of section 71 will always avert a failure of justice, though in such cases justice comes later on, for the immediate question turning upon such a difference may concern the power of the police to take cognizance of the offence, since while cheating is now cognizable, an offence under this section is not, and the distinction may at times have a practical bearing on the question.

4378. In ordinary cases, the distinction between the two offences would turn upon the absence of fraudulent or dishonest inducement which is the essence of cheating. But it is clear that there may be such inducement for delivery and consequent misappropriation, in which case the offence would probably be regarded as more appropriately cheating rather than criminal misappropriation. But between cheating and criminal misappropriation there is this difference that while deception is the essence of the one crime it is by no means the essence of the other.(13) There may be deception incidentally but it is not its essential element. Moreover, a person may quite honestly come into possession of the property in which case his taking would be honest thus excluding possibility of the application of section 415, but his subsequent retention may be dishonest thereby converting his taking into criminal misappropriation. Now, applying these principles to the case last cited, the accused may have honestly believed that the necklet belonged to his Jat acquaintance when he made the first representation, but having thus obtained delivery of it, he may have changed his mind and decided to keep what he may be in duty bound to deliver to its lawful owner.

This case is not unlike that of the illiterate boy of fourteen named Boucher, who having found a lost cheque, showed it to the prisoner who falsely told the boy that it was an old cheque and that he wished to show it to a friend, and so retained it. The boy demanded the cheque from the prisoner but the latter put him off with sundry excuses till the boy ceased asking for it. The cheque belonged to one Goldsmith who had offered a reward to its finder and the jury found that "the prisoner took the cheque from Boucher in the hope of getting the reward; and, if that is larceny, we find him guilty," and, upon a case reserved, it was held that these facts did not show any felonious taking. The mere withholding of the cheque in the circumstances did not amount to such a taking as is required to constitute the offence of larceny.(14) But in view of Explanation I, it is evident that such retention is sufficient to constitute misappropriation and if such a case arose in this country there can be no doubt but that the accused would be convicted under this section. In this case there was no appropriation to the use of the accused, but a simple misappropriation, within the meaning assigned to that term in this section.

Misappropriation is a Mental Act : How Proved.

4379. Strictly speaking, an appropriation is a mental act and implies an allocation of a thing as one's own. In this sense, appropriation may be completed, as soon as a person decides to set a thing apart to one's exclusive use. So it was observed by the

(13) Raghubir, 51 I. C. (A) 173, 20 Cr. L. J. 413.

(14) (1862) Gardner, L. & C. 243.

Punjab Chief Court: "There may be a misappropriation by a mental act without any expenditure of the money thus appropriated. The fact that the money has not been expended is a circumstance to be taken into account as evidence in favour of the view that there has been no mental appropriation, but the circumstance is not conclusive that there has been no such appropriation. Again, this must be established by some overt and visible act, but actual expenditure of the money is not the only proof of it.(15)

The accused, who was the servant of A, was entrusted with A's money for the purpose of purchasing grain at J. He left for J with the money and went off to H without giving any information to A of his departure, and subsequently gave false account of it. He was arrested at H and the whole of the money was found in his possession. It was contended for him that he could not be convicted of criminal breach of trust as a servant as the money had been found intact with him and there was no evidence that he had converted it to his own use. But it was held that the first possession being lawful the misappropriation consisted not in any actual expenditure of the money but in a mental act or intent to deprive the master of his property without any outward or visible trespass, and which was rightly inferred from the conduct of the accused.(16)

4380. Both criminal misappropriation and criminal breach of trust imply existence of property in a person other than the accused. It is of the essence of misappropriation that the property itself should not be at the absolute disposal of the accused.(17) If it is, there can be neither misappropriation nor criminal breach of trust, though it may then be a case of cheating. So there can be no trust when there is a loan, for a loan confers on the borrower a beneficial interest in the thing lent. The borrower may refuse to lend a thing but he cannot then be prosecuted for criminal breach of trust, though he may be for criminal misappropriation, if it is proved. But it cannot be inferred from a mere false denial of a loan, for it may amount to no more than an attempt to evade civil liability for the money or the chattel lent. It is undoubtedly evidence of that offence, but it is not conclusive.(18)

4381. It will be observed that though the section speaks of "misappropriation" thereby implying appropriation which is wrongful, its wrongfulness must not be judged by any standard other than that of dishonesty as laid down in sections 23 and 24. In other words, a misappropriation is only criminal if it is dishonest, and if it is not dishonest, it is not criminal, though it may be otherwise wrongful. Nothing then turns upon the use of the word "misappropriates" which as the illustrations and Explanation II make clear is merely used in the sense of "appropriates."

(15) Per Plowden, J., in Kesho Ram, (1889) P. R. No. 36; Rambilas, 38 M. 639; Ram Byas Rai, 47 I.C. (Pat.) 667, 19 Cr. L. J. 943.

(16) Kesho Ram, (1889) P. R. No. 36.

(17) Hira Lal, (1908) P. R. No 36.

(18) Girji, (1904) 6 Bom. L. R. 1093 (1094).

When Appropriation Becomes Dishonest.

4382. The appropriation must then be, in any case, made dishonestly, from which it follows that in order to be dishonest, the property must be appropriated or converted with the intention of causing wrongful gain to one person or wrongful loss to another, that is, with the intention to cause gain by unlawful means of property to which the person gaining it is not legally entitled, or the loss by unlawful means of property to which the person losing it is entitled (§§ 243-254). The gain or loss of property and the gain or loss of the possession of property are, however, not necessarily identical things, and the distinction is specially clear when the loss of possession is only temporary and is intended by such person who causes such loss to be temporary only. Where there is no intention to cause wrongful gain or wrongful loss of property, and merely an intention to deprive the owner temporarily of the use of property, there is no dishonesty. No doubt Explanation I refers to a temporary misappropriation, but it does not extend the meaning of an appropriation to wrongful gain or loss of possession of property as distinct from wrongful gain or loss of the property itself.[19] But the former may be evidence of an attempt to cause wrongful gain or loss of property.

So where the accused, a postal peon, while helping a sorter secreted two bearing letters, which were promptly recovered from his person. He confessed his intention to be to misappropriate the bearing fee due thereon: he was convicted of an attempt to commit this offence, and in affirming his conviction the Court said: "The intention of the accused was admittedly a dishonest intention, viz., that of causing wrongful gain to himself and wrongful loss to the Post Office. To carry out that intention, he, for the time being, took the letters into his own personal possession and out of the possession of the Post Office, or, in other words, he appropriated the letters. The letters were, until delivery, property to the possession of which the Post Office was entitled, and should have been handed over in the ordinary course to the delivery peon, whose possession would, of course, in point of law, have continued to be that of the Post Office until such time as the letters were delivered. The accused, by taking possession of the letters with the dishonest intention which he admitted, was guilty, we consider, of the offence of stealing and of fraudulently appropriating the letters within the meaning of the section, and also of the offence of theft, and of attempt to commit misappropriation of the property within the meaning of the Penal Code."[20]

4383. Such a case is, of course, widely different from one in which the accused, a joint-proprietor of a certain property takes exclusive possession of it, though he might not have such title as to justify his possession.[21] On the other hand, the fact that the accused was lawfully in possession of the property does not negative his liability for his offence which depends upon an appropriation or conversion which is dishonest. So in a case where the accused, who was the judgment-debtor in a case, and as such, whose standing crops were attached

(19) Jhandu, (1886) P. R. No. 27.
(20) Venkatasami, 14 M. 229.
(21) Parbutty Churn Chuckerbutty, 14 W. R. 13 (14).

by his creditor, harvested them in spite of the attachment removing the crops against their being made available in execution of the decree, Benson, J., held both this section as well as section 424 applicable, but his colleague Davies, J., was content to affirm the conviction under the latter section.(22)

Wrongful Conversion.

4384. The terms "misappropriation" and "conversion" do not imply merely wrongful receipt of property, but receipt under circumstances so as to make the act one of conscious assertion of a right or title which vests it with the necessary element of criminality. The accused, an old thief, found a purse containing valuables lying on the floor of a temple during a religious fair, and which he picked up and concealed in his waist-cloth, and as he was making off with it he was arrested by the police, and on a search being made, the purse was found concealed in his dhoti. He did not appear to have opened it before his arrest. He was convicted of this offence, but the Court annulled his conviction, holding that his temporary possession of the purse did not amount to either misappropriation or wrongful conversion within the meaning of this section.

As Chatterji, J., put it: "Section 403 requires that the property should be shown to have been misappropriated or converted to his own use by the accused. The mere possession of the property is not sufficient for proving the charge without something to indicate the appropriation or conversion, though long possession without any attempt to find the owner, may amount to evidence of intention to do so. There is no proof of any overt act indicating conversion or appropriation to his own use, nor did any interval of time worth considering elapse between the taking and the arrest, to raise any presumption from the mere act of detention, of an intention to misappropriate or convert. Explanation 2 to s. 403, I think, makes the necessity of some positive proof of this sort quite clear. Illustration (a)shows that the picking up of a rupee, whose owner is not known, is not an offence. Similarly, illustration(c) shows that the finding of a purse with money belonging to an unknown owner is not an offence, but the appropriation of it to the finder's own use is necessary to complete it."(23)

Such was the case of a constable who had caught a strayed sheep intended for sacrifice, and on his transfer from the Police Station House to which he was attached, he took it with him.(24) Such again would be the case if the agent who was given a sum of money by the principal, failed to deliver it to him, and he could not be found when the principal wanted to call him to account for it.(25) The accused was found riding a mare with its filly following it. He was questioned by the lambarder of a village through which he passed and he made a false statement, whereupon he was prosecuted under this section, for misappropriation of a mare which he had seized while grazing out in the common. The accused defended himself by falsely stating

(22) Obayya, 22 M. 151.
(23) Phuman, (1908) P. R. No. 11.
(24) Sarju Mallah, 17 A. L. J. 145, 49 I. C. 778, 20 Cr. L. J. 218.
(25) Gowkaran Lal, 1 Pat. L. T. 200, 56 I. C. 775, 21 Cr. L. J. 519.

that he was taking the mare to the pond at S, which again was a false statement. It however appeared that he had seized the mare as he got tired on the way, and that he intended to ride her to his house upon reaching which he intended to set her free. His subsequent false statement was attributed to his fear, and as the act as proved was held not to amount to misappropriation he was acquitted.(1)

4385. Again, there is a difference between misappropriation and the mere non-fulfilment of a legal obligation. For instance, where the prisoner purchased hides of a certain value from the prosecutrix, but deducted from the price a sum on account of a former debt which the prosecutrix repudiated, the prisoner's act was held not to amount to misappropriation or criminal conversion within the meaning of this section.(2) The terms "misappropriation" and "conversion" have both reference to property as distinct from a claim to property, which being a legal obligation is a chose in action, the non-fulfilment of which constitutes a breach of contract but not a misappropriation.

Temporary Misappropriation.

4386. These were cases of chattel in which temporary possession was held to be excusable on the ground that it did not amount to a misappropriation. But such cases are to be distinguished from those in which the accused misappropriates a sum of money for a time intending to make it good eventually. But in this case, the money must have remained with the prosecutor for at least so long as to justify the Court to hold that the accused had converted the money to his own use. The accused was an income-tax clerk, and as such received a sum of money which he did not credit into the treasury for six months, when he made a false entry in the remittance book as to the date of receipt. He admitted having had the money for six months, but he pleaded that he intended to credit the amount as soon as he could without detection. He was convicted of this offence and his conviction was affirmed.(3) The case would have been the same even if the accused had been in private service. It is the duty of a servant receiving moneys for his master to account them to him, and if he mixes the collection with his own moneys and so applies his master's money to his own use dishonestly and falsifies the account so as to conceal his fraud, he would be guilty of this offence.(4) In this respect the English rule appears to be identical,(5) though the conviction in such cases there, would be had for larceny or embezzlement.

4387. In such a case, the question depends not so much upon the length of misappropriation as upon the intention and purpose of the accused. Of course, the lapse of time is evidence of dishonesty, but it may be coupled with the small amount of the money and also evidence of forgetfulness. The accused was the kurnam of a village, and as such received a sum of money from the head of the village for the purpose of remitting it to a Government Treasury. This was not his duty,

---

(1) Muhammada, (1906) 7 P. L. R. 100.
(2) Boystum Moochee, 17 W. R. 11.
(3) Rama Krishna, 12 M. 49.
(4) Kareem Bux, 2 N. W. P. H. C. R. 30.
(5) Proud, L. & C. 97; Tyree, L. R. 1, C. C. R. 177.

but he undertook to make the remittance, but told the headman that it would be troublesome to remit it on the day of receipt. He retained it from 13th March to 8th May when the Tahsildar having held an inquiry into the arrears due by the villagers, the kurnam made the remittance. He was held to have committed this offence, though the High Court felt themselves precluded from quashing his acquittal (6)

Appropriation or Conversion must be Dishonest.

4388. Such questions depend upon the question whether the appropriation or conversion was dishonest. Now in order to be dishonest, an act must be something more than merely illegal, it follows that an act cannot be criminal under this section, if it is otherwise legitimate or legal. For instance, the managing member of a joint Hindu family is entitled under Hindu law to collect keep and sell the produce of the family lands, notwithstanding the wish of any of the coparceners to the contrary, such coparcener being only entitled to an account of the family income at the time of partition and not to the payment of a share of the produce, whenever it is collected. Consequently, if while the partition was going on, such manager sells the produce of the family lands still undivided, and failed to keep an account of the rents paid to him by tenants, he could not be convicted of criminal misappropriation on the ground that the sale of the produce had been opposed by the complainant coparcener.

As the Court said: "Such managing member may be liable to a charge of misappropriation if, after a division of property has taken place and the share of each member of the family has been ascertained, it is found that the manager has wrongfully applied to his own use the share that belongs to one of the other coparaceners, but so long as no account of produce or money has been taken, or the shares ascertained, no member of an undivided Hindu family has the right to claim any particular share or property as his separate property, and no prosecution against the manager for misappropriation would lie. The mere fact that there has been a general agreement to divide does not entitle one of the coparceners to claim any defined portion of the estate, nor does it even enable him to say that he is entitled to any quantum in an isolated item of the property, until division entrusts the property to the manager."(7)

But, of course, this case is no authority for holding that a person may not criminally misappropriate joint property, for the fact that the property was joint may lend colour to an assertion of good faith, thus repelling a charge of dishonesty; it is not of itself an answer to the charge. The accused Sania had removed certain property from the house of her husband's deceased brother which she claimed to be the joint-property of her husband and the deceased, and the removal of which she justified on the ground that she had removed it to prevent its being squandered by the widow of the deceased on her paramour. It was found that there was no sufficient evidence to justify any finding as to whether the property was joint as asserted by the accused, or separate as claimed by the prosecution. It was, however, held that that question was immaterial as its appropriation was dishonest and so constituted an offence under this section.(8)

(6) Madduri Krishnanima, (1883) 1 Weir 455.

(7) Anon, (1880) 1 Weir 453 (454).

Presumably, in this case, the Court was of opinion that the plea of the accused that she had removed the property to save it from being wasted, had not been made out, but the plea was well worth considering, for the question whether the property was kept with a dishonest intention, or only on an erroneous belief that the prisoner was justified in keeping it, is material, for in the latter case, the act would not consititute the offence of criminal misappropriation.(9) This was the view taken by Jardine and Ranade, JJ., in a case in which the accused claimed to retain the money collected by him on behalf of the prosecutor in satisfaction of what was due to him under a decree against the former.

4389. Claim of Right.—This suggests the question: is a person guilty of no offence if he illegally converts to his own use money, believing that he had a right to it? It is apprehended that in such a case, the act of the accused would be sufficiently dishonest to amount to criminal misappropriation under this section. So it has been held by Jackson and Markby, JJ., that a servant who retains money which he was authorized to collect, and which he did collect from the debtor of his master, because money is due to him as wages, is guilty of criminal misappropriation. But in this case, the element of dishonesty was otherwise present. The accused who was a peon employed by the prosecutor to collect outstandings, sent him to do so. He realized a sum for which he passed an acknowledgment in his own name instead of the one signed by the prosecutor which he returned to him, stating that the debt was not recovered. It was ascertained that he had realized the amount, for which he was prosecuted, whereupon he defended himself by claiming to have paid himself his arrears of salary out of the sum so realized. He was discharged by the Joint Magistrate, but Jackson, J., in convicting him said: "It would be most mischievous if the law were understood to be as supposed by the Joint Magistrate, that servants employed in collecting their masters' debts were at liberty to keep back such debts, when collected, in satisfaction of claims of their own, and to inform their masters that the amounts so kept back had not been realized from their debtors."(10) But would it have made any difference if the accused had told the truth, refusing at the same time to deliver up the money and claiming to appropriate it in view of his wages overdue? It seems not, because no servant has the right to pay himself out of his master's money which he receives and retains for a specific purpose, and which he is bound to account to him. His position in such matters is not different from that of a trustee of the money which he is bound faithfully to account to him for whom he received it. The contrary view could only be supported on the assumption of a lien which no servant possesses in such cases.

Legal Lien.

4390. Such lien is no doubt declared in certain cases by law, and when it is so, the retention of property in assertion of the right of lien would then be not only

(8) Pania, (Mt.), (1881) A. W. N. 85.
(9) Khanderao, (1894) B. U. C. 700.
(10) Bissessur Roy, 11 W. R. 51.

not illegal but is perfectly justifiable. Such lien is, for example, declared in favour of a bailee who has in accordance with the purpose of his bailment rendered any service involving the exercise of labour or skill in respect of the goods bailed and which he may, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, retain until he receives due remuneration for the service he has rendered in respect of them.(11) Such a right may be claimed by a diamond cutter who has spent labour on polishing a stone which he has a right to retain until he is paid for the services he has rendered.(12) The same right enures in favour of a tailor who is presumably entitled to a lien on the garments made by him in lieu of his wages. So bankers, wharfingers, attorneys of a High Court and policy brokers may, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, retain as a security for a general balance of account, any goods bailed to them, as such, but no other persons have a right to retain as a security for such balance, goods bailed to them, unless there is an express contract to that effect.(13) An agent is, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, entitled to retain goods, papers and other property, whether moveable or immoveable, of the principal received by him until the amount due to himself for commission disbursements and services in respect of the same has been paid or accounted for to him.(14) So the Indian Railways possess statutory liens conferred on them for recovery of rates, terminals and other charges.(15)

Lien Negatives Dishonesty.

4391. But these are exceptional cases in which a person is given a certain right of appropriation and which he may then exercise within the limits and for the purpose for which the right has been conferred. In such cases there can be no misappropriation; but between such cases and dishonesty there is a wide gulf, for it cannot be readily assumed that as soon as an act ceases to be legal, it becomes dishonest. In order to constitute dishonesty there must be an intention to cause gain or loss by unlawful means of property to which the person gaining is not legally entitled.(16) In other words, in order to constitute dishonesty there must be not only an unlawful means employed to cause an illegal gain or loss, but also an intention to cause such gain or loss. An act which falls short of this is not dishonest, howmuchsoever illegal it might be. The prisoner's house was searched on a charge of dacoity, and certain bonds evidencing debts were recovered from his possession. They did not belong to him and the complainant alleged that they had been stolen by dacoits. The prisoner said that he had picked them up at a ferry ghat. The case of dacoity having failed the prosecution laid the charge of criminal misappropriation of the bonds against the prisoner, but Glover and Loch, JJ., acquitted him holding that the mere possession of bonds which he had certainly picked up as alleged did not amount to criminal misappropriation, merely because the prisoner had made no effort to find out the owner. He had made no

(11) S. 170, Indian Contract Act (IX of 1872).
(12) Ib., ill. (a).
(13) Ib., s. 171.
(14) Ib., s. 221.
(15) Indian Railways Act (IX of 1890) s. 55.
(16) Ss. 23. 24. Comm y.

attempt to realise the amount of the bond, or done any act which might be construed into a conversion of the property to his own use.[17]

The same view was taken in another case in which the accused had picked up a purse containing money from the floor of a temple, and which he put into his waist-cloth pocket. He was arrested almost immediately and before he could open it to examine its contents. It was held that the mere picking up of an article and taking possession of it for a time did not amount to dishonest appropriation or conversion so as to be punishable under this section. "Both appropriation and conversion include the substitution of one purpose for another as the object to which the object is to be devoted, and unless it is assumed that the petitioner picked up the bag with the intention of appropriating or converting it to his own use, a conviction under section 403 is justified only by the finding that he so appropriated or converted it after he had picked it up, neither the assumption nor the finding is, in my opinion, justified by the fact that that he had taken no steps to restore the bag to its owner when he was arrested. Having regard to the denseness of the crowd, the petitioner may very possibly have thought that the bag had remained on the ground for a considerable period before he found it, and may have thought it useless to proclaim the discovery at once."[18] The accused in this case had been twice before convicted of theft, but the Court agreed that that fact could not be taken into account in determining the criminality of the accused's act; for to do so would be to let in evidence of bad character which section 54 of the Indian Evidence Act[19] makes inadmissible.

4392. Proof of Dishonesty.—The question whether the act of the accused is dishonest so as to amount to criminal misappropriation under this section, is one of fact, and its determination must, therefore, depend upon the proved circumstances of each case. The fact that an act of the accused was dishonest and that it was connected with property, does not make it a dishonest misappropriation of property. That term implies something more than a mere non-fulfilment of an obligation. Where, for instance, the accused purchased some hides of the complainant and out of the price refused to pay a sum alleging it to have been taken in lieu of a former debt, and upon which he was prosecuted for this offence, it was held that it was a matter of trade between the prosecutor and the accused and that the latter could not be convicted of this offence.[20]

The accused had agreed to give his daughter in marriage to the complainant's son, whereupon the complainant delivered to him jewels, clothes and sweets against the betrothal. The accused retained the presents but broke off the match. The complainant demanded the return of his clothes and jewels which the accused refused. He was convicted of this offence but the High Court acquitted him in revision holding that the presents were retained because the accused had shown that the complainant was to blame for the failure of the ceremony and the accused felt justified in retaining the jewels as he had incurred expense and claimed compensation for breach of the contract. In other

(17) Abdul, 10 W. R. 23 A.
(18) Phuman, (1908) P. R. No. 11
(19) Act I of 1872.
(20) Boystum Moochee, 17 W. R. 11

words, his retention of them was not dishonest.(21) Other cases have been similarly decided upon the facts which call for no comment.(22) Money paid to a person by mistake may be the subject of criminal misappropriation, in the same way as money received for one purpose is misappropriated by being converted by the payee to his own use. The prisoner, a railway booking clerk, received from a passenger applying for a railway ticket Rs. 17 instead of 17 pice, which the prisoner received and kept being aware of the mistake under which it was paid to him. But on an inquiry being made he refunded the amount to the prosecutor. He was held to have brought himself within the penalties of this section.(23)

4393. But in England, it is an ancient doctrine that an innocent receipt of money and its fraudulent appropriation do not constitute larceny,(24) so that where a bag of money intended for one was delivered to and received by another and the latter kept the money consciously even exclaiming, "the biter has got bit: he has paid me double wages," it was held that inasmuch as the prisoner had not at the moment of receipt the animus furandi, he could not be convicted of larceny.(25) But this view proceeds upon the view of common law that there can be no larceny without trespass, and there can be no trespass where the prisoner has obtained lawful possession of the goods alleged to be stolen, or in other words, the thief must take the goods into his possession with the intention of depriving the owner of them. If he has got the goods lawfully into his possession before the intention of depriving the owner of them is formed, there is no larceny.(1)

This view sometimes leads to curious results. Suppose the prisoner asks the prosecutor for the loan of a shilling and the latter gives him a sovereign by mistake, which the prisoner receives, believing it to be a shilling. He discovers his mistake sometime afterwards, but then he decides to misappropriate it to his own use. Such a case arose, but upon a case reserved for the opinion of fourteen Judges, the Court was equally divided, seven being for affirming the conviction and the remaining seven for quashing it. The conviction therefore stood, but the point remained undecided.(2) But a similar point was disposed of in another case in which the prisoner applied for the withdrawal of 10*s.* out of the 11*s.* which stood to his credit in the Post Office Savings Bank. The postal clerk by mistake placed on the counter £8 16*s.* 10*d.*, which was the sum due to another customer. The amount was debited in the accused's pass-book, and the prisoner took away the money. He was found then to possess an animus furandi and eleven against four Judges held him guilty of larceny.(3)

(21) Nasir Khan v. Fyaz Hassain, 72 I. C. 348, (1922) A. I. R. (C.) 57, 24 Cr. L. J. 348.

(22) Soban Lal, 13 A. L. J. 1131, 31 I. C. 651, 16 Cr. L. J. 795; Ram Khelawan, 52 I. C. (Pat.) 430, 20 Cr. L. J. 654.

(23) Sham Soondur, 2 N. W. P. H. C. R. 475.

(24) Per Lord Coleridge, C. J., in Flowers, 16 Q. B. D. 643 (646).

(25) Ib.; to the same effect, Cockburn, C. J., in Middleton, L. R. 2 C. C. 38 (45); Mucklow, 1 Moo. C. C. 160; Davies, Dears C. C. 640; Thurborn, 1 Den. C. C. 387; Glyde, L. R. 1 C. C. 139.

(1) Per Cave, J., in Ashwell, 16 Q. B. D. 190 (200).

(2) Ashwell, 16 Q. B. D. 190 (226).

(3) Middleton, L. R. 2 C.C.R. 38; to the same effect, Hollis, 12 Q. B. D. 25; Helire, 18 Cox 267.

4394. In this country, such a question is as unnecessary as it is irrelevant (§§ 4367, 4368). An act at one time honest may at any other time become dishonest, so as to bring the offender within the penal visitation of this section. The Shebait or the priest of an idol being in charge of the property belonging to the idol is bound to use it for the purposes of that idol, and he would be guilty of criminal misappropriation if he dishonestly uses it on himself.(4) The accused met the prosecutrix in the Benares Railway Station. He had himself a ticket for the Benares Cantonment Station. He induced the prosecutrix to let him see if she had the right ticket for Ajudhia which she gave him to look at. He then surreptitiously changed that ticket for his which he delivered to her. He was promptly detected and gave up the ticket. The Sessions Judge convicted him of cheating under section 420, but Burkitt, J., held the offence to be one under this section, inasmuch as he had dishonestly misappropriated the ticket the prosecutrix had given him to look at.(5)

4395. Property must have an Owner.—Dishonest misappropriation of property implies appropriation by a person to which he is not entitled. Now property to which a person is not entitled must be property to which another person is entitled. If, therefore, a thing was res nullius, the accused could not by appropriating it, be said to have caused wrongful gain or wrongful loss, for "wrongful" is a relative term, and there can be no wrong where there is no infraction of a legal right. Consequently, no one could be convicted of theft, much less of this offence by appropriating a thing which was, or believed to be, ownerless. Property of the former kind has been sufficiently described in dealing with the subject of theft. Animals ferræ naturæ, fish in a navigable river or creek, or in the open sea are instances of such property. A human body, whether dead or alive, is also not property so as to be capable of theft or misappropriation.(6)

In this respect the present law is an improvement upon that prevailing during the days of slavery, when human beings were regarded as property and, as such, could be made the fit subjects of traffic and huckster. In those days a person seducing a slave might conceivably have been guilty of criminal misappropriation. Indeed, as has been elsewhere remarked, property is the creature of law, and objects may become or cease to be property in accordance with its mandate. For instance, water and gas were at one time not property, but they may now be both reduced into possession and then they may be the subject both of theft and criminal misappropriation. The term "property" as here used, does not merely mean a thing of value, but a thing which is capable of ownership, and in fact has an owner. So where the accused who professed to help the complainant in his case in Court, made off with a bundle of his cancelled cheques, which he was preparing to file in Court, it was held that though they had been honoured and cancelled, they were still property, even assuming that they were of no value further than the paper upon which they were written, and that as such, they could be made the subject of theft, misappropriation and criminal breach of trust, and as they had obviously evidentiary value the Court held it to be no case under section 95.(7)

(4) Guru Siddheshvar, (1897) B.U.C. 919.
(5) Raza Hussain, (1904) A. W. N. 9.
(6) Ramadhin, 25 A. 129.
(7) Maula Buksh, 27 A. 28.

4396. This was the view taken by Grose, J., of the paper and stamps of the notes of county bankers which had been paid off but which might have been re-issued. The question referred to the twelve Judges was whether such papers and stamps in transitu constituted property, and Grose, J., in delivering the judgment of the Court, said : "The question submitted in this case to the consideration of the Judges was, whether the paper and stamps are, under the circumstances of the case, the subjects of larceny at common law; or in other terms, whether they are the property of, and are of any value to, Messrs. Large and Co. (the county bankers) who were unquestionably the owners of them. These gentlemen had paid for the paper, the printing, and the stamps of these papers, which once existed, both in character and in value, as promissory notes. Their character and value as promissory notes were certainly extinct at the time they were stolen; but, even in this state, they bore about them a capability of being legally restored to their former character and pristine value. It was a capability in which these owners had a special interest and property. The act of re-issuing them would have immediately manifested their value as papers, for it would have saved their owners an expense of reprinting other notes, and of purchasing notes, to which expense, it was proved, they were put, on their being deprived of these papers, by the crime of the prisoner. In what sense or meaning, therefore, can it be said that these stamped papers were not the valuable property of their owners? They were indeed, only of value to those owners; but it is enough that they were of value to them, their value as to the rest of the world is immaterial. The Judges, therefore, are of opinion, that to the extent of the price of the paper, the printing, and the stamps, they were valuable property belonging to the prosecutors; and that the prisoner has been legally convicted."[8]

Derelict Cattle.

4397. No Property: No Misappropriation.—The mere fact that a thing was capable of ownership, does not make it property so as to make its appropriation a punishable wrong. As an example of this may be mentioned a bull set at large in accordance with the religious usage of the Hindus, which would thereupon cease to be property within the meaning of the Code, inasmuch as not only was it not then the subject of ownership by any person, but the original owner having surrendered all his rights as its proprietor, it became a nullius proprietas and incapable of theft or misappropriation as even a ferræ naturæ.[9] Of course, a person abandoning his property in such a bull may again acquire property therein by bringing it under his control, but the mere fact that it receives some attention from the cowherd of its late liberator, and is daily fed by him by his direction, and is not used for breeding purposes without his permission, is not inconsistent with its total surrender.[10] Consequently, a person who killed it for food could not be charged with theft, criminal misappropriation or mischief, nor of any offence intended to protect rights in property,[11] though such a person may be conceivably guilty of other offences if his object was to

(8) Clark's case, 2 Leach. 1036 ; so the halves of bank-notes are property for they might be at any moment joined; Mead. 4 C. & P. 535; Jones, 1 Den C. C. 551.

(9) Bandhu, 8 A. 51; Nihal, 9 A. 349; Romesh Chander Saynal v. Hira Mandal, 17 C. 852 ; Sita, 18 B. 212, Sarajul, Hayue, 67 I. C. (Pat.) 497, 23 Cr. L. J. 401 (derelict cow) ; Dwarka Dass v. Narasimhulu 44 M. L. J. 128, (1923) A. I. R. (M.) 364.

(10) Romesh Chunder Sanyal v. Hiru Mondul, 17 C. 852.

(11) Romesh Chunder Sanyal v. Hiru Mondul, 17 C. 852.

wound the religious feelings of the Hindus, or if the killing was done in an unnecessarily public or offensive manner. But in such cases, the offence has nothing to do with rights in property and the accused might just as much be guilty of the offence if the bull he killed was his own (§§ 2655-2658).

Abandoned Property.

4398. The accused, who was in the service of the prosecutor, had been ordered by the latter to take several bags of waste paper belonging to them to their yard at Garden Reach in Calcutta and there burn and destroy them. The accused took the papers, but instead of burning them sold them in the market. It was held that the accused's act amounted to no offence,[12] presumably because the owner, having condemned the paper for destruction, had abandoned all property therein, and the bags were then res nullius as soon as they were handed to the accused for destruction. Such was the guiding principle of the case in which a consignment of rice lying unclaimed at the Kidderpore Docks was first advertised for sale, but being condemned as unfit for consumption, its sale was countermanded and it was delivered to the accused for destruction at the incinerator at Goragatcha. The accused took possession of the rice and sold a part of it for Rs. 1,000. He was prosecuted under section 409, but Hill, J., held that the rice was not "property" within the meaning of the section and the accused was discharged.[13] The accused went to see the complainant to whom the postman delivered a letter which he read and then threw on the table. The accused picked it up and later on sought to use it in a case against the complainant. The Court held that recipient had abandoned the letter as much as if he had thrown it into a waste paper basket.[14] It is submitted that that intention was not deducible from the mere fact of his laying it on the table. Where goods are delivered to the vendee the vendor transfers their ownership to him. He cannot afterwards prosecute him for this offence if the vendee denies their receipt and refuses to pay them.[15] There is nothing in the section to preclude partners from rendering themselves guilty of this offence.[16] A partner who is in possession of partnership assets, is bound to account for them to his other partners. If, therefore, he appropriates them to his own use in denial of the right of the other, he would be liable.

Property not in Possession.

4399. It will be observed that this offence materially differs from theft in that it may be committed in respect of property not in possession of any person. For example, a person could not be guilty of theft of two logs of wood which he found drifting in a river during a high flood and took possession of them. His conviction for theft was out of the question because he had reclaimed logs when they were in no one's possession. But he might have been convicted of this offence, but the fact that he had left them exposed unused in front of his house for several months, was held to negative his criminal intentions, and he was acquitted.[17]

(12) Preo Nath Chowdhry, 29 C. 489.
(13) Wilkinson, 2 C. W. N. 216.
(14) Harris, 40 A. 119.
(15) Velayutham, 72 I. C. (M) 172 ; 24 Cr. L. J. 332.
(16) Nrigendra Lall v. Okhoy Coomar, 21 W. R. 59, F.B., Bhudhar Mal v. Ramchunder, 1 Pat. L. T. 217, 55 I. C. 674, 21 Cr. L. J. 338.
(17) Murugan, (1883) 1 Weir 455.

Such a case may be saved by Explanation 2, to which no reference was made by the Court, but which is distinctly in point.

Explanation 2 (1) Derelict Property.

4400. Appropriation of Lost Property.—That explanation adopts the English rule as to a finder of property, but in a form much more restricted and qualified than that rule (§ 4368). It enacts that a finder may innocently acquire property in a thing if he has not the means of discovering the owner, or has after he has used reasonable means to communicate with the owner, kept it at his disposal for a reasonable time. Appended to this explanation there are six illustrations which are all taken from the English decided cases and many of which have the effect of overruling them so far as this country is concerned (§4368). But both the English and the rule here enacted coincide in excluding from the offence abandoned property. But the question in such a case is: When is a property abandoned?

As Rolfe, B. told the jury in a case in which the accused stood charged with stealing a gold chain, breast pin, eyeglass and pin: "If a man is possessed of a chattel, he does not lose the property in it, because he places or drops it in a field; nay, if he drops it in a street, it still remains his property. The only case where a party can be justified in converting it to his own use is, where it has fallen, where a party may fairly say that the owner has abandoned it, or if the party cannot be found to whom it belonged. If I had an apple and dropped it, it might be presumed that I abandoned it; but if I drop £500, the presumption is that I do not mean to abandon it. If I drop a thing where there is no reasonable means of finding out that it belongs to me then, though I am found out to be the owner, the party finding it would not be guilty of felony if he converted it to his own use, though he would be liable to an action of trover.[18] Illustration (a) is an example. A finds a rupee on the high road, not knowing to whom it belongs. He picks it up and converts it to his own use. He is not guilty of this offence. And it was so held in a case from which the illustration is drawn[19]

In that case it was laid down that the finder of a sovereign in the high road, who, at the time of finding, had no reasonable means of knowing who the owner was, but who at the time intended to appropriate it even if the owner should afterwards become known and to whom the owner became soon afterwards known, was not guilty of larceny, even though he refused to deliver it up to the owner. It will be probably so decided in this country in the case of money which carry on their face no indicia of individual ownership, and property which passes from hand to hand by mere delivery. So where the accused discovered some coins buried in his land which he had purchased and whereupon he was convicted of this offence, Couch, C. J., and Newton, J., annulled the conviction holding that "the rupees which were acquired were derelict and not in the possession of any person."[20] Such a case must, however, be distinguished from (18) (1843), Peters, 1 C. & K. 245.

(19) Glyde, 37 L. J. M. C. 107, following (per Martin, B.) Thurborn, 18 L. J. M. C. 140.

(20) Chodapa, (1868) B. U. C. 8: see now s. 20, Treasure Trove Act (VI of 1878), under which omission to give notice is penal.

that presented in illustration (b) which is, again founded on English precedent,[21] the facts of which have been stated before.

(ii) When Owner is Traceable and when he is Not.

4401. That case was followed in another in which the prosecutor had lost a £10 Bank of England note in a hair-dresser's shop, and the jury found that he had dropped it in the shop of the prisoner who found it there, and who had then no knowledge nor a reasonable means of knowledge as to its owner, but that he acquired that knowledge subsequently, after which he converted it to his own use, that when he picked it up he intended to appropriate it, whoever might have been its owner, and that he believed at the time he found it that the owner could be discovered. On these facts it was held on a case reserved, that the prisoner was guilty of larceny.[22]

This case was decided upon the principle formulated in Thurborn's case,[23] in accordance with which though the note was lost, because it was dropped out of the owner's purse, property in it was not abandoned, nor was the owner without means of tracing the owner. So in the illustration, since the latter contains directions as to the owner, the finder is guilty because he had ready means of discovering the owner. The same principle pervades the next illustration which is also an English precedent,[24] in which[25] Parke, B., said: "Suppose a person finds a cheque in the street, and in the first instance, takes it up merely to see what it is; if afterwards he cashes it, and appropriates the money to his own use, that is a felony, though he is a mere finder till he looks at it."[1] But this view is not quite reconcilable to that taken in another case decided in 1862[2] in which a lad aged fourteen by name Boucher, found a cheque on a road which he showed to the prisoner, he himself being illiterate. The prisoner told him that it was an old cheque and so put him off till he ceased demanding it back. The jury found that the prisoner knew that the cheque belonged to Goldsmith and that he retained it to earn a larger reward than the five shillings offered to its finder, and on a case reserved it was held that the mere withholding of the cheque under the circumstances did not amount to such a taking as is required to constitute the offence of larceny.[3]

It may be a question whether such a case would be covered by this exception. Could it be said that in retaining the cheque the finder was keeping it to restore it to the owner? He was but on terms which the owner may consider prohibitive. It is apprehended that retaining a cheque to enforce an extortionate demand may well be regarded as a punishable misappropriation. The next two illustrations (d) and (e) are also English cases.[4] They are both illustrations which did not form a part of the original draft but were subsequently added. They refer to two distinct cases depending upon the acquisition of knowledge as to the owner: such knowledge being in case (d) acquired contemporaneously with the (21) Thurston's case, 18 L. J. M. C. 140.

(22) Moore, (1861) L, & C. 1.
(23) 18 L. J. M. C. 140.
(24) Thurborn, 18 L. J. M. C. 140, as adopted in Merry v. Green, 7 M. & W. 623; Gardner, L. &. C. 243.
(25) Merry v. Green, 7 M. &. W. 623.
(1) Ib.
(2) Gardner, (1862) L. & C. C. R. 243.
(3) Gardner, (1862) L. & C. C. R. 243.
(4) West, (1854) Dears C. C. R. 402.

finding: it being in the other case acquired afterwards. This difference marks the difference between criminality and non-criminality in English law, but it is wholly immaterial in the Code. In this respect illustration (c) is directly opposed to the English rule which was stated by Lord Hale to be that if A find the purse of B in the highway and take it and carry it away, with all the circumstances that usually prove the animus furandi, yet it is not felony.(5) But Lord Hale remarks that this doctrine must be understood to apply only to cases where the owner believes the goods to have been lost by the owner.

Property Mislaid but Not Lost.

4402. But there is a difference between the property lost and that which is merely mislaid. The rules applicable to the one case do not apply to the other. So in a case decided in 1854, the prosecutor left his purse containing money by mistake on the counter of a shop. A stranger asked if it belonged to the prisoner whereupon the latter put it into her pocket exclaiming, "yes, it is a wonder if it was gone before this." She concealed the purse, and the jury found that she had taken the purse then knowing that it did not belong to her and intending to appropriate it, but that she did not then know its true owner, whereupon the prisoner was convicted, and on a case reserved Jervis, C.J., said: "If there had been any evidence that the purse and its contents were lost property, properly so speaking, and the jury had so found, the jury ought further to have been asked whether the prisoner had reasonable means of finding the owner, or reasonably believed that the owner could not be found, but there is in this case no reason for supposing that the property was lost at all, or that the prisoner thought it was lost. On the contrary, the owner having left it at the stall, would naturally return for it when he missed it. There is a clear distinction between property lost and property merely mislaid, put down and left by mistake, as in this case under circumstances which would enable the owner to know the place where he had left it, and to which he would naturally return for it. The question as to possession by finding therefore, does not arise."(6)

Illustration (d) puts the case of a man who knows the owner because he said he saw him drop the purse. When he picked it up he intended to return it to the owner, but afterwards his cupidity got the better of his honesty. He is consequently guilty of misappropriation. So Parke, B., said: "If the prisoner had seen the notes drop from the prosecutor, or if the notes had had the owner's name upon them, or there had been any marks which enabled the prisoner to know at the moment when he found the notes who the owner was, or that he could be discovered, it might have been within the principles laid down in Reg v. Thurborn"(7)—that is that the prisoner was guilty because he took with animus furandi. But even if the taking was innocent, as in the illustration (c) then the acquisition of subsequent knowledge of the owner would convert that possession into criminal misappropriation. So Parke, J. A. J., said in the case of the prisoner who had picked up a hat while he had his own on: "If a person pick up a thing when he knows that he can immediately find the owner, and instead of returning it to the owner, he converts it to his own use, this is felony."(8)

(5) 1 Hale P. C. 506 (2 East) P. C., c. 16, s. 99, p. 664; Buckley v. Gross 3 B. & S. 566.

(6) West, Dears C. C. 402.

(7) Dixon, (1855) Dears C. C. 580.

(8) Pope 6 C. & P. 346.

4403. Finder's Duty to Trace the Owner.—The last illustration which is also new, establishes a rule at variance with the English Law as expounded by Jervis, C.J., who said: "The finding of the jury was that the notes were lost; that the prisoner did not know the owner but that it was probable that he could have traced them. He was not bound to do that."(9) But he would have been bound to do it under the Code.(10) For explanation 2 makes it penal to appropriate derelict property "when he knows or has the means of discovering the owner, or before he has used reasonable means to discover and give notice to the owner, and has kept the property a reasonable time to enable the owner to claim it." But according to Parke, B., the English rule is that "If a man finds goods that have been actually lost, or are reasonably supposed by him to have been lost, and appropriates them with intent to take the entire dominion over them, really believing when he takes them, that the owner cannot be found, it is not larceny. But if he takes them with the like intent, though lost, or reasonably supposed to be lost, but reasonably believing that the owner can be found, it is larceny."(11) The obligation cast on the finder to trace the owner is, therefore, a restriction on the right of a finder as understood in English Law. He is bound to discover the owner whether he has the means of discovering the owner or not. For in the latter case he must "use reasonable means to discover and give notice to the owner."

What reasonable means are, is no doubt declared to be a question of fact, but does it imply that the means must be readily available to him or does it cast upon him an obligation to discover the owner even when there is nothing to put him upon enquiry? Is the finder, for instance, bound to advertise for the owner of a lost thing? Is his failure to do so criminal? It appears to be sufficiently apparent that the obligation of the finder is limited by the means he has or are reasonable under the circumstances for discovering the owner. He is not bound to adopt extraordinary means for his discovery, nor is he bound to be out of pocket in discovering him by means of an advertisement. If the is anything in the property from which he is in a position to trace the owner, he is then bound to adopt reasonable means to discover him. He is not bound to scour the four seas in search of him, but to adopt such means as a reasonable man might be expected to adopt under the circumstances of the case. If, for instance, one finds a watch on a road, one may well expect to report the fact to the police or to make inquiries from persons in the habit of wearing such watches. If, on the other hand, one finds an article of inconsiderable value, the same inquiry would be naturally uncalled for. Indeed, it would not be unreasonable in such a case to suppose that the owner is not likely to be found unless of course, there are facts which point otherwise. In this connection the remarks of Rolfe, B., quoted before are relevant.

4404. The degree of care sufficient to be reasonable would seem to depend upon the nature and value of the property, the likelihood of its being mislaid, lost or abandoned, and the means that are readily available, or may readily suggest themselves, for discovering its owner. In this respect there is clearly a distinction between a thing abandoned and a thing lost. So, Cockburn, C.J., told the jury that where property had been cast away or abandoned, any one finding it and taking it, acquired a right to it, which would be good even as against the former owner, if the latter should be minded to resume it; but that, when a thing had been accidentally lost, the property was not divested but remained in the owner who lost it.(12) The accused was convicted of this offence for having picked up a gold mohar in an open plain in a village adjoining a city, which she forthwith sold to a Shroff for Rs. 22-12. She was convicted under this section, but Candy and Fulton, JJ., acquitted her holding that "it cannot fairly be said that when accused sold the mohar she knew, or had the means of discovering, the owner, or that she omitted to use reasonable means to discover and give notice to the owner and did not keep the property a reasonable time to enable the owner to claim it. It might have been different, had the mohar been found on a thoroughfare, in which case the finder would naturally believe that the property had been recently lost, and that the owner would be discoverable. But in this case the mohar may have been lying undiscovered on the plain for weeks. It is a fair inference that the owner had given up all hope of recovering it, and had abandoned his right of ownership.(13)

(9) Dixon, (1855) Dears C. C. 580.
(10) Chandaria, (1911) P. W. R. 36, 11 I. C. 623.
(11) Thurborn, (1849) 18 L. J. M. C. 140.

Dishonest misappropriation of property possessed by deceased person at the time of his death.

Session. Pres. Mag or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class Non-cog. Warrant Bailable. Not comp.

404. Whoever dishonestly misappropriates or converts to his own use property, knowing that such property was in the possession of a deceased person at the time of that person's decease, and has not since been in the possession of any person legally entitled to such possession, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years and shall also be liable to fine; and, if the offender at the time of such person's decease was employed by him as a clerk or servant, the imprisonment may extend to seven years.

Illustrations.

Z dies in possession of furniture and money. His servant A, before the money comes into the possession of any person entitled to such possession, dishonestly misappropriates it. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

[Property (moveable property)—ss. 27, 409, § 4066
Dishonestly misappropriates—s. 403.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4405).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4406).
(3) Proof (4407).
(4) Form of Charge (4408).
(5) Principle (4409).
(6) Meaning of Words (4410).
(7) Despoliation of the Dead (4411-4412).

(12) Glyde, L.R. 1 C.C. 139.

(13) Per Candy, J., in Sita, 18 B. 212.

4405. Analogous Law.—This section presents an aggravated case of the offence defined in the last section. It deals with the despoliation of the dead by two classes of persons: first by a stranger who is liable to imprisonment up to three years without the option of a fine, and secondly by a clerk or servant of the deceased, in which case the offender is liable to the enhanced penalty which may extend to seven years. In this respect, law measures the criminality in the same way as in the case of an offence under section 381, which also provides the same punishment.

4406. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable but warrant should, ordinarily, issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class. The Madras High Court pointed out that as this offence is non-compoundable, no Court can permit the withdrawal of a prosecution on a compromise made with the accused.(14)

4407. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That there was some moveable property.(15)

(2) That it was in the possession of a deceased person at the time of his death.

(3) That after his death it was not in the possession of any person legally entitled to its possession.

(4) That the accused misappropriated it or converted it to his own use.

(5) That he did so dishonestly.

(6) That he then knew of the facts mentioned in (2) and (3).

To which may be proved the following aggravating circumstance—

(7) That the accused was at the time of the death of the deceased employed as his clerk or servant.

4408. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you dishonestly misappropriated (or converted to your own use) certain property, to wit—knowing that such property was in the possession of A B, a deceased person, at the time of his death, and had not since been in the possession of any person legally entitled to such possession; (and that you were at the time of the death of the said A B employed by him as a clerk or servant) and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 404 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

(14) 7 M. H. C. R. (App.) 34.
(15) E. G., Conversion of rafters severed from the house; Daud Khan, (1925) A. 673.

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

4409. Principle.—The section deals with the offence of criminal misappropriation committed in respect of property after its owner is dead and before it is taken possession of by his legal representative. It is an interval when it is exposed to the easy attacks of designing men, and law, consequently, deems it as a fit object of special protection, which it confers by prescribing specially deterrent punishment meted out to offenders according to the circumstances of their aggravation. As persons who were "clerks or servants" of the deceased, and, therefore, in his confidence, they are naturally visited with the same measure of punishment as if they had been guilty of robbing their late master (§ 4170). Others are also subject to enhanced penalty though not anything to the same extent.

The section is, of course, intended to punish only strangers and servants with no semblance of claim to the effects of the dead man. It is not intended to punish relatives who take possession of and deal with the deceased's effects under a claim of right as heirs or legal representatives of the deceased.(16)

4410. Meaning of words.—"Dishonestly misappropriates or converts to his own use": This phrase has been explained under the last section in which sense it has been used here (§ 4384). "property knowing, etc.: The word "moveable" before property is to be understood, for it is implied in the words "misappropriates or converts to his own use" and is expressly mentioned in the last section. The omission is obviously unintentional. "Such property was in the possession of the deceased": which means actual possession under a title though that title may not be flawless. "And has not since been": If it has passed into the possession of another—the offence will be one under section 403. Such possession must, however, be of a person legally entitled to it. "Clerk or servant": These words are used here in the same sense as in section 381.

4411. Despoliation of the Dead.—This section refers to criminal appropriation of property which was in possession of a deceased person at the time of his death, and before it has been delivered in possession of one legally entitled to it. This is a peculiar circumstance of aggravation, for a person may have been suddenly struck down at a time when he has no relation or friend to take care of his goods and when it behoves those who may then chance to be servants or neighbours, not to take advantage of the opportunity which his death offers them of pillaging his property. Such human ghouls have always been regarded as fit objects of extreme execration, social as well as legal, and this section deals with one aspect of their crime—that in which the act amounts to no more than criminal misappropriation. All the elements of that offence must necessarily be present in an offence under this section.[17] For though the section prescribes a different penalty, the offence it refers to is the same. There must, consequently, be evidence of misappropriation or conversion to the accused's use of property which must be dishonest. But as has been pointed out under the last section, it is not necessary that the misappropriation as distinct from conversion should be to the use of the accused.

(16) Karri Mangadu, (1914) M. W. N. 791; 25 I. C. 514 contra Ram Ditta, (1910) P. L. R. 11; 6 I. C. 490 in which, however, there is no discussion of the point.

Where, therefore, the zamindar sent a servant to take possession of his tenant's land and goods, claiming them to be his by the right of purchase and for arrears of rent, and it was found that the land was rent-free and there had been no sale, the accused was convicted under this section, though he was shown to have "appropriated" the property on behalf of his master.[18] The section applies only to property in the possession of the deceased at the time of his death. The term "possession" must, however, be understood here as used in the sense in which it is defined in section 27 (§§ 274-277). Consequently, property in possession of a person's wife, clerk or servant would be in his possession, so that if a clerk or servant was entrusted with the custody of money by the deceased which he had at the time of his death, his misappropriation of it would be punishable under this section.[19]

4412. The term "property" is here used to denote only moveable property,[20] so that taking possession of immoveable property belonging to a person on his death would not be punishable under this section. For the meaning of clerk or servant see §§ 4167-4176

Of Criminal Breach of Trust.

405. Whoever being in any manner entrusted with property or with any dominion over property, dishonestly misappropriates or converts to his own use that property, or dishonestly uses or disposes of that property in violation of any direction of law prescribing the mode in which such trust is to be discharged, or of any legal contract, express or implied, which he has made touching the discharge of such trust, or wilfully suffers any other person so to do, commits "criminal breach of trust."

Criminal breach of trust.

Illustrations.

(a) A, being executor to the will of a deceased person, dishonestly disobeys the law which directs him to divide the effects according to the will, and appropriates them to his own use. A has committed criminal breach of trust.

(b) A is a warehouse-keeper. Z, going on a journey, entrusts his furniture to A, under a contract that it shall be returned on payment of a stipulated sum for warehouse room. A dishonestly sells the goods. A has committed criminal breach of trust.

(c) A, residing in Calcutta, is agent for Z, residing at Delhi. There is an express or implied contract between A and Z, that all sums remitted by Z to A shall be invested by A according to Z's direction. Z remits a lakh of rupees to A,

(17) Nobin Chunder Sircar, 12 W. R. 39.
(18) Ib.
(19) Erayet Hossain, 11 W. R. 1.
(20) Girdhar Dharamdas. 6 B. H. C. R. 33; Nobin Chunder Sircar, 12 W. R. 39.

with direction to A to invest the same in Company's paper. A dishonestly disobeys the directions, and employs the money in his own business. A has committed criminal breach of trust.

(d) But if A, in the last illustration, not dishonestly but in good faith, believing that it would be more for Z's advantage to hold shares in the Bank of Bengal disobeys Z's directions, and buys shares in the bank of Bengal, for Z, instead of buying Company's paper, here, though Z should suffer loss, and should be entitled to bring a civil action against A on account of that loss, yet A, not having acted dishonestly, has not committed criminal breach of trust.

(e) A, a Revenue-officer, is entrusted with public money, and is either directed by law, or bound by a contract, express or implied, with the Government, to pay into a certain treasury all the public money which he holds. A dishonestly appropriates the money. A has committed criminal breach of trust.

(f) A, a carrier, is entrusted by Z with property to be carried by land or by water. A dishonestly misappropriates the property. A has committed criminal breach or trust.

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4413-4414).
(2) Principle (4415).
(3) What is Criminal Breach of Trust (4416-4420).
(4) There must be a Trust (4417-4419).
(5) Trust may be Unlawful (4420).
(6) Debt but Not Trust (4421-4424).
(7) No Trust (4425).
(8) Dominion over Property (4426).
(9) Immoveable Property Excepted (4427-4428).
(10) Violation of Legal Duty or Contract (4429-4435).
(11) Violation of Legal Duty (4430-4432).
(12) Dishonest Use or Disposal (4433-4435).
(13) Confusion of Funds (4436-4438).
(14) Wilfully Suffering Dishonest Use or Disposal (4439).
(15) Civil Breach of Trust (4440).
(16) No Offence (4441).

4413. Analogous Law.—This section defines the offence of criminal breach of trust, which closely corresponds to the English offence of embezzlement. This offence was not indictable at Common law, and was then only within the cognizance of the Star Chamber which undertook to punish every misdemeanour including those especially of public importance for which the law, as then understood, had provided no sufficient punishment. Thus corruption, breach of trust, and malfeasance in public affairs, or attempts to commit felony, seemed to have been reckoned not indictable at Common law, and came in consequence under the cognizance of the Star Chamber.[21] Embezzlement was subsequently made indictable by Statute [22] the latest of which [23] provides as follows:—

"S. 68. Whosoever, being a clerk or servant, or being employed for the purpose of or in the capacity of a clerk or servant, shall fraudulently embezzle any chattel, money, or valuable security which shall be delivered or received or taken into possession by him for or in the name or on the account of his master or employer, or any part thereof, shall be deemed to have feloniously stolen the same from his master or employer, although such chattel, money, or security was not received into the possession of such master or employer otherwise than by the actual possession of his clerk, servant, or other person so employed and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding fourteen years or to be imprisoned.....and, if a male under the age of sixteen years with or without whipping."(24)

(21) 1 Hallam's Const. His. 442, 443.
(22) 39 Geo. III. c. 85; 7 & 8 Geo. IV c. 29. s. 47; 9 Geo. IV, c. 55, s. 40; repealed and re-enacted in 24 & 25 Vict., c. 98, s. 68.
(23) 24 & 25 Vict., c. 96 (Larceny Act, 1861. s. 68.

This Statute makes other provisions against embezzlements by officers in public service(25) or the Bank of England or Ireland(1) and other Statutes supplement it by extending its provisions to partners or joint owners of the partnership or joint property,(2) officers of customs(3) and local marine boards.(4)

4414. This section is far more exhaustive than all these Statutes extending as it does to all who may "in any manner be entrusted with property," whether they be clerks or servants, partners or other persons ordinarily holding a position of trust, or were only entrusted for once with property or dominion over property. The gist of the offence is dishonest misappropriation or conversion to the person's own use of property—in short, criminal misappropriation. This is thus a specific case of that offence committed by a person in the position of a trustee.

4415. Principle.—Following the scheme ordinarily followed in the Code, this section defines the offence while the four next sections prescribe the penalties graduated according to the nature and gravity of the crime. The offence of criminal breach of trust is a species of criminal misappropriation defined in section 403 and for which that section, and the next prescribe the punishments. Being, however, a misappropriation committed by a trustee law regards it as a distinct offence of peculiar gravity and as such requiring separate treatment. Of course, the peculiar aggravation of the offence lies in the confidence abused and in which respect this section is distinguishable from the generic offence of criminal misappropriation. The expediency of thus multiplying offences was doubted(5) but the Law Commissioners had no difficulty in vindicating their plan which was adopted by the Legislature. But all the same these offences though distinct are not to be treated as radically different from those which are violations of rights in property and which are all vulgarly spoken of as theft.

4416. What is a Criminal Breach of Trust.—The definition of the offence here called "criminal breach of trust" comprises generally the offence of criminal misappropriation committed by a person entrusted with property or any dominion over property. But it is not in all respects coincident with that offence. For the act may not be merely

(24) The words italicized are new: otherwise the section re-enacts 7 & 8 Geo. IV, c. 29, s. 47, in which the receipt was, moreover, stated to be "by virtue of such employment" as had the effect of restricting the offence to moneys only so received, as held in Snowby, 4 C & P. 390; Thorley, R. & M. 343; Hawtin, 7 C. & P. 781; Mellish, R. & R. 80; Crow, 1 Lewin 88—all of which are now overruled by the amended Statute cited in the text.

(25) Larceny Act (24 & 25 Vict, c. 96), s. 70.

(1) Ib., s. 73.

(2) 31 & 32 Vict., c. 116, s. 1.

(3) 39 & 40 Vict., c. 36, s. 29.

(4) 57 & 58 Vict., c. 60, s. 248.

(5) First Rep., 551.

misappropriation or conversion to his own use, but also dishonest use or disposal of the property in violation of the trust or contract made regarding its disposal, or wilfully suffering another to do the same. In short then the two essential ingredients of the crime are (i) a trust, and (ii) its dishonest breach in the manner explained in the section.

(i) There must be a trust.

4417. In the first place then, there must be a trust connected with the use of property. A trust is defined to be an obligation annexed to the ownership of property and arising out of confidence reposed in an accepted by the owner or declared and accepted by him, for the benefit of another, or of another and the owner.(6) But it is not in this narrow sense that the term has been used in this section, for it includes not only trustees, properly so called, but also those whose position is analogous to that of trustees, who become liable to the other by similar obligations arising out of a relationship implied by act and conduct which give rise to the same or similar confidence and duties.(7) Such would, for example, be the case of a partner entrusted with partnership property in which case he becomes liable for breach of trust, if he dishonestly uses the property in violation of the mode in which his trust was to be discharged, or of the agreement between the parties as to the use he was to make of the property.(8) In such a case the partner cannot plead that the property in respect of which he was tried was as much his own as of the other partner.

No doubt in ordinary cases a partner is authorized to receive and disburse money on behalf of the firm, and his appropriation of it cannot be deemed to be necessarily criminal, unless it is shown that there was an understanding between the partners that he would not so use it, or that he knew that such money could not upon the state of the firm's accounts fall to his share. So where a partner received money on behalf of the firm and omitted to enter it in the accounts so that the fact of the receipt could not be known to his co-partner, it was held that such omission, unless duly accounted for, was some proof of an intention by the partner to appropriate partnership assets to himself without the knowledge and consent of his co-partner, which prima facie was dishonest, and that his admission when detected and profession to credit the money to his share of profits did not exculpate him.(9)

4418. In England this point is now met by direct legislation(10) which enacts "that if any person, being a member of any co-partnership, or being one of two or more beneficial owners of any money,.... shall steal or embezzle such money,....every such person shall be liable to be....tried, convicted, and punished for the same as if such person had not been or was not a member of such co-partnership, or

(6) Indian Trusts Act (II of 1882), s. 3.

(7) So, under the English Statute, it is sufficient to allege that the accused was a trustee, and not that he was a trustee on some express trust created by an instrument in writing; Piper, (1902) 65 J. P. 10.

(8) Negendro Lall Chatterjee v. Okhoy Coomar Shaw, 21 W. R. 59, F. B., overruling contra in Lall Chand Roy, 9 W. R. 37; Debi Prasad Bhagat v. Nagar Mull, 35 C. 1108.

(9) Karim Baksh v. Habibulla, (1903) P. R. No. 10.

(10) 31 & 32 Vict., c. 116, s. 1.

his appointment required the treasurer to deliver an account and to pay over such moneys as may be found due upon the balance of such account. It was added that it was on the prosecution to prove that it was not the prisoner's duty to pay over the money at a particular time, and as it was impossible to fix any time the prisoner could not be convicted, but the Judges were unanimously of opinion that the conviction was right.[20]

442½. Debt but Not Trust.—Though the terms of the section are wide still it has due limits, and could not be extended to cases in which a person is entrusted with money only in a figurative sense, but property in it is intended to pass with delivery. Such, for instance, is the case of moneys advanced by a person to a contractor for building purposes in which case any misuse or misappropriation of the money could not be held to constitute criminal breach of trust. But in such a case it would be more correct to say that the money was paid and not entrusted to the contractor, though the payment may have been made for a specific purpose and on the strength of a certain assurance. So where money was paid to the accused on condition that he should use it only for the purchase of paddy to be sold at the market rate on the date of delivery and the accused misappropriated the money for which he had executed promissory notes in favour of the complainant, the Court held that the money had been merely advanced and not entrusted to the accused who could not, therefore, be prosecuted for criminal breach of trust because he used it to pay off his own debts.[21] The real question in such cases is not by what name the advance is made, but whether the property in money remains with the complainant or is parted with in favour of the accused.

The complainant owed money to the accused on a mortgage which he paid him in full satisfaction of the loan. The payment was endorsed on the deed by another. The accused took the deed, entered his house, saying that he would keep the money and return the deed. He then denied the payment. It was held that the money being paid in discharge of a debt, denial of its receipt did not contitute breach of trust.[22] But the accused in this case was presumably charged on the receipt of money. The case would have been sufficient if he had been charged on the deed which belonged to the complainant as soon as it was discharged and the non-return of which would have conceivably constituted criminal breach of trust. Such was the case of the accused who had left certain promissory notes with the complainant as security for a loan. He persuaded him to return them to him alleging that they were required to collect the money which he promised to pay the complainant. He sold the notes but did not pay the money. He was held guilty of this offence as well as of cheating.[23] Where the tenant paid a sum of money to the landlord for rent and the (20) Welch, 2 C. & K. 296.

(21) Wong Yone Wain, 5 Bur. L.T. 11, 14 I. C. 653; Naga Po Seik 5 Bur. L. T. 143 F. B., 17 I. C. 824; Hock Cheng & Co v. Tha Ka Do, 6 Bur. L. T. 13 F. B., 19 I. C. 145; Keymer, 12 A. L. J. 730, 23 I.C. 492; Nga Po Yant, 7 Bur. L. T. 209, F. B., 24 I. C. 332.

(22) Golam Hussain, 22 C. W. N. 1005, 49 I. C. 343, 20 Cr. L. J. 151.

(23) Venkatagurunatha, 45 M. L. J. 133, 72 I. C. 612, (1923) A. I. R. (Mad.) 597.

latter appropriated it towards swadeshi subscription, the Court held it to constitute no offence.[24]

4422. So where the relation between the parties was that of banker and customer, which is in law that of debtor and creditor, the moneys due to the customer would be due simply as debts, so that if the banker fails in business or dishonestly withholds payment he could not be proceeded against under this section, since the money was fully at the disposal of the banker, and the latter in using it for his own purpose, could commit no criminal breach of trust.[25] But while it is settled law that the relation between banker and customer is simply that of debtor and creditor, still it is possible for a banker to be a trustee also, but in that case his position as such must be strictly proved. Such may, for example, be the case where the banker enters into a contract of a special nature to keep a certain sum intact and distinct from his other capitals in trade, in which case he would be as regards that fund a trustee. So it often happens that a certain money repayable at call is kept by a banker merely for safe custody, in which case he is a trustee of that money, though he may hold other moneys of a person in his general capacity as banker. So constituents dealing with a bank may entrust their scrip to it for safe custody and realization of divident or interest from time to time, in which case the banker holds the scrip as a trustee and is accountable to the customer as such. The fact is that a person may be both a banker as well as a trustee of the same person.

4423. It all depends upon the question in whom property in the fund vests. If the customer has the property and the banker a mere custody the latter is a trustee of the former. If, on the other hand, he is entitled to absolute disposal of the fund for the time being or for any limited time he is then a banker and not merely a trustee. Trust implies that the fund of which the banker is a trustee should be kept distinct and intact for a specific purpose and at the disposal of the cestui que trust. He should not be at liberty to mix it with his general working capital or to use it as such. The accused acted as a shroff of the regiment. He was in charge of Government moneys as well as of the moneys belonging to the regimental fund, officers and men. He was permitted to make loans to officers of the regiment which were repaid by reductions made out of their salary. But he was alleged to hold the Government money merely as a cashier and at the beck and call of the Commanding officer. He was so described in his agreement with the Commandant, and Chatterji, J., taking into consideration the oral evidence of the Commandant, and the fact that the accused had absconded, reluctantly yielded to the argument that his position was one of trustee. He was accordingly convicted, but let off with a nominal sentence.[1]

4424. The prisoner was the servant who had contracted to supply labour to a Railway Company for delivering coals to the Company's customers. It was a part of the contract that W or his men should realize the price of coals so supplied and deliver to the Company's manager. W engaged the prisoner who conveyed the Company's coals to its customer and received a payment which he misappropriated and for which he was indicted. It was objected that the money was not received on the account of W, nor was his property, and upon a case reserved Campbell, C.J., said "This case depends entirely upon whether the evidence shows that the money was received in the name or on the account of his master, and this depends upon whether any privity exists between the carman and the Company. If there be such privity as to make the carman the agent of the Company in receiving the money, and he agreed to pay it to them, the money in his hands was not the money of the master but of the Company. The opinion of the majority of us is, that such privity is established, and that, therefore, the money was not received on account of the prosecutor, but on account of the Company. This being so, this conviction cannot be supported."(2)

(24) Kumeda Charan Ghose, 15 C. L. J. 512, 15 I. C. 656, 13 Cr. L. J. 512.

(25) Ruashan Rai, (1901) P. R. No. 32, following Chandu v. Chanda Mal, (1885) P. R. (Civ.) 95; Nga Po Seik, 6 L. B. R. 62 F. B., 17 I. C. 824, 13 Cr. L. J. 888.

(1) Hira Lal, (1908) P. R. 19.

The fact that the prosecutor had delivered the money to try the honesty of the prisoner does not affect his liability, if in fact he is guilty of breach under the circumstances described as criminal. The prisoner was a shopman in the service of the prosecutor who, suspecting embezzlement, formed a plan for detecting him, and marked the money in the till, and then gave three other marked pice to a confidant who paid them to the prisoner in payment of goods purchased from him which he misappropriated. It was contended that as the money had been marked and paid for the sole purpose of trying the fidelity of the prisoner, the delivery of them to the prisoner had not changed the possession of them, which it was contended, remained constructively with the prosecutor up to the moment when the embezzlement took place; and that, therefore, the charge should have been for a larceny at common law, and not for an embezzlement under the Statute. But it was held that the case was clearly one of breach of trust.(3) This view is perfectly sound and has been reiterated in several cases,(4) and it is consonant with the general principle applicable to such cases (§§ 243-254).

4425. No Trust.—If there was no trust, actual or constructive, there can be no breach of trust, whatever other offence the accused may have committed. So if of two servants employed by the prosecutor one A be employed to sell his goods, and B for another purpose with no authority to sell the goods, and if B should get behind the counter and sell goods which he had no authority to do and misappropriate the proceeds, he would be guilty of theft and not of this offence. Such a case is not different in principle from that of B stealing his master's goods and then selling them to evade detection. The accused, a Stationmaster wrongly collected an overcharge on sale of tickets. It was held that he could not be convicted of this offence, since the excess collection did not belong to the Railway.(5) Where the accused was employed by

(2) Beaumont, Dears C. C. 270.
(3) Hedge's case. 2 Leach 1033.
(4) Whittinghams case, 2 Leach 912; Hawkins, 1 Den. C. C. 584.
(5) Kudart Nath, 75 I. C. 79, (1923) A. I. R. (L.) 295: Karimuddin, 40 A. 565 (A marksman, doing the unauthorised work of a Stationmaster, overcharged a sum and misappropriated it).

the prosecutor merely to register orders for goods and receive payments made for goods so supplied, and had no authority to make or direct delivery of goods from his master's shop, his delivery of two articles to a customer entering up only one as delivered and paid for, the price of the other article being misappropriated, was held to constitute larceny and not criminal breach of trust.(6)

So, of course, there could be no criminal breach of trust against the accused, when he was only nominally the manager of a bogus Provident Institution, the real power and funds being in the hands and under the control of the proprietor or agent.(7) So the wife is, ordinarily, in joint possession of her husband's property, and she cannot be held to be a trustee of his goods, so that any disposal of property by her would not, it is said, be criminal breach of trust.(8) But it is difficult to see why the wife is not the bailee of her husband's goods. She is now so held in English law.(9) The wife is necessarily in charge of her husband's property. As such, she is entrusted with it, and if she should dishonestly dispose it of, she would be, it is submitted, as much guilty of criminal breach of trust as a servant or manager. There can, of course, be no breach of trust where there is only a contract and no trust, and as the distinction between the two is at times fine, regard must be had to the exact nature of the transaction which favours the basis of the charge. A person guilty of a breach of contract or of a quasi-contract cannot be visited with the penalty of this offence.(10)

Dominion over Property.

4426. A person who is entrusted with property possesses certain indicia of apparent ownership. He is in fact in charge of the property which is impressed with a trust. Otherwise, he is at liberty to use it in any way he chooses. A person who is entrusted with any dominion over property has not the same right over it. His dominion may be limited or unlimited, temporary or permanent. The manager of a mill, and an overseer have both such dominion over property. Neither of them is entrusted with the mill, but each has certain rights over it. As such, each possesses a certain dominion over it. If, therefore, either of them dishonestly converts to his own use that property it will amount to this offence. The prisoner was the miller of a mill in the county gaol, being paid a weekly salary as such out of the county rates, and it was his duty to direct persons who brought grain to be ground at the mill to obtain at the porter's lodge a ticket specifying the quantity of grain brought, and his duty there was to receive the grain with the ticket and the grinding fee and to account for it to the governor of the jail, who was in his turn responsible to the country treasurer. The accused received the grain in question without a ticket, and without directing the persons who brought it to obtain one, received the charges for grinding it, which he misappropriated. It was held

(6) Wilson, 9 C. & P. 27.
(7) Kamal Krishna Bose, 5 M. L. T. 141, 4 I. C. 1106.
(8) (1864) Weir (3rd Ed.) 266.
(9) Per Martin, B., in Robson, 31 L. J. M. C. 22, overruling contra in Denmour, 8 Cox 440.
(10) Muku Lal Rai, 96 I. C. (C). 501.

that he could not be convicted of embezzlement, as, though he had made an improper use of the mill by grinding the corn for his own benefit, he could not be said have received the money on behalf of his master.[11]

But such a case would be clearly within this clause, for the section is not restricted to embezzlement of money, and the phrase "Dominion over property" is wide enough to include such control. So such a dominion over property is acquired by a mortgagee in possession and by the mortgagor in possession in an English mortgage. If, therefore, such a person wilfully defaults and so causes it to be sold for arrears of Government revenue for the purpose of defrauding the mortgagee, and purchases it benami, he is liable to be punished for this offence.[12] In this view this offence may be committed as much in respect of moveable as of immoveable property. But the contrary has been laid down in two cases[13] in which this offence has been held to relate only to moveable property, that being the meaning of the term "property" as used in this connection in this and the subsequent sections relating to the same offence.

4427. Immoveable Property Excepted.—Both these cases were cases of pure trespass. In the Bombay case a person having died intestate, the Nazir was appointed to administer the estate and he deputed a subordinate to take possession of the house of the deceased. In the meantime one Girdhar had established himself in the house which he refused to vacate. He was convicted under section 404, but the Court held that section inapplicable, observing "that there seems to be much doubt whether immoveable property is within the meaning of section 404 of the Indian Penal Code; for, although as remarked by the referring Magistrate, property is the term used in the said section, the single illustration below the section refers to moveable property only, and the meaning and object of the section appears to be to prevent the unlawful appropriation of moveables between the decease of the owner and the time when the effects should, in ordinary course, be received by the heir or person authorized to receive them." This view was concurred in by Tucker and Gibbs, JJ., who disposed of the reference.[14]

More recently this case was followed by Beverley and Gordon, JJ., in a case in which the accused who was the Jemadar of an Indigo factory in charge of the Indigo plots had let out certain plots to ryots for his own benefit, and the sole question argued was whether such an act relating to land could amount to a criminal breach of trust. The learned Judges did not definitely commit themselves to any view but expressed the inclination of their mind to be in favour of the Bombay view, adding: "In this case the appellant was at most entrusted with the supervision or management of the factory lands, and the fact that he mismanaged the land does not in our opinion amount to a criminal offence under section 408. Be that as it may, we think that upon the (11) Harris, 6 Cox. 363; Cullum, L. R. 2 C. C. 28.

(12) Ram Manik Shaha v. Brindabun, 5 W. R. (Cir.) 230.

(13) Girdhar Dharamdas, 6 B. H. C. R. 33: followed in Jukdown Sinha, 23 C. 372.

(14) Girdhar Dharmadas, 6 B. H. C. R. 33.

evidence the conviction cannot be sustained."[15] It may be added that the term "property" has undoubtedly been used by the Legislature to denote "moveable property" e.g., in section 410-415. In section 410 which defines stolen property, the term "property" has been undoubtedly used to designate moveable property, for it speaks of property in connection with the offence of theft as of those in which the term used is ambiguous. Again, since these offences are only specific cases of theft it would be more appropriate to restrict the term only to moveable property.[16] The language of the section and also the fact that distinct sections provide for trespass favour the same view.

The accused, who was a forest guard, was convicted of this offence, because he had permitted a timber merchant to cut down and remove certain trees. The Court altered his conviction to one under section 379 on the ground that, trees being immoveable property, criminal breach of trust could not be committed in respect of them.[17] This view has been hesitatingly followed in a case in which the accused, who being appointed to watch a paddy field until the crop was ripe, cut and removed the crop as soon as it was ready. They were convicted of this offence, but on revision their conviction was supported either for this offence or under section 379 on the dual ground, that though when the crops were standing the accused was in charge of immoveable property till when they were severed, they still remained entrusted to him; and even if there was no continued trust, the Bombay case would support the accused's conviction under section 379.[18] As to the first reason it is submitted that what was entrusted was the standing crop: its cutting by the accused was never contemplated, and there could, therefore be no trust in respect of them.[19]

4428. The section does not require that the dominion over property should be a matter of contractual relationship, for it may be acquired in any manner so long as it is "entrusted" by another. The right thus acquired would partake of the nature of trust, though such dominion would, ordinarily, be acquired over immoveable property. But it may be equally as well acquired over moveable property, though in such a case it would be more correct to say that the property itself was entrusted to another. A certain municipality condemned a hackney pony as too diseased for work and as fit for destruction. For this purpose it came before a Magistrate who in the ordinary course would have ordered its destruction. But out of motives of humanity he made it over to the accused who professed to be the secretary of a Society for the maintenance of incurable animals. As a matter of fact, he alone constituted such Society. He took charge of the animal, and after keeping it for sometime and patching it up a little, sold it to another hackney driver for the work for which it had been already condemned. He was prosecuted for this offence, and the question

(15) Jugdown Sinha, 23 C. 372; dissented from in Daud Khan, (1925 A. 673.

(16) Bhagu, (1897) B. U. C. 928; Durga Tewari, 36 C. 758.

(17) Bhagu, (1897) B. U. C. 928; followed in Durga Tewari, 36 C. 758.

(18) Durga Tewari, 36 C. 758, following Bhagu, (1897) B. U. C. 928.

(19) Rambilas, 38 M. 639; Kesho Ram, (1889) P. R. No. 36.

raised on his behalf was that the accused could not be convicted of breach of trust, as there was no trust created in his favour, but it was held that a person who accepts a trust cannot turn round and dispute the title of his truster. Then it was said that the Magistrate had retained no property in the pony. But Blair, J., said, that as against the accused the Magistrate did retain a certain qualified property in the pony. It was true that there was no express agreement as to that or to any other effect, between the Magistrate and the accused, but the contract between them must be inferred from their position and surroundings. The pony had been manifestly made over to be maintained, with the implied promise to maintain and not to work it or to allow it to be worked. If the accused did not intend to fulfil that obligation he was bound to return it to the Magistrate, who had as against him property in the pony. His sale was, therefore, misappropriation of the pony, and both his conviction and sentence of three months rigorous imprisonment were consequently upheld.(20)

4429. Violation of Legal Duty or Contract.—A person may acquire dominion over property for a limited purpose, as in the case of the pawnee of goods, and he may then be guilty of this offence if he is guilty of the acts which constitute the crime. The question in such cases is: did the accused dishonestly misappropriate the property, or did he convert it to his own use, or did he dishonestly use or dispose of the property in violation of any direction of law prescribing the mode in which such trust is to be discharged, or of any legal contract, express or implied which he has made touching the discharge of such trust, or did he wilfully suffer any other person so to do? These acts imply the violation of (i) a legal duty, or (ii) legal contract, or (iii) criminal negligence enabling some other person to violate such legal duty or a legal contract. But the mere violation of such duty or contract is not criminal unless it was at the same time dishonest, and it manifested itself in some overt act, such as (a) misappropriation, (b) conversion to one's own use, (c) use or disposal of the poperty. The mens rea constituting criminality here consists then of dishonesty and violation of a legal or contractual obligation, but the act following upon such a state of mentality must be a positive commissive act.

(1) Violation of Legal Duty.

4430. In the first place, then, there must be the violation of a legal duty or a legal contract relating to the discharge of the trust. Such a violation must be, moreover, dishonest. The prosecutor entrusted some silver to the accused, who were silversmiths for the purpose of making certain ornaments. They alloyed it with copper, misappropriating an equal quantity of silver. It was held that they were guilty of criminal breach of trust and not cheating.(21) Why? Because they had contracted expressly or impliedly against adulteration, and in mixing the alloy they were guilty of violation of a legal contract touching the trust, and it was, moreover, dishonest and accompanied by misappropriation of property. The case was, therefore, one of criminal breach of trust, and rightly so held. But if suppose, in such a case, the prosecutor had told the accused to use a certain quantity of good silver of their own in making the ornaments and the accused had then done what they did in the last case, then the offence would have been one of cheating and not of criminal breach of trust, because the prosecutor had then entrusted them with no property, for the property used was their own.

(20) Gouri Shankar, (1894) A. W. N 197.

(21) Babaji, 4 B. H. C. R. 16.

The accused was the servant of a liquor contractor and was, as such, entrusted with a certain quantity of liquor by his master to sell. For selling it he was allowed a certain quantity of the liquor for himself. He was liable to account for the remainder to his master who had forbidden its adulteration with water. The accused all the same adulterated it, and having sold it at the rate of unadulterated liquor, received an extra amount which he misappropriated to his own use. He was convicted of this offence, and it was held that his conviction was right, as he had dishonestly disposed of the property, in violation of a legal contract, which met all the requirements of this section.[22] So in another case the accused was given certain earrings to raise a loan of only Rs. 7, instead of which the accused pledged them for a larger amount, misappropriating the additional sum so raised. The facts were held to be sufficient to bring the offender within the scope of this section.[23] So a person may be guilty of this offence if he fails to account for the moneys received by him to another to whom he was bound in duty to render it. Such duty may be legal or conventional.

4431. The treasurer in a Bank or Government Treasury is bound to account to his official superior all sums received and paid out by him. The same obligation is cast upon other servants of Government who have in the course of their employment to receive and make payments. They would be, therefore, guilty of this offence if they, in violation of the direction of law convert to their own use property or money with which they are so entrusted within the course of their employment. But such direction of law, must be express and explicit, and it must prescribe the mode in which the property or money is to be used or disposed of. It cannot be assumed that because a certain person receives a payment on behalf of another he is bound to account to him for it inslanter, on pain of being charged for malversation if he fails to do so. In order to place a person under an obligation to account, there must be not only an obligation legally created, but it must, moreover, prescribe the mode in which it is to be discharged.

The accused was the servant of a baker and authorized to sell bread and collect bills, which he was ordered to pay on the evening of each day. The accused received three sums of such money on three different dates, but failed to pay them over to the baker, though he never denied their receipts. It was contended that as the prisoner had all along admitted receipt of the moneys, his mere omission to pay them was not embezzlement, but Coleridge, J., held that as it was the duty of the accused to account for and pay over all moneys received by him in the course of the day every evening, his wilful omission to do so was clearly equivalent to a denial of the receipt of the money.[24] Of course, a person may not deny receipt of money and yet may go on misappropriating it. In such case the question is not what the accused said but what he did with the money which is the main point at issue.

(22) Jamsetji, (1888) B. U. C. 395.

(23) Gurumahanty, (1894) 1 Weir 465; Ramchand, (1926) L. 385.

4432. The mere violation of law or a legal contract is, however, only one element for consideration. The essential element is dishonesty. But for dishonesty the accused may pass off as a fool, though not a knave. But dishonesty stamps him as a knave, and it makes his act criminal if it is followed up by appropriation or use of the property to be presently considered (§§ 4433, 4434). The term "dishonestly" has been defined before,[25] and it has been there and since the subject of frequent references.[1] It has been used here in the same sense as in sections 378 and 403 as implying the intention of causing gain or loss by unlawful means of property to which a person gaining or losing is not or is entitled. The dishonesty must relate to the appropriation or wrongful conversion, and when it is only so, the offence is in substance criminal misappropriation. But where the dishonesty relates to the use or disposal of the trust property this offence may be completed, though there may be no criminal misappropriation. Where there is no evidence of it the accused cannot be convicted of this offence. Such was the case of the accused who was entrusted with certain property by Court. When called upon to produce it he evaded service and failed to produce it. It was held that he might be guilty of contempt of Court, but in the absence of proof of misappropriation he could not be convicted of this offence.[2].

(2) Dishonest Use or Disposal.

4433. The word "use" is of large import and may mean anything from a temporary employment to a permanent appropriation. But since it must be dishonest, it follows that the term as used here is restricted in its sense as meaning such employment as constitutes wrongful gain or wrongful loss. Where, therefore, the prosecutor gave his clothes to the accused, a washerman, to wash and the latter wore them and lent them to be worn by a man of low caste, so that it was rendered useless to the prosecutor, it was held that the act did not constitute dishonest use of the property within the meaning of this section.[3] The same view was taken of the pledgee of a turban who deteriorated it by wearing it.[4] In such cases the word "use" must be construed ejusdem generis with misappropriation, conversion or disposal of the property. So if a person keep his furniture with another for safe custody, and the other use it instead of keeping it, he could not be charged with criminal breach of trust, for such use is not dishonest, which it would be if it was pledged or lent on hire to another. The use or disposal of property is, therefore, by no means the most material

(24) Jackson, (1844) 1 C. & K. 384; Lister, 26 L. J. M. C. 62; Chandra Prasad, 5 Pat. 578 (V. P. clerk keeping money for more than 10 days, denying its receipt); Devasikhamani, 95 I. C. 943, (1926) M. 727 (Amin withholding receipts for 5 months); Daga Shankar, 29 O. C. 245, 94 I. C. 205, (1926) O. 398 (Non-crediting of moneys received).

(25) S. 24.

(1) E.g., §§ 243-254.

(2) Harnam Singh, 16 A. L. J. 600, 47 I. C. 875, 19 Cr. L. J. 975.

(3) Anon, (1880) Weir (3rd Ed.) 269.

(4) Anon, 3 M. H. C. R. (App.) 6.

ingredient of the crime. But dishonesty is, and if it is present with the use for disposal of property, the only thing that then remains to complete the crime is the violation of a legal or conventional obligation. Indeed, it may even be added that in ordinary cases the presence of dishonesty implies the absence of a legal right, so that dishonest misappropriation would suffice to establish this offence, and of these dishonesty is all in all.

4434. Of course, dishonesty without use is not punishable, but there may be use without dishonesty, in which case there may even be a breach of trust, but it is not criminal.(5) The accused, a Police Sub-Inspector, was in charge of a cattle pound in which a pony was impounded which was put to sale. The Cattle Trespass Act,(6) under which the sale was held prohibits a police-officer from purchasing pound cattle directly or indirectly. The accused purchased the pony benami, but it was found that he had paid the approximate value of the animal. It was held that though the accused had disposed of the pony in violation of the direction of law, his act was not punishable under this section, because it was not dishonest,(7) which it would have been, if the price paid had been below its approximate value. So where the accused refused to deliver land which had been in fact mortgaged to them, but which they denied, it was held that the dispute was one of an ordinary civil nature and not one constituting this offence.(8) Such was held to be the case of a pleader who having the client's balance in his hand retained it towards his fee, though the recovery of it had become barred.(9)

So where a person withholds property on account of a bona fide dispute, there is no dishonesty, and consequently no offence. The accused was employed by the prosecutor and other persons to sell their paddy. The accused sold the prosecutor's paddy and realized the full price, but he withheld payment of a portion of the price on the ground that another person by name Naloo laid claim to it. The prosecutor charged him with this offence. Naloo was examined and he asserted his claim to the money withheld, but the Magistrate found his claim groundless. Naloo then brought a civil suit against the accused for recovery of the amount, but the latter was, before the disposal of the suit, convicted of this offence. It was found that there was a dispute as to the number of bags given by the prosecutor: Naloo claimed that some of the bags claimed by the prosecutor were his and given by him for sale to the accused. The High Court held that though this may be a false claim, still there was Naloo's civil suit to reckon with, and whether it was a false claim or not, the fact that there was a claim made, exculpated the accused who might have bona fide refused to deliver up money to the prosecutor when he was threatened with a hostile claim.(10) In this case, the hostile claim of Naloo was a reason and not a pretext for refusing payment, and such

(5) Lanter, (1913) A. C. 221; followed in Gunanunda, 29 C. W. N. 432, 86 I. C. 213, (1925) C. 613.
(6) S. 19, Act I of 1871.
(7) Rajkristo Biswas, 16 W. R. 52.
(8) Jaffir Naik, 2 B. H. C. R. 127.
(9) Krishna Rao, 6 N. L. R. 119, 73 I. C. 335, 24 Cr. L. J. 591.
(10) Raj Kishore Patter v. Joy Krishna Sen, 28 C. 362.

a case is conceivable. In that case the last case would be no authority for holding that the accused could not be convicted. But the verdict in the following case is by no means easy of comprehension.

The prosecutor employed the accused as his general agent in charge of petty suits instituted by his creditors against him. The prosecutor owed the accused Rs. 300. The latter had taken Rs. 32 on two occasions, and when called to account, falsely stated that he had paid it to a pleader as his fee. The Magistrate convicted him of this offence, but the High Court acquitted him holding that in view of the prosecutor's indebtedness to the accused "we do not think it can be held that the mere failure to give a correct and true account of the manner in which Rs. 32 was expended by the prosecutor's agent in numerous Small Cause Court proceedings necessarily implies a dishonest intention."(11) But it was not a case of a mere failure, and the prosecutor's indebtedness had nothing to do with the case.

4435. The fact is that the Code draws a distinction between a civil breach of contract and a criminal breach of contract. The last few cases cited were all instances of a civil breach, but in which the absence of dishonesty saved them from becoming criminal. Such was also the case of the accused who as President of a municipality, had drawn the pay of the municipal staff, but did not actually pay it out till a fortnight later. The money was in the neantime ready and available but not paid, and Scott and Jardine, JJ., thereupon held that the act disclosed no dishonesty, and that in the absence of dishonesty the accused could not be convicted of this offence. There was no doubt of the withholding of payment. It might be improper and might even amount to a civil breach of contract, but the offence required strict proof of dishonesty of which there was no vestige. The account books showed the money as duly received, it was not shown as paid out. There was the fact that the cash fell short of the Rs. 68, but it may well have been the result of a desire to hide the delay, but it was of itself no proof of dishonesty.(12) But, as the Court added, the case would have been different if the account books had been falsified, and the money withdrawn had not been shown as received, in which case the omission would have been suggestive of dishonesty.

This was apparently the ratio decidendi of another case in which the accused, who was the revenue patel, was made the intermediary for payment of two small sums of money to two other villagers who were entitled to receive them from Government. The accused received the sum, but did not pay them over to the persons to whom they were payable. But he got them to execute acknowledgments of their receipts promising to pay the amounts in eight days or so. The receipts were forwarded to the revenue authorities as vouchers of payment. The men never complained, but trusted in the honour of their patel to pay them, upon which the Court held that he could not be convicted of this offence, because he had duly discharged the trust reposed in him by the Collector by obtaining the receipts.(13) This case had been

(11) Datta Ram, 3 I. C. (B.) 285.
(12) Ardeshir Merwanjee, (1889) B. U. C. 484.
(13) Ganpat Tapidas, 10 B. 256.

animadverted upon by Irwin, C. J., of Upper Burma[14] who said: "The last reason I cannot endorse; I think that so far from fulfilling the trust reposed in him, he tried to deceive the Collector by submitting false evidence of payment." But why was it a false evidence? Suppose the patel had delivered the money and borrowed it instantly from the payees, would not the receipts have then been true? And what difference did it make if the same thing was understood both by the patel and the payees?

4436. Confusion of funds.—Mere retention of money does not necessarily raise a presumption of dishonest misappropriation. But it is one step in that direction.[15] If there is by law or contract a special place assigned for the keeping of money held on trust, the fact that it was not kept there, but was removed to another place would be a strong evidence of its dishonest use, but it will not be conclusive. But where no such separate place has been assigned the accused could not be charged with a misappropriation by mixing the trust money with his own and using it promiscuously. He is not then bound to earmark the identical coins, nor to assign them a separate place unless he is so obliged.[16] In such cases when the private and the trust money of a person is suffered to be held together, there may be a misappropriation, but it is then a matter of intent. The honest man would pay the sums to the proper recipient out of the mixed sum in his possession, while the dishonest one would simply form in his own mind the intention of not paying it. But so long as the matter is confined to intention the accused cannot be convicted. for his dishonesty cannot be proved. He must, then, do some overt act to establish it. Such act may consist of mere retention for such a length of time as would justify an inference that the accused did not intend to pay it.

Such was the case of the village headman who had been ordered by Government to collect plantain trees from the villagers and to pay for them at the rate of Rs. 15 per hundred. He collected them for three years, received their price, but did not pay it to the owners from whom he was supposed to have purchased the trees. He, on the other hand, collected the price of trees from those who could not supply them. The money was so retained for three years and it was held that the retention was for a sufficiently long time to constitute misappropriation.[17] Such was also the case of the income-tax clerk who received moneys, but failed to credit them into the treasury or in the remittance book, but took them home intending to credit them later on, and who was then convicted of criminal misappropriation.[18] But in this case, the accused was under a legal obligation to credit his receipts immediately into the treasury. His taking them home was then sufficient to constitute dishonest misappropriation.

(14) Nga Tha Zani, (1905) U. B. R. 19, following Nga Hmut, (1897-1901) U. B. R. 345.

(15) Balthasar, 41 C. 844; Mathura Prasad, 40 I. C. (A.) 303; distinguishing Kadir Baksh, 33 A. 249.

(16) Lonier, (1914) A. C. 221, 18 C. W. N. 98, P. C.

(17) Nga Tha Zan, (1905) U. B. R. 19; Mathura Prasad, 40 I. C. (A.) 303, distinguishing Kader Baksh, 33 A. 249.

(18) Rama Krishna, 12 M. 49; Proud, 31 J. M. C. 71; Oliphant, (1905) 2 K. B. 67, in which omission to account was shown to be in pursuance of a scheme of fraud; see s. 477-A, post.

4437. The fact that the accused had duly posted up the items received in the accounts, does not necessarily counteract criminality, though it is an indication of bona fides. The contrary was, however, laid down by Cresswell, J., in a case in which the prisoner was the master of a vessel owned by the prosecutors. He sold its cargo and received a price out of which he deducted a sum, which, on being questioned he falsely accounted for as due to short weight and the receipt of a part of the amount was admitted, but explained as appropriated in accordance with a mercantile custom, of which there was no evidence. But Cresswell, J., nevertheless held it to be no case of embezzlement, adding: "I think that this does not amount to embezzlement. Embezzlement necessarily involves secrecy; the concealment for instance, by the defendant of his having appropriated the money. If instead of denying his appropriation, a defendant immediately owns it, alleging a right or an excuse for retaining the sum detained, no matter, how frivolous the allegation, and although the fact itself on which the allegation rests were a mere falsification, as in the present case, and although it should turn out that there was no such difference as that asserted by the defendant between the tonnage as measured at Swansea and that at Plymouth, or that there was no such custom as that set up, I do not say to what species of offence this may amount, but, in my opinion, not to embezzlement."(19)

4438. It is submitted that the grounds for exoneration are here overstated. The question whether the explanation given by the accused is or is not sufficient, is a question of fact and not of law, and if it was bona fide believed by the accused it will probably be regarded as a sufficient defence; for if his act was bona fide it could not be dishonest.(20) Such was the case of the nazir of the Court of a Magistrate who was convicted of having criminally misappropriated a sum of Rs. 52-6-3. It appeared that his accounts were in order, but in accordance with an old practice the officials used to draw upon the accused for advances according to their requirements. This was purely a private matter, and the officials concerned, paid back the loans on receipt of the pay. He had made such advances when his cash was checked and disclosed the deficiency. The Magistrate ordered him to make it good and he did so. It was held that the accused could not be convicted therefor as there had been no dishonesty.(21)

So it was pointed out in another case of a salt daroga that the mere fact of there being a large deficit of salt in his charge is not sufficient to fasten on him criminal liability under section 409, for which there must be distinct proof of a criminal misappropriation. Such a person may have been negligent, but negligence may be a good ground for civil liability, but it does not suffice to establish a criminal charge of this magnitude.(22) Indeed, as was pointed out in a case, the correct entry may have been itself made to avert suspicion and in order to deceive,(23) "made with forethought and a view to this defence."(24)

(19) Norman, C. & M. 501.
(20) 1 Hale P. C. 507; 1 Hawk, P. C. C. 33, s. 8; Farre's case, Kel. 43; Hall, 3 C. & P. 409; Holloway, 5 C. & P. 524.
(21) Imam Din, (1902) P. L. R. 157.
(22) Brinbadhur Putnaik, 5 W. R. 21.
(23) Lister, D. & B. 118; overruling Cread, 1 C. & K. 63. To the same effect Guelder, Bell, C. C. 284.
(24) Guelder, Bell, C. C. 284.

On the other hand, the absence of an entry may appear to be accidental and due to carelessness in which case it will be no evidence of misappropriation.(25) All the same there are cases decided in England where the denial of receipt(1) or the absence of entry(2) is insisted upon as necessary to establish a charge of embezzlement. But though these are valuable tests of dishonesty they are not the sine qua non for a conviction.(3) There is, however, a wide difference between a mere omission to enter in the accounts or to account, for the receipt of money, and a wilful falsification of an account, for which the former may be consistent with innocence and the latter not.

4439. Wilfully Suffering Dishonest Use or Disposal.—Dishonesty may be proved or presumed from circumstances. But it cannot be assumed as a matter of course. The accused who was the tindal of a cargo-boat, was entrusted with 200 hides to be carried to a steamer. On delivery on the steamer twenty-two hides were missing upon which the accused was convicted of this offence. It was held that there was no evidence of dishonesty, nor could dishonesty be inferred from the mere fact that some of the hides disappeared from the boat. The accused may have been negligent, but he was not dishonest.(4) The crew or some of them may have committed the theft, but the accused could not be convicted unless there was evidence of at least wilful sufference which must at least amount to abetment. The accused was the mother of a child and to whom the prosecutor, a vaccinator, paid two annas as price of the lymph which he wanted to take out of the child whom he had recently vaccinated and whom the accused promised to take for that purpose to a village named. She failed to do so, and thereupon she was prosecuted for this offence, but the Court held it to be no case of criminal breach of trust.(5)

4440. Civil Breach of Trust.—Though the ingredients of this offence are somewhat broadly stated, there is no doubt as to their meaning. This group of sections was intended to punish an offence of which dishonesty is the essence. Any breach of trust is not an offence. It may be intentional without being dishonest, or it may appear dishonest without being really so. In such cases the Magistrate should be slow to move.(6) This caution is all the more necessary, since there is a natural desire to secure speedy justice by having recourse to criminal law, a flagrant example of which is the following case. The pawnee of certain jewels had obtained a decree for their sale. He made them over to the pawner and executed in his favour a receipt for full payment of the decree. Subsequently, he prosecuted him for criminal breach of trust alleging that his receipt was nominal, and that he had in fact entrusted the jewels to the accused to raise money on for payment of his decree. The Magistrate believed the story and convicted the accused, but on revision the High Court naturally threw out the case

(25) Jones, 7 C. & P. 833.
(1) Per Bolland, B., in Jones, 7 C. & P. 834.
(2) Norman, C. & M. 501.
(3) Jackson, 1 C. & R. 384; Lister, 26 L. J. M. C. 62.
(4) Ramaya, (1904) 10 Bur. L. R. 170.
(5) Satawa, (1891) B. U. C. 557.
(6) Koorathalwar, (1920) M. W. N. 346, 55 I. C. 469, 21 Cr. L. J. 309.

animadverting on the magisterial procedure of inquiring into the bona fides of a receipt on which even Civil Courts would not find it easy to decide.(7)

Another case equally instructive had to be decided by the Privy Council. There the accused was instructed to invest certain minor's money in a most remunerative way which he did by including it in the trading capital of a Bank of which he was a partner. He paid the interest due thereon and allowed even overdrafts on the minors' accounts. All of a sudden the minors' guardians demanded the money which the accused was unable to produce in specie. He, however, gave a sufficient security, but nevertheless he was convicted but the Privy Council had to interfere "not on any matter of form," but "that the facts did not on any just or legal view of them warrant a conviction."(8) The transition between such cases and those in which there is a doubt as to the trust or dishonesty or any other ingredient constituting the offence, is not gradual, though cases in which a payment due is merely delayed,(9) though not delayed beyond the possibility of mere negligence,(10) or where there is a claim of right, or a confusion of accounts (§ 4436),(11) and errors therein due to ignorance or negligence or a mistaken procedure,(12) fall into the same category. But as these cases relate to rather evidence than to the principle of the crime, they will be found discussed in the sequel.

4441. No Offence.—Two things are essential to constitute this offence. In the first place there must be a trust, and in the second place dishonesty. Where there is one and not the other it may be a case of civil breach of trust but not one imposing criminal liability. There remain cases in which there is no breach of trust at all. Such was the case of the pledgee of goods who had sub-pledged them to another which he was held fully entitled to do.(13) The accused was employed to collect certain dues out of which he was entitled to certain percentage as his commission. He had to deposit the balance in the treasury, but no period was fixed within which he was to do so. It was held that his retention of the money did not expose him to this charge.(14) If, of course, the prosecution fail to prove the trust, they fail in their first duty to bring the offence home to the accused.(15) The accused was the managing director of a Bank. As such, he drew certain Hundis on another bank the amount of which he credited in the floating account of his own bank. Some months later, he caused an entry to be made debiting the Bank with the cost of the Hundis he had purchased. It was clear that he had committed no criminal breach of trust.(16)

(7) Gokavarapu, (1916) 2 M. W. N. 158, 36 I. C. 866.

(8) Lonier, (1914) A. C. 221, 18 C. W. N. 98.

(9) Balthasar, 41 C. 844; Kadir Baksh 33 A. 249.

(10) Mathura Prasad, 40 I. C. (A.) 303.

(11) Giles Seddon v. Loane, 9 M. L. T. 20, 8 I. C. 325. For a case on the other side of the line, see Daulat Rai, (1915) P. R. No. 28, 29 I. C. 105.

(12) Daulat Rai, (1915) P. L. R. 162, 29 I. C. 86.

(13) Sarju Prasad, 9 O. L. J. 421, 71 I. C. 58, 24 Cr. L. J. 10, (1922) A. I. R. (Oudh) 280.

(14) Nurul Hassan, 56 I. C. Pat. 669, 21 Cr. L. J. 509.

(15) Gour Narayan v. Til Bikram, 25 C. W. N. 838, 65 I. C. 1004, 23 Cr. L. J. 220.

(16) Daulat Rai, (1915) P. W. R. 24, 29 I. C. 86, 16 Cr. L. J. 454.

406. Whoever commits criminal breach of trust shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Cognizable. Warrant. Not bail. Not comp.

Punishment for criminal breach of trust.

[Criminal breach of trust—s. 405.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4442).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4443-4449).
(3) Venue (4444).
(4) Change in procedure since 1898 (4445).
(5) Charge affects only criminal breach of trust of money (4446).
(6) Forfeiture (4450).
(7) Proof (4451).
(8) Form of Charge (4452, 4453).
(9) Evidence of criminal breach of trust (4454).
(10) Burden of proof (4455).
(11) Breach of hire-purchase Agreement (4456).
(12) Breach of duty (4457).

4442. Analogous Law.—This section prescribes punishment for the simple offence of criminal breach of trust—its three aggravated forms being dealt with in the three ensuing sections. Thus the next section deals with the offence committed by a carrier, wharfinger or warehouse-keeper, while section 408 deals with the same offence committed by a clerk or servant, and section 409 with a public servant. In all these cases the circumstance of aggravation is the position and nature of trust reposed in the accused, the abuse of which law esteems as specially flagrant and calling for commensurately enhanced punishment.

In this respect English Law is identical, for it also regards such cases as those of aggravated larceny.(17)

4443. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable, and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class. As this offence is non-compoundable, the Court has no power to recognize a compromise of the case made by the prosecutor with the accused, nor does the fact that the latter had given a bond to the former prevents his prosecution,(18) howmuchsoever scandalous may be the conduct of the prosecutor in turning round upon a person with whom he had compounded the case.(19) But in such a case, if the prosecutor is agreeable, the practice of the Courts is to permit the prosecutor to secure

(17) By bailee generally—24 & 25 Vict., c. 96, s. 3; Wells, 1 F. & F. 109; De Banks, 13 Q. B. D. 29; Bellencontre, (1891) 2 Q. B. 122; Bunkall, 33 L. J. M. C. 75; Aden, 12 Cox. 512; Davies, 10 Cox. 239. By clerks or servants—24 & 25 Vict., c. 96, s. 67; misappropriation by servants, 26 & 27 Vict., c. 103, s. 1 (see s. 38, ante): By public servant,—24 & 25 Vict., c. 96, s. 69. By customs officer—39 & 40 Vict., c. 36, s. 29.

(18) Mayandi Pillai, (1886) 1 Weir 462; Ramasami Nadan, (1883) 1 Weir 465.

(19) Daly, 9 C. & P. 342; Bryant, 27 J. P. 277 (289).

a discharge of the accused by offering no evidence.[20] Ordinarily, the criminal Court will not inquire into the benami character of a transaction. It will rest content by assuming the existence of title in one who had possession.[21]

Venue.

4444. One or two points relating to practice call for notice here. As regards the venue it has been held in England that a servant committing criminal breach of trust in respect of his master's money in Paris, cannot be tried in London where his employer suffered the loss in consequence of his embezzlement.[22] But on the point, the rule enacted in the Procedure Code is said to be wider.[23] So that if the master live at Cawnpur, and the servant commit criminal breach of trust in Manbhum, he may, it was held, be tried for the offence equally in both places.[24] But this view has been dissented from in Madras where the rule in consonance with the English Law is followed.[25] In any case where the place for account is fixed it is the place for trial for a breach of contract.[1] As has been remarked under section 403 (§ 4371), an offence under this section may consist of a number of specific items running over a number of years, and each one of them singly and all of them collectively may have been misappropriated so as to be properly made the subject of a prosecution. At one time there was a considerable diversity of views as to whether in such a case, it is legal for the prosecution to charge the accused for an aggregate of embezzlements, without specifying each item separately. This conflict was set at rest by the addition of the following clause to section 222 of the Procedure Code[2]:—

"S. 222. (2) When the accused is charged with criminal breach of trust or dishonest misappropriation of money, it shall be sufficient to specify the gross sum in respect of which the offence is alleged to have been committed, and the dates between which the offence is alleged to have been committed, without specifying particular items or exact dates and the charge so framed shall be deemed to be a charge of one offence within the meaning of section 234:

"Provided that the time included between the first and last of such dates shall not exceed one year."

Change in Procedure since 1898.

4445. Prior to this clause, the High Courts were by no means agreed as to the legality of charging a person for a general deficiency without specifying the particular items in account which were alleged to have been misappropriated. This is the rule of English Law,[3] and it was held to apply to the Code,[4] but in England there is a sharp conflict of view on the subject. For while there are cases which hold with Alderson, B., that "it is not sufficient to prove at the trial a general deficiency in account; some specific sum must be proved to be embezzled, in like manner as in larceny some

(20) Roxburgh, 12 Cox 8.
(21) Harry Jones, 28 C. W. N. 831.
(22) Oliphant, (1905) J. P. 175; to the same effect, Rambilas, 38 M. 639.
(23) S. 179, Cr. P. C.; O'Brien, 19 A. 111, followed in Mahadeo, 32 A. 397; Langride v. Atkins, 35 A. 29; Assistant Sessions Judge v. Ramaswami, 26 M. L. J. 235; dissented from in Rambilas, 38 M. 639; Ganeshi Lal v. Nandkishore, 34 A. 487.
(24) O'Brien, 19 A. 111.
(25) Rambilas, 38 M. 639; Simhachalam v. Rati Kant Laha, 21 C. W. N. 573.
(1) Gunanunda, 29 C. W. N. 432, 86 I. C. 213, (1925) C. 613.
(2) Act V of 1898.
(3) 2 Russ. Crimes, Bk. 4, c. 19, s. 4; Lloyd Jones, 8 C. & P. 228; Wolstenholme, 11 Cox 313.
(4) Ramchand Govind, 19 B. 749 (conceded per Jardine, J.). particular article must be proved to have been stolen,"[5] there are as many and more cases in which the Judges have laid down the contrary.

Thus in one case Erle, J., combated the opposite view, adding: "I think that the offence is sufficiently made out within the meaning of the Statute, if the jury are satisfied that the prisoner received in the aggregate the amount with which he appears to have charged himself, and that he absconded, or refused when called upon to account, leaving a portion of the gross sum deficient. There would be constant failure of justice if I were to decide otherwise, since it is impossible in cases like the present, where a number of different amounts of money have been received, to specify which sum or sums, or the part of which sum or sums have been embezzled."[6] This has been legalized by the Larceny Act, 1861.[7] But no such provision existed till the Procedure Code of 1898 which has now, by adding the clause, brought the law in line with the recent English view. This clause is in conformity with several cases so deciding,[8] while it has necessarily the effect of overruling those in which the specification of items was held to be essential.[9]

Charge Affects Only Criminal Breach of Trust of Money.

4446. Of course, clause 2 of s. 222 of the Procedure Code, manifestly deals only with money. It has no application to any other property. If, therefore, a person is accused of criminal breach of trust in respect of several things other than money, he would have to be separately charged with and tried for each thing separately, and it is illegal to try him for more than three things so misappropriated within the space of twelve calendar months.[10] In such cases, the obvious duty of the prosecution is to select three typical cases so as to bring the offender to justice without subjecting him to multifariousness. This is commendable even in the case of misappropriations of money,[11] though in such a case, it is permissible to pass in review all the items embezzled within the same period, provided that the accused is charged for misappropriation of an aggregate sum as now provided in cl. 2 of section 222 of the Procedure Code. But this is merely permissive and not obligatory, and if the accused has reason to object to the trial on the ground of multifariousness, the Court may see reason to confine the inquiry to a narrower compass, or even specify the items in respect of which the accused is to be tried, from which it, of course, follows that the accused cannot complain of multifariousness if, in addition to the charge being for a general deficiency, it specifies the items which is entirely to the accused's advantage.[12]

(5) Per Alderson, B., in Lloyd Jones, 8 C. & P. 288; followed per Williams, J., in Chapman, 1 C. & K. 119; per Bret, J., in Wolstenholme, 11 Cox. 313.

(6) Lambert, 2 Cox 309; to the same effect, Moah, 25 L. J. M. C. 66; King, 12 Cox 73. This is now provided by Statute 24 & 25 Vict., c. 96, s. 71, which overrules cases deciding otherwise.

(7) 24 & 25 Vict., c. 96, s. 71.

(8) Kellie, 17 A. 153; Buddhu v. Babulal, 18 A. 116; Lachmi Narayan, 14 C. 128.

(9) Ram Chand v. Govind, 19 B. 749; Cheer, 15 W. R. 5; Luchmi Narain, 14 C. 128; Coverjee Hari Dass, 24 C. 193; Ekram Ally, 2 C. W. N. 341.

(10) Criminal Procedure Code (V of 1898), s. 234.

(11) Villikkat Govinda Menon, (1883) Weir (3rd Ed.) 270.

(12) Gulzari Lal, 24 A. 254; Ishtiaq Ahmad, 27 A. 69; Set Narain Tewari, 32 C. 1085.

4447. But whether it is so or not, the prosecution have in any case to establish a prima facie case of criminality against the accused. They have, therefore, to overhaul the accounts generally with a view to see where and when the accused commenced embezzlement. And though in such a case, the charge must be confined to the specific sum of items charged, it is allowable to take in the other acts of embezzlements to prove that the items in dispute could not have been omitted or falsely entered by negligence or mistake.(13) So where on an indictment for embezzling three sums of money, the prosecution had tendered all the account books maintained by the accused in evidence, and the accused objected to the books being generally tendered in evidence, contending that the charge must be confined to the three items specified in the indictment, the Court overruled the objection and upheld the conviction.(14)

So in another case, the account-books were tendered to show that the accused had entered the individual items correctly, but had wrongly totalled them and that from week to week the same mistake was repeated. Williams, J., held that evidence of a series of similar errors, both before and after those which formed the subject of the indictment, was admissible. It was clear that the defence to the three charges would be that these were mere errors in casting up the accounts, and such defence naturally arising, any lawful means might be resorted to whereby such defence might be anticipated, and proved to be ill-founded; and evidence which was admissible for such a purpose was not the less so because it tends to prove the commission of other felonies by the prisoner.(15)

4448. The question of dishonesty is a question of fact and should be left to the jury who are the sole Judges of criminal intention.(16) The offence of the accused may be held proved from their refusal to return it or to account for it.(17) But the mere failure to return it will not of itself support it.(18)

A person charged with the misappropriation of a sum of money, cannot be convicted of the misappropriation of goods and vice versa.(19) Where, therefore, the accused was so charged, he was held entitled to show that the missing goods were never converted into money which he could have misappropriated. If in such a case, there is no evidence that the goods have been converted into cash, the Judge ought not to leave the question to the jury whether the goods have been converted into cash, for them to arrive at a conclusion by mere guess-work.(20) So where the prosecutor had delivered to the accused, an auctioneer, three pieces of furniture for sale, and the charge referred to the accused having misappropriated Rs. 109, being their sale proceeds, the Court quashed the conviction, holding that that amount had never been entrusted to the accused.(21) Then, again, the offence must be completed within the period charged. Where, therefore, the accused was charged for offences committed between the 17th August 1909 and 15th August 1910, and the evidence

(13) S. 15 ill. (b), Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872); Proud, L. & C. 97; Richardson 2 F. & F. 343.
(14) Proud L. & C. 97.
(15) Richardson, 2 F. & F. 343.
(16) Drewett, (1905) 69 J. P. 37.
(17) Jagannath v. Deokinandan, 29 I. C. (C.) 671.
(18) Mathura Prasad, 40 I. C. (A.) 303, 18 Cr. L. J. 655.
(19) Bipra Das v. Niradamani, 12 C. W. N. 577; Balthasar, 41 C. 844.
(20) Clarke, (1905) 69 J. P. 150.
(21) Balthasar, 41 C. 844.

pointed to the misappropriation having been made in February and May 1911, the Court acquitted the accused, holding that no offence had been committed between the dates charged.(22)

4449. Since this offence consists in misappropriation, etc., by a person entrusted with property, or dominion over property, it is necessary to establish a trust, though it is not necessary that the trust should be express or created by writing.(23) But if no case of trust is proved, the offence may be one under section 403, or under section 379,(24) but no case under this section could then be held to have been made out.

4450. Forfeiture.—A case in which the Court had on conviction for this offence, ordered the forfeiture of the rents and profits of the accused's estate,(25) has no significance now since the penalty of forfeiture is abolished.

4451. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused was entrusted with property or with dominion over it.(1)

(2) That he—

(a) misappropriated, or (b) converted to his own use, or (c) used it, or
(d) disposed of it.

} Para 4375

(3) That he did so dishonestly.(2)

(4) That he did so in violation of—

(i) any direction of law prescribing the mode in which such trust was to be discharged, or

(ii) any legal contract, express or implied, which he has made touching the discharge of such trust; or

(5) That he wilfully suffered any person to do as in (2), (3) and (4) (i) or 4 (ii).

4452. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you being entrusted with——(mention the property) committed criminal breach of trust, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 406 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

---

(22) Pramotha Nath Roy, 17 C. W. N. 479, 19 I. C. 315.
(23) Piper, (1902) 95 J. P. 10.
(24) Durga Tewari, 36 C. 758.
(25) Amrit Lal, 29 A. 25; Mohomed Akhbar, 12 W. R. 17.
(1) Piran, 85 I. C. 839, (1923) L. 321. Property must not be worthless; Singhleton 29 C. W. N. 260, 86 I. C. 38, (1925) C. 501.
(2) This is the gist of the crime and must be clearly proved; Bishambar, 87 I. C. 962, (1925) O. 676; Hay, 28 O. C. 230, 88 I. C. 830, (1925) 469 (evidence in case of conspiracy).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

4453. There is a clear distinction between this offence and other cognate offences, e.g., theft or criminal misappropriation, or cheating. (sections 403 and 415). The accused against whom his creditor had sued out execution, seized his moveables which were deposited with one A for safe custody. A died, whereupon the accused took the property and appropriated it to his own use. He was convicted of this offence, but in revision his conviction was altered to one under section 379 in that A's possession was possession of the Court, and his removal therefrom with a dishonest intention constituted theft, and since he had never been entrusted with its possession, there could be no criminal breach of trust.(3) One set of account-books constitutes a single item of property, and would justify only a single charge, and the accused cannot be charged in respect of each account-book as a separate item of property.(4) The accused induced his employer to pay him sums of money which he falsely alleged were required to pay labourers in the owner's coffee plantation. He misappropriated them, and the question was whether the offence was cheating or one under section 408. But since there was an abuse of trust by a servant, the Court held section 408 more appropriate.(5)

4454. Evidence of Criminal Breach of Trust.—All the ingredients of this offence are set out in its definition in the last section, under which they will be found discussed (§§ 4416-4449). This section merely prescribes a penalty for that offence. As such, it punishes an offence which is not within the comprehension of sections 407-409 which deal with the same offence when committed by persons occupying a position of greater confidence. This section only deals with cases not otherwise provided for. But whether the offence necessarily falls under this or any other section relating to the same subject, it must necessarily possess the common ingredients specified in section 405. They require that there should be a trust, between one person and the accused, and that in pursuance of that trust, some property, whether moveable or immoveable should be made over to another, or that he should be assigned certain rights over it (§§ 4417-4426). That taking advantage of such possession or control the accused should have either misappropriated it (§§ 4379-4388), or converted it to his own use (§§ 4429-4438), or that he should have otherwise used it or disposed of it (§§ 4433, 4435) dishonestly, which must be in breach of the trust either constituted by violating a provision of law prescribing the manner in which the trust was to be discharged (§§ 4430-4432) or of any contract made with cestui que trust relating to its discharge (§ 4429).

Such contract must be legal, for if it is illegal no Court will punish for refusing to do an illlegal act. The contract may, however, be express or implied, but if implied, it must be necessarily so, for otherwise the accused may plead misunderstanding or mistake, the offence may be committed

(3) Chunnoo, 8 A. L. J. 656, 11 I. C. 142; but could the Court alter the offence on revision?—Thoppulan, v. Sankrannarayana, (1914) M. W. N. 483, 24 I. C. 176.

(4) Promotha Nath Ray, 17 C. W. N. 479.

(5) Ramappa, 22 M. L. J. 112, 13 I. C. 108; following Q v. Cooke, 40 L. J. M. C. 68.

either by the accused himself doing those acts which are pointed out as criminal, or "wilfully suffering" another person to do so, in which case there must be not only evidence of negligence or omission or dereliction of duty but of a conscious connivance of the act with full knowledge of its criminal character, or in short abetment. Such was held to be the case of the accused who was employed as the Municipal water works Inspector to supervise and check the distribution of water from the Municipal water works. He appropriated water for his own use and that of his tenants without payment. He was held guilty of criminal breach of trust under s. 408, in that, being entrusted with water for sale he misappropriated a part of it for his own use.(6) In another case the Sanitary Inspector of a Municipality had sold the rubbish and night soil instead of depositing it in a place fixed for it. He was convicted of this offence under s. 409,(7) (§§ 1023-1028).

4455. Burden of Proof.—As the offence consists of misappraprіation or misuse of the money, the burden of proof is on the prosecution to prove not only that property was delivered or money paid to the accused on trust, but that he criminally abused it by misappropriating or misapplying the money—or in other words, that he did not apply for the purpose for which it was given to him. So if the accused plead that he had paid the money he was called upon to account to the proper person(8) or give an account to an agent of his employer,(9) it is in the first place on the prosecution to prove that he had not paid the money or given the account. The mere fact that the payment was delayed is no ground for imputing a criminal intention(10) (§ 4436). Nor is the mere fact that the accused had mixed up the account of the prosecutor with his own, criminal.(11) The accused was instructed by the guardian of certain minors to collect and invest funds belonging to the minor so as to give him the largest yield. He mixed up the account of the minor with those of the Bank of which he was a partner. The amounts so received were credited to the minor's account and advances made thereon, sometimes the minor's account being even overdrawn.

The gist of the charge against accused was that he had mixed up the two accounts, and that he was unable to produce the money when called upon to do so, upon which Lord Shaw observed: "The mixture of the funds of another with one's own funds may be in many cases natural and proper, in other cases convenient but irregular, and in the third, both irregular and criminal. The distinctions between these cases require to be treated with the greatest judicial care, so as while preserving the amplest civil responsibility, to prevent the third or criminal category from being extended to mistaken though convenient acts. This is only to say that apart from constructive criminal responsibility which, of course, may be imposed by statute, a Court of justice cannot reach the conclusion that a crime has been committed unless it be a just result of the evidence that the accused in what was done or omitted by him was moved by the guilty

(6) Bimala Charan Roy, 35 A. 361.
(7) Heri Lal, 45 A. 281.
(8) Hari Dayon, (1896) B. U. C. 872.
(9) Ram Chandra Ganesh, (1896) B. U. C. 860.
(10) Balthasar, 41 C. 844; Mathura Prasad, 40 I. C. (A.) 303; Nurul Hassan, 56 I. C. (Pat). 669, 21 Cr. L. J. 509.
(11) Lanier, (1914) A. C. 221, 18 C.W. N. 98 P. C.

mind."[12] Such was also the case of the accused who was the complainant's landlord, to whom the latter paid Rs. 90 as rent of his land. The accused took Rs. 25 therefrom, stating it was a Swadeshi subscription. He demanded Rs. 25 more and refused to give the complainant a receipt till it was paid. He was convicted under ss. 406 and 417; but in revision the Court quashed his conviction holding that an illegal demand did not amount to a crime.[13]

4456. Breach of Hire-purchase Agreement.—The accused had taken a motor car under the hire-purchase agreement stipulating that he "shall not during the hiring, assign, underlet, or part with the possession of the same in any way whatsoever." In violation of the agreement he mortgaged the car to three different persons who were given under their respective mortgages, either the right to recover possession of the car or to bring it to sale. He was convicted of this offence, and on appeal Beaman, J., doubted if he could be convicted, but on the case finally coming on for hearing before another Bench, his conviction was upheld on the ground that he had violated his contract and that his conduct was dishonest within the meaning of section 24, in that he had caused wrongful gain to himself and wrongful loss to the owner who would have to fight the mortgagees for his priority.[14] This decision is unquestionably right, since the property in the car being still with the complainant, the conduct of the accused was scarcely distinguishable from that if he had hired a car from a garage for a day and then sold it to another appropriating the proceeds. In other words, he was not the owner but a mere bailee of the car.[15]

In another case the accused received some jewellery on approval, promising the payment of price if accepted. He kept the goods but never paid the price. It was held that property in the goods did not pass to the accused because he had not paid the price, and that, therefore, his retention of them constituted an offence under this section.[16] But where the complainant had delivered a motor car to the accused on a hire-purchase agreement, there being an express agreement that the car was to remain the absolute property of the complainant till its full price was paid, he sued for the price and obtained a decree after which the accused sold the car. It was held that since the original contract became merged in the decree, the property in the car was no longer in the complainant, and that, therefore, its sale by the accused was not punishable under this section, though the accused might still be proceeded against under s. 206[17]

Breach of Duty.

4457. The accused in another case, was the Waterworks Inspector of the Cawnpur Municipality. He rented two houses, one of which he sublet, and to convenience the sub-lessee he secretly tapped the main and joined it on to the house, recovering the water tax from his sub-tenant which, of course, he appropriated to himself. The fact having become known he was convicted of this offence

(12) Lanier, (1914) A. C. 221, 18 C. W. N. 98 P. C.

(13) Kumeda Charan Ghose, 15 C. L. J. 515; distinguishing Khoda Bux v. Bakaya, 32 C. 948.

(14) Selas Moses, 17 Bom. L. R. 670; Maung Mya Gyi v. Nga Po Shwe, 7 Bur. L. T. 222, 24 I. C. 161; Khitish Chandra 51 C. 796; Cadd, 45 A. 288.

(15) But everything depends upon the contract; Kedar Nath, 73 I. C. 807, 24 Cr. L. J. 695.

(16) Khitish Chandra, 51 C. 796.

(17) Cohen, 40 I. C. (C.) 728, 18 Cr. L. J. 728.

and his conviction was upheld on the ground that in misappropriating the water he had committed an offence under s. 408, and as regards the water-tax his offence fell under this section.(18)

There can be, of course, no conviction, when there is a doubt as to the purpose for which the accused was entrusted with the money.(19)

For further commentary on this section, see s. 405.

Criminal breach of trust by carrier, etc.

407. Whoever, being entrusted with property as a carrier, wharfinger or warehouse-keeper commits criminal breach of trust in respect of such property, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Cognizable. Warrant. Not bail. Not comp.

[Criminal breach of trust—s. 405.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4458).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4459).
(3) Proof (4460).
(4) Form of Charge (4461).
(5) Criminal Breach of Trust by Carrier and Common Custodian (4462-4463).
(6) Wharfinger (4464).
(7) Warehouse-keeper (4465).

4458. Analogous Law.—This section deals with bailees entrusted with storage or conveyance of goods. As such, the bailee being in sole charge of them for a special purpose and for which he is presumably paid, it lies with him to take special precautions for their safe custody. And his offence is for the same reason considered specially heinous if he abuses the special trust reposed in him and pilfers the very goods it is his duty to protect.

4459. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable, and warrant should, ordinarily, issue in the first instance. It is both non bailable and non-compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class.

4460. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused was entrusted with property, or with dominion over property.

(2) That he was so entrusted as a carrier, wharfinger or warehouse-keeper.

(3) That he committed criminal breach of trust in respect of it.

4461. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

(18) Bimala Charan Roy, 35 A. 361. (19) Duli Chand, 38 I. C. (C.) 997.

"That on or about the——day of——at——you being entrusted with ———(mention the property) as a carrier or wharfinger or warehouse-keeper committed criminal breach of trust in respect of it, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 407 of the Indian Penal Coed, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

4462. Criminal Breach of Trust by Carrier and Common Custodian.—This section prescribes an enhanced punishment for criminal breach of trust committed by a carrier, wharfinger or warehouse-keeper. The property that would be entrusted to these persons would naturally be moveable property, but it must be entrusted to them in their capacity as carrier, wharfinger or warehouse-keeper. A carrier must be, it is conceived, a common carrier as referred to in the Carriers Act,(20) and who is defined to be a person other than the Government, engaged in the business of transporting for hire property from place to place, by land or navigation, for all persons indiscriminately. The Indian Railways are carriers, though their liability is specially limited.(21) But these limitations affect only their civil liability. But they are "carriers" all the same for the purpose of this section. The liability of a person as carrier depends upon the liability he is under to deliver to a person named, goods in specie. He ceases to be a carrier, if he is entrusted with the duty or is at liberty to convert the article delivered to him into something else, before he returns it or delivers it to other persons to whom he is entrusted to deliver it.(22)

The prosecutor entrust his mare to the prisoner for sale on the following Wednesday. He sold the mare and absconded with the proceeds of sale. He was convicted as bailee of the money,(23) but Stephen, J., dissenting, held that bailment implied "a deposit of something to be returned in specie."(24) The prosecutor engaged the prisoner a carter, to bring him half a ton of coal from a coal-staith for which he gave him money. The prisoner brought the requisite quantity of coal in his own name, loaded them in his own cart, and while conveying them to the prosecutor abstracted a quantity therefrom, the residue being delivered as the coals purchased as required. It was held that he was liable as a bailee.(25) The same view was taken in another case in which the carter misappropriated the money before he ever purchased the coals.(1) If such cases arose under the Code the accused would be liable under the general provisions of section 406, but it is doubtful if he would be held to have been entrusted with the money as a carrier. No doubt the money was entrusted to the accused because he was a carrier, but then it was not to be conveyed in specie. Such a case arose where a carter was employed by the owner of a cargo of coals to load the coals in the carter's own carts from the ship, and to deliver

(20) Act III of 1865, moulded on The English Carriers Act, 1830 (11 Geo. IV & 1 Will. IV, c. 68).
(21) Ib., s. 2.
(22) Indian Railways Act (IX of 1890) ss. 72-82.
(23) De Banks, 13 Q. B. D. 29 (31).
(24) Ib., p. 32.
(25) Bunkall, 33 L. J. M. C. 75.
(1) Aden, 12 Cox 512.

specified quantities to certain persons. He sold two loads of the coals dishonestly to persons whose names were not mentioned by the owner and misappropriated the price. He was held liable as the bailee of the two loads.[2]

4463. Of course, a carrier may be entrusted with "property" of any kind, whether money or any other thing whether of value or otherwise. For instance, a carter may be engaged for treasury remittance, in which case he would be liable under this section if the money was entrusted to him, but not otherwise. Such a case may be conceived of a Sub-Treasury making a remittance to the Central Treasury of cash carried in carts, but which is in charge of the police guard and not of the carter, who is merely hired to carry the bullion but is not entrusted with its custody. The gist of the crime appears to be abuse of the confidence necessarily reposed in the carrier for the safe conveyance of property which is for that purpose delivered to him. If, therefore, a sealed box containing cash or valuables be entrusted to a carrier for conveyance from one place to another, and the carrier abstract its contents and deliver the box intact at its destination he would be liable for theft, but not for criminal breach of trust under this section. But the case would be otherwise if the carrier dishonestly misappropriates the whole box. The question whether the carrier's agents and servants are equally comprised in the term has not yet arisen, but they do not appear to be included in the term. They cannot be held to be entrusted with property as a carrier, nor is there any privity between them and the owner.

4464. Wharfinger.—The case of wharfingers and warehouse-keepers stands on the same footing and for the same reason. A wharfinger is the owner or keeper of a wharf, and a wharf[3] is a structure or platform of timber, masonry, iron, earth, or other material built on the shore of a harbour, river, canal, or the like, and usually extending from the shore to deep water, so that vessels may lie close together to receive and discharge cargo, passengers and the like.[4] A wharf is sometimes called a quay or a pier and the owner or possessor of such wharf usually charges a due called wharfage for its use. The wharfinger has necessarily charge of the goods at a critical stage in their transit when they are being loaded or unloaded and thus transferred from one carrier to another. It is also the stage when the goods require special protection as they are necessarily exposed to greater risks.

4465. Warehouse-keeper.—The last class of bailee mentioned is the warehouse-keeper who is the keeper of a warehouse, which is a house for keeping "ware,"[5] which means merchandise goods or commodities. A warehouse is thus what is ordinarily called godown in this country, and a warehouse-keeper is the keeper of a godown. A person who rents his warehouse to another is not the keeper of the warehouse which connotes a person who receives things for safe custody. The

(2) Davies, 10 Cox 239.
(3) From Swed; Varf, a shipbuilder's yard.
(4) Webster.
(5) Allied to worth, value.

cloak room of a railway station or hotel is such a warehouse, and the keeper thereof would be liable under this section for the offence of criminal breach of trust. So keepers of grain godowns are liable to those who store it in their charge. But if they merely rent a godown and store therein grain under their own lock and key, they cannot hold the owner liable because he was not entrusted with the property.

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Cognizable. Warrant. Not bail. Not comp.

Criminal breach of trust by clerk or servant.

408. Whoever, being a clerk or servant or employed as a clerk or servant, and being in any manner entrusted in such capacity with property or with any dominion over property, commits criminal breach of trust in respect of that property, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[Criminal breach of trust—s. 405.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4466).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4467).
(3) Proof (4468).
(4) Charge (4469-4470).
(5) Criminal Breach of Trust by Clerk or Servant (4471).
(6) Entrusted in Such Capacity (4472-4475).
(7) Servants' Commission (4476-4478).
(8) Abetment (4479).

4466. Analogous Law.—Theft by a clerk or servant is an aggravated form of that offence punishable under section 381. A criminal breach of trust by the same person is similarly visited with the aggravated penalty here prescribed. It will be observed that in this respect this section is exactly the same as the last.

4467. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable, and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class. As has been observed under section 406 (§§ 4443-4451), this offence may be inquired into both at a place where it was actually committed as well as in that, where a person suffered a consequence of that offence. If, for instance, the master at Cawnpur send a servant to Manbhum with goods which he should misappropriate there, the master would be entitled to prosecute him at Cawnpur, and the accused cannot object that he should be tried at Manbhum where the alleged criminal breach of trust was committed.(6) The conviction of an accused by a Magistrate is not illegal merely because he had also committed an offence under s. 477-A which is exclusively triable by the Court of Session.(7)

(6) S. 179, Cr. P. C.; O'Brien. 19 A. 111; Dina, 6 L. 257.

(7) Which may be inferred by his failure to account for it; Sona Meah, 2 R. 476.

For other points relating to practice, reference should be made to §§ 4443-4451.

4468. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused was the clerk or servant or employed as such.

(2) That as such he was entrusted with the property in question or with dominion over it.

(3) That he committed criminal breach of trust in respect of it.(7)

4469. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you being a clerk of A B (or servant, or employed as a clerk or servant by A B) and in such capacity entrusted with (or with dominion over) certain property, to wit——committed criminal breach of trust with respect to the said property, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 408 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court). ....

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

4470. A person who commits a criminal breach of trust and prepares a false account to shield himself cannot be separately charged under ss. 408 and 465 inasmuch as the falsification of accounts was an offence which formed part of the same transaction within the meaning of s. 235 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.(8) But the case would be different where the falsified accounts were unconnected with the specific sums in respect of which the criminal breach of trust was charged.(9) But in such a case it may be a question whether the joinder of two such unconnected charges was not illegal. The accused was given a cheque to clear certain goods from a railway. He cashed it, but when questioned about it on the following day, denied having done so. A few days later he persuaded the goods clerk to deliver him the goods promising him payment which he never made. He was tried for this offence and cheating, but his conviction was quashed on the ground of misjoinder of charges and a re-trial ordered.(10)

4471. Criminal Breach of Trust by Clerk or Servant.—This offence being an aggravated form of criminal breach of trust must naturally possess all the ingredients which are set out in section 405 and discussed thereunder (§§ 4416-4439). In addition to those elements the offence must be shown to have been committed by "a clerk or servant"

(7) S. 179, Cr. P.C.; O'Brien, 19 A. 111; Dina, 6 L. 257.

(8) Lalji Bhauji, 14 Bom. L. R. 306, 15 I. C. 645; distinguishing Nathalal, 4 Bom. L. R. 433; Kasi Viswanathan, 30 M. 328.

(9) Nathalal, 4 Bom. L. R. 433; Kasi Viswanathan, 30 M. 328.

(10) Parmeshwar Lal, 13 C. W. N. 1089, 4 I. C. 28.

or one employed as such. These words are not novel, for they occur also in section 381 where their meaning will be found to have been discussed (§§ 4167-4176). The phrase as used in that section somewhat differs, for it speaks of one who is "employed in the capacity of a clerk or servant," but this is only a verbal variation and does not differ from the shorter phraseology here adopted. A clerk is a word of wide import and ordinarily means a writer employed in an office, public or private, for maintaining accounts, recording minutes and transact other business under direction of a Court, superior official or an official superior, but who is not himself charged with any independent function.

A clerk is a ministerial subordinate, and, so long as his duties are clerical, he is a clerk, by whatsoever designation he may be officially or popularly known. An amanuensis, a typist or a copyist, a superintendent of an office, and other officials whose duty is to assist by their pen, officers in their public duties are clerks. They may or may not be legally appointed, but if they are "employed" as such—if they are de facto clerks—they answer the designation whatever informality or illegality may taint their appointment.(11) The question whether a person is a clerk or not may sometimes raise nice questions, but its collocation with the word "servant," obviates such discussion. For if a person fails to be a clerk he may still be a servant, which is a term implying an assistant of whatever grade or kind, including a clerk as well as other employees paid or unpaid. A servant must, however, be distinguished from an agent, for the former is within the rule; the latter is not. The distinction between the two terms has been already the subject of notice elsewhere, and it need not be again adverted to (§§ 4171-4172).

4472. Entrusted in Such Capacity.—Assuming then that a person stands to another in the relation of a clerk or servant the section requires that he should have been in such capacity entrusted with property or with any dominion over property. In this respect this section differs from section 381 which makes the clerk or servant liable to the higher punishment there provided without being in custody of the things he steals. If a clerk or servant is entrusted with property, but not in his capacity as such, he will be liable, but only for the simple offence punishable under s. 406. His greater liability depends upon the special trust reposed in him as a clerk or servant. It is not necessary that the property entrusted to him should have been within the scope of his legitimate duties, for it may have been entrusted to him "in any manner," but nevertheless the duty should have been assigned to him in his capacity as clerk or servant. This dispenses with the proof of the legality of the duty, but does not dispense with the proof of its delegation in that character. In short, it does not make a servant liable qua servant for all breaches of trust, but only those which he has committed in respect of property entrusted to him in that capacity.

Where the Head Clerk in a Government office was entrusted with certain stamps for custody and he made them over to the Nazir, who misappropriated them, it was held that, whether his custody of the stamps was legal or illegal was immaterial so long as it was qua Nazir, since this section does not limit the mode in which a trust should arise, whether by specific order or by reason of its being a part of the proper duty of a public functionary.(12) He was, therefore, held liable as much under this section as under s. 409. Such a case is clearly distinguishable from one in which an official employs another as a "fag," in which case it cannot be said that the latter was necessarily entrusted with property in his capacity as clerk or servant. Such, indeed, was the case of the Court Inspector whose duty it was to receive and pay moneys received on various accounts either to the collectorate or to the parties entitled to receive them. Th Inspector delegated his duties to a constable and the question was whether the constable who was guilty of misappropriations should be dealt with under this section or section 409. It was conceded that the trust was not reposed in him in his capacity as a constable, and that the constable could not be therefore punished under section 409, but it was said that in delegating to him that duty the Court Inspector employed him as his "servant" under a special trust, and that, therefore, his offence was punishable under this section.(13)

(11) Foulkes, 44 L. J. M. C. 65.

4473. But why, it may be asked, was the constable his servant and not his agent for the special purpose for which he was illegally charged with that duty? Such a case is scarcely distinguishable from one in which, let us suppose, an officer employs his official clerk to check his washing. If the clerk took a fancy to some of his clothes he was entrusted with the duty of receiving and checking, could he be charged with this offence, because forsooth he had become his servant for that special purpose? Of course, it is easy to conceive of the case of a factotum who like a general in gentleman's household is assigned no particular duties and may be employed for any purpose as the occasion may demand. In that case the servant could not claim exoneration merely on the ground that the trust did not arise within the scope of his usual duties.

The accused who was a Gomasta of the complainant received certain sums of moneys aggregating Rs. 600 between 15th April and 30th June of a year for the purchase of wood. When questioned he falsely stated having purchased wood from various parties, but in fact he had purchased nothing. He was held to have been properly convicted under this section.(14) In this case there was a specific direction establishing the trust, but if the Gomasta had been in charge of the prosecutor's estate, and as such realized rent collections, and if he had been in general account with his employers and if as such he had been ordered to purchase wood, and had then made the false statement proved against him in the last case, he would not have been necessarily guilty of this offence, unless coupled with the false statement there was evidence of defalcation in the general balance. Compared to this the following is a clear case, illustrative of this offence. The accused

(12) Ram Dhun Dey, 13 W. R. 77.
(13) Per Glover and Seton-Karr, JJ., in Banee Madhub Ghose, 8 W. R. 1; but see Karimuddin, 40 A. 565.
(14) Watson & Co. v. Golab Khan, 10 W. R. 28.

was the servant of a company of coffee planters. Its manager gave him a sum for distribution to the garden coolies. He appropriated it and was convicted of this offence.[15] He might have been equally convicted of cheating for he had on various occasions induced the manager to pay him money which he had falsely induced him to believe was required for payment to the coolies. Where the accused was given some money to purchase paddy but he failed to purchase the paddy and misappropriated the money, he was convicted of this offence because he was the servant of a firm who had employed him for that purpose.[16]

4474. Again, the trust may be express or implied, but the liability of the accused is in either case the same. A servant employed for the purpose of collecting bills and giving receipts to the payee is charged with an express trust for that purpose.[17] If, on the other hand, he was employed for another purpose, but nevertheless collected bills on behalf of his employer, then he was his implied trustee for the sums so collected.[18] Such was the case of the accused who was the court agent of the prosecutors, who were zemindars and who was employed to pay into the treasury the land revenue and cesses due from them. The latter sent him a sum of Rs. 394-5 by post, but without any accompanying letter of advice. The accused acknowledged receipt of the money and the next day he sent a letter stating that he had paid the Government revenue, and enclosed therewith four Treasury chalans in which he had altered the figures of the amounts he had actually paid into the Treasury. He was convicted of forgery as well as this offence, but on appeal it was contended for him that there could be no conviction for criminal breach of trust as there was no evidence of trust express or implied, but the Court held that it was to be inferred from the remittance having been made on the last day, when the instalment fell due, and from the fact that the accused had made payments of small amounts and sent the chalans altered as vouchers of the payment on account of the instalment and as he had altered the chalans so as to show payments of larger sums it was clear that he had misappropriated the difference which brought his act within the purview of this section: "He had done completely all that was necessary to show that the amount had been duly appropriated to his employer's use by forwarding the altered chalans and falsely showing a deposit by him of the larger amount."[19]

4475. The same view was taken in another case in which, the prosecutor gave the accused certain blocks of wood-engraving to illustrate his catalogue of jewellery, which the accused surreptitiously used in illustrating the catalogue of another person, it was held that the use was dishonest because it caused wrongful gain to the other customer in saving him the cost of preparing the blocks, and it was so intended because the accused used them clandestinely. The question remained

(15) Ramappa 22 M. L. J. 112, 13 I. C. 108, 13 Cr. L. J. 15.

(16) Pyo Gyi, 10 L. B. R. 31, 51 I. C. 673; 20 Cr. L. J. 513; cf. Narayanasawmi, 9 M. L. T. 332, 9 I. C. 726, 12 Cr. L. J. 123.

(17) Basiruddin, 9 C. L. J. 257, 4 I. C. 48.

(18) S. 94, ill. (b). Indian Trusts Act, Act II of 1882.

(19) Lolit Mohun Sarkar, 22 C. 313.

whether in using the blocks the accused was guilty of any violation of contract express or implied, and it was so held because it was not possible for the complainant to permit the accused to embellish a rival tradesman's catalogue at his expense.[20] As compared to these the case of the Waterworks Inspector who tapped a Municipal main and effected a private connection with his house rented to a tenant from whom he realized a water-tax appropriating it himself presents no difficulty. As one in charge of the water supply, his misappropriation of the water of his employer for his own use rendered him liable to the penalties of this section; as one who had recovered the water-tax from his tenant he was guilty of the same offence punishable under s. 406, inasmuch as he had recovered it to pay to the Municipality but which he did not pay.[21]

4476. Servant's Commission.—The commission claimed from and paid by tradesmen raises a somewhat more difficult question, which was considered in a case in which the facts were these. The accused Imdad Khan was a superintendent of stores in Postal employ at Allahabad. It was his duty to receive and check the quality of stores and send them to outstations. He paid the contractors on bills signed by himself and countersigned by the Inspector-General. One such contractor was Tarini of Calcutta who supplied a certain cloth at the contract rate of Re. 1-12 6 per piece of eighteen yards. In January, 1881, the appellant rejected a consignment of this cloth received from Calcutta as being of an inferior quality. He then arranged with Tarini to procure the cloth locally and remit him his profit at one anna per piece. Thereafter the accused purchased the cloth at Allahabad, but Tarini billed for it at the contract rates which the accused cashed as before stated. It was contended by the prosecution that the accused purchased the cloth at a cheaper rate (i.e., at Re. 1-6 a piece) and after remitting one anna a piece to Tarini as his profit he himself misappropriated the difference. It was, however, admitted that the cloth was of the requisite quality.

It was held that if the facts alleged had been proved, the accused would be undoubtedly guilty of criminal breach of trust under this section.[22] The Court then added: "If the account is an open one, that is, an account of which the items have never been checked or settled, and if the transaction amounts to a taxation of the bill and a reduction of the price by the servant, it is obvious that the servant obtains the reduction for his master; that the money in his hand always remains the master's property; and that, if he appropriates it he steals it. But if the master himself has settled the account with the tradesman for a specific sum, and he sends the servant with the money, and the servant, after making the payment, asks the tradesman for a present, then, if the servant takes the present, and keeps it, he is not guilty of stealing because he has no intention to steal; the money is given to him by a person whom he believes to have a right to give it. It may be that, according to the strict equitable doctrines of the Court of Chancery, the servant is bound to account to his master for the money. But, however this may be, his act is a very different matter from a criminal offence, and I do not think he can be convicted of criminal breach of trust merely because by a mere equitable doctrine of the Court of Chancery, it was obligatory on him to render an account."(23)

(20) Keshab Chandra Boral v. Nityanund Biswas, 6 C. W. N. 203 (206).

(21) Bimalacharan Roy, 35 A. 361.

(22) Imdad Khan, 8 A. 120.

4477. This case once more illustrates the civil breach of trust from a breach which is criminal. That a servant cannot make a secret profit out of his position is a proposition which admits of no doubt. So Lord Cairns, L. C., said: "The rule of this Court, as I understand it, as to agents, is not a technical or arbitrary rule. It is a rule founded upon the highest and truest principles of morality. No man can, in this Court acting as an agent, be allowed to put himself into a position in which his interest and his duty will be in conflict. The Court will not inquire, and is not in a position to ascertain, whether the bank has lost or not lost by the acts of the directors. All that the Court has to do is to examine whether a profit has been made by an agent, without the knowledge of his principal, in the course and execution of his agency." To which James, L. J., added: "That rule is an inflexible rule, and must be applied inexorably by this Court which is not entitled, in my judgment, to receive evidence, or suggestion, on argument as to whether the principal did or did not suffer any injury, in fact by reason of the dealing of the agent; for the safety of mankind requires that no agent shall be able to put his principal to the danger of such an inquiry as that."(24)

4478. As this section is only confined to criminal breach of trust in respect of "property" entrusted to a clerk or servant, it follows that if what was entrusted to the accused was not "property", he could not be convicted of this offence. Instances have been already given before of objects which do not answer that designation (§§ 4078-4083). In all such cases there being no property there can be no dishonesty and there being no dishonesty there can be no theft, criminal misappropriation or criminal breach of trust or, indeed, any offence of which dishonesty is an essential ingredient.

4479. Abetment.—A person though not himself a clerk or servant may be convicted of abetment of this offence by a person who is so. But in such a case all the elements essential to consititute an abetment must be present. If, for instance, a person is charged for abetment of criminal breach of trust by a servant, it must be proved that what the accused had instigated the servant to do was criminal breach of trust and that he was aware of it.(25) If his act was innocent and the servant used it for the purpose of this crime, he could not be charged for this abetment.

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st class. Cognizable. Warrant. Not bail. Not comp.

Criminal breach of trust by public servant or by banker, merchant or agent.

409. Whoever, being in any manner entrusted with property, or with any dominion over property in his capacity of a public servant or in the way of his business as a banker, merchant, factor, broker, attorney or agent, commits criminal breach of trust in respect of that property shall be punished with transportation for life or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years and shall also be liable to fine.

(23) Imdad Khan, 8 A., 135.

(24) Parker v. McKenna, L. R. 10 Ch. 96, to the same effect, Robinson v. Mollet, L. R. 7 H. L. 812; Hay's case, L. R. 10 Ch. 593; McKay's case, 2 Ch. D. 1; Panama and South Pacific Telegraph Co. v. India Rubber etc. Co., L. R. 10 Ch. 515.

(25) Bal Gobinda Shaha, 4 C. W. N. 309 (Head note inaccurate).

[Public servant—s. 21. Property—s. 378 (§§ 4066-4088), s. 405 (§§ 4397-4427 Criminal breach of trust—s. 405.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4480).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4481).
(3) Proof (4482).
(4) Form of Charge (4483).
(5) Principle (4484).
(6) Meaning of Words (4485).
(7) Criminal Breach of Trust by Public Servant and Others (4486-4497).
(8) By Public Servant (4486-4490).
(9) Banker (4491).
(10) Merchant (4492).
(11) Factor (4493).
(12) Broker (4494).
(13) Attorney (4495).
(14) Agent (4496-4497).

4480. Analogous Law.—This is the last section of the set dealing with the offence of criminal breach of trust attended with aggravation. Of these this section prescribes the highest penalty. It is consequently deemed the worst type of the offence. But it is possible that the provisions of this section may overlap those of the last section, unless that section be restricted to apply only to a clerk or servant who is not a public servant or any of the rest. That it must be necessarily so is however evident. For if the offence falls under this section it must be necessarily excluded from the last and other sections prescribing a lower penalty : Specialia generalibus derogant.(1)

4481. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable, and warrant should, ordinarily, issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class. For other points of practice, see section 406(§§ 4443-4451).

4482. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused was either a public servant, a banker, a merchant, factor, or a broker, or an attorney or agent.

(2) That as such he was entrusted with the property in question or with any dominion over it.(2)

(3) That he committed criminal breach of trust in respect of it.

4483. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows :—

(1) Things special take away from the things general."

(2) Saiyid Mohiuddin, 4 Pat. 488.

"That on or about the——day of——at——you being in any manner entrusted with property, to wit——(or with any dominion over property, to wit——) in your capacity of a public servant (or in the way of your business as a banker, merchant, factor, broker, attorney, or agent), committed criminal breach of trust in respect of that property, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 409 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

4484. Principle.—The persons brought under the lash of this section are those in whom the public have necessarily to place the utmost confidence. It is also necessary that person who necessarily wield large powers and execute varied duties in which they handle large properties should be above temptation in matters with which they are officially concerned. Such persons have, therefore, in all countries been the subject of stringent laws, as the mischief their misappropriations might cause is as unexpected as it is widespread. In the case of public servants in particular, the Government is primarily concerned in enforcing upon them a high standard of morality, which should be pattern to those who whether as bankers, factors or agents, are entrusted with equally important duties.

4485. Meaning of Words.—"In his capacity of a public servant": It need not, however, be his legal capacity or duties. "Or in the way of his business," i.e., in the course of his trade in the ordinary course of his duties as such merchant, etc. "Banker, merchant, factor, broker, attorney or agent": All these persons are trusted agents employed by the public in their various business. As to the precise meanings of these terms, see below (§§ 4491-4497). "In respect of that property," that is to say, the property entrusted to them or over which they are entrusfed with any dominion.

4486. Criminal Breach of Trust by Public Servant and Others.—

(1) By Public Servant.

The special provisions of this section which prescribe the maximum penalty of transportation for life apply only to the six classes of persons specified as the "public servant", banker, merchant, factor, broker, attorney or agent. With the possible exception of a "public servant" all the rest are generally speaking agents of the public employed for the discharge of certain, often important, functions, and their duties are of a quasi-public character. In any case they are persons in whom the public have necessarily to repose abundant confidence, and a criminal breach of trust committed by them may often cause widespread misery: it certainly tends to shake public confidence in persons but for whom the administration of a country could not well be carried on.

Consequently, the section places in the forefront of those exposed to the penalties of this section—the public servants. But the section makes no distinction as regards the constitution of the crime and the apportionment of punishment. In all cases the section qualifies their liability only to property entrusted to them in their capacity of public servant or in the way of their business as banker, etc. Similar words occur in the last section under which the limitation implied by their use has been pointed out (§§ 4472—4475). It will be observed that while these words define the capacity of the recipient there is nothing to define the capacity of the trustor. The persons entrusted with property must, therefore, answer a certain description and possess a certain capacity, but the person entrusting the property may be any one. This is manifest from the section, though it has been the subject of a reported case.(3)

4487. Any person may then create such a trust, and the trust may be created "in any manner." It is not necessary that it should be created in a legal manner or that it should be so accepted. It is sufficient if the trust is in fact created and accepted, the former trusting him as a public servant, etc., and the latter accepting the trust as such. It may not be legal or within the legitimate scope of his duties. But he becomes liable under this section by the mere fact of his acceptance. So where the Head Clerk of an office was legally entrusted with the custody of certain stamps, and the latter made them over to the Nazir, it was held that the latter had by his misappropriation brought himself within the mischief of this section.(4)

The same view was taken of the Police Moharir who was sent for by a traveller who had in his possession considerable property consisting of cash and gold coins, and who while at a serai believed himself to be dying and thereupon sent word to the Police station to take charge of his property. The accused who was the Thana Moharir went and took charge of it, and misappropriated it. The question was whether his offence fell under this section; in other words, was he entrusted with the property in his capacity as a public servant; and it was held that since the accused was empowered by section 95 of the Procedure Code of 1872 (now s. 149) to receive the property to prevent the commission of an offence, such as theft, by other persons taking advantage of the illness or death of the traveller, he must be deemed to have been entrusted with the property in his capacity as a public servant.(5)

In another case, the accused who was a clerk in the record-office of a collectorate abstracted a copy of a sale-certificate belonging to the person to whom he delivered it, and who was shown to have requisitioned it for production in another case. He was convicted under this section, but the question that exercised the Court was whether his doing a right thing in a wrong way was dishonest. It was conceded that the recipient was entitled to the return of his copy and would have got it back if he had applied for it in the regular way. It was, however, held that the Government was deprived of the small amount of court-fee which the applicant would have had to pay on his application for return of the document which in the view of Aikman, J., constituted the wrongful loss to Government.(6) But the learned Judge could not have been unaware of the fact that such applications

(3) Ram Soondar Poddar, 2 C. L. R. 515.
(4) Ram Dhun Dey, 13 W. R. 77
(5) Bhag Singh (1876) P. R. No 24.
(6) Ganga Prasad, 27 A. 260.

are exempt from court-fee. It was said that the accused might have received illegal gratification for doing the friendly act. But this was a mere surmise.

4488. The following case, however, presents no difficulty. The accused, a Sub-Post-Master was authorised to redeem cash certificates by payment of Rs. 8-2-6. He paid to a holder only Rs. 7-6-6. He was guilty of this offence.(7) The rubbish and night soil removed by the Municipal Sweepers is the property of the Municipality. Consequently, where the accused, a Sanitary Inspector, sold it and had it deposited on the soil of those from whom he had received payment he was convicted of this offence.(8) The accused was a subordinate in the Salt Department of Government. He was empowered to sell salt at a reduced rate to fish-curers who held tickets entitling them to the concession. He purchased salt himself at the reduced rate charging it to the account of the ticket-holders, thus defrauding Government of the difference in the two rates. It was held that inasmuch as he was entrusted with dominion over the salt entrusted to sell at reduced rates only to those who cured fish, his converting the salt to his own use would, if proved, be both dishonest and a violation of trust, and that, therefore, he would be guilty of this offence. As however the accused had been acquitted, the Court remanded the case for a re-trial.(9)

4489. Clearer still was the case of a constable who having been entrusted with the pay of his Police out station dishonestly misappropriated it.(10) The accused who was a cattle-pound Moharir realised Rs. 5 on account of pound-fee, but gave the payer a receipt for only Rs. 4 which amount he entered in his register. But before he could remit the amount into the Treasury the payer complained of the overcharge, and the accused having come to know of it altered the entries in the account book and the counterfoil of the receipt and remitted the full amount. It was held that the accused was guilty of an attempt to commit this offence.(11) But it is not explained why it was not the offence itself.

But though a person may have no jurisdiction to act in a particular transaction, still he must be entrusted and prima facie act in that capacity. For instance, in Madras there is a class of public servants called village shroffs, whose duty it is to realize and remit revenue payable in cash to Government. In certain other tracts such persons are called village patels, but their duties are the same. A shroff received grain from the ryots and in return granted receipts for the public revenue as if for money received. But he failed to remit the amount for which he had passed the money-receipts, and thereupon he was convicted under this section, but it was held that "the shroff could not receive the public revenues in kind; and the party who so delivered the grain did not thereby discharge himself from liability for the revenue," and that, therefore, he could not be convicted of this offence.(12) The facts of this case have not been fully reported, and it may be that the

(7) Sita Ram, 42 A. 204.
(8) Hari Lal, 45 A. 281.
(9) Balayya, (1894) 1 Weir 467 (468).
(10) Subdar Meeah, 3. W. R. 44.
(11) Bhula, (1893) B. U. C. 632.
(12) 4 M. H. C. R. (App.) 32.

accused had received grain conditionally. For, if he purchased the grain and paid for it receipts passed in satisfaction of revenue, they would be as good as if he had received the rents in cash, for which he would then be criminally liable under this section.

4490. As has been elsewhere pointed out by the present writer, the question in such cases depends upon the intention of the parties,[13] and so does also the question of criminality. In another case the village kurnam, who is also in practice a revenue agent of Government and as such in subordinate charge of the collection of revenue, realised moneys from certain ryots of the village as revenue due on unassessed lands, part of which have been cultivated by the ryots without leave and as cost of its demarcation, which he misappropriated. He was convicted under this section, but his conviction was quashed on appeal by the High Court, who appears to be of opinion that the moneys were not paid to him in his capacity as agent of Government or in trust for Government. Nor was he guilty of cheating as the ryots must clearly have known that the money was not to be paid to Government. The prisoner was, therefore, acquitted.[14]

(2) Banker

4491. Criminal breach of trust committed by a banker is subject to the same rule, provided that it is committed by him in "the way of his business". A banker is a person who conducts the business of banking, and banking is the business of a bank which is an establishment for the custody, loan, exchange or issue of money, and for facilitating the transmission of funds by drafts or bills of exchange. The share-holders of an incorporated bank and its directors are within the term. In other cases all partners of a banking concern would singly and collectively fall into that category. In the former case the directors have dominion over the property and management of the funds of the bank, so that if they dishonestly, that is, knowingly and intentionally pay dividends to the share-holders out of deposits when there were no profits, intending to cause gain to themselves or others to which they were not entitled or to cause wrongful loss to other persons, they would be guilty of this offence.[15] But the manager and accountant or assistant manager, though also bankers, do not fall within the comprehension of this section, as they are not persons who are entrusted with property, or with dominion over property as bankers or agents, though they may be guilty of abetment under this section read with section 109, by conspiring with the directors to commit breach of trust if they assist the Directors to obtain the sanction of the share-holders to the illegal payment of dividends, and do so for the dihonest purpose of causing wrongful gain or wrongful loss.

It was so held by Edge, C. J., in the case of Moss and several others, who were prosecuted under this section on the failure of the Himalaya Bank. That bank had been incorporated under the Indian Companies Act, and as such, it was bound to issue a biennial balance-

(13) 2 Gour's Law of Transfer (5th Ed.) p. 1066 § 1524.
(14) Rangaswami Ayyangar, (1888) 1 Weir 466.
(15) Moss, 16 A. 88.

sheet stating its general position in the form prescribed by the Act.[16] Amongst the particulars required to be stated in the balance-sheet were the nature of the debts due to the bank—whether good debts for which the Company holds security, and debts if any, considered doubtful and bad. The bank had as a matter of fact, thirteen lacs of bad and doubtful debts. The accused Munton and Wilson were the Directors of the bank, Moss was its Manager and Charles Greenway, Accountant and Officiating Manager. They were charged under this section, and the charge against them was that they had issued false balance-sheets suppressing mention of the bad debts and even declared a 10 per cent. dividend out of the profits, which was a myth. Their object was stated to be to defraud the share-holders and depositors into a belief that the bank was stable when it was in fact insolvent. Adverting to the liability of the four accused, the learned judge told the jury that while the Directors certainly fell within the designation of bankers, the Manager and Accountant did not, and that though they could not be charged under this section they might still be guilty of abetment. In the result the Directors were convicted of this offence and the Manager and Accountant of abetment.[17]

This view is consonant with that taken by Lord Campbell, C. J., in a case arising on failure of the British bank.[18] The accused, one Daulat Rai, was the Managing Director of the Hindustan Bank which was in distress. A debtor of the Bank executed in its favour certain Hundis for Rs. 30,000 payable after six months. The Bank being in need of ready money, the accused asked the Co-operative Bank to discount the Hundis which the Bank declined to do unless the accused cleared his own account with it. In order to secure ready money, the accused caused his son to apply to the Hindustan Bank for the loan of a sum equivalent to the accused's indebtedness to the Co-operative Bank. The accused sanctioned this loan on the security of his own moneys in the Bank and thus cleared his deft to the Co-operative Bank. He was acquitted of this offence on the ground that there had been no misappropriation.[19]

(3) Merchant.

4492. The liability of a "merchant" is stated to be the same as that of a banker. A merchant is one who deals in the purchase and sale of goods, or who traffics with foreign countries. Merchant is a generic term and includes a banker who is a merchant dealing in money or in exchange. But the term is used here to designate a dealer in goods, as distinct from a banker who deals in money and stock. The use of the term may raise the question whether it is wide enough to include even petty shopkeepers, and large manufacturers of goods. That the latter are included in the term is undoubted. But petty shopkeepers can scarcely be called merchants, which is a term ordinarily understood to denote a person who traffics on a large scale. The section would apply to manu-

(16) Moss, 16 A. 88.

(17) Moss, 16 A. 88. The Bank was registered under Act X of 1866; now see Act VI of 1882. To the same effect, Daulat Rai, (1915) P. R. No. 28, 29 I. C. 105.

(18) Esdaile, 1 F. & F. 213; Burch 4 F. & F. 407; Burnes v. Pennell, 2 H. L. C. 497.

(19) Daulat Rai, (1915) P. L. R. 164. 29 I. C. 75, 16 Cr. L. J. 443.

facturers sending out goods on commission sale, dealers in raw materials supplying manufacturers and the like. There is scarcely any trust between an ordinary shopkeeper and his customer.

(4) Factor.

4493. Factors and brokers are intermediaries through whom merchants transact their business. A factor[20] is literally a person who does anything for another, and so in law the term means one who transacts business for another. The term is, however, used here to denote a mercantile agent who buys and sells goods and transacts business for others on commission. A factor may be a home factor or a foreign factor. He differs from a broker in that he buys and sells in his own name, and he is entrusted with the possession and control of goods, which a broker is not.[21] A factor may be a mere consignee of goods, in which case he is as much a merchant as a factor, and of course, also an agent for the purpose of his delegated duties. Sometimes he is so constituted under a power of attorney. But whether he is so empowered or not, he retains the right as factor to sell goods consigned to him in his own name.[22] A factor is, in short, a commission agent, and as Pollock, C. B., said: "As soon as it appears to be a branch of a party's business to sell the goods of others on commission, that establishes him to be a factor."[23] Being placed in possession of goods by a distant principal, he is placed in a position of special trust and responsibilities in respect of the goods entrusted to him. He is bound to exercise uberrimoe fides in dealing with his principal. And this section consequently provides a specially deterrent sentence in case of his breach of trust.

(5) Broker.

4494. In this respect there is little to choose between a factor and a broker, except that a broker being not in possession of his principal's goods does not occupy the same position of trust as a factor. But nevertheless he is an agent employed to settle contracts and bargains between two dealers in matters of trade and business, commerce and navigation, and it is his duty to faithfully communicate the terms and intentions of both parties and bring them both in contact for the purpose of transacting business. A broker may be employed by one party or both for a business transaction. In certain localities he is entrusted with large sums to make payments, as in the case of purchase of stocks and shares and bills of exchange. Even in the case of dealings with other commodities, a practice has grown up in this country of making payments through a broker, who has thus become an indispensable middleman, who is an impartial agent of both parties to a bargain, and who is equally paid by both a small commission on the business concluded through him.

(6) Attorney.

4495. An attorney[24] is also an agent but appointed for a special purpose. He is a person appointed by another to do something in his absence, and as such, he pos-

(20) Lat. facere, to do—factor, a doer.

(21) This distinction was pointed out by Chitty, J., in Stevens v. Bileer, 25 Ch. D. 31 (34); following ex parte Dixon 4 Ch. D. 133 (137).

(22) Per Pollock, C. B., in Whitfield v. Brand, 16 M. & W. 282; Semenza v. Brinsley, 18 C. B. N. S. 467.

(23) Ib.

(24) From Lat. attornare, to attorn, to commit business to another—lit., a substitute, a proxy.

sesses all the powers which are necessary for transacting that business, and such powers are usually reduced to writing in a document called the "power-of-attorney." An attorney may be public or private. A private attorney is a person appointed by another to transact any business for him out of Court. Pleader's clerks are, for example, called attorneys. Public attorneys, or as they are more popularly called attorneys-at-law are practitioners in a Court of law, legally qualified to act on the retainer of clients for the purpose of prosecuting and defending suits and cases. As such, they are a class of lawyers, but that is naturally a more general term and includes also counsellors who are a class distinct from attorneys, whose duties are confined to carry on the practical and formal parts of the suit. In England, since 1873, attorneys are by Statute called solicitors. Such attorneys correspond to the procurators of civil law,[25] and the proctors of the ecclesiastical and admiralty Courts. They are called law agents in Scotland.[1]

4496. An agent is a person employed to do any act for another, or to represent another in dealings with third persons.[2] The term "agent" is thus a term of wide import and includes all agents whether factors, brokers or attorneys, who are all agents appointed for special purposes. An agent is for the purpose of the business within the scope of his authority an alter ego of his principal, and they mutually stand to each other in the position of active confidence. The term "agent" as used here is wide enough to include not only agents expressly constituted, but also those who become or are employed in the capacity of agent. If, for example, a person requests another to carry a sum of money for payment to another he is for that purpose his agent, so that, should he misappropriate the amount he would be liable under this section. Public servants are in a sense agents of Government, but it is not in that sense that the term has been used here. It is rather used as implying a representative in business. Where the functions and duties of an agent are not defined, it would not perhaps be easy to prove if an act was in the way of his business. And even if it was, there still remains the question—was he an agent, or only a clerk or servant within the meaning of the last section. Now a servant may be an agent, and ordinarily an agent must be a servant. The question may arise whether in such a case the act in question was done by him as a servant or as an agent.

(7) Agent.

4497. The decided cases do not appear to have referred to this distinction. Take, for instance, the following case already noticed (§§ 4473-4475). The accused was the agent of the prosecutor who was a zemindar, and had as such to pay periodically a certain Government revenue into the Treasury. The accused ordinarily resided at Khulna, and was in charge of the prosecutor's court cases. He was also in the habit of paying into the Treasury the land revenue due from his master. He misappropriated a part of the money sent to him for this purpose. He was convicted under this section.[3] But the High Court referred to it as a conviction under section 408,[4] which is, so far as the report goes, unintelligible. The case was clearly one for conviction under this section, and if so, the conviction could not have been sustained under section 408. In this case the agent was presumably authorized to act under a general power of attorney. When it is so, all acts performed in pursuance of such authorization will be deemed to have been done in his capacity as an agent. But other acts are not thereby excluded. For a person may act as an agent without a written power-of-attorney, and in that case the question is merely one of evidence and legal inference. A trustee or manager of a temple is presumably to be so regarded.

(25) In Scotland they were so called by the Procurators (Scotland) Act, 1865, repealed by the Law Agents Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict, c. 63, s. 25).

(1) Law Agents Act (36 & 37 Vict., c. 63).

(2) Indian Contract Act (IX of 1872). s. 182.

The accused was the manager of a temple appointed by the temple committee under the Religious Endowment Act, 1863.[5] With the assistance of confederates he broke into the temple one night and stole therefrom a large number of jewels. He was convicted of housebreaking and theft by a servant, but on appeal it was contended for him that he could not be convicted of either offence inasmuch as he was himself in possession of the temple jewels, and he was convicted of stealing. This contention prevailed and the Court held that "the right view appears to be that the deity is regarded as the owner of the temple property, and the trustee or the manager appointed by the committee is the agent of the deity subject to the committee's control. The prisoner was, therefore, in possession of the temple and its jewels, and if he has made away with the property, his offence is criminal breach of trust by an agent punishable under section 409 of the Indian Penal Code."[6]

Of the Receiving of Stolen Property

Stolen property.

410. Property, the possession whereof has been transferred by theft, or by extortion, or by robbery, and property which has been criminally misappropriated or in respect of which criminal breach of trust has been committed, is designated as "stolen property," whether the transfer has been made, or the misappropriation or breach of trust has been committed, within or without British India. But, if such property subsequently comes into the possession of a person legally entitled to the possession thereof, it then ceases to be stolen property.

[British India—s. 15. Possession—cf. s. 27. Theft—s. 378. Extortion—s. 383. Robbery—s. 390. Criminal misappropriation—s. 403. Criminal breach of trust—s. 405.]

(3) Lolit Mohan Sarkar, 22 C. 313 (318).
(4) Ib., pp. 318, 319.
(5) Act XX of 1863.
(6) Per Collins, C. J., and Parker, J., in Mathusami Pillai, (1895) 1 Weir 432 (433, 434).

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4498-4501).
(2) Meaning of Words (4502).
(3) What is Stolen property (4503-4504).
(4) Possession transferred (4505).
(5) Changed property (4506-4507).
(6) Stolen property reverting to lawful possessor (4508-4511).
(7) Not Stolen property (4512).

4498. Analogous Law.—The words "whether the transfer has been made or the misappropriation or breach of trust has been committed within or without British India" were inserted by the Amending Act of 1882,[7] in consequence of the defect in the Indian law pointed out by Sargent, C. J., and Melvill, J., in the case of Moorga Chetty,[8] who was a clerk in the employment of a mercantile firm at Port Louis in Mauritius, and who cashed certain bills in Bombay which were shown to have been extracted at Port Louis, whereupon it was held that the bills of exchange having been stolen at Mauritius, in which island the Indian Penal Code was not in force, they could not be regarded as "stolen property" within the provisions of this section, so as to render the recipient at Bombay liable under the next section, and that the High Court of Bombay had, therefore, no jurisdiction; and the conviction was consequently quashed. This amendment has necessarily the effect of overruling that case, and those in which a similar view was taken.[9]

The amendment makes the criminal acts of persons like Moorga Chetty clearly criminal, and it is now no longer possible for the accused to say that he is not amenable to the British Courts for such acts done in foreign territory since whoever, whether a British subject or a foreigner, is in possession of stolen property, may be tried for it, in British India.[10] Two other minor amendments have been made in this section. Originally the words enacted were "or in respect of which the offence of criminal breach of trust, etc." But this necessitated proof of the substantive offence of criminal breach of trust in each case, and consequently, the words "offence of" were omitted by the same Act of 1882,[11] but there still remained the "the" as a disturbing element, till it was also removed by the Amending Act of 1891.[12]

4499. In England the receiving of stolen property was originally a bare misdemeanour and as a misdemeanour was triable where any one of several acts constituting it had been done,[13] a receiver could be dealt with wherever the accused had had the goods, and was in custody.[14] But by the Statute of 1691[15] receivers were declared

(7) Indian Penal Code Amendment Act (VIII of 1882), s. 9.
(8) (1881), 5 B. 338, F. B.
(9) Moorga Chetty, 5 B. 338, F. B., Hakim, (1881) P. R. No. 5; Au, (1883) P. R. No. 4; Saminada, (1888) P. R. No. 22.
(10) Jaffar Ali, (1894) P. R. No. 30
(11) Act VIII of 1882, s. 9.
(12) Repealing and Amending Act (XII of 1891).
(13) Per Abbot, C. J., in Burdett, 1 St. Tr. (N. S.) 146.
(14) Com. Dig. Action (N. G.)
(15) 3 & 4 Will. & M. C. C., s. 4.

to be accessories after the fact, and misdemeanour was then held to be merged in the felony.[16] But as an accessory could not be tried except with or after the felony, the law as to receivers still remained defective, and accordingly a Statute was passed in 1708,[17] that as for a misdemeanour, the receiver might be prosecuted apart from the thief, but only when the thief was not amenable to justice.[18] This created fresh difficulties which were, however, removed by the Act of 1772.[19] The present law of receivers is governed by the Larceny Act 1861,[20] which makes receiving stolen property an independent felony, the receiver being triable independently of the thief. The provisions of this Statute run thus:—

"S. 95. Whosoever shall receive any chattel, money, valuable security, or other property whatsoever, the stealing, taking, obtaining, converting or disposing whereof is made a misdemeanour by this Act, knowing the same to have been unlawfully stolen, taken, obtained, converted or disposed of shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and may be indicted and convicted thereof, whether the person guilty of the principal misdemeanour shall or shall not have been previously convicted thereof, or shall or shall not be amenable to justice; and every such receiver, being convicted thereof, shall be liable at the discretion of the Court to be kept in penal servitude for any term exceeding seven years..... or to be imprisoned, if a male under the age of sixteen years, with or without whipping."

4500. It will be noticed that as this section is worded, it includes as stolen property a chattel obtained even by cheating, and in this respect the definition of the term as enacted in this section is narrower, as it excludes from that category things obtained by cheating.

4501. This section does not define an offence but only a term used in defining it. The term "stolen property" as here defined does, however, presuppose the commission of the offence of theft and its other derivative offences, but it does not presuppose the existence of an offender—for there may be a receiver of stolen property without there being a thief—as in the case of theft committed through an innocent person. The words "the offence of" before "criminal breach of trust" were omitted to provide against such contingency (§ 4498).

4502. Meaning of Words.—"Property": This word has been certainly used to denote only "moveable property." "Possession whereof has been transferred": This does not mean that the receiver should receive directly from the thief. All it implies is that the receiver should receive property which has been obtained by theft. In this case an innocent intermediate transferee does not purge the property of its taint as stolen property which it continues to be in the hands of all subsequent transferees, except the person legally entitled to its possession. "Whether the transfer has been made, etc.," i.e., whether the substantive offence of theft or the subsidiary offence of receiving was committed within or without British India. "If such property subsequently comes into possession": This should be satisfied if the property comes into his possession, whether actual or constructive, though it may be afterwards delivered to the receiver to detect his crime.

(16) 12 East. P. C. 744.
(17) 7 Anne, c. 21.
(18) Foster, Cr. L. J. 374.
(19) 22 Geo. III, c. 55; Bulwer's case, 7 Rep., 4; Thomas & Fraser's Ed., pp. 52, 53.
(20) 24 & 25 Vict., c. 96, s. 91; which re-enacts 7 & 8 Geo IV, c. 29, s. 54.

4503. What is Stolen Property?—The definition of stolen property here adopted follows the definition of the substantive offence of theft, which it is intended to unravel and prevent. As that offence is defined to be the dishonest taking of property out of the possession of any person, so this offence is the receipt of property, the possession of which has been transferred by theft and the other allied offences. The word "possession" is used here in its largest sense as implying custody or control, whether temporary or permanent, or exclusive of or jointly with the thief, nor is manual possession necessary. The prosecutor went to a public house with a prostitute named Duncan. He felt a tug at his watch and it was gone. He charged the prisoner with its theft. He left the place and went into the prostitute's room, where the prisoner asked him what he should give if the watch were found. He promised a reward, and thereupon the prisoner promised to restore the watch to Duncan and took her to his house where his accomplice Holland placed the watch on the table. Holland claimed the promised reward from the prosecutor which he paid, after which Holland absconded, but the prisoner was tried as a receiver, and the jury were told that if the prisoner knew of the watch as having been stolen by Holland and if he knew of its being in his possession under the prisoner's absolute control, so that the watch would be forthcoming if the prisoner ordered it, there was ample evidence to convict him of receiving stolen property. The jury found the prisoner guilty, holding that though the watch was in Holland's hand it was in the prisoner's absolute control, and on a case reserved the Judges upheld this conviction. It was held that manual possession was unnecessary to constitute receipt of stolen goods, and the possession of the receiver may be jointly with the thief. The jury might have found that either Holland or the prisoner was the thief, and that in the former case the latter only acted as the former's agent in restoring the watch to the prosecutor, but there was evidence and it justified the finding of the jury in deciding as they did.(21)

4504. Where several persons live in the same house, it may be a question whether the possession of one is the possession of all, and vice versa. Stolen property consisting of a considerable quantity of cloth weighing about five maunds, was discovered on search by the police in a locked room in a house belonging to, and inhabited by, a joint Hindu family, composed of a father, a son and a grandson. The son was found to be the managing member of the family, and the key of the room in which the stolen property was found was produced by him. The circumstances were such that it was very improbable that the cloth could possibly have been placed where it was found, without the connivance of some or all of the members of the family. It was conceded that if the only fact proved against the petitioner was that he was the managing member of the family, it would not have supported the conviction. But there were other facts: the size of the missing bale weighing five maunds which could not have been got into the house surreptitiously, the fact that the room of the house in which it was found was locked, and that the key was produced by the petitioner, which taken in conjunction with the other facts justified his conviction under section 411 (§ 4531).[22]

(21) Smith, Dears, C. C. 494; to the same effect, Rogers, 37 L. J. M. C. 83.

4505. Possession Transferred.—Property, the possession of which has been transferred by theft and the other offences, is designated stolen property. It is, therefore, a term which equally applies to property in the hands of the thief as of a receiver other than the thief. As regards property acquired by theft, extortion and robbery, the property is called stolen property the moment there is asportation. The property of a thief who runs away with stolen property is properly so-called, though there has not been "transfer" in the real sense of the term, and though his possession is insecure. But insecurity of possession is an incident of all stolen property, and its transfer does not demand complete transmutation of possession which is not even the incident of a legal transfer. Indeed, the gist of the term lies in the intention as will be seen presently (§ 4550).

This section merely specifies the attributes of stolen property, which, however, by themselves do not constitute an offence. In order to do so the presence of other elements mentioned in the next section is necessary. As it is, transfer of possession is only necessary if the property be the proceeds of theft, extortion or robbery. It is not necessary where the property is acquired by criminal misappropriation or criminal breach of trust, in which case the transfer of possession may be perfectly legal, and so long as it is so, the property so possessed could not be designated "stolen." It only acquires that character as soon as the possession becomes wrongful by reason of the act or intention which constitutes either of those offences. The question where the principal offence was committed is now immaterial for the present purpose (§ 4515). The result of this clause is that if a thief commit an offence, say in Nepal[23] or Rajkote, he might be tried for the act in British India as the receiver of stolen property, though he could not be tried here for theft without extradition.[24] In such case, it is no defence for the accused that he is a foreign subject and that the property was stolen by himself, and that he was not therefore, liable to be tried, convicted or punished by the British Court for theft;[25] in short, that he could not be convicted for an act indirectly for which he could not have been legally tried directly. The reply is that the offence of stolen property is a continuing one, and it is, therefore, justifiable anywhere the offender may be found.[1]

4506. Changed Property.—Since the only property the possession of which has been transferred by theft, etc., is designated stolen property, it follows that if the property is changed, converted or altered, so as to destroy its original identity it ceases to be stolen property. So where A and B were charged, the one for stealing and the other for receiving six notes of £ 100 each, and the only evidence against the receiver was that A had stolen the notes and changed them into other notes of 20*l* each, of which he gave a number to B, who knew that they

(22) Budhlal, 29 A. 598.
(23) Sunker Gope, 6 C. 307, Adivigadu, 1 M. 171; Lakhy Govind, 1 B. 50
(24) Abdul Latib, 10 B. 186.
(25) Jafar Ali, (1894) P. R. 30.
(1) S. 180, E, Cr. P. C.

were the proceeds of A's theft, it was held that he must be acquitted of receiving, as he had not been charged with receiving the proceeds, but with receiving "the said promissory notes," which the notes in B's possession were not.(2) But in this case the decision turned upon the defective indictment. But suppose the indictment had referred to the proceeds of the theft, could B have pleaded exoneration on the ground that the property in his hands was not stolen property? He could clearly do so, as indeed, was held in the case of a person who had received the money obtained by cashing forged cheques, in which case the Court held that since this section defines only property acquired by theft, etc., to be stolen property, it does not comprise other property into which the stolen property may be converted.(3)

But something must also depend upon the nature of the change. For if, suppose, a thief steal a sheep and deliver its mutton to an accomplice, the latter could not plead in defence against his indictment for receiving, that he had received only the mutton, though the thing stolen was a sheep.(4) So if the thief steal ornaments of gold and silver which he should melt down after the stealing, disposing of the bullion to a confederate, the latter could not be heard to say that what he had received was not stolen property. But in such cases, the substance of the property remained the same and only its form had undergone a change. But if, suppose, in the last case, the thief had purchased a horse with the notes or ornaments he had stolen, and then made it over to a receiver, the horse could not be held to be stolen property, nor could the receiver be convicted for receiving it, even though he may be shown to have possessed the knowledge that the horse had been purchased from the proceeds of theft.

4507. This section, it will be noted, confines the definition of stolen property only to the property which was the actual subject-matter of theft. It excludes all property which the stolen property has been converted into or exchanged for.(5) It was, accordingly, there held that an ingot obtained by melting down stolen jewellery cannot be regarded as stolen property.(6) But the question whether the property still remains stolen property depends upon the nature of conversion. As in the case before cited, where notes of one denomination were exchanged into those of other value, the exchange was so complete as to have completely destroyed the identity of the original property. In such a case the receiver could not be convicted under the next section, even though he may be shown to have received the property with the knowledge that it was the proceeds of theft. But the case would be different, if the corpus remaining the same, merely the appearance or form is altered, in which case it remains the same property in spite of the alteration in its appearance.

(2) Walkley, 4 C. & P. 132.

(3) Monmohun Roy, 24 W. R. 33 (35). It is there pointed out that the Code contains no provision similar to 24 & 25 Vict., c. 96, s. 38, which makes the receiving of money obtained upon or in virtue of forged instrument, a felony punishable with 14 years' imprisonment. Under the Code mere receipt of such money apart from abetment is not punishable.

(4) Cowell, 2 East. P. C. 617, 781, Chepple, 9 C. & P. 355.

(5) Subha Chand, (1881) P. R. No. 39

(6) Ib.

The case is the same as if a person were to steal another's cigarette case and rub out his crest thereon to prevent its identification.

4508. Stolen Property Reverting to Lawful Possessor.—Property once stolen retains that character so long as it remains out of the possession of the person lawfully entitled to it. Hence, as an owner may commit theft of his own property (§ 4098), so he may be also in possession of stolen property which is his own. This is obvious from the fact that the three offences of theft, extortion and robbery are intended only to protect possession and not ownership. But in the case of property misappropriated "if such property subsequently comes into the possession of a person legally entitled to the possession thereof" must mean the owner as distinct from the person in possession. This is evident from the fact that the possession of a misappropriator is not ab initio wrongful. It becomes wrongful only with the change of intention. Consequently, legal possession of property may, with the change of intention, be converted into stolen property.

4509. But in either case the section is on one point clear. Neither a subsequent consent nor ratification suffices to alter the character of stolen property. For instance, if a person steal one's property, and afterwards pay for it, upon which the owner allows him to retain it, the property which was stolen still retains its character despite the subsequent consent of the owner. This is the inevitable consequence of the policy of law which does not permit the owner to compound with the thief. The result of this is that property once "stolen" remains stolen for ever afterwards, irrespective and independently of the volition of its lawful possessor till it reverts to him. But the principle of this doctrine must not be carried too far. For, if, suppose, in the last case the owner had actually taken hold of the stolen thing and then sold or gifted it to the thief, could it then be said that it was still stolen because it was infected with the taint of the original theft? If not, what difference does it make if the thing was delivered to the thief not by manual delivery but by a mental direction.

4510. That in such a case, the possession of the thief becomes legalized, was the view of the Judges to whom a case on the following facts was referred for opinion. On a theft of his property the owner found his goods in the pockets of the thief, whereupon he hailed a policeman who seized them, but afterwards by the direction of the owner restored them to him for sale, which he then sold to the prisoner, upon his paying their price to the owner. The prisoner was indicted for receiving stolen goods, but on a case reserved, the conviction was quashed. Lord Campbell, C.J., observing: "I do not see how it could be supported unless the doctrine was laid down that if at any period of the history of a chattel, which had been stolen and has been restored to the owner, who has long had it in his possession, the same chattel should be received from the owner by a person who knew that it had been once stolen, such a receiving would be an offence within the Statute. I think, such a receiving could never be said to be an offence within the Statute, any more than it could make the receiver an accessory at common law to the felony. If an article once stolen has been restored to the master of that article, and he, having had it fully in his possession bails it for any particular purpose, how can any person, who receives the article from the bailee, be said to be guilty of receiving stolen goods within the meaning of the Act? ——(In this case) the owner had possession of the goods just as much as if he had taken them into his own hands, and had delivered them from his own possession to another person for a particular purpose. He was the bailor of the goods subsequently to the theft, and the other person was the bailee. After that, the goods are carried by the theft by the direction of the master of the goods, to the prisoner who receives them. That is not a receiving within the meaning of the Act."(7) This case then justifies the three following deductions: (i) Stolen property loses its character the moment it reverts to its lawful possessor; (ii) such possession may be actual or constructive; and (iii) for this purpose it is sufficiently in the possession of the person if it was placed under his direction.

4511. This case was followed in another in which the prosecutors were a firm of carriers who received the goods in question for conveyance to the consignee. While they were awaiting despatch, a servant of the carriers changed the label directing them to the prisoner, but the superintendent of the prosecutor detected the fraud and ordered two detectives to accompany the consignment. The parcel was delivered to the prisoner under circumstances which clearly shewed knowledge on his part that it had been stolen. The prisoner was indicted for receiving stolen goods and the carriers' servant who had changed the label, for larceny, to which he pleaded not guilty. It was held that as the consignors had resumed possession of the goods, the property ceased to be stolen property, and that its receipt by the prisoner could not, therefore, constitute receipt of stolen property. As Pollock, B., put it: "It is, of course, frequently the case that when it is found that a person has stolen property he is watched; but the owner of the property, if he wishes to catch the receiver, does not resume possession of the stolen goods; here the owners have done so, and the result is that the conviction must be quashed."(8) This view would appear to be in conformity with the language of the section which speaks of the property subsequently coming into the possession of the person legally entitled to its possession.

4512. Not Stolen Property.—Property acquired by a fraudulent transfer is not stolen property, since whatever may be the object, ownership therein is transferred by consent. The creditor of a person applied for the latter's insolvency. The debtor transferred some of his property to the accused to prevent its falling into the hands of the Receiver. The creditor complained that its recipient was either the thief or the receiver of stolen property. He was of course neither, and it was so held.(9)

Session. Pres. Mag or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Cognizable. Warrant. Not bail. Non-comp. Summary. if property valued at Rs. 50 or less.

Dishonestly receiving stolen property.

411. Whoever dishonestly receives or retains any stolen property, knowing or having reason to believe the same to be stolen property, shall be punished with imprisonment of either

(7) Dolan, Dears C. C. 436; Schmidt, 35 L. J. M. C. 94; Miller, 6 Cox 353; Villensky, (1892) 2 Q. B. 597.

(8) Villensky, (1892) 2 Q. B. 597 (599, 600); following Dolan, Dears C. C. 436; Schmidt, 35 L. J. M. C. 94.

(9) Bulchand, 8 S. L. R. 55, 25 I. C. 1003, 16 Cr. L. J. 675.

description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

[Dishonestly—s 24. Reason to believe—s. 26. Stolen property—s. 410.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4513).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4514).
(3) Venue (4515-4517).
(4) Restitution of Stolen Property (4518-4521).
(5) Proof (4522-4526).
(6) Sentence (4525).
(7) Charge (4527).
(8) Principle (4528).
(9) Meaning of Words (4529).
(10) Dishonestly Receiving Stolen Property (4530).
(11) Exclusive Possession Necessary (4531-4534).
(12) Joint Family (4535).
(13) Husband and Wife (4536-4539).
(14) What is Dishonest Receipt (4540).
(15) Knowledge of or Belief in Stolen Property (4541-4548).
(16) Nature of the property (4545).
(17) Circumstances of Sale (4546).
(18) Price Paid (4547).
(19) Retaining with Guilty Knowledge (4549-4550).
(20) Presumption from Recent Possession (4551-4560).
(21) Degrees of Presumption (4552).
(22) Nature of Presumption how Determined (4557).
(23) No Offence If Property Abandoned or Ownerless (4561).

4513. Analogous Law.—The mere possession of stolen property is not and cannot be an offence. In order to be an offence it must be received or retained dishonestly, and with the knowledge, or sufficient cause for belief that it was stolen property. Such knowledge is essential under the Larceny Act, 1861,[10] the provisions of which have been already set out under the last section (§§ 4499-4501). This is another section dealing with what the draftsmen termed "subsequent" abetment and what is known as succession after the fact.

4514. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable, and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class, and summarily if the value of the property stolen does not exceed rupees fifty.[11] A person found in possession of stolen property belonging to different owners, cannot be convicted of separate offences in respect of each owner unless there is evidence to prove that he had received it at different times.[12]

4515. Venue.—A charge under this and cognate sections may be inquired into either by the Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the goods were stolen, or by any Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction any of them were at any time dishonestly received or retained.(13) A person cannot be subjected to the double conviction for theft and receiving stolen property in respect of the same property and the same act,(14) though of course, there is nothing to prevent a person from being convicted of receiving stolen property, though the person be the thief as well, and for which the Court have no jurisdiction to try him.(15) But this naturally implies that the accused received or retained the property in British India. For, a person not proved to be a British subject, could not be tried in British India for the proceeds of a theft committed in British India, which he had removed to and was found in possession of in a native state.

(10) 24 & 25 Vict., c. 91, s. 95.
(11) S. 260 (f), Cr. P. C.
(12) Shco Charan, 45 A. 885; Munna, 83 I. C. 481, (1925) O. 298.

This was laid down in a case in which the facts were these. The three accused were shown to have taken part in a dacoity committed in a British village separated from the Gwalior territory by a river. The police pursued the robbers into that State and found them and the booty which they had carried across to their hiding place. The accused were extradited for trial into British territory. It was not shown whether they were British subjects or subjects of the state of Gwalior. The case of dacoity against them fell through for want of credible evidence, and the Judge was left on his hands with the case of receiving stolen property for which they were convicted. They appealed to the High Court, but Edge, C. J., held that they could not be tried in British India for receiving or retaining stolen property out of British India. They were accordingly acquitted.(16)

4516. In cases of receiving stolen property a person cannot be tried at any place in British India for possessing such property in British India, but he can be tried only by the Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the stolen property was found. Consequently, to make it legal to punish at A, it must be proved that the prisoner either committed the theft at A, or that he was there found in possession of stolen property. If, therefore, it is shown that B committed the theft at A and the prisoner was found in possession of the property at C he could not be tried at A, though B found at C may be so tried there.(17) As regards the joinder of charges in the case of a person found in possession of different articles of stolen property, the question depends not upon whether the things belonged to different owners but upon whether the accused had received them at different times. For in the former case, it may be that the prisoner may have received at one time all the properties which may be the subject of several thefts.(18)

Where, however, he has received the several articles with distinct notice of their being proceeds of distinct thefts, the mere fact that they were received at one time would not consolidate his crimes. As it was put in a case: suppose the thief were to say to the receiver: "Here is a coat stolen from A, take this," and the receiver took it, and also: "Here is a ring stolen from B, take this," and the receiver took it.(19) The question

(13) Sheo Charan, 45 A., 485; Munwa, 83 I. C 481, (1925) O. 298. s. 180, ill. (b).

(14) Sreemunt Adup, 2 W. R. 63; Seeb Churn Haree, 11 W. R. 12.

(15) Lakhya Govind, 1 B. 50; Sunkur Gope, 6 C. 307; Jafer Ali, (1894) P.R. No. 30.

(16) Kripal Singh, 9 A. 523; cf. Pirtai, 10 B. H. C. R. 356.

(17) Ghusoo Khan, 5 W. R, 49; Moheswari, 18 C. W. N. 1178; s. 180, ill. (b), Cr. P. C.

(18) Makhan, 15 A. 317.

(19) Semble in Ishan Muchi, 15 C. 511.

here depends upon the construction of the language used in section 235 of the Procedure Code, which depends upon whether the several acts were so connected together so as to form the same transaction. So where stolen goods apparently of two thefts were found on an accused person at one and the same search and there was no proof of two distinct acts of receiving it, it was held that there could not be two convictions under this section.(20)

4517. Amended s. 239 of the Code of Criminal Procedure now expressly permits the joint trial of a person accused of theft, extortion or criminal misappropriation and one accused of receiving or retaining or assisting in the disposal or concealment of property, possession of which is alleged to have been transferred by any such offence committed by the first named person, or of abetment of or attempting to commit any such last-named offence.(21) It also authorizes the joint trial of persons accused of offences under this and s. 414.(22) Before the present amendment the test was whether the two offences were committed "in the same transaction."(23) This clause was held to imply a community of purpose and object evidenced by the proximity of time and place.(24) This threw on the prosecution an additional burden which they were at times unable to sustain in consequence of which the entire proceedings had to be quashed.(25) The same consideration determined the legality of trial of two or more persons accused of receiving stolen property which was shown to be the proceeds of the same theft. The recent amendment of the section brings the Indian rule in line with the English rule on the subject.(1)

Restitution of Stolen Property.

4518. The subject of this offence suggests a point which, though relating to procedure, often arises in practice, and to which some allusion has been made before (§§ 4123-4124). For this purpose property is divided into cash and bills or notes payable to bearer, and other property not so negotiable. As regards the former, the property is ordinarily inseparable with possession; but as regards the latter it remains in the person from whom it is stolen.(2) But even in the case of the former, fraud on the part of the holder of it will destroy his right to the bill.(3) But otherwise the holder for the time being is the owner of such property, and the fact that the complaint establishes it to be a clear case of theft, does not give him any better title over a bona fide holder. But if the same property be anything, except cash or currency note or a negotiable instrument payable to bearer, the rule is that as between the first owner and the subsequent bona fide purchaser, the latter must suffer, the property being on the conviction of the receiver

(20) Kaur, (1907) P.W.R. Cr. 4.
(21) S. 239 (e), Cr. P. C.
(22) S. 239 (f), Cr. P. C.
(23) A. David, 6 C. L. R. 245; Man Mohan Roy, 19 C. W. N. 672; 26 I. C. 307; Keshav, 6 Bom. L. R. 361; Balabhai, 6, Bom. L. R. 516; Bhima, 38 A. 311; Nga So Shat, 4 Bur. L. T. 263, 13 I. C. 395; contra in Sunder Singh, (1905) P. R. No. 3, 2 Cr. L. J. 37; Govindarajulu, (1914) M. W. N. 352, 23 I. C. 208; Ram Pershad, 2 R. 80.
(24) Man Mohan Roy, 19 C. W. N. 672, 26 I. C. 307.
(25) Subramani, 25 M. 61 P. C; Bhagat Singh, 5 P. L. R. 372.
(1) Reardon, L. R. 1 C. C. 31.
(2) Anon, 1 N. W. P. H. C. R. 298.
(3) Collector of Salem, 1 M.H.C.R. 233.

returned to the complainant.(4) In this respect the English rule is the same and is now enacted as follows:—

"If any person guilty of any such felony or misdemeanour as is mentioned in this Act, in stealing, taking, obtaining, extorting, embezzling, converting, or disposing of, or in knowingly, receiving any chattel, money, valuable security, or other property whatsoever, shall be indicted for such offence, by or on behalf of the owner of the property, or his executor or administrator, and convicted thereof, in such case the property shall be restored to the owner or his representative and in every case in this section aforesaid the Court before whom any person shall be tried for any such felony or misdemeanour shall have power to award from time to time writs of restitution for the said property, or to order the restitution thereof in a summary manner: Provided, that if it shall appear before any award or order made that any valuable security shall have been bona fide paid or discharged by some person or body corporate liable to the payment thereof, or being a negotiable instrument shall have been bona fide taken or received by transfer or delivery, by some person or body corporate, for a just and valuable consideration, without any notice or without any reasonable cause to suspect that the same had by any felony or misdemeanour been stolen, taken, obtained, extorted, embezzled, converted, or disposed of in such case the Court shall not award or order the restitution of such security: Provided also, that nothing in this section contained shall apply to the case of any prosecution of any trustee, banker, merchant, attorney, factor, broker, or other agent, entrusted with the possession of goods or documents of title to goods, for any misdemeanour against this Act.(5).

4519. Under this rule so far as regards the thief law makes no distinction between negotiable property or otherwise, the thief being liable to restore not only the thing stolen but anything into which he may have converted it, so that where the thief stole a bill of exchange for £100 and a considerable sum of money in specie, and it appeared that with a part of the proceeds of the theft the thief had purchased a horse, the Court ordered delivery of the horse by way of restitution.(6) And this is clearly provided by the explanation to s. 517 of the Procedure Code which extends the conception of "property" to include anything into which it is converted or for which it is exchanged. But the power of the Court is confined to restitution only to this extent and no further. For instance, if the thief in the last case had been found in possession of the horse, but there had been no evidence of its purchase from the stolen money, then the Court could not have ordered restitution, though the horse may not have been worth more than the value of the stolen property.(7) But in such a case it is open to the prosecutor to maintain a separate suit, the right to which is, of course, in no way affected by the summary powers of the Court.

4520. So far then as the thief himself is concerned, his liability to restitution is unaffected by the nature of the property. But the distinction between property which is negotiable and other property becomes material where the rights of the third party intervene. In that case the rule is that a negotiable property payable to bearer and discharged by the payee cannot be recovered by the owner, though if the property

(4) Bhara Mull, (1871) P. R. No. 37: Gardi Singh, (1872) P. R. No. 7; Hussa, (1873) P. R. No. 8, in which, however, an exception is made in the case of sale in market overt, while in Kishen Kour, (1878) P. R. No. 20, the purchaser is held entitled to the property in a summary proceeding under what is now s. 517, Cr. P. C.

(5) 24 & 25 Vict., c. 96, s. 100; taken from 7 & 8, Geo. IV, c. 29, s. 57, and 9 Geo. IV, c. 55, s. 50 (1).

(6) Powel, 7 C. & P. 640.

(7) The City of London, 27 L. J. M. C. 231.

be non-negotiable the rule is different. So where a prisoner was indicted for stealing a £10 bank-note, which had been paid and cancelled by the Bank, it was held that the order to restore could not be made.(8) The same view has been taken in this country of a currency note cashed at a Government Treasury, property in which passes on delivery, which if stolen and cashed, the owner cannot recover from a bona fide transferee without notice.(9) But where the thief was convicted of stealing certain pieces of plush, the property of A, which were sold by the thief to B, who was a bona fide purchaser without notice of the thief, and in fact who had purchased it from the thief believing him to be A's agent, it was held that the property in the plush revested in A on the thief's conviction and who thereupon became entitled to restitution.(10) And this rule has been followed in this country.

4521. The powers of the Court under section 517 of the Procedure Code are as limited as those of the English Court, and they are defined by that section to be limited to "the disposal of any property or document produced before it or in its custody, or regarding which any offence appears to have been committed, or which has been used for the commission of any offence." The property which has been produced before the Court or is in its custody calls for no comment, for such property being under the physical control of the Court must be disposed of by it on the termination of the proceedings. The question, however, as to what is comprised in the rest of the clause may not be always manifest, and has much exercised the Courts in a case in which the Magistrate had ordered confiscation of the press held to have been used for the printing of a seditious newspaper, which order was intended to be upheld on the ground that the press had been used for the commission of the offence of sedition, but it was held that that provision had only reference to the offences relating to property or documents and not to such an offence as sedition, that in any case it could not be said that the press had been used for the commission of the offence of sedition, for the press was a remote instrument, and in this view the order for confiscation was quashed.(11)

Again, section 517 presupposes the commission of an offence, and no order can be legally passed under that section for delivery of the property to any person other than its previous possessor, if the evidence discloses no offence and the accused has to be discharged or acquitted.(12) In such a case the Court has no power to act under section 523 of the Procedure Code, for that section does not apply to property which is produced before it in the course of an inquiry or trial under a search-warrant issued by itself under section 96 of the Code, but applies only to property seized by the police of their own motion in the exercise of the powers conferred on them by law, as for example, sections 51, 54, 164 and 165.(13)

For further commentary, see s. 379.

(8) Stanton, 7 C. & P. 431.
(9) Collector of Salem, 7 M. H. C. R. 233.
(10) Woolez, 8 Cox 337; Macklini, 5 Cox 216; Goldsmith, 12 Cox 594.
(11) Abinash Chandra Bhattacharjee, 11 C. W. N. 1046.
(12) Devidin Durga Prasad, In re, 22 B. 844: Amra Nathu, (1890) B. U. C. 500.
(13) Ratanlal, 17 B. 748; Devidin Durgaprasad, In re, 22 B. 844.

4522. Proof.—It has been remarked before, that the same person cannot be subjected to a double conviction for theft and receiving in respect of the same act. But there is nothing against his being tried for the two offences, but his conviction must be only for one offence, the accused being then acquitted of the other,[14] unless the Court elects to convict him in the alternative. This alternative has an advantage when there is no evidence of theft against the accused, since the Indian Evidence Act provides that "The Court may presume that a man who is in possession of stolen goods soon after the theft, is either the thief, or has received the goods knowing them to be stolen, unless he can account for his possession."[15] But the accused cannot be called upon to account for his possession till the Court makes that presumption, which it would be justified to make under circumstances to be presently considered (§§ 4551-4556). It would then be no misdirection for the Judge to tell the jury that if the prisoner could not account for his possession it was their duty to convict him.[16] It is, however, clearly a misdirection to tell the jury merely to find whether the property was stolen, and whether it was retained by the accused.[17] A proper charge to the jury must direct them to find: (i) whether the property was stolen;(ii) whether it was dishonestly retained; and (iii) whether the accused knew or had reason to believe the same to be stolen property. Unless these questions are found by the jury in the affirmative, the accused could not legally be convicted of an offence under this section.[18]

4523. There can be no conviction for receiving unless there is evidence of theft; it is not necessary that the thief should have been traced or convicted, but what is necessary is that there must be proof that a theft took place and that the property charged is the proceeds of such theft.[19] This must be proved by independent evidence, though the record of conviction for theft, if any, may be filed as corroborative evidence. But it is no evidence against the accused.

4524. It is to be noted that section 414 of the Code is closely analogous to this section, and a person may be charged with and tried for this offence and also in the alternative. So where two or more persons assist in the concealment of property, they may be separately charged with and convicted of the two offences. As the Procedure Code provides:—

"S. 239. (i) Several stolen sacks of corn are made over to A and B, who know that they are stolen property, for the purpose of concealing them. A and B thereupon voluntarily assist each other to conceal the sacks at the bottom of a grain pit. A and B may be separately charged with and convicted of offences under sections 411 and 414 of the Indian Penal Code." (20).

(14) (1864) 1 W. R. (Cr. Cir.) 2.

(15) Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872). s. 114, ill. (a).

(16) Narain Bugdee, 5 W. R. 3 (Head-note inaccurate).

(17) Balya Somya, 15 B. 369; Karatuka 42 C. L. J. 212, 90 I. C. 542, (1925) C 1241.

(18) Ib.; general principle followed in Tajee Pramanik, 25 C. 711; Ghansham Das, 26 P. L. R. 165.

(19) R. v. Ballard, 12 Cr. A. R. 1; Hira, 9 A. L. J. 370, 14 I. C. 606; Sankara Narayana, 4 L. W. 53, 35 I. C. 488; Samachari, 45 M. L. J. 728; Maung Gyi 1 R. 520; Lal Singh, (1911) P. L. R. 113, 24 I. C. 833, 15 Cr. L. J. 521; Yasin Khan, 19 N. L. R. 176, 75 I. C. 544, 24 Cr. L. J. 960.

(20) S. 239, ill. (j), Cr. P. C.

4525. Sentence.—There would be fewer thieves if there were fewer receivers of stolen property. The latter made thieving profitable and its detection difficult and at times impossible. The receiver must be, therefore, held responsible in the same degree as the thief. A first offender may now be dealt with under s. 562 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.(21)

4526. The points requiring proof under this section are:—

(1) The commission of theft, extortion, robbery, criminal misappropriation or criminal breach of trust.

(2) That the possession of the property in question was transferred by theft, extortion or by robbery, or that it had been acquired by criminal misappropriation or criminal breach of trust.

(3) That the accused received or retained such property.(22)

(4) That he did so dishonestly.

(5) That he knew or had reason to believe that it was stolen property.

4527. Charge.—The charge should specify the name of the owner or the lawful possessor of the stolen property. A charge that the accused dishonestly received stolen property knowing it to be stolen, in having had in his possession clothes and brass pots worth two rupees and six annas, and in not being able to account satisfactorily for the manner in which he obtained possession of them, was held to be defective, though the Court did not interfere with the conviction,(23) but the case was not argued for the accused and it was not contended that the defect had prejudiced the accused. Of course, since dishonesty and knowledge or reasonable belief on the part of the accused that the property he received was stolen property, are two of the essential elements of this offence, they must be both set out in the charge.(24) A person charged for theft and in the alternative for receiving, cannot be convicted for receiving if the Judge charged the jury on the case for theft without adverting to the other charge for receiving.(25)

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you dishonestly received (or retained) stolen property, to wit——(specify it) belonging to A B. knowing or having reason to believe the same to be stolen property, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 411 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

(21) Overruling Kabir Shah, (1923) A. I. R. (Pat.) 297, decided under the unamended section. Security for good behaviour from an offender aged 14½ years—Tagar Nath 6 Pat. L. T. 294; (1923) Pat. 297.

(22) Ram Autar, 47 A. 51v (Exclusive possession must be proved against the member of a joint family).

(23) Balnath, 1 B. H. C. R. 95.

(24) 4 W. R. (Cr. L.) 11.

(25) R. v. Evans, 12 Cr. A. R. 8, 85 L. J. (K. B.) 1186.

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court,) on the said charge."

4528. Principle.—Thieving obtains encouragement from the facility thieves possess of disburthening themselves of their goods. But for the aid of a receiver the avocation of a thief would be fraught with manifest perils. The receiver is, therefore, an ally of the thief, and of the two probably not the less culpable, because it is he who usually profits most by the proceeds of theft without incurring the same risk of detection. Law, therefore, regards his offence as equally great and the punishment provided here for receiving is, therefore, the same as for simple theft. Three things are, however, necessary to constitute theft: (i) dishonesty; (ii) knowledge of the property being stolen; and (iii) the fact that it is stolen. In this respect he possesses all the essential elements of the substantive crime; and thus the thief and the receiver are regarded as particeps criminis, the one receiving aid and encouragement from the other.

4529. Meaning of Words.—"Receives or retains any stolen property": To begin with, the property must be stolen and it must be "received or retained." It is thus possible for property to be received innocently and retained dishonestly. "Knowing or having reason to believe": These words are stronger than the words "suspect" and involve the necessity of showing that the circumstances were such that a reasonable man must have felt convinced in his mind that the property with which he was dealing must be stolen property[1] (§§ 4541-4543).

4530. Dishonestly Receiving Stolen Property.—Three things are essential to constitute this offence: (i) the property must be stolen; (ii) it must have been received or retained "dishonestly"; and (iii) it must have been received or retained "knowing or having reason to believe" it to be stolen property. There can be obviously no offence of receiving unless the property in respect of which the offence of receiving is alleged answers the description of "stolen property" as given in the last section. That section makes it sufficiently clear that stolen property must have been acquired by theft or criminal misappropriation or other offences allied to them (§§ 4503,4504). As this fact has to be established against the accused, it is necessary to prove all the circumstances constituting the property as stolen property. The fact that it had been shown to be so in a proceeding against the thief is insufficient; and, indeed, not even relevant, for those proceedings cannot affect the offence of the accused who was no party to them. He is entitled to have the question tried in his presence, and for this purpose it is incumbent upon the prosecution to prove all the facts to support its character as stolen property.[2] If the principal offender has confessed, his evidence would be relevant against the receiver,[3] but being an accomplice, his evidence would then require corroboration,[4] though this is merely a rule of judicial caution and not of law.[5]

(1) Rango Timaji, 6 B. 402 (403).
(2) Mataya, (1888) B. U. C. 416; Baldeo Pershad, 2 N. P. W. H. C. R. 187; Burke, 6 A. 224; Ishan Chandra Chandra, 21 C. 328.
(3) Haslam, 1 Leach, 418.
(4) Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872) s. 114, ill. (b); Robinson, 4 F. & F. 43.
(5) Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 133.

The Court trying the receiver is not bound to be guided by the proceedings against the thief, nor is it, indeed, permissible for it to rely upon the judgment in that case as affording any strength to the case against the receiver. The case against him may be proved by the evidence adduced in the former case; but it must be adduced afresh giving him an opportunity of cross-examining the witnesses and of showing that the property in respect of which he was charged was not stolen property. Assuming, however, that the property is proved to be stolen, it does not necessarily follow that the accused is necessarily to be convicted as its receiver. For there yet remain two more vital questions to be considered: Did he receive or retain it dishonestly, and knowing or having reason to believe it to be stolen property. These two elements are necessarily inter-related, though they are not necessarily interdependent. They necessarily exclude other aiders and abettors, such as, for instance, a person who negotiates for the sale of goods which he knows to have been stolen, who cannot consequently be convicted of receiving or retaining stolen property unless he is also shown to have been in possession of the property in the sense of having joint or exclusive control over it.(6)

4531. Exclusive Possession Necessary.—Dishonest receipt and retention implies possession, and such possession to be criminal must be actual and exclusive, for criminal liability does not attach to constructive possession, as of the Karta of a joint Hindu family, who though presumed to be in possession of the entire family property, could not on that assumption be held criminally liable for stolen goods brought into the house by other members of the family. From this it follows that where property is found in a house in the possession of more than one inmate, none of them could be said to be in possession of it for the purpose of this offence unless there is evidence of exclusive conscious control against them(7) (§ 277). If, therefore, a person is shown to stand in such relation to stolen property as falls short of possession by him of such property, his manner of dealing with the property may warrant a charge of assisting in concealing or disposing of or making away with the property with a guilty knowledge within the meaning of section 414, but it would not justify a conviction under this section.(8) Such possession cannot be inferred from the mere fact that the accused showed the police certain hiding places in grass and water-courses where the incriminating property was concealed.(9)

This case was followed by Edge, C.J., and Banerji, J., in a case in which the accused had pointed out a spot in the field, not his own, where certain stolen property was found, and dug up the property therefrom. It was held that this evidence was wholly insufficient to sustain a conviction under this section for which there must have been the further evidence to prove that the accused had himself concealed the article in the place where it was found. "It is not sufficient for a conviction that the accused pointed out the stolen article, if it is left doubtful whether the

(6) R. v. Watson, (1916) 2 K. B. 385.
(7) Muhamad Ali Shet, (1908) 4 M.L.T 415; Sharafat, 57 I.C. 913 21 Cr. L.J. 673; Bashir Ahmad, 22 O.C. 256, 54 I. C. 245, 21 Cr. L. J. 40; Farukh Husain, 24 O. C. 294, 67 I. C. 588, 23 Cr. L. J. 428 (Khushi Ram, 20 A. L. J. 162, (1922) A. I. R. (A.) 83, 67 I. C. 388, 23 Cr. L. J. 385; Ganeshi Lal, 4 L. L. J. 484.
(8) Khoma, (1879) P. R. No. 31.
(9) Kinkar, (1881) A. W. N. 94.

accused or some other person concealed the stolen article, or that the accused obtained in some other way information that the stolen property was in the place where it was found.(10) In another case the accused was convicted for the theft of a bullock whose skin he pointed out as buried in the land which was not in his exclusive possession, but his conviction was quashed on the ground that the shed in which it was found belonged to or was in possession of several persons other than the accused and that the giving of information by the accused that it lay buried there was not conclusive of the guilt of the accused under this section as it was not inconsistent with his being the thief or the receiver.(11)

4532. But in these cases the confessions of the accused supplementing the fact of possession were rejected as either extorted or unreliable, but had they been admitted, the result might have been different. Such was the case of the accused who being charged with the murder of a boy for the sake of his ornaments confessed about the boy being with him immediately before his death, which he explained as due to a fall from his house. He admitted having thrown his corpse into a tank from which it was subsequently recovered. He also produced the ornaments which the boy wore from a hole near the tank. There was no evidence of murder and the medical evidence was to the effect that the boy might have been intentionally or accidentally strangled. It was held that though there was not sufficient legal evidence of murder, the evidence as to the finding of the ornaments justified his conviction under this section.(12) Even where the property is found in a house of which the accused is an adult male member it does not necessarily follow that he was in possession of it, nor indeed that all the inmates were conjointly in such possession. Even in such a case the necessity of tracing exclusive possession to an individual member remains.(13) Such possession may be proved by evidence of exclusive control, as where a separate room is allotted to an individual member of the family, for which he possessed the key and from which the stolen property was recovered,(14) or other facts leading to the same conclusion. The true test of receipt, on a trial for receiving stolen property, is control.(15)

4533. The word "possession" in this connexion obviously means conscious possession, for any other possession could not be taken into account in charging a person with criminal liability. As has been, indeed, expressly provided for in the section, such possession must be both dishonest as well as with knowledge or belief in the stolen character of the property. So, while it is provided in the Indian Evidence Act that the Court may presume that a man who is in possession

(10) Gobinda, 17 A. 576; followed in Paimullah, 16 C. W. N. 238, 12 I. C. 783; Hakiman, (1905) P.R. No. 20; Pir Baksh; (1912) P. L. R. 46, 13 I. C. 220; Mehru, (1913) P. W. R. 32, 21 I. C. 474; Buta (1917) P. R. No. 1, 39 I. C. 330; Umar, 3 S. L. R. 136, 4 I. C. 481.

(11) Hakiman, (1905) P. L. R. 196; Hamada, 1 P. W. R. Cr. 1; Rullia Ram, 5 L. L. J. 325, (1923) A. I. R. (L.) 438, Indar Singh, 5 L. L. J. 87, 73 I. C. 331, 24 Cr. L. J. 587.

(12) Nirmal Das, 22 A. 445; Malhari, 6 B. 731.

(13) Rajani Kanto Kar, 8 C. W. N. 22.

(14) Budh Lall, 29 A. 598.

(15) R. v. Gleed, 12 Cr. A. R. 32; Sew-Dhar, 40 C. 990.

of stolen goods soon after the theft is either the thief, or has received the goods knowing them to be stolen, unless he can account for his possession; [16] it is also provided that in so presuming the Court shall have regard to such a fact as the following: "A shopkeeper has in his till a marked rupee soon after it was stolen, and cannot account for its possession specifically, but is continuously receiving rupees in the course of his business.[17]

4534. The question whether the facts and circumstances of a case warranted a finding as to a possession being exclusive is one of fact. The prisoner was indicted for being the receiver of a stolen hat and a watch, the theft of which the principal offender, A, had confessed to. It was proved that in consequence of information received a policeman went to the lodgings of the prisoner and asked him if A had brought a hat there, to which the prisoner replied in the affirmative and then fetched the hat out of a box in the corner of his bedroom. He was then questioned about the missing watch which he said had been pawned at a certain shop, which was, however, not the case. The prisoner then sent for a boy and asked him for the watch and he brought it and made it over to the policeman. The prisoner lived in a common lodging-house, and it was contended for him that as he had no exclusive possession of the room in which he lived there was no evidence of exclusive possession of the hat; and as for the watch all that had been proved against him was that he knew where it was, which was insufficient; but on a case reserved it was held that there was sufficient evidence to go to a jury.[18]

Where, however, the stolen property was found in the camp of a party of refugees, it was held that it was not proved in whose possession it was to justify the conviction of anyone of them for theft.[19] The accused was convicted under this section the fact proved being that the stolen oxen were taken to his well and put up there for the night, and that he subsequently promised to have them restored to the complainant, but did not do so. It was held that it was sufficient to support the conviction as there was nothing to show that the oxen were taken to his well with his knowledge.[20] In another case certain stolen goods were consigned from one railway station to another. The accused delivered the railway receipt to the railway office and paid for the freight, but before he could obtain manual delivery he was arrested. It was held that the production of the railway receipt established the possession of the accused, and as the other ingredients were proved, his conviction under this section was right.[21]

4535. Joint Family.—Though members of a Hindu joint family are deemed to be in possession of everything belonging to them, such possession is not sufficiently conscious and exclusive to render all members criminally liable under this section. Consequently, the mere fact that possession of a stolen article is traced to such a house is not of

(16) Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 114, ill. (a).
(17) Ib.
(18) Hobson, Dears C. C. 400.
(19) Nagshwe E. Eik, 1 Bur. L. R. 379
(20) Ahmada, (1905) P. L. R. 145
(21) Sewdhar, 40 C. 990.

itself sufficient to warrant any presumption of criminality against any of its inmates,[22] unless there is evidence to show that they knew of its character and exercised sufficient control to constitute possession (§§ 277, 278). Such was held to be the case of the accused who was the head of the family, of which the only other male member was his son and a stolen cloth was found in his house worn by his daughter and a chadar was found concealed in the thatch of the house where he lived, upon which the Court held him prima facie responsible as being in possession of them.[23]

4536. Husband and Wife.—Criminal law does not esteem the husband and wife as one person, and it holds each individually liable for his or her acts shown to be criminal. But the wife living in coverture with her husband is deemed to live in the house of which the husband is in possession, but it does not extend the presumption to the extent of making him criminally liable for the stolen goods that may be found therein.[24] There is, however, a presumption that the house occupied by a married couple is in the possession of the husband rather than the wife, but it is presumption too weak to support his criminal liability for any stolen article found therein, nor would in such a case the wife be criminally liable under this section for her connivance and assistance given to her husband in concealing the goods, though in such a case she may bring herself within the terms of section 414. Such was the case of the accused whose husband used to steal oil of the railway Company in whose service he was, and of which information being laid, the accused removed a quantity of the stolen oil and buried it in the ground. She was convicted both under this section as well as section 414, but the Court held that the ground urged in support of her conviction under this section, that the property was found in the house in which she lived was wholly inadequate, for it constituted the possession of the husband rather than of the wife. It was true that the wife assisted in concealing the stolen property when a search was being made for it, but that might have been done from a desire to screen her husband. The Court therefore quashed her conviction under this section maintaining only that under section 414.[25]

4537. In a case against husband and wife the question must then be decided in accordance with the general law which determines individual possession. There is, however, this much to be inferred from the relationship that the wife is the agent of, and must be deemed to have subordinated her will to that of the husband. A wife, in her husband's absence, and without his knowledge, received stolen goods, and paid money on account of them. The thief and the husband afterwards met, and the husband learning of the sale to his wife, agreed on the price to be paid for them, paying the balance to the thief. He was convicted for receiving, and on a case reserved his conviction was affirmed, the Court observing that the contract for the sale of goods was not complete until the husband and the thief met; the husband

(22) Muhammad Ali Shet, 19 M. L. J. 301, 4 I. C. 163.

(23) Musai Kamat, 1 Pat L. T. 431, 58 I. C. 341, 21 Cr. L. J. 757.

(24) Khu Shi Ram, 20 A. L. J. 162, 67 I. C. 338, 23 Cr. L. J. 386.

(25) De Silva, 5 N. W. P. H. C. R. 120.

then acquired a guilty knowledge, and ratified the receipt, which amounted to a receipt at that time with guilty knowledge. As Blackburn, J., put it: "If a thief were to leave stolen goods with a pawnbroker's apprentice in the absence of the master, and the pawnbroker on his return, being told of the circumstances, and knowing that the goods were stolen, were to say, 'It is all right; put them away,' no one could doubt that he would be rightly convicted of receiving stolen property."(1) The case would be different if the transaction being completed, the husband came to hear of it and he then acquiesced without taking any active part in it.(2)

4538. In England, a feme covert is presumed to be so much under the power and authority of her husband that she is exempt from punishment for a theft or burglary committed in the company of her husband which the law presumes a coercion.(3) But no such presumption is made in the case of receiving stolen property.(4) So where the husband and wife were jointly charged for receiving stolen sugar and the evidence against the wife was that she and her daughter had washed it away, and that she thought it a hard case that she and her husband should be at a loss of four or five pounds, Coltman, J., told the jury that "if the husband received the property, knowing it to be stolen, and if the wife received it from him with the like knowledge and with the purpose of aiding and assisting him in the object which he had in view in receiving it, by turning it to pecuniary profit or in other like manner, although prima facie she might be supposed to be acting under the coercion of her husband, that was rebutted by the active part which she took in the matter with the intention above mentioned. But if the part she took was merely for the purpose of concealing her husband's guilt, and screening him from the consequences, then she ought to be acquitted. A wife cannot be convicted of harbouring her husband when he has committed a felony, and the mere circumstance of her attempting to conceal what may lead to her detection appears to come within the same rule." The jury acquitted the wife.(5)

4539. There is, however, one point upon which the Engisih Law on this subject differs from this section. Under English Law the wife can not steal her husband's goods, even though she may have committed adultery, (s. 378) the consequence of which is that the adulterer cannot be convicted of receiving goods which she had removed from her husband though he may be indicated for common law misdemeanour.(6)

What is Dishonest Receipt ?

4540. The use of the word "dishonest" in this connection is important, as it implies that the receiver had received the property not in the ordinary course of business or out of his own necessity but with the intention of causing wrongful gain or loss within the meaning of those terms as

(1) Woodward, 31 L. J. M. C. 91.
(2) Dring, 7 Cox 283.
(3) 1 Hale, P. C. 44, 516; 1 Hawk, P. C. C. 1. s. 14.
(4) The contrary is implied by the marginal note in Archer, R. & M. C. C. 143: but which is inaccurate, for all that was there laid down is that the wife can not be convicted conjointly with her husband when there is nothing to show that she was present at the time of receipt or that she countenanced their reception—thus placing the wife on the same level with a stranger.
(5) M'Clarens, 3 Cox 425.
(6) Kenny, 2 Q. B. D. 307; Streeter [1900] 2 Q. B. 601.

defined in the Code.[7] It is not of the essence of dishonesty that the receiver should obtain the property for the purpose of wrongful gain to himself. It is equally within the term if he receives it for the purpose of assisting the thief or for the purpose of concealing it, although by so doing he gains no profit or advantage for himself.[8] The fact that he receives it with that intention is sufficient to constitute receipt, though he may not succeed in his attempt and may be detected immediately.

Dishonesty is a phase of the mind and must be inferred from circumstances. But the circumstances must be sufficient to justify an inference that the receiving or retention of the property was dishonest. It is a question of fact and not of law,[9] being an inference deducible from the facts and probabilities of each case. There can, however, be no dishonesty when there is no knowledge of the stolen character of the property; for dishonesty implies a wrong and an intention to do a wrong, and therefore there can be no such intention without the knowledge or belief that the property is stolen property. Of course, there may be such knowledge or belief and no dishonesty; as where a person seizes property in order to make it over to its lawful owner, or where one seizes it and retains it under a bona fide claim of right (§ 4090). Again, there may be "dishonesty" without the knowledge or belief essential to constitute this offence. Such may be the case where the thief is himself defrauded, as where one steals a diamond ring which the receiver dishonestly pronounces to be paste. He may know not of the theft, but may intend to cheat the thief, in which case there would be dishonesty though without knowledge of the property being stolen.

4541. Knowledge of or Belief in Stolen property.—The dishonesty of receipt must then be connected with the knowledge of or belief in the stolen property.[10] Such knowledge or belief must refer to the property received as being the property stolen. In other words, the receiver must receive the identical property stolen (§ 423), of which he must possess that knowledge. To begin with then, there must be stolen property as defined in section 410. If the property was not stolen the accused could not be convicted of this offence, although at the time of receiving it he erroneously believed it to be stolen property.[11]

4542. If, however, the property is shown to have been stolen property, there arises then the question whether, when receiving or retaining it, he knew or had reason to believe it to be stolen property. The words "knowledge" and "belief" are here used ejusdem generis, as both implying the existence and presence of facts or circumstances from which the accused was either made aware, or ought to have been made aware, of the nature of the property. So Bramwell, B., in one case told the jury that "the knowledge charged in the indictment need not be such knowledge as would be acquired if the prisoner had actually seen the lead stolen; it is sufficient if you think the circumstances accompanying the transaction were such as to make the prisoner believe that it had been stolen."[12]

(7) Ss. 23, 24.
(8) Richardson, 6 C. & P. 935; Davis, 6 C. & P. 177.
(9) Guzzala Hanuman, 26 M. 467.
(10) Arjan Das, 76 I. C. 963, (1923) A. I. R. (L.) 340.
(11) Issup, (1888) B. U. C. 3289.
(12) White, 1 F. & F. 665.

The word "knowledge" in this connection means merely mental cognition and not visual perception. It merely implies that the receiver had such facts brought to his notice as could not but have led him to believe that the property was stolen and could not have been honestly obtained. Consequently, both knowledge and belief imply the presence of certain facts from which the accused might have drawn the inevitable conclusion. And this must be proved by the prosecution. As Melvill J., put it referring to the case before him. "It lay upon the prosecution to prove that the accused person knew or had reason to believe that the bullock was stolen property. It was not sufficient to show that the accused was careless, or that he had reason to suspect that the property was stolen, or that he did not make sufficient enquiry to ascertain whether it had been honestly acquired. The word 'believe' in section 414, Indian Penal Code, is a very much stronger word than 'suspect,' and it involves the necessity of showing that the circumstances were such that a reasonable man must have felt convinced in his mind that the property with which he was dealing must be stolen property."(13)

4543. The facts of the case in which these observations occur were these: A bullock stolen from its owner was sold by a person to another for Rs. 16 on the guarantee of the accused that it was the property of the seller. It was shown that the seller was so poor that he had to leave the village during the famine to earn his livelihood elsewhere. There were no other circumstances evidencing guilty knowledge, and the Court found it impossible from this single circumstance to hold that the accused had sufficient reason to feel convinced that the seller could not have acquired the means of purchasing a bullock of the value of Rs. 16. He was accordingly acquitted.(14) The mere fact that a person pointed out the place where the stolen property was found does not justify a Court in coming to a conclusion that that person had received, retained or rendered assistance in concealing it. The mere knowledge of the place of concealment does not necessarily lead to the conclusion that the person having such knowledge actually received the articles stolen or participated in the act of its concealment.(15)

4544. But in this connection it is well to observe that for the purpose of the present section it is not necessary to establish actual knowledge or belief in the mind of the accused that the property he was receiving was stolen property; it being sufficient if it is shown that he had reason to believe it to be stolen property. This is then an offence in which criminality is based merely upon a presumed knowledge and belief though it may be at variance with the actual state of the accused's mind. But then, when it is said that the accused must have had reason to believe, what is intended and implied is that the facts and circumstances must be such as should have been sufficient to induce that belief in the mind of the accused, and not that they were sufficient to induce such belief in the mind of any prudent and reasonable man.

(13) Rango Timaji, 6 B. 402; Kanniappa, (1913) M. W. N. 696; Muhammad Ibrahim, 32 I. C. (A.) 153.

(14) Rango Timaji, 6 B. 402; followed per Batty, J., in Jethalal, 29 B. 449.

(15) Gobinda, 17 A. 576; Hakiman, (1905) P. R. No. 20, 2 Cr. L. J. 230; Buta Singh, (1917) P. R. No. 1, 39 I. C. 330, 18 Cr. L. J. 490.

The latter test is often resorted to in civil law, but it has no place in the criminal jurisprudence of this country. All the same it is a test which naturally forces itself upon the mind of the Judge inquiring into the state of the accused's mind. But it is a fallacious reasoning, as Bacon pointed out: "The human mind," he said, "has this property, that it readily supposes a greater order and conformity in things than it finds; and although many things in nature are singular and entirely dissimilar, yet the mind is still imagining parallels, correspondences and relations between them which have no existence."(16) This is a propensity which, in dealing with this offence, cannot be too carefully watched, for the inquiry that had to be made is not the inquiry whether the accused, as a reasonable man should have believed, but only whether the accused as he was constituted must have believed that the property he was receiving was stolen property. The ordinary and usual tests applied to such cases are: (i) the nature of the property; (ii) the circumstances attending the sale; and (iii) the price paid as compared with its value.

(i) Nature of the Property.

4545. The nature of the property is material, for it affords an occular proof of a mental state which the receiver must have possessed when taking possession of the property. For it cannot be denied that if an elephant or a horse is purchased by a person, the fact of the necessary publicity attending its sale would negative any presumption as to guilty knowledge. On the other hand, if the property purchased is of an unusual character, such as a temple regalia, purchased by a Mahomedan grocer, its character would at once bespeak suspicion that the receiver must have been aware of its true origin. But no such presumption can arise in the case of an article not of an unusual character and such as easily passes from hand to hand, such, for example, as dhotis and turbans,(17) or pots and pans(18) or the domestic or agricultural cattle,(19) or implements, cheap ornaments,(20) or indeed such things as persons in the position of the accused might reasonably be expected to possess. But in such cases the question may sometimes depend upon the make of the article. For in a country like India peopled with multitudinous races of diverse views and customs, each race affects articles differing from the rest which afford a valuable clue for detection. For instance, the pots and pans used in a Parsi household are as distinct from those favoured by the Mahomedans as those used by the latter are distinct from those used by the Hindus. Again a Marwari from Ajmere has a distinctive costume from that of one hailing from Jaypur, and both carry their differences of habiliments to the other articles of their household.

---

(16) Novum Organum Aphorism, 45; cf. also Bacon's Advancement of Learning, Bk. II. This propensity will be found to have influenced some decisions under this section. So Rattigan, J., in Gulbad Shah, (1888) P. R. No. 37, said: "A person must be held to have reason to believe when the circumstances are such that a reasonable man would be led by a chain of probable reasoning to the conclusion or inference that the property he was asked to deal with was stolen property although the circumstances may fall short of carrying actual conviction to his mind on the point." But the receiver may not necessarily possess the intelligence of the conventional "reasonable man." He may be a dunce, what then?

(17) Ravaji, (1892) B. U. C. 594.

(18) Ina Sheikh, 11 C. 160.

(19) Rango, 6 B. 402; Lal, (1912) P. W. R. 85, 16 I. C. 528; Mani Ram, (1912) P. W. R. 22, 15 I. C. 971.

(20) Behari 120 L. J. 339, 89 I. C. 155. (1925) O. 452 (Assessor's opinion entitled to weight in such cases).

4546. Next to these considerations arise those attending the sale. The questions that present themselves in this connection are (i) why was the property sold and bought; (ii) was the sale made in public; (iii) was it unusual; and (iv) what was the price paid. A person who carries on trade in a particular article may naturally be expected to buy and sell such goods in the usual course of his business. He could not be expected to be overcircumspect as to the customers with whom he was to deal, unless, indeed, there is anything in their demeanour and mode of business which arouses his suspicions. A brazier buying and exchanging pots may receive those which a thief wishes to relieve himself of, but if there is nothing unusual in his doing, he could not be held responsible for buying pots without inquiry. The same may be said of the sonar who has become notorious as a receiver of stolen jewels which he is reputed to pass through his crucibles with incredible celerity. But he cannot be condemned on that account on insufficient evidence. For the evidence required in each case is the same. And the question invariably is, were the circumstances such as were sufficient to make a person in the position and of the intelligence of the accused believe that what was offered to him was stolen property.

(ii) Circumstances of Sale.

4547. Of course, one great question in such cases is the price actually paid for the thing. If it was a fair market price, it will then in ordinary cases be sufficient to repel suspicion. But if there appears a gross difference between the price paid and the price which represents its intrinsic value,[21] it will then be a strong evidence no less of dishonesty than that the property was known or believed to be stolen property. But in judging of the price of a thing regard must always be had to its present saleable value, the market available for it and the fair trade risk which the accused may have taken into account in purchasing it. For it is a fact that a second hand article does not fetch anything like its real value, and if it is an article of personal use its value is then nominal. If, therefore, the accused paid a low price for it, it must not be readily assumed to have been out of the sense of guilty knowledge, for it may have been paid because of the want of a market for the thing and the advantage it thus gave him in driving a hard bargain with his customer. But these are facts which the Court must take into consideration on a proper case arising. They are not to be readily assumed in every case nor pressed into service to explain away possession otherwise sufficiently pointing to criminality.

(iii) Price Paid.

4548. But on the other hand there may arise a combination of circumstances when the inference of criminality is not only natural but irresistible. Such a case arose where the accused took in pawn a costly shawl worth Rs. 125 from a man in poor circumstances for Rs. 10 without inquiring as to its owner and the necessity for its pledge.[22]

(21) Which must be proved—it cannot be assumed; Mahbood 56 I.C. (A.) 856; 21 Cr. L.J. 552.

(22) Ramjoy Karmokar, 25 W. R. 10

4549. Retaining with Guilty Knowledge.—The question when the accused must have possessed the requisite guilty knowledge or belief, is in view of the section immaterial. For the offence of receiving stolen property may, as here described, consist of equally whether the property is received or retained with such knowledge or belief. The use of this alternative expression "dishonestly receives or retains" thus relieves the prosecutor of proving more than that the accused either received or retained the property dishonestly, that is to say, the prosecutor need not prove that it was dishonestly received as distinct from dishonestly retained, or dishonestly retained as distinct from dishonestly received. It is enough to prove facts which justify the inference that the accused either dishonestly received the property, or having received it honestly, dishonestly retained it.[23] A person who receives property dishonestly, necessarily retains it with that knowledge if he continues to keep it with him. But he may get rid of it as soon as the true facts dawn on him, in which case it may be difficult to prove dishonest receipt or retention, for his disposal of it may synchronize with his knowledge of its being stolen property.

The collocation of "receipt and retention" are obviously intended to do away with the necessity of proving the presence of dishonestly at the time of its first possession.[24] It has been said that dishonest retention is contra-distinguished from dishonest receipt, and that in the former case dishonesty supervenes after the act of acquisition or possession, while in the latter dishonesty is contemporaneous with the act of acquisition. Every person who retains possession of property dishonestly, possesses and continues to possess it dishonestly so long as he retains it dishonestly, but every person who possesses and continues to possess it dishonestly does not retain dishonestly within the meaning of section 411. Neither the thief nor the receiver of stolen property commits the offence of retaining such property dishonestly merely by continuing to keep possession of it: to constitute dishonest retention there must have been a change in the mental element of possession (possession always subsisting animo et facto from an honest to a dishonest condition of mind in relation to the thing possessed). A simple illustration is the case of a pawn-broker who receives property in pledge honestly, and subsequently discovering it to be stolen property, notwithstanding mentally resolves to keep it for his own benefit. In the absence of any act amounting to misappropriation or conversion of the property to his own use, the pawn-broker could not be convicted under s. 403 of criminal misappropriation, but he might be held to have committed this offence.[25]

4550. As however both receiving and retaining constitute one offence the accused is not entitled to claim the nature of his possession specified, and it is sufficient if he is charged for receiving or retaining and evidence is adduced to prove guilty knowledge at some period antecedent to its recovery by the police. Such knowledge may be inferred from the mode of concealment as where a person conceals the property from observation which under the circumstances is otherwise inexplicable. But the mere absence of explanation,(1) or unsatisfactory or false explanation, (2) are not of themselves sufficient to bring this offence home to the accused, since the failure of a person to account for his possession is only an element in the proof but it is no substitute for proof.

(23) Per Plowden, J., in Muhammad, (1879) P. R. No. 15.

(24) 4 M. H. C. R. (App.) 42.

(25) Najibulla Khan, (1884) C. R. 18: followed in Jawaya, (1887) P. R. 46; Khona, (1879) P. R. 31.

4551. Presumption from Recent Possession.—Assuming that the possession of stolen property is traced to an individual the proof of other facts necessary to establish an offence under this section may be dispensed with if the case falls within the rule enunciated in the Indian Evidence Act enabling the Court to presume that a man who is in possession of stolen goods soon after the theft, is either the thief or has received the goods knowing them to be stolen, unless he can account for his possession; but in considering whether this presumption is justifiable the Court must have regard to a case such as the following: "A shop-keeper has in his till a marked rupee soon after it was stolen, and cannot account for its possession specifically, but is continuously receiving rupees in the course of his business."(3) (§ 4138) This rule of law, the bald statement of which is contained in the Indian Evidence Act, is founded upon good sense and reason which controls its indiscriminate application to all cases irrespective of the other considerations which necessarily limit and qualify it. In the first place the rule is the rule of presumption, or as it is usually termed, circumstantial evidence which is admissible in civil as well as in criminal cases, and the necessity of which in criminal cases is more obvious seeing that the positive testimony of witness is in them less available. Presumptions may be of fact or of law. A presumption of law arises where some facts being proved another follows as a natural or very probable inference or conclusion from them, so as readily to gain assent from the mere probability of its having occurred, without further proof. The fact thus assented to is said to be presumed, that is, taken for granted until the contrary be proved by the opposite party: stabitur præsumptioni donec probetur in contrarium.(4) And it is adopted the more readily, in proportion to the difficulty of proving the fact by positive evidence, and to the facility of disproving it or of proving facts inconsistent with it, if it really never occurred.(5)

S. 114, Illustration (a), Indian Evidence Act.

4552. The rule here enacted is not a presumption of law, but of fact which are of three kinds: (i) violent presumption; (ii) probable presumption; and (iii) rash presumption. The presumption is violent where the facts and circumstances necessarily attend the fact presumed; it is probable where they usually attend the fact presumed. A presumption is rash when it has no weight or validity at all.(6) Now, applying these principles to an offence under this section, suppose, if the thief were apprehended a few yards from the outer door of the house he had robbed with the stolen goods in his possession, the presump-

Degree of Presumption.

(1) Bharos, 21 A. L. J. 836.
(2) Allu, (1914) P. W. R. 34; 25 I. C. 982; 15 Cr. L. J. 654.
(3) S. 114, ill. (a) and Exception, Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872).
(4) Co. Litt. 272.
(5) Arch, Cr. Pl. (22nd Ed.,) p. 313.
(6) 3 Black, pp. 371, 372.

tion would be violent that the goods he possessed were stolen; but if he were dicovered with their possession in his house sometime after the theft, and he refused to account for his possession of them, this together with proof that they were actually stolen, amount not to a violent but to a probable presumption merely, and if the property was not found recently but long after the theft, say a year or more after the theft, the presumption would be rash and entitled to no weight.[7]

But length of time is not the only element in modifying the presumption which depends as much upon the nature of the property stolen, and whether it be or be not likely to pass readily from hand to hand,[8] as upon other circumstances from which men may safely draw inferences. As Maule, J., put it: "If a man go into the London Docks sober, without means of getting drunk, and comes out of one of the cellars very drunk, wherein are a million gallons of wine, I think that would be reasonable evidence that he had stolen some of the wine in that cellar, though you could not prove that any wine was stolen, or any wine was missed."[9] But though these considerations necessarily influence the presumption, the main test referred to in the section is, was the possession recent enough to raise the presumption of guilty knowledge.

In one case Parke, J., observed that possession of stolen property three months after it was lost was not such recent possession as to put the prisoner upon showing how he came by it unless there was evidence of something more than the mere fact of the property being in his possession at the distance of time after the loss of it"[10]: a fortiori possession[11] six or seven months after the loss[12] and sixteen months was much too long to raise any presumption at all.[13] But even three months may be too long in respect of property which readily passes from hand to hand. So Patteson, J., observed that the question of what is or is not such a recent possession of stolen property as to require the person in whose possession it is to give an account of how such possession was acquired was to be considered with reference to the nature of the articles stolen, adding, "if they are such as to pass from hand to hand readily, two months would be a long time."[14]

(7) Per Baley, J., in Anon., C. & P. 459: Adams, 3 C. & P. 600; Cooper, 3 C. & K. 318.

(8) Cf. per Patteson, J., in Partridge, 7 C. & P. 551.

(9) Per Malue, J., in Burton, Dears C. C. 822; Dredge, 1 Cox 235; Mookford, 11 Cox 16.

(10) Adams, 3 C. & P. 600 (No. presumption after 2 months); Ramudu Ajyar, 44 M. L. J. 243, 72 I. C. 538, 24 Cr. L. J. 426; Ramhit, 20 A. L. J. 178, 65 I. C. 849, 23 Cr. L. J. 193, (1922) A. I. R. (A.) 24 (possession of a dupatta, common scarf, after 40 days, held to raise no presumption).

(11) Hari Ram, 62 I. C. 867, 22 Cr. L. J. 595; Ram Chundra v. Haji Meah, 17 C. W. N. 1129, 21 I. C. 171, 14 Cr. L. J. 571 (A Government Currency note found with a Shroff 7 months after theft,).

(12) Per Maule, J., in Cooper, 3 C. & K. 318.

(13) Partridge, 3 C. &. P. 551; Lal Singh, (1914) P. L. R. 113, 24 I. C. 833, 15 Cr. L. J. 521; Obbava, (1912) M. W. N. 529, 16 I. C. 164, 13 Cr. L. J. 596; Hatkim Mondal, 24 C. W. N. 619, 56 I. C. 849, 21 Cr. L. J. 515.

(14) Partridge, 3 C. & P. 551; followed in Ina Sheikh, 11 C. 160; Nga E, (1885) S. J. L. B. 354; Kana Nat, 6 C. P. L. R. 29,

4553. The principle of these cases has been followed in several decided cases in this country. That the possession of the accused of the proceeds of a theft 4 days thereafter was held to raise the presumption justifying his conviction of this offence admits of no doubt.[15] In one case the accused was convicted of this offence on the presumption raised from the fact of his possession of a drinking cup proved to have been stolen eleven months back, but the Court held that his possession was not so recent as to put him to prove of how such possession was acquired.[16] In this case not only the time elapsing was long, but the thing stolen was one of common use and such as might readily pass from hand to hand. This is implied in the exception given in the Indian Evidence Act to section 114, illustration (a). Having regard to this fact Jardine and Telang, JJ., refused to make the presumption in the case of dhotis and turbans, the possession of which had been traced to the accused six weeks after the theft.[17] The case of currency notes[18] stands on the same footing. Indeed, there will be no such presumption at all if the article purchased is new and such as can be had anywhere. Even where it is old, the fact that it is one in common use would counteract any presumption that may arise from its possession.

4554. The accused was the guard of a train by which the prosecutor travelled from one station to another, and amongst his wearing apparel contained in a portmanteau were seven handkerchiefs to which the guard had access. A day or two after completing the journey the prosecutor found his handkerchiefs gone. A month later the accused was found in possession of a similar handkerchief. The accused stated that he had received it from a prostitute at Delhi, but this was not proved. The accused was convicted but on appeal it was held that the conviction could not be upheld because there was no proof of theft (§§ 4522-4526) and of its dishonest receipt by the prisoner. Then adverting to the presumption arising from recent possession the Court remarked that the handkerchief was found in the prisoner's possession more than a month after the theft. "That is a considerable time; and the circumstance will not afford a presumption that he received it knowing it to be stolen, unless he can account for its possession. The fact that he is in possession of the handkerchief, and does not account for it, is, no doubt, suspicious, but nothing more, and the prosecution is not relieved from the obligation of proving beyond reasonable doubt, both that the handkerchief was stolen and that the appellant received it dishonestly. This has not been done, and I set aside the conviction."[19]

So in another case the accused's house being searched, a number of brass utensils were found and for the possession of which he could not explain. At the time of search there were no claimants of the pots but two days afterwards some four persons came forward and (15) Turimella, 33 I. C. (M) 819, 17 Cr. L. J. 179.

(16) Ina Sheikh, 11 C. 160.
(17) Ravaji, (1892) B. U. C. 594.
(18) Ramacharan v. Haji Meah, 17 C. W. N. 1120; Vellai Ocha Thevan, 11 M. L. T. 189, 15 I. C. 315.
(19) Per Oldfield, J., in Burke, 6. A. 224.

professed to identify some articles out of the heap shown to them. They stated that the articles had been stolen a year or more before the search. But other complainants alleged a recent theft. The Court quashed the conviction in the former cases and affirmed it in the latter, holding that the period was recent in the one batch of cases and not recent in the other so that the presumption made in the one case could not be reasonably extended to the other.[20]

4555. The prosecutor's house was broken into on the night of July 17th and the prisoner was arrested on the road with a part of the stolen property on September 15th. He could not account for his possession, but denied that he was ever found in possession upon which the Court felt justified in convicting him under this section,[21] though having regard to the lapse of time it did not feel justified in convicting him of theft. The prosecutor, a prostitute of Calcutta, was robbed of her ornaments by two persons A and B. C who was B's father-in-law was three days after the theft found in possession of the ornaments as he offered them for sale in a village where he had no business to go, as the ornaments could have been disposed of in Calcutta. It was conceded that there was no necessity for the hurried sale and yet the Court held the case to be one of no more than a mere suspicion and the accused was acquitted.[22] If the facts of this case have been fully reported, no reference was made to this presumption, and it is submitted, that the case was otherwise wrongly decided, because (i) the possession was recent, (ii) the disposal secret (iii) and without necessity, and (iv) the accused could not account for his possession. One fails to see where this presumption comes in, if it does not in a case like this.

4556. It is to be observed that the presumption arising from recent possession may be strengthened by the absence of a satisfactory explanation from the accused accounting for his possession. So in a case the Judge told the jury: "In cases of this nature you should take it as a general principle, that, when a man in whose possession stolen property is found, gives a reasonable account of how he came by it, as by telling the name of the person from whom he received it, and who is known to be a real person, it is incumbent on the prosecutor to show that that account is false; but if the account given by the prisoner be unreasonable or improbable on the face of it, the onus of proving its truth lies on him."[23] The accused was found in possession of certain pots, a tin of gun-powder, some pieces of silks, a sari and a watch and chain. They were shown to have been stolen some eight or ten months since the accused was asked to account for their possession. He mentioned the name of a person from whom he had received some of the articles and in which he was corroborated. But his explanation as to the watch and chain showed that he had appropriated it without any inquiry as to its owner. The Court considered the presumption thus strengthened by the feeble explanation, and applying the other presumption arising from section 114 (a) of the Indian Evidence Act, it convicted him on the whole case.[24]

---

(20) Poromeshur Alteer, 23 W. R. 16.
(21) Madappa, (1888) 1 Weir 471.
(22) Aswini Kumar Roy, 10 C. W. N. 219.
(23) Crowhurst, 1 C. & K. 370.
(24) Hari Ramji, 9 Bom. L. R. 27.

There was nothing remarkable in the case of the accused who was found in possession of stolen jewellery three weeks after it was stolen, which being held to be sufficiently identified by its owner, and his wife and daughter who were in the habit of seeing him wearing it, the Court felt justified in presuming that the accused was a receiver unless he could account for his possession.[25] Section 114 (a) of the Indian Evidence Act is useful in establishing scienter in doubtful cases, for it provides that if A is accused of receiving stolen goods knowing them to be stolen, and it is proved that he was in possession of a particular stolen article, the fact that, at the same time, he was in possession of many other stolen articles, is relevant, as tending to show that he knew each and all of the articles of which he was in possession to have been stolen.[1]

Nature of presumption How Determined.

4557. It will be observed that the presumption arising under law in case of recent possession is either of theft or receiving stolen property. It may then be a question as to when does a presumption arise of theft and when of receiving stolen property, and whether it invariably arises in the alternative. The prisoner was indicted for receiving stolen sheep which were shown to have been driven from the possession of its owner by the prisoner's two little boys aged eight and twelve. He was convicted, but it was urged that there was no evidence to support that count and that the jury ought to have been so directed, but on a case reserved the conviction was affirmed, Pollock, C. B., observing: "If no other person is involved in the transaction, and the whole of the case against the prisoner is that he was found in possession, of the stolen property, the evidence would no doubt point to a case of stealing rather than a case of receiving; but in every case, except indeed, where the possession is so recent that it is impossible for anyone else to have committed the theft, it becomes a mere question for the jury whether the person found in possession of the stolen property stole it himself or received it from some one else. If there is no other evidence, the jury will probably consider, with reason, that the prisoner stole the property; but if there is other evidence, which is consistent either with his having stolen the property, or with his having received it from some one else, it will be for the jury to say which appears to them the more probable solution." To which Byles, J., added: "There are three ways in which the prisoner may have received these sheep with a guilty knowledge. First, the boys may have stolen them independently of their father, who may have received the sheep from them. Secondly, the father may have sent the boys as innocent agents to receive the sheep from the actual thief, in which case the father would have been guilty of receiving as a principal, the boys being, as it were, merely the long arms with which he took the sheep. Thirdly, he may have sent the boys for the same purpose as guilty agents, in which case, although the boys would be the principals in the felony (of receiving), yet the father would be an accessory before the fact, and might be convicted as a principal."[2]

(25) Sen Raya Govindan, 3 M. L. T. 30, 7 Cr. L. J. 30.

(1) Ib.

(2) S. 14 (a), Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872).

4558. The question whether the jury should be justified in presuming theft or receiving from a recent possession depends upon other circumstances. If the receiver was seen anywhere near the scene of theft at the time, the Court may take that circumstance with the fact of possession into consideration and presume it to be a case of theft rather than of receiving. The prisoner was indicted for larceny and receiving, and the evidence consisted of the stolen property having been found concealed on her person at about 10 o'clock in the morning after the night of theft and of her having given contrary account of how she came into possession of it, whereupon the jury convicted her only of receiving, acquitting her of larceny, and it was held that the evidence was sufficient to justify the conviction.(3)

4559. In view of the provisions of section 72 providing for a conviction in the alternative in such cases, the question as to whether the receiver should not under a given circumstance have also been convicted of larceny does not seem to call for further notice. At the same time cases may undoubtedly arise in which the act clearly amounts to stealing and when conviction for receiving would be obviously unjustifiable. Such was, for instance, the following case: An indictment charged A with stealing 18s. 6d. and B with receiving it. It was proved that A and B were accomplices, A was the barman and B went up to the bar and called for refreshments and put down a florin: —A served B, took up the florin and gave him 18s. 6d. from his employer's till as his change. He was arrested as he was leaving the bar. The jury convicted A of stealing and B of receiving, but it was held that the evidence did not make out a case of receiving but of larceny, in which B was a principal in the second degree.(4) In England this distinction is material as a person cannot be there indicted in the alternative. The distinction between theft and receiving it, therefore, is the subject of attentive consideration in English Law, but it can have no more than a bare academic interest in this country.

4560. But it suggests two other questions as of more practical importance. In the first place the question may arise whether a person guilty of theft could be convicted of receiving stolen property, if he could not be convicted of theft. Such a case may arise as in the cases supposed where the accused commits theft in foreign territory but is found in possession of his booty in British territory, in which case the view is that though he could not be convicted of theft, there is nothing to prevent his conviction for this offence. This was clearly the intention of the amendment of section 410 (§§ 4498-4501). The English rule on this point was, however, at one time(5) different, and it was erroneously followed in a case of the Chief Court of Lower Burma.(6)

(3) Langmead, L. & C. 427.
(4) McMahon, 13 Cox. 275; Deer, 32 L. J. M. C. 33.
(5) Coggins, 12 Cox. 517; Shunker Gope, 6 C. 307; Ishan Muchi, 15 C. 511: Abdul Latib, 10 B. 186; Baldewa, (1906) A. W. N. 52; Shivram, (1875), B. U. C. 98.
(6) Nya Kyaw, (1900) 1 L. B. R. 39. Now since the Larceny Act, 1896 (56 & 57 Vict., c. 52) s. 1,'a receiver of stolen goods in the United Kingdom may be convicted though the theft was committed abroad. The rule is therefore now the same as enacted in s. 410, since its amendment of 1882.

4561. No Offence if Property Abandoned or Ownerless.—It has been already seen that there can be no theft in the case of derelict or ownerless property (s. 378). It follows that if there can be no substantive offence there can be no subsidiary offence provided for here. So a person appropriating a bull let loose as a part of a religious ceremony cannot be convicted of this offence, because the bull being, since its dedication, a res nullius, becomes the property of anyone by capture.(7)

Dishonestly receiving property stolen in the commission of a dacoity.

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Cognizable. Warrant. Not bail. Non-comp.

412. Whoever dishonestly receives or retains any stolen property, the possession whereof he knows or has reason to believe to have been transferred by the commission of dacoity, or dishonestly receives from a person, whom he knows or has reason to believe to belong or to have belonged to a gang of dacoits, property which he knows or has reason to believe to have been stolen, shall be punished with transportation for life or with rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[Dishonestly—s. 24. Reason to believe—s. 26. Possession—s. 27. Dacoity—s. 391. Stolen property—s. 410 Receives or retains—s. 411.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4562).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4563).
(3) Proof (4564).
(4) Form of Charge (4565).
(5) Principle (4566).
(6) Meaning of Words (4567).
(7) Receiving from Dacoit or Dacoity Goods (4568-4569).

4562. Analogous Law.—The drastic provisions of this section were enacted to suppress dacoity, an offence which appears to have been rampant when the Code was drafted. Consequently, this section metes out the same penalty to a receiver of the booty of dacoity as to the principal dacoit himself.(8) But naturally the case must be strictly brought within the requirements of the section.

4563. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate, or a Magistrate of the first or second class. Instead of the sentence here provided, section 59 authorizes the substitution of transportation for this sentence, but in that case it must be limited to ten years, the maximum here fixed.(9)

4564. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the property in question is stolen property.

---

(7) Bandhu, 8 A. 51; Nihal, 9 A. 348; Jamura, (1884), 4 A. W. N. 87; Romesh Chunder Sanyal v. Hiru Mondul, 17 C. 852; Sita, 18 B. 212.
(8) S. 395.
(9) Mohanundo Bhundary, 5 W. R. 16.

(2) That its possession was transferred by the commission of dacoity.

(3) That the accused received or retained such stolen property.

(4) That he did so dishonestly.

(5) That he then knew that—

(a) the property he received has been transferred by the commission of dacoity; or

(b) that the transferor was a dacoit belonged to a dacoit gang, in which case, prove further that the knew or had reason to believe that the property he received was stolen property.

4565. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows :—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you dishonestly received (or retained) stolen property, to wit——belonging to one A B, knowing (or having reason to believe) the same to have been transferred by the commission of dacoity [or dishonestly received from one C D, a person whom you knew (or had reason to believe to belong or to have belonged) to a gang of dacoits] property which you knew or had reason to believe to have been stolen, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 412 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

4566. Principle.—Though there is no difference in the measure of punishment between the offence of the receiver from a dacoit and the dacoit himself, still the offence primarily here defined is that of a receiver of the plunder of dacoity by a person distinct from the dacoit himself.[10] The section contemplates receipt of such property with knowledge or belief that it is the outcome of dacoity, which knowledge or belief may be gained by the receiver in one of two ways: (a) when he knows or believes it to be property transferred by dacoity; and (b) when he believes that the transferor is a past or present dacoit, and that the property is stolen property. In the one case the property is directly connected with dacoity, in the other it is connected only indirectly through the dacoit from whom he receives. But in such a case it is manifest that he must be further aware that the property he is receiving is stolen property, though he may not know or believe it to be the outcome of dacoity. The section thus does not punish dealing with a dacoit, but only receipt of stolen goods from one who is believed to be a dacoit.

4567. Meaning of Words.—"Stolen property, the possession whereof he has reason to believe to have been transferred by the commission of daco- ity." that is, facts must exist or be brought to his notice, connecting the property with dacoity, failing which the offence may yet fall under section 411. "Or to have belonged to a gang of dacoits." Within reasonably such time as to make him believe that the stolen property is probably the proceeds of a dacoity. The person belonging to such a gang need not have been convicted under section 400, under which the meaning of this phrase has been set out.

(10) Babiru, (1886) B. U. C. 312.

4568. Receiving from Dacoit or Dacoity Goods.—This section is only an aggravated form of the offence punishable under the last section, the other form of aggravation being noticed under the next section. That section regards persistency as an aggravation: This section views aggravation from the heinous nature of the offender of which the receiver is regarded as the confederate. In other respects both the sections follow the language of section 411. So far as regards this section the offence is described to lie in receiving property known or believed to have been transferred by the commission of dacoity, or receiving stolen property from a past or present dacoit with the knowledge or belief that the property is stolen property, though not necessarily the proceeds of a dacoity. But in either case it is not sufficient merely to prove that the property was stolen property.(11)

Ordinarily, this section would apply to a receiver other than the dacoit himself, but in any case a person cannot be convicted both for dacoity under section 395 as well as receiving the property obtained in dacoity,(12) since the two offences would then be based on the same facts, which law does not permit. But there is nothing against a person being charged in the alternative, in which case he may be convicted of one or the other offence, and if the evidence adduced falls short of that required to establish a case under this section, the accused may be convicted of the simple offence of being in possession of stolen property under the last section.(13) But a person found in possession of property immediately after the commission of a dacoity may be presumed to be either a dacoit or a receiver from a dacoit, and if he does not appear to be a receiver, as when there is no reason to suppose that he had received the property from a third person, then he may be fairly presumed to be a dacoit.(14)

A receiver under this section is as heinous a criminal as a dacoit, and a person cannot be convicted of this offence unless there is some positive evidence that the knew or had reason to belive that a dacoity had been committed and that the property he was receiving was the proceeds of that dacoity, or that the transferor was a dacoit and was transferring stolen property.(15) The fact that the receiver asked no questions of the transferor, which if he had, would have put him in possession of the information necessary to bring his case under this section cannot be urged in favour of his liability under this section, for his liability does not depend upon what he might and could have

(11) Daji, (1895) B. U. C. 756.
(12) Babiru, (1886) B. U. C. 312; Abdul Hossein, 1 W. R. 48: Shahabut Sheikh, 13 W. R. 42; Guzzala Hanuman, 26 M. 467.
(13) Daji, (1895) B. U. C. 756.
(14) Jogeshur Bagdee, 7 W. R. 109.
(15) Ib., p. 110.

learnt, but what he did in fact learn, and after learning had reason to believe.

The fact that the accused had purchased the property from a robber does not create any presumption that the receiver had done so with guilty knowledge as here required, for as Hobhouse, J., said: "The first object of a robber is to get rid of his plunder, and in doing so, he is not likely to mention and the guilty receiver is not likely to ask how and when he got it. It is a case of give and take, and no uncomfortable or compromising questions put or answered on either side, and thus it is quite possible that the prisoner, the inhabitant of a strange district, and for anything that is in the evidence to the contrary, of a strange village, six days after the dacoity, may have received and retained, knowing indeed that the property was stolen, but not knowing precisely that it was stolen at a dacoity."(16) The same view was reiterated by Dwarkanath Mitter and Jackson, JJ., in which case the accused had been persuaded to confess his guilt—which he did to the effect that one Tara Noina visited him for a smoke towards morning on a certain day after committing a dacoity, and told him that he was burying the property as it was morning, and that he would remove it the next day. The Court held that the statement, if admissible, must be taken in its entirety, and all it showed was, that the property buried was by certain dacoity to his knowledge, but it did not prove its receipt or retention by the accused. In this view the accused was acquitted.(17)

4569. Indeed, proof of the possession of the stolen property is a sine qua non for a conviction under section 411, a fortiori under this section which exposes the possessor to heavier penalties. The two offences are, however, of the same kind, so that on failing to establish a case under this section the accused may be convicted under section 411.(18) But as under that section, so under this the offence may be presumed from recent possession, though such presumption will naturally fade with time. So where persons are found within six hours of the commission of a dacoity, with portions of the plundered property in their possession, the presumption of law is that they were participators in the actual dacoity and not merely receivers.(19) But such presumption could not be made where a person is apprehended after some time, say eight days after a dacoity, with part of the plunder in his possession, but he may then be justifiably charged in the alternative for being either a dacoit or a receiver under this section,(20) and if there has been a longer interval between the dacoity and receipt, the presumption may altogether vanish (§§ 4551-4556). In any case the presumption is of fact and not of law, and it is entirely the province of the jury to make or refuse to make it. It was, therefore, considered a misdirection to the jury in the judge's directing them that the finding of the stolen shirt with the accused two months after the dacoity was so short a time as to justify them in convicting each accused of

(16) Jogeshur Bagdee, 7 W. R. 109 (111).
(17) Bishoo Manjee, 9 W. R. 16.
(18) Samiruddin, 18 W. R. 25; Daji Mahadhu, (1895) B. U. C. 756.
(19) Gassy Mul, 3 W. R. 10.
(20) Motee Jolaha, 5 W. R. 66.

the dacoity itself. It was held that the question whether the possession of the recent stolen property was recent enough to warrant a conviction for the substantive offence was a matter entirely for the jury, and should not have been put to them in the positive way which the Judge adopted. In the result the Court quashed the conviction of the accused for dacoity as due to the misdirection, and confirmed it under section 411.[21]

Habitually dealing in stolen property.

413. Whoever habitually receives or deals in property which he knows or has reason to believe to be stolen property, shall be punished with transportation for life, or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years and shall also be liable to fine.

Session. Cognizable Warrant. Not bail- Not comp.

[Receive—s. 411.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4570).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4571-4572).
(3) Proof (4573).
(4) Form of Charge (4574).
(5) Principle (4575).
(6) Meaning of Words (4576).
(7) Habitually Dealing in Stolen Property (4577-4578).

4570. Analogous Law.—A casual receiver of stolen property is punishable under the last two sections, according to the nature of the property and knowledge or belief on the part of the accused. The professional receiver or dealer of such property comes under the lash of this section and the maximum sentence it prescribes is only short of death. It is needless to add that the terms of the section must be strictly fulfilled.

4571. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable, and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable and is triable exclusively by the Court of Session.

4572. An offence under this section is not of the same kind as an offence under section 411 of the Code, within the meaning of section 234 of the Procedure Code, so that a prisoner cannot be tried at the same trial for receiving or retaining stolen property and for being a habitual receiver of or a dealer in such property. The proper course in such a case is to try the accused first for the simple offence under section 411 or 412, as the case may be, and then to put him on his trial for this offence putting in the previous convictions under those sections in evidence, and proving the finding of the rest of the property in respect of which no previous conviction was had in consequence of the provisions of section 234 of the Procedure Code.[22] It may also be noted that since this section enacts a substantive offence, there must be evidence of a receiving or dealing independent of those for which the accused had already been convicted. For instance, if a person was twice convicted under section 411, he could not be convicted again on the strength of those convictions and independently of any fresh act of receipt or dealing to be tried thereunder. Any other view would offend against the provisions of section 403 of the Procedure Code.

(21) Gussala Hanuman, 26 M. 467.
(22) Uttom Koondoo, 8 C. 634. The reference in the case to s. 435 of the Cr. P. C., 1872, corresponds to the s. 234 of the present Code.

4573. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the property in question is stolen property.

(2) That the accused received it or dealt in it.

(3) That he did so habitually.

(4) That he did so knowing or having reason to believe it to be stolen property.

4574. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you were a habitual receiver of (or dealer in) property, which you knew (or had reason to believe) to be stolen property and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 413 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge."

4575. Principle.—Habitual offenders have been invariably classed as desperate criminals in the Code, and in which provision has been made for the passing of deterrent sentences either as provided in section 75 or as otherwise specifically provided, as in the case of habitual dealer in slaves[23] or false coins.[24] In this case the maximum penalty provided is transportation for life with the alternative sentence of imprisonment which may extend up to ten years and the minimum of which may be anything according to the discretion of the Court. This wide range of discretion is probably intended to be exercised not only according to the inveteracy of the habit but also according to the other circumstances which aggravate the offence which, for instance, distinguishes an offence under the last section from one under its predecessor. The question when an offender is deemed to have become a habitual one depends upon the frequency of his offending acts. He must, at least, be shown to have committed, at least once before, such an act as a distinct and independent act. It is not necessary that he should have been convicted of it, but it is necessary that the proof of that act should be as convincing, for it is that act which determines the applicability of this offence and the measure of punishment here provided.

(23) S. 371. (24) Ss. 237-240.

4576. Meaning of Words.—"Habitually receives": The receipt must have been so frequent as to become a matter of habit (§ 4575). "Habitually deals," that is, as a professional dealer. Such dealing must have been made a trade of, otherwise there would be no habitual dealing, though there may be habitual receiving. Dealing implies the transfer of such property to others whether possessing the same guilty knowledge or not.

4577. Habitually Dealing in Stolen Property.—The gist of this offence lies in the habit of receiving or dealing in stolen property. Now a person cannot be said to be an habitual receiver of stolen property if he receives the proceeds of a number of different robberies from a number of different thieves on the same day. In order to support a conviction under this section there must be evidence to show that the property was received on different occasions and on different dates.(25) So where the accused was found in possession of a large number of utensils which were shown to have been stolen on different dates, but there was no evidence that they were received by the accused on different dates, the Court quashed his conviction under this section, and since the accused had been twice tried before, it refused to direct his fresh trial under section 411 which was the only appropriate section applicable to his case.(1) The evidence of habit cannot as in the case of an offence under s. 401, be furnished by a mere record of previous convictions, or an order made under s. 110 of the Code of Criminal Procedure (§§ 4344-4345), though these might be used to corroborate other independent evidence, but such evidence must of itself be sufficient to establish habit.

What is Receiving and Dealing ?

4578. The offence of receiving here referred to must be understood in the light of its definition contained in section 411. The word "dealing" requires some explanation. It has been used in section 371, and the sense in which it has been used here is the same. The term is intended to be used as implying the carrying on a traffic in stolen property. But the term is probably not wide enough to include a mere middleman, such as a broker of stolen property, who may have habitually negotiated the transfer of such property, though such a person may, if he possesses the requisite knowledge or belief, be liable under the next section.

Assisting in concealment of stolen property.

414. Whoever voluntarily assists in concealing or disposing of or making away with property, which he knows or has reason to believe to be stolen property, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag of 1st or 2nd class. Cognizable. Warrant. Not bail-Not comp. Summary, if property valued not more than Rs. 50.

[Voluntarily—s. 39. Stolen property—s. 410 Reason to believe—s. 411]

(25) Baburam, 19 C. 190.

(1) Baburam, 19 C. 190.

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4579).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4580).
(3) Proof (4581).
(4) Form of Charge (4582).
(5) Principle (4583).
(6) Assisting Concealment of Stolen Property (4584-4586).

4579. Analogous Law.—This section is generally worded, and may, as such, include not only a person assisting in the concealment or disposal of property, but also one who is its receiver, and is therefore punishable under section 411. But the section is obviously intended only to apply to cases in which the act of the accused does not fall within the scope of section 411, but in which a person is shown to stand in such a relation to a stolen property as falls short of possession by him of such property, but his manner of dealing with it is nevertheless such as warrants a charge of assisting in concealing or disposing of or making away with the property with a guilty knowledge.[2]

4580. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable, and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class, and it may be tried summarily if the value of the property in respect of which this offence is committed does not exceed Rs. 50. This section is not intended to provide an additional punishment for a thief concealing or disposing of his spoil. Consequently, a person cannot be convicted both for theft and for concealing[3] or disposing of[4] the same property. There is, however, nothing against the same person being tried at the same time for the two offences of theft and this offence, or an offence punishable under section 411 and this section, but he cannot be convicted of both.[5] The two offences in such cases must be treated as parts of one continuous transaction and they cannot be considered as two distinct offences.[6]

4581. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the property in question is stolen property.

(2) That the accused assisted in concealing or disposing of or making away with it.

(3) That he did so voluntarily.

(4) That he then knew or had reason to believe it to be stolen property.

4582. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

(2) Khona, (1879) P. R. No. 31 Subba Chand, (1881) P. R. No. 39.
(3) Nga Po Kyaw, (1885) S. J. L. B. 334.
(4) Zinda, (1896), P. R. No. 15.
(5) Nowlia, 1 Agra 9; Sakharam, (1889) B. U. C. 449; Alu Kala, (1891) B. U. C. 553.
(6) Alu Kala, (1891) B. U. C. 553, Subba Chand, (1881) P. R. No. 39, 4 M. H. C. (App.) 13.

"That on or about the——day of——at——you voluntarily assisted in concealing (or disposing of or making away with) property, to wit ——which you knew (or had reason to believe) to be stolen property, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 414 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

4583. Principle.—This section is not intended to punish those whose acts constitute a distinct offence punishable as such under either sections 411, 412 or 413. It is intended only to punish those acts of assistance which fall short of actual receipt or retention of the property, but are nevertheless distinctly calculated to thwart the detection of the crime by making away with the corpus delicti. A person so actuated may have no dishonest intention, for his sole intention may be to screen the offender. Dishonesty is therefore made no part of this offence, though the section requires that the assistance should have been given voluntarily.This ensures the exemption of those who have rendered assistance under coercion or who have been made innocent tools by designing men. As, however, the assistance given by a person may be voluntarily rendered under circumstances of great extenuation, the section provides for the alternative sentence of a mere fine.

4584. Assisting Concealment of Stolen Property.—The offence here defined consists in rendering voluntary assistance in concealing or disposing of or making away with property which the person so assisting knows, or has reason to believe to be stolen. The property must thus in fact be stolen property, and the accused must moreover have known, or at least believed it to be so. Now such belief does not imply a conviction amounting to certainty. Nor does it imply a mere suspicion falling short of a moral conviction.(7) All that the section says and all it implies is that there must be such facts and circumstances present to the mind of the accused that he was, or should have been, as a reasonable man, convinced that the property he was dealing with was stolen property. He was bound to desist from assisting in its concealment after that belief. If, therefore, he voluntarily disposes of it, or assists in its disposal, he renders himself obnoxious to the penalties of this section.

4585. Such knowledge may, for instance, be easily inferred on the part of a cartman removing a bale of cloth from the station-yard at night, especially in a place where railway robberies had become notorious. The cartman could not, in such a case, believe otherwise than that the bale he was ordered to shuffle out of sight was a bale of merchandise and not the property of the station-master who ordered its removal.(8) Of course, in such cases, in order to consider whether a person was voluntarily assisting another in the disposal of stolen property, not only the nature of the property but also the circumstances under which it was being made away with, must be taken into consideration. So, where the wife, on hearing that her husband was about to be arrested for the theft of oil which he had been stealing from his employers, the Railway Company, carried it to a neighbour's kitchen and buried it there, the Court held the case to be one fit for punishment under this section.(9) In such cases, there may have been no direct communication of knowledge or belief, but there were circumstances from which the Court felt justified in presuming knowledge or belief.(10) The accused may not have actually believed in the property being stolen, but in dealing with this case, the law regards the probability of his belief which it infers from the sufficiency of cause. The voluntary assistance here punishable may as much be concealing or otherwise disposing of the property so as to assist the thief in escaping detection as for the purpose of fabricating evidence for the purpose of getting an innocent person convicted of theft. The accused had some railway pins brought to him which he employed a servant to conceal in the godown and fields of his enemy, his intention being to implicate him as the thief. It was held that inasmuch as there was both the voluntary concealment of stolen property as well as the fabrication of false evidence with the intention of implicating a person, the two acts constituted two distinct offences punishable under s. 193 as well as this section.(11)

(7) Rango Timaji, 6 B. 402 (403). (8) Hari Shankar, 2 B. H. C. R. 130.

4586. The word "concealment" means hiding from view—specially the view of those interested in the investigation of the crime. A person may conceal property by altering its form so as to prevent its recognition, as by melting down jewellery or effacing therefrom the marks of identification. The burial of such property under ground would serve the same purpose. The disposal of property suggests its transfer to a receiver or other person, while "making away" implies taking it away so as to put it out of the reach of those legally requiring it. It does not necessarily imply concealment or disposal, but implies such an act as swallowing a stolen article or setting it on fire or the like.

OF CHEATING

Cheating.

415. Whoever, by deceiving any person, fraudulently or dishonestly, induces the person so deceived to deliver any property to any person, or to consent that any person shall retain any property, or intentionally induces the person so deceived to do or omit to do anything which he would not do or omit, if he were not so deceived, and which act or omission causes or is likely to cause damage or harm to that person in body, mind, reputation or property, is said to "cheat."

Explanation.—A dishonest concealment of facts is a deception within the meaning of this section.

(9) De Silva, 5 N. W. P. H. C. R. 120. 17 I. C. 537.
(10) Budhan Khan, 14 Bom. L. R. 898, (11) Rameshar Rai, 1 A. 279.

Illustrations.

(a) A, by falsely pretending to be in the Civil Service, intentionally deceives Z, and thus dishonestly induces Z to let him have on credit goods for which he does not mean to pay. A cheats.

(b) A, by putting a counterfeit mark on an article, intentionally deceives Z into a belief that this article was made by a certain celebrated manufacturer, and thus dishonestly induces Z to buy and pay for the article. A cheats.

(c) A, by executing to Z a false sample of an article, intentionally deceives Z into believing that the article corresponds with the sample, and thereby dishonestly induces Z to buy and pay for the article. A cheats.

(d) A, by tendering in payment for an article a bill on a house with which A keeps no money, and by which A expects that the bill will be dishonoured, intentionally deceives Z, and thereby dishonestly induces Z to deliver the article, intending not to pay for it. A cheats.

(e) A, by pledging as diamonds articles which he knows are not diamonds, intentionally deceives Z, and thereby dishonestly induces Z to lend money. A cheats.

(f) A intentionally deceives Z into a belief that A means to repay any money that Z may lend to him and thereby dishonestly induces Z to lend him money, A not intending to repay it. A cheats.

(g) A intentionally deceives Z into a belief that A means to deliver to Z a certain quantity of indigo plant which he does not intend to deliver, and thereby dishonestly induces Z to advance money upon the faith of such delivery. A cheats; but if A, at the time of obtaining the money, intends to deliver the indigoplant, and afterwards breaks his contract and does not deliver it, he does not cheat, but is liable only to a civil action for breach of contract.

(h) A intentionally deceives Z into a belief that A has performed A's part of a contract made with Z, which he has not performed and thereby dishonestly induces Z to pay money. A cheats.

(i) A sells and conveys an estate to B. A, knowing that in consequence of such sale he has no right to the property, sells or mortgages the same to Z, without disclosing the fact of the previous sale and conveyance to B, and receives the purchase or mortgage money from Z. A cheats.

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4587-4593).
(2) Principle (4594).
(3) Meaning of Words (4595).
(4) What is Cheating (4596-4606).
(5) No Intention No Deception (4597).
(6) Fortune Telling (4598).
(7) Puffing Advertisement (4600).
(8) Misrepresentation (4601-4602).
(9) Overstating Weight (4603).
(10) Showing Better Sample (4604-4606).
(11) Mute Deception (4607).
(12) Deceiving must Induce (4608-4611).
(13) Attempt to Cheat (4611).
(14) Inducement must be Fraudulent or Dishonest (4612-4623).
(15) Meaning of "Fraudulently" (4612-4617).
(16) Omission to Disclose an Incumbrance (4618-4619).
(17) Inducement by Acts and Conduct (4624-4635).
(18) Inducement by Dishonest Acts (4625-4629).
(19) Subsequent Conduct (4630-4635).
(20) Delivery of Retention of Property (4636-4641).
(21) Meaning of "Property" (4638).

(22) Delivery or Retention must be Illegal (4639).
(23) Temporary Delivery Sufficient (4640).
(24) Inducement Too Remote (4642-4643).
(25) Indirect Inducement When Criminal (4644).
(26) Intentional Inducement (4645-4648).
(27) Harm When Too Remote (4647-4648).
(28) Dishonest Concealment (4649).
(29) Attempt: Abetment (4650-4655).
(30) Fraud by Post (4652).
(31) Abetment (4655).
(32) Immoral Contract (4656).

4587. Analogous Law.—Cheating was from very early times punishable under the English common law.[12] So a married woman executing a bail bond for one arrested on a bailable writ pretending to be a widow was punishable as a fraud on the Sheriff who had been thus defrauded.[13] Other cases treated as frauds are cases of swearing a false affidavit [14] or execution of a false instrument,[15] as by forging an order of discharge from jail or the like.[16] To the same class were relegated such offences as should now be classed as public nuisances, as the selling of unwholesome provisions lucri causa,[17] the using of false weights and mesures [18] or trade mark,[19] of bread mixed with alum,[20] the mala proxis of a physician, the rendering of false accounts [21] or a refusal to render an account,[22] frauds in connection with procuring and securing admission to the parish work-house [23] or enlistment into a regiment.[24] So voluntarily maiming oneself to attract charity or to prevent one's being impressed as a sailor or enlisted as a soldier was treated as an offence of the same kind.[25]

It will thus be seen that the conception of the offence in common law followed more the popular notion of cheating than what is now defined as constituting that offence under the Code. So Hawkins defined cheating to be those "deceitful practices in defrauding or endeavouring to defraud another of his known right by means of some artful device contrary to the plain rules of common honesty.[1] But the classification of forgery as a distinct offence was early recognised,[2] and latterly cheating was defined to be the fraudulent obtaining of the property of another by any deceitful and illegal practice or token short of felony which affects or may affect the public.[3]

(12) 2 East. P. C., c. 18, s. 4, p. 821; 2 Hawk. P. C., c. 22, ss. 1, 31, 39, citing Waterer v. Freeman, Holt 205 (266); Morley v. Harrison, Dy. 249; Nawbey, 6 T. R. 619 (635); Crossby, 7 T. R. 315.
(13) Blackburn, Trem. P. C. 101.
(14) Waterer v. Freeman, Holt 205 (266).
(15) Omealy v. Newell, 8 East. 364; Mawbey, 6 T. R. 619 (635).
(16) Fawcett's case, 2 East. P. C., c. 19 s. 7, p. 862.
(17) 4 Black 162; 2 East. P. C., c. 18, s. 4, p. 822; Pinkney's case, 2 East P. C. 820; Young, 3 T. R. 104.
(18) 2 East. P. C. 820.
(19) Edward's case, Trem. P. C. 1-103.
(20) Dixon, 4 Camp. 12; Dixon, 3 M. & S. 11.
(21) Dr. Groenvelt's case, 1 Ld. Raym. 213.
(22) Bembridge, 22 St. Tr. 1; Martin. 2 Camp. 269.
(23) Commings, 5 Mad. 179.
(24) The Minister of St. Botolph, 1 Black R. 443.
(25) Jone's case, 1 Leach 174.
(1) 1 Hawk. P. C., c. 55; 1 Holt P. C. 412; Co. Litt. 127-a.
(2) 1 Hawk. P. C., c. 71, s. 1.
(3) 2 East. P. C. 817; Ward's case, 2 Sr. 747.

4588. The view of the English common law thus was to regard the offence as cheating if it affected the public as against an individual merely, which was not indictable.(4) So an indictment of cheating which merely affected an individual in a private transaction, was quashed on the mere ground that it did not affect the public. Such was the case of the accused who had used a false bushel for measuring corn,(5) and one who had falsely described a gum of inferior quality as the gum seneca, and thus imposed on the purchaser,(6) or one who obtained money by falsely representing himself to have been sent by another and upon which Holt C. J., said: "Shall we indict one man for making a fool of another? Let him bring his action."(7) So on the same ground Lord Ellenborough, C. J., threw out an indictment against a miller who, having received good barley for grinding had substituted bad and musty barley which he fraudulently delivered to the owner as his own.(8)

4589. These provisions of the common law were in part supplemented by the Larceny Act which provided, "whosoever shall, by any false pretence, obtain from any other person any chattel, money or valuable security, with intent to defraud, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and being convicted thereof, shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for a term of not less than five years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement..."(9) The section goes on to provide that if on such an indictment the offence disclosed is larceny, the accused may be convicted of it, and that it was sufficient to support the indictment to prove that the accused did the act charged with an intent to defraud, it being unnecessary to establish an intent to defraud any particular person.

4590. It is thus obvious that the present section embraces cases clearly distinguishable from those which are classed as those of cheating under English law. In drafting it the framers appear to have taken an independent line, for though they acknowledged their general indebtedness to the laws of England and France, they said: "There is no offence in the Code with which we have found it so difficult to deal as the offence of cheating. It is evident that the practising of intentional deceit for purposes of gain ought not always to be punished. It will hardly be disputed that a person who defrauds a banker by presenting a forged cheque, or who sells ornaments of paste as diamonds, may with propriety be made liable to severe penalties. On the other hand, to punish every defendant who obtains pecuniary favours by false professions of attachment to a patron; every legacy-hunter who obtains a bequest by cajoling a rich testator; every debtor who moves the compassion of his creditors by overcharged pictures of his misery; every practitioner who, in his appeals to the charitable, represents his distresses as wholly unmerited, when he knows that he

(4) 2 East. P. C. 818.
(5) Pinkney's case, 2 East. P. C., c. 18, s. 2, p. 818.
(6) Lewis, Say. 205.
(7) Jones, 1 Salk. 379. To the same effect, Byran, 2 Str. 866; Lara, 6 T. R. 565; Gibbes, 1 East. R. 185.
(8) Haynes, 4 U. & S. 214.
(9) 24 & 25 Vict., c. 96, s. 88.

has brought them on himself by intemperance and profusion, would be highly inexpedient. In fact, if all the misrepresentations in which men indulge for the purpose of gaining at the expense of others, were made crimes, not a day would pass in which many thousands of buyers and sellers would not incur the penalties of the law.

It happens hourly that an article which is worth ten rupees is affirmed by the seller to be cheap at twelve rupees, and by the buyer to be dear at eight rupees. The seller comes down to eleven rupees and declares that to be his last word; the buyer rises to nine, and says that he will go no higher; the seller falsely pretends that the article is unusually good of its kind, the buyer that it is unusually bad of its kind; the seller that the price is likely soon to rise, the buyer that it is likely soon to fall. Here we have deceptions practised for the sake of gain, yet no judicious legislator would punish these deceptions A very large part of the ordinary business of life is conducted all over the world, and nowhere more than in India, by means of a conflict of skill, in the course of which deception to a certain extent perpetually takes place. The moralist may regret this; but the legislator sees that the result of the attempts of the buyer and seller to gain an unfair advantage over each other is that, in the vast majority of cases, articles are sold for the prices which it is desirable that they should fetch, and therefore, he does not think it necessary to interfere. It is enough for him to know that all this great mass of falsehood practically produces the same effect which would be produced by truth; and that any law directed against such falsehood would in all probability be a dead letter, and would, if carried into rigorous execution, do more mischief in a month than all the lies which are told in the making of bargains throughout all the bazars of India produced in a century.(10)

4591. So far the view here enunciated coincide with the English common law under which a cheat or fraud, in order to be indictable, must be such against which common prudence could not have guarded.(11) All these cases have been also excluded from the section, which embraces only such cases of cheating as involve not only deception but also either dishonesty or fraud. So the framers wrote: "We propose to make it cheating, to obtain property by deception in all cases where the property is fraudulently obtained; that is to say, in all cases where the intention of the person who has by deceit obtained the property, was to cause a distribution of property which the law pronounces to be a wrongful distribution and in no other case whatever. However immoral a deception may be, we do not consider it as an offence against the rights of property if its object is only to cause a distribution of property which the law recognizes as rightful.

"A few examples will show the way in which this principle will operate.

"A intentionally deceives Z into a belief that he is strongly attached to Z. A thus induces Z to make a will, by which a large legacy is left to A. Here A's conduct is immoral and scandalous.

(10) Note N, Reprint, p. 163. Buller, J., in Young, 3 Tr. 99 (104).
(11) 1 Hawk, P. C., c. 71, s. 1; per

But still A has a legal right on Z's death to receive the legacy. Even if the clearest proof of A's insincerity are laid before a tribunal, even if A in open Court avows his insincerity, the will cannot, on that account, be set aside. The gain, therefore, which A obtains under Z's will is not in the legal sense of the expression, wrongful gain. He has practised deception; he has thus caused gain to himself and loss to others; but that gain is a gain to which the civil law declares him entitled, which the civil law will assist him to recover if it be withheld from him; that loss is a loss with which the civil law declares that the losers must put up; A, therefore, has not committed the offence of cheating under our definition.

"But suppose that the civil law should contain, and we think that it ought to contain a provision declaring null a will made in favour of strangers, by a testator who erroneously believed his children to be dead; and suppose that A intentionally deceives Z into a belief that Z's only son has been lost at sea, and by this deception induces Z to make a will by which everything is left to A: here the case will be different. The will being null, any property which A could obtain under that will would be property which he had no legal right so to obtain, and to which another person had a legal right. The object of A has, therefore, been wrongful gain to himself, attended with wrongful loss to another party. A has, therefore, under our definition, been guilty of cheating.

"Whether the principle on which this part of the law is framed be a sound principle, is a question which will be best determined by examining, first, whether our definition excludes anything that ought to be included, and secondly, whether it includes anything that ought to be excluded.

"It can scarcely, we think, be contended that our definition excludes anything that ought to be included; for surely, it would be unreasonable to punish as an offence against the right of property, an act which has caused, and was intended to cause a distribution of property which the law declares to be right and refuses to disturb. If such an act be an offence, it must be an offence on some ground distinct from the effect which it produces on the state of property. Thus, if a person to whom a debt is due, thinking that he shall obtain payment more easily if he assumes the appearance of being in the public service, wears a badge of office which he has no right to wear when he goes to make his demand, he is guilty of this offence; but if he gains only what he has no legal right to retain, he is not a wrongdoer as respects property, inasmuch as he has only rectified a wrong distribution of property.

"Indeed, it appears to us that there is the strongest objection to punishing a man for a deception, and yet allowing him to retain what he has gained by that deception. What the civil law ought to say may be doubtful, but there can be no doubt that the civil and criminal law ought to say the same thing; that the one ought not to invite while other repels that the Code ought not to be divided against itself. To send a person to prison for obtaining a sum of money, and yet to suffer him to keep that sum of money, is to hold out at once motives to deter and motives to incite. Humanity requires that punishment should be the last resource employed only when no other means can be found of producing the desired effect. Penal laws clearly ought not to be made for the prevention of deception, if deception, could be prevented by means of the Civil Code. To tempt men, therefore, to receive by means of the Civil Code, and then to punish them for deceiving, is contrary to every sound principle.[12]

4592. The framers then went on to add that their definition did not exclude any case of deception which ought to be punished as cheating. On the other hand, it includes many cases of cheating which are so punishable under English law such are, for instance, cases of loans obtained by false representation with no intention of repayment,[13] obtaining an advantage of money on a false promise to render service or deliver goods which the promisor never intended to make good,[14] or where a person receives payment by falsely asserting that he had performed the work for which he was hired.[15] The Code punishes these acts, as being infractions of a legal right effected by deliberate dishonesty.

4593. The section is very widely worded, and it was objected to at the time, on the ground that it was likely to bring within the vortex of its text a host of trivial illegal acts which were in no sense criminal. The case assumed in illustration (f) was especially singled out as "of a quality to excite ridicule."[16] This was no doubt a startling innovation on the accepted doctrine of common law, but the framers knew it and they gave weighty reasons in support of their clause, for if a civil debtor was liable to imprisonment for non-payment of debt why should one escape, who had voluntarily and by wilful deceit obtained a loan which he does not pay, because he never meant to pay it? This was the view of the English Law Commissioners[17] and it strengthened the hands of the Legislature in retaining the clause in spite of the adverse criticism to which it was exposed. Indeed, the defect in the English law in this respect was itself rectified in 1869, by the Debtors' Act,[18] which made the incurring of any debt or liability "under false pretences or by means of any other fraud" punishable as a misdemeanour.

4594. Principle.—The offence of cheating must, like that of extortion, be committed by the wrongful obtaining of consent. The difference is, that the extortioner obtains the consent by intimidation, and the cheat by deception. In both cases there is wrongful gain or loss, and in both cases the act is done to induce delivery of property. The two offences are thus essentially the same, though the modus operandi of the offender in the two cases necessarily differs. The offence is here subdivided into (i) cheating by representation, and (ii) cheating by personation; and of these two, law regards the latter as more serious. It also considers it an aggravation to cheat one whose interest the cheat was legally

(12) Note N, Reprint, pp. 164-166.
(13) Ill. (f).
(14) Ill. (g).
(15) Ill. (h).
(16) First Rep., s. 581.
(17) Fourth Rep., p. 43.
(18) 32 & 33 Vict., c. 62, s. 13.

bound to protect. The distinction between sections 417 and 420 has been, moreover, held to turn upon the delivery of property as the result of cheating, and the success attending the act may thus be regarded as another element of aggravation.

4595. Meaning of Words.—"By deceiving any person": The word "deceiving" means causing to believe what is not true. It implies a misrepresentation inducing belief, and such misrepresentation may be by an act or omission.(19) "Fraudulently or dishonestly": "Dishonestly" is defined in section 24 and "fraudulently" in section 25. "Induces the person so deceived to deliver any property": Inducement and not delivery of the property would seem to be the gist of the crime.(20) That inducement may relate to delivery or retention of property, or the doing of or omitting to do anything which he would not have, but for the inducement, done. The property in this section has been held to mean only moveable property.(21) "Or intentionally induces, etc.": The word "intentionally" only qualifies the second clause as the words "fraudulently" or "dishonestly" qualify the first clause.(22) But this view if pushed to its logical end, might at times lead to awkward result. See the subject discussed under section 419, post. The second clause is intended to cover cases like those assumed in illustrations (f) to (i). "And which act or omission causes damage or harm": This means that the inducement must result in a harmful act though unconnected with the delivery or retention of property. "A dishonest concealment of fact is a deception:" Fraud is defined to be "suppressio veri, suggestio falsi." A dishonest concealment may be either.

4596. What is Cheating?—The terms of this definition of cheating are so wide as to include almost any case of misrepresentation. And as the section is worded even the intent to deceive is not material, though without such intention the section would include a host of deceptions which, as the authors noted, were the common incidents of every bazar in India (§ 4590). The question of criminality must then be limited with reference to the "deceiving" which is the mental act constituting the scienter in this offence. What is then deceiving as used in this context? Ordinarily, term "deceiving" means(23) nothing more or less than cheating. But the sense in which it has been used here, would seem to imply an act by which another is led into error or made to believe what is false or disbelieve what is true. It no doubt and necessarily implies fraud, but it is fraud which operates upon the conviction of another's mind which prompts him to action, taking on trust the existence of facts which in reality do not exist.

No Intention No Deception.

4597. But such deception may be innocent or fraudulent. The former is, of course, necessarily excluded from the operation of this rule. So an overcharge made by mistake, could not be held to constitute cheating if there was no dishonesty or fraud.(24) So where on an auction-sale

(19) Giles, 34 L. J. M. C. 50; Khoda Bux v. Bokeya Mundari, 32 C. 941; see Explanation.

(20) Bavaji, (1875) B. U. C. 96.

(21) Abdul Ahad, (1882) A. W. N. 6.

(22) Nandlal, (1888) P. R. No. 36; Mahabat, (1889) P. R. No. 20, F. B.; Ahmada, (1914) P. R. No. 9, 27 I. C. 203.

(23) From Lat. decipere, to catch, to ensnare—to deceive.

(24) Nathuram Naranji, 4 Bom. L. R. 442 (Head-note is inaccurate), of waste paper held in the office of the Accountant-General the accused, who was a Daftari in the office, bid for its purchase under an assumed name, and the sale was concluded in his favour, whereupon he was prosecuted for cheating, the Court held that as there was no rule prohibiting the purchase of such waste paper by an employee of the department, the accused committed no offence in bidding in an assumed name.(25) There is, indeed, nothing wrong in assuming a false name: many people of distinction travel incognito for the sake of privacy and quiet. But it is wrong to use that name fraudulently.

So if A goes to a Bank under the name of B, knowing that B has credit there, and in that name cashes a cheque drawn by himself as B, A would be guilty of cheating B, though it would be otherwise if A's disguise was innocent, as if A had credit at the Bank and drew a cheque believing that the Bank knew of his alias. If there is an intention to cheat, cheating may be committed under any circumstance, whether in business or at play, the latter being expressly enacted an offence under English law.(1) So cardsharpers and tricksters are clearly within this rule. But in such a case, the evidence adduced must establish fraud or dishonesty. This may be done by establishing collusion between the players to defraud one, as in the case of the accused who inveigled the prosecutor to deposit twenty guineas on a bet that he could not successfully guess three times successively the hiding place of a half-penny by another of the prisoner under a pot. The two prisoners were found to have conspired to rob the prosecutor and they were held to have been rightly convicted of larceny.(2)

Fortune-Telling.

4598. The question whether money made by fortune-telling, and by persons professing to forecast the future by means of cards, caligraphy, phrenology and photographs, raises a somewhat similar question. But it has been held that if the accused believed in what he professed, he could not be convicted of cheating, though that offence would be committed if it was merely a device used for practising deception. The prisoner, a gipsy woman, told the prosecutor that she could raise spirits and lay them, that some property had been left for the prosecutor, which she had been cheated of and that the prisoner could recover it for her. The prosecutor believed her and put half a crown on a certain spot in a book shown to her by the prisoner. She then went away promising to call the next day which she did and then she said that the money she wanted was not her husband's but her own, which the prosecutor gave her amounting to £10. 9*s*. 4*d*. She then demanded a shift to wrap the money in and a shawl to cover it, which were lent her on her promising to return them. Other articles were also similarly lent. The prisoner had been promised £5 for her trouble. She never returned. It was held that if the original intention of the prisoner was merely to practise witchcraft, in which she might believe although it was afterwards altered, there would be no larceny. But, if it was a mere trick to get the property with no intention to return it, it was larceny.(3)

(25) Kutub Ali, (1902) A. W. N. 151, (1903) A. W. N. 231.

(1) Gaming Act, 1815 (8 & 9 Vict., c. 109), s. 17: "Every person who shall by any fraud or unlawful device or ill practice in playing at or with cards, dice, tables, or other games or in bearing a part of the stakes, wages or adventures, or in betting on the sides or hands of them that do play, or in wagering on the event of any game, sport, pastime, or exercise, win from any other person, to himself at any other or others—any sum of money or valuable thing, shall be deemed guilty of obtaining such money or valuable thing from such other person by a false pretence, with intent to cheat or defraud such person of the same, and being convicted thereof shall be punished accordingly."

(2) Robson, R. & R. 413. In other cases the question turned upon whether what was parted with was property or merely possession. It being held that if the prosecutor parted with the property under a belief that the money had been fairly won there could then be no larceny; Nicholson, 2 Leach 610; Riley, 1 Cox 98. But these cases imply that the greater the fraud, the less is the chance of the accused being brought to book.

4599. In another case, the prosecutrix went to the prisoner to exercise her power to bring her back her husband who had deserted her. She took some clothes and money and promised to bring her husband back by a certain day, but which, of course, she failed to do, and whereupon she was prosecuted for false pretence, and Erle, C. J., told the jury: "The first question is whether the indictment is good. I take it that the pretence that the prisoner had the power to bring back her husband to the prosecutrix is the material part of the indictment. Now, the pretence of power, whether moral, physical, or super-natural, made with intent to obtain money, is within the mischief of the law, and sufficient to constitute an offence within the language of the Statute.... Then the question is, was there evidence of a false pretence of an existing fact that the prisoner had the power to bring the husband back when the money was obtained. It was contended that the prosecution ought not to succeed, because the evidence was that the prisoner said that she would bring the prosecutrix's husband back, and that after the prisoner had got the property she said she could bring the husband back, and that there was, therefore, a promissory pretence only.(4) It is clear that an indictable pretence must precede the obtaining of the money, so that it can be alleged that the money was obtained by means of the pretence. The exact words of that part of the evidence favour the argument of the prisoner's counsel; but I have come to the conclusion that we ought not to sustain the objection, because the whole tenor of the evidence is to be regarded, and it may be upon the evidence that the prisoner intended to convey to the mind of the prosecutrix that she had not only the will but the power to bring her husband back. The whole of the evidence was to be regarded by the jury, and they were to consider whether the prisoner intended to pretend to the prosecutrix, and to induce her to believe, that she, at that time, had the power to bring her husband back, and that she did actually so pretend."(5) The learned Judge then held that the evidence clearly justified the finding that the prisoner was an impostor and her conviction was consequently affirmed. Following the principle of these cases the accused was convicted in a case in which he had induced the prosecutor to believe that God had ordered him to pay him Rs. 300.(6)

Puffing Advertisement.

4600. So a trickster who finds a dupe to believe in his power to convert a currency note into one of a higher denomination, commits the same offence, because he deceives him into a belief in his power and thereby induces delivery of property. In all such cases, there is both deceit and dishonesty or fraud. But there may be all these elements and yet no

(3) Bunce, 1 F. & F. 523.
(4) In England a promissory pretence is not indictable, but in this respect the rule here enacted is wider.
(5) Giles, 10 Cox 44.
(6) Doraiswamy, 48 M. 774.

cheating, as in the case of a tradesman puffing his goods and thereby inducing the public to pay for them a price they would not have otherwise paid. The framers of the Code evidently intended to exclude all trade advertisements from the operation of the rule, for they wrote: "However censurable, in a moral point of view, the deceptions practised by both may have been, yet those deceptions were intended to produce a distribution of property strictly legal. Neither the buyer nor the seller, therefore, has been guilty of cheating; but if the seller has produced a sample of the article, and has falsely assured the buyer that the article corresponds to that sample, the case is different if the article does not correspond to the sample, and the buyer is entitled to have the purchase-money back. The seller has taken and kept the purchase-money without having a legal right to take or keep it, and it may be recovered from him by a legal proceeding. His gain is therefore wrongful, and is attended with wrongful loss to the buyer; he is therefore guilty of cheating under the definition. So if the seller passes off ornaments of paste on the buyer for diamonds, the price which the seller receives is a price to which he has no right, which the buyer may recover from him by an action. Here, therefore, the object of the seller has been wrongful gain attended with wrongful loss to the buyer; the seller is therefore guilty of cheating. So if the buyer, intending to acquire possession of the goods without paying for them, induces the seller by deception to take a note which the buyer knows will be dishonoured, the buyer is guilty of cheating. His object is to retain in his own possession, money which he is legally bound to pay to the seller. The gain which he makes by retaining the money is wrongful gain, and it is attended with wrongful loss to the seller; he is, therefore, within the definition."(7)

Misrepresentation.

4601. The question whether a misrepresentation amounts to a statement of fact or is merely an expression of opinion, would seem to determine the difference between liability and non-liability. The rule is the same in civil law, for mere words of commendation do not amount to warranty: Simplex commendatio non obligat.(8) The prisoner went to pawn certain spoons with the prosecutor and obtained a larger advance for them, on the strength of his assurance that they were of the best quality, being equal to Elkington's A, that the foundation was of the best material and that they had as much silver upon them as Elkington's A. The spoons were in fact of an inferior make and the jury found that the prosecutor had been induced to make the large advance he did owing to the false declaration of the prisoner. But on a case reserved it was held that the exaggeration of the quality of one's goods could not be held to be indictable, Cockburn, C. J., adding: "It seems to me to make all the difference whether the man who is selling merely represents, as in this instance it appears he did, the articles to be better in point of quality than they really are, or whether he represents them to be entirely different to what they really are.....Here if the prisoner had represented these articles as being of Elkington's manufacture, when in point of fact they were not, and he knew it, that would be a different thing; but the representation

(7) Note H. Reprint, pp. 164, 165.

(8) "A simple recommendation creates no warranty"; Da Costa v. Deefholts, 29 C. W. N. 362, 86 I. C. 985, (1925) C. 605 here made was only a vaunting or exaggerating of the value of the article in which he was dealing, by representing it to be in quality equal to a particular manufacture."[9] This view was concurred in by the majority of the Judges,[10] but there was a notable dissent,[11] Willes, J., observing: "It appears that the persons who made the advances were thereby defrauded, and thereby induced to make the advances, and the jury have found that the statements were known by the prisoner to be untrue, and that in consequence of these statements he obtained the money mentioned in the indictment. It appears to me that for all practical purposes that ought to be taken to be a sufficient fact, coming within the region of assertion and calculation, and not mere opinion, and that it should be considered as a false pretence." Though his view was not acceptable to the majority of the Judges, they conceded that there may be cases where even a mere expression of opinion may be indictable.

So Coleridge, J., said: "It would be a dangerous thing to say that there could be no fraudulent misrepresentation within the Statute, in the course of an ordinary transaction of buying and selling. I think it may as often occur in the course of a real transaction of buying and selling as in any other way; but in order to determine whether a fraudulent misrepresentation is or is not within the Statute, I think you must look, among other things to the extent to which it goes, and the subject matter to which it is applied. It seems to me to be a safe rule to say, where it applies simply to the quality, and is only in the nature of an exaggeration on the one hand, or a depreciation on the other, which too frequently takes place even in tolerably honest transactions, this is not the subject of a criminal proceeding." But as Crompton, J., puts it "Where the thing sold is of an entirely different description from what it is represented to be and of no value whatever, as where a man passes off a chain of base metal for gold or silver, and the buyer really gets nothing for his money, the Statute applied." Such was the case of the prisoner who took eleven thimbles for pawn and on being questioned by the pawnbroker if they were silver asserted that they were and upon which they were tested and proved to be of base metal, it was held that the prisoner was rightly convicted of obtaining money by false pretences.[12] In such a case, the fact that a precious metal entered into the composition of an article is not sufficient to exonerate the accused if his representation was in substance false and he knew it.

4602. The accused represented that the figure "18" on a watch indicated that it was made of 18 carat gold, which he knew it was not, and whereupon he was convicted though he was able to show that some gold had entered into its composition.[13] Such was the case of the prisoner who sold a chain fraudulently representing it to be a 15 carat gold, whereas in fact it was only a trifle better than 6 carat in quality, it was held that the statement that the chain was 15-carat gold was not a mere laudation

(9) John Bryan, 26 L. J. M. C. 85.

(10) Lord Campbell, C. J., Pollock, C. B., Coleridge, J., Cresswell, J., Earle J., Crompton, J., Crowder, J., Watson, B. and Chanell, J.

(11) Willes, J., who differed stating that his view was shared by Jervis C. J.; and with whom Bramwell, B., concurred.

(12) (1842) Ball, C. & M. 249, overruling Tabram, C. & M. 251; (mentioned by counsel in Ball, C. & M. 249,: followed in Roebuck, D. & B. 24; Steven 1 Cox, 83.

(13) Sutor, 10 Cox 577.

but a warranty as to a fact within his knowledge and as such constituted a false pretence.(14) The prisoner went about hawking blacking bottles advertised as "Everett's Premier," which was a make of repute which the bottles sold were not. His bottles bore a label which was a colourable imitation of the label used on Everett's blacking, the only difference noticeable between the two being in the address which was stated at "Queen's Court" instead of King's Court which was the address on the genuine article. The prisoner gave himself out as Everett's agent. The prosecutor's case was that he had purchased the bottle taking it to be Everett's; the defence was that the bottle was sold on approval and that the prosecutor having had the option to retain or return it, he was not cheated as he might have returned it if he was not satisfied with it. But Earle, J., told the jury that the offer to sell on approval might be intended to put the prosecutor off his guard; but the actual bargain was for cash, which was paid, and the sale completed. As to the difference between the labels the jury would consider whether it was a small and colourable difference only, and intended to deceive. It was of little consequence whether the man's name was Everete, as he had stated, or not; for even if it were, and he went about the country and offered blacking for sale as "Everett's Premier," representing it to be the well-kown article of that name, knowing that it was not so, and intending to cheat the prosecutor by passing upon him a spurious article as the true one, his conduct was equally fraudulent."(15)

Overstating Weight.

4603. The case is the same if the prisoner overstated the quantity of the goods sold by weight. The prisoner sold the prosecutrix a load of coals which he represented to weigh eighteen hundred weight, but which in fact weighed only fourteen hundred weight; it was held that the prisoner having overstated the quantity by four hundred weight more and having received its price for the same, was guilty of fraudulent representation. So Pollock, C. B., put the following case; "If the bargaining and selling being entirely over, goods were to be transferred from the seller to the buyer, upon payment of the price, and the seller were to go and demand payment, and fraudulently name an amount different from that agreed on, and that false representation was for the purpose of obtaining money which was not in fact due for the goods, and the seller did thereby obtain it, he would be guilty of obtaining money by false pretences."(16) Such a case is not unlike the case supposed by Jervis, C. J., who said: "Supposing a person employed a man on a contract to do ditching at one shilling a yard; and the man came at the end of the week and said, 'I have done 5,000 yards,' whereas he had only done 1,000, and thereby gets the money, he is guilty of obtaining it by false pretences."(17)

Showing Better Sample.

4604. A person who shows one sample and then sells goods of inferior quality guaranteeing them to be as per sample, is clearly guilty of cheating. For the sample is shown to induce consent to the sale and the (14) Jahn Ardley, 12 Cox 23.

(15) Dundas, (1853) 6 Cox 380; Smith, D. & B. 566.

(16) Sherwood, (1857) D. & B. 251 overruling contra in Read, 7 C. & P. 848, in which a lie told in trade was held to be exempt from punishment.

(17) Ragg, (1860) Bell C. C. 214; cf, per Bramwell, B., in Ridgway, (1862) 3 F. & F. 838.

inferior goods are sold to make wrongful gain, which constitutes dishonesty. In such cases, the disparity between the sample and the goods sold may be small, but if it makes a difference in their respective values, there is wrongful gain. In England several cases have been decided in which the prisoner had sold cheese giving cheese of superior quality to taste, the difference between the sample and the goods sold being in one case one penny or two pence a pound,[18] in other cases the precise difference was not ascertained, but the result was held to be unaffected by it.[19]

4605. This offence may equally be committed by a person standing to another in a fiduciary relationship such as attorney and client. So where the accused appeared as an attorney for the prosecutor before a Magistrate who fined the prosecutor £ 2 and whereupon the attorney went to the prosecutor's wife and falsely assured her that the Magistrate had inflicted the same fine upon another person at the same time but had afterwards relented to reducing it to £ 1 on his offering it, and that he should try the same plan for the prosecutor if she gave him £ 1 and which she did, but the attorney misappropriated the money and never made the application he had promised. It afterwards appeared that his story to the prosecutor's wife was a myth, and it was held that the money was obtained by false pretence.[20] Such a case may arise where an attorney or pleader induces the client to part with his money on the pretext of requiring it to bribe the judge or pay in court-fees or for a like purpose in the course of his duties.

4606. On the other hand, where the accused described a certain plot of land as "situated in a hollow" on the faith of which the Commissioner sanctioned its sale at a lower rate. The Magistrate found that his report though false was not dishonest, and thereupon his discharge was ultimately upheld,[21] though no reference was made to the fact that the report related to immoveable property with which the offence has no concern.[22]

4607. Mute Deception.—It is not necessary that the deception should be by the express words or visible representation, for it may be equally practised by conduct or implied in the transaction itself. The accused delivered a cheque in payment of goods without informing the payee that he had no balance to his credit. He was held guilty of this offence.[23] The complainant had executed a zur-i-peshgi mortgage of his land in favour of the accused. He paid him the amount due thereon and asked him for the return of his security. The accused returned a bond which the complainant repudiated as not his own, and who insisted upon the return of his lease. As the accused would not return it, he was prosecuted for this offence and the lower Courts found that the complainant had not executed the bond which the accused had offered to return to him, that is, in any case the money was paid to disencumber the land, and that the accused dishonestly refused to return the mortgage-deed, upon which the High Court held that inasmuch as the accused gave the complainant to understand that he would return the mortgage-deed on receipt of the

(18) Dark, 1 Den. C. C. 276.
(19) Garlick, 1 Den. C. C. 276; Abbott, 1 Den. C. C. 273; Goss, Bell C. C. 208; Pratt, 8 Cox 334.
(20) Asterley, 7 C. Q. & P. 191.
(21) Kaka, 5 S. L. R. 95; 12 I. C. 641.
(22) Abdul Ahad, (1882) A. W. N. 6.
(23) Martindale, 52 C. 347 (370).

money and on the faith of which he paid the amount, the subsequent refusal of the accused to return it was manifestly dishonest. And since the accused had deceived the complainant by his previous attitude into a belief that his bond would be returned on payment, the conduct of the accused clearly fell within the terms of this section.[24] In this case the accused had made no express promise to return the deed, but the Court held it to be immaterial, for one may as much deceive another by express words as by acts and conduct.

The same view was taken in another case in which the accused who was the pledgee of the complainant's jewels, received the payment made to redeem it, after which he refused to deliver the jewels, and claimed to have appropriated the payment towards another unsecured debt. It was shown that the payment was made to redeem the jewels, and that it would not have been made if the complainant had not been assured of the delivery of his jewellery. It was held that if the accused had made the pretence of returning the jewellery on the faith of which the complainant paid the money, he was clearly guilty of this offence. But if the accused had not made this pretence, but had at the time of receiving payment intended to restore the jewellery but afterwards changed his mind and failed to restore it, then he would not have been guilty of cheating but only of a breach of contract.[25] The following case is a barefaced example of cheating. The accused's immoveable property was attached and advertised for sale. He had applied for permission to raise the decretal amount by private transfer, but his application was rejected. Nevertheless he falsely represented to one A that he had received the Court's sanction, and A thereupon advanced him Rs. 1,000. In ordinary course the house was sold and the accused withdrew the surplus sale-proceeds. He was convicted of cheating as he deserved to be.[1] The same fate befell a minor who raised a loan upon assurances given that he had attained majority which induced lenders to make loans which the minor had no intention to repay.[2]

4608. Deceiving must Induce.—It is of the essence of this offence that the deceit must induce the person deceived to do any of the acts mentioned in the section. But the inducement need not have been wholly due to the deceit independent of other auxiliary causes. It was so held by Bovil, C. J., who said: "The second point reserved was, whether a charge of obtaining goods by false pretences can be sustained when the prosecutor admits that another circumstance influenced his mind in parting with his goods, as well as the alleged false pretence. It has been long settled that it is immaterial that the prosecutor was influenced by other circumstances than the false pretence charged. If that were not so, an indictment for false pretence could scarcely ever be maintained, as a tradesman is generally more or less influenced by the profit he expects to make upon the transaction."[3] Nor is it necessary that the deception should have been such as was sufficient to deceive a man of ordinary prudence.

---

(24) Khoda Bux v. Bakeya Mundari, 32 C. 941.

(25) Sheodurshun Dass, 3 N. W. P. H. C. R. 17.

(1) Ramchand v. Jai Dial, (1915) P. W. R. 18, 30 I. C. 641.

(2) Sada Ram, 18 A. L. J. 408, 58 I C. 253, 21 Cr. L. J. 749.

(3) Lince, 12 Cox. 451, following Hewgill, Dears C. C. 315.

For it is enough if it deceived the accused, though it might have been wholly inadequate to deceive another. It was argued in a case that the deception was such as was unlikely to impose on a man of ordinary caution, whereupon Lord Denman, C. J., said: "I never could see why that should be so. Suppose a man has just art enough to impose upon a very simple person, and defraud him. How is it to be determined whether the degree of fraud is such as shall amount to a misdemeanour? Who is to give the measure?....There are indeed cases, where the pretence is so very foolish, that it is difficult to say that an imposition is practised; but still who is to give the measure?"(4)

4609. The question in such cases is, therefore, not whether the deception could have imposed upon an ordinary mind, but whether it did impose upon the mind of the person deceived. That is the question—the sole question in the case, though the quantum and nature of the deception might be looked at to see if the prosecutor was in fact deceived. This dispenses with the necessity of proving ordinary prudence or caution on the part of the prosecutor. So Alderson, B., told the jury in a case: "If a man represents as an existing fact that which is not an existing fact, and so gets your money, that is a false pretence; for instance, that a certain church had been built, and that there was a debt still due for the building, when there was no debt due, that would be a false pretence; yet the matter might easily be inquired into and ascertained."(5) The prisoner gave an Irish one-pound note to the prosecutrix for changing, saying it was a five-pound note. As a matter of fact it was only a pound-note and the word "one" was clearly printed at each corner and the words "one pound" were also printed in the centre. The prosecutrix gave it to her mother without examining it, who again did not look at it, but gave the change for £ 5. Both the mother and daughter were literate, and it was objected that there was no deception as they could have ascertained the truth if they had only used ordinary prudence, but on a case reserved the conviction was upheld on the ground that as the prosecutrix gave the change trusting in the misrepresentation of the accused, the latter had obtained the money by false pretences, whatever imprudence the other party might have betrayed.(6)

So where the prisoner produced a £ 5 note of a bankrupt bank for change, and the prosecutor accepted it in ignorance of the bankruptcy, and gave the change asked for, the Court held it to be a case for conviction, though there was no formal proof of the bankruptcy of the bank by production of the bankruptcy proceedings, though there was evidence that the bank had stopped payments forty years ago and had not resumed business.(7) The prisoner in another case had sent the two halves of a good note to two different tradesmen on the same day as a security for the goods he intended for. He was indicted for obtaining goods by false pretences, but it was held that as there was no direct promise in either of the letters accompanying the half-notes that the other half would be forwarded, the indictment could not be sustained.(8)

(4) Wickham, 10 Ad. & E. 34.
(5) Wooley, 1 Den. C. C. 559.
(6) Jessop, D. & B. 442; Bryan, D. & B. 265.
(7) Per Cockburn, C. J., Dowey, 37 L. J. M. C. 52; Flint, R. & R. 460; Evans, Bell C. C. 187.
(8) Masterson, 2 Cox. 100.

It is cheating if the steward of a club should present a bill for a larger sum than was actually owing by the prosecutor and thereupon the prosecutor pays the amount of the bill out of which the accused misappropriates the excess paid.(9) The same principle runs through the case of a workman claiming a large amount of wages for the work done than were actually earned by him.(10)

4610. But such a case is clearly distinguishable from one in which a false claim is made, but it is discovered before it is met, or where again, the making of an exaggerated claim may as conceivably be due to mistake or negligence as to an active fraud intended to deceive. The accused who was a Marwari cloth merchant had had dealings with the prosecutrix, to whom he had supplied cloth from time to time. In his bill he included an item of claim on account of the price of cloth alleged to have been supplied to the prosecutrix. The latter admitted having received the cloth, but afterwards returned it to the accused which was proved. It was held to be no case of cheating.(11) But a person who sees through the deception can scarcely be said to have been induced. The prisoner was employed to cut chaff for the prosecution at 2*d*. per fan. He had cut and removed eighteen fans which he piled on the heap of other chaff to the knowledge of the prosecutor, to whom, however, he represented having cut sixty-three fans and for which he demanded payment. The prosecutor met his claim and then prosecuted him, but on a case reserved it was held that the prisoner had not obtained the money by means of false pretence, for the prosecutor knew it was false, and therefore it was not the false pretence that induced him to part with his money.(12) The accused requested the complainant to receive bets on credit promising to pay up his losses, if any, punctually on the settling day. He failed to pay up as promised. His conviction was quashed on the ground that while there was no doubt that the accused had deceived the complainant, the evidence fell short of proving that it had induced the acceptance of his bets; since it is possible that if the complainant had not accepted them on credit the accused might not have offered any bets at all.(13) In short, this case is little distinguishable from those in which the creditor makes the loan upon the debtor's promise to repay it which he afterwards fails to do.

Attempt to Cheat.

4611. But in one case it was held that though in such case there may be no cheating, still there may be an attempt to cheat, for which the accused may be convicted. In this case the accused sent two half currency notes of Rs. 20 each enclosed with a letter in which he claimed the amount due thereon, alleging that the other halves of the notes had been lost. On receipt of this claim the currency office made a search and discovered that the other halves of the notes in question had been already cashed and cancelled. The prosecutor stated that after this he was satisfied

(9) Wooley, 1 Den. C. C. 559.
(10) Leonard, 1 Den. C. C. 304.
(11) Baijnath Ram v. Burgess, 5 C. W. N. 255.
(12) Mills, D. & B. 205.
(13) Bhedwar v. Rao, 27 C. W. N. 919, 74 I. C. 76, 24 Cr. L. J. 748.

that the claim was false and that the accused was attempting to cheat, and for which he wanted the accused to commit himself. He therefore sent him the usual D form of inquiry containing a set of questions to be answered by the accused, which he did declaring that the other halves of the notes had been lost from his box in December 1887. As a matter of fact the other halves had been discharged in 1871. The story of the accused was therefore palpably false and the question arose what offence he had committed. It was held that the fact that there was no possibility of inducing the prosecutor to sanction payment only showed that the offence was not cheating. But "a man may attempt to cheat, although the person he attempts to cheat is forewarned, and is, therefore, not cheated." The case was thus held to be an attempt to commit this offence. It was contended for the accused that his first letter of demand was a mere preparation and not an attempt, but the Court held that though it was so, still the form D filled in by the accused was a formal claim made, which so far as he was concerned completed the only act he was required to do to complete the demand. It was, therefore, an attempt and not merely a preparation.(14) And this view accords with English Law.(15)

4612. Inducement must be Fraudulent or Dishonest.—Again though a person may deceive and another may be deceived still it will not amount to this offence unless the inducement is fraudulent or dishonest. These words have been the subject of separate consideration (§§ 243-260), but their force in this connection requires to be again examined. The word "fraudulently" is defined in section 25 as meaning "to defraud," but as the Code does not define what it is to "defraud," the definition is defective inasmuch as it is content to define one word by another itself requiring a definition.(16) However, as has been elsewhere pointed out, the term "fraudulently" has been obviously used in the Code in a sense distinct from "dishonestly." It does not necessarily imply wrongful gain or loss, but rather merely deception or artific caused or used intentionally (§§ 255-263). The term "dishonestly" is clear, for it means the causing of wrongful gain or wrongful loss as those terms have been defined in section 23 (§§ 227-239).

Meaning of Fraudulently.

4613. It will be observed that these words do not control the whole section, which is divided into two distinct clauses, of which the second provides for the case of a person who by deceiving another intentionally induces the person so deceived to do an act which causes or is likely to cause damage or harm, although the deceiver has not acted fraudulently.(17) Reserving this branch of the case for subsequent consideration, the use of the terms "fraudulently" and "dishonestly" will be found to be associated only with the delivery or retention of property. Now the term "fraudulently" being used in juxta-position with "dishonestly" must mean something akin to and yet different

(14) Umesh Chunder Mitter, 16 C. 316; distinguishing Hensler, 11 Cox 570; Maung Po, 2 R. 53.

(15) Roebuck, 25 L. J. M. C. 101; Mills, 26 L. J. M. C. 79; Hensler, 11 Cox 570.

(16) Baburam Rai, 1 C. L. J. 469 (472).

(17) Mohabat, (1889) P. R. No. 20, following Girdharee, (1876) P. R. No. 16.

from the term "dishonestly."[18] It, of course, implies the practice of intentional fraud upon another, the object being to convey conviction by precluding inquiry. This is necessarily compassed with an ulterior object, though it may not be associated with the wrongful gain or loss of property, and though it does imply either such loss or the risk of such loss.[19] One thing, however, is clear. All deception is not fraudulent, nor is all fraud punishable. If, therefore, there is evidence of deception, and even of fraud, such as is here implied, it does not necessarily make for this offence.

Such, for instance, was the case of the accused who applied for a duplicate certificate of his having passed the matriculation examination of the Madras University in the name of one A who had really passed that examination, and to obtain which he made a false statement that A had lost his original certificate and to support which a forged letter from the Headmaster of the local school was enclosed with his petition. The Registrar of the University sent a duplicate certificate to the address of the said headmaster, who thereupon disclaimed his authorship of the certificate purporting to go from him, and whereupon the accused was prosecuted for forgery and attempting to cheat, but the Court held that there was nothing in the conduct of the accused to merit punishment. His forgery of the headmaster's certificate was neither fraudulent nor dishonest, and his application to the Registrar for a duplicate certificate of A had not caused any damage or harm to the Registrar or to the University. It may be that the accused intended to secure some temporal advantage by pretending that he had passed the Maticulation Examination. But if he had such an intention it was merely a preparation towards such object and would not amount to an attempt within the meaning of section 511.[20] But in this case the fraud, if any, was inchoate and inconsequential. But the following case furnishes an example of cheating by fraudulent as distinct from dishonest inducement.

4614. The accused, presumably the decree-holder in a civil suit, went to a Court clerk and requested him to let him have the warrant of attachment issued on his judgement-debtor just to show it to his pleader. The clerk believed him and delivered him the warrant upon which he indorsed a report that the bailiff refused to go on foot to execute it, but wanted a carriage, and that he had requested the accused to make thereon a false report that the house of the judgment-debtor was found locked and so the bailiff could not execute the process. The clerk prosecuted the accused for this offence and he was held to have brought his act within the first part of this section,[21] that is to say, the view of the Court was that the accused had fraudulently induced delivery of the warrant, his intention being to injure the bailiff.

(18) It must mean something different. Baburam Rai, 32 C. 775 (779); but see Kotamrajee, 28 M. 90, F. B. In Lal Mahomed, 22 W. R. 82, Couch, C. J. held "fraudulently" to have been used in the same sense as "dishonestly." But West and Nanabhai, JJ., citing De Blanc, J. (Haycroft v. Creasy, 2 East. 92, 108), held the term to imply merely an intention to deceive whether from any expectation of advantage to the party himself or from the ill-will towards the other.

(19) Kotamrajee, 28 M. 90, F. B.

(20) Srinivasan, 25 M. 726.

(21) Harishankar, 6 Bom. L. R. 375.

"Fraudulently" must, therefore, imply at least ill-will towards another.[22] If even this is lacking, the accused cannot be punished for doing an act which may be fraudulent in the eyes of the public, but which is not fraudulent in the especial sense in which that term is used in this context. The accused visited the doctor and Health Officer of the Calcutta Corporation, for subscription stating to him that he was a Muncipal employee and was collecting money to feed the poor on the occasion of the opening of the new Municipal offices. The subscription book contained the names of many subscribers and P contributed Rs. 10. The accused made over the collection to the charity. He was, however, prosecuted for cheating inasmuch as he had falsely stated that he was a servant of the Municipality which he was not, and which P swore had induced him to part with his money But it was held that the deceit was too remote, and was not at any rate fraudulent.[23]

4615. Two brothers, A and B had borrowed a sum of Rs. 900 from C who pressed them for payment. They agreed to execute a mortgage of their house to him, purchased a stamp-paper and engrossed thereon a mortgage-deed. A signed it but B demanded Rs. 200 more for his signature which C refused. While the brothers were thus negotiating with C for the payment of the Rs. 200 they secretly mortgaged their house to D C appeared before the Registrar to prevent the registration of D's mortgage, but failed. He then complained against A and B of cheating, but Melville, J., held it to be merely a breach of contract and not cheating.[24] But the following case presents a different view of such breaches of contracts. The accused had purchased grain from the complainant on the express contract that it was to be paid for on delivery. The complainant measured out the grain, but refused to let the carts leave till he was paid. Taking advantage of his momentary absence the accused slipped away. The complainant promptly complained to the police and in defence the accused falsely pleaded payment. The Court found that he had no money to pay, and his conviction for this offence was upheld.[25]

4616. The accused, who were rival shop-keepers, waylaid certain intending customers of the complainant and falsely represented themselves as belonging to the complainant's shop and took them to their own shop which they alleged to be the complainant's, and sold goods to them at the prevailing market-rate. They were convicted of this offence, but their conviction was quashed on the ground that the persons deceived had suffered no loss by the deception, and that the fraud or dishonesty here contemplated was intended to involve loss to the person deceived, and not to a third person like the complainant.[1] The same view was taken in a case, where the accused personated another (A), and caused the Registrar appointed to record Mahomedan marriages and divorces to register a fictitious deed of divorce, by which A purported to divorce his wife. It was held that though the accused

(22) Per Le Blanc, J., in Haycroft v. Creasy, 2 East. 98 (108).
(23) Ashutosh Mallick, 33 C. 50.
(24) Hargovandas, 9 B. H. C. R. 448.
(25) Nga Mya, 4 Bur. L. T. 14, 9 I. C. 458.
(1) Sundar Singh, (1904) P. R. No. 25.

had clearly deceived the Registrar by falsely personating A and causing him to register a fictitious deed in the name of A still, inasmuch as there was no evidence of damage or harm within the meaning of this section, the accused was held to have committed no offence. So where the creditor induced the debtor to pay up his father's debts by acting merely on his fear of consequences to his father, he could not be convicted of cheating, even though he had grossly exaggerated the consequences of non-payment.(2) Such a case is not unlike that supposed by Lord Macaulay of a creditor donning the dress of a public servant to induce his debtor to pay up his debt in which case there would be no cheating because there is no fraud or dishonesty.(3)

4617. The term "fraudulently" may then be defined to imply an intent to deceive in such a manner as to expose any person to loss or risk of loss.(4) A mere false personation unconnected with such loss is not fraudulent. The accused was the manager of a joint-family and as such entitled to draw some money held for payment to a minor. The accused falsely represented himself to be the minor and thus obtained the payment. It was held that the deception was not fraudulent within the meaning of this section.(5)

Omission to Disclose an Incumbrance.

4618. While it would unquestionably be cheating to sell property to which the vendor had no title,(6) there is nothing fraudulent or dishonest in omitting to disclose an existing incumbrance on property sold by the owner to another, unless it is shown either that he was asked by the vendee whether the property was incumbered and said it was not, or that he sold the property on the representation that it was unencumbered.(7) In such a case there is no fraud even in the contemplation of the civil law, for illustration (a) of section 17 of the Indian Contract Act runs thus: "A sells by auction to B a horse which A knows to be unsound. A says nothing to B about the horse's unsoundness. This is not fraud in A." In this respect the English rule is not different. So Bramwell, B., said, "The fraud must be committed by the affirmance of something not true within the knowledge of the affirmer or by the suppression of something which is true which it was his duty to make known."(8) So in another case Lord Macnaughten observed: "Silence is innocent and safe when there is no duty to speak."(9) Such duty may of course be statutory, or conventional, or it may arise from the necessity of disclosure because one is invited to speak. Such was the case of the accused, whose nonage was extended to 21 by the appointment of a guardian. He concealed this fact from the creditor from whom he borrowed money which he had no intention to repay. He was held guilty of this offence.(10)

(2) Mojey, 17 C. 606.
(3) Raj Coomar Banerjee, (1864) W. R. 25.
(4) Kotamrajee, 28 M. 90, F. B.
(5) Baburam Rai, 1 C. L. J. 469.
(6) Dorai Lal, 17 A. L. J. 500, 50 I. C. 667, 20 Cr. L. J. 331.
(7) Bishankas, 27 A. 561.
(8) Horsfall v. Thomas, L. J. Ex. 322.
(9) Chadwick v. Manning, (1896) A. C. 231 (238).
(10) Sada Ram, 18 A. L. J. 408, 58 I. C. 253, 21 Cr. L. J. 740.

Of course, a fraud that is actionable is not necessarily indictable, for criminal responsibility is by no means co-extensive with civil liability. But there is nothing even creating a civil liability in a seller not mentioning the existence of an incumbrance to his purchaser. So where A sold his property to B for the sum of Rs. 750 and the sale-deed was silent as to the existence of a prior incumbrance for a sum of Rs. 20,000, and it was proved that A did not disclose that fact to B nor did B make any inquiry about it, it was held that the omission on the part of A to disclose the heavy prior incumbrance on his property sold to B did not amount to cheating, Aikman, J., holding that the omission was not dishonest, as dishonesty implied unlawfulness and there could be no unlawfulness when there was no legal obligation to disclose under section 55 of the Transfer of Property Act, inasmuch as the mortgage had been effected by a registered instrument, the existence of which could have been discovered by the mortgagee by the exercise of ordinary care. " He might also have ascertained its existence by questioning his vendor. Had he done so, and had the vendor falsely represented the property to be unincumbered, the case would have been very different, as there would have been an actual misrepresentation by the vendor sufficient to consistitute the offence of cheating.

It might be thought at first sight that illustration (i) appended to section 415 is opposed to the view set forth above, but the case contemplated in that illustration is clearly distinguishable. The illustration referred to deals with the case of a person selling or mortgaging an estate which he has previously sold and conveyed away. In that case a person who knows that he has got no right left to a property deals with it as if he had, his conduct amounts to a false representation that he has a subsisting right in the estate, although he well knows that he has not. In the case before me the seller still owned an interest namely the equity of redemption in the property which he conveyed to the complainant. For all that he knew to the contrary, the vendee might have been aware at the time of his purchase that the property he bought was under a mortgage. I have no hesitation in holding that the dishonest concealment of facts referred to in the explanation to section 415 is a dishonest concealment of facts which it is the duty of the person concealing them to disclose to the person with whom he is dealing. The Magistrate in his judgment argues that it is not necessary that wrongful gain or wrongful loss should have been caused, inasmuch as the conduct of the defendant, if not dishonest, was at least fraudulent. If the appellant refrained from disclosing the existence of the incumbrance, his conduct might be immoral, but it would not in my opinion be fraudulent, any more than would be the conduct of the seller of a horse who, knowing that the horse had a splint, did not disclose its existence to a purchaser.(11)

4619. This was also the view of Banerji, J., in another case in which A had sold his property to B for Rs. 2,750, whom C sued for pre-emption alleging that the actual consideration for B's sale was only Rs. 1,525. The suit was eventually compromised on condition that C should get a decree for pre-emption against B on payment of Rs. 1,575 in cash, the rest of the consideration being withheld by C for discharge of a prior charge on the property. After the compromise-decree C discovered that B had executed a mortgage of his property since his sale and prior to his suit for pre-emption in favour of D. C therefore prosecuted B for this offence, but the Court held that there was no legal obligation cast on B to disclose the existence of this incumbrance to C. B's omission was therefore not dishonest, nor could it be said to have induced C to compromise his suit.(12)

(11) Per Aikman, J., in Bishankas, 27 A. 561, followed in Bhojraj, 9 S. L. R. 97, 30 I. C. 994; Paruchery, 36 I. C. 872.

4620. So there is nothing fraudulent within the meaning of this section in a person giving a false name and address in order to shield himself from prosecution for an offence. The accused was asked his name and address by a Sanitary Inspector to enable him to prosecute him for committing a nuisance, and the accused thereupon gave a false name and address which led to the prosecution of a person of that name, who was innocent of the offence. The accused was thereupon prosecuted under this section and the Magistrate convicted him for fraudulently giving his false name and address which induced him to charge Magan with a criminal offence, and that it was likely to cause the Sanitary Inspector harm in his mind and reputation. But it was held that the giving of a false name and address by the accused could not be said "to defraud" the Sanitary Inspector, nor could it be said to have deceived the latter and intentionally induced him to do anything which he would not do if he were not deceived, which act was likely to cause damage or harm to that person in body, mind, reputation or property within the meaning of the second clause of this section.(13) It is not fraudulent to tell a lie, nor is the mere telling of a lie punishable under this section. It may be that the lie induced a man to do an act which he would not otherwise do, but that too does not bring the act within the terms of the section.

4621. The accused was in the sevice of A whom he deserted and went to A's brother B in a distant village and being questioned by B as to A's health replied that he was dangerously ill, whereupon B hied himself to A only to find him well. B prosecuted the accused for cheating, but the Court held that the accused had no doubt told a lie and played a practical joke at B's expense, but he could not be convicted of this offence unless it appeared that by deceiving B the accused had "fraudulently or dishonestly" induced him to do a certain thing which he would not have done if "not so deceived and that act" caused or was likely to cause damage or harm to B in body, mind, reputation or property.(14) The accused and the complainant had filed cross complaints against each other, and they both compromised them by each undertaking to withdraw his complaint against the other. Acting on this assurance the complainant withdrew his complaint, but the accused then refused to withdraw his cross-complaint whereupon the complainant prosecuted him for cheating, but the Court held it to be no case of cheating inasmuch as his act could not be held to cause damage or harm to the complainant's body, mind, reputation or property. "The object of a criminal complaint is supposed to be the punishment of the offender, and his not being punished could not, in the present case at least, injure his accuser."(15) So there is neither fraud nor dishonesty in travelling in a railway carriage of a higher class than what the accused had paid for,(16) or in being found within an exhibition without a ticket. Moreover, merely a fraudulent act does not amount to cheating unless it was done to induce some one to do or omit to do something which he would not have otherwise done or omitted to do. So while in a case like the last the intrusion of the accused into the exhibition grounds might be fraudulent, still it could not amount to cheating.(17)

(12) Gendanlal v. Abdul Aziz Khan, 27 A. 302.

(13) Ladka, (1898) B. U. C. 635.

(14) Punjia, (1888) B. U. C. 423, following Lal Mahomed, 22 W. R. 82; Narotam Das, 6 A. 98, the latter of which cases has no bearing on the subject.

4622. The accused applied for his enlistment in the police force of Farukabad. He knew that the natives of that district were ineligible for such enlistment. The Superintendent of Police questioned him if he was a native of that district and he falsely stated that he was not. He was prosecuted for cheating, but Tyrrell, J., quashed his conviction holding that his statement was neither fraudulent nor dishonest.(18) But would not the offence in such case be one under section 182? (§§ 1785-1789).

4623. It has been sometimes said that there is no difference between "fraudulently" and "dishonestly" as used in this context.(19) It has been, on the other hand, said that the two terms must have necessarily different meanings because they have been used together, otherwise the use of the two words would be redundant.(20) It will be observed that while the section uses the words as distinct concepts, the nine illustrations appended to the section are all cases of dishonesty which Couch, C. J., held to indicate that the two terms were intended to be used in the same sense. But though the illustrations undoubtedly relate only to dishonest inducement, it is possible to conceive of a case of cheating in which the inducement was fraudulent without being dishonest, though naturally such cases are comparatively rare. Such a case may be conceived of a prostitute suffering from syphilis and inducing another to have connection with her by falsely assuring him that she was not diseased, in which case the communication of the disease would be a fraudulent inducement, but under circumstances when fraud does not enter into the composition of the crime, for the case would then fall under the second clause of the section.(21) Indeed, if the fraud was practised in connection with the delivery of property as it must invariably be in a case falling under the first clause of the section, that word must necessarily bear a sense akin to dishonesty, though the term might save cases in which dishonesty may not be palpable.

(15) Durgiah, (1892) 1 Weir 477.
(16) Dayabhai, 1 B. H. C. R. 140.
(17) Meheranji Bejanji, 6 B. H. C. R. 6.
(18) Dwarka Prasad, 6 A. 97.
(19) Per Couch, C. J., in Lal Mahomed, 22 W. R. 82 (83).
(20) Per Harrington, J., in Baburam Rai, 1 C. L. J. 469.
(21) Rakhma, 11 B. 59.

4624. Inducement by Acts and Conduct.—The cases of cheating by a dishonest inducement present comparatively no difficulty. They are all cases in which the deceiver plots to receive or retain property to which he has no right by employing unlawful means. The means of inducement employed in such cases must necessarily differ according to the nature and belief of the person deceived and the influences to which he is subject. Of course, such inducement need not be by words only for it may be as effectually made by the acts and conduct of the party, though there may not be a single word spoken,(22) or where words are spoken, they may, when literally construed, be mere expressions of hope and expectation, though their intention may be to make a representation as to existing facts, in which case it is for the judge of fact to say whether their form or their substance was intended to operate.(23) So if a person purchase goods from a tradesman and deliver him a cheque upon a banker with whom in fact he had no credit, he would be guilty of this offence,(24) if he was then aware of the fact that he had no credit at the Bank. But the case would be different if he had reason to believe that the cheque would be honoured on presentation, even though he had no account at the bank, but the bank refused to cash it.(25)

The accused purchased goods of the prosecutor, promising to pay ready money for them. He gave a cheque on a bank for the price and took away the goods. He had shortly before opened an account at the bank but had withdrawn his deposit except a few shillings He was held guilty of obtaining goods by means of a false pretence.(1) In another case the prosecutor had agreed to sell some iron to the accused for £1-17*s*. Ten shillings were paid on account, and the balance was agreed to be paid on delivery. The next day the accused brought a pony cart and began to load it with the iron. During the loading he gave the prosecutor a cheque for £1-7*s*. The prosecutor allowed the iron to be taken away. The cheque was dishonoured on presentation, and it was held that the prosecutor had been induced to part with his goods in the belief that the cheque was good and genuine, and that the accused was rightly convicted of this offence.(2)

In these cases the transaction was for cash, and neither party intended to give or take credit. But if there is anything in the transaction to show that one party intended to give and another to take credit for how short so ever a time then there would be no cheating, but a breach of contract on the failure to pay. Such contract would be necessarily implied from delivery of a post-dated cheque. So where the accused purchased a horse and paid for it by a post dated cheque, telling the prosecutor not to present it for the two days by which it had been post-dated, but who nevertheless presented it on that very day and when it was dishonoured and it appeared that

(22) Partridge, 6 Cox 82; Hunter, 10 Cox 642; Carter ,10 Cox 642; Giles L. & C. 502; Cooper, 2 Q. B. D. 510; Parker and Bulteel, (1916) 80 J. P. 271.

(23) Aaron's Reefs v. Twiss, (1896) A. C. 273 (284).

(24) Ill. (d); Jackson, 3 Camp. 370; Martin, 5 Q. B. D. 34; Garratt, 10 T. L. R. 167; Haselton, 44 L. J. M. C. 11; Cosuett, 20 Cox 6.

(25) Walue, 11 Cox 647.

(1) Haselton, (1874) 44 L. J. M. C. 11.

(2) Cosuett, (1901)65 J. P. 472.

the accused bona fide expected a remittance which he intended to deposit in the bank to pay for the cheque, it was held that there was no false pretence.(3) But this case does not establish a general exception in favour of drawers of post-dated bills, for the question in such cases depends upon intention. The accused purchased a watch and chain for £25, and before the completion of the sale represented to the prosecutor that he was in funds at the bank, and that he had the right to draw the cheque, though he was going to post-date it for his own convenience which was all false. The cheque was presented and dishonoured on the date of its execution, and it was held that as the accused had no reasonable means of paying it on the date it fell due, and as his whole statement was false and calculated to deceive the prosecutor, he was rightly convicted of the offence.(4) The cases in which the accused pays in forged or worthless notes are clearly cases of flagrant cheating.(5) Such case may arise where the prisoner encloses a half of a good bank note having already parted with the other half to a third person, and which implies a representation that the accused would forward the other half in due course.(6)

Inducement by Dishonest Acts.

4625. So where the accused at Oxford went to a shop wearing the university cap and gown, though he was not a member of the University, and thus obtained credit, he was held to have committed this offence, though nothing passed in words.(7) It may be that the act in this case was ambiguous, for, the accused may conceivably have put on the University robes for a purpose other than that of fraud. But this should have been established by the accused. The prosecutor is not bound to show that the words and acts of the accused had no other meaning. If they were susceptible of the meaning attached to them by the prosecutor who was thereby deceived it is sufficient. The accused wrote to the prosecutor the following letter: "Please send me one truck of Regent's and one truck of Rock's as samples, at your prices named in your letter; let them be good quality, then I am sure a good trade will be done for both of us. I will remit you cash on arrival of goods and invoice. P.S.—I may say if you use me well I shall be a good customer. An answer will oblige, saying when they are put on." The prosecutor sent the potatoes, believing that the accused was a dealer in potatoes in a large way of business. He was in fact a huckster and carried about fruit for sale in a donkey cart.

The jury found that the prisoner's ordinary dealings being on a very small scale to which the large order for potatoes was disproportionate, and that consequently he had misrepresented his character and position and thereby induced the prosecutor to consign goods, and on a case reserved the Court confirmed the conviction, Lush, J., observing: "The pretence in order to justify a conviction must be of existing facts. It may be made either by words or by acts. It is sufficient if it can be reasonably and naturally inferred from the words, or from the acts, in order to raise a question for the decision of the jury. It is not

(3) Walne, 11 Cox 647.
(4) Parker, 7 C. & P. 825.
(5) Flint, R. & R. 460; Dowey, 11 Cox 115; Freetle, R. & R. 127; Anderson, 2 M. & Rob. 471; Caulson, 4 Cox 227.
(6) Murphy, 13 Cox. 298.
(7) Barnard, 7 C. & P. 784; Stevens, 1 Cox 83.

necessary that the words or that the acts should be capable only of the meaning charged by the indictment. If the words in the letter written by the prisoner in the present case were intended to mean, and are fairly capable of meaning, that which is charged, and if they were so understood, then there was as much a pretence, as though the letter had contained, the definition of their meaning. The words here are capable of supporting the pretence charged without further explanation, this large quantity is asked for as a sample, and then the prisoner says he will remit, and talks of the trade to be done. The letter is fairly capable of representing and conveying to the mind of the reader that the defendant was a man dealing largely, and in a position to do good trade, and remit at once on delivery. The jury have adopted this construction, and have found that the prosecutor did so read the letter and that the prisoner intended it to be so read. I therefore think the conviction right."[8]

4626. So while an ordinary trader does not by the mere fact that he keeps his doors open for business represent that he is at the moment solvent, the business of a bank stands on a different footing because a banker trades with other persons' money, and he undertakes by the very carrying on of his business that he will honour any cheque drawn upon an account provided that the account is in credit to the account of the defendant. Consequently, it is open to a jury to find that a banker impliedly represents that he is in a position to fulfil those obligations, and is solvent.[9]

4627. As a letter alleged to contain a dishonest inducement and sent to the prosecutor is presumably intended to influence him, his opinion as to what he understood thereby is material, though the question whether the letter did influence him is for the jury, while the question whether it could have influenced him is a question of law and for the judge. As Wright, J., put it: "In order to convict the prisoner three things must happen: first which is a question for the judge, whether the document is reasonable, capable of bearing the meaning attributed to it; secondly, which is for the jury, whether it was so meant by the prisoner; and thirdly, whether it was so understood by the prisoner.[10]

4628. The prisoner went to a post office and enquired if there were any letters for John Story. The postmaster looked into his reserve letter box and found one addressed to John Storer which the lady in charge made over to him. He took it and then returned with the enclosed money-order for a pound and demanded money which was paid to him on his signing his real name John Story. He was prosecuted for obtaining money by false pretences, but it was contended for him that he had made no false assertion and had signed his true name, but on a case reserved it was held that he was rightly convicted inasmuch as in presenting the money order and receiving payment he represented himself to be John Storer which he knew to be another man.[11]

---

(8) Cooper, 2 Q. B. D. 510 (514).
(9) Parker and Bulteel, (1916) 80 J. P. 271.
(10) King, (1897) 1 Q. B. 214 (219).
(11) Storey, R. & R. 81.

The case of a false cheque delivered in payment of goods implies the same representation, that the cheque would be cashed on presentation.

4629. In judging of the nature of the act the only thing relevant is the intention of the accused at the time of the inducement For a person cannot be said to cheat if his act being originally honest afterwards became dishonest with the change of intention. The mere taking of money one day, and dishonestly running away without paying the next day is not necessarily cheating. There must be an intention to deceive and defraud at the time of taking the money, and subsequent conduct of the accused would only be evidence to show the previous dishonest intention,[12] but it is not necessarily conclusive.[13]

Subsequent Conduct.

4630. So it has been held that a vendor who delivers goods on the terms that they are to be paid for immediately after they have been received gives credit to the purchaser.[14] Such was the case of the accused who was introduced to the prosecutor by another person and who thereupon agreed to advance him a sum of money on his agreeing to purchase rice and bring it in his own boats for sale through the prosecutor, and upon which he was to receive a certain commission. The accused received the money but failed to bring the rice as promised. It also appeared that his statement was grossly exaggerated, but that it had the substratum of truth, for he had control over some boats and there was evidence of his having made advances for the purchase of rice. On these facts the High Court held that it was not a case in which it could interfere with the acquittal.[15] This was a case of mere breach of contract. The distinction between such a case and one of cheating is well marked though it is not often manifest. It depends upon the intention of the accused at the time of the inducement, which may be judged by his subsequent act but of which the subsequent act is not the sole criterion. The prisoner hired certain property from the complainant for use at a wedding and advanced a portion of the hire, promising in writing to pay the balance of hire and restore the goods when the wedding was over. Here the transaction was manifestly a fair one, but other facts may be superadded to put upon it a different complexion. For instance, in the case last supposed it was shown that the alleged wedding was a mere ruse resorted to get possession of the property which the accused intended to secure by applying for its attachment before judgment.

In a suit brought against another person to whom it really belonged and who had previously mortgaged it to the complainant, it was held that the act of the accused was clearly dishonest and as it had induced delivery of the property he was guilty of cheating.[16] The same view was taken of the accused who had mortgaged his land to the complainant and who visited him during his absence, and finding his wife at (12) Heeramun Hulwye, 5 W. R. 5.

(13) Ram Chandra, 43 C. L. J. 287, 94 I. C. 204.
(14) Jones (Williams), (1898) 1 Q. B. 119; Khitish Chandra, 5 I. C. 796.
(15) Deputy Legal Remembrancer v. Ijjatulla Kasi, 10 C. W. N. 1005.
(16) Kadir Bux, 3 N. W. P. H. C. R. 16; Khoda Bux Sheikh v. Bakeya Mundari 32 C. 941; Ramanath Kalapahar, 2 C. L. J. 524. Per Rampini & Woodroffe, JJ. (Mookerji, J., dissenting).

home asked her to let him see the instrument which she delivered him. He then took it away. He was convicted of this offence, but on appeal it was held that inasmuch as the complainant's wife had not been examined, the circumstances attending its delivery were not proved. On the case being reported to the High Court it was held that the conviction was not bad in law if the allegations were proved. If it had been proved that the accused made a promise which he at the time never intended to keep and thereby deceived the woman, and in consequence of which she delivered the deed to the accused, his intention inducing her to deliver the deed would have been clearly fraudulent or dishonest and upon which he might have been rightly convicted of this offence.(17)

4631. But in such a case, the intention of the accused at the time he requested delivery of the deed, may well be gathered from his subsequent conduct. If, however, there was anything in it to negative that intention, then the accused could not have been convicted of this offence. Such was the case of the accused whom the complainant engaged at Madras to serve him as a cook for six months. He received an advance of a half-a-month's pay and travelling expenses and joined his master on a hill station, but after serving for twenty-four days he absconded. He was prosecuted for cheating, but the Court held that there was nothing to show that at the time the accused induced the complainant to part with his money he intended to act fraudulently or dishonestly. He did not intend to get to the hill on the pretext of serving the complainant. The fact that something afterwards supervened which caused the defendant to break his contract to remain in complainant's service for six months, does not convert the previous honest intention into a dishonest one so as to support the conviction for cheating.(18) The accused presented a stolen note to a shopkeeper for encashment, and in reply to the inquiry of the shopkeeper gave his name falsely. The shopkeeper did not ask the accused for his name until after he had cashed the note, and he admitted that the name given by the accused in no way influenced him in cashing the note. It was held that the giving of the false name had nothing to do with its encashment by the complainant, and that there was no other deceit inducing delivery of the money. The accused may, perhaps, be presumed to have represented the note to be a good note, as it was in fact, but there was no representation that it was not stolen. There was, therefore, no cheating, and consequently no cheating by personation for which the accused could be convicted.(19)

4632. The selling of milk and water in about equal proportions as pure milk is sufficient to support the finding of cheating.(20) But where a person went on purpose to buy such milk in order to prove a case of adulteration against the seller, he could not be said to have been deceived or induced to buy such milk and the seller could not therefore be convicted of cheating,(21) though he may be convicted of an attempt. So it is cheating to demand a higher rate for an article than what is legally prescribed as the rate at which it is to be sold.

(17) Anan, (1880) 1 Weir 478.
(18) Viraswami, (1881) 1 Weir 478.
(19) Shaik Basit, (1883) 1 Weir 479.
(20) Nana, (1880) B. U. C. 145.
(21) Kalee Modock, 18 W. R. 61.

So the sale of opium is regulated by Government which prescribes the rate at which it is to be sold by licensed retailers. If, therefore, such a ratailer sell opium worth half-an-anna for an anna he would be guilty of cheating[22] in the same way as if he had passed on a half-anna stamp when what the purchaser had wanted and paid for was an anna stamp. In either of these cases the act of the accused was dishonest, because the vendor made half-an-anna more than he was entitled to and it induced delivery of it by deception inasmuch as the vendor made the accused falsely believe that the property delivered was what the Government had ordered him to sell. Such a case must, however, be distinguished from one in which the Government Famine Relief officers sold rice to shopkeepers at the rate of sixteen seers per rupee on condition that they should retail it at fifteen seers per rupee. The accused was one such purchaser and he was convicted of cheating for selling the rice which he had so purchased at sixteen seers per rupee at the rate of twelve seers. It was held that as property in the rice passed to him its sale by him at a rate other than that subject to which it was sold amounted only to a breach of contract and not cheating.

As Couch, C. J., put: "The rice having been sold to him and he having paid for it, it was not unlawful for him to sell it again at such prices as he thought fit."[23] The non-fulfilment of a promise which was only one factor in inducing delivery of the property otherwise legally made, does not make it a case of cheating. The example of the son being induced to pay up his father's debts failing which the father should suffer dire consequences which were imaginary and intended merely to frighten the son, has been already considered.[24] Another case of the same kind is the following. The accused was the holder of a decree against the prosecutor for Rs. 194-10, in execution of which he attached his property for sale, whereupon the prosecutor compromised his case by paying him Rs. 154, the latter agreeing to withdraw from the execution, which, however, he failed to do as soon as he had secured the sum of Rs. 154, and the result was that the sale was proceeded with and the prosecutor's property sold. He was prosecuted for cheating and would have been convicted were it not for the finding that he had thereupon instructed his pleader not to prosecute the case, but which he nevertheless went on with and eventually purchased the property himself It was in fact a case where the accused had bungled but not cheated the complainant.[25]

Far different, however, would be the case of the man who under such circumstances received the money and then denied its receipt. His denial would be a clear proof of his previous dishonesty, creating a presumption against him which it would not be easy for him to overcome.

4633. A person who receives money from another giving him a girl in marriage falsely stating her caste, would be guilty of cheating

(22) Pandurang, 4 Bom. L. R. 823.
(23) Lal Mahomed, 22 W. R. 82.
(24) Raj Coomar Banarjee, (1864) W. R. 25.
(25) Sadoo Churn Pal, 4 W. R. 13.

if he knew of the real caste of the girl and had dishonestly concealed it for the sake of the money.(1) And the offence would be the same if in such a case the girl's true parentage is concealed and she is described to be of a good family which she was not.(2) But to say that a person belongs to a good family is a matter of opinion, and upon which one could not be convicted of cheating, for which there should be a mis-statement of fact as distinct from a mere expression of an opinion. So where the accused reported as having completed the work, and whereupon he was paid off his final bill by the Public Works Department under whom he had taken a contract, but who afterwards discovered it to be incomplete in parts, it was held that his statement if false was alone insufficient to sustain the charge of cheating, because there must be evidence that it was not only false but believed it to be false by the accused at the time he made it.(3) So a person cannot be convicted of cheating for selling nasty sweetmeats, for nastiness is a matter of taste and upon which opinions are likely to differ.(4)

4634. The case would, however, be different if a person used false weights and measures and represented them to be true, in which case he may bring himself within the penalties of sections 264-267 as well as of this section. The accused sold liquor measuring it in a glass which was not a prescribed measure, and which contained less liquor than it was represented to do, it was held that the appropriate offence of the accused was cheating.(5)

4635. Compared to these cases the following is a barefaced example of cheating. The accused advertised for the sale of a book of English idioms by one Robert S. Wilson, M.A., for Rs. 2-4, obtainable on prepayment from the said Robert S. Wilson, M.A., Council House Street, Calcutta. The accused instructed the post office to redirect the letters sent to that address to his own at Rajam in the Vizagapatam district. He signed himself as Robert S. Wilson. He then wrote to the postmaster at Rajam that his clerk Seshagiri Rau should visit him for receiving the redirected money orders and later on he himself appeared at the post office and took delivery of the money orders, representing himself to be the expected Seshagiri Rau, and producing for the satisfaction of the postmaster a written authority purporting to be written and signed by Robert S. Wilson and which was in his own handwriting. There were no such persons as Robert S. Wilson or his clerk Seshagiri Rau, nor any book of Idioms by the former. In fact all that the accused did was to advertise a fictitious book by a fictitious author to cheat intending buyers. It was held that the accused was guilty of cheating those who remitted money for the book.(6)

The case is not unlike the many cases of swindling, which play changes on the same tune. In some the advertiser promises a lucra-

(1) Peddomonee, 5 W. R. 98; Dabee Singh, 7 W. R. 55; Komul Das, 2 W. R. 7; Sheoram, 2 A. W. N. 237.
(2) Dhunput Ojhah, 7 W. R. 51.
(3) Kalipuddo Poramanik, 23 W. R 43.
(4) Kalee Modock, 18 W. R. 61.
(5) Nurodin, (1888) B. U. C. 386.
(6) Pera Raju, 13 M. 27.

tive employment on payment of a fee, in others he promises an heiress for a wife for the same consideration, but in both cases there is neither the employment nor the promised heiress. The advertisement is in short, a swindle intended to draw money, which clearly constitutes cheating. Sometimes this form of swindle assumes a more specious form. The advertiser gives away a photographic enlargement just to boom his trade. He only wants a photograph and a shilling or two for packing. If the money is sent, the advertiser demands later on half-a guinea for the frame without which the enlargement cannot be sent, which is a clear case of cheating, inasmuch as there was a dishonest concealment of this fact when the shilling was demanded for postage and the photograph was promised free.

4636. Delivery or Retention of Property.—The first clause dealing with fraudulent or dishonest inducement relates merely to the delivery or retention of property. It has no application to any damage done to property, nor indeed to any damage or harm done to a person in body, mind or reputation, as distinct from his property. The delivery or retention of property, which alone is the subject of the first clause, may, however, be any property, present or prospective, existent or non-existent, provided that the inducement is a continuing one and existed at the time the property comes into being and is delivered under its influence. So, where the prisoner was indicted for obtaining by false pretences a spring van, and it was proved that the prosecutor built it on the faith of those pretences and delivered it in pursuance of the original order, although the prisoner had countermanded the order after the building and before the delivery, it was held that the existence of the chattel was not necessary to constitute the offence.

4637. As Bovill, C. J., put it: "Take the case of a coat obtained by a false pretence, or of money, say £500. A man may not carry £500 about with him, and it may be that the bank notes obtained by the pretence are not printed when the pretence is made. Can anybody doubt that such a case would be an obtaining within the Statute, the pretence and the delivery being connected together? So is the detaining of a valuable security in the shape of a note or bill of exchange, which does not exist at the time when the prisoner asks for it but is made afterwards. Again, take the case of minerals, of coals which is not dug at the time of making the pretence, which at common law is not, till severed, the subject of larceny. A vast variety of similar cases might occur in which it would be an absurdity to say that the offence was not within the Statute. In all cases, of course, the pretence must precede the delivery of the chattel. What, then, is the test as to the distance of time between them? The real test is whether or not there is a direct connection between the making of the pretence and the delivery; or, in other words, whether the pretence is a continuing one, continuing during the interval between the time of making the pretence and the time of the delivery. It would be for the jury in all cases to say whether that was so in fact."(7)

So, where the accused went to a restaurant and ordered and ate a meal knowing that he could not pay for it, he was held to have been rightly convicted of this offence though the meal was not in existence when the pretence was made.[8] In another case the prisoner induced the prosecutor to deliver him a cheque, which, however, owing to a material omission, was dishonoured by the banker upon whom it was drawn; and whereupon the pretender informed the prosecutor who wrote out another cheque which the accused got cashed, appropriating the proceeds. It was held that the false pretence which induced the prosecutor to issue the first cheque continued when the second cheque was drawn and that the money obtained by him on the second cheque was wrung out of the prosecutor by cheating.[9]

(7) Martin, L. R. 1 C. C. 56.

Meaning of "property."

4638. The term "property" is thus here used in the widest sense as signifying anything which is the subject of ownership. As property without an owner is not property within the meaning of law, it follows that there can be no cheating by appropriating it whether with or without consent, and whether that consent is free or coerced. The fact that a thing is valued, but is valueless, is enough to invest it with the right of property. So a cancelled cheque has been held to be property. And so a lottery ticket, however valueless it may be for the time being, is property, the right to which may be vindicated by complaint or action. The principle de minimus non curat lex cannot shield an attack made on such property. The prosecutor had purchased a lottery ticket which the accused took away, representing that it had won a prize of Rs. 10 or Rs. 20 which he offered to pay. As a matter of fact it had won a prize of Rs. 598. The complainant insisted upon the return of his ticket, but as the accused refused, he complained of cheating and the Court held it to be a good prima facie case of that offence.[10]

The term "property" includes money,[11] and everything else whether corporal or incorporal. But it does not include immoveable property.[12]

Delivery or Retention Must be Illegal.

4639. The delivery or retention of property secured by deceitful inducement must be illegal, for, as has been already seen, if the delivery was legal there can be no cheating.[13] So there is nothing illegal in a passenger to make over his excess luggage to a friend to evade payment of its freight, and the Railway cannot charge such person of cheating them out of their freight, because they have suffered no injury.[14] But it is illegal to take possession of a warrant of attachment before it is ready for delivery, on the pretence that it was required for inspection, and then to appropriate it. The accused, who was presumably a decree-holder, induced a clerk of the Civil Court to let him show the warrant of attachment to his pleader which the clerk delivered to him for the purpose, whereupon the accused made an indorsement on it to the effect that the bailiff refused to execute it, refusing to go on foot and wanted a carriage and that he wanted the accused to report that the judgment-debtor's house was closed. The clerk prosecuted the accused for this offence, and it was held that as the accused had taken possession of the warrant by false

(8) Jones, (1898) Q. B. 119.
(9) Greathead, 14 Cox 198.
(10) Bhagwan Kessev v. Siba Valji, 4 Bom. L. R. 76.
(11) Birendra Lal Bhaduri, 32 C. 22.
(12) Abdul Ahad, (1882) A. W. N. 6; cf. Durga Tewari, 36 C. 758.
(13) Raj Coomar Banerjee, (1864) W. R. 25.
(14) S. 44; Paras Ram, (1903) P. R. No. 25.

representation, he was guilty of this offence under the first part of this section.[15]

Temporary Delivery Sufficient.

4640. Both under English law as well as under this section the offence is complete with delivery or retention of property, though the delivery or retention may have been consented to only for a moment. So in England it is no defence to an indictment for this offence that the money had been obtained only by way of a loan and that the defendant intended to repay it. But in this respect the English rule is narrower and draws a line between property, such as money and other chattels, the rule being that in the case of money the offence is complete even if the loan be taken and the accused, intended to repay it,[16] whereas in the case of other chattels a temporary possession, however deceitful, is held insufficient to constitute cheating. This difference between the two kinds of property follows the rule, that while property in the one passes by mere delivery, property in the other does not necessarily accompany its physical possession.[17] This is, however, a conception of law which does not find favour in the Code except for the purpose already discussed (ss. 378, 411).

4641. The fact, however, that the property had been already made over to the cheat before the inducement began is important, as it will then show that its delivery could not have been induced by deceit. But if what had been parted with was merely possession, as in the case of a bailment, this offence may be equally committed by the owner consenting to its retention by the cheat.

4642. Inducement Too Remote.—But in this case it may be a question whether the inducement was not too remote. For while the section undoubtedly speaks of deceit and inducement, it is evident that there must be a limit beyond which criminal law could not extend its penalties.[18] For instance, there is such a thing as undue influence which vitiates a contract, which in view of the civil law is so induced where the relations subsisting between the parties are such that one of the parties is in a position to dominate the will of the other, which he uses to obtain an unfair advantage over the other.[19] A person who dominates the will of the other possesses an advantage which he can turn to his account. But the gaining of any advantage would not amount to cheating unless it was gained either fraudulently or dishonestly and was, moreover, so directly the outcome of another's fraud as to amount to delivery induced by deceit. And even apart from undue influence there may be cases when the inducement is too remote to be criminal. Such was the case of the prisoner who falsely represented himself to be a naval officer, and by that false pretence obtained lodging for a week. He had then said nothing about the board. He, however, subsequently arranged for his board as well and for which he was indicted, but it was held that the obtaining of the articles of food was too remotely the result of the false pretence.[20] This case was followed by Hill, J., in another case in which the prisoner's first contract was for board and lodging, but he subsequently

(15) Harishanker, 4 Bom. L. R. 375.
(16) Crossley, 2 M. & Rob. 17.
(17) Burgon, Dears & B. 11; Kilham, 39 L. J. M. C. 109.
(18) Sarada Saran, 21 A. L. J. 873
(19) S. 16, Indian Contract Act (IX of 1872).
(20) Gardner, 25 L. J. M. C. 100; see this case explained, per Bovill, C. J., in Martin, L. R 1 C. C. 56 obtained a sixpence as a loan and for which he was indicted, but his pretence was held to be too remote.[21]

4643. In another case the prisoner competed in a swimming race, and gained a twenty seconds' start allowed to members of a certain club, of which he falsely represented himself to be a member. He won the prize and upon which he was indicted for obtaining it by false pretences, but the Common Sergeant, after consulting Stephen, J., held that the prize was too remotely connected with the false pretence.[22] This was also the view of the Court in the case of the accused who visited a Municipal employee representing to him that he was also a servant of the same Municipality and was collecting money for feeding the poor on the occasion of the opening of the new Municipal offices. He showed a list containing the names of respectable subscribers, whereupon the prosecutor paid Rs. 10, which the accused duly made over to the charity. His statement that he was in the service of the Municipality was false and the prosecutor swore that that false statement had alone induced him to subscribe to the fund of the charity. But the Court held the misrepresentation too remote, adding that any other view involved the assumption that the charity was not to have the benefit of the money in the event of the accused not being employed in the Municipality.[23] The question of remoteness is, however, a question of fact, and it is for the jury to find whether the deceit was so proximately connected with the delivery of property as to be the cause of it.

4644. Indirect Inducement When Criminal.—It is not necessary that the inducement should be directly addressed to the person deceived, for he may be equally influenced through an innocent agent[24] or while the deceitful representation is ostensibly,[25] intended to be addressed to a third person. So two or more persons may conspire to influence another by their joint effort, in which case it will be a question of fact whether the several representations were not a part of the same scheme intended to defraud a person[1] (§§ 324-325).

4645. Intentional Inducement.—The inducement operating upon a person's mind, may, according to the section be (i) fraudulently; (ii) dishonestly; and (iii) intentionally. The first two refer only to the delivery or retention of property. The last has a wider operation, for it may result in an act or omission unconnected with the delivery or retention of property, provided that it causes or is likely to cause damage or harm to the person deceived "in body, mind, reputation or property." Here again the question of remoteness (§§ 4642-4644) must be strictly kept in view. For if these words are too literally construed they may include not only the delivery or retention of property specifically provided for in the first clause, but would also include almost any phase of the mind such as regret caused by the deception or the like, or even such an offence as murder caused by inducing one to take poison misrepresenting it to be an innocuous drug. But this

Clause 2.

(21) Bryan, 2 F. & F. 567.
(22) Larner, 14 Cox 497.
(23) Ashutosh Mullick, 33 C. 50.
(24) Butcher, 28 L. J. M. C. 14.
(25) Brown, 2 Cox 348; Dent, 1 C. & K. 249; Hamilton, 9 Q. B. 271.
(1) Kerrigan, 9 Cox 441; Moland, 2 M. C. C. 276; Clayton, 1 C. & K. 128.

is not the intention of the section. The section was probably pushed to its extreme length in the following case.

The accused applied to the Tehsildar for a lease for five years of 23 acres of land describing it as waste, upon which the Tehsildar forwarded the application to his superior officer for sanction. The land he had applied for was cultivated and not waste, and he was therefore prosecuted for cheating but acquitted by the Sessions Judge who held that it did not cause nor was likely to cause any damage to the person deceived. But the High Court reversed the conviction, holding that the false statement had induced the Tehsildar to entertain his application forwarding it to his superior officer. "Nothing was more likely," it added, "to damage the reputation of the Tehsildar with his immediate superiors than forwarding such an application, which, if complied with, would have resulted in a considerable loss of revenue to Government, and might have laid the Tehsildar open to suspicion of having colluded with the defendant to defraud the Government." In this view the accused was convicted of this offence.(2) But it is submitted that the damage in this case was too remote (§§ 4642-4644).

The correct view was taken by Henderson and Geidt, JJ., in a case in which the Karta of a joint Hindu family had applied in his representative character for the withdrawal of certain sale proceeds standing to their credit in the Treasury, but the Collector directed him either to file a power of attorney or to cause all the other members to appear and admit his authority to sign on their behalf, whereupon they all appeared in person before him except two minors who were personated by other persons, and who signed for the minors and withdrew the money standing to their credit. They were prosecuted for this offence, but it was held that though the men had undoubtedly deceived the Collector, still it was no more than a trick to obtain money to which the men were rightly entitled. In short, though they had induced the Collector to deliver them the money they had not done so fraudulently or dishonestly. But did their act then fall under the second clause? "Here again there is no question that deception was intentionally practised and that the Collector was actually deceived, and in consequence of the deception he made over the money, which he would not have paid, but for the deception. But in my opinion it cannot be said, upon the facts found, that the act done, that is, the payment of the money, caused or was likely to cause damage or harm to the Collector in body, mind or reputation, for he was legally bound (though he was entitled to insist upon the authority being proved) to hand over the money to the person or persons authorized to receive it and Ramdiyal (the Karta) has been found to have been so authorized."(3)

4646. In another case in which the same question was agitated was decided upon the following facts. The accused was a coolie-recruiter and he induced the complainant to go to his depot by promising him domestic service. He went. In the meantime the accused sold him to a coolie contractor as a coolie to work in Assam. He was then sent to the station to fetch a parcel. He went there and found himself booked for Assam, where he refused to go. He communicated with the police who prosecuted

(2) Anon, (1871) M. H. C. R. 477. (3) Babu Ram, 32 C. 775.

the accused under section 164 of the Assam Labour and Emigration Act,(4) under which he was convicted, but on appeal his conviction was altered to one under section 417|511 of the Code, after giving the accused the chance to resummon and cross-examine the witnesses. The accused moved the High Court in revision and Henderson and Geidt, JJ., held that the case of the accused did not fall under the first clause, but that it fell under the second clause and for the following reasons: The complainant had been deceived by the accused when he promised him domestic employment, while his real intention was to sell him as a coolie. If he had not protested, he would have been so sold, and if once sold as a coolie there can be no doubt but that he would have suffered in mind. As, however, he was not actually sold, the act of cheating was not complete. It was, however, an attempt to cheat for which the accused was rightly convicted.(5)

Such a case bears some analogy to the case in which the accused who was in the service of A deserted him and appeared in a distant village where A's brother B resided, and who having questioned him as to A's welfare, the accused maliciously told him that A was dangerously ill, whereupon B took the trouble of paying him a visit finding him well as usual, and whereupon he prosecuted the accused for cheating him, but he was acquitted by Birwood and Jardine, JJ., with reference to this clause, the scope of which, however, was not discussed, the learned Judges being content to hold that the deception had not caused B any damage or harm in body or mind, reputation or property.(6) But there appears to be nothing to discriminate between this case and the last—the persons deceived in the two cases were both deceived and the mental harm suffered in the latter case was more than what the complainant in the last case suffered.

Harm when Too Remote.

4647. At any rate, the mental harm here contemplated must be something more appreciable than a mere momentary annoyance which should be condoned under section 95. Such was the annoyance caused to certain sepoys who being accustomed to purchase from the shop of A were waylaid by a more enterprising rival and taken to his own shop on the false representation that it was the shop of A, of which he was the agent. A prosecuted the accused as having suffered by his deception, but the Court had no difficulty in putting him out of Court, holding that the section does not contemplate injury to any but the person actually deceived, which in the case under reference were the sepoys, but who having bought the goods at the market rate could not be said to have been injured beyond feeling of some annoyance at having been taken in by the accused, but which the Court considered a negligible wrong.(7) Such was held to be the case where the servants of a Railway Company had allotted more wagons to a colliery than they were entitled to. It was contended that the colliery proprietors had cheated the Railway by conspiring with the servants of the Railway, but it was held that the allotment had caused no damage to the Railway and could not therefore be construed as cheating it.(8)

The accused had appeared at the Matriculation Examination of the Madras University, but was unsuccessful. One A had passed that examina-

(4) Act VI of 1901.
(5) Kishori Lal Chatterji, 9 C. W. N. 764.
(6) Punjia, (1888) B. U. C. 423.
(7) Sunder Singh, 6 P. L. R. 62.
(8) Manmatha, 51 C. 250 (262, 263).

tion and held a certificate issued by the Registrar. The accused wrote to him in the name of A, alleging the loss of his certificate and requesting him to issue a duplicate. He enclosed with his application a forged certificate purporting to have been issued by the local schoolmaster corroborating his alleged loss and recommending the issue of a fresh certificate. The accused paid Rupees 3, which was the fee charged on a duplicate copy of a certificate. The Registrar issued a duplicate and forwarded it to the schoolmaster for delivery to the accused, when the fraud was discovered, and the accused prosecuted for this offence, but Davies and Bhashyam Ayyangar, JJ., held it to be no case of cheating, as the certificate had been paid for and could not be said to have caused any damage or harm to anyone.(9)

4648. The same view was taken of the accused who being a candidate for recruitment in the police force falsely stated to the Superintendent of Police that he was not a native of the Farukhabad district, the natives of which were disqualified from entering the local police force and upon which he was prosecuted for this offence, but Tyrrell, J., held the statement though false, to have neither caused nor was likely to cause damage in body, mind or reputation to the person so misinformed.(10) So the complainant and the accused had filed cross-complaints against each other which they both compromised, each undertaking to withdraw his complaint against the other. The complainant withdrew his complaint, but the accused did not, and the former consequently prosecuted the latter for this offence, but it was held that the non-withdrawal of the complaint could not be held to cause harm to the mind of the complainant, for it was only to result in the punishment of the offender which is not harm within the contemplation of this section.(11)

The view of the Court apparently was to construe "harm" as meaning injury as defined in section 44. If so, the term "harm" must mean "harm illegally caused to any person in body, mind reputation or property," and if so again, all that the second clause means is that the intentional deception should have caused an injury, and this is all that the clause was probably intended to imply. In any view it is not necessary that the intentional inducement should imply an intention to cause the damage or harm. It is sufficient if the deceiver intentionally induces the person deceived to do or omit to do anything which he would not do or omit to do if he were not deceived, and such act or omission causes or is likely to cause damage or harm to that person in body, mind, reputation or property.(12) In other words, the clause presumes that the deceiver who intentionally induces a person to do an act knows of the natural consequences of his inducement, and if the consequence was natural, his knowledge need not be proved, but if it is unnatural his ignorance of the consequence is presumed and his inducement cannot then be held to constitute cheating. Such a case arose where the accused, a broker, entered into a forward delivery contract for the sale of jute on behalf of a fictitious firm, and on the price rising the complainant prosecuted the accused for an attempt to cheat; but the Court quashed the proceedings holding that the act amounted to no offence because the harm suffered was at the time of the contract both uncertain and too remote.(13)

(9) Srinivasan, 25 M. 726.
(10) Dwarka Prasad, 6 A. 97.
(11) Durgiah, (1892) 1 Weir 477.
(12) Nand Lal, (1888) P. R. No. 36.
(13) Harendra Nath v. Jyotish Chandra 52 C. 188 (194, 195).

4649. Dishonest Concealment.—Lastly, while deception may be practised as much by words as by act and conduct, still it cannot be practised for this purpose by a mere concealment unless it is dishonest. But does this exempt a concealment which is fraudulent though not dishonest? For example, suppose A personates B and appears before P to cheat him of property. C happens to know that A is not B and he is questioned by the intended victim of A as to his identity. A professes ignorance and thereupon A victimizes P, C knew of the fraud A intended to practise on P, but he did not like to incur his displeasure by exposing him to P. C gained nothing by A's fraud. C's concealment was fraudulent, but not being dishonest, C could not be held to have deceived P. There is another reason why in such a case C did not deceive P. The explanation, as it is worded, refers only to the actual deception itself and not to the concealment of a deception by some one else.(14) The accused was manager and secretary of an incorporated company which was in a state of collapse, and the news of whose failure created a panic amongst its members. He thereupon prepared a false document affixing thereto the signature of a fictitous shareholder alleged to embody a resolution of the shareholders of the company sanctioning his resignation as secretary, and a copy of which he forwarded to the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies, and whereupon he was prosecuted for cheating and forgery, but it was held that the act constituted neither offence nor cheating because no damage or harm was likely to arise from the acts of the accused, his object being merely to escape the inconvenience and annoyance caused by the importunate inquiries of the shareholders.(15)

4650. Attempt: Abetment.—Instances have been given in the foregoing discussion of acts which falling short of cheating may yet amount to an attempt or abetment. An attempt must be distinguished from a mere preparation which is an indifferent act possessing no definite indication of criminality. It only develops into an attempt as soon as the accused has done all in his power to let the act be out of his control so that the commission of the crime would be a natural effect of the acts already committed. Such would be the purchase of a stamp paper in the name of another, which may or may not be used to forge a bond against the person in whose name it was purchased. But if the bond is actually executed in his name, the act then passes out of the region of preparation, and becomes an attempt and may even amount to forgery. The accused had borrowed money from the complainant and the two met to adjust their accounts which showed to be Rs. 33-5-3 due to the complainant, which he requested the accused to acknowledge in his account book. The accused thereupon made an entry in Malayan, a language unknown to the complainant, that the said sum had been paid to the complainant, and the account squared. He was prosecuted for forgery, but as the entry was not signed by the complainant it was held not to amount to a document, but it was held to constitute an attempt to cheat for which the accused was convicted.(16)

The accused was employed to note in a register the weight of sugarcane purchased by a factory. He had overstated the weight of a purchase

(14) Nga Po Maung, (1891) 1 U. B. R. 255.
(15) Lallubhai, 4 Bom. L. R. 440 (442).
(16) Kunju Nayar, 12 M. 114.

but was detected before he could fill all the connected entries. He was held to have been detected before he had reached beyond the stage of preparation.(17) But where the accused had fraudulently obtained a consignment receipt from the Railway for 300 bales of cotton worth Rs. 63,000. He pledged it for Rs. 40,000. It was found that he had only 200 available for despatch. He was convicted of an attempt to cheat; presumably because the complainant had issued only Hundis for Rs. 40,000 the payment of which was withheld in consequence of the detection of fraud.(18) A person is guilty of an attempt to cheat if he makes a claim for damages against an insurance company far in excess of the goods destroyed by fire.(19)

4851. The accused was the son of one A who had purchased some tobacco of B who drew up a bill stating the quantity sold and the instalment in which its price was payable. After the first instalment became due B presented the bill in A's shop for payment, when he was accosted by the accused who took the bill and indorsed on it payment of the money. This he did in spite of B's remonstrance. But having succeeded in making the entry he snatched away the bill tearing it in twain, only one fragment containing the writing remaining with the accused, and B then asked him for the money the payment of which he had indorsed, and to which the only reply the accused gave was: "Go away, I have paid." The accused being prosecuted pleaded payment. It was held that the mere writing of the indorsement on the bill was insufficient to constitute an attempt, which seemed to the Court at least to involve that the person charged should have taken some step towards the communication of the representation to the person whom it was the intention to deceive; but however probable it may have been that the accused would have taken such a step if the bill had been taken away from him, he did not in fact take it, and a man is punishable not in respect of what he may have intended to do, but in respect of what he does.(20)

The accused applied for employment to the Carriage and Locomotive Department of the Burmah Railways enclosing a false certificate purporting to have been issued by the District Loco Superintendent of Multan certifying the past employment of the applicant on the North Western Railway from the 1st July 1900 to the 15th April 1903, "when he resigned, character good." It was held that inasmuch as the accused intended to secure an employment by means of the false certificate he was guilty of attempting to cheat presumably under the second clause of the section, for the Court said:—"The 'injury' specified in section 415 of the Penal Code is as comprehensive as words can make it, and we hold that the respondent attempted to cheat."(21) But in another case the accused had applied for a temporary appointment in the Public Works Department. He had filed with his application a printed pamphlet containing his collected certificates which included one from one Mr. Clayton, Executive Engineer at Cawn-

(17) Lakshmi Prasad, 65 I. C. (Pat.) 492, 23 Cr. L. J. 108.
(18) Shiamji, 65 I. C. (N.) 694, 23 Cr. L. J. 210, (1922) A. I. R. (N.) 40.
(19) Mg Po Hmyin, 2 R. 53.
(20) Hurjee Mull v. Imam Ali Sircar, 8, C. W. N. 278, F. B.
(21) Fazal Din, (1906) 1 P. W. R. 9. This was held to be no forgery but in Abdul Razack, (1895) P. R. 2, it was held to amount to forgery; but in Lachman Lal, 4 Pat. L. J. 16; 49 I. C. 174; 20 Cr. L. J. 142 it was held to be neither forgery nor an attempt.

pur purporting to have been given by him some 20 years ago. Mr. Clayton denied its authorship and it was found that the certificate was a pure invention. Nevertheless the Court acquitted the accused of an attempt to cheat on the ground that since it was one of his many certificates which the accused expected would combinedly induce the recipient to offer him the appointment, it could not be said nor had it been proved that Mr. Clayton's certificate alone, if true, would have induced him to appoint him which he would not have done without it.[22] In other words, the inducement was too remote.

4652. Fraud by Post.—Several cases are reported of fraud committed by post. The debtor advises his creditor of the remittance of a sum of money in currency notes by insured post. On opening it the creditor finds its contents worthless. What offence has the debtor committed? It has been held in some cases that his offence is an attempt to cheat,[23] while in others it is held to constitute no offence,[24] though in one case it was conceded that it might amount to the fabrication of false evidence.[25] The act seems more in the nature of a preparation than an attempt, for which a closer relation to cheating would seem to be necessary. This appears to be the rationale of the case in which the accused, a broker had entered into a contract with the complainant for the sale of jute on behalf of the firm B which proved to be fictitious. The price of jute having risen the complainant prosecuted the broker but the prosecution was quashed on the ground that the prospective harm to the complainant was both uncertain and too remote[1] (§§ 4647, 4648).

4653. There need be no inducement in an attempt to cheat. A definite overt act intended to cheat is sufficient to constitute an attempt. The accused was a forest contractor who was by his agreement bound to grant passes to all comers wishing to cut timber in the Government forest, persons found cutting without such passes being subjected to a second payment. The accused realized more sums than were shown in his accounts, and he was prosecuted for fabricating false evidence and criminal breach of trust, but West, J., held it to be a case of an attempt to cheat.[2] So in another case the accused was detected travelling on an expired Railway pass of which the entries as to the date and the number of persons had been altered. It was held that the offence of the accused was an attempt to cheat the Railway Company.[3]

4654. The case was the same where the accused appearing before the Superintendent of the Municipal Octroi Duty for refund of duty paid by him, informed the Superintendent that the cart contained sixteen maunds of sugar, whereas it contained only six maunds of it, which was discovered before any money was paid out. It was held that the accused had attempted to cheat and was liable to a conviction for that offence.[4] But the case was held to be different where the accused induced the Moharir

(22) Lachman Lal, 4 Pat. L. J. 16; 49 I. C. 174; 20 Cr. L. J. 142.
(23) Arura, 1913 (P. R.) 10; 20 I. C. 596; 14 Cr. L. J. 426; Sadho Lal, 1 Pat. L. J. 391: 34 I. C. 992; 17 Cr. L. J. 272.
(24) Ram Behari, 50. C. 849; Tularam, 21 A. L. J. 865, 83 I. C. 993, (1924) A. 205; Vythinathaswami, 51 M. L. J. 800.
(25) Tularam, 21 A. L. J. 865, 83 I. C. 993, (1924) A. 205.
(1) Harendra Nath v. Jyotish Chandra, 52 C. 188 (194, 195).
(2) Ramjirav, 12 B. H. C. R. 1.
(3) Gunpat, (1868) P. R. 6.
(4) Bhagwan Dass, 2 A. L. J. R. 718.

to prepare a refund chalan for 460 bags of linseed, but as a matter of fact there were only 230 bags, the balance he however promised to produce the next day, when he sent some more carts, but they were stopped by the Municipality and a case for attempted cheating launched against him. The Court, however, acquitted the accused holding that the laxity of the Municipal procedure did not prove the dishonesty of the accused.(5)

On the 25th April the parents got to know that the accused was married. They gave the lady option to give up the accused or their house which she did, joining the accused who seduced her. It was held that the accused could not be convicted of this offence, because, while the accused had clearly deceived the girl her seduction was not the natural result of the deception.(6) A young boy A was married to B who was much older. On discovering her age A's father convened a panchayat who ordered return of the presents and the marriage was cancelled at the instance of A's mother and brother. Subsequently, B's father charged A's mother and brother for this offence, but the Court, having found no dishonest inducement, threw out the charge.(7) But the Court has convicted the accused who have brought about the marriage of girls by misrepresenting their caste. So, where a sweeper woman was passed off as a Jat woman,(8) and a Rajput as a Kunbin,(9) by marriage brokers who received the price for bringing about the marriage, they were both convicted of this offence.

Abetment.

4655. It may be sometimes difficult to say whether an act amounts to an attempt or abetment. For instance, take the following case: The goods train of a railway arrived late at a wayside station, and the guard was in a hurry to get away. The accused, who was the Assistant Station Master, came up to his van as he was starting and asked him to initial a consignment note misrepresenting it to be only a letter or words to that effect. The guard hurriedly put his initials in the Station Receipt Book against the words " one only " which were afterwards altered to " four only," and the description " four bales silk " was also subsequently interpolated—as meaning that the accused had delivered four bales of silk in charge of the guard. He was convicted under section 418, but Sargent, C. J., and Candy, J., altered it to one for an abetment holding that the act was neither cheating nor an attempt to cheat, because the forwarding by the accused of the fictitious consignment notes could only be regarded as preparatory to the offence of cheating. It was not done in the attempt to cheat, but was an abetment of cheating, the principal being presumably either the owner of the bales or the guard.(10) The three accused, who were known to the complainant, persuaded him to gamble with one Fakirya who had been rigged out as a rich Seth, and whom they represented to be so, adding that he should fall an easy prey to

(5) Birjraj, 17 C. W. N. 294, 18 I. C. 680, 14 Cr. L. J. 120.

(6) Milton v. Sherman, 22 C. W. N. 1001, 45 I C. 701, 19 Cr. L. J. 781.

(7) Jumman, 21 A. L. J. 321, (1923) A. I. R. (A.) 431.

(8) Jhanda Singh, (1918) P. R. No. 16 44 I. C. 351, 19 Cr. L. J. 335.

(9) Jham Singh, 58 I. C. 820, 21 Cr. L. J. 820.

(10) Raghunath, (1889) B. U. C. 470; following Padala Venkatasami, 3 M. 4, relying on s. 116, ante; as to not being an attempt, see Doyal Bawri, 3 B. L. R. A. C. 55; Riasab Ali, 7 C. 352.

the complainant who thereupon gambled with Fakirya who was a notorious and practised gambler well versed in all the tricks of gambling, and who cheated the complainant of all he had. It was held that the three accused were guilty of cheating and Fakirya of abetment.[11] All that is reported of this case is the judgment and it is not clear from it what further part the three accused took and why they were guilty of the substantive offence while Fakirya was only guilty of abetment.

4656. Immoral Contract.—Although the section is generally worded, it has been held that no person should be permitted to prosecute in a criminal Court for an act for which he will obtain no redress from the civil Court. It was so held in a case in which the accused had agreed to hire out her daughter for concubinage to the complainant for one year for Rs. 70 out of which she was paid Rs. 35 in advance. Later on she refused to carry out her contract or to refund the advance. The Court held the contract immoral and rejected the complaint on the ground of public policy.[12] But the doctrine of public policy must be used with discrimination. The accused offered for sale to complainant spurious trinkets which he said were made of gold, but offered cheap as they had been stolen. The accused was convicted of an attempt to cheat.[13]

Cheating by personation.

416. A person is said to "cheat by personation" if he cheats by pretending to be some other person, or by knowingly substituting one person for another, or representing that he or any other person is a person other than he or such other person really is.

Explanation.—The offence is committed whether the individual personated is a real or imaginary person.

Illustrations.

(a) A cheats by pretending to be a certain rich banker of the same name. A cheats by personation.

(b) A cheats by pretending to be B, a person who is deceased. A cheats by personation.

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4657). (2) Cheating by Personation (4658-4665).

4657. Analogous Law.—This section defines "cheating by personation," an offence for which the penalty is prescribed in section 419. The offence owes its aggravation to the fact that it affects both the person deceived as well as the person personated.

4658. Cheating by Personation—This offence is a special form of cheating practised by false personation which the section describes as

(11) Jaharna, (1904) P. R. No. 4.
(12) Jani Hira, 14 Bom. L. R. 503, 15 I. C. 793, 13 Cr. L. J. 521.
(13) Abdullah, (1914) P. R. No. 14, 23 I. C. 473, 15 Cr. L. J. 265.

"pretending to be some other person or by knowingly substituting one person for another, or representing that he or any other person is a person other than he or such other person really is." The false personation may be by word, act or conduct. But it must be a personation, otherwise the accused could not be convicted under section 419. The fact that a person falsely describes himself as a naval officer and thereby obtains credit is such an offence.(14) And such representation need not be by word of mouth. For where the accused put on the cap and gown of an undergraduate of Magdalen College at Oxford and went to a bootmaker ordering him to send him goods, and when questioned he said that he belonged to that college, which was false, Bolland, B., said: "If nothing had passed in words, I should have laid down that the fact of the prisoner's appearing in the cap and gown would have been pregnant evidence from which a jury would infer that he pretended he was a member of the University, and if so, would have been a sufficient false pretence to satisfy the Statute. It is clearly so by analogy to the cases in which the offering in payment the notes of a bank which had failed knowing them to be so has been held to be a false pretence without any words being used."(15)

4659. The accused was asked by a patient if he was the Mr. H. who had cured Mrs. C. at the Oxford Infirmary and to which he replied he was, which was false, but the prosecutor believing in him advanced him a sum of money for his treatment and purchased his meditine. It was held that inasmuch as the accused had induced the prosecutor to deliver money by representing himself to be Mr. H. he was guilty of cheating by personation.(16) In another case the accused told the prosecutrix that he was a member of a club called the "Instant Benefit" which he described as in a very solvent state. The prosecutrix would not be persuaded then, but a month later the accused visited her again and said no more than that the club was strong and respectable whereupon the prosecutrix gave him 3*d*, for membership which he misappropriated. It was held that it was for the jury to connect the two representations and to say if they formed one continuing representation,(17) and on their verdict would then depend whether the accused could be convicted of cheating merely or of cheating by personation. One Vellore Absalom David was a registered candidate for a University Examination. The accused entered the hall as Vellore David and answered the examination questions in that name. He was prosecuted and the Court held that in obtaining an admission ticket to the examination hall in the name of David he had committed the offence of cheating by personation and in signing himself in the examination papers as David he committed the offence of forgery and for both of which he was convicted.(18) The accused entered as a candidate for a prize in a foot-race. He was a superior runner and a previous winner, but in order to gain an advantage over his competitors he falsely declared himself to be one Sanis and as one who had never previously won a race. He was convicted of attempting to obtain the

---

(14) Wickham, 13 Ad. & E. 34.
(15) Barnard, 7 C. & P. 784.
(16) Bloomfield C. & M. 537.
(17) Welman, Dears C. C. 188.
(18) Appasami, 12 M. 151; followed in Soshi Bhushan, 15 A. 210.

prize by false pretences, and on a case reserved his conviction was affirmed, it being held that the attempt was not too remote from the pretence.(19)

4660. False personation may consist as much in personating another as in the dishonest concealment of facts relating to one's own personality. So where the accused falsely represented to the prosecutor that a girl which he intended to sell him in marriage was a Brahmin, and whereupon the prosecutor who was a Brahmin paid him the money and married her to his brother and it afterwards appeared that the girl was a Sudra, it was held that the accused was guilty of this offence.(20) The term "person" is thus used here in its rather wide sense as connoting not only a separate individual but also a material misdescription of the same individual. Such misdescription may consist as to one's position in life as in the illustration (a) or of one's caste as in the cases last cited, or in any other matter influencing the mind or judgment of man.

It has, however, been held in the Punjab that mis-statement of a person's caste is not such misdescription as to amount to cheating by personation. This was laid down in a case in which the facts were these: A was the wife of B who was absent on duty at Kohat. His wife A who was then aged 16 lived with her mother-in-law and from whose custody she eloped with a man C who made her over to D who kept her as his mistress, and then sold her to a woman P who presented her to her husband R and herself went away to live at another place. This man kept her as his mistress for a couple of months and he then sold her to another man E. Meanwhile her husband (B) and his brother-in-law were making a search for her and traced her to E, who was convicted with R for kidnapping and cheating, P being convicted of the abetment. So far as regards R's conviction for cheating, the prosecution relied upon his having sold her to E describing her to be a kirari woman, though in fact she was a Brahmin. It was found that the misrepresentation of her caste enabled R to realize Rs. 250 as her price which he would not have obtained if he had truthfully stated her caste. This was held to justify R's conviction under section 420, though not under section 419.(21) The soundness of this view depends upon what is to be understood by "representing that any person is a person other than such a person is."

4661. There appears to be no reason why this should not include a representation that a Brahmin is a non-Brahmin or vice versa. It certainly includes a misdescription as to one's position in life as in illustration (a). And it is clear that the misdescription may assume any other form and have the same effect. So it has been held to be cheating by personation for a person to describe a girl to be the daughter of A and of good family when in fact she was the daughter of another woman.(22) The accused was charged with having filed

(19) Button, (1900) 2 Q. B. 597.
(20) Mohim Chunder Sil, 16 W. R. 42 43).
(21) Durga Das, (1904) P. R. No. 13. To the same effect, Singhara, (1903) P. L. R. 613.
(22) Dhunput Ojhah, 7 W. R. 51.

certain Jamabandis purporting to have been prepared and signed by one "Ganpat Lal Patwari." They were really signed by Ganpat Lal, but he signed them as Patwari though they related to a time when he did not fill that office. The object of so signing them was clearly to induce a belief as to their genuineness, and thereby affect delivery or retention of property. The question, however, was whether the preparation of such Jamabandis constituted forgery, but it was held by Ainslie, J., that the misrepresentation by false description of one's position in life was distinctly provided for by this section, and that therefore the document could not be held to be a forgery under the first part of section 464 but would be evidence of cheating by personation under this section.(23)

4662. It is clearly cheating by personation in A to obtain a hall ticket giving himself out as B and then answer B's examination paper and sign them in B's name. Here as the real candidate was B, A's personation of him would be cheating by personation,(24) and B would be guilty of abetment. In one case the accused Ahmada had sold a mare in the Lyallpur fair to one Lalu and got the sale registered under the false name of Sultan. The mare was not stolen property, and all that the accused did was to give a false name to the Moharir He was convicted of this offence, it is submitted wrongly, for there is nothing illegal in trading in cognito unless there is any intention to defraud. But in the Punjab the view taken of section 415 is that the term "intentionally" in the second clause governs that clause alone, the words "fraudulently" or "dishonestly" only qualifying the first part of the section. This may be so; but nevertheless, a mere giving of a wrong name to a cattle sale Moharir is of itself not cheating by personation in any sense of the term,(25) and in the case under reference there was nothing to shew that if the accused had given his name as Ali Baba, Lalu would have hesitated to purchase the mare.

4663. A personation of another may be innocent or fraudulent. This section is not intended to punish all cases of false personation but only those in which it is used as a means to cheating. Now it is obvious that such personation may be of the cheat himself or of another person utilized by the cheat. In the former case the cheat pretends or represents himself to be some other person, while in the latter case he substitutes one person for another. The pretension or representation may be by disguise or it may be by verbal persuasion as in the illustration, or it may be by both. So if a person who is a notorious gambler and a cheat dons the dress of a rich Marwari and three of his confederates represent him an easy victim to the complainant who intending to cheat him in gambling is himself cheated, the cheat would be guilty of this offence.(1) So where the accused knowingly represented one Mt. Jasoda to be Mt. Bitia, the mother of a sepoy named Kapur Singh who had been killed in action, and thereby induced the military authorities to grant her a pension which she drew for nearly nine years, he was held to have committed this offence.(2)

(23) Joy Kurn Singh v. Man Patuck, 21 W. R. 41 (43).
(24) Appasami, 12 M. 151; Katamraju, 28 M. 90, F. B.
(25) Ahmada, (1914) P. R. No. 9, 27 I. C. 203.
(1) Jahara, (1905) P. R. No. 4.
(2) Kirab Singh, (1907) A. W. N. 291.

4664. But where a servant purchased a stamp paper in the name of his master, it was held that though he had personated his master he did not cheat for he had no fraudulent or dishonest intention,(3) or rather because it was a mere preparation as distinct from an attempt. Where A who had executed a deed fell ill on her way to the registration office and she thereupon requested B to personate her and admit the deed for registration, which she did, she was held to have personated A but committed no cheating by such personation, and though she was convicted under the Registration Act, her conviction for this offence was quashed.(4) In another case on the same facts the Sessions Judge justified the conviction on the ground that the false personation of the executant by the accused had caused harm to the Registrar, but the Court held that the "damage or harm" must be the necessary consequence of the Act done by reason of the deceit practised, or must be necessarily likely to follow therefrom. The possibility of the Registrar suffering in reputation and losing fees in future from persons deterred from registering their transactions is too remote to be in the contemplation of section 415.(5) But the false personation of a witness, as where B passes himself off as A and deposes as such is not cheating under this section but giving false evidence within the meaning of section 193 of the Indian Evidence Act.(6)

4665. Of course, it is not necessary for the purpose of cheating that the person personated should be a real person. For cheating may be as effectively done by representing oneself to be some other person whether that person is real or imaginary. But in either case the personation must be used as an aid to deception and inducing delivery of property so as to constitute cheating within the meaning of that term as defined in section 415. In other words, the fact that a person falsely personates another is not cheating, but false personation if used to cheat aggravates the offence if the offence of cheating is proved.

Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Non-cog. Warrant. Bailable. Cognizable. Court's sanction.

417. Whoever cheats shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

Punishment for cheating.

[Cheats—s. 415.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4666).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4667-4671).
(3) No Cheating (4672).
(4) Proof (4673).
(5) Form of Charge (4674).
(6) Evidence of Simple Cheating (4675-4680).
(7) No Cheating (4681-4687).
(8) Marriage Lies (4686).
(9) Cure Dispute (4687).
(10) Evidence of Other Acts (4688-4694).
(11) Evidence of Conduct (4690).

(3) Keruppanna, (1883) 1 Weir 480.
(4) Loothy Bewa, 11 W. R. 24.
(5) Mojey, 17 C. 606.
(6) Prema Bhika, 1 B. H. C. R. 89.

4666. Analogous Law.—This section punishes the simplest case of cheating not otherwise provided for. Since section 420 also punishes the same offence, a question may arise and has arisen as to the scope of the two sections, the distinction between which is all the more important in view of the fact that while this offence is non-cognizable section 420 is cognizable; and while an offence falling under this section is triable by a Magistrate of the second class, that under s. 420 is not so triable. The fact that section 420 speaks of the inducement resulting in the delivery of property, appears to make no difference, for, but for such delivery the offence of cheating would be incomplete. The two sections are really redundant and this was presumably recognized by Couch and Newton JJ., who laid it down that "effect should if possible, be given to both sections of the Act, and that the offence of cheating accompanied by a delivery of property may be punished under either section; when the case appears to the trying authority to be of a serious nature steps should be taken that it may be sent to the Court of Session and punished under section 420."(7)

4667. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable, but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both bailable and compoundable with the permission of the Court, and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first or second class.

4668. The venue for this offence may be laid either in the place where the deception was practised or where the delivery of property in consequence of the deception took place.(8) So if A post a letter containing money, obtained by cheating, for delivery in the district P and the cheat receives it in the district R the accused may be prosecuted either in the district P or R.(9) A cheque issued at Gaya was dishonoured by a bank in Calcutta and the notice of such dishonour was given to the complainant at Butan. It was held that the accused might be prosecuted at any one of the three places namely, Calcutta, Gaya or Butan.(10)

4669. Where an accused person attempts to cheat a whole body of villagers and speaks to them as a body, and to each individual villager for the purpose, he may be tried on one charge for each attempt to get money from them.(11) The accused asked the villagers for 8 annas and 4 annas a piece for signing their land certificates. He did not ask each individual singly but spoke to them in a body. It was held that he was thereupon rightly charged as for a single attempt to cheat.(12)

4670. Property obtained by cheating is not stolen property, so that the receiver from the cheat acquires full right thereto and is not liable to restore it to the owner on conviction of the cheat, unless the receiver be his confederate.(13)

(7) Bapu, (1864) B. U. C. 2; Billinghurst, 27 C. W. N. 821, (1924) A. I. R. (C.) 18 (41).

(8) S. 179, Cr. P. C. The English rule is the same; Jones, 19 L. J. M. C. 162; Buttery, 4 B. & Ald. 179; Ellis. (1899) 1 Q. B. 230; Leach, 25 L. J. M. C. 77; Allington, 9 T. L. R. 199; Holmes, 12 Q. B. D. 23.

(9) Jones, 19 L. J. M. C. 162.

(10) Metcalfe v. Watson, 76 I. C. (C.) 17; 25 Cr. L. J. 81.

(11) 2 C. L. J. 618.

(12) Ibid.

(13) S. 410.

4671. This is one of those sections in which the Court should carefully discriminate between the civil liability and a crime, and in a case where the Court saw no prima facie case against the accused, it stopped the inquiry and discharged the accused.(14) In another case an insurance company refused to redeem its policy on the ground that the age of the deceased policy-holder was misstated. The Court quashed the proceedings holding the matter to be one of a purely civil nature.(15) Again, though a case may, strictly speaking, be one of cheating it does not follow that the Court will lend its machinery to the prosecution of a person against whom the doors of the civil Court are closed. So where the accused was paid Rs. 35 agreeing to let her daughter on hire to the prosecutor for one year for Rs. 70, and she was prosecuted for cheating, the Court refused to act, holding that no Court could afford redress for breach of an immoral contract for which the prosecutor had no civil remedy.(16) It has already been seen that evidence of the subsequent conduct of the accused is admissible to prove his intention (§§ 4630-4631). But evidence that the accused had similarly cheated others on previous occasions is not admissible either under s. 14 or s. 15 of the Evidence Act.(17) Where the accused had obtained the thumb impressions of ten persons on blank papers upon which he afterwards drew up bonds, he could not be tried for all the ten offences on a consolidated complaint of the ten complainants.(18)

4672. No Cheating.—There is nothing to prevent the High Court from quashing a conviction for cheating, even though there be concurrent findings of facts to the contrary, if there is nothing on record to justify them.(19)

4673. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused deceived some person.

(2) That he thereby induced him.

(3) That the inducement was fraudulent or dishonest.(20)

(4) That the person so induced delivered or consented to the retention of some property.

Or prove:—

(1) That the accused deceived some person.

(2) That the accused thereby induced him.

(3) That such inducement was intentional.

(4) That the person so induced did or omitted to do something.

(5) That such act or omission caused, or was likely to cause, damage or harm to that person in body, mind, reputation or property.

(14) Nrisingha, 20 C. W. N. 1112.
(15) Hiran Kumar v. Mangal Sen, 17 C. W. N. 761, 20 I. C. 222.
(16) Jani Hira, 14 Bom. L. R. 503, 15 I. C. 793.
(17) Abdul Wahid, 34 A. 93.
(18) Girja Dayal, 25 O. C. 151, 69 I. C. 271, (1922) A. I. R. (Oudh) 250.
(19) Shib Das, (1909) P. W. R. 13, 4 I. C. 978.
(20) Which must, of course, be proved by the prosecution; Khairati, 15 A. L. J. 807, 42 I. C. 1005, 19 Cr. L. J. 45.

4674. Charge.—A charge for cheating ought to mention the date on which[21] and manner in which the cheating is alleged to have been committed,[22] as also the name of the person who was cheated[23] though this omission is curable by s. 537 of the Criminal Procedure Code.[24] The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the ——day of——-at——you cheated A B by deceiving him fraudulently (or dishonestly induced him) to deliver some property to wit—[or induced him to consent to the retention of some property, to wit—by you (or C D)] [or by intentionally inducing the said A B to do (or omit to do) something, to wit—which the said A B would not do (or omit to do) if he were not so deceived, which caused him (or was likely to cause him) damage (or harm) in body, mind, reputation or property]; and that you thereby committed the offence punishable under section 417 (or 420) of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session, or High Court).

["And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge].

4675. Evidence of Simple Cheating.—This section prescribes the penalty for the simple offence of cheating. The offence itself has been defined in section 415 under which its ingredients will be found to have been fully set out (§ 4596). The enactment of section 420 prescribing a penalty for a similar offence raises a doubt as to the necessity of two similar sections in the Code. But so long as these two sections remain, some workable rule should be agreed upon as to the applicability of each. In the opinion of Couch and Newton, JJ., this section should be reserved only for cases of minor importance, the other section being applied to more serious cases, and to those in which there is delivery of the property of the nature there described (§ 4665). It would seem that the Codifiers intended to discriminate between cheating not followed by delivery of property or other consequences specified in section 415, and one in which there was such delivery. But a deceitful inducement not attended with delivery is merely an attempt as distinguished from a completed offence (§§ 4651-4655) and consequently the position of both this section and section 420 in the Code is anomalous.

However, reserving this section only to cases of comparative unimportance, the questions that call for notice are: (i) Did the act constitute cheating; (ii) was it not otherwise provided for; and (iii) what is there in the nature of the act so as to make a case fit for punishment under this section?

(21) Farsand Ali, 96 I. C. 221, (1926) Pat. 347.

(22) Kedar Nath, 29 C. W. N. 408, 86 I. C. 705, (1925) C. 603; Janke Das, (1922) P. L. R. 38, 68 I. C. 819, 23 Cr. L. J. 595.

(23) Billinghurst, 27 C. W. N. 821, (1924) A. I. R. (C.) 18 (41).

(24) Gokul Khatik, 29 C. W. N. 483, 86 I. C. 970, (1925) C. 674.

4676. As regards the first, the requirements of this section are the same whatever may be the nature or gravity of the offence. Such requirements have been already the subject of discussion under section 415. But they may be again briefly adverted to here. As has been already pointed out, the two essential ingredients of this offence are deceit and inducement. Of these two there must be first deceit and then inducement. If there was no deceit but inducement there cannot be cheating and vice versa (§§ 4612-4613). The practice of deception implies the practice of fraud and falsehood. For there can be no deception without fraud, and falsehood is a species of fraud implied in deceit. Now fraud is hydra-headed, and its ways of attack are insidious and innumerable. It may consist of words, acts or conduct or all combined (§ 4607). There is no general rule as to what deceit should consist of and the Courts have rightly regarded it as a question of fact to be decided upon the facts of each case (§ 4609).

4677. The deception may or may not be seen through. If it is seen through the receiver cannot be said to have cheated though there may be a stage when the person deceived may have been "induced," though he may have been disabused before he delivered property or suffered the other consequences which complete the crime. In that case the offence is inchoate, though if the deceiver has gone beyond the stage of preparation and committed an overt act amounting to an attempt he may be so punished. Such was the case of the accused who being indebted to the complainant in the sum of Rs. 600 sent him a letter insured for Rs. 650, but which contained nothing but blank paper, whereupon his conviction for attempted cheating was justified presumably on the ground that the complainant had been induced to sign the acknowledgment which he did on the assurance implied by the fact stated on the letter that its contents were valued at Rs. 650.[25]

4678. Persons not guilty of an attempt may still be liable for an abetment (§ 4655). But abetment does not imply that the offence is incomplete. It only presupposes instigation of the offence (§§ 999, 1002), whether the offence instigated is or is not committed in consequence (§ 1003). If it is committed in consequence the abettor is liable to an enhanced penalty (§ 1052). But it does not thence follow that if the offence is not committed the abettor is not liable (§ 1072).

4679. The inducement necessary to constitute cheating may be (i) fraudulent; (ii) dishonest; or (iii) merely intentional. Now an intentional inducement can only amount to cheating if it leads to the doing of an injurious act (§§ 4608, 4612, 4613), as distinct from or unconnected with the delivery or retention of property (§ 4624). An intentional inducement merely as such for delivery of property does not amount to cheating, unless that intention is also fraudulent or case dishonest. An act may be fraudulent without being dishonest as in the case of the decree-holder making a false endorsement on the writ of attachment to the effect that the bailiff wanted a cart to go in, to execute the process, and that he did not go at all but wanted the accused to make a false report that he had gone to the house of the judgment-debtor, but could not attach his property as his house was locked.(1) Other cases have been already given to illustrate the difference (§§ 4612-4619). An act may be fraudulent if it is malicious and intended to injure though it may be unconnected with the delivery of property. If it is dishonest, it must be necessarily connected with the delivery of property. The question whether an act was fraudulent or dishonest depends upon proof of facts and circumstances which may justifiably lead the Court to a conclusion that the inducement was fraudulent or dishonest, and that it had caused the delivery of property. The delivery of property must have of course effected a wrongful distribution of property, for if the receipt or retention was legal, the act which induced it could not be illegal (§ 4637).

(25) Sadho Lal, (1916) 1 Pat. L. J. 391; 34 I. C. 922; Arura, (1913) P. R. 10; 20 I. C. 596.

4680. But apart from the delivery of property there may be cheating, where the person induced does an act or suffers an omission injurious to the person deceived. The terms of this clause of section 415 are wide, but they must be confined only to such injuries as are at once appreciable (§§ 4644, 4645), and proximate (§§ 4600-4604).

4681. No Cheating.—So there may be a promise to induce another, but it would fall short of an inducement within the meaning of s. 415. Such was the case of a pleader who promised to induce his client to agree to certain terms on the faith of which a case was to be compromised, but the client would not agree to the pleader's persuasion which was not the latter's fault, though he was dragged into Court for this offence.(2)

4682. As observed before (§ 4670) recourse to this section should not be too readily had where from all appearances the matter savours of a civil dispute. The accused held three bonds from the complainant who really owed him some Rs. 170. He paid him Rs. 116. The accused returned him two of his bonds withholding the third. The complainant alleged that such withholding was fraudulent as the accused had agreed to compound them all for Rs. 116, but the Court opined that even if the accused had tricked the complainant into paying him Rs. 116 as alleged, it would not be cheating as the accused was not legally bound to relinquish the balance due to him.(3)

4683. It is of course, no cheating to obtain decrees by means of forged bonds.(4) So there can be no cheating where the statement of fact is no more than a statement of opinion which may be reasonably probable though not literally true. The accused who were owners of a pilgrim ship advertised its sailing "about the 12th October" by which times its repairs were likely to be completed. They were however completed on the 23rd and it sailed on the 24th October. They were prosecuted for receiving fares by cheating, but the Court acquitted them on appeal, holding that the assumption of a sanguine anticipation

(1) Hari Shankar, 6 Bom. L. R. 375.
(2) Nrishingha, 20 C. W. N. 1112.
(3) Mausa Ram, (1913) P. L. R. 327, 20 I. C. 1104.
(4) Chuni, (1913) P. R. No. 10, 27 I. C. 200.

was not such a misrepresentation as would render the accused criminally liable.(5) The prosecutor complained that the accused had sub-mortgaged to him a house to which his mortgagor had no title as proved in an objection case filed against the accused's brother. He was convicted but on revision his conviction was quashed on the ground that even if the house be in fact found to belong not to the mortgagor but to his grandfather, who successfully claimed it in the objection proceedings, it was no ground for holding the accused guilty of cheating, because there was neither fraud nor dishonesty on the part of the accused in sub-mortgaging a house on the terms of which his other property was equally liable for realization of any balance irrecoverable from the sale of the mortgaged property.(6)

4684. A Railway Company issued tickets to students at a reduced rate. As such certain students received a certificate entitling them to receive tickets at a reduced fare. This was utilized by other students, whereupon they were convicted of cheating, but the High Court held them not guilty on the ground that as students, they were entitled to the concession, and that the students' tickets were not untransferable, so that even if the original students had purchased the tickets the accused could have legally used them.(7) It is not cheating the Railway Company where one obtains a larger allotment of wagons than one was fairly entitled to. The fraudulent act of the Railway Company's servants in unduly favouring some applicants over others has not the effect of causing any appreciable damage to the Company's reputation as the damage would in any case be too remote.(8)

4685. There can be, of course, no cheating where there is no dishonesty and no fraud. Certain recruits were presented to and rejected by the Recruiting Officer. They were offered to the accused, who was Lambardar, through whom recruits had got to be enlisted, as fresh recruits. He presented them as such to the Recruiting Officer who discovered that they had already been rejected by him. The accused was convicted of cheating, but there was nothing to support his conviction for it was found that he had been himself misled, and he was acquitted on appeal.(9) There might be misrepresentation but no deception in charging a discount on currency notes.(10) Such discount is charged by money changers everywhere.

4686. So while a number of lies pass muster in marriage contracts, there is a limit to the endurance of Criminal Law. The accused, a married man, got engaged to and seduced a lady to whose parents he introduced himself as a bachelor. On the 25th April the parents got to know that the accused was married. They gave the lady option to give up the accused or their house, which she did joining the accused who seduced her. It was held that the accused could not be convicted

Marriage Lies.

(5) Ebrahimji, 15 Bom. L. R. 297, 19 I. C. 328.
(6) Hari Krishan, (1910) P. W. R. 40, 8 I. C. 256.
(7) James Fletcher, 7 M. L. J. 201, 5 I. C. 973.
(8) Manmatha, 51 C. 250.
(9) Mhd. Shah. (1918) P. R. No. 34 48 I. C. 877, 20 Cr. L. J. 77.
(10) Murarji, 43 B. 842.

of this offence, because while the accused had clearly deceived the girl, her seduction was not the natural result of the deception.[11] A young boy A was married to B who was much older. On discovering her age A's father convened a panchayat who ordered return of the presents, and the marriage was cancelled at the instance of A's mother and brother. Subsequently, B's father charged A's mother and brother for this offence, but the Court having found that there was no dishonest inducement, threw out the charge.[12] But the Court have convicted the accused who have brought about the marriage of girls by misrepresenting their caste. So where a sweeper woman was passed off as a Jat woman,[13] and a Rajput as a Kunbin[14] by marriage brokers who received the price for bringing about the marriage, they were both convicted of this offence.

Cure Dispute.

4687. It has already been seen that questions involving the determination of civil rights cannot be appropriately tried in the guise of criminal offences. Where a partner realizes the dues due to a partnership even after its dissolution, it cannot be denounced as done on purpose to cheat his quondam partner.[15] It may amount to cheating if its ingredients are present and proved; but without such proof—and let it be added, clear proof—the Court will refer the complainant to the Civil Court. The complainant owed the accused Rs. 170 on three bonds. He complained that the accused had accepted Rs. 116 in full payment of all the bonds but returned only two of them claiming a further sum due on the third, the Court held it to be no cheating since the creditor was legally entitled to the full sum legally due on the three bonds.[16] The accused was the complainant's pleader in a proceeding under s. 107 of the Criminal Procedure Code. He had agreed to persuade his client to avert a sale. He failed to do so, whereupon the party, aggrieved by his inaction, flew to Court for action under this section. His complaint was naturally dismissed.[17]

4688. Evidence of Other Acts.—These are then the elementary pre-requisites of the offence, the proof of which must depend upon the proof of facts and acts which law declares to be relevant for this purpose. Thus, only such evidence as establishes the fraudulent or dishonest intention of the accused, at the time of the commission of the act in respect of which the cheating is alleged, is held to be relevant to establish this offence. For instance, take the case supposed in illustration (f) of a person borrowing money from another not intending to repay it. The offence is declared to be cheating, but it is cheating only if at the time of the loan the debtor had no such intention, but not otherwise. In other words, if the debtor intended to fulfil his obligation at the time of contracting the loan but afterwards

---

(11) Milton v. Sherman, 22 C. W. N. 1001, 45 I. C. 701, 19 Cr. L. J. 781.

(12) Jumman, 21 A. L. J. 321, (1923) A. I. R. (A.) 431.

(13) Jhanda Singh, (1918) P. R. No. 16 44 I. C. 351, 19 Cr. L. J. 335.

(14) Jham Singh, 58 I. C. 820, 21 Cr. L. J. 820.

(15) Paruchery, 36 I. C. (M.) 872, 18 Cr. L. J. 40.

(16) Mansa Ram, (1913) P. W. R. 25, 20 I. C. 1004, 14 Cr. L. J. 524.

(17) Nir Singha v. Kumudendu, 20 C. W. H. 1112, 37 I. C. 34, 18 Cr. L. J. 50.

changed his mind, his subsequent dishonesty, howmuchsoever culpable from the standpoint of social ethics, is not criminal within the meaning of this section.[18] Where therefore the two brothers A and B borrowed Rs. 900 from C, and who having threatened them with a suit, they agreed to mortgage their house to him. They purchased a stamp and got a mortgage engrossed thereon, and one of them A even signed it but B refused to execute it unless he was paid Rs. 200, which C naturally declined to pay, while, however, C was pressing for the execution and B for the payment, the two brothers secretly executed a mortgage in favour of another person D, the registration of which C attempted to prevent, but was unsuccessful. He thereupon prosecuted both A and B for cheating, but Melville, J., held it to be no case of cheating but only of a breach of contract.[19]

4689. The accused represented to the complainant that he would pay the amount of a decree, and thereby induced the complainant to pay the accused a certain sum of money for the purpose of being applied in satisfaction of the decree. He received the money and failed to apply it as he had promised, whereupon the complainant charged him of this offence, but the Court held it to be a breach of contract and not cheating.[20] In both these cases there was a promise and a subsequent default, and all that the Court held was that the mere proof of a subsequent default, was no proof of cheating. But subsequent default is evidence of the previous dishonest intention,[21] though it is obviously inconclusive.

Evidence of Conduct.

4690. But evidence may be given of other similar subsequent defaults as showing that the default in question was not accidental but intentional and as a part of the same system of fraud.[22] Some doubt has been cast on this rule by a judgment of West and Birdwood, JJ., who held section 119 of the Indian Evidence Act to be insufficient to let in evidence of other transactions. In that case the accused purchased wool with delivery of possession from a firm agreeing to pay its price on the next day. He failed to pay as promised and pledged the wool to another and raised money thereon. He was prosecuted under section 420 and the prosecution produced evidence of two other similar purchases made by the accused, in which he had made similar promises after which he had similarly pledged the wool and misappropriated the proceeds.

But the Court excluded this evidence,[23] relying on the judgment of Melville and West, JJ., in another case of the same Court,[24] in which they held section 11 to be limited by section 54 of the Indian Evidence Act. It was a case of forgery, and the view of the Court in that case was that it was not open to the prosecution to produce

---

(18) Hargovandas, (1872) 9 B. H. C. 448; Fazul, (1886) B. U. C. 412; Venkatachala, (1883) 1 Weir 476; Viraswami, (1881) 1 Weir 478.

(19) Haragovandas, 9 B. H. C. R. 448.

(20) Venkatchala, (1883) 1 Weir 476.

(21) Hceramun Hulwye, 5 W. R. 5.

(22) S. 11, Indian Evidence Act; Fazul, (1886) B. U. C. 312; Wyatt, (1904) 1 K. B. 188; Rhodes, (1899) 1 Q. B. 77; Smith, (1905) 69 J. P. 51.

(23) Fazul, (1886) B. U. C. 312.

(24) Parbudas, 11 B. H. C. R. 90.

a number of other forged documents found in the possession of the accused as establishing that his possession of the particular document in question was intentional and not accidental. And West, J., said: "Section 11 of the Evidence Act is, no doubt, expressed in terms so extensive as that any fact which can, by a claim of ratiocination, be brought into connexion with another, so as to have a bearing upon a point in issue may possibly be held to be relevant within its meaning. But the connection of human affairs are so infinitely various and so far-reaching, that thus to take the section in its widest admissible sense would be to complicate every trial with a mass of collateral injuries limited only by the patience and the means of the parties. One of the objects of the law of evidence is to restrict the investigation made by Courts within the bounds prescribed by general convenience, and this object would be completely frustrated by the admission on all occasions of every circumstance on either side having some remote and conjectural probative force, the precise amount of which might itself be ascertainable only by a long trial and a demonstration of fresh collateral issues, growing up in endless succession as the enquiry proceeded.(25)

4691. It is not intended to discuss here the general operation of this section of the Evidence Act, but it is submitted that these remarks have no application to the evidence of other acts of cheating which is admitted both in England(1) as well as in this country.(2) In England, such evidence is admissible, not as tending to establish the fact in issue, but as tending to establish a system and negativing accident or mistake, for which evidence, not only of acts prior to that complained of but of all acts subsequent thereto, is admissible. The defendant was indicted for obtaining certain furniture by false pretences from a furniture dealer at Brighton between October 14th and 17th. It was held that evidence that the defendant a few days afterwards obtained other goods from another at Brighton by means of false pretences the same as, or similar to, those charged in the indictment was admissible as tending to show that it really related to one transaction and was all part of the same system of fraud.(3) The fact that the transaction as to which evidence is tendered had already been the subject of a previous trial resulting in the acquittal of the accused would not seem to render evidence of it inadmissible. The defendant was indicted for obtaining money on a worthless cheque on the 5th of July from A, but he was acquitted. He was then indicted for obtaining money from other persons on the 24th and 26th of June and on the 6th of July on other worthless cheques, and A was called to prove the indictment dated the 5th July, and his evidence was held to be admissible on the second indictment.(4)

4692. It has been stated before, that the offence consists of deceit and inducement. It has already been seen that the facts constituting

(25) Parbudas, 11 B. H. C. R. 90.

(1) Rhodes, (1899) 1 Q. B. 77; Wyatt, (1904) 1 K. B. 188; Smith, (1905) 69 J. P. 51; Walford, (1907) 71 J. P. 215.

(2) S. 14, Indian Evidence Act; Debendra Pershad, 36 C. 573; Girdhari Lal, (1913) P. R. No. 12, 6 I. C. 964.

(3) Smith, (1905) 69 J. P. 51. In such case the evidence of a similar fraud is of course admissible. Rhodes, (1899) 1 Q. B. 77; Wyatt, (1904) 1 K. B. 188.

(4) Ollis (1900) 2 Q. B. 758.

deceit cannot be the subject of a general statement. They must be proved in such case and in which it will then be a question of fact whether the act, fact or conduct was intentional or accidental, and if intentional, what was the intention. The question whether it sufficed to induce the person deceived to deliver property is again a question of fact admitting of no general enunciation. It is not, however, necessary that the whole of the pretence charged should have been proved,(5) or that the inducement should be shown as due wholly to the deceit.(6)

4693. If the deceit was in writing as when it consisted of letters written by the accused to the prosecutor, it is again a question of fact whether the prosecutor was likely to have been influenced thereby, though it is a question of law whether it could have influenced him.(7) If the writing containing the pretence be lost, its contents may be proved by secondary evidence.(8)

The inducement, again, need not be shown to have been directly addressed to the person induced,(9) though it must be shown to have been intended for and have induced him.(10)

Where the inducement is alleged to be the result of a series of statements made at different times, it is again a question of fact whether those statements were so connected together as to constitute one pretence.(11)

4694. Lastly, there can be no cheating without proof of the consequence alleged to be due to the inducement. This cannot be presumed but must be proved. It is, indeed, a necessary part of the definition of the offence and must as such be established by the prosecution. But this subject has been sufficiently discussed already and need not be adverted to here (§§ 4608-4611).

Session. Pres. Mag or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Non-cog. Warrant. Bailable. Comp.

Cheating with knowledge that wrongful loss may ensue to person whose interest offender is bound to protect.

418. Whoever cheats with the knowledge that he is likely thereby to cause wrongful loss to a person whose interest in the transaction to which the cheating relates, he was bound either by law or by legal contract, to protect, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

[Wrongful loss—s. 23. Cheats—s. 415.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4695). (2) Procedure and Practice (4696).

(5) Hill, R. & R. 190; Lince, 12 Cox 451.
(6) Hewgite, Dears C. C. 315; English, 12 Cox 171; Lince, 12 Cox 451.
(7) King, (1897) 1 Q. B. 214.
(8) Chadwick, 6 C. & P. 181.
(9) Mosely, 31 L. J. M. C. 24; Rouse, 4 Cox 7.
(10) Rouse, 4 Cox 7.
(11) Martin, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 56.

(3) Proof (4697).
(4) Form of Charge (4698).
(5) Principle (4699).
(6) Cheating one whom Accused was Bound to Protect (4700-4701).

4695. Analogous Law.—This section introduces the first element of aggravation in the offence of cheating—that element being the abuse of trust coupled with cheating. The section is obviously applicable only to those who stand to the person deceived in the relationship of trustee such as mentioned in the section.

4696. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable, but warrant should, ordinarily, issue in the first instance. It is both bailable and compoundable with the permission of the court and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class. The points of practice calling for notice have been already set out under the last section (§§ 4667-4671).

4697. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused cheated some person.

(2) That the accused was then under a legal obligation to protect the interest of that person.

(3) That the cheating related thereto.

(4) That the accused knew that he was likely to cause wrongful loss thereby.

4698. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you cheated A B by—— (specify the act constituting the offence) with the knowledge that you were thereby likely to cause wrongful loss to the said A B whose interest in the transaction to which the cheating related you were bound either by law (or a legal contract) to protect, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 418 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

4699. Principle.—This offence obtains its special aggravation by reason of the abuse of trust on the part of the cheat which makes his offence as much more aggravating as it is probably committed with comparative facility. For the parties stand to each presumably in the position of some confidence and the cheat is, therefore, not likely to encounter much resistance in practising his seduction with success.

4700. Cheating one whom Accused was Bound to Protect.—The general language advisedly used in this section eschews the necessity of establishing anything like trust between the deceiver and the deceived. All that the section requires is the existence of a legal obligation—whether created by law or contract—by which the deceiver was bound to protect the interest of the deceived. Such relationship necessarily exists between a trustee and a cestui que trust, solicitor and client, principal and agent, banker and depositor, guardian and ward, master and manager, directors of an incorporated company and its shareholders; and the Karta of a Hindu family probably stands on the same footing.

4701. It is not necessary that the cheat should bear any defined relationship to the person deceived, or that he should know him, for all that is necessary is that if once he stands to him in a position when it becomes his duty to protect the interest of the other, he could not be suffered to cheat him in a transaction in which his duty had enjoined on him scrupulous regard for his interest, and the abuse of which is itself a breach of trust. So where the Manager, Assistant Manager and Accountant of the Himalaya Bank issued false balance-sheets to make the share-holders and depositors believe in the stability and solvency of the Bank, though the Bank was then bankrupt, Sir John Edge, C. J., told the jury: "The way these men are said by the prosecution to have conspired to cheat, whether true or not, was that to their knowledge these balance-sheets were false; that they were materially false; that they, acting in concert, concealed the true state of affairs from the depositors and share-holders, and by that concealment the share-holders who were depositors, and depositors not share-holders, were induced to allow their money which was in the Bank on deposit to remain on deposit. It stands to reason and common sense that if you, or I or anyone else, had Rs. 3,000 or Rs. 4,000 deposited in the Bank, and we were in a position to draw it out, we should draw it out if we knew from the balance-sheet that the Bank was insolvent; on the other hand, if the balance-sheet represented the Bank to be more or less flourishing, we should probably allow our money to remain in the Bank. If these men intending to defraud the share-holders or depositors knowingly put forward these balance-sheets knowing that they were false balance-sheets, then it is your province to find them guilty, under section 418."[12]

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Cognizable. Warrant. Bailable. comp.

Punishment for cheating by personation.

419. Whoever cheats by personation shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

[Cheating by personation—s. 416.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4702).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4703-4704).
(3) Proof (4705).
(4) Form of Charge (4706).
(5) Evidence of Cheating by Personation (4707-4711).

(12) Moss, 16 A. 88.

4702. Analogous Law.—This section only prescribes the punishment for the offence defined in section 416. The section is probably intended to deal only with a case of simple cheating by personation, for if the offence involves delivery of valuable property justifying proceedings under section 420, then there is no need to have recourse to this section.(13)

4703. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both bailable and compoundable, with the permission of the Court and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class.

4704. Where a person attempted to get himself reinstated in the post of a karnam by the production of a certificate of having passed a certain examination, which he alleged referred to him, whereas in fact it referred to another but it was not shown that his misrepresentation had caused damage or harm to the officer to whom it was made, the Court held this section inapplicable, and quashed his conviction opining that it might conceivably amount to an offence under s. 182.(14)

For other points relating to practice, reference should be made to section 415.

4705. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused cheated some person.

(2) That he cheated him by—

(a) pretending or representing himself to be some other person, or

(b) knowingly substituting or representing one person for another.

4706. Charge—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you cheated A B by pretending to be C D (or representing yourself to be C D, or knowingly substituting C D for E F or representing that C D was E F) and thereby fraudulently (or dishonestly, etc.) induced delivery of property by A B, to wit——(mention the property cheated) [or intentionally induced the said A B to do (or omit to do) some act, to wit——]which caused (or was likely to cause) damage (or harm) to the said A B in body (mind, reputation or property) and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 419 of the Indian Penal Code, and

(13) Sadanand Dass, 2 W. R. 29; Nga Po Lu, (1902) 1 L. B. R. 356, discussed under s. 420, post.

(14) Manikam, (1908) 19 M. L. J. 271, 3 I. C. 600; following Ganesh, 13 B. 506.

within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

4707. Evidence of Cheating by Personation.—It has already been seen (§§ 4659-4665) what constitutes this offence. It only remains to state that this offence being a special form of cheating must be established by proving not only cheating, but cheating affected in the manner specified in section 416. As that section provides, such cheating may be effected by false pretension, representation or substitution, or in short false personation. The cheat may falsely represent himself to be another, or he may falsely represent some one else. Such false personation must be intended to hoodwink another so as to make him believe the false to be the true representation, and thus act upon that belief. If he saw through the disguise before he was entrapped, the offence may be an attempt, but it falls short of cheating (§§ 4651-4655). The question whether a person was in fact deceived by a false personation is a question of fact, though the question whether he could have been so deceived is a question of law (§§ 4688-4694). The person substituted, if other than the cheat, may be either an innocent agent or he may be guilty. If he was innocent, his evidence would be sufficient to condemn the cheat, but if he was himself guilty, as if he lent himself to the deception contemplated by the cheat, then his evidence would be that of an approver, and as such calling for corroboration.

4708. The evidence required to establish this offence is not the same as is required to establish a case of simple cheating, for in addition to the proof of all those facts there must be proof of the further fact that the means employed to cheat were those described in section 416. This proof presupposes an inducement effected by the aid of false personation, though it is not necessary that it should have been the only means employed to cheat. Indeed, a cheat's armoury is seldom confined to a single weapon of attack. He may at times resort to false representation, at other times to false personation, and sometimes again to both as the occasion may require. It is, therefore, no defence to a charge under this section that false personation fell flat upon the person deceived, and that what had induced him was something quite different.

4709. It would be merely an attempt where the false personation had caused no actual deception. Such was the case of the accused who travelled from Trichinopoly to Podanur on a pass issued by the Railway to its Assistant Auditor. Being detected at Podanur he was convicted of this offence, but his conviction was altered to one for an attempt as there was no evidence that he had previously shown the pass to anyone else, as he was detected as soon as he presented it for check.[15]

For further commentary under this section, see section 416, §§ 4659-4665.

(15) Govindaswamy, 21 M. L. J. 748,11 I. C. 590.

420. Whoever cheats and thereby dishonestly induces the person deceived to deliver any property to any person, or to make, alter or destroy the whole or any part of a valuable security, or anything which is signed or sealed, and which is capable of being converted into a valuable security, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Cheating and dishonestly inducing delivery of property.

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st class. Cognizable. Warrant. Bailable. Comp.

[Dishonestly—s. 24. Valuable security—s. 30. Cheats—s. 415.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4710).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4711).
(3) Proof (4712).
(4) Form of Charge (4713-4714).
(5) Principle (4715).
(6) Evidence of Cheating (4716-4730).
(7) False Tokens (4721-4724).
(8) Delivery of a valuable Security (4725-4730).

4710. Analogous Law.—The relevancy of this section in the Code in view of the provision of section 417 has already been the subject of a previous reference (§ 4665), where it has been stated that this section should be more appropriately confined to serious cases of cheating in which there has been some delivery of property, as distinct from cases of cheating falling under clause 2 of section 415 (§ 4645), which should then be exclusively the subject of punishment under section 417. Even in case of delivery of property, it would seem that while dishonest inducement is punishable under this section a fraudulent inducement would only be punishable under section 417. The distinction between the two is at times sought to be justified by contrasting the connotations of the two words "fraudulently" and "dishonestly." It is said that there may be delivery of property in both but if it is obtained fraudulently the offence is punishable by s. 417—if dishonestly then by this section. For example, A may by a false representation induce B to advance him a sum of money in such circumstances that A is aware that he is exposing B to risk of loss but without intention of causing wrongful loss. A then would be acting fraudulently and would only be punishable under s. 417. But if he intended to cause wrongful loss he would be acting dishonestly and would be punishable under this section.(16) This is another ground for reconciling the two sections which would otherwise appear to be redundant (§§ 4666, 4675, 4715).

4711. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable, and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both bailable and compoundable with the permission of the Court and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class. The distinction between s. 417 and s. 420, though at times obscure is nevertheless important in view of the fact that while an offence under s. 417 is triable by a second class Magistrate, that under this section is only triable by a Magistrate of the first class. Where therefore the complainant was made drunk and a divorce deed taken from him, the offence was held to fall under this section and not under s. 417.(17) Where the complainant prosecuted the accused on the ground that he had paid the latter Rs. 35 in advance and that the latter had promised to send her daughter to him for concubinage which she had failed to do, thereby cheating him out of his bargain and his money, the Court refused to lend him its assistance.(18) The accused had executed a kabala in favour of the complainant which he presented for registration, but soon afterwards withdrew it on the pretext that he wanted to read it and tore it up. The complainant sued him for specific performance of the contract and also prosecuted him for cheating. It was held that the person cheated was the Registrar and that as the complainant had instituted a suit the charge should not be enquired into.(19)

(16) Ba Shein, 13 Bur. L. T. 239, 64 I. C. 33, 22 Cr. L. J. 721.

Other points of practice will be found set out under section 417 (§§ 4665-4668).

4712. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused cheated another person.(20)

(2) That he thereby induced—

(a) delivery of property to any person, which property did not belong to the accused, or

(b) to make, alter or destroy the whole or any part of a valuable security, or

(c) anything which is signed or sealed and capable of being converted into a valuable security.

(3) That he did so dishonestly.

4713. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you cheated A B, by dishonestly inducing him to deliver——(mention the property) to you which was the property of the said A B(21) [or to make, alter or destroy the whole or any part of a valuable security (or anything which is signed or sealed, which is capable of being converted into a valuable security)] and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section

(17) Bakhtawar Singh, 3 L. L. J. 283, 67 I. C. 588, 23 Cr. L. J. 428.

(18) Jani Hira, 14 Bom. L. R. 503, 15 I. C. 793, 13 Cr. L. J. 521.

(19) Hiralal v. Makhan Lal, 30 C. L. J. 175, 54 I. C. 64, 21 Cr. L. J. 16.

(20) For which see s. 417; it is, of course, the most material ingredient of the offence; Hanuman, 57 I. C. 103, 21 Cr. L. J. 583.

(21) This clause is necessary; Williams, 1 M. H. C. R. 31.

420 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

4714. The provision here made as to a valuable security is in accordance with the following section of the English Larceny Act[22]:—

"S. 90. Whosoever, with intent to defraud or injure any other person, shall by any false pretence fraudulently cause or induce any other person to execute, make, accept, endorse, or destroy the whole or any part of any valuable security; or to write, impress, or affix his name, or the name of any other person, or of any company, firm or co-partnership, or the seal of any body corporate, company, or society, upon any paper or parchment, in order that the same may be afterwards made or converted into or used or dealt with as a valuable security, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and being convicted thereof shall be liable.....to be kept in penal servitude..... or to be imprisoned....."

Inducing Persons by fraud to execute Deeds and other Instruments.

And for this purpose the English Statute contains the following definition of a valuable security.—

"S. 1. In the interpretation of the Act the term 'valuable security' shall include any order, Exchequer acquittance, or other security whatsoever entitling or evidencing the title of any person or body corporate to any share or interest in any public stock or fund, whether of the United Kingdom, or of Great Britain, or of Ireland, or of any foreign state, or in any fund of any body corporate, company, or society, whether within the United Kingdom or in any foreign state or country, or to any deposit in any bank, and shall also include any debenture, deed, bond, bill, note, warrant, order or other security whatsoever for money or for payment of money, whether of the United Kingdom or of Great Britain, or of Ireland, or of any foreign state, and any document of title to land or goods as hereinbefore defined.[23]

4715. Principle.—This section provides for an aggravated case of cheating generally defined in section 415. It has been there seen that that definition contemplates either (a) delivery of property, or (b) the doing of any other act or omission as a consequence of cheating which again may be effected by inducement brought about (i) fraudulently, or (ii) dishonestly, or (iii) intentionally. This section then provides only for the case (a) (ii), and a certain case of (b) (ii) when the act affects a valuable security, all other cases being relegated to the more general provisions of section 417. It will be seen that the two cases here dealt with are those in which the offence is committed under circumstances of great aggravation, which also show great malignity on the part of the offender.

4716. Evidence of Cheating.—Properly understood, the operation of this section should be confined only to the special cases of cheating last described (§ 4715), to which the drastic provisions of this section would seem to be appropriate. These cases of cheating are those in which the accused acts dishonestly in inducing the person deceived. Cases in which the inducement is fraudulent or intentional without being dishonest are thus excluded. Then, as cheating may as much relate to the delivery of property as to the doing of any injurious act or omission, this section specifies only those acts which relate to the making, altering or destroying the whole or any part of a valuable security or anything which is signed or sealed and which is capable of being converted into a valuable security, and which are moreover done by dishonest inducement. There thus remain still the following case to be disposed of under section 417:—

S. 417 Distinguished.

(22) 24 & 25 Vict., c. 96, s. 90. (23) 24 & 25 Vict., c. 96, s. 90.

(a) fraudulently inducing delivery of property, under section 415, clause (i);

(b) the whole of clause (ii) of section 415.

4717. It will be observed that under the general provisions of clause (ii) of section 415 a person may be intentionally induced to make, etc., a valuable security but it will be then an offence punishable under section 417 and not this section, which requires that such person should have been induced dishonestly and as such it refers to a case not expressly mentioned in the section defining the offence. But the act of making, altering or destroying a valuable security is an act which causes or is likely to cause damage or harm to that person in body, mind or property, but inasmuch as that act was the effect of an intentional inducement, the Code regards it sufficiently met by the lighter punishment provided for in section 417.

4718. Confining this section then to the two special cases here expressly mentioned, it becomes necessary to inquire if the offence here described calls for any special rules of evidence.

4719. It will be observed that in discussing the effect of section 415 it was stated that it was not necessary to prove whether the inducement was made fraudulently or dishonestly by the accused (§§ 4612-4613). This must now be qualified for proof of the offence described in this section. For it requires proof of dishonest inducement and the burden of proof of which is on the prosecution. They must then prove that the delivery of the property was induced by the accused to cause wrongful gain or wrongful loss; or, in other words, that the inducement was intended to cause wrongful gain or loss by unlawful means of property to which the person losing was, or the person gaining was not, entitled.[24] If the delivery of property was the result not of the inducement of the accused but of the representation made by third parties the accused cannot be called to account under this section.[25] The inducement must relate to a fact and not to a future anticipation[1] (§ 4683). Unless it amounts to do a thing in future which, it is in one's power to do, in which case it is a promise.[2]

Dishonest inducement then implies: (i) knowledge of the unlawfulness of the method employed; (ii) an intention to employ it and to cause wrongful distribution of property thereby; and (iii) some degree

(24) Ss. 25, 26.

(25) Malta Prasad, 18 A. L. J. 371, 55 I. C. 730, 21 Cr. L. J. 362.

(1) Ebrahimji, 18 Bom. L. R. 297, 19 I. C. 328, 14 Cr. L. J. 232.

(2) Girdhari Lal, (1913) P. R. No. 12, 6 I. C. 964, 11 Cr. L. J. 428.

of personation effected for that purpose. These elements are common to the whole section, which is otherwise divided into two clauses:(a) that which relates to the delivery of property; and (b) that relating to a valuable security. The term "property" as used in this connection is wide enough to include anything capable of ownership. It includes money,[3] an examination certificate,[4] but not immoveable property.[5] Therefore, where the accused personated a Court peon and appeared in a village and proclaimed there by a beat of drum that a certain person had been dispossessed from his holding by the Court, and the Sessions Judge thereupon upheld his conviction under this section, Straight, J., quashed it, holding that the section had no application to the delivery of immoveable property, or as in the case before him, to the surrender of a cultivatory holding.[6] Indeed, the whole of this group of sections commencing with section 378 applies only to the protection of moveable property, though there are sections in which such property is more specially described than in others.

4720. Now, whenever there is dishonest inducement and delivery of property, this would seem to be the appropriate section for the punishment of the accused, even though the accused may have cheated by false personation. This was apparently the view taken in a case in which the accused went about pretending to hold the office of a police headconstable reprimanding certain villagers as to the state of the roads, receiving small sums as hushmoney, till he was surprised by the real police-officer, who thereupon had him convicted under this section.[7] In another case A was licensed to sell opium. B went with A's ticket and presented it to the shopkeeper who delivered him a certain quantity of opium. It was held that B had cheated by personation, and as he had obtained delivery of opium, he was liable to conviction under this section.[8] Of course, the offence is complete the moment the cheat obtains delivery of property as the result of his imposition. The fact that he afterwards returned it under pressure does not exonerate or exculpate his offence.[9] The following cases of cheating call for no notice. The accused induced the complainant to deliver him a receipt for money which he promised to pay. On securing the receipt he did not pay the money promised.[10]

False Tokens.

4721. Dishonest delivery of property may be obtained not only by false personation, but also by presenting false tokens. So where the accused was charged with selling or pawning as genuine gold mohars stated to be of the reign of Shah Jahan, which were really silver rupees of that reign coated over with gold, it was held that the offence of the accused was cheating under this section and not uttering of a false coin.[11] The fact that the coins used by the accused were not current does not affect the question. In another case the accused had in his possession a double pice coated

(3) Birendra Lal, 32 C. 22; Sadanund Dass, 2 W. R. 29.
(4) Gangaram, 16 N. L. R. 52, 67 I. C. 619, 23 Cr. L. J. 443.
(5) Abdul Ahob, (1882) A. W. N. 6.
(6) Ib.
(7) Sadanund Dass, 2 W. R. 29.
(8) Nga Po Lu, (1902) 1 L. B. R. 356.
(9) Debendra Pershad, 9 C. L. J. 605.
(10) Jaffar Ayub, 68 I. C. (N.) 621, 23 Cr. L. J. 589, (1922) A. I. R. (N.) 195.
(11) Shushali, (1907) 26 A. W. N. 308.

with mercury so as to resemble a rupee, which he delivered to A as a rupee to obtain change. It was held that the accused was not liable to a conviction under either section 232 or section 241. He could be only convicted under the former section if at the time of silvering it he intended to practise deception or knew it to be likely that deception would be thereby practised. If the idea of using the coin as a rupee was an after-thought, the only offence of which the accused could be convicted would be of abetting A to cheat the person to whomsoever A may deliver the coin for change.[12] Such a case stands on the same footing as cheating by delivery of forged notes, cheques, hundis[13] or other bills of exchange to which reference has been made already in discussing the cardinal requirements of the offence (§§ 4596-4655).

4722. But there are innumerable ways in which this offence may be committed. The accused was an unpaid apprentice in the Tehsildar's office at Gorakhpur, to which the military authorities sent a monthly requisition for reporting the current market rates to enable them to pay for the provisions purchased by them, and which was used to be prepared by the accused in vernacular, from which an assistant in the Collectorate drew up his report. The accused was induced by the interested suppliers of provisions to the military authorities to prepare a wrong schedule, so that he misread the prices current to the Collector's assistant, which were in due course reported to the military authorities. He was convicted of this offence,[14] but it would have been more correct to convict him of abetment. The accused represented to the complainant that he was a commission agent of an up-country purchaser who had indented on him for a bicycle. He was given a bicycle which he sold to a local customer. It was held that this offence was completed, as soon as the bicycle was delivered on his false representation.[15]

4723. The following is however a case which almost verged on the civil side, though it was a case of calculated fraud. Ralli Brothers had contracted to purchase from the accused 260 dokras of fully good machine ginned cotton in lieu of which he delivered them 260 dokras of cotton largely composed of cotton seed, unginned cotton and rubbish carefully packed into the middle of the dokras while all round the sides was placed good ginned cotton, the object being to evade its examination. The admixture of inferior stuff was proved to be 6 to 15 per cent. as against the normal of ½ to 1 per cent. The High Court held this sufficient to reverse the acquittal of the accused who was sentenced to imprisonment and fine.[16] But these cases should not be understood to break any new ground. They were decided upon their own facts in which the rubbish was carefully concealed in sound cotton. They are no authority for rendering all admixture and adulteration punishable as cheating, the difference between the two classes of cases being that while in the one case the concealment was cunningly made to elude detection, in the ordinary cases of admixture it is easily open to examination and detection.

(12) Mikarban, (1884) P. R. No. 9.
(13) Uttam Lal, 23 Bom. L. R. 340, 60 I. C. 993, 22 Cr. L. J. 305.
(14) Parmeshar Dat, 8 A. 201.
(15) Banaji, 2 Bom. L. R. 621.
(16) Kanji Shivji, 14 Bom. L. R. 137, 14 I. C. 669; Mansing, 15 Bom. L. R. 568, 20 I. C. 593.

4724. It is not a necessary ingredient of this offence that the person cheated should deliver the property to the cheat. For the offence would be equally complete if A cheats B and induces him to deliver property to C, and in this case it is not even necessary that A should stand to gain by its delivery to C; for if B suffered wrongful loss by the wrongful distribution of his property to C, A's act was dishonest, though he did not himself profit by it. But of course there is no legal impediment to A's conviction in such a case; still the question remains, why should A have cheated B to benefit C, to whom he was a stranger. But this is a question of fact and not of law.

Delivery of a Valuable Security.

4725. Apart from the delivery of property which suggests other cases of cheating already noticed (§§ 4608-4623), there remain the other cases connected with a valuable security which stand on the same footing. In this respect the present provisions coincide with the corresponding rule of English law (§ 4714). The question "What is a valuable security?" has been defined in section 30 of the Code, and the term has been of course used here in that sense. That term implies a document which is sufficient to be classed as, and to pass for, a valuable security. So, where A cheated B, by inducing him to execute a cheque in favour of C, and B executed a cheque payable to C, but not to bearer or order, and it required to be, but was not stamped, the Court held it not to amount to the making of a valuable security.(17) But a pay order under the signature of the president of a burial society was held to be a valuable security, when it was payable to bearer, and the fact that the society had not been registered was held to be no objection to its validity.(18)

4726. Now, as the term has been defined in section 30, not only a document payable to bearer or order, but one payable only to a specified individual, would fall within the comprehension of a valuable security. In short, so long as such document is a security for value, it is a valuable security whether it is negotiable or not. Consequently, not only the bills of exchange, such as a hundi, cheque or the like, which are payable to bearer of valuable security, but other documents, such as simple bonds, fall within that term. And the section deals not only with completed documents, but also with those which, though signed or sealed but still fall short of a completed valuable security, as, for instance, where they lack attestation which is legally required to complete them, as in the case of a deed of mortgage or of gift. A decree of a Civil Court is, however, not a valuable security, since it is only an order of the Court declaring the rights of parties. Where, therefore, several accused were found to have conspired to deceive a court into passing decrees and issuing executions, it was held that they could not be convicted of this offence: first, on the ground that decrees were not a valuable security; and secondly, on the ground that, even if they were so regarded, it is only the original decree which remains in Court that can be so described. Its copies supplied to parties could not be so treated.(19)

4727. In order to complete this offence the cheat must not only dishonestly induce another to make, alter or destroy a valuable security,

(17) Yates, 1 Mood. C. C. 170.
(18) Greenbalgh, Dears C. C. 26.
(19) Charu Chandra, 28 C. W. N. 414, (1924) A. I. R. (C.) 502.

but the inducement must fructify in action, so that the person cheated actually makes, alters, or destroys a valuable security, or anything which is signed or sealed and is capable of being converted into a valuable security. The word "make" implies completion of a valuable security by due execution, attestation as well as its registration, where its registration is compulsory. If, however, it is not so "made," it may still be "signed or sealed," which, being an act of its execution converting a draft into a deed, has the same effect as the making of a valuable security. But anything short of this is not included. So if a person be dishonestly induced to write a document, but which he did not sign or seal, the person so inducing may be guilty of an attempt, but he could not be convicted of this offence.

4728. The word "alter" implies any change in the text of the valuable security. For instance, if a person is induced to raise or lower the rate of interest stipulated therein, it would be an alteration, and punishable here if it was induced dishonestly. It is not necessary that the alteration should have been made by the executant, if it is made with his consent obtained by "dishonest inducement." An alteration made without such consent may be forgery, but it will not be cheating.

4729. The destruction of a security would ordinarily be induced in token of the extinguishment of an obligation. This may be done by a person falsely misrepresenting that he had discharged the debt, or that the security had become unenforceable in law, or that he should upon its destruction execute another security, or, indeed, under any circumstances which constitute the offence of cheating, provided only that the inducement was "dishonest" and not merely "fraudulent."

4730. Adulteration of food and drink has been already the subject of a previous discussion, where it has been stated that serious adulterations constitute cheating (§ 4632). It has been held under this section that the adulteration of saccharine with a mixture of soda bicarbonate and passing off the stuff as saccharine, and selling it as such, suffices to constitute an offence punishable under this section.[20]

For further commentary, see under section 415.

Of Fraudulent Deeds and Dispositions of Property.

4731. Topical Introduction.—This and the next three sections deal with the criminal aspect of fraudulent conveyances which are the subject of section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act,[21] and the Presidency and Insolvency Acts.[22] The effect of these Acts generally is to declare the nullity of deeds intended to defraud creditors and to ensure a certain degree of commercial honesty in dealing with one's property. The present group of sections are intended to subserve the same end by placing dishonest debtors under the lash of criminal law. But these sections, with those (ss. 206-210) already considered, which are closely analogous to these, have practically remained a dead letter in the Code, owing to the difficulty and expense of prosecuting dishonest debtors, and the disinclination of creditors to embark upon the uncertain issue of vindicating justice.

---

(20) Bhola Singh, 26 Bom. L. R. 211.
(21) Act IV of 1882.
(22) Pres. Act (III of 1909); Prov. (III of 1907); 1 Gour's Law of Transfer (5th Ed.) §§ 941, 992.

4732. Taking, however, all the nine sections together, they will be all found to deal with the one subject of fraudulent transfer of property intended to defeat or delay creditors. But the mode in which this fraud may be perpetuated are the subject of the specific sections which deal with following typical cases:—

(i) Fraudulent concealment of property in one's possession (ss. 421, 424).

(ii) Fraudulent concealment of a chose in action (s. 422).

(iii) Fraudulent execution of a deed of transfer (s. 423).

(iv) Fraudulent release of debt (s. 424).

4733. All these are frauds perpetrated without the intervention of Court. But the same object may be achieved by taking advantage of the procedure of law. Consequently, fraudulent concealment of property may be made by suffering a collusive decree to be passed against oneself in which case the debtor commits the offence punishable under section 208, while the collusive decree-holder is provided against by section 207.

421. Whoever dishonestly or fraudulently removes, conceals or delivers to any person, or transfers or causes to be transferred to any person, without adequate consideration, any property, intending thereby to prevent, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby prevent, the distribution of that property according to law among his creditors or the creditors of any other person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Non-cog. Warrant. Bailable. Not comp.

Dishonest or fraudulent removal or concealment of property to prevent distribution among creditors.

[Dishonestly—s. 24. Fraudulently—s. 25.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4734).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4735).
(3) Proof (4736).
(4) Form of Charge (4737).
(5) Transfer in fraud of Creditors (4738-4739).
(6) Who are Creditors (4739).
(7) Mental Elements of Criminality (4740-4745).

4734. Analogous Law.—This section relates to a voluntary transfer inter vivos of property without consideration and in fraud of creditor's whether of the transferor or of another, as for example, his creditor's creditor. The intention and knowledge of the transferee being immaterial, the transfer may be good so far as regards the transferee, though the transfer may be punishable under this section.(23) In short, under civil

(23) 1 Gour's Law of Transfer (5th Ed.), § 992.

law such transfer is only void if the transferee was privy to the fraud, but this section has nothing to do with the transferee, the offence being complete with the transfer or delivery of property by the transferor with the fraudulent or dishonest intent aforesaid. The section applies equally to property whether moveable or immoveable. Its provisions remain unaffected by any local or special law, e.g., the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, ss. 17 and 103.(24)

4735. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable, but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class.

4736. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused removed, concealed, delivered or transferred to any person or caused it to be so transferred.

(2) That such delivery or transfer was without adequate consideration; and

(3) Dishonestly or fraudulently.

(4) That it was moreover intended to prevent or which the transferor knew to be likely to prevent the distribution of that property according to law among his creditors or the creditors of any person.

4737. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you dishonestly (or fraudulently) removed (or concealed or delivered or transferred or caused to be transferred to A B) without adequate consideration, certain property to wit——, intending thereby to prevent (or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby prevent) the distribution of that property according to law among your creditors (or the creditors of any other person, to wit C D), and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 421 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

"And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge."

4738. Transfer in Fraud of Creditors.—This section makes it an offence to withdraw property dishonestly or fraudulently and without consideration, intending to prevent its being legally available for distribution amongst creditors. As the primary object of this section is to punish the fraudulent concealment of property from creditors, it will affect only those who have no other property available to satisfy their claims. Nor does it apply to secured creditors, who must prima facie look to the security for the satisfaction of their claims. The section is really applicable to an insolvent debtor who having no sufficient assets to meet the demands of his creditors, fraudulently removes whatever property is available to meet their claims, and thus defrauds them even of the little they had the chance of seizing upon to satisfy their claims. Such fraud by a debtor may be committed not only to defraud his own creditors, but also "the creditors of any other person"—that "other person" being presumably his own creditor. For instance, A being indebted to B, who is in his turn indebted to C may fraudulently remove his property so as to withdraw it from being seized by C in satisfaction of his claim against B. It is not, therefore, necessary that A should defraud his own creditors so long as he does the act in fraud of creditors.

(24) Mulshankar, 35 B. 63.

Who are Creditors?

4739. The meaning of this term must not, however, be unduly enlarged. Nor should it be understood as restricted only to mean only money lenders or those situated to the debtor in the relationship of banker and customer. The term is rather used as a correlative to debtor, and means one to whom a "debt" is due. The word "debt" means a liquidated money obligation recoverable by suit.(25) It is either money or money's worth provided that its worth is ascertained. This will exclude a mere claim to damages, profits or the like, so that if a person fraudulently withdraws property knowing that a heavy decree for such claim is likely to be passed against him, he could not be dealt with under this section, whatever other liability may attach to him as a fraudulent debtor. The creditor, again, must be a present creditor with his claim enforceable in law, though that claim may not have been secured by a decree.

The subject will be found more fully discussed in the author's Law of Transfer to which reference should be made for more particular information on the subject.(1)

4740. Mental Elements of Criminality.—The section does not penalize all transfers made by a debtor, but only those made (i) "dishonestly" or "fraudulently," (ii) without adequate consideration, and (iii) with intent to prevent the lawful distribution of property amongst creditors. All these elements constitute the gist of the crime. They presuppose not merely a fraudulent preference which is in civil law sufficient to avoid a transfer, but a disposition of property in which the primary object of the transferor was not to satisfy a legal demand, but to shield his property against the claims of the creditors generally. For instance, it will exclude cases in which the transferor favours one creditor at the expense of the other, or those in which without intending to defraud them the necessary effect of his disposition is to prevent a legal dstribution of his assets amongst his creditors. And a transfer may even be fraudulent within the meaning of civil law, but it does not necessarily expose the transferor to the penalties of this section. In other words, these sections view the act from a different standpoint than civil law, and it may be that a transfer is not fraudulent within the meaning of one though it is so within the meaning of the other. And the reason for this is evident. The object of the civil law is remedial and not punitive, and consequently it declares what transfers are void and insufficient to pass property in the transferee, and what property may therefore be made available to satisfy the claims of creditors in spite of the transfer. In determining the operation of fraud on the right of property, law necessarily regards the intention and knowledge of the transferee material, and the rule of civil law therefore is, that a transfer is not fraudulent if the transferee was not privy to the fraud.(2) But the rules here enacted approach the question from a wholly different standpoint, for they view it solely from the standpoint of the transferor, and wholly unconnected with the transferee. This distinction must be clearly kept in view, for though the Court may punish the fraudulent transferor, it has no power to order distribution of the property amongst the creditors held to have been so defrauded.

(25) 1 Gour's Law of Transfer (5th Ed.) § 104.

(1) Ib., §§ 973, 974.

4741. But in considering the question of fraud, the duties of the civil and the criminal Courts are similar, though not identical. For they have both to inquire into the intention of the transferor and find whether his intention was bona fide or fraudulent. In this connection the section raises the three questions upon which the Court must be satisfied, namely:—

(i) Was the transfer made dishonestly or fraudulently;

(ii) Was it without adequate consideration;

(iii) Was it made to prevent lawful distribution of the property amongst creditors.

The question whether a transfer was dishonest or fraudulent depends upon the circumstances surrounding it. In civil law a number of rules have become stereotyped as badges of fraud,(3) and they are equally relevant for the present purpose. The question whether a certain transaction was dishonest, or merely fraudulent without being dishonest, has no practical value in view of the declared effect of the two being the same. But at the same time it is well to note that a transfer may be fraudulent without being dishonest, as, if a debtor should conceal his property out of a malicious intention to injure another and with no thought of wrongful gain or loss. Such a case may arise where A being indebted to B, who is in his turn indebted to C, conceals his property against C, though he subsequently pays his just debts to B. In such a case the question of the adequacy of consideration does not arise. In this respect the terms of this section are wider than those of section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act(4) and of the Insolvency Acts.(5)

4742. The words "removal, concealment or delivery" are again wider(6) and embrace cases of withdrawal of property unconnected with transfer from its being made available to creditors. Such a case may arise if the debtor removes his property to a native state where the creditors are unable to follow it, or where it is shuffled out of view, though there is no evidence as to what has become of it. The word "delivery" must be understood ejusdum generis with removal or concealment, for it was not intended to prevent a mere transfer of custody, though it may have been fraudulent and with intent to prevent just distribution of it amongst

(2) 1 Gour's Law of Transfer (5th Ed.), § 992.
(3) Ib., §§ 992, 993.
(4) Act IV of 1882.
(5) 1 Gour's Law of Transfer (5th Ed.), §§ 941, 942.
(6) But they do not include a case of wanton destruction, which is not punishable under this section, though it may be punished as mischief, s. 425, ill. (d).

creditors. In this respect the terms of this section are narrower than those of section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act, which refer to defeating or delaying creditors, for they exclude acts which merely delay, but do not defeat their claims.

Of course, a concealment, removal or delivery of property would be for no consideration, for the object of the transferor is not to convey but merely to screen it from his creditors. But there may be cases in which there is a transfer, though it may not be for an adequate consideration, in which case the transferor is declared to be equally obnoxious to the penalties of this section. Such a case is, however, likely to present greater difficulties in practice, for the presence of consideration would invest it with a reality which, though not rendering it inexpugnable may still protect the transferor against this section. The question, however, whether the transfer is criminal or merely voidable, depends upon the quantum of consideration in proportion to the value of the property. If there was no consideration at all, as, when the transfer was benami, the transferor runs a greater risk of conviction than if it was supported by some consideration.

4743. Indeed, a benami transaction is nothing more than the removal or concealment of property, and if it is made in fraud of the creditors, the benamidar is liable to punishment under this section.(7) Of course, as has been elsewhere pointed out, a benami transaction does not of itself imply fraud, for the practice of benami transactions is inveterate in India; and although looked upon with jealousy by the Courts, it is applicable alike to Hindus and Mahomedans.(8) But though benami transactions may be common, they cannot be used to the injury of others. As it was observed in a Calcutta case: "While it is impossible to ignore the existence of benami transactions in Bengal, we have no doubt that they must be judged by the ordinary and well established rules of law, that a third party cannot be made to suffer by the voluntary acts of owners of property. It is not to be supposed that because the existence of benami transactions has been recognized by our Courts, parties are at liberty to use the system to the injury of others, whether by direct fraud or by putting other parties in a position to defraud, or take undue advantage of innocent persons."(9)

The fact that a transaction was benami does not therefore affect the present question, which must still be answered with reference to the three elements which render the act criminal. Of these three, the question of the adequacy of consideration is the most important, for if a transfer was supported by sufficient consideration, then it cannot be condemned as fraudulent, and indeed, as the section is worded, the two other questions then become immaterial. But the consideration must be adequate, that is to say, it must be sufficient to invest the transfer with a presumption of reality. It may not be such as would represent its fair market value, nor indeed even such as may be obtained in a forced sale, but it must at least bear such proportion to its value as would suffice to uphold the transfer in the Civil Court. The question whether the consideration was adequate is a question of fact, and it is on the prosecution to show that it was

(7) Abdul Goni Sulaman, (1898) P. J. L. B. 593.
(8) 1 Gour's Law of Transfer (5th Ed.), § 769.
(9) Rakhaldass v. Bindoo, 1 Marsh. 293, 295.

inadequate—indeed, so inadequate as to justify the Court to find that it was merely a cloak to invest the transfer with an appearance of reality, whereas in fact it was no transfer at all but a device to hoodwink the creditors.

4744. The question of intention to prevent satisfaction of the claims of creditors is no doubt the main question—and indeed, it is against the unjust distribution of property amongst creditors that the present rule is enacted. But here again this section bears no close analogy to the corresponding rules of civil law under which intention and not knowledge of likelihood is alone material.(10) Of course, every preference implies such knowledge, but a mere preference of one creditor to another is not fraudulent, much less criminal. What is then implied is that the transferor should have effected the transfer with the primary object of defeating the creditors generally, and that with that object in view he should have put it out of their reach taking whatever consideration was offered him in the hurry of the moment and when his thoughts were turned more on how to avoid his liabilities than dispose of his assets.

4745. The fraud must in any case affect the creditors generally, though it may not substantially reduce the debtor's assets available for rateable distribution. But in this case the question may arise whether the debtor would have planned a fraud to achieve so little an advantage to himself.

Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Non-cog. Warrant. Bailable. Not comp.

Dishonestly or fraudulently preventing debt being available for creditors.

422. Whoever dishonestly or fraudulently prevents any debt or demand due to himself or to any other person from being made available according to law for payment of his debts or the debts of such other person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

[Dishonestly—s. 24. Fraudulently—s. 25.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4746).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4747).
(3) Proof (4748).
(4) Principle (4749).
(5) Dishonest Prevention of Payment (4750-4752).
(6) No Offence (4753).

4746. Analogous Law.—This section was enacted at a time when the distinction between property and an actionable claim was more marked than it has been since in consequence of subsequent legislation.(11) All the same it may still cover cases not contemplated by the last section, as where the debtor fraudulently passes an acknowledg-

(10) S. 53, Act IV of 1882.

(11) See 1 Gour's Law of Transfer (5th Ed.) §§ 99-110.

ment in respect of a debt due to himself so as to prevent its being made available for the satisfaction of the claims of his own creditors. In short, the "prevention" here contemplated need not necessarily be by removal, concealment, delivery or transfer as enacted in the last section, nor, on the other hand, need it be without adequate consideration, so long as it is either dishonest or fraudulent.

4747. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable and is triable by the Court of the Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first or second class.

4748. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That there was a debt or demand.

(2) That the accused prevented it from being made legally available for payment towards a certain debt.

(3) That he did so dishonestly or fraudulently.

4749. Principle.—The last section dealt with the fraudulent withdrawal of property as distinct from a chose in action which is the subject of the present section. In the present view of law, a debt or demand is ordinarily classed as property, though the term "demand" is certainly much wider than an actionable claim as defined in section 3 of the Transfer of Property Act.[12] The gist of the offence lies in the dishonest or fraudulent evasion of one's own liability in abetting others in evading it.

4750. Dishonest Prevention of Payment.—For the purpose of this offence, there must be, in the first place, a debt or demand due to the accused or some other person. The debt or demand would have been presumably available for payment, but for the preventive action of the accused. It must then be obviously within time and such as had become due and payable, but was not paid owing to his criminal intervention. The word "debt" looks simple but has now acquired a somewhat loose significance. As legal concept it connotes a liquidated money obligation usually recoverable by suit.[13] But the term "demand" is wider and may mean any claim, whether liquidated or unliquidated, for money or other property. It may thus include a debt and a claim to money not in the nature of a debt, such as mesne profits or damages. Such demand or debt must be due, though it may not be due to the accused, but he must have prevented its payment, and it must have been "dishonestly" or "fraudulently."

4751. If the prevention was in breach of contract, or in assertion of a bona fide right, it is not criminal, though it may entail a civil liability. So where the accused assigned the benefit of a pending suit to the prosecutor as a security for the due payment of his debt due to the prosecutor, agreeing at the same time not to compromise the suit, but which, notwithstanding his agreement, he compromised, and whereupon he was prosecuted under this section, it was held that he could not be convicted under this section unless the compromise was shown to have been made fraudulently or dishonestly, that is, in fraud of the prosecutor or to cause him wrongful loss.(14) It was doubted whether a claim for unliquidated damages in a suit was a debt or demand within the meaning of this section,(15) but the nature of the suit compromised was not known to the Court, and the decision ultimately turned upon the point already noticed.

(12) Act IV of 1882.

(13) For a general discussion on the subject, see 1 Gour's Law of Transfer (5th Ed.), § 104.

This case was followed in another case disposed of by Prinsep and Handley, JJ., on the following facts: Certain persons (A) mortgaged their property to B for a lac of rupees. The mortgage was a simple one, but contained a covenant that the property shall be mortgaged by B's nominee C during the continuance of the mortgage. As such, C was put in possession of the property for A in whose name he obtained a decree against an under-tenureholder D, in execution of which C brought D's estate to sale and purchased it in the name of A who was the decree-holder; but C agreed with D that if the latter should pay a certain sum within a certain time the sale should be set aside. D was, however, unable to pay this amount, and he went to A and induced him to agree to the sale being set aside on his depositing Rs. 1,000, to which A agreed, which amount was deposited in Court, and for which A applied to the Court for withdrawal. B then prosecuted A under this section and the Magistrate convicted him, but on revision the High Court held that A's conduct in compromising with D and in attempting to withdraw the Rs. 1,000 deposited by him was merely a breach of contract, which would probably have entitled B to realize at once the full amount of the debt. A's action was prompted by his desire to put an end to the management of B. But A's act could not be considered dishonest. It was true that B was hindered or delayed in the liquidation of his debt; but that did not render the conduct of A fraudulent or dishonest. It was, on the other hand, shown on the facts that the compromise was beneficial, and as in any case it had been entered into to put an end to B's management rather than to prevent the money from being available for payment of his debt under the mortgage, A's conviction for an attempt to commit this offence could not be sustained.(16)

4752. But these cases are instructive, for they show that the word "prevention" is here used in its widest sense as implying any act which leads to the non-satisfaction of a debt, whether that act be the removal or concealment of the property, or the realization of a debt due to the debtor which he had assigned over to his creditor. So if A assign over in favour of B an actionable claim, such as a debt or demand payable by C, and after assignment realize the claim from C and pass in his favour an antedated receipt to defraud B, both A and C would be clearly guilty of this offence. A because he had dishonestly prevented a debt due to himself from being made available for the payment of his debts

(14) Nobin Chunder Mudduck, 22 W. R. 46.
(15) Ib., p. 46.
(16) Hara Kumar Chaudhurani v. R Savi, 28 C. 314.

due to B, and C because he had fraudulently prevented a debt due to B from being made available for payment to A, to which he was legally entitled. But if in such a case C had no knowledge of the assignment, he may be innocent though B may be guilty.

4753. No Offence.—The accused who executes successive mortgages of his property, or mortgages it to one and then sells it to another commits no offence under this section;[17] though he may be visited with the penalties prescribed in other sections (e.g., ss. 417, or 420) if his convenants expose him to those charges.

Dishonest or fraudulent execution of deed of transfer containing false statement of consideration.

423. Whoever dishonestly or fraudulently signs, executes or becomes a party to any deed or instrument which purports to transfer or subject to any charge any property, or any interest therein, and which contains any false statement relating to the consideration for such transfer or charge, or relating to the person or persons for whose use or benefit it is really intended to operate, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Non-cog. Warrant. Bailable. Non-comp.

[Person.—s. 11. Dishonestly—s. 24. Fraudulently—s. 25.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4754).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4755).
(3) Proof (4756).
(4) Form of Charge (4757).
(5) Principle (4758).
(6) Meaning of Words (4759).
(7) Fraudulently False Recital of Consideration (4760-4762).

4754. Analogous Law.—The false recital of consideration or a false statement of the beneficiary in a deed, is made an offence by this section, if the false recital or statemnt is made fraudulently or dishonestly. The object is to punish fraud, when it is perpetrated to the immediate prejudice of a third party.

4755. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class.

4756. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That there was a deed or instrument.

(2) That it purported to effect a transfer or create a charge on any property.

(17) Musal Lal, 18 I. C. (A) 893, 14 Cr. L. J. 141.

(3) That the accused signed, executed or became a party to such deed or instrument.

(4) That it contained a false statement as to the consideration for such transfer or charge or as to the beneficiary.

(5) That the accused did as in (3) dishonestly or fraudulently.

4757. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows :—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you dishonestly (or fraudulently) signed (or executed or became a party to) a deed (or instrument) which purported to transfer (or subject to a charge) any property, to wit——(or any interest therein, to wit——) which contains a false statement relating to the consideration for the said transfer [(or charge) or relating to the person (or persons) for whose use (or benefit) it is really intended to operate] and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 423 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

"And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge."

4758. Principle.—As has been stated before (s. 241) there is nothing fraudulent in executing a benami transfer, but such a transfer easily lends itself to fraud and may become fraudulent if it is executed against the provisions of the Code. If, in short, its object be dishonest or fraudulent, it is punishable either under the provisions of this section or of those which condemn such transfers. So far as regards this section its provisions are directed against two specific acts of fraud, viz., (a) false recital of consideration, and (b) false name of the beneficiary. These are two of the most material particulars of a deed, and their mis-statement has the effect of creating evidence of a false claim; and law considers it an offence, the gravity of which is measured not by the mischief actually caused as by the mischief inevitably threatened.

4759. Meaning of Words.—"Signs, executes, or becomes a party": A person may sign as an attesting witness, execute as obligor and become a party as an executor or obligee. "Any deed or instrument": These words are intended to exclude all documents not having the operation of a deed or instrument, such as, for instance, a receipt. The deed or instrument must "purport to transfer or subject to any charge any property," i.e., transfer any property or create a charge thereon. A charge is distinguished from a transfer in that it does not convey any interest in the property in favour of the charge-holder, but merely indicates a fund out of which a claim is to be satisfied. As an instance of a transfer of any interest in property may be mentioned a mortgage or a lease. "False statement relating to the consideration" means only a statement of the price of a thing as distinguished from its description or value.(18)

4760. Fraudulently False Recital of Consideration.—This section is enacted to counteract a specific evil, the general purpose of which is to ensure a certain irreducible degree of honesty on the part of those who obtain credit on the faith of it. As such, it punishes the creation of documentary evidence containing a false recital of consideration or a false statement of the name of the beneficiary, these two being the most material particulars of a deed against which a person affected thereby may be wholly powerless, for scripta litera remanet, and it is not always possible to overcome the testimony of a deed. But, since the object of the section is to protect third parties from being directly injuriously affected by the deed, it follows that there is nothing criminal, though it may be fraudulent to overstate the consideration or falsely state a beneficiary. Such a case would, however, arise where the consideration is over-stated to defraud a preemptor.(19) And in such a case the vendor no less than the purchaser may be held equally liable under this section. For the section treats all alike whether they be those who signed or executed or were a party to any deed. Even persons who attested such a deed as witnesses may become liable under this section if they signed it fraudulently. But in such a case it is not probably allowable to infer fraud from a mere knowledge of the fraudulent purpose of the parties to a deed. But there may be circumstances evidencing ill-will or dishonesty, as payment of a sum of money as a consideration for obtaining a person's attestation, from which the Court would be justified in finding the elements necessary to constitute this offence.

(18) Mania Goundan, 37 M. 47.

4761. But the same scrutiny would be unnecessary in the case of the purchaser of property subject to pre-emption, in whose case the overstatement of consideration may be reasonably attributed to an intent to defraud the pre-emptor. A sold a certain property to B for Rs 1,500, but induced him to enter the price as Rs. 1,900 to forestall the co-parcener's right of redemption. B was convicted under this section, but on revision it was contended for him that the over-statement of the price of a sale to resist a pre-emptor was permissible under Muhammadan law, but Blair, J., held that whatever might have been the view of Muhammadan law, as to the claim of pre-emption, the Court was bound to give effect to the plain terms of this section which clearly applied to such a case, but at the same time the Court remarked: "The prosecution under section 423 is no doubt somewhat novel.(20) After many years' experience in this Court, we have never had a prosecution under that section for the entry of false consideration in a sale-deed, and yet it is within the experience of this Court that considerations are habitually falsely entered. In respect of the dishonesty of such false entries, the popular conscience has never been aroused." The Court then commended this consideration in imposing sentence which the Court said "should be rather a warning than a punishment."(21)

4762. In such a case the offence, of course, depends upon the right of pre-emption being proved to exist in a third party. There can be no

(19) Ram Dwaya, (1868) P. R. No. 16; Sandagar, (1869) P. R. No. 23; Gurditta Mal, (1902) P. R. No. 10; Chhajju, (1908) P. R. No. 16; Mahabir Singh, 25 A. 31.

(20) It was represented to the Court that the reports contained no case on the subject. As a matter of fact there were three such cases cited in the last note.

(21) Mahabir Singh, (1902) 25 A. 31.

dishonesty if the accused erroneously believed in the existence of such a right, though in that belief he may have overstated the consideration.[22] So Chatterji, J., said: "The District Magistrate's view that the intention of the accused alone is material is erroneous, for it ignores the correlation of the existence of the right with intention which is essential to satisfy the connotations of the words 'dishonestly' and 'fraudulently,' and to constitute the offence."[23] In such cases then the criminal Court may have to try a question of a civil right for the purpose of this offence. But the fact that it has to do so does not entitle it to throw out the case holding it to be one of a civil nature, or for the purpose of having the civil right first determined by the Civil Court.[24]

Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Non-cog. Warrant. Bailable. Not comp.

Dishonest or fraudulent removal or the concealment of property.

424. Whoever dishonestly, or fraudulently conceals or removes any property of himself or any other person, or dishonestly or fraudulently assists in the concealment or removal thereof, or dishonestly releases any demand or claim to which he is entitled, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

[Dishonestly—s. 24. Fraudulently—s. 25.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4763).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4764).
(3) Proof (4765).
(4) Form of Charge (4766).
(5) Principle (4767).
(6) Fraudulent Concealment of Property (4768-4770).

4763. Analogous Law.—This section bears a close analogy to, and must be compared with the provisions of sections 421 and 422. It generally provides for cases which may be equally punishable under those sections. Really speaking, it embraces three cases of fraud those consisting of concealment or removal of any property or assisting in its concealment, or relinquishing any debt or demand (§ 4767).

The penal provisions of the Madras Estates Land Act are merely supplementary to those enacted in this Code, and nothing therein contained affects this section.[25]

4764. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable, but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class. As to this section it was said in Madras: "The High Court have reason to believe that section 424 of the Penal Code is sometimes abused in the mofussil and that civil rights are disposed of in the criminal Courts. This should be checked as much as possible."[1]

---

(22) Chhajju, (1908) P. R. No. 16.
(23) Ib.
(24) Umrao Singh, (1883) 3 A. W. N. 209.
(25) Sivanupandia, 38 M. 793.
(1) (1868) 1 Weir 483.

4765. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused—

(a) concealed or removed any property, or

(b) assisted in its concealment or removal, or

(c) released any demand or claim to which he was entitled.

(2) That he did so dishonestly or fraudulently.

4766. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you dishonestly (or fraudulently) concealed (or removed) a certain property, to wit—— belonging to yourself (or to A B) [or dishonestly (or fraudulently) assisted in the concealment (or removal) thereof (or dishonestly released a certain demand, to wit——], and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 424 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

"And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge."

4767. Principle.—This offence is presumably intended to provide for a case not otherwise provided for. For concealment or removal of property of a certain kind is punishable under section 421, while the release of a demand may amount to a prevention of a demand due to a person from being made available for payment to another within the meaning of section 422 of the Code. The section is obviously restricted only to a fraudulent concealment or removal of property and not to its wanton destruction, which may be punished as mischief,[2] but which is not punishable under this section.

Of course, the section must be strictly construed, for otherwise it is likely to trench upon a number of cases which are the fit subject for civil adjudication.[3] But otherwise the section is wide enough to include any case of fraudulent concealment of property whether the fraud be practised on creditors or partners.[4]

4768. Fraudulent concealment of Property.—This section is not intended to punish an alienation of property, which, though fraudulent, is protected by civil law. Such is the concealment or alienation in anticipation of an attachment, though the case would be different if the attachment was in fact effected, provided that the attachment was then legally in force, and the burden of proving which is on the prosecution.[5] It was so held in the case of a distraint,[6] but its principle applies equally to the case of an attachment. It should be noted that both an attachment as well as a distraint only prevent an alienation of the pro-

(2) S. 425, ill, (d).
(3) Karri Mangadu, (1914) M. W. N. 791, 25 I. C. 514.
(4) Gour Benode Dutt, 21 W. R. 10.
(6) Gopalasami, 25 M. 729; followed Gopalasami, 25 M. 729.
(6) Gopalasami, 25 M. 729; followed in 1 Weir, 486.

perty by the person in possession. They do not effect a transfer of ownership or possession, so that a judgment-debtor who removes his standing crops after their attachment can only be convicted of this offence and not of theft.(7) Even where attachment involves transfer of possession, but possession in fact is not transferred, the only offence, for which the accused could be legally convicted is this offence, and not theft, because theft implies dishonest removal from the possession of another, and such possession must be actual and not merely constructive.(8) And the fact that the accused had deposited his crops in the village threshing floor when they were attached, would not affect his possession, if his control remained unaffected, though he may have been prohibited from removing them.(9)

4769. The rule that a removal of crop in violation of an order, which the person making it has no authority to make, constitutes an offence under this section.(10) It presupposes the presence of at least illegality in the act. This is necessarily implied in "dishonestly" and must be presumed to be implied in "fraudulently." Persons who remove their crops in spite of an illegal distraint are thus necessarily excluded.(11) So are those who remove their property in ignorance of a distraint, or being aware of it, with an object to preserve and protect them and not to remove them, so as to make them unavailable for the purpose of attachment or distress.

4770. These cases, however, present only one aspect of the question. The section is generally worded and would apply to any case of fraudulent removal or concealment connected with the purpose for which the section is enacted. The property removed may be of any kind and not exclusively his own. For it may be "of himself or any other person" and partly of one or of the other. So where a partner removed the account books of the firm with intent to defraud his co-partners, this offence was held to have been committed, it being held that this group of sections equally applied to co-partners as well as to creditors.(12)

So while a partner in cultivation, such as a bataidar, is entitled to joint possession of the crops raised by him and may even claim to remove them for threshing without detriment to the right of his co-sharer, still if he removes them fraudulently or dishonestly with intent to appropriate them to his own use in derogation of the right of his partner, he would be guilty of this offence, if by so doing he prevents their appraisement or distribution, but in such a case there must be evidence to show, as in the reported cases of conviction,(13) that he did so on purpose to defraud his partner by putting them out of his

---

(7) Obayya, 22 M. 151.
(8) Ib.
(9) Daya Karsan, 1 Bom. L. R. 515.
(10) Bavuri Magata, (1882) 1 Weir 483.
(11) Gopalasamy, 25 M. 729; Bavuri Magata, (1882) 1 Weir 483; Ananda Muttusami Aiyar, (1882) 1 Weir 284; contra in Brojokishore Dutt, 8 W. R. 17, which was probably dealt with a case of impropriety as opposed to an illegality affecting jurisdiction.
(12) Gour Benode Dutt, 21 W. R. 10.
(13) Sivanupandia, 38 M. 793; Kuldip Pandey v. Ramnath, (1917) Pat. 71, 1 Pat. L. J. 353, 35 I. C. 491; Lalu Gope, 1 Pat. L. W. 691; Khushi Ram 2 L. L. J. 99, 59 I. C. 654, 22 Cr. L. J. 142.

sight to prevent their appraisement and division. Of course, the fact that such an Act may be equally dealt with under a Local Act, does not limit the operation of this section. The accused were tenants of the Darbhanga Raj who was entitled to nine annas of the value of all trees cut by the tenant on his holding, after sale. In order to avoid this payment the tenant clandestinely cut down certain trees. He was convicted of this offence.(14)

Of Mischief.

4771. Topical Introduction.—This group of section (ss. 425-440) consists of 16 sections dealing with the offence of mischief, its various and varying phases, the underlying elements in all of which are, however, those here described. Mischief corresponds to the "malicious injuries to property" in the Digest of the English Criminal Law,(15) the leading characteristic of which was described by the English Law Commissioners to be malice as distinguished from fraud. For this purpose, however, there must be malice in fact, or express malice which was described to be "some actual intention to cause hurt, damage, or injury."(16) And an act "is maliciously done or omitted to be done, where being prohibited to be done, it is wilfully done, or being commanded to be done, it is wilfully omitted to be done without lawful justification or excuse."(17)

The terms of this offence are wide, and they were objected to on the ground that it included offences so wide apart as arson and the scuttling of ships. But such was stated to be the effect of the English Law.(18)

In laying down the punishment for different degrees of the offence of mischief, the gradation observed refers to the amount of the loss sustained, a mode of distinction not admitted in estimating the degrees of criminality in other offences against property. But it is not the only circumstance of aggravation, for the Code recognizes the following as equally aggravating:—

(i) Value of property (ss. 427, 429).

(ii) Mode of mischief—as by killing, poisoning or by fire or explosives, or after preparation to cause hurt (ss. 428, 440).

(iii) Utility of the subject of mischief, e.g., public road, bridges, river, channel or works of irrigation (ss. 430, 431), houses (s. 436), ships (s. 437), etc.

(iv) Its probable consequences—as by the destruction of landmarks, lighthouses, etc.,(ss. 432, 433).

The last three regulate the degree of criminality generally in the Code.

(14) Panche Mandar, 57 I. C. (Pat.) 273, 21 Cr. L. J. 609.
(15) First Rep., s. 603.
(16) First Rep., s. 604.
(17) Ib.
(18) Ib., s. 606.

The provisions of these sections generally correspond with those of the Malicious Damage Act, 1861,[19] and the subject is sometimes also treated under malicious mischief.[20] The rules of English Law generally correspond with these sections, but there are points on which the two materially differ. This will, however, be the subject of reference under the various sections which present such coincidences and contrasts.

Mischief.

425. Whoever, with intent to cause, or knowing that he is likely to cause, wrongful loss or damage to the public or to any person, causes the destruction of any property or any such change in any property or in the situation thereof as destroys or diminishes its value or utility, or affects it injuriously, commits "mischief."

Explanation 1.—It is not essential to the offence of mischief that the offender should intend to cause loss or damage to the owner of the property injured or destroyed. It is sufficient if he intends to cause, or knows that he is likely to cause, wrongful loss or damage to any person by injuring any property, whether it belongs to that person or not.

Explanation 2.—Mischief may be committed by an act affecting property belonging to the person who commits the act, or to that person and others jointly.

Illustrations.

(a) A voluntarily burns a valuable security belonging to Z intending to cause wrongful loss to Z. A has committed mischief.

(b) A introduces water into an ice-house belonging to Z and thus causes the ice to melt, intending wrongful loss to Z. A has committed mischief.

(c) A voluntarily throws into a river a ring belonging to Z with the intention of thereby causing wrongful loss to Z. A has committed mischief.

(d) A, knowing that his effects are about to be taken in execution in order to satisfy a debt due from him to Z, destroys those effects, with the intention of thereby preventing Z from obtaining satisfaction of the debt, and of thus causing damage to Z. A has committed mischief.

(e) A, having insured a ship, voluntarily causes the same to be cast away, with the intention of causing damage to the underwriters. A has committed mischief.

(f) A causes a ship to be cast away, intending thereby to cause damage to Z, who has lent money on bottomry on the ship. A has commited mischief.

(g) A, having joint property with Z in horse, shoots the horse, intending thereby to cause wrongful loss to Z. A has committed mischief

(h) A causes cattle to enter upon a field belonging to Z, intending to cause and knowing that he is likely to cause damage to Z's crop. A has committed mischief.

---

(19) 24 & 25 Vict., c. 97. (20) Arch., Cr. PL. (22nd Ed)., p. 633.

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4772-4773).
(2) Principle (4774).
(3) Meaning of Words (4775).
(4) What is Mischief (4776-4783).
(5) Accidents (4777).
(6) Negligence (4778-4779).
(7) Right of Ownership (4780).
(8) Mischievous Harm (4781-4782).
(9) Legal Act with Criminal Intention (4783).
(10) Bona Fide Claim Excepted (4784).
(11) What is Damage (4785).
(12) But Erroneous Belief in Right Excepted (4786-4789).
(13) Cutting of Trees (4787).
(14) Bona Fide Mistake Excepted (4790).
(15) Mischief must Affect Property (4791).
(16) Destruction: Change in Situation: Injury (4792-4793).
(17) Case of Mischief (4794).

4772. Analogous Law.—Though the offence here defined is designated "malicious injury to property" still, it is for all practical purposes an offence in which malice is presumed from the nature of the act and need not be proved. So Tindall, C. J., told the Grand Jury at Bristol: "Where a Statute directs that to complete an offence, it must have been done with intent to injure or defraud any person, there is no occasion that any malice or ill-will should subsist against the person whose property is so destroyed. It is a malicious act in contemplation of law when a man wilfully does that which is illegal, which, in its, necessary consequence, must injure his neighbour, and it is unnecessary to observe that the setting fire to another's house whether the owner be a stranger to the prisoner, or a person against whom he had a former grudge, must be equally injurious to him.[21] Similarly it has been laid down in other cases, that it was not necessary to prove express malice in a case of malicious injury to property,[22] and the definition of mischief is in accordance with this view.

4773. For the rest, the English Statute is more specific in its definition of indictable mischief. For instance, it punishes riotously demolishing houses[23] or riotously damaging them,[24] entering houses to destroy silk goods,[25] destroying agricultural machines,[1] flooding mines,[2] and other injuries relating thereto,[3] exhibiting false signals,[4] and doing other acts tending to the immediate loss of a ship,[5] arson and the like for which the Code makes correspondingly specific provisions. There is however no general offence of mischief to correspond with the next section in English Law, nor is its definition either so precise or comprehensive.

A definition was indeed framed by the English Law Commissioners for their Digest, but as it never became law, English Law remains without any definition of mischief.

(21) Newill, R. &. M. C. C. R. 458.
(22) Davies, 1 F. & F. 69; James v. Phelps, 11 Ad. & E. 483; James, 8 C. & P. 131.
(23) 24 & 25 Vict., c. 97, s. 11.
(24) Ib., s. 12.
(25) Ib., s. 14.
(1) Ib., s. 15.
(2) Ib., s. 28.
(3) Ib., s. 29.
(4) S. 47.
(5) Ib.

4774. Principle.—This section enacts a rule of which the maxim Sic uteri tuo ut alienum non laedas[6] is but a partial exponent. It enacts a rule which while preserving to the owner the maximum rights of property, prevents his using it to the injury or damage of another, and a fortiori it punishes one who wantonly causes such injury or damage to another's property. Neither malice nor an intention to cause the injury is essential for the constitution of the offence which may be committed by injury caused with only the knowledge of likelihood, which must, however, be strictly proved.[7]

4775. Meaning of Words.—"With intent to cause or knowledge that he is likely to cause": The distinction between an intention and knowledge of likelihood will be found discussed under s. 299 (§§ 3027-3037). From the examples there given it will be evident that there may be the knowledge of likelihood without intention, though the converse proposition is not always necessarily true. "Wrongful loss or damage," i.e., without any corresponding gain or profit. No loss is wrongful if it is caused in the bona fide exercise of right over one's own property.[8] "Causes the destruction of any property": The term "destruction" implies the causing of injury to the property by destruction—as by the demolition of a watercourse. So the cutting of green crops before they were ripe for harvesting would be mischief. The term "property" is here used in its wide sense as comprising both moveable and immoveable property. It does not however include incorporeal or intangible property such as an easement.[9]

Explanation 1.—This merely means that A may cause mischief to B's property so as to injure not B but C, as in illustration (e).

Explanation 2.—In fact as is pointed out in illustration 2, such mischief may be caused by A to his own property as in the illustrations (d) and (g).

4776. What is Mischief.—The word "mischief" here defined has been used in a special sense as a term of art as implying the causing of such unlawful injury to property as is punishable by law. The first and its most essential element is the intent to cause, or knowledge that he is likely to cause, wrongful loss or damage to the public or to any person. This furnishes the mens rea but for which there can be no offence. In some cases the offence is said to lie in the intention[10] but this is inaccurate, for as is apparent from the section, the offence may be equally committed if there is no intention but merely a knowledge of likelihood, the question of intention being then material only as regards the sentence.[11]

But the question of intention and knowledge suggests another question: Should it be actual intention or knowledge, or such as may be presumed from the nature of the act ? It has been elsewhere point-

(6) "Use your own property so as not to injure that of another."

(7) Benarsidas, 4 L. L. J. 482, (1922) P. L. R. 53; Hari Singh, 52 I. C. (Pat.) 276, 20 Cr. L. J. 612.

(8) Kondi Chetty, 8 M. L. T. 385, 8 I. C. 128; Fateh Din, (1909) P. R. No. 14, Muhammad, 5 I. C. 560.

(9) Keru, (1888) B. U. C. 387.

(10) Per Kembell and Nanabhai, JJ., in Shama, (1874) B. U. C. 88.

(11) Per Jardine and Ranade, JJ., in Rev Sing, (1894) B. U. C. 690

ed out that the Code has no place for what is sometimes called secondary intention or knowledge. Whenever criminality in the Code depends upon the presence of intention or knowledge, it requires proof of the actual or primary intention or knowledge and not merely of a presumed state of the mind which, though admissible in English Law, is not consistent with the conception of crime in the Code.(12) But of course, while what the Court has to find is the primary intention, still the Court is well justified in inferring it from the nature of the act and the circumstances surrounding it. But what it has to find is the real and not a hypothetical intention or knowledge, though in most cases it is a matter of inference rather than of direct proof. As such it is a question of fact and not of law. But being a part of the definition of the offence it must be established by the prosecution, who must establish facts and circumstances from which the jury or the judge may justifiably infer the presence of the intention or knowledge, which makes the injurious act criminal. Such act must then negative a reasonable inference that it could be due to any other state of the mind, such as accident, carelessness or negligence, or bona fide belief in one's right.

Accidents.

4777. The question of accident presents no difficulty. Accident and misfortune may lead to a consequence of which the author is an involuntary agent. He may be perhaps guilty of recklessness or negligence, but his recklessness or negligence is too remotely connected with the effect, and at any rate the effect is caused in a manner which he could not have foreseen. Such was the case of the accused, who whilst driving his bullock cart ran against the carriage of a Colonel Lucas, who ordered him to get out of his way, whereupon he pulled the bullock in the wrong direction, thereby dashing the pole of his yoke against the footboard of the prosecutor's cart causing it damage. The Magistrate fined the accused under the next section, but the conviction was of course set aside on revision by the Court, who held it to be an accident due to the accused's stupidity, and for which the Magistrate had "lamentably failed in his duty for holding the accused to be criminally liable."(13) Of course, the prosecutor might have recovered damages in tort if he had brought action in the Civil Court, but it was not a case of mischief.

In another case the Magistrate had similarly erred in convicting the accused of this offence for having damaged a bridge as they were floating some timber through it, but the conviction was again set aside.(14) The accused set fire to some rubbish in his field which was close to a protected forest. The fire was carried by the wind to the adjacent protected forest and set fire to it. The accused tried to subdue the fire but failed. The Magistrate convicted him of mischief holding that as the accused set fire to the rubbish in such close proximity to a Government forest, he knew that he was likely to cause destruction by fire to Government property, if he did not take precautions to prevent the spreading of the fire he had lit, and he took no real precaution. But on revision it was held that the accused was merely guilty of negligence, in not preventing the spread of the fire, but he could not be held guilty of this offence, for he could not be said to have caused the destruction of the Government forest within the meaning of this section.(15)

(12) Gen. Intro., §§ 58-60.
(13) Shama, (1874) B. U. C. 88.
(14) 5 M. H. C. R. (App.) 40.

Negligence.

4778. So an act may be negligent but it is not necessarily mischievous. Such was the case of the accused who negligently allowed one's bullocks to stray into another's garden, which uprooted the vegetables and plants causing loss to its owner;(16) or one whose buffaloes strayed into another's wheat-field causing damage to the crop and against which the accused took no precaution.(17) All these were cases of illegal omissions, but even an illegal omission may amount to mischief, if, for instance, the owner of cattle, who, knowing them to be not properly provided with fodder and accustomed to stray in search of food, intentionally omits to secure his cattle or neglects to take reasonable precautions for their care and custody.

The omission or neglect, however, must be such as to have an active effect conducing to the result, as a link in a chain of facts from which an intention to bring about the result may be inferred.(18) For this purpose it would be admissible to show that the accused was in the habit of letting his cattle into other people's pasture, or that he let them to graze at night in the vicinity of gardens, knowing well that they are likely to trespass therein. In such a case it may well be said that the accused causes his cattle to enter into those gardens within the meaning of illustration (b). So a person who lets loose his cattle near another's field in spite of remonstrance and promise to take better care of them in future, may be justly held to have caused his cattle to enter therein with knowledge of the injury they were likely to cause, and as such he could not be acquitted of his intention to commit this offence.(19)

4779. But the terms of this section should not be unduly enlarged. And in the case of straying cattle, it is not permissible to presume an intention or knowledge of likelihood from the mere fact of repeated trespass and its non-prevention,(20) unless it justifies an inference that the owner knew that it was likely to cause loss or damage to the public or to any person.(21) Such knowledge may be justifiably inferred from the owner wilfully driving them into another's land,(22) or where the omission to take care of them is such as justifies a finding that it was only reasonably consistent with such knowledge as in the case already cited.(23) Such inference was, for instance, held to be reasonable in a case where the defendants grazed their cattle on waste land on which the Government had by notification prohibited

(15) Nandeyappagowda, 8 Bom. L. R. 851.
(16) Narsu, (1882) B. U. C. 185; Hyderally, (1884) B. U. C. 199.
(17) Rangu, (1883) B. U. C. 189; Anon, 6 M. H. C. R. (App.) 36.
(18) Thornotti, (1886) 1 Weir 495.
(19) Aruz Sircar, 10 W. R. 29.
(20) Forbes v. Grish Chunder Bhuttacharjee, 14 W. R. 31.
(21) Baibaya, 7 B. 126; Anon., 6 M H. C. R. (App.) 36.
(22) Sheik Raju, 9 B. 173.
(23) Thornotti, (1886) 1 Weir 495.

the public from grazing cattle, another plot being set apart for that purpose. The accused turned their cattle into the prohibited area, whereupon the Court held that though the accused had a right to graze in the Government waste, still their grazing them in the prohibited area constituted mischief, inasmuch as it caused wrongful loss to Government of the grass which the cattle consumed, which thereby caused the destruction of some property, namely the grass.(24) In such a case the motive of the accused may have been to provide his cattle with more abundant pasture than was available in the permitted area, but this could not be taken into consideration in judging of the offence (§ 253).

Right of Ownership.

4780. Another fact negativing this offence is the assertion of the right of ownership in exercise of which the accused is entitled to make use of his property, though it may cause damage to others. The accused had purchased the complainant's house in execution of a decree against him. He obtained symbolical possession but the complainant refused to vacate it whereupon he set fire to it. He was held justified in destroying what was his own property.(25) If a person removes a building constructed without his consent on his land, when the constructor of the building had no right to erect it, and had acquired no right to retain it, he cannot be convicted of this offence, because the loss he has caused is not a wrongful loss.(1)

So on a mortgage of a building, the mortgagor does not cease to be the owner of the property, and he and his heirs continue to enjoy the same rights of property subject however to the right of the mortgagee. But such right was in no way imperilled by the mortgagor's reversionary heir having sold some of the materials of the house, which had tumbled down during a flood, for the sum of Rs. 18 and which were otherwise lying perfectly useless on the ground. It was held that the accused had neither the dishonest intention, nor indeed did it materially affect the mortgagee's interest so as to make the act punishable as mischief.(2) In another case the two accused had dammed up their water channel causing inundation into and damage to the complainant's field. He prosecuted them for mischief, but the Court held that as there was doubt as to the bona fides of the accused, there could be no conviction for mischief adding that prima facie a man had a right to do what he liked with his own, and if his action indirectly prejudiced his neighbour, the latter's ordinary remedy was in the Civil Court.(3)

Mischievous Harm.

4781. But it will not warrant a wanton destruction of property merely in assertion of such a right. So where the prosecutor cultivated a plot of land having rented it from B, but before the produce was harvested the accused

(24) Gurram Siddugadu, (1886) 1 Weir 492.

(25) Ram Krishna Singh, 3 Pat. L. J. 335; 66 I. C. 817, 23 Cr. L. J. 321; Kesho Singh, 72 I. C. 883, 24 Cr. L. J. 467 (The owner is entitled to block his own channel); Kullappa, (1920) M. W. N. 131, 54 I. C. 617, 21 Cr. L. J. 137 (or to cut open his own bund).

(1) Grove (Daniel), 1 Weir 489.

(2) Bhuban Mohan Banerjee v. Tansuk Ray, 6 C. W. N. 34.

(3) Kondi Chetti, 8 M. L. T. 385, 8 I. C. 128.

entered upon the land, assaulted the complainant and carried away some of the produce trampling on and destroying whatever remained, the lower Court held that the prosecutor had proved his possession, and the accused his title to the land, and therefore in the exercise of his right of ownership the accused was entitled to destroy the crop, but Kindersley, J., held that even if the accused was the owner of the land he was not justified in establishing his right by violence but by a civil suit, though the Court declined to interfere with the acquittal.(4)

The owner of land has a right to eject a trespasser, but he has no right to destroy whatever property of the trespasser the owner may find on the land. If the trespasser be found using the owner's tools on the land trespassed upon, he may destroy them, for the tools are his own. But if the tools belonged to the trespasser he might be guilty of mischief if he destroyed them, though they were being used upon his land. The complainant held land of the accused, and his lease terminated though he continued to hold on, but he was found to have no right and was in fact a trespasser. The accused went up to him and snatched his ropes used for watering the land and as protest against his possession threw them into the well, whereupon he was convicted of this offence, and his conviction was affirmed by Batty, J., who held the act of the accused to be unjustifiable, adding: "The applicant's pleader, I understand, is unable to contend that if a trespasser left his watch in the room of another person, that would justify that other person in smashing the watch or throwing it down a well.(5)

4782. Mischief implies the causing of wrongful loss or damage and no loss or damage is wrongful unless it involves invasion of a legal right. In any other case it is Damnum sine injuria.(6) (§ 362). So if A build a mill near to B's on purpose to diminish his profits, he intends to cause damage to B but A's act is neither punishable nor actionable becaused it is perfectly legal. So where A and B were joint owners of a parcel of land whereon A erected an edifice without the consent of B who sued him and obtained a decree for its demolition, and whereupon B's servants went and pulled it down, it was held that they could not be convicted of this offence because their act had caused no wrongful loss to A.(7) The same view was taken of the accused who removed an illegal obstruction put up by the Municipality, which the accused removed as it barred his right of way.(8)

The same view was also taken of the owner of a bullock, who buried its carcass to prevent its being skinned by the village skinner, and who had apparently a right thereto, but who would presumably have duly become entitled to the skin if the owner had abandoned his right of property in the carcass. The case was, however, held to be one involving merely an infraction of a civil right.(9) So a person could not be convicted of mischief for demolishing a wall which another has

(4) Vengappaiyan, (1883) 1 Weir 491.
(5) Dinkar, 7 Bom. L. R. 86 (87).
(6) "Damage without injury."
(7) Rajcoomar Singh, 3 C. 573.
(8) Abdul Aziz, (1895) B. U. C. 745.
(9) Govinda Panja, 8 B. 295.

erected on his land.[10] But if so why should the owner be held liable for uprooting the standing crops grown by a trespasser upon his land? It is submitted that in such cases criminality depends not so much upon the act of the accused, as upon his intention and knowledge of the likelihood of causing loss or damage to the public or to any person. If the act itself is legal then the question of intention becomes immaterial.

Legal Act with Criminal Intention.

4783. But even the assertion of a legal right may involve the doing of an illegal act, and in that case the question of intention and knowledge may convert an innocent act into a criminal act. The accused dug up some of the graves and removed the stones placed over some of the graves in order to extend his cultivation. It was held that though the primary object of the accused was to extend his cultivation, still he was guilty of mischief as his act involved such a change in the graves as would injuriously affect them, if they could be treated as property. The Court could not say that they were not property so as not to be the subject of trespass or mischief, and it held the accused to possess the knowledge that the act was likely to cause such a change in the property as either to prevent its identification or affect it injuriously.[11] But in this case it was found that though the graves stood on the accused's land, they belonged to a class of persons by whom a care-taker was appointed to look after them. The case would have been different if they had been discarded graves in possession of the accused, or such in which another person had not a vested right.[12] Such was the case of the accused who cut down his tree under which the idol of a god had been for years exhibited once a year for public worship, and whereupon he was prosecuted for this offence, but it was held that that fact alone did not amount to a dedication of the tree to the idol or the public in the absence of which the accused could not be divested of this right of ownership.[13]

4784. Bona Fide Claim Excepted.—The principle deducible from these cases is then this, that while there can be nothing wrong in the owner exercising the ordinary rights of property, his act becomes wrongful if in the exercise of that right he infringes the right of another, and his act would amount to this offence if it is done with the intention or knowledge so as to cause "wrongful loss or damage to the public or to any person."[14] Now the causing of wrongful loss implies the causing of loss by unlawful means of property to which the person losing it is legally entitled. Such loss, therefore, implies the adoption of an illegal means to cause an illegal loss, which again implies the existence of some right over the accused's property. That right may not be capable of separate enjoyment or possession. It may be even inchoate and undefined but still it must be in the nature of a right, as in the illustration (d). Such a right comes into existence in favour of a purchaser of immoveable property on the formation of a contract for its sale, though it is declared by civil law that it does not of itself create any interest in or charge on the property.[15]

(10) Sankar Lal, (1887) A. W. N. 101.
(11) Rumala Nagayya, (1889) 1 Weir 496.
(12) Chotu Ally, 4 Bom. L. R. 463.
(13) Venkata Purnandam, (1902) 1 Weir 496.
(14) Packriya v. Muthukrishna, 11 M. L. W. 348, 56 I. C. 510, 21 Cr. L. J. 478; Dharmalinga, 39 M. 57.
(15) S. 54. Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882).

Where therefore the accused's land was sold by the Collector, and purchased by the complainant, who paid a portion of the purchase-money in accordance with the sale law under which the sale was to be confirmed on expiration of sixty days. Before the expiration of this period the accused cut down some of the fruit trees standing on the holding, and he was thereupon charged for this offence, it was held that this offence may be committed not only when the damage consists of the infringement of an existing present and complete right, but also when it is intended to defeat and render infructuous a right about to come into existence. The Court referred to illustration (d) and added: "A very little alteration in the words makes the case fit the present. A, knowing that his property has been sold in satisfaction of a public demand in order to satisfy that public demand, and that the purchaser's title will, after the lapse of sixty days, become final and conclusive, destroys the fruit trees upon the land with the intention of thereby preventing the purchaser from obtaining the benefit of the purchase he has made, under which his title now inchoate, will become final and conclusive after sixty days: A has committed mischief."[16] But where an act is done in the exercise of a right of ownership in which another has no interest there can be no mischief. So while A would be guilty of mischief if he shot down a horse which he owned jointly with Z intending thereby to cause loss to Z,[17] A could not be convicted of that offence if the horse was his sole property. So it was put to the Law Commissioners if A, a collector, having a duplicate specimen of a rare coin, painting or other article of vertu was guilty of this offence if he destroyed it so as to enhance the value of the other, and to which the Commissioners had no difficulty replying in the negative, for by destroying what is his own property he causes no wrongful loss to any person.[18]

What is Damage ?

4785. But the collocation of "damage" with wrongful loss may suggest a question whether that term was intended to enlarge the meaning of the other. It is apprehended that the term is used ejusdem generis with "loss" as implying an unlawful loss, and not merely a pecuniary loss or inconvenience caused by the act of another. Indeed, such loss cannot be even the subject of a civil action, much less of a criminal prosecution. The term "damage" must then involve invasion of a right, though it does not necessarily contemplate damage of a destructive character, but it does imply diminution of the value of one's property caused by that invasion of right, which to be punishable as mischief must have been contemplated by the doer of it when he did it.[19]

The accused was the servant of the owner of a hat in which the complainant had a stall. He, however, wanted to shift it to another hat, and for that purpose loaded his goods in a cart when he was accosted by the accused who refused to permit him to shift, but on the complainant's insisting upon it he overturned his cart throwing the boxes on to the road. He was convicted of wrongful restraint, but the Court held it to be a (16) Dharma Das Ghose v. Nusseeruddin, 12 C. 660.

(17) Ill. (g).

(18) First Rep., s. 609; Ram Krishna Singh, 3 Pat. L. T. 335, 66 I. C. 817, 23 Cr. L. J. 321; Kesho Singh, 72 I. C. 883, 24 Cr. L. J. 467; Jang Bahadur, 93 I. C. 40, (1926) Pat. 244.

(19) Per Pigot, J., in Juggeshwar Dass, 12 C. 55.

case of mischief, adding: "There was an unlawful removal of goods from the cart, and an unlawful change in their situation, with the knowledge that that change must amount to an inconvenience, more or less serious, to the owner of the goods, and must, to some extent, diminish the utility of the goods which it was desired to remove from one place to another by the fact of their being cast out of the conveyance in which they were to be removed. To that extent the utility of those goods was diminished and to that extent they were injuriously affected."(20) As remarked before, there can be no offence where the act though legal is done with malicious intent, as where a person sets up a rival establishment to ruin his neighbour by competition, in which case, the competition being legal the setting up of a rival establishment cannot be relieved against, because it is not illegal. It is in short a case of Danum sine injuria, of a damage without an injury.

But Erroneous Belief in Right Excepted.

4786. There can be then no mischief without the invasion of a right. But all invasion of a right, though wrongful, is not mischievous which involves an intention to cause damage or knowledge that he is likely to cause it. Now there can be neither such intention nor knowledge when the right is itself the subject of dispute, and when what is done is itself in vindication of a right. The accused were the servants of a zemindar B who claimed a right to fishery which was claimed by another zemindar A, and who obtained a decree in the Civil Court declaring his right thereto, but to which B was not a party. A's servants put up a bar across the watercourse to prevent the escape of fish, which the servants of B removed as an obstruction to the enjoyment of their right. They were convicted of mischief, but on revision the High Court quashed the conviction, holding that the accused could not have been convicted without a finding that A was entitled to the fishery as against B, and that the act of the accused was done on purpose to cause wrongful loss to A and that it was not done in good faith for the protection of their master's interests, and for repelling what they believed to be an unlawful intrusion on the part of A. If the accused really acted in the belief that the fishery belonged to their masters, it could not be said that in removing a bar which interfered with that fishery they acted with intent to cause or knowing they were likely to cause injury to A. Such belief was perfectly consistent with A's decree by which B was not bound and of which the accused may have had no knowledge, if their act had been in its nature malicious and wanton, and one which could have had no other object than that of the injury or destruction of the property, or to prevent the title to the property being ascertained, or otherwise to injure A.(21)

The determination of a right to fishery involves the determination of an intricate question of civil right, for as has been already seen (§§ 4072-4073) it is not in every case that fish is capable of private ownership,(22) but where a right to fishery is once established, any invasion of that right would constitute as much this offence as theft. For this purpose the (20) Juggeshwar Dass v. Koylash Chunder Chatterjee, 12 C. 55.

(21) Bakar Halsana v. Dinbandhu, 12 W. R. 1.

(22) As to when they are, see s. 378, §§ 4072-4073; and Mayaram Surma v. Nichala Katani, 15 C. 402; Bhagiram Dome v. Ahar Dome, 15 C. 388.

Indian Fisheries Act[23] divides water into private waters and public waters, the latter of which alone has been specially legislated for,[24] a person being liable to a conviction thereunder though he may not be punishable for mischief. But a person may be punished for mischief if he commits an act which amounts to that offence in a "private" water though he could not have been punished under the Indian Fisheries Act. Such a case arose where the two rival persons had right to fish on either bank of a river; one bank which was the property of Government being leased to the prosecutor, while the other bank was the property of a private owner who had leased his fishery right to the accused. The latter diverted the course of the river so as to reduce a section of it to practically dry land and thereby destroyed a quantity of mature and immature fish. He was convicted of mischief, and it was held that by diverting the course of the stream the accused knew of the damage he was likely to cause to the prosecutor. He was therefore guilty of this offence, as he had caused a change in the stream or in the situation thereof and diminished its value or utility within the meaning of this section.[25] In this case the question of the accused's good faith was not considered.

A person is justified in exercising not only his private right but also his public right. The complainant had encroached on the site of a public road and built upon it. The accused, as a member of the public pulled down the construction and exercised his right of way. He was held justified.[1] So a mortgagee (presumably in possession) was held justified in cutting down some trees on the property mortgaged to him in order to repair another part of the mortgaged premises; it being held that the waste even if excessive could be adequately compensated for in the accounts between mortgagor and mortgagee.[2] So where the tenant removed some earth from zemindar's land and pleaded a customary right, the Court threw out the case observing that criminal Courts were not intended to decide civil dispute, and that the one under reference was too petty to be the basis for conviction under s. 426.[3]

4787. Cutting of Trees.—The right to cut down trees standing upon the tenant's land has given rise to several prosecutions for mischief, in which it has been held that if the cutting was protected by a plausible claim it cannot be punished as mischief whether the motive in cutting the trees was mala fide or dishonest.[4] The question in such cases is, was the cutting at least defensible on the ground of a bona fide claim,[5] a bona fide dispute,[6] or at least a bona fide mistake (§§ 4789-4790).

4788. An illegal act done in the belief that it is legal is a good defence to a criminal prosecution for an offence in which the criminality depends upon the presence of criminal knowledge or intention. The

(23) Act IV of 1897.
(24) Ib., s. 6.
(25) Chanda, 28 A. 204. To the same effect, Ramakrishna v. Palainyandi, 1 M. 262, F. B.; Athimoolam v. Palaniyandi, (1920) M. W. N. 131, 54 I. C. 617, 21 Cr. L. J. 137; Jaganath, 10 B. 183.
(1) Dharmalinga, 39 M. 57.
(2) Ramasamier, 1 M. L. W. 274, 23 I. C. 498, 15 Cr. L. J. 290.
(3) Hukum Chand, 73 I. C. 805, 24 Cr. L. J. 693, (1923) A. I. R. (A.) 544.
(4) Sham Lal Lohan, 5 Pat. L. W. 114, 46 I. C. 409, 19 Cr. L. J. 729.
(5) Pitam Singh, 58 I. C. (A.) 828, 21 Cr. L. J. 828, Gerish Chandra v. Akhay Kumar, 62 I. C. (C.) 331, 22 Cr. L. J. 507.
(6) Gainu Panday, 68 I. C. (M.) 40, 23 Cr. L. J. 504.

prosecutor was a tenant of the accused B's employer, and as his rent fell into arrear the latter obtained a distress warrant the execution of which was entrusted to the accused A, who accompanied by B proceeded to execute it, and in doing which they forced open the complainant's lock, which neither had any right to do. They were both convicted of this offence, but the High Court quashed their conviction holding that neither could be held to possess the knowledge of causing wrongful loss, and as for A his act was further protected under section 79. The proper remedy of the complainant was a civil suit for trespass, but it was not a case of mischief.(7)

Such was the view taken of the owner of a dead bullock who buried its carcass to prevent its being skinned by the village Mehar who claimed a right to it, which was held to be a mere infraction of a civil disputed right and in nowise a case of mischief.(8) The accused who demolished the wall constructed on his land by the complainant who was found to be a trespasser, stood on a higher ground, for his act though wanton, could not be wrongful. As Tyrrell, J., observed: "Whatever loss might result to the complainant from interference with his building materials, it is plain that such loss.....would not have been wrongful, inasmuch as he was not wrongfully kept out of, or deprived of, the wall in question, the placing of which on Shanker's land was wrongful on his part."(9)

4789. But this view should not be pushed too far, for otherwise what should we say of the owner who uprooted the immature crops grown on his land by a trespasser (§§ 917, 4767). The true test in such cases appears to be: was the act done out of malice or in the assertion of a bona fide claim of right.(10) Of course, such a claim may be legal or illegal. If legal, the question of bona fide does not arise, for if the act was legal, the question of intention is immaterial (§§ 917, 4767). It is only when the act is indefensible on the ground of its legality that the question of a bona fide belief arises. But there can be no bona fide belief where the act manifestly was, or known to be, illegal. That plea has a place only in case of a doubtful right, or a right which a person may still believe in as his own.

The appellants and other members of a Christian congregation were found to have had a joint interest in a graveyard, which was in the possession of the complainant who was their priest, and who had the key of the gateway. The appellants asked his permission to bury a deceased person. It was refused. The appellants thereupon broke open the gate and buried the deceased. They were prosecuted for this offence, but it was held that as they had the right of burial in the graveyard, they were justified in breaking open the gate using no more force than was necessary if the priest refused them admission. They were in any case protected because they acted in the exercise of a bona fide claim of right.(11) This was the ratio decidendi of the case in which the accused who were members of a Municipal Committee permitted a tree standing within the Municipal limits

(7) Kaikhusro, (1898) B. U. C. 949.
(8) Govinda Punja, 8 B. 295.
(9) Shankar Lal, (1887) A. W. N. 101.
(10) Per Brodhurst, J., in Rustam Ali, (1882) A. W. N. 209; per Muttusami Aiyar, J., in Jagannathan, (1892) 1 Weir 490.
(11) Viagula Fernandez, (1890) 1 Weir 489.

to be cut down for a public purpose against a formal order of the Municipality.(12)

4790. Bona Fide Mistake Excepted.—In order to exculpate the accused it is not sufficient merely to assert a claim of right, for if it were so, such assertion would be readily made in every case where it is said that the accused is protected if he deals injuriously with the property of another. What is meant is, that law cannot punish a man for a bona fide mistake, and that if he really though erroneously believed that he had the right to do the act he did, he is protected not because he causes no loss nor because it is not actionable, but because his act was not committed with intent to cause wrongful loss or damage to any person.(13) The question whether the act of the accused was such as to amount to mischief raises the question whether the act was done in the assertion of a claim of right, and it would not therefore be a question which the accused is bound to plead in his defence, provided that the plea may equally be established from the evidence on record.(14) Such a person acts on a misconception of facts, and his knowledge or intention must then be judged on the assumption of those facts in which he believed.

So if a person being ignorant of the true boundary of his land removes a building from land he in good faith believes to be his own, he cannot be convicted of this offence inasmuch as he acts on a misconception of fact, provided that he does no more than he believes himself justified in doing in the view he entertains of the ownership of the land.(15) It is no fact rebutting the plea of a bona fide claim of right that the accused's right to do the act had long since been the subject-matter of dispute. For impulsive action is not an invariable index of bona fides. So where there was a longstanding dispute about a wall between the prosecutor and the accused and who one day ordered his servant to pull it down to enforce his right, which he did, the accused constructing a new wall in its place, it was held that the dispute was one for settlement by the Civil Court.(16) The same view was taken by the Bombay Court of the accused who put up a hut on a piece of land, to protect the right he believed himself to possessed, which the complainant had been disputing for years.(17)

4791. Mischief must Affect Property.—The offence of mischief must affect some property in one of the injurious modes, described in the section. If a thing was not property within the meaning of the law, then there can be no mischief, whatever may have been the nature of the act The term "property" as here used means and includes only tangible property and not merely an easement.(18) So where the accused was found to be the owner of a staircase to which the complainant had the right of use, it was held that the accused's destruction of the building with the staircase could not be punished as mischief, because the destruction of the (12) Amir Chand, (1878) P. R. No. 9.

(13) S. 23; Budh Singh, 2 A. 101.
(14) S. 102, Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872). Madhu Sudan v. Sasti Prosad, 7 C. W. N. 859; (1881) 1 Weir 488; Issur Chunder Mundle v. Rohim Sheikh, 25 W. R. 65.
(15) Grove (Daniel), (1882) 1 Weir 488 (489).
(16) Jagannathan, (1892) 1 Weir 490; contra in Mahadeo, 96 I. C. 210, (1926) A. 704, decided upon its own facts.
(17) Nandu, (1889) B. U. C. 465.
(18) Keru, (1888) B. U. C. 387.

staircase led only to the destruction of an easement which the complainant had acquired over the staircase.[19] For the same reasons, things which are nullius proprietas cannot be the subject of this offence (§§ 4077-4082). But if a thing is " property " in the sense in which that term is understood in law then it may be the subject of this offence, though it may be practically valueless. The accused received a registered postal article, but being called upon to sign its acknowledgment he tore it up, whereupon he was prosecuted for this offence and Chatterji, J., convicted him holding the receipt to be the property of the Post Office having some value, however small, the tearing of which caused wrongful loss to its owner which the accused was likely to know. He was consequently convicted and fined two rupees.[20]

In another case the accused was convicted for destroying two documents which were both immoral agreements whereby the complainant permitted his wife to live in adultery on her foregoing her claim to maintenance. It was reported to the High Court that inasmuch as the consideration for the agreement was immoral, the documents were worthless and their destruction therefore did not constitute mischief. But it was held that as one of the documents contained a declaration that she had no right of maintenance against the accused, and as both of them might be used as evidence of the adultery on the part of the wife and of the cessation of the liability to maintain her on the part of the husband, they were both property the destruction of which was sufficient to constitute this offence.[21]

4792. Destruction: Change in Situation: Injury.—Besides the necessary criminal intent, the next essential requisite of this offence is the causing of " destruction of any property, or any change in any property, or in the situation thereof as destroys or diminishes its value or utility or affects it injuriously."[22] These words imply a physical injury from a physical cause. They do not include any metaphorical injury to property by affecting it ritually. Such was the case of the accused who attended a caste dinner and being late asked those who had already seated themselves to move elsewhere, which they declined, whereupon the accused threw down a shoe in front of the diners which made the food ritually impure, and in consequence of which the guests refused to partake of it and left in confusion. The Magistrate convicted the accused of this offence, but Blair, J., held it to be inapplicable to such a case.[23] So there can be no destruction where the standing crops of another are cut when they are mature for harvesting;[24] but if they are cut when immature then this offence may be committed. But in any other case the taking may cause wrongful loss to the grower, and if it be dishonest, a conviction may be had for the theft. But it cannot be mischief. If, therefore, a person is accused of mischief, by cutting paddy, it is not sufficient for the prosecution to prove that he cut it under the circumstances so as to make it mischief, but it is necessary to prove, and the Court must find it also, that the paddy was unripe and not in a fit state to be cut when it was cut by the accused.[25]

Meaning of Injury.

(19) Keru, (1888) B. U. C. 387
(20) Sukha Singh, (1905) P. R. No. 24.
(21) Vyapuri, 5 M. 401.
(22) Fateh Din, (1909) P. R. No. 14, 4 I. C. 863.
(23) Moti Lal, 24 A. 155.
(24) Nga Si, (1903) 10 Bur. L. R. 126 Mohomed Foyaz v. Khan Mahomed, 18 W. R. 10.
(25) Miras Chowkidar, 7 C. W. N. 718 (714).

4793. So where the accused was convicted of this offence for having forcibly cut and removed certain bamboos standing on his land, the Court quashed the conviction holding that as bamboo was a thing which is grown to be cut, the cutting and removing it could not amount to the destruction or other injury here contemplated.(1) The same view was taken in Madras in a case in which the accused had erected a dam across a river which it was alleged the accused knew was likely to submerge the prosecutor's lands. The accused justified his act by right of an old custom. But the Court threw out the case holding that the construction of the dam did not cause the destruction of any property. It was the alleged probable consequential damage to other property which was the cause of complaint, and though that would authorize increased punishment under section 432, it did not of itself constitute mischief.(2) This was, however, not concurred in by Collett, J., who held it to be mischief on the ground that the dam constituted a change in the river likely to be attended with damage, and affected it injuriously. But it does not appear how the dam injuriously affected the river, though it so affected the adjacent property.

But this was apparently held to be sufficient to constitute mischief in another case of which the facts have been already recapitulated. In that case the prosecutor held a lease of fishing rights of one bank of a river which belonged to the Government, the other bank of which was the property of the accused's lessor. The latter diverted the course of the river by placing dams above and below a certain section which had the effect of reducing that portion to practically dry land. In convicting him of this offence, Richards, J., said: "The accused caused a change in the river and he must have known that the alteration of the river and the destruction of thousands of fish, mature and immature caused thereby, would injuriously affect the Dehra Dun Fishing Association (the prosecutors). I accordingly think that when he deliberately changed the course and condition of the river he was guilty of the offence mentioned in section 426."(3) But in another case of the same Court the view taken harmonizes with that of the Madras High Court. There the accused had maliciously impounded the prosecutor's cattle, so as to cause him to be mulcted in fine which he had to pay. It was held that the offence of the accused did not amount to mischief, in that it had caused no change in the impounded cattle so as to affect them injuriously and that the accused could only have been convicted under the Cattle Trespass Act.(4)

4794. Case of Mischief.—The transition between such cases and those which obviously fall within the definition of this offence is naturally a gradual but a perceptible one. For example, it has been stated before that the owner of land has a perfect right to use his own property in any way he pleases, but he has no right to injure the rights of others which they may have therein or in any other property adjoining thereto. If,

(1) Shakur Mahomed v. Chunder Mohan Sha, 21 W. R. 38. But some dissatisfaction was expressed with this ruling in Sonai Sardar, 25 W. R. 46; Gamirullah Sarkar v. Abdul Sheikh, 10 C. 408.

(2) Per Scotland. C. J., Bittleston and Ellis, JJ., in 4 M. H. C. (App.) 15, Collett, J., contra, on the ground that a knowledge of a likelihood to cause damage was sufficient, and placing a dam across an irrigation channel was a change in its situation likely to be attended with damage, and affected it injuriously.

(3) Chanda, 28 A. 204: to the same effect Ram Golam Singh, 12 W. R. 59 (60).

(4) Ramjiwan, (1881) A. W. N. 158.

therefore, the accused trenches upon their rights he may be guilty of this offence, supposing that his act otherwise conforms to the other requirements of the offence. The accused were the servants of a person who owned land up to a certain jhil which belonged to the complainant. They cut a channel through that land and extended it to the jhil with the result that it ran it dry and destroyed its fish, mature and immature. The Court found that while the accused had undoubtedly a right to cut a channel on their own land, they had no right to cut it through the complainant's jhil and thereby cause him wrongful loss or damage of which they could not be unaware, and which act therefore amounted to mischief.(5) As compared to this the act of the accused in cutting down trees standing on his land after its sale to another, presents no difficulty, for it is clearly mischief.(6) So is the notorious habit of the Gaolis to let loose their cattle for grazing at large, which is punishable because the Gaolis know that their cattle feed upon other people's plants, shrubs and garden produce. In one case the High Court went to the length of reversing on appeal an acquittal by the Sessions Judge, of the owners of cattle which had been ineffectively impounded by the owners of farms upon the produce of which they had fed. The two accused were convicted and sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for 3 months on each count in addition to fine.(7)

For other cases of mischief, see the foregoing and ensuing commentary. (§§ 4802-4808).

426. Whoever commits mischief shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine, or with both.

Any Mag. Non-cog. Summons. Bailable. Comp. if only private person injured. Summary.

Punishment for mischief.

[Mischief—s. 425]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4795).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4796-4800).
(3) Punishment (4800).
(4) Proof (4801).
(5) Form of Charge (4802).
(6) Evidence of Simple Mischief (4803-4808).
(7) Injuring Property When Mischief (4805).
(8) Injury Classified (4806).
(9) No Mischief (4809).

4795. Analogous Law.—This section prescribes the sentence for the simple case of mischief as defined in the last section, and not otherwise provided for. It naturally presupposes the loss or damage done by the act to be below Rs. 50, for if it amounts to that sum, the offence is then subject to the higher penalty prescribed in section 427.

4796. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is not cognizable and summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable,

(5) Soshi Bhusan v. Gobind Chandra, 7 C. W. N. 663.
(6) Sonai Sardar v. Bukhetar Sardar, 25 W. R. 46; Dharma Dass v. Nusseruddin, 12 C. 660.
(7) Punja Godad, 21 Bom. L. R. 247, 50 I. C. 995, 20 Cr. L. J. 387.

but only compoundable when the loss or damage caused is loss or damage to a private person only. It is triable by any Magistrate, and summarily.

4797. In a summary trial held under this section the Magistrate had to dispose of the plea of an act done in assertion of a claim of right, but Macpherson and Morris, JJ., held that a bona fide claim of right deprives a Magistrate of jurisdiction to deal with a criminal charge in a summary way. Indeed, as was there pointed out, a summary trial is intended to apply only to short and simple cases in which but little evidence is needed. It is wholly inapplicable to contested cases and those in which the trial is likely to be protracted and the evidence adduced voluminous.(8) It is also pointed out that the authority vested in the Criminal Court of punishing persons for acts of mischief is one which must be exercised with great caution, and it must be very clear before conviction, that the accused had brought himself within the true meaning of section 425; otherwise this provision of the law will be frequently resorted to as a trenchant mode of deciding disputed civil question of right,(9) which it is not their function to decide and which in petty cases, in any case, they should refrain from deciding.(10)

4798. The accused cannot be tried on the same facts both for mischief as well as theft. So a person who has been charged with theft cannot be separately charged with and convicted for the subsequent killing of it.(11) This was also the view at one time taken in Bombay.(12) But a different note was struck by Jardine and Candy, JJ., in a similar case going up before them in revision. In both the cases the accused had stolen the bullock and then killed and consumed its flesh, whereupon, in the first case the Court held a double conviction for theft and mischief illegal, but in a subsequent case it upheld such conviction on the ground that the two acts were separate and distinct, and as no property was transferred by the theft to the thief, the accused was held to have been properly convicted for a fresh act of mischief.(13) But it was conceded that if the theft were committed for the flesh, then the intention being one, the accused could be punished only for a single intention.(14) But this view has apparently been since abandoned by that Court, for in a more recent case a double conviction in such a case was held to be illegal,(15) and this view not only accords with that of the other Courts,(16) but is in entire harmony with the other sections of the Code (§ 517).

4799. It is not open to an appellate Court to add a charge under s. 143 to one under sections 426 and 451 as it would have the effect

(8) Issur Chunder Mundle v. Rohim Sheik, 25 W. R. 65; Gamirullah Sarkar v. Abdul Sheik, 10 C. 408.

(9) Ram Golam Singh, 12 W. R. 59.

(10) Hukum Chand, 73 I. C. (A.) 805; 24 Cr. L. J. 693; Sarat Chandra v. Yakub, 28 C. W. N. 736.

(11) Mader Saheb, (1902) 1 Weir 497; Genya, (1877) B. U. C. 129, in which the accused had stolen the bullock and then killed it.

(12) Genya, (1877) B. U. C. 129.

(13) Krishna, (1889) B. U. C. 430; following Narayan Krishna, 2 B. H. C. R. 392.

(14) Krishna, (1889) B. U. C. 430, distinguishing Dod Basya, 11 B. H. C. R. 13.

(15) Ramla Ratanji, 5 Bom L. R. 460.

(16) Bichuk Aheer, 6 W. R. 5; Hamira, (1866) P. R. No. 37; Nga Paik, (1894) 1 U. B. R. 241; Nga Aung So, (1899) P. J. L. B. 633.

of imposing a constructive responsibility for individual acts of all persons who were members at the time of the assembly, whereas if the charges were only under ss. 426 and 451 it would be necessary to prove the guilt of each of the persons charged for his individual acts.(17)

Punishment.

4800. As regards the punishment, this section evidently provides for the simplest case of mischief, the gravity of which is measured not only by the absence of any of the aggravating circumstances forming the subject-matter of distinct offences under this set of sections, but also by the value of the loss or damage caused by the offence. In this respect this offence introduces a novelty not to be found elsewhere in the Code (§ 4771). There may, however, be cases in which two or more aggravating circumstances may supervene, but in which it will not be right to take them each as further aggravating the offence, unless it is proved that there was in the view of the offender a wholly separate intention. For instance, if the accused should commit mischief by fire by setting fire to a warehouse, destroying its contents to the value of over Rs. 100, he could not be convicted both under sections 436 and 435.(18)

4801. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the thing in question was property.

(2) That the accused, caused its destruction or such change therein, or in the situation thereof, has destroyed or diminished its value or utility, or affected it injuriously.

(3) That the accused did so intending or knowing that he was likely to cause loss or damage to the public or to any person.

(4) That such loss or damage was wrongful.

(5) That it was below Rs. 50.

4802. Charge.—The charge under this and the next section should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you committed mischief, by causing wrongful loss or damage to the property of A B estimated at Rs.——and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 426 (or s. 427) of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

"And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge."

4803. Evidence of Simple Mischief.—In the discussion describing the essential elements of this offence as defined in the last section, all the points necessary to establish a case under this section have been set out (§§ 4776-4794). They will all have to be established by the prosecution, for it is on it to show that the act of the accused is such as falls under the penal visitation of this section.[19] It may be said that the plea being taken in exoneration of the crime, it must be both pleaded and proved by the accused.[20] But this would have been the case were it on the prosecution to establish that the loss or damage caused by the act was wrongful and proof of which could only be reached by negativing any right or bona fide belief in a right on the part of the accused.[21]

(17) Mukka Muthiriyan, 31 I. C. (M.) 337. (18) Dod Basaya, 11 B. H. C. R. 13.

4804. The proof of wrongful loss or damage is necessary, and its establishment would make the mischief-maker liable, though only civilly liable for damages in tort. To convert it into a crime the prosecution must prove the further fact that the accused had the intention to cause such loss, or that he knew that he was likely to cause it. This intention or knowledge is an aggravating circumstance, which would not only enhance the civil liability but exposes the person to a further risk of criminal prosecution. Now this intention may be inferred, as it has often to be inferred, from the proved facts of the case. But it is not to be readily assumed in every case, for there is such a thing in logic, as post hoc ergo propter hoc and it is a fallacy which too often passes for proof. Of course, the question of intention and knowledge is one of fact and it has to be inferred from all the circumstances of each case. It cannot be made the subject of a general dissertation. But something has been said in the foregoing commentary to show what facts are and what are not relevant to establish it. The wrongful loss or damage must be to property," which implies a thing capable of ownership (§ 4789). If therefore the property was such as had not an owner at the time of the mischief, that offence could not be committed in respect of it, for there would then be no loss or damage, nor would that loss or damage be wrongful. The other constituents of this offence are the destruction or injury caused to such property. This may be caused in several ways, but whatever the mode or nature of the injury, its one essential feature is that it causes loss or damage to its owner or the public at large, through its own destruction or deterioration.

Injuring Property When Mischief.

4805. The gravamen of mischief then consists not so much in causing loss as in causing it by injuring the property. This distinction would at once put out of account such cases as the cutting of mature crop or trees, because such act does not cause injury to the thing cut though it may cause loss to its owner.[22] It may then be theft, but is not mischief (§§ 4792, 4793). This principle would explain why the cutting down of fruit trees is mischief, but the cutting down of timber is not. The one are not intended to be cut, the other are planted only for that purpose. So any act injuriously affecting property would be mischief, as when a person should dam up the water channel irrigating one's crops, or let out water from a bund used for the same purpose and from which the crops of his neighbour suffer some injury.

(19) Issur Chander Mundle v. Rohim Sheik, 25 W. R. 65; Gamirullah v. Mahadshet, (1889) B. U. C. 432.

(20) S. 105, Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872).

(21) Mahadshet, (1889) B. U. C. 432.

(22) Talebar, (1917) 2 Pat. L. W. 49.

In one case this section was put in force to punish the accused who had stolen water from the Government canal by breaking through its wall to enable them to sow their fields. They were convicted under s. 430, but on revision their conviction was altered to one under this section, the Court observing. "It is an act of wilful mischief for any person to make a breach in the wall of a canal. It is an act which causes such a change in property as destroys or diminishes its value or utility or affects it injuriously."(23) In another case the accused finding their fields flooded proceeded to let the water out by making a breach in the Railway. Their intention was clearly to let the water out, but nevertheless they were convicted of mischief and in view of the serious consequence to the travelling public sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for four months.(24) But though the section is widely worded and would embrace the case of any injury however small, still it must not be forgotten that De minimus non curat lex.(25)

Injury Classified.

4806. The injury contemplated by the section may be varying and caused in a variety of ways. Section 425 specifies at least four such cases of injury: (i) where it consists of the total destruction of any property; (ii) where it consists of the destruction or diminution of its value, or (iii) utility; or where (iv) it is injuriously affected. Then again the section contemplates at least three ways of causing the foregoing injury by: (i) destruction of the corpus, or (ii) any change in the property, or, (iii) any change in the situation of the property. Such change in the property must be a physical change caused by a physical means. It would thus exclude such a change as the pollution of food caused by the touch of a low-caste man.(1) This case has been already noticed under section 298 and in the preceding discussion on this offence (§ 2992).

4807. Lastly, while the objective of the offender under this section is to hit another through property it is not necessary that the property be his, for it may belong to a third person as in the illustration (e) or it may, indeed, belong to the accused himself as in the illustrations (d) and (g) appended to section 425. The former is in fact drawn with reference to Explanation 1, while the other two illustrations are intended to refer to the other explanation.

4808. It is perhaps unnecessary to add after what has been made clear in another connection (§ 4077) that the term "property" is large, but it does not include a human being. If therefore A poisons B to enable him to claim the money due on his life policy the offence committed by A would be either murder or hurt but not mischief, which it would have been if B were classed as property.

4809. No Mischief.—As already observed (§§ 4807-4808), a person may commit mischief by destroying or injuring his own property. But where it is so, the question of motive or intention becomes very material. The accused who was the servant of a ward of Court des-

(23) Bansi, 34 A, 210; Chengamma, (1911) 2 M. W. N. 349.

(24) Chulhan Ahir, 16 C. W. N. 263; 13 I. C. 826.

(25) "Law does not concern itself about trifles." Hukum Chand, 73 I. C. (A.) 805; 24 Cr. L. J. 693.

(1) Motilal, 24 A. 155.

troyed some bamboos of his master for which he was convicted of mischief. The act was alleged to be done with a view to bring the management of the Court of Wards into disrepute. The accused was acquitted, presumably on the ground that there was no evidence to strengthen the surmise.(2) Other cases follow the same trend. The accused who was the father of the sonless widow of the complainant's deceased brother ploughed up some land over which he had no right but which he did in assertion of his daughter's claim to maintenance. His conviction for mischief and trespass was quashed by the High Court on revision on the ground that to plough up land was not to injure it and that to sustain a conviction for trespass the necessary intention was lacking.(3) The accused who was a mortgagee had openly cut a few trees to repair another part of the mortgaged premises. The Court held it to be no mischief, as being an actionable waste the mortgagor had his remedy in the Civil Court.(4) There can be no mischief where the act is merely negligent and not wilful.(5) So where property was injured owing to the rash and negligent driving of the accused, the latter could not be convicted of mischief.(6)

For further commentary on this section see s. 425 (§§ 4772-4794).

Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Non-cog. Warrant. Bailable. Comp. if only private person injured. Summary.

Mischief causing damage to the amount of fifty rupees.

427. Whoever commits mischief and thereby causes loss or damage to the amount of fifty rupees or upwards, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

[Mischief—s. 425.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4810).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4811).
(3) Proof (4812).
(4) Charge (4813).
(5) Evidence of Mischief Causing Damage of Rs. 50 (4814).
(6) No Mischief (4815).

4810. Analogous Law.—This section only prescribes a higher punishment for the offence of simple mischief as defined in section 425, which is punishable under section 428 if the loss or damage incurred is below Rs. 50.

4811. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but is compoundable only when the loss or damage is caused to a private person, otherwise it is non-compoundable. It is triable by the

(2) Parmeshwar Singh, 7 I. C. (C.) 812; Saravana, 8 M. L. T. 222, 7 I. C. (M.) 855.
(3) Mannikka, 8 M. L. T. 246, 8 I. C. (M.) 318.
(4) Ramasamier, (1913) 1 M. L. W. 274, 23 I. C. (M.) 498.
(5) Baju, 9 B. 173.
(6) Akidullah, (1911) 5 S. L. R. 263, 15 I. C. 898.

Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class and summarily.

For other points of practice calling for notice reference should be made to the last section (§§ 4796-4799).

4812. Proof.—The points requiring proof are the same as for an offence under to the last section (§ 4801), for clause 5 of which prove—

(5) That the loss or damage caused amounts at least to Rs. 50.

4813. Charge.—See under s. 426 (§ 4802).

4814. Evidence of Mischief Causing Damage of Rs. 50.—The elements necessary for the proof of this offence are all those set out under section 426 from which this section differs only in the heavier loss or damage caused—the section requiring proof that it is valued at least at Rs. 50. This must be the value of the actual injury and not of any prospective or resultant loss to the owner.(7) Thus if the loss complained of be the destruction of immature crop or fish, the value of the crop or fish on the date of destruction should be ordinarily reckoned. But this is not an invariable rule. For in the case of growing crops they have no present value beyond as grass, and in that case the Court is not incompetent to assess the damage by calculation of the approximate loss which the owner was likely to have suffered by the destruction of his property.

So where the accused were found to have removed the complainant's fishing stakes in the open sea within three miles of the shore, West, J., held it to amount to mischief under this section, though the accused did not appropriate the stakes, his view being that in this case the loss suffered by the complainant was the pecuniary loss the value of which was the fish which he would have caught and sold, which he could not do owing to the act of the accused, and which loss the accused knew his act was likely to occasion to the complainant.(8) In short, in such a case the loss may be calculated not only on the injury actually caused but on the injury immediately consequent. So where the accused set fire to a summer house in a wood, and the fire was thence carried to the wood, he was held to have been properly convicted on an indictment charging him with setting fire to the wood.(9) But in this case the accused was held liable because he was held to have been aware of the probable consequence of his act.(10) Where several things are destroyed or injured by an act or a series of acts forming one transaction, the loss or damage may for this purpose be taken in the aggregate. So where the accused stole or cut several trees at the same time, or so continuously as to form one transaction, it was held permissible to calculate the value of the trees cut in the aggregate.(11)

(7) Whiteman, 23 L. J. M. C. 120 (case of the larceny of a tree).
(8) Kastya Rama, 8 B. H. C. R. 63.
(9) Price, 9 C. & P. 729.
(10) Natrass, 15 Cox. 73; Harris ib., 75.
(11) Shepherd, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 118; cf. s. 235, Cr. P. C.; Bleasdale, 2 C. & K. 765; Firth, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 172; Henwood, 11 Cox. 526.

4815. No Mischief.—A person is not vicariously liable for mischief. The accused who lived in Calcutta employed a contractor to build him a house in Benares. In digging up the foundations the contractor did not prop up the next door neighbour's wall or take such precautions which a builder ought to have taken, with the result that the neghbour's wall sank and cracked. It was held that the accused could not be held liable for his contractor's negligence.(12)

Pres. Mag or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Cognizable. Warrant. Bailable. Not comp.

Mischief by killing or maiming animal of the value of ten rupees.

428. Whoever commits mischief by killing, poisoning, maiming or rendering useless any animal or animals of the value of ten rupees or upwards, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

[Animal—s. 47. Mischief—s. 425.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4816).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4817).
(3) Proof (4818).
(4) Form of Charge (4819).
(5) Principle (4820).
(6) Meaning of Words (4821).
(7) Mischief by Injuring Animal (4822-4825).
(8) Maiming (4823).
(9) Rendering Useless (4824-4825).

4816. Analogous Law.—The provisions of this section correspond to ss. 40 and 41 of the Malicious Damage Act, 1861, (13) which run as follows:—

"40. Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously kill, maim, or wound any cattle shall be guilty of felony and being convicted there of shall be liable.....to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding fourteen years."

"41. Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously kill, maim, or wound any dog, bird, beast or other animal, not being cattle, but being either the subject of larceny at common law, or being ordinarily kept in a state of confinement, or for any domestic purpose shall be imprisoned, etc."

Both these sections re-enact 7 & 8 Geo. IV, c. 30,(14) from which also were the present provisions presumably drawn. It should be observed that neither the provisions of the English Statute nor those of this section apply to a mere cruelty to animals as distinct from mischief as defined in section 425.

This section is not the only section prescribing a punishment for injuries to animals, for the next section deals with the subject and prescribes a higher penalty, for injuring certain specified animals, and other animals of the value of Rs. 50 or more.

(12) Srish Chandra, 17 A. L. J. 343, 50 I. C. 347, 20 Cr. L. J. 299.
(13) 24 & 25 Vict., c. 41.
(14) Malicious Injuries to Property Act (England), (1826) 7 & 8 Geo. IV, c. 30, ss. 16, 17.

4817. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable and is triable by a Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class.

4818. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused committed mischief (s. 426).

(2) That the property injured was an animal.

(3) That the injury was caused by killing, poisoning, maiming or rendering useless such animal.

(4) That the value of the animal at the time of injury was at least Rs. 10.

4819. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at———you committed mischief by killing (or poisoning or maiming or rendering useless) any animal, to wit —(describe it) which was the property of A B, then valued at Rs. 10, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 428 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

"And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge."

4820. Principle.—Mischief by mutilation of animals is regarded as an offence of a higher degree of gravity owing to the cruelty thereby inflicted on the animals injured and the resultant loss thereby caused to the owner. The maiming of cattle was thus an offence of some gravity at common law.(15) The Statute defines the offence to lie in unlawfully and maliciously killing, maiming or wounding,(16) but the section extends it to "rendering useless" any such animal, which is a variant from the expression "diminishes its value or utility" as used in section 425. Probably the phrase is used ejusdem generis with the rest, and is intended to cover cases of "causing infirmity" as used in section 319, which though not exactly wounding produces a result not different from it.

4821. Meaning of Word.—"Maiming," i.e., multilation implies permanent injury and thus differs from "wounding," which implies an injury not necessarily permanent. "Rendering useless any animal," i.e., ejusdem generis with "killing, poisoning or maiming" (§ 4820). "Of the value of ten rupees": This means the market price of the animal at the moment of injury, and not its value to the owner which as in the case of a pet animal may be great.

4822. Mischief by Injuring Animal.—Mischief has been described before as the causing of wrongful loss or damage to any person by causing destruction of any property, or by causing any change in the property as destroys or diminishes its value or utility, or affects it injuriously. In an offence under this section the "property" must be an animal worth Rs. 10 or more and the mode of causing injury should be by "killing, poisoning, maiming or rendering useless" such animal. The term "animal" is defined in section 47 and "denotes any living creature other than a human being." It would thus include a quadruped as well as birds and fowls, insects and reptiles, and in fact any lower animal. The animal must be the subject of ownership, otherwise there can be neither theft nor mischief (§ 4791). So if an animal originally ferae naturae is reduced into possession by being confined or kept in a fold, its destruction in its state of confinement would be mischief. But it would be otherwise if the animal had been abandoned,[17] or the accused had no reason to suppose it to be the subject of ownership. The value of the animal must be at least Rs. 10 at the moment of the offence. Such value must be its market value and not the special value which the animal may possess to its owner (§ 4821). The value must, of course, be before it is killed, poisoned, maimed or rendered useless. An animal may be "poisoned" but not killed, and it may be killed though not by poisoning. If it is poisoned, the offence is complete, though the poisoning may not injure the animal. The administration of poison must, of course, be with intent to commit mischief. If it is given not to injure but to cure the animal, it is no offence. So, of course, will killing be justifiable if it is done in self-defence.[18]

(15) Haywood, R. & R., 16. (16) 24 & 25 Vict., c. 97, ss., 40, 41.

Maiming.

4823. But the killing, poisoning, maiming or rendering useless an animal in any other case if it falls within the intent and provision of section 425 is punishable. The term "maiming" is nowhere defined or described in the Code. But it is a term of well-known import in English Law, and is the same as "Mayhem"[19] which meant the deprivation of a member proper for defence in fight, as an arm, leg, finger, eye, or a foretooth, yet not a jaw-tooth, nor an ear, nor a nose, because they have been supposed to be of no use in fighting.[20] It has, however, since acquired a wider significance, and now means the privation of the use of a limb or member, and implies a permanent injury. It does not then mean merely "wounding," but wounding or otherwise injuring so as to entail a permanent injury.[21] Permanent injury is of the essence of maiming.

So where the accused was shown to have poured nitrous acid into her ears, some of which either ran into her eye or was poured into it and behind her, in consequence of which she was killed by the owner, and the surgeons proved that the injuries done to the ear were not wounds, but ulcers, it was held that the accused had been rightly convicted of maiming.[22] So in another case the accused was similarly convicted for having administered sulphuric acid to a horse.[23] The cutting off the ears of a horse is unquestionably maiming[24] as it permanently affects the sense of (17) Subbarayadu, (1888) 1 Weir 498.

(18) Hanway v. Boultbee, 4 C. & P 350.
(19) O. E. main, to hurt.
(20) Brit. Bk. J. C. 25; Hawk. P. C. 111; 1 Black, 130; 3 Black, 121; 4 Black 205; Text followed in Marowdha v. Srinivasa, 35 M. 594; Rangasawmy, 22 M. L. T. 68; 39 I. C. 938.
(21) Jeans, 1 C. & K. 539; M'Laughlin, 8 C. & P. 635; Moriarty v. Brooks, 8 C. & P. 684; Beckett, 1 M. & Rob. 526; Nga San Yun, (1885) S. J. L. B. 404; Narain Singh, (1905) U. B. R. P. C. 25, Suterao, 3 Bom. L. R. 503; Bhawal Singh, (1891) P. R. No. 7.
(22) Owens, 1 Mood. C. C. 205.
(23) Mogg, 4 C. & P. 364.
(24) Marogowdha v. Srinivasa, 35 M. 594; Rangaswami, 22 M. L. J. 68, 39 I. C. 988; 18 Cr. L. J. 620; Anna Laxman, 18 Bom. L. R. 289, 34 I. C. 973, 17 Cr. L. J. 253.

hearing; but it would not be maiming if only half a ear is slit off because it does not impair the hearing,[25] and so would probably be any form of mutilation such as cutting off the end of a horse's tongue[1] or the like. But an injury which causes a mere disfigurement without a permanent injury is not maiming.

Rendering Useless.

4824. In England, "wounding" an animal is an offence, but that term is not used in this section which uses a term of wider import. For an animal may be rendered useless by wounding no less than by the infliction of other injuries which though they do not maim, may still cause permanent infirmity. So wounding an animal if it has the effect of rendering it useless would be punishable under this section. But since the section refers to the offence by the effect rather than the act, an injury which wounds but does not render an animal useless cannot be punished under this section, though it would be under section 426. So where the accused threw a stick to drive a bullock away from his cow-shed, which hit and blinded one of its eyes, the Court held that since the injury thus caused was not shown to be permanent, and it appeared in evidence that the animal was still under treatment, the accused could not be convicted under this section, and as there was no criminal intention, the accused was held to be guilty of no offence.[2] This was a case of accident, such as caused the death of the buffalo whom the accused hit with a clod of earth to drive away from his backyard which caused its death.[3]

But where the accused inflicted three severe wounds on a bullock found trespassing on his master's land, the Court held the injury wholly unjustifiable and such as constituted mischief, though they did not amount to maiming.[4] Here the act showed a reckless disregard of the injury caused to the animal and it was out of all proportion to the provocation given. Such was also the view taken in the following case. The accused, intending to gratify his own depraved tastes, thrust the handle of a stable fork into the vagina of a mare and pushed it two feet and more into the mare's body, working it backwards and forwards in that position, whilst this was being done the mare put her ears back and stamped her feet, thereby indicating signs of pain. The mare was injured in two places there being a hole in the base of the bladder and three holes in the large intestines. He was indicted for maliciously wounding the mare, and on a case reserved on the question of malice the Judges agreed that there was sufficient malice to sustain the conviction.[5]

Where the accused beat a pony breaking the ribs thereby diminishing its utility and value, the Court held it to amount to maiming.[6] But where the accused cut a scar on an animal's forehead, it was held to be neither a case of maiming or rendering the animal useless, and the accused's conviction was accordingly altered to one under s. 426.[7] Of course, it is not necessary to rendering useless that the animal should be wounded, or that

---

(25) Anna Laxman, 18 Bom. L. R. 289, 24 I. C. 973; explaining Marogawdha v. Srinivasa, 35 M. 594.

(1) Jeans, 1 C. & K. 539.

(2) Narain Singh, (1905) U. B. R. P. C. 25.

(3) Obammal, (1901) 1 Weir 502.

(4) Subrao Sukhal, 3 Bom. L. R. 503.

(5) Welch, 1 Q. B. D. 23 (24); Pembliton, L. R. 2 C. C. 9.

(6) Nga San Yun, (1885) S. J. L. B. 404.

(7) Fatteh Din, (1881) P. R. No. 33.

the wound should be caused by any instrument other than the hand,(8) or indeed, that the injury should be inflicted by the accused himself. Upon an indictment for wounding a sheep, it appeared that the prisoner set a dog at the sheep, which bit it, it was held by Parke, J., that this was not wounding within the meaning of the Statute.(9) This case proceeded upon the peculiar wording of the Statute, but in any case injuries caused to animals by setting dogs and the like would be within the section if they have the effect of rendering the animal useless, otherwise the offence would be punishable as simple mischief.

4825. The term "rendering useless" is not intended to include a case of over-work or ill-use which has that effect upon an animal in course of time. It is intended to apply only to such cases as the last which have the effect of permanently impairing the utility of an animal by an act which is otherwise mischief within the meaning of that term as defined in s. 425. The question whether the animal had been rendered useless by reason of the injury is a question of fact which will have to be decided, having regard to the ordinary service rendered by the animal and the diminution of its value since the injury. The uselessness referred to, must, of course, be permanent, in the absence of which the offence cannot be punished under this section.

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Cognizable. Warrant. Bailable. Not comp.

Mischief by killing or maiming cattle, etc., of any value or any animal of the value of fifty rupees.

429. Whoever commits mischief by killing, poisoning, maiming or rendering useless, any elephant, camel, horse, mule, buffalo, bull, cow or ox, whatever may be the value thereof, or any other animal of the value of fifty rupees or upwards, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, or with fine, or with both.

[Mischief—s. 425.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4826).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4827).
(3) Proof (4828).
(4) Form of Charge (4829).
(5) Mischief by Killing Domestic Animals (4830-4834).
(6) Nullius Proprietas (4833-4834).
(7) Maiming Trespassing Cattle (4835).

4826. Analogous Law.—This section enhances the offence a step further in consequence of the greater value and importance of the animals enumerated, and in consequence of the other animals being of the higher value of Rs. 50 or more. In other respects this section is the same as the last.

(8) Bullock, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 115.

(9) 4 Geo. IV., c. 54, s. 2; Hughes, C. & P. 420; but in Elmesley, 2 Lew. 126, the bite of a dog was held to be within the Statute; and so where the prisoner set fire to a cow-house in which was a cow which was burnt to death, Punton, J., held that the prisoner could be convicted for killing a cow.

4827. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable, and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Sessions, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class.

For other points of practice, reference should be made to section 426 (§§ 4795-4809).

4828. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused committed mischief (s. 426).

(2) That the mischief related to an elephant, camel, horse, mule, buffalo, bull, cow or ox, irrespective of value, and if to any other animal than that, it was then valued at least at Rs. 50.

4829. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the———day of———at———you committed mischief by killing (or poisoning, or maiming or rendering useless) the elephant of A B (or the tame panther of A B, valued at Rs. 50), and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 429 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

4830. Mischief by Killing Domestic Animals, etc.—The last section punishes mischief by injuring any animal generally, provided that the value of the animal does not fall below Rs. 10. This section carries the offence a step further by prescribing a higher penalty for doing the same act to any one of the eight enumerated kinds of animals, viz., an elephant, camel, horse, mule, buffalo, bull, cow or ox, of whatever value and, in the case of any other animal, where the value amounts to Rs. 50 or more. The animals specifically enumerated are those classed as domestic animals, and the section protects them against mischief, which renders them useless to their owners, by visiting the offenders with specially deterrent penalties.

4831. The terms "killing, poisoning, maiming or rendering useless" any animal call for no explanation—for they form the gist of the offence described in the last section (§§ 4819-4820). The question whether the words "elephant, camel, horse, mule, buffalo, bull, cow or ox" include also their young ones has been answered in the affirmative by Norris and Beverley, JJ., in a case in which they said: "It seems to us that this section specifies the more valuable of the domestic animals without any regard to age, but in respect of other animals not so specified, the section would not apply, unless the particular animal in question was shown to be of the value of fifty rupees or upwards."(10) This is obviously the meaning, and the term "elephant" must then be held to include a baby elephant, as the term "horse" must be held to include a mare, gelding, colt or filly, and a bull or ox to include a heifer or calf of whatever age and value.

(10) Hari Mandal v. Jafar, 22 C. 457; Jaga Bundhoo Mythee v. Golam Ali Sha, ib., note; contra in Cholay, (1864) Mad. Unrep. Per Scotland, C.J., dissented from.

4832. In the last case, the lower Court had taken the view that the section intended only to apply to the animals specially enumerated, their young ones being then treated as "any other animals" so that the accused, who was detected butchering and skinning a calf, could not be convicted under this section unless the calf be shown to be valued at Rs. 50; but the Court held the phrase "any other animal" to refer only to an animal of a different genus altogether, such as a dog or a goat.(11) The killing of another's calf for the sake of its skin or flesh was therefore an offence under this section irrespective of its value, and the accused was to convicted.(12)

Nullius Proprietas.

4833. Of course, the animals enumerated must be domestic animals and such as are the subject of ownership. The section could not, for example, apply to wild elephants or bulls not reduced to possession, but only to those which have been captured and are no longer ferae naturae, but domitae naturae (§ 4076). Now it is evident that property in such animals continues only so long as they are in possession, and it may be relinquished or abandoned by the owner at any moment. So a bull set at large by its owner in accordance with religious usage, would prima facie cease to be property, so that a person killing it could not be convicted under this section.(13) But this is evidently not the view taken in Madras where the view taken appears to be that a person wholly abandoning a bull without any precaution taken for its future control may still be the property of the temple by which its dedication is actually or inferentially accepted, and it would then prima facie be the property of the temple, even though the animal were allowed to be at large free from all control. "If such animals in their wanderings at times trespass on and do damage to private property with impunity, it is because superstition induces villagers to regard them with veneration, and to endure the mischief which they commit, without seeking redress as of right."(14)

4834. But, as was pointed out in a subsequent case, there is really no conflict of views between the several Courts, for in such cases the question whether a bull so set at large continues or ceases to be property within the meaning of section 425, is a question of fact and not of law, and depends upon the nature of the dedication and the renunciation or abandonment of the right, or rather upon the question whether it was a transfer of ownership or an abandonment.(15) If, for instance, the bull was not released but dedicated to a temple, property therein would vest in the temple, and it would then be as much the subject of larceny as of mischief. On the other hand, if it was merely set at large it would be nullius proprietas, and as such no longer "property" within the meaning of section 425.

(11) Hari Mandal v. Jafar, 22 C. 457.
(12) Ib.
(13) Jamura, (1884) A. W. N. 87; Bandhu, 8 A. 51; Nihal, 9 A. 348; Romesh Chander Sannyal v. Hiru Mondal, 17 C. 852.
(14) Nalla, 11 M. 145.
(15) Ghanta Veeranna, (1887) 1 Weir 500.

In the Allahabad cases, the Court found as a fact that the ceremony of abandonment involved complete divestiture of all rights therein without the translation of any rights in favour of anyone in particular. In such a case, there having been a complete extinguishment of a right, anyone finding the bull, and taking it, acquired a right to it which would be good even as against its former owner, if the latter should be minded to resume it.(16) And, as was pointed out by Norris, J., such total surrender is not inconsistent with the fact that the bull continued to be fed by its late owner or was taken care of by his cowherd: "A bull thus dedicated and set at liberty is regarded as sacred by all Hindus, and it is a religious and meritorious act on the part of strangers even to feed it; but it is peculiarly sacred in the eyes of the person who performed the shardha and set the animal at liberty, and he regards it as a moral duty to feed it after it has been set at liberty."(17)

4835. Maiming Trespassing Cattle.—Every owner or occupier of land has unquestionably the right to drive away cattle trespassing into his land; and for this purpose it is permissible to use such force as is necessary. The accused was convicted under this section for mischief in killing a young buffalo at which she threw a stone to drive it out of her backyard. The case failed because there was nothing "to show that the accused had, in throwing the stone, any intention to cause injury to the animal or reasonable cause to suppose that loss or damage was likely to be caused.(18) But it would be mischief if the missile selected was a heavy stone and it was hurled with violence which broke the animal's leg.(19) But this is probably an extreme case. That there is such a thing as a private defence of property cannot be questioned, and the only question in such cases then is whether the force used was in excess of the requirements of the case; and even then it is still a question whether the matter is not one for civil redress.(20)

Mischief by injury to work of irrigation or by wrongfully diverting water.

430. Whoever commits mischief by doing any act which causes, or which he knows to be likely to cause a diminution of the supply of water for agricultural purposes, or for food or drink for human beings or for animals which are property, or for cleanliness or for carrying on any manufacture, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, or with fine, or with both.

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Cognizable. Warrant. Bailable. Comp.

[Mischief—s. 425.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4836).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4837-4838).
(3) Proof (4839).
(4) Form of Charge (4840).
(5) Principle (4841).
(6) Mischief by Diminution of Water-supply (4842-4846).

(16) Per Cockburn, C. J., in Glyde, L. R. 1 C. C. 139.
(17) Romesh Chunder Sannyal v. Hiru Mondal, 17 C. 852.
(18) Obammal, 1 Weir 502.
(19) Mahadeo, 12 N. L. R. 188.
(20) Proceedings, 1 Weir 497, 498

(7) Cases Excepted: Bona Fide Right (4844-4846).
(8) No Diminution (4847).
(9) Mischief by Omission (4848).

4836. Analogous Law.—This section specifies another instance of aggravated mischief—that consisting in an act causing a diminution of water supply. Where, however, the act fouls the water without causing any diminution, it is a public nuisance punishable under section 278 and not mischief punishable under this section.

4837. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable, and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable and compoundable with the permission of the Court, and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class.

4838. This is another section which is liable to abuse and in which Criminal Courts are often requisitioned to decide a question of a purely civil right between contending disputants. It need scarcely be reminded that the offence here punishable must be mischief first and then mischief of the kind here described, and that if it is not one it cannot be the other. So if the accused closed a channel in the bona fide assertion of a right and not with a mischievous intent, he could not be convicted under this section, for the question of a disputed right is one for the adjudication of the Civil Court and cannot be really made the subject of a criminal prosecution.[21] But this does not imply that the Criminal Courts are to stay their hand in every case till the aggrieved party has obtained an adjudication of his right by the civil right, for if it were so, a mischievous act would have to be endured till the formality of the civil action is complied with. But criminal law creates no such estoppel and on a proper case arising the Criminal Courts would be well justified in inquiring into the right and adjudicating upon it themselves for the purpose of this offence.[22] It is competent to the Magistrate inquiring into this case to make a local inspection of the channel or other source of water supply, regarding which this offence is alleged to have been committed.[23]

4839. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the act constituted mischief as defined in section 425.
(2) That the mischief in question caused or was likely to cause a diminution of the supply of water.
(3) That the accused knew it.
(4) That the diminution was in the supply of water used for—
  (a) agricultural purposes; or
  (b) food or drink for human beings or their animals; or (c) cleanliness; or
  (d) any manufacture.

4840. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

(21) Athinarayanasawmy Pillai v. Subbier, (1888) 1 Weir 505.
(22) Muruga Pillai, (1883) Weir 508.
(23) Ib.

"That on or about the——day of——at——you committed mischief by doing an act, to wit—(specify it) which caused (or which you knew to be likely to cause) a diminution of the supply of water of A B for agricultural purposes (or for food or drink, etc.), and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 430 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court on the said charge)."

4841. Principle.—This section prescribes a high penalty for mischievously cutting off one's water-supply used for cultivation, and manufacture, washing and drink. The offence must necessarily involve the mental state of criminality constituting the offence, that is an intent to cause or knowledge that the act is likely to cause wrongful loss or damage to the public or any person (§ 235). Now no loss is wrongful unless it was illegal, and consequently no one can be punished for causing a diminution of water supply if it was not illegal and what is more, unless the accused knew of its illegality.[24] But it is no part of the offence that the act should be a wanton act of waste. It is sufficient that it is done without any show of right.[25] Evidently the diminution must be appreciable, otherwise the act may be excusable under section 95.

4842. Mischief by Diminution of Water-supply.—This section protects the source of water-supply against mischief. As such, it applies equally to irrigation channels as to the other sources of irrigation, such as tanks and ponds,[1] and in fact to any source of water-supply whether natural or artificial, such as a river, lake or pond or a reservoir, well, or canal or channel, provided that it was used for the purpose of agriculture, or manufacture, or for food or drink, or for cleanliness, thereby excluding water-supply used for horticulture or for a purpose other than those specially mentioned. Of these, the supply of water for agricultural purposes plays a most conspicuous part having regard to its value and importance in this country and the frequent disputes to which it gives rise. The supply of water for such purpose may be natural or artificial and the right of a person thereto may be exclusive or joint. The fact that it is joint and not exclusive does not render the commission of this offence by a co-sharer impossible, for to vary illustration (g) of section 425: A having joint property with Z in an irrigation canal dams it up intending thereby to cause wrongful loss to Z. A has committed mischief. The case would be no different if Z had merely the customary right to the use of its water.[2]

4843. The water-supply must, of course, be "property," that is to say, it must be the subject of ownership whether by Government or a private person. It would ordinarily exclude navigable channels and rivers which are res publicae and property in which vests in the public generally, though even in such cases it is possible to commit the offence. The

---

(24) Indra Talavar v. Narasiha, 29 I. C. 670; 16 Cr. L. J. 542.

(25) Ramkrishna Chetti v. Palaniyandi, 1 M. 262, F. B.; Jagannath Bhikaji, 10 B. 183.

(1) Syton Chinna Mangaiya, (1885) 1 Weir 510.

(2) Krishna, 88 I. C. 188, (1925) M. 577.

supply of water must in any case have been shown to have been used either solely or mainly for any of the four purposes specified in the section, namely: (a) agriculture, (b) drink, (c) cleanliness, or (d) manufacture. It may be that water drawn for agriculture is also used for other purposes, as for instance for watering the roads, but in that case it does not cease to be water used for agricultural purposes Water used for watering the roads would, however, be water used for cleanliness, which ordinarily implies water used for washing man and beast, clothes and the like. So water used for flushing the gutters of a city for the purpose of cleansing them would be so treated. In all such cases any act calculated to diminish the water-supply would be mischievous if it is done with intent to cause wrongful loss or with knowledge of the likelihood of such loss.(3)

Cases Excepted Bona Fide Right.

4844. Such knowledge of likehood cannot be presumed, but must be proved, though it may be inferred from circumstances. Where, for instance, the accused diverted the water-course constructed by the complainant and in his exclusive possession, and the accused who had no right of any kind thereto contended it to belong to him jointly, the Court held the assertion of a false claim, to support a criminal act, was merely an additional wrong and was no plea which could extenuate the offence.(4) The plea of right to be admissible, must then be a plea supported by some evidence of title which, though not exclusive, is at least sufficiently plausible. It is at any rate such as would justify the Court in finding that the accused honestly believed in his right though that belief was in fact wholly unjustifiable. That belief may, however, either relate to the right to cut off the water-supply or it may relate to the knowledge of the likelihood of diminution. The accused is protected in either case. But he is not protected if he should plead that he was using the water withdrawn from the accused in his own fields or selling it to other tenants, and that he was causing no waste,(5) since it would suffice if he had caused wrongful loss to another or knew that it was likely.(6) But, of course, no loss is wrongful which is not actionable at law. In other words such loss must amount to the infringement of a legal right.(7)

So where the accused cut the dam erected by the complainant to irrigate his own crops, and it appeared that they cut the dam to save their own crops from submersion, it was held that they could not be convicted of this offence as there was no proof of intention or knowledge of causing wrongful loss to the complainant.(8) So there could be no mischief where there was a right, as in the case of the zemindar who stopped a water-channel running over his own land, on the complainant's

(3) Nafar Chandra Bhattacharjee v. Helaluddin, 8 C. W. N. 370; Sheikh Arif, 35 C. 437; Mohur Singh v. Lalloo, 3 A. L. J. 142-n; Mohammad, 5 I. C. 560.

(4) Jagannath Bhikaji, 10 B. 183; following Ramkrishna Chetti v. Palaniandi, 1 M. 262, F. B.

(5) Chidambaram v. Mhd. Khan Sahib, 34 M. L. J 206, 44 I. C. 580, 19 Cr. L. J. 356.

(6) Deenabandhu v. Viswarasarayi, (1923) M. W. N. 634; 75 I. C. 862, 24 Cr. L. J. 330.

(7) Budda Reddi, 44 M. L. J. 234, 69 I. C. 59, 23 Cr. L. J. 655.

(8) Nafar Chandra Bhattacharjee v. Helaluddin, 8 C. W. N. 370; Budda Reddi, 44 M. L. J. 234, 69 I. C. 59, 23 Cr. L. J. 655.

refusing to pay him the rent he demanded.(9) So where the accused had, equally with the complainant, the right to draw water, the fact that in the assertion of his right, he diminished the flow of water required by the complainant, was no ground for convicting him under this section. Both the complainant and the accused were entitled to the use of an irrigation channel which was the property of Government Ordinarily, the accused were content to irrigate their fields with the surplus water leaving the complainant's field. But in the year in dispute they diverted the channel to their own fields, presumably because they considered the surplus water insufficient for the purpose of irrigation. They were held to have committed no offence.

4845. In such cases, the act is protected because it is presumed to be done by the accused for the protection of his own interest. But where there is no such justification, the act of the accused would be mischievous unless it is shown to be otherwise protected.(10) Such would be the case where the act, though intended to be mischievous, neither causes nor is likely to cause any diminution of the water-supply, as in the case where the accused closed a watercourse by which water had been supplied to the complainant's land, but which caused him no damage, in which case it was contended that though the act did not cause diminution of the watersupply, it still destroyed the utility of the water-course in which the complainant was interested, but which the Court considered as bringing the offence possibly under section 426, but not under this section.(11) But in order to bring an offence under this section, it is not required to prove an actual loss or diminution of water-supply; its likelihood is sufficient, so that the offence is complete as soon as a channel is dammed, and which is likely to cause a diminution of the supply of water in future, and not when such diminution or the resultant loss actually occurs.(12)

4846. These exceptions only establish the line beyond which the provisions of a penal statute could not be extended. Besides them there still remain other cases in which some of the elements necessary to constitute the offence, may be wanting. The offence is one in which the machinery of criminal law is as likely to be readily resorted to as it is likely to be abused. But to say that all disputed rights are for the adjudication of the Civil Court is to underrate the preventive value of criminal law. On the other hand, to put it in force in every case of trivial infraction of a civil right is to unnecessarily extend the domain of criminal law and to use it for a purpose which will defeat itself. As observed by the Madras Full Bench: "Under section 430 of the Penal Code, the physical requisites of the act are the doing of an act which causes, or, to the doer's knowledge, is likely to cause, a diminution of supply. He also fulfils the mental requisites when he does this with intent to cause wrongful loss, and the intention is properly held to be such when he takes it without any sort of right, and it matters not that he claims to set up such a right

(9) Mohur Singh, v. Lalloo, 3 A. L. J. 142-n.

(10) Vatukaran, (1881) 1 Weir 507; Rangana, (1890) 1 Weir 510; Bansi, 34 A. 210; Deputy Legal Remembrancer v. Matukdhari, 20 C. W. N. 128 (134); Indra Talawar v. Narasimha, 29 I. C. (M.) 670.

(11) Kalaya, (1885) B. U. C. 217; Bansi, 34 A. 210.

(12) (1881) 1 Weir 503 (504).

if the facts are so clear that the claim is manifestly only an additional wrong. It is for judicial tact to distinguish where the case is sufficiently doubtful to prevent the inference of a wrong intent."(13)

4847. No Diminution.—This section is intended to conserve the water-supply used for the purposes specified in the section. But mischief may be committed by diverting a watercourse without causing any such diminution. Such was the case of the accused who wanted water to sow their fields. Consequently, they cut open the bank of a canal, whereupon they were convicted of mischief, but their conviction was altered from this section to one under s. 426, as there was no evidence of any diminution of water.(14) There is, of course, no case of mischief of any kind where a person used a canal cut for a period in excess of that allotted to him.(15) The question in such cases is one of intention and knowledge.(16)

Mischief by Omission.

4848. But it is not necessary to constitute mischief that the accused should do a positive act, for he may equally commit it by an illegal omission as distinct from a positive act. Such was the following case. The accused obtained permission from the Public Works Department to cut their channel and draw water for twenty-four hours. They failed to close the breach which it was their duty to do on expiry of that period, and the complainant suffered in consequence, in that he thereby received a shorter supply of water than to what he was justly entitled. The act of the accused was found to be intentional and they were convicted under this section.(17) As compared to this, the case in which the accused opened without permission the sluice of a channel in order to take water for his field, presents no difficulty except that the act was as much mischief because it lessened the supply of others more entitled to it,(18) as theft, because it involved dishonest deprivation of property belonging to Government.

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Cognizable. Warrant. Bailable. Not comp.

Mischief by injury to public road, bridge, river or channel.

431. Whoever commits mischief by doing any act which renders or which he knows to be likely to render any public road, bridge, navigable river, or navigable channel, natural or artificial, impassable or less safe for travelling or conveying property, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, or with fine, or with both.

[Act—s. 32. Mischief—s. 425.]

(13) Ramakrishna Chetti v. Palaniyandi, 1 M. 262, F. B.; Kondi Chetti, 8 M. L. T. 385; 8 I. C. 128; Fateh Din, (1909) P. R. No. 14, 4 I. C. 863; Chengema, (1911) M. W. N. 349, 12 I. C. 527.

(14) Bansi, 34 A. 210.

(15) Fateh Din, (1909) P. R. No. 14, 4 I. C. 363; but see Chengama, (1911) M. W. N. 349.

(16) Kanda Kamarla v. Kumari Rae, (1913) M. W. N. 179, 19 I. C. 305.

(17) Nallappa, (1899) 1 Weir 505 (506).

(18) Aiyannagowd, (1881) 1 Weir 507.

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4849).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4850).
(3) Proof (4851).
(4) Form of Charge (4852).
(5) Meaning of Words (4853).
(6) Injury to Public Ways (4854).

4849. Analogous Law.—This section is wider in its terms than sections 279, 280 and 283, which deal with a public nuisance as distinct from mischief. The difference between the two offences lies in the intention or knowledge required in this case which is not invariably necessary in an offence punishable under those sections.

4850. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class.

4851. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused committed mischief (s. 426).

(2) That it was committed by doing an act which rendered, or the accused knew it likely to render, a public road, bridge, navigable river or channel, impassable or less safe for travelling or conveying property.

4852. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you committed mischief by doing an act, to wit——[(specify it) which rendered or which you knew to be likely to render a public road, to wit——(describe it) or a bridge, navigable river or a navigable channel] impassable (or less safe for travelling or conveying property), and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 431 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

4853. Meaning of Words.—"Public roads": This does not include a track through a jungle.[19] For its meaning see section 279 (§§ 2765). It means the same thing as a public way. "Bridge" must be a public bridge. It would include also a viaduct or an aqueduct.[20] "Navigable river" means a river which affords passage to ships, vessels, or boats. A river may be navigable at certain seasons, e.g., during high tide or the rains.

4854. Injury to Public Ways.—Two sets of sections punish the causing of injuries to public road, bridge, navigable river or a navigable channel. Sections 277-283 refer to acts which are rash or negligent, but not mischievous, while this section punishes only acts which are mischievous and which may be of the nature described in those sections. But in order to support a conviction for this offence there must be evidence of intention to cause wrongful loss or damage, or knowledge that such loss or damage was likely.(21) The intention or knowledge must, moreover, relate to the act causing an obstruction so as to render the public or water way less safe for the purpose for which it is used. The fact that the accused caused an obstruction may be some evidence of intention, but it is neither conclusive nor even sufficient to constitute mischief. The accused cut timber on the bank of a river some eight miles above a bridge and left it lying there. Two of such pieces came floating down the river in a flood and coming in contact with the bridge destroyed two of its piers. He was convicted under this section, but the High Court naturally quashed the conviction, holding that there was no proof of intention or knowledge.(22) The act was not even criminally negligent, for the effect was as unexpected as it was due to a cause beyond human control.

---

(19) Nga Shwe Laukke, (1899) P. J. L. B. 629.

(20) The analogous provisions of the English Statute (24 & 25 Vict., c. 97, s. 33), Malicious Damage Act, 1861, includes it.

So where the accused dug a trench on a waste land alongside a public road to drain his land, he could not be convicted of this offence even though "the act be calculated to do mischief incidentally to the public road."(23) As was pointed out in another case,(24) the offence of mischief implies the destruction of some property or "such a change in the property or the situation of it as destroys or diminishes its value or utility or affects it injuriously." The excavation of a channel could not be said to have affected the road injuriously, and therefore neither the act nor the intention was criminal. The section is intended to refer to such acts as the removal of buoys or other seamarks, the putting in of stakes across a navigable channel or the like which endangers it as public way, and of which the doer of the act has knowledge. An act such as the mooring of a barge in a narrow channel may block the passage or render it less safe for travelling, but if it is not moored with the intention to cause wrongful loss to the public or with knowledge of its likelihood, he could not be convicted under this section, though his act may fall under section 283.

For a further commentary on this section, see ss. 277-283.

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Cognizable. Warrant. Bailable. Not comp.

Mischief by causing inundation or obstruction to public drainage attended with damage.

432. Whoever commits mischief by doing any act which causes or which he knows to be likely to cause an inundation or an obstruction to any public drainage attended with injury or damage, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, or with fine or with both.

[Act—s. 32. Mischief—s. 425.]

(21) S. 425; Nga Shwe Laukke, (1899) P. J. L. B. 629.

(22) Malayan Kalan, (1883) 1 Weir 510.

(23) Kairthadi Anantha, (1888) 1 Weir 511 (512).

(24) 4 M. H. C. R. (App.) 15.

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4855).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4856).
(3) Proof (4857).
(4) Form of Charge (4858).
(5) Mischief to Public Drainage (4859).

4855. Analogous Law.—This section is confined to punishing mischief caused to a public drainage by an act which causes or is likely to cause an inundation or obstruction resulting in injury or damage. The provisions of this section and the last generally correspond with those of sections 32-34 of the Malicious Damage Act, 1861.(25)

4856. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate, or a Magistrate of the first or second class.

4857. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused committed mischief (s. 426).

(2) That the mischief was caused by an act which caused or was likely to cause an inundation or an obstruction to any drainage.

(3) That the drainage in question was public.

(4) That such inundation or obstruction was, or was likely to be attended with injury or damage.

(5) That the accused knew that his act caused or was likely to cause such inundation or obstruction attended with injury.

4858. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you committed mischief by doing an act, to wit——(mention it) which caused, (or which you knew to be likely to cause) an inundation (or an obstruction) to a public drainage, to wit——(describe it) attended with injury or damage, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 432 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

4859. Mischief to Public Drainage.—This section deals with the mischievous interference of a "public drainage," a term which includes natural or other channels by which the water from a place is carried away. Revers and streams are such natural drains whilst drainage pipes serve the same purpose in towns and cities adopting drainage as a means of sanitation. The act punishable here is an act by which the inundation or obstruction is caused to such drainage and which causes or is likely to cause injury or damage whether to the public at large or to any person in particular. Any interference with the natural flow of a public drainage is consequently not mischievous, unless it causes injury, and the accused is aware of it. The accused erected a dam across a river, which they claimed to do under an ancient custom. There was no evidence that it was likely to cause injury to any one. They were, however, fined by the Magistrate who held it to cause inundation of the adjacent villages. But on revision it was held that even assuming this to be the case the act fell short of mischief since it did not injuriously affect the property dammed, namely, the river, and the fact that it threatened damage to other property, would not of itself constitute mischief under this section.(1)

(25) 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, ss. 32-34.

This view would then appear to suggest that the "injury or damage" caused by the inundation or obstruction must be to the drainage itself and not to any property other than the drainage. But this does not appear to be the intention of this section, which is directed against an injury to the public rather than to the drainage itself. Of course, damage to one would lead to damage to the other, but it does not appear to be the gist of the crime. This appears to have been conceded in a case(2) in which the accused was convicted of having cut away a portion of the top of a bund in consequence of which the Magistrate apprehended an inundation of the town of Maldah, but it was held by Jackson, J., that the damage anticipated was too remote and that, in any case, the accused having merely intended to cut the bund to erect a house and extending a mango garden could not be said to have intended to cause wrongful loss or damage to the public, nor could it be said that he had knowledge of such a remote contingency. His conviction was accordingly quashed.

Session. Cognizable. Warrant. Bailable. Not comp.

Mischief by destroying, moving or rendering less useful a light-house or sea-mark.

433. Whoever commits mischief by destroying or moving any light-house or other light used as a sea-mark, or any sea-mark or buoy or other thing placed as a guide for navigators, or by any act which renders any such light-house, sea-mark, buoy or other such thing as aforesaid less useful as a guide for navigators, shall be punished with imprisonment of ether deiscription for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4860-4862).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4863).
(3) Proof (4864).
(4) Principle (4865).

4860. Analogous Law.—The provisions of this section must be regarded as supplementary to section 281, which deal with a public nuisance connected with a sea-mark, while this section deals with a mischief committed in respect of it.

(1) 4 M. H. C. R. (App.) 15.

(2) Pran Nath Shaha, 25 W. R. 69 (70).

4861. Its provisions correspond to the following section of the English Statute[3]:—

"S. 48. Whosoever shall unlawfully, and maliciously cut away, cast adrift, remove, alter, deface, sink, or destroy, or shall unlawfully and maliciously do any act with intent to cut away, cast adrift, remove, alter, deface, sink or destroy, or shall in any other manner unlawfully and maliciously injure or conceal any boat buoy, buoy rope, perch, or mark used or intended for the guidance of seamen, or for the purpose of navigation, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable at the discretion of the Court to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years.....or to be imprisoned.....and if a male under the age of sixteen years with or without whipping."

4862. In England, the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894,[4] further prescribes a summary procedure for injuring light-houses, removing buoys, or the like.

4863. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable, and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session.

4864. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused committed mischief (s. 426).

(2) That it was committed by destroying or moving any light-house or other light used as a sea-mark or any sea-mark or buoy or other thing, placed as a guide for navigators; or by an act rendering such mark or thing less useful as a guide for navigators.

4865. Principle.—Sea-marks are the main guides of navigators, and any tampering with them may lead to serious consequences. Both section 281 as well as this section consequently visit such malefactors with high penalties, but the act done must be mischievous within the meaning of section 425, which excludes a case of accident or inadvertence.[5] But if the act was not mischievous, it may still be punishable as a public nuisance (§ 2783).

Mischief by destroying or moving, etc., a landmark fixed by public authority.

434. Whoever commits mischief by destroying or moving any landmark fixed by the authority of a public servant, or by any act which renders such landmark less useful as such, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Non-cog. Warrant. Bailable. Not comp.

[Public servant—s. 21. Act—s. 32. Mischief—s. 425.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4866).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4867).
(3) Proof (4868).
(4) Form of Charge (4869).
(5) Principle (4870).
(6) Mischief by altering Landmark (4871-4873).

(3) Malicious Damage Act (24 & 25 Vict., c. 97.) s. 48.
(4) 57 & 58 Vict., c. 60, ss. 666, 680.
(5) Cf. Senior, (1899) Q. B. 283 (291)

4866. Analogous Law.—This section prescribes the penalty for an offence of the same kind as is punishable under the previous sections, but as the destruction or removal of a landmark is not to be compared with the perils of the sea the penalty provided therefor is comparatively lighter.

4867. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable, but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable and is triable by a Presidency Magistrate, or a Magistrate of the first or second class.

4868. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused committed mischief (s. 426).

(2) That it was committed by destroying or moving a landmark or by doing any act which renders it less serviceable.

(3) That the landmark was fixed by the authority of a public servant.

4869. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the———day of——at——you committed mischief by destroying (or moving, etc.) a landmark, to wit——(describe it) which was fixed by the authority of A B, a public servant, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 434 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

"And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge."

4870. Principle.—The removal of landmarks confuses boundaries, and the confusion of boundaries leads to confusion of titles, litigation and riots. The sanctity of landmarks has thus been always a matter of great concern with all nations; and so the Hebrew Prophet cursed those who removed their neighbours' land marks. In this respect the Code is more tolerant and punishes only those who tamper with a landmark fixed by order of a public servant.

4871. Mischief by Altering Landmark.— The landmark, the removal of which is punishable under this section, may be temporary or, a permanent one. But it must have been put up under the authority of a public servant. And it must be landmark, that is to say, a marked or fixed object by which the limits of a portion of territory may be known and preserved. A commemorative tablet is not a landmark. Again, when it is said that the landmark should have been fixed by the authority of a public servant, what is meant is that it should have been fixed by his lawful authority,(6) that is to say, he must be legally empowered to fix such landmarks. Such authority is necessarily conferred on survey and settlement officers, and the Civil Courts who have to adjudicate upon boundary disputes. But no such power is possessed by a Magistrate acting under section 145 of the Procedure Code. Consequently, a Magistrate, while so

(6) Rameshar, 27 A. 300.

acting, could not legally order that the property which was the subject of a dispute and which he declared as belonging to one of the disputants to be demarcated by boundary pillars, and if he does so, a person destroying or removing such boundary pillars cannot be convicted under this section. As Banerjee, J., put it: "Section 145 of the Code of Criminal Procedure did not authorize him to order boundary marks to be effected. The only order which under sub-section (vi) of that section he was competent to pass was an order declaring one of the parties to the proceedings to be entitled to possession of the subject of dispute until evicted therefrom in due course of law, and forbidding all disturbances of such possession until such eviction. The section does not empower the Court to put any party into possession or to lay down the boundary marks of the property, the subject of dispute."(7)

4872. Again since the offence here punishable is mischief of a special kind, no removal of a landmark is punishable unless it was intended to cause or known as likely to cause wrongful loss or damage to the public or to some one in particular. So where a Municipality placed a barricade to demarcate land which was for sale, which having interfered with the accused's ingress and egress from his house, he removed it, it was held that he could not be convicted under this section, for the necessary intention was lacking.(8)

4873. The landmark fixed by the authority of a public servant may consist of anything—a heap of stones, a tree painted to mark a boundary, a pillar of brick or mud, or indeed even a wooden post. It must, however, bear on its face some distinct and distinguishing feature of being a landmark, otherwise the accused might justifiably excuse himself on the ground that he did not know that what he was removing was a landmark.

435. Whoever commits mischief by fire or any explosive substance, intending to cause, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby cause, damage to any property to the amount of one hundred rupees or upwards, or (where the property is agricultural produce) ten rupees or upwards shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st class. Cognizable. Warrant. Bailable. Not comp.

Mischief by fire or explosive substance with intent to cause damage to amount of one hundred or (in case of agricultural produce) ten rupees.

[Mischief—s. 425.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4874-4875).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4876).
(3) Proof (4877).
(4) Form of Charge (4878).
(5) Principle (4879-4880).
(6) Mischief by fire (4881-4886).

(7) Rameshar, 27 A. 300.

(8) Abdul Aziz, (1895) B. U. C. 745.

4874. Analogous Law.—This section has been amended by the insertion of the words "or (where the property is agricultural produce) ten rupees or upwards."[9] The object of the amendment was to place agricultural produce which is stacked in the open under special protection. Mischief by fire is arson, and the offence dealt with in this and the next section is therefore that offence which is the subject of more elaborate enactment under English Law.[10] In England the gravity of this crime is determined according to the nature of the property whether it was a place of divine worship,[11] a railway station,[12] or a public building,[13] or a house with some person therein,[14] or whether a place was fired to defraud or injure any person,[15] or whether the intent was to set fire to goods contained in a building.[16]

4875. This and the next section view the crime from a double standpoint, first: as in England, from the nature of the property and the necessity of its requiring protection; secondly, from the nature of the property burnt, e.g., agricultural produce; and, thirdly, from the extent of the damage done or threatened. These three considerations will be found to be present in the two sections which provide for the three cases of varying gravity.

4876. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first class.

4877. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused committed mischief (s. 426).

(2) That the mischief was caused by fire or any explosive substance.

(3) That the damage caused thereby amounted to Rs. 100; unless the property destroyed was agricultural produce, in which case it need not amount to more than Rs. 10.

(4) That the accused intended or knew that he was thereby likely to cause such damage.

4878. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you committed mischief by fire (or any explosive substance) intending thereby to (or knowing it to be likely that you will thereby) cause damage to a property, to wit——to the amount of Rs. 100 (or Rs. 10, if the property was

(9) Indian Penal Code Amendment Act, s. 10 (Act VIII of 1882).
(10) Malicious Damage Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict., c. 97), ss. 1-8.
(11) Ib., s. 1.
(12) Ib., s. 4.
(13) Ib., s. 5.
(14) Ib., s. 2.
(15) Ib., s. 3.
(16) Ib., s. 7.

agricultural produce), and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 435 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session, or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

4879. Principle.—This section prescribes the same punishment for arson resulting in the destruction of two kinds of property—agricultural produce of the value of Rs. 10 or more, or any other property if the damage caused is valued at least Rs. 100. The special protection thus afforded to agricultural produce was justified by the exposure of that produce in the open for considerable portion of the year and the comparative immunity with which it might be so destroyed. Cases of agricultural incendiarism were, moreover, becoming all too frequent which it has been the purpose of the amendment of 1882 to prevent by prescribing a specially deterrent penalty.

4880. The offence punishable under this section is naturally an offence excluded from the purview of section 436, which relates to arson of a house or building irrespective of value, and in that case the quantum of loss is of course immaterial. This section would then apply to arson causing loss of property when it is not destroyed when contained in a building. Again, in order to justify a conviction under this section, it is, moreover, necessary to show not only the destruction of property worth Rs. 100 or Rs. 10, as the case may be, but also that the accused intended or knew loss to that extent to be probable. If the amount falls short of that amount, the accused may be convicted under section 427 or section 426, but he could not be convicted of this offence.

4881. Mischief by Fire—This section merely prescribes an enhanced penalty for mischief committed under the circumstances here described, that is to say, the mischief must be in the first place committed by means of fire of an explosive; in the second place, it must cause damage to property; and in the third place, the damage must be to the extent of Rs. 10, if the property be agricultural produce and Rs. 100 in any other case.

4882. But before all, the act must amount to mischief as defined in section 425. It must be an act intended to cause or knowing it likely to cause wrongful loss to property. If there was no such knowledge or intention, the act may still be criminal if it was rash or negligent and causes injury as defined in sections 285 and 286 of the Code, but it is not punishable under this section. And it may not be even punishable under those sections if it was neither so rash nor negligent as to be criminally punishable, or if it was the result of an accident or misfortune, or such as was too remote from the effect. Such was the case of the accused who set fire to a heap of rubbish in his field which was in the proximity of a Government forest, and from which the fire was carried by the wind to the Government reserve which was burnt down. The accused was convicted under section 426 and fined Rs. 6 but his case was reported to the High Court, when Aston, J., was for upholding the conviction, holding that the accused was found to have had the knowledge of the fire extending to the Government forest, which was a finding of fact, upon which the High Court could not interfere in revision. But Heaton, J., was of opinion that the act was in itself innocent and natural, and the effect wholly unintended and unforeseen, being wholly due to the wind. Owing to this difference of opinion the case was referred to Russel, A. C. J., who agreeing with Heaton, J., held that the High Court has power to interfere in revision and that it would exercise its power if it is of opinion that there has been a conviction of a clearly innocent person, that in the case before him the act of the accused did not show anything more than a mere neglect or carelessness, but it was a very different thing to the intention and knowledge of likelihood necessary to constitute mischief. The accused was therefore acquitted.(17)

4883. Between such negligence and that which is criminal there is a clear line of demarcation elsewhere noticed (§§ 2817-2829). Between such criminal negligence and an act intended, there is obviously a wide gulf. For, a person who is reckless or negligent may not advert to the consequence, but a mischievous person is not only presumed to advert to it, but intends that it should ensue, or at any rate knows that it is likely. There is, for instance, a very marked difference between lighting a cigarette in a gunpowder magazine and throwing down the lighted lucifer upon an open canister of gunpowder. The one may be guilty of inadvertence, the other may be properly charged for incendiarism.

4884. The special mischief here punishable is mischief by fire or an explosive substance. What these words mean has already been noticed (§§ 2814-2840). The word "fire" would include anything that generates fire, as for example, phosphorus, while an explosive substance would include anything that explodes or detonates owing to a rapid chemical reaction such as gunpowder or dynamite. The question of a gun or a pistol firing an explosive substance has been also considered before (§§ 2826-2827). It will suffice here to add that it is not an explosive substance.(18)

4885. The fire or explosive must have been used as a means for causing damage to any property, and the damage must be worth Rs. 10 or Rs. 100 according as the property is agricultural or non-agricultural. This does not mean that the property of that value should have been actually burnt down. All that it means is that it must be at least the value of the deterioration caused to such property.

4886. Lastly, the distinction between agricultural produce and other property is material. The former includes the product of agriculture, such as grain, chaff, and the like. Even standing crops are such produce. Non-agricultural property would include anything which is not the product of cultivation, such as grass trees and shrubs of spontaneous growth. As it is on the prosecution to establish a case under this section, all points essential to constitute this offence would have to be established by it.

This commentary is continued under the next section.

(17) Nandeyappagowda, 8 Bom. L. R. 851.

(18) Kasiya Pillai, (1886) 1 Weir 235.

436. Whoever commits mischief by fire or any explosive substance, intending to cause, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby cause the destruction of any building which is ordinarily used as a place of worship or as a human dwelling or as a place for the custody of property, shall be punished with transportation for life, or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Session, Cognizable Warrant. Not bail. Not comp.

Mischief by fire or explosive substance with intent to destroy house, etc.

[Building—s. 380, § 4141. Mischief—s. 425.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4887).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4888-4889).
(3) Measure of Punishment (4889).
(4) Proof (4890).
(5) Form of Charge (4891).
(6) Arson of a Building (4892 4897).
(7) What is a Building (4898-4901).

4887. Analogous Law.—This section adds yet another circumstance of aggravation to the ordinary offence of arson punishable under the last section. In doing so it closely follows the provisions of the English Statute relating to malicious damage to property[19] (§§ 4874, 4875).

4888. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is triable exclusively by the Court of Session. In drawing up a charge under this section it is necessary to state that the mischief was caused intentionally, or knowingly that destruction of a building would follow,[20] the nature of which should be described, whether it is one ordinarily used as a place of worship or as a human dwelling or as a place for the custody of property.[21] The evidence of previous fires unconnected with the accused is inadmissible, and a conviction based upon such evidence was quashed.[22]

4889. It is evident that in prescribing the maximum sentence the legislature has left a good deal to the discretion of the Judge. It was, indeed, expressly so stated by the Law Commissioners to whom was pointed out the great difference that existed between a thatched hut of the lowest classes and the substantial secure and valuable dwellings of the upper classes, but which the Commissioners thought was a matter well left to the discretion of the Judge.[23] So it was pointed out by the High Court of Calcutta that the amount of mischief done is not to be the sole

Measure of Punishment.

(19) Malicious Damage Act. 1861 (24 & 25 Vict., c. 97) ss. 1-7.
(20) 3 W. R. Cr. L. 7.
(21) Per Hobhouse, J., in Durharro Polic, 8 W. R. 30.
(22) Abdul Kadir, 20 C. W. N. 1267, 35 I. C. 981, 17 Cr. L. J. 421.
(23) First Rep., ss. 614, 615.

measure of the penalty to be inflicted. A person who sets fire to a human dwelling may put in jeopardy the lives and the property not only of those dwelling therein, but of others dwelling in adjoining houses, of persons assisting to put out the fire, and so on. These will be fit cases for condign punishment.[24] Then, again, the punishment must be proportioned to the malignity of the intention of the incendiary; for instance, between the case of one who deliberately plots and sets fire to the house of another and one who in a fit of temper in consequence of a domestic quarrel breaks his crockery and desiring to put an end to his habitation goes out and sets fire to the eaves of his house, thereby endangering the safety of neighbouring houses,[25] (s. 285).

4890. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused committed mischief (s. 426).

(2) That the said mischief was committed by fire or an explosive substance.

(3) That it destroyed or damaged a building.

(4) That such building was ordinarily used either as a—

(a) place of worship, or

(b) human dwelling; or

(c) place for the custody of property.

4891. Charge.—In drawing up a charge under this section regard must be had to the points already noticed. (§ 4889). It should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you committed mischief by fire or an explosive substance, to wit——(describe it) intending to cause (or knowing it to be likely that you would thereby cause) the destruction of a building (of A B)[1] which was ordinarily used as a place of worship (or as a human dwelling or as a place for the custody of property) and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 436 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge."

4892. Arson of a Building.—This section prescribes a penalty for setting fire to a building of any of the three kinds enumerated in the section: (a) a building used as a place of worship, (b) as used for human dwelling, and (c) as used for the custody of property. The foundation for the offence being mischief as defined in section 425, all the elements which are the pre-requisites of that offence would have to be necessarily established (§§ 4776-4794). In fact, it may be even generally stated that both the last and this section possess common ingredients except that the property affected is a building. Under either section there must, of course, be the intention or knowledge which distinguishes this offence from those in which there is nothing more beyond rashness or negligence, or acts which are too remote to cause the effect or in which the effect is due merely to accident or misfortune (§§ 4777-4790).

(24) Deebo Nath Jogee, 8 W. R. Cr. L. 14.

(25) Hari, (1887) B. U. C. 126.

(1) This may be added as descriptive of the house, but it is not necessary to prove that the house belonged to A. B.; Newboult, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 344.

4893. Of course proof of such intention or knowledge does not presuppose proof of an intention or knowledge to cause injury to any individual in particular. And, of course, the question of motive is immaterial for the purpose of the offence,(2) though it has high evidentiary value. For it will establish whether an act was intentional or accidental.(3) In England, law presumes every person to intend the necessary consequence of his own act; but this is not the view of the Code.(4) Consequently, though the intention has to be inferred, it may be held to have been proved from the nature of the act, but it cannot be presumed as a matter of course. Even in England the artificial presumption is subject to the rule that the act must be wilful.

4894. The intention or knowledge must be with regard to the destruction of a building. It is not necessary that any particular building should be aimed at, but what is necessary is that the incendiary should have for his object the destruction of a building. If, therefore, intending to set fire to the house of A he accidentally sets fire to that of B, it is felony, and so if a man wilfully set fire to his own house and thereby burn also the house of one of his neighbours, it will be felony.(5) In England it has been even held that if a person intending to commit a felony, by accident set fire to another's house this would be arson, both by common law and under the old Statute.(6) But the soundness of the view has been rightly doubted in Ireland(7) and at any rate, it is a view unacceptable to the Code (§§ 708-710). So it has been held in England that if a person do an illegal act, as shooting without a license and thereby set fire to the thatch of a house, it will be felony.(8) But the Code views the question in a different light. (§§711-713).

4895. As to actual proof of arson, direct evidence in many cases may not be available. In that case the jury must be content to determine the question in the light of such circumstantial evidence as may be available. So where a house was robbed and burnt the prisoner being found in possession of some of the goods which were in the house at the time it was burnt, the fact was held to be relevant as tending to prove the accused guilty of the arson.(9) So it is relevant as showing that the fire was intentional and not accidental, that the accused was on another occasion seen making an attempt to set fire to the house.(10) But it is not relevant to show that a few days previously

(2) Farrington, R. & R. 207.
(3) Salmon, R. & R. 26; Davies, 1 F. & F. 69.
(4) General Introduction, §§ 58-61.
(5) Probert, 2 East P. C. 1030; Isac, ib., 1013.
(6) Fost, 258, 259.
(7) Faulkner, 13 Cox (Ir.) 550.
(8) Dosset, 2 Cox 243; contra in Hole, 569.
(9) Rickman, 2 East P. C. 1035.
(10) Dossett, 2 C. & K. 306; Taylor, 5 Cox 138; Bailey, 4 F. & F. 342; Gray, 4 F. & F. 1102.

to the fire in question, another building of the prosecutor's was on fire, and that the accused was then standing by evidently gratified or indifferent to it,[11] or that there had been previous fires in the village of which the accused had some motive to be the incendiary.[12]

In order to establish the possibility of the fire, it is allowable to make experiments to see how a building could have been set on fire.[13]

4896. The intention or knowledge must under this section relate to the setting a house on fire. If, therefore, one intending merely to burn another's goods, sets fire to such goods in his house, and from which the fire extends and destroys the house, the accused could not be puinshed for this offence unless there was evidence to show that he set fire to the goods knowing that it may probably destroy the house as well.[14] On the other hand, the mere knowledge of such probability would not aggravate the offence so as to bring it under this section, unless the house was in fact set on fire.[15] And for this purpose it would seem that there must be evidence of "destruction" and not merely that some part of it was scorched or singed,[16] though it would be otherwise if it was charred.[17] Indeed, this section provides a punishment for only serious cases of mischief caused by fire, and not every case of mischief by fire. The use of the word "destruction" and the absence of other words used in the same connection in section 425 is significant, for it limits the operation of the section only to the case in which the damage caused by the fire amounts to the destruction of a building—any damage falling short of it may amount to an attempt, but it does not expose the offender to the full penalties of this section.

4897. But as the section is worded it is not necessary that the building should have been wholly destroyed by fire, for all that it requires is that the accused should commit mischief intending or having knowledge of the likelihood of causing destruction of the building. But how can the accused be said to possess this intention or knowledge unless he does some definite act from which the Court could justifiably infer that intention. Such inference may, according to the English Common Law, be reasonably made if the act caused an actual burning of the whole or some part of the house, though it is not necessary that any part of the house should be wholly consumed, or that the fire should have any continuance, or that it should immediately be put out or go out itself. But without burning at least a part of the house no such inference can be drawn from a bare intention, or an actual attempt to burn the house by putting fire into or towards it.[18]

But there may be fire without flame, and if the effect of the fire was to destroy the building it will be sufficient to constitute arson, though the fire emitted no flames and was at no time seen ablaze. So

(11) Harris, 4 F. & F. 342.
(12) Todan Mir, 20 C. W. N. 1287, 35. I. C. 981.
(13) Heseltine, 12 Cox. 404.
(14) Nattrass, 15 Cox 73; Harris, ib., 75.
(15) Child, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 307.
(16) Russell, C. & Mar. 541.
(17) Parker, 9 C. & P. 45.
(18) 3 Inst., 66; 1 Hale P. C. 568 to 569, 1 Hawk. P. C. C. 36, ss. 16, 17; 1 East. P. C. 1020.

Cresswell, J., said: "We think that it is not essential to this offence that the wood should be in a blaze, because some species of wood will burn, and entirely consume, without blazing at all."(19) This was the view taken in another case in which the accused was charged with arson for having set fire to some straw piled on the wooden roof of an outhouse, which was pulled out when several handfuls were found burnt and two half thatches were also discovered in the straw on the ground. There was evidence of emission of smoke out of the straw but no flame was seen. On a case reserved as to whether this constituted the setting on fire,(20) and whether the house was a building and, if so, whether the straw was a part of the building the Judges answered all the three questions in the affirmative.(21)

4898. What is a Building?—The question what constitutes a "building" without the meaning of this section was put to the Law Commissioners, to whom it was pointed out that the grass or mat huts of the lowest classes were placed on a level with the substantial, secure, and valuable dwellings, of the better classes, to which the Commissioners replied that the distinction would be naturally taken into consideration by the Judge in apportioning the sentence.(22) But so far as regards the import of the term, it is intended to embrace all structures more particularly described in the English Statute(23) as "house, stable, coach house, outhouse, warehouse, office, shop, mill, malt-house, hopoast, barn, store-house, granary, hovel, shed, or fold, farm building, or any building or erection used in farming land." The term would include anything from a costliest palace down to a lowliest hovel, and whether made of stone, brick, clay or wood, and with whatever substance covered. It would include even an unfinished structure, provided that it was nearing completion, as where all the walls external and internal are built and finished, the roof put on and finished, the flooring of a considerable part laid, and the internal walls and ceilings are prepared for plastering.(24) But a house the walls of which had been raised only a few feet from the ground could scarcely be said to fall within that term. So a shed used for the storage of seasoned timber and made of wooden sides, glass windows, and slated roof was held to be a building.(25)

4899. The term "building" would however be scarcely applicable to a temporary tattie shed put up by coolies for shelter. This is obvious from the exclusion of "tent" in the same collocation as used in section 380. A temporary erection put up for shelter is not building which should have at least a permanent foundation. So a cattle-pen or grain-bin bind of mud or stripped bamboos could be scarcely designated a building.

4900. The building here intended must not only be building in the proper sense of the term, but a building ordinarily used as a place of

(19) Russel, C. & M. 541.
(20) Under 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 30, s. 2.
(21) Stallion, R. & M. C. C. 398 (Tindle, C. J., dissentiente, on the second and third point).
(22) First Rep., ss. 614, 615.
(23) 24 & 25 Vict., c. 97, s. 3.
(24) Manning, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 338, decided on the meaning of "building" as used in 24 & 25 Vict., c. 97, s. 6.
(25) Amos, 20 L. J. M. C. 103; Munson, 2 Cox. 186.

worship, or as a human dwelling or as a place for the custody of property. The first would include such place as a church, mosque or a temple, a Kyaung(1) or a pagoda. A tomb or a graveyard is not such a place though it may be used by the pious for the purpose of saying their prayers (§ 3091). A building ordinarily used as a prayer house must be a building set apart for that purpose by the community who use it for worship. Such community may be small but it must customarily use it for divine worship. It may be even used once or twice a year as in the case of an Idgah or it may be a place of daily resort as in the case of mosques and temples. A building used for human dwelling must answer the same purpose. If a person takes up his abode in a tunnel or a public archway it does not convert it into a building ordinarily used as a human dwelling, for the word "dwelling" implies something more than merely obtaining shelter. It implies that the place is used for residence or more or less permanent habitation. A structure may be a human dwelling but not a "building," as where a field watchman sets up an erection on posts to scare away wild birds and thieves, or a person puts up a shed in his fruit garden for the same purpose.

4901. A place used for the custody of property will however admit of a still greater variety. But in any case it must be a building. A place, such as an open timber yard or a hurdle used as a cattle pen is clearly not intended. But the term is otherwise wide enough to include a goods' shed, an outhouse, a warehouse or a godown. The fact that a building is used for a certain purpose implies its adaptability to that purpose but it is not in special requirement. And the question whether a place is a building and whether it is one ordinarily used for any of the three purposes specified in the section, is a quesion of fact dependent upon the evidence adduced in each case.

Session. Cognizable. Warrant. Not bail. Not comp.

Mischief with intent to destroy or make unsafe a decked vessel or one of twenty tons burden.

437. Whoever commits mischief to any decked vessel or any vessel of a burden of twenty tons or upwards, intending to destroy or render unsafe, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby destroy or render unsafe, that vessel, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[Vessel—s. 48. Mischief—s. 425.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4902).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4903).
(3) Proof (4904).
(4) Form of Charge (4905).
(5) Mischief Endangering Ship (4906-4909).

(1) (1894) U. B. R. 198.

4902. Analogous Law.—This section applies to an ordinary case of mischief committed on board a ship or boat when plying in water. The insertion of the qualifying word "decked," or the words "of a burden of twenty tons or upwards" were intended to exclude the small native crafts of all kinds such as a ferry boat, a dug-out or a canoe, the object of the Legislature being to reserve its high penalties to mischief aboard of a ship imperilling the lives of many on board. Originally this purpose was intended to be served by restricting the provision of this section only to a "decked" vessel, but it was pointed out that though the dhonies or native coasting crafts in the Bay of Bengal were for the most part decked those used on the western coast of India and those navigating the northern part of the Indian Ocean to the Red Sea were undecked and for which some provisions were necessary.(2) This led to the addition of the alternate qualification which while excluding all vessels such as fishing boats, cross-ferries and the like not plying in the open sea or deep rivers or lakes would yet include all vessels of any importance and for which alone this provision was intended to apply.

4903. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session or the High Court.

4904. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused committed mischief (s. 426).

(2) That the mischief was committed against a vessel.

(3) That the vessel was either decked or of a burden of at least 20 tons.

(4) That when committing the mischief the accused intended to destroy or render unsafe that vessel or that he knew it to be likely that he will thereby destroy it or render it unsafe.

4905. Charge.—The charge under this or the next section should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you committed mischief [(in case of s. 438 add by fire or any explosive substance)] to a decked vessel of A B (name it) (or to a vessel of A B of a burden of——tons) intending to destry (or render unsafe) the said vessel (or knowing it likely that you will thereby destroy it, or render it unsafe), and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 437 of the Indian Penal Code and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

4906. Mischief endangering Ship.—Vessels plying on the unstable element naturally incur great risks, and this section therefore prescribes a stringent penalty for mischief committed on board. But the section

(2) First Rep., s. 619.

justifiably draws a line as regards the vessels deserving of this special protection. In an insular country like England such vessels are naturally of greater dimensions than here, where small canoes and crafts do much of the inland and coasting trade. This section excludes all vessels that are not "decked" or which have not the carrying capacity of at least 20 tons. The word "decked" implies that the vessels are furnished with a deck, which is a horizontal platform or floor extending from side to side of a ship, and formed of planking supported by the beams. Such deck is only possible in a vessel of a comparatively large size. But as even such vessels may not be provided with a deck (§ 4902), the section insures the same result by requiring vessels to be of at least a certain tonnage that is large enough to carry on board property weighing at least 20 tons. As the carrying capacity of ocean-going vessels is invariably registered, a reference to the registered tonnage should be sufficient to prove its capacity, but this would be in most cases superfluous, for if a vessel is an ocean-going vessel, it must be taken as a matter of course that its carrying capacity is at least 20 tons. In other cases this fact will have to be established by evidence. In England, a pleasure-boat eighteen feet long was held to be a vessel within the meaning of the English statutes.(3)

4907. The special form of mischief here punishable is that which is directed against the destruction or damaging of such a vessel, so as to render it unsafe for the conveyance of person or property. The mischief need not be necessarily perpetrated on board a ship while it is on water, for a vessel in the docks may be equally the subject of this offence. And it is equally immaterial whether the ship was complete or in an unfinished state (§ 4906)

4908. But, of course, the act done must amount to mischief, the special purpose of which must be the destruction or damage of the ship so as to render it unsafe for the purpose for which it was ordinarily intended. Now since mischief implies the doing of some physical injury to the subject of mischief, it follows that if a ship be only run aground and be afterwards refloated in such a condition as to be easily refitted, it would not be mischief.(4)

4909. The intention or knowledge is, of course, necessary to make the doer of the act complained of criminally responsibe. Criminality would as a rule vary with the nature of such intention and knowledge. For example, a person deliberately sinking a ship to defraud the underwriters,(5) would deserve exemplary punishment as compared to one who throws away its rudder in a drunken brawl.

Session. Cognizable. Warrant. Not bail. Not comp.

Punishment for the mischief described in section 437 committed by fire or explosive substance.

438. Whoever commits, or attempts to commit, by fire or any explosive substance, such mischief as is described in the last preceding section, shall be punished with transportation for life, or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

(3) 24 & 25 Vict., c. 97, ss. 42—44; Bowyer, 4 C. & P. 559.

(4) De Londo, 2 East P. C. 1098.

(5) Gilson, R. & R. 138.

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4910-4912).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4913).
(3) Proof (4914).
(4) Charge (4915).
(5) Arson Endangering Ship (4916-4917).

4910. Analogous Law.—This is really a proviso to the last section prescribing a still higher punishment for the offence if it amounts to arson, which, of course, exposes the vessel to a greater risk of destruction.

4911. The provisions of this section correspond to those of section 42 of the Malicious Damage Act.(6) But the English Statutes contain more exhaustive provision against this offence; but this section though simpler has, when read with section 425 and 437, the same effect.

4912. It will be noticed that this is another section in which an attempt is regarded as of the same heinousness as the completed crime,(7) and both are punishable alike.

4913. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session or the High Court.

For other points of practice calling for comment, see s. 426.

4914. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused committed or attempted to commit mischief (s. 426).

(2) That the mischief was committed or attempted by fire or an explosive substance.

(3) That it was committed or attempted to be committed to any decked vessel or a vessel of a burden of 20 tons or more.

(4) That when committing the mischief the accused intended to destroy such vessel or render it unsafe, or that he knew that he was likely to do so.

4915. Charge—See last section (§ 4905).

4916. Arson Endangering Ship.—This section prescribes a still higher penalty for mischief—indeed, it is the highest provided for it any where. And the reason is clear. For, there can be no greater peril to a sailing ship than when it is on fire. The ship may, however, be set on fire when it is at anchor in the docks or is in harbour, but in that case the Court will have to take into consideration the fact that it was not then exposed to the same risks, though this fact may be counteracted by the evil intention of the incendiary which may be, for instance, to defraud the underwriters.

(6) Malicious Damage Act. 1861 (24 & 25 Vict., c. 97), s. 42; re-enacting 1 Will. & 1 Vict., c. 89, ss. 4, 6. Other provisions relating to the same subject are contained in the Dockyards Protection Act, 1772 (12 Geo. III) s. 1; Naval Discipline Act, (29 & 30 Vict., c. 109), s. 34; 24 & 25 Vict., c. 97, s. 43 (setting fire to defraud insurance), s. 44 (attempting to set fire.)

(7) Introduction, § 58.

4917. On the other hand, though the fire may be the work of the accused, still he may not be guilty at all because of the want of criminal intention (§§ 722-735). So where the accused, a sailor, entered the spirits room of the ship for the purpose of stealing rum, and while tapping a cask of rum a lighted match held by him accidentally came in contact with the rum which was flowing from the cask tapped by him and a fire ensued which destroyed the vessel, it was held by the Irish Court that the accused could not be convicted of arson [8] (§ 708-709).

Session. Cognizable. Warrant. Non-bail. Not comp.

Punishment for intentionally running vessel aground or ashore with intent to commit theft, etc.

439. Whoever intentionally runs any vessel aground or ashore, intending to commit theft of any property contained therein or to dishonestly misappropriate any such property, or with intent that such theft or misappropriation of property may be committed, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[Dishonestly—s. 24. Vessel—s. 48.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4918).
(2) Procedure and Practice (4919).
(3) Proof (4920).
(4) Stranding a Ship for Plunder (4921-4922).

4918. Analogous Law.—This is an offence allied to piracy, and pirates and their abettors are equally liable to be punished under this section. But the offence relates to a preparatory stage in which the vessel is stranded to enable its being robbed. The subsequent stage of actual robbery may or may never be reached, but the offender is all the same liable to the penalty here prescribed.

4919. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session.

4920. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused ran aground or ashore a vessel.

(2) That he did so intentionally.

(3) His intention being to commit theft of the property contained therein or to dishonestly misappropriate any such property, or that such theft or misappropriation may be committed.

(8) Faulkner, 13 Cox (Ir.) 550.

4921. Stranding a Ship for Plunder.—The subject of piracy has been elsewhere dealt with (§§ 79-87). This section prescribes the punishment for an allied offence, committed within territorial waters, that offence consisting in the stranding of a ship, by running it aground or ashore for the purpose of committing theft or criminal misappropriation of any of its contents. The ship may be run aground by deliberately altering its course through shoal and thus plunging it into a sandbank. It is not necessary that the ship should be injured, nor is it necessary that the person running it aground should himself plunder it. The only thing that the section requires is that he should have done so with the intention of facilitating its plunder. It will be noticed that in this connection the section makes criminality depend upon intention and not merely a knowledge of likelihood, for it is conceivable that a person may run a ship aground and thus expose it to the attack of thieves, though his intention was to save it, say, from sinking.

4922. The proof of criminal intention may be furnished by the subsequent act, or by the evidence of previous or contemporaneous acts and declarations, or by those circumstances from which it is allowable to infer such an intention.

Mischief committed after preparation made for causing death or hurt.

440. Whoever commits mischief, having made preparation for causing to any person death, or hurt, or wrongful restraint, or fear of death, or of hurt, or of wrongful restraint, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st class. Cognizable. Warrant. Not bail. Not comp.

[Hurt—s. 319. Wrongful restraint—s. 330. Mischief—s. 425.]

Synopsis.

Analogous Law (4923).

4923. Analogous Law.—This section punishes mischief accompanied by duress, the aggravation lying in the armed resistance got ready to overcome opposition.

Of Criminal Trespass.

4924. Topical Introduction.—This branch of the chapter dealing with the offence of criminal trespass contains 22 sections, and of these the first section defines the term "criminal trespass," which is by itself an offence punishable under section 447. That offence may however be committed under various circumstances of aggravation, of which the following are noticed as calling for special penalties:—

(i) Time of trespass—trespass by night being an unexpected intrusion into one's privacy and causing greater alarm without the ordinary means of resistance available at daytime, being regarded as more serious than a trespass at daytime.

(ii) Purpose of trespass—the penalty varying with the intention to commit serious offence against person and property.

(iii) The nature of the property trespassed upon—trespass into a house being naturally more serious than on one's field.

So the draftsmen wrote:—

"We have given the name of trespass to every usurpation, however slight, of dominion over property. We do not propose to make trespass, as such, an offence, except when it is committed in order to the commission of some offence injurious to some person interested in the property on which the trespass is committed, or for the purpose of causing annoyance to such a person. Even then we propose to visit it with a light punishment, unless it be attended with aggravating circumstances.

4925. "These aggravating circumstances are of two sorts. Criminal trespass may be aggravated by the way in which it is committed. It may also be aggravated by the end for which it is committed.

4926. "There is no sort of property which it is so desirable to guard against unlawful intrusion as the habitations in which men reside, and the buildings, in whch they keep their goods. The offence of trespassing on these places we designate as house-trespass, and we treat it as an agravated form of criminal trespass.

4927. "House-trespass, again, may be aggravated by being committed in a surreptitious or in a violent manner. The former aggravated form of house-trespass we designate as lurking house-trespass; the latter we designate as house-breaking. Again, house-trespass, in every form, may be aggravated by the time at which it is committed. Trespass of this sort, has, for obvious reasons, always been considered as a more serious offence when committed by night than when committed by day. Thus, we have four aggravated forms of that sort of criminal trespass, which we designate as house-trespass, lurking house-trespass by night, and house-breaking by night.

4928. "These are aggravations arising from the way in which the criminal trespass is committed. But criminal trespass may also be aggravated by the end for which it is committed. It may be committed for a frolic. It may be committed in order to a murder. It may also often happen that a criminal trespass which is venial, as respects the mode, may be of the greatest enormity as respects the end; and that a criminal trespass committed in the most reprehensible mode, may be committed for an end of no great atrocity. Thus A may commit house-breaking by night for the purpose of playing some idle trick on the inmates of a dwelling. B may commit simple criminal trespass by merely entering another's field for the purpose of murder or gang-robbery. Here A commits trespass in the worst way. B commits trespass with the worst object. In our provisions we have endeavoured to combine the aggravating circumstances in such a way that each may have its due effect in settling the punishment."(9)

441. Whoever enters into or upon property in the possession of another with intent to commit an offence or to intimidate, insult or annoy any person in possession of such property,

Criminal trespass.

(9) Note N, Reprint, p. 168.

or, having lawfully entered into or upon such property, unlawfully remains there with intent thereby to intimidate, insult or annoy any such person, or with intent to commit an offence, is said to commit "criminal trespass."

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4929-4933).
(2) Meaning of Words (4934).
(3) What is a Criminal Trespass (4935-4936).
(4) Civil Trespass (4937-4939).
(5) Intention vs. Knowledge (4940-4945).
(6) Specific Intention Unnecessary (4946-4950).
(7) View that Specific Intention Necessary (4947).
(8) Law Defective (4948-4950).
(9) Entry or Remaining must be Unlawful (4951).
(10) Trespass on Disputed Land (4952-4955).
(11) Who may Complain (4956).
(12) Possession must be Actual and Exclusive (4957).
(13) Illegal Possession Excluded (4958-4960).
(14) License and Possession Without Title Excluded (4958-4960).
(15) Unlawfully Remaining After Lawful Entry (4961).
(16) What is Entered Upon must be Property (4962-4963).
(17) Bona Fide Claim (4964-4967).
(18) Limits of the Rule (4967).
(19) Manifestation of Criminal Intent (4968-4973).
(20) Intent only Necessary (4971-4973).

4929. Analogous Law—This section defines the offence of criminal trespass which is akin to the "forcible entry" of English law, in which that offence is indictable at common law as well by Statutes; but the terms of the common law are stricter and require proof of entry by such force as constitutes a public breach of the peace, or such proceedings as constitute a riot or unlawful assembly.(10) But "forcible entry" under Statute is punishable, if it is forcibly made with a strong hand by a multitude of people.(11) An entry into the land or possession of another unaccompanied by any circumstance constituting a breach of the peace is there called trespass which is not indictable.(12) The conception of criminal trespass in the Code is thus somewhat novel and a departure from the English law inasmuch as the offence lies not so much in the entry vi et armis, as in the intention which is the sole test of criminal liability.

4930. The definition as now enacted is, however, materially different from that originally drafted which ran thus:—

"418. Whoever exercises any dominion over any property, not having a legal right, independent of the consent of any other party to exercise such dominion, and not having the consent, express or implied, of any party legally entitled to give a consent which would authorize the exercise of such dominion, is said to "trespass."(13)

(10) Wilson, 8 T. R. 357; Bake, 3 Burr. 1731.
(11) 5 Rich. 2, c. 7.
(12) George, 3 Salk. 188; Sharpless, 4 T. R. 777.
(13) S. 418.

Appended to this section were the following six illustrations:—

"(a) A walks into a building, not having a right of entry there, and not having the consent of any person entitled to authorize such entry. A trespasses.

"(b) A goes across Z's field, not having a right of way there, and not having the consent of any person entitled to authorise A so to do. A trespasses.

"(c) A takes up a book belonging to Z, and reads it, not having any right over the book, and not having the consent of any person entitled to authorize A so to do. A trespasses.

"(d) A throws rubbish into Z's garden, not having any right over the garden, and not having the consent of any person entitled to authorize A so to do. A trespasses.

"(e) A climbs up behind Z's carriage not having a right so to do, and not having the consent of any person entitled to authorize him to do so. A trespasses.

"(f) A goes into Z's field with Z's consent but remains in the field after he has been directed by Z to withdraw. A trespasses."

4931. Having thus settled the sense of "trespass" the Bill then proceeded to define "criminal trespass," in the following words.

"419. Whoever knowingly trespasses in order to the injuring by any offence, o the intimidating, to the insulting or to the annoying of any possessor of the property which is the subject of the trespass, or of any person who, by the permission express or implied, of such possessor, is exercising any dominion over such property is said to commit criminal trespass."

4932. The definition of "trespass" was, however, considered too wide and even unnecessary for the purpose of a Criminal Code. The two definitions were, consequently, consolidated into the present definition, which takes an intermediate place between the "trespass" and "forcible entry" of English Law.

4933. The word "criminal trespass" as here defined is not to be confused with a mere "trespass" mentioned in section 297. As there pointed out (§ 2968), that word has not the special significance attached to "criminal trespass" which may be regarded as a term of art possessing certain well defined attributes, which are of the essence of the offence punishable as such.

4934. Meaning of Words:—"Possession of another," which means actual possession,[14] not necessarily rightful, but sufficiently long to be legal and peaceful[15] (§ 4955). "With intent to commit, etc." Mere unlawful entry may amount to trespass, but in order to make it criminal it must accompany the intention to intimidate, insult, or annoy not the owner, but the person in possession of the property. The question whether such intention should be actual or presumed is not free from doubt (§§ 4894-4946).

4935. What is a Criminal Trespass?—Trespass is an encroachment on the property of another. As such, trespass is a wrong, and it may be a civil wrong or a crime. The term "criminal trespass" is therefore not synonymous with trespass, for all trespass is not criminal even though it should conform to all the requirements of this section. As Straight, J., remarked: "The unusually vague and elastic language used in section 441 if not closely scrutinized and strictly interpreted might lead to its application to sets of facts or circumstances for which it was never intended by the legislative authorities who framed it. For, it is easy enough to conceive multitudinous cases, some approaching the verge of absurdity, that would fall within the letter, not the spirit, of the section, and which no one would for a moment consider a fit subject even for civil proceedings, much less for a prosecution in a Criminal Court. To lay down any rule as to the extent to which its operation should be limited is scarcely possible, but it is plain that its scope must be confined within those bounds that common sense and sound reason dictate.

---

(14) Kunji Lal, 12 A. L. J. 151; Tok Gyi, 35 I. C. (Bur.) 810.

(15) Ram Dyal, 7 W. R. 28; Dwarka Singh, 38 I. C. (Pat.) 962.

4936. "In this view, let us see what the words of the section practically enact, and how they are to be practically applied. First, there must be an unauthorized entry into or upon property—unauthorized, that is to say, either directly against the will of the person in possession, or constructively against his will, in the sense that he who enters has an unlawful intention, which, were it known to such person would make him object, forbid, or prevent the entry that in ignorance of such intention he sanctions and permits; or again, if the entry has been lawfully and legitimately obtained; there must be an unlawful remaining, either directly or constructively, against the will of the person in possession, to be judged by the tests already explained. In either case the unlawful entry or unlawful remaining must be with intent: (i) to commit an offence; (ii) to intimidate; (iii) to insult; (iv) to annoy any person in possession of the property. As to these intents the first three are sufficiently explicit by the light of sections 40, 503 and 504 of the Penal Code; but as to the fourth, very grave difficulty arises to ascertain what is or is not meant. Is the word 'annoy' to be taken in its fullest and most general sense, or with what limitations is it to be construed? The varieties and differences of human temperament are so innumerable that it is next to impossible to estimate to what lengths a literal definition might not extend. It is a matter of daily observance that what will annoy one man will not disturb an emotion in another; and in a vast community like the native population of this country, the endless fancies, feelings, and prejudices, religious or caste-born, necessarily are stronger and more sensative with one set of persons than with another. It must, therefore, be that the word 'annoy' in this section (441) must have some plain and intelligible construction placed upon it, and its application must not be left to depend upon each individual case and the peculiarities of character or idiosyncrasies of feeling of the special person who comes forward to complain. It seems to me that the word 'annoy' in section 441 must be taken to mean annoyance that would generally and reasonably affect an ordinary person, not what would specially and exclusively annoy a particular individual."(16)

(16) Gobind Prasad, 2 A. 465.

4937. Civil Trespass.—Entry into or upon property in the possession of another is not necessarily trespass, for it may be a lawful entry, as in the case of the landlord exercising his right of re-entry on expiration of the lease. Such entry may, however, become unlawful, if though peaceful, it is not warranted by law. And it may then be civilly actionable as a civil trespass, but it is not criminally punishable. And since an erroneous but honest belief in one's right is always a ground for exoneration, it follows that no person could be condemned for an act which though illegal was done in the belief that it was legal. Such an act may amount to a civil trespass and may even make the trespasser liable to pay damages, but he could not be convicted of criminal trespass which is a statutory offence requiring the presence of a certain criminal intention which is the gist of the crime.(17) In this sense a lawful entry may become criminal if it is accompanied by the intention which law has declared to be criminal. And so in England while at common law, if a man had a right to the possession of land and a right to enter thereon, he might enter and obtain possession with force of arms, and retain possession by force, but this led to abuse of the right by the strong ejecting the weak under pretence of feigned titles, and so it was enacted in 1381 " that none henceforth make entry into any lands and tenements, but in cases where entry is given by the law; and in that case not with strong hand, nor with multitude of people but only in a peaceable and easy manner."(18)

4938. This was the first enactment against lawful but forcible entry upon land and, it has since remained the law that no person has the right of making a forcible entry upon his own land if in the possession of another, even though the latter have no clear right to possession. So Parke, B., said in a case " where a breach of the peace is committed by a freeholder, who, in order to get into possession of his land, assaults a person wrongfully holding possession of it against his will, although the freeholder may be responsible to the public in the shape of an indictment for a forcible entry, he is not liable to the other party. It is a perfectly good justification to say that the plaintiff was in possession of the land against the will of the defendant who was the owner, and that the defendant entered upon it accordingly."(19)

In English Law the position of the parties is then this: in order to determine the civil responsibility of the person, law looks not to the nature of the entry but to the right. If the entry was legal, it does not care if it was also forcible. But criminal law views the entry in a different light. It looks not to the right but to the manner of the entry. If it was forcible, it holds the person indictable and it does not matter that the entry was legal.(20) The result of viewing this question from two different stand-points has led to this result that a person may be criminally punished for trespass though he could not be held

---

(17) Bakar Halsana v. Dinobandhu, 3 B. L. R. (A. Cr.) 17 Shistidhur, 9 B. L. R. (App.) 19; Budh Singh, 2 A. 101; Wazir Jan, 9 A. 58; Abdul Latif, 5 S. L. R. 125; Ramchandra, 5 N. L. R. 69; Meajan v. Sharafatullah, 16 C. W. N. 1007. 17 I. C. 415, 13 Cr. L. J. 873.

(18) 5 Ric. II., c. 7.

(19) Harvey v. Brydges, 14 N. & W. 442; Davison v. Wilson, 11 Q. B. 1890; Meriton v. Coombes, 9 C. B. 787.

(20) Newton v. Harland 1 M. & G. 644.

civilly liable for the same act.[21] It may be then said quoting the words of the authors that "to tempt men to trespass by means of the Civil Code, and then to punish them for trespassing, is contrary to every sound principle."[22] But such is the law of England, enacted in the Code, but which appears to be abundantly justified, if regard is had to the different objects which the two branches of law have in view—the one being concerned with the protection of title, the other with the preservation of peace.

4939. English Law insures this by preventing forcible entry, while this section seeks to attain the same end by preventing an entry "with intent to commit an offence, or to intimidate, insult, or annoy a person in possession of such property." It has been thought that these words are too wide and would include even a case of innocent entry if it has the effect of causing annoyance to the possessor of land. (§§ 4937-4938). But it is apprehended that this is by no means the effect of the section, which makes criminality depend upon the intention of the trespasser and not upon the effect produced by his trespass. Nor does it take account of the knowledge of the likelihood of causing annoyance in the mind of the trespasser as distinct from his intention. In other words, the sole test of criminality in this offence is the intention as distinct from knowledge and effect.

4940. Intention v. Knowledge.—It is conclived that such intention must be actual and primary, and not merely constructive or secondary[23] (§§ 4942-4945). Consequently, where a person makes an entry upon another's land not with the intention of annoying him, but in the assertion of a bona fide claim of right, he could not be punished for this offence though his act may have in fact caused annoyance to the possessor, and the trespasser may have been aware of it. This ground for exoneration is based upon the broad principle that no one could be said to have intended to annoy another when his act was prompted by the intention to take possession of property which he believed to be his own. In this case the question does not depend upon an inherent right, but upon the trespasser's belief in his right—in short, upon the state of his mind and not upon the strength of his title.

So, Turner, J., said: "If a person enters on land in the possession of another in the exercise of a bona fide claim of right, but without any intention to intimidate, insult or annoy the person in possession, or to commit an offence, then, although he may have no right to the land, he cannot be convicted of criminal trespass, because the entry was not made with any such intent as constitutes the offence. So also, if a person deals injuriously with property in the bona fide belief that it is his own, he cannot be convicted of the offence of mischief, because his act was not committed with intent to cause wrongful loss or damage to any person. But the mere assertion of a claim of right is not in itself a sufficient answer to such charges. It is the duty of Criminal Court to determine what was the intention of the offender; and if it arrives at the conclusion that he was not acting in the exercise of a bona fide claim of right, then it cannot refuse to convict the offender, assuming of course that the other facts are established, which constitute the offence."[24] So it was said in another case: "If the appellant entertained the belief in good faith that he was entitled to the possession of the land, his entry and continuance on it would constitute a trespass on the land for which he would, if he failed to prove his title, be answerable in a civil suit, but would not be liable to a criminal charge. If, on the other hand, the circumstances were such that he could not have entertained such a belief in good faith, it would be a fair inference that he intended the annoyance which his action must have caused to the complainant, and the conviction would be proper."[25]

(21) Pollen v. Brewer, 7 C. B. N. S. 373

(22) Note, Reprint, p. 166; cited under s. 415.

(23) Harendra Nath v. Jyotish Chandra, 52 C. 188 (193), following Bhagwana v. Kedari, 25 B. 202 (226); Suleman, 96 I. C. 871, (1926) L. 600; Moti Lal, 47 A. 855.

4941. The question whether the claim was bona fide or a mere pretence, is a question of fact which must be decided upon the proved facts of each case. But in order to support a conviction under this section, there must be a clear finding that what the accused did was done with the primary intention of committing one of the acts reprobated in the section. This has been laid down in several cases,[1] but a discordant note was struck in a Full Bench case of the Punjab Chief Court, in which the majority of the Judges approached the question from a different stand-point. For they said: "The question for decision is whether the intent to annoy or intimidate or insult any person in possession of the property entered upon, must, under section 441 of the Penal Code, in order to constitute criminal trespass, be the primary intent, or whether an act intended to assert a bona fide right to the property entered upon may constitute criminal trespass by reason of intimidation, insult or annoyance to the person in possession, being a natural consequence of the act. After careful consideration of the judgments and of the authorities cited, the conclusion at which I have arrived is: (i) that each case must be decided on its own merits, with special regard to the nature of the claim, the nature of the act alleged to constitute criminal trespass, and the effect which such act would have on a person of ordinary temperament, regard being also had to the sex and position in life of the individual affected by the act; (ii) that the fact that the primary intention of the accused was to assert a bona fide claim to property, does not necessarily justify an act by him which he knows or must be assumed to know, to be likely to intimidate, insult or annoy the person in possession; (iii) that the means at the disposal of the accused of asserting his claim, and the necessity for asserting it in the manner adopted, must be considered."[2] Now as against this, and more specially as against point (ii) it is submitted that wherever the Code declares the offence to depend upon the "knowledge of likelihood," it says so expressly. It does not say so here. Why should then the offence depend upon a mere knowledge of likelihood as distinct from intention? And moreover what justification is there for the introduction of such a fiction as the secondary intention in the Code?

(24) Budh Singh, 2 A. 101.

(25) Turner, C. J., in Devarasetti, (1884) 1 Weir 517.

(1) Shistidar Parui, 9 B. L. R. (App.) 19; Shambunath v. Ram Kamal, 13 C. L. R. 212; Ram Dyal Mundle, 7 W. R. 28; Kali Nath Nag, 9 W. R. 1: Chooamoni, 14 W. R. 25; Ishar Chandra, 17 W. R. 47; Shib Nath Banerjee, 24 W. R. 58; Roshun Lal (Seith), 2 N. W. P. H. C. R. 82; Budh Singh, 2 A. 101, 5 M. H. C. R. (App.) 17; 5 M. H. C. R. (App.) 19; Jotharam, 2 M. 30; Vartapa, 5 M. 382; Rayapadayachi, 19 M. 240; Luximan, 26 B. 558; Ganpat, (1888) B. U. C. 390; Gobind Prasad, 2 A. 465; Jangi Shah, 26 A. 194; Bazid, 27 A. 298; Pika Ram, (1902) A. W. N. 6; Nandu, (1902) A. W. N. 42; Golap Pandey v. Boddam, 16 C. 715; Evans, 28 C. 123; Hari Bhumali, 9 C. W. N. 974; Bura, (1886) P. R. No. 5; Muhammad Shah, (1881), P. R. 42; Asa Mal, (1884) P. R. No. 1.

4942. Indeed, as has been elsewhere pointed out, the Code eschews the fiction of a presumed intention or knowledge but bases the offence on the actual intention of the accused—that is to say, upon evidence which justifies an inference as a fact that the accused possessed the intention to cause the effect upon which depends his criminal liability. It may be, and indeed it cannot but be, that in drawing such inference the Court takes into consideration the nature of the act and the effect produced on the mind of the party in possession, but it is not content to say: "Every man is presumed to intend the natural consequence of his act, and as such consequence was annoyance, the accused must be presumed to have intended it, whatever in fact be his intention."

4943. This is the English view of crime,[3] but it is not the Indian stand-point[4] though the Courts have in several cases failed to notice this difference. It is possible that the practical result of the two views is the same, but it cannot be forgotten that there is a difference between a presumed and an actual intention: the one is a fiction—the other is a fact. It has been sometimes said that when an act is done with a knowledge amounting to practical certainty that a result will follow, the doer must be held to have intended to cause the result,[5] to which the reply submitted is that, it may be so found in a given case upon consideration of all the facts,[6] but that it cannot be laid down as a legal axiom, for there are cases easily conceivable in which the accused may have the fullest knowledge but not the least intention of causing annoyance. For example, suppose the case of the landlord re-entering upon the land of his tenant on sufferance. He knows that the tenant, who has been squatting on his land would feel greatly annoyed by his ejectment, but the landlord does not effect his entry with the intention of causing him annoyance. He could not, therefore, be convicted of trespass whatever annoyance his entry may have caused the wrong-doer, and howmuchsoever it may have been the natural consequence of his act.

4944. This view is consistent with that taken in several cases,[7] though the contrary has been also laid down in other cases of the same Court,[8] but these latter cases are supported by nothing in the Code,

(2) Per Reid, J., in Ram Saran, (1906) P. R. (Clerk, C. J., concurring; Rattigan, J., dissentiente); followed in Jiwan Singh, (1908) P. R. No. 17.

(3) Hicklin, L. R. 3 Q. B. 360; followed per Reid, J., in Ram Saran, (1906) P. R. No. 12; per Fulton, J., in Lakshman, 26 B. 558.

(4) See General Introduction, §§ 58-60.

(5) Lakshman, 26 B. 558.

(6) See the definition of "Proved" in s. 3, Indian Evidence Act (Act I of 1872)

(7) Moti Lal, 855; Ganpat, (1888) B. U. C. 390; Fakirgavda, (1888) B. U. C 393; Sivaratri (1895) 1 Weir (3rd Ed.) 329; Royapadayachi, 19 M. 240.

(8) Vedagurukkal, (1882) Weir (3rd Ed.) 328.

and are on the other hand opposed both to its letter and spirit. The correct view was, therefore, undoubtedly taken by Shephard and Davis, JJ., who dissenting from an earlier case[9] said: "It is one thing to entertain a certain intention, and another to have the knowledge that one's act may possibly lead to a certain result. The section defining criminal trespass is so worded as to show that the act must be done with intent, and does not, as other sections do (e.g., section 425), embrace the case of an act done with knowledge of the likelihood of a given consequence."[10] That there is such a difference will be clear from the facts of this case, in which "the accused had entered the complainant's house for the purpose of having sexual intercourse with the complainant's unmarried sister. The sexual intercourse constituted no offence, but the accused was convicted of trespass on the view that nothing could be more annoying and insulting to the complainant than such an entry." But the High Court held that it was insufficient to prove the intention to annoy.[11]

This was reaffirmed by the Full Bench of the same Court in a case in which the accused's son had stolen some of his jewels, and when questioned, stated that he had given them to his schoolmaster. The accused thereupon went to him and in spite of his remonstrances, searched his house for the stolen jewels, which he did not find. He was prosecuted for house trespass and the Full Bench held that if a person entered into property in possession of another or remains there with an intent other than to intimidate, insult or annoy him or to commit any offence, but with the knowledge that his act is likely or certain to cause annoyance or insult to the person in possession, he is not guilty of this offence.[12] But this view has not been accepted in other cases. So where the accused was found having entered the complainant's female apartment at night pleaded an alibi, which was disbelieved, the question then arose as to what intention he could have had in committing the trespass. It was contended for him that the room contained several women of whom two were such as the accused could ravish without committing an offence and upon which the Court said: "The case comes to this, that late at night, when the women were in bed the prisoner, a stranger, though a neighbour, went into the room where they were sleeping; that his position and all the facts preclude any notion of his going there to steal, or for any purpose save his own pleasure. We think, the facts are good evidence of an intent and of an intrusion on privacy within the meaning of section 509 of the Indian Penal Code, and that, therefore, the intent to commit an offence within the meaning of section 441 is made out."[13]

4945. This case follows the view taken in the earlier cases of the same Court.[14] In one the accused, a village doctor, was caught in the room occupied by two widows. His plea was alibi which failed, and the

---

(9) Ib.
(10) Royapadayachi, 19 M. 240.
(11) Ib.
(12) Vullappa v. Bheema Row, 41 M. 156 F. B. dissenting from Lawshman, 26 B. 558; Premanundo v. Brindabun, 22 C. 994. To the same effect, Rehana, (1923) 5 Lah. 20 Jag Mohan Das, 75 I. C. (Oudh) 292, 24 Cr. L. J. 916; Narayana, 20 M. L. W. 239.
(13) Premanando v. Brindabun, 22 C. 994.
(14) Koilash Chandra, 16 C. 657; Balmakand v. Ghansamram, 22 C. 391.

question was as to his intention, and the Court remarked: "What we have to deal with is the case of a man, a stranger, who uninvited and without any right whatever to be there, effects an entry in the middle of the night into the sleeping apartment of two women, members of a respectable household, and who, when the attempt is made to capture him, uses great violence in the effort to make good his escape. Under such circumstances we think, a Court ought to presume that the entry was effected with an intent such as is provided for by section 441 of the Penal Code."(15) But these cases are no authority for presuming as a matter of law. The Court no doubt presumes an intention, but it finds it as a fact, in the same way as it finds other facts upon which there is direct evidence. In other words, the question of intention in such cases being a question of evidence, the Court may well apply the rule of evidence and presume the existence of a fact which it thinks likely to have happened, regard being had to the common course of natural events and human conduct in their relation to the facts of the particular case.(16)

4946. Specific Intention Unnecessary.—But in any view, it is not necessary that in order to be criminal, the intention should be found to have been directed to the commission of a specific offence, or to any other specific purpose out of those enumerated in the section. But where under a given set of circumstances it is possible to presume any of the intentions mentioned in the section, the accused is entitled to have it taken that his intention was the least culpable. The accused was found to have entered the sleeping apartment of the complainant at about one at night, while he was asleep with his wife aged 25. He was caught by the complainant and made over to the police. The complainant strove to conceal the true facts and suggested the trespass as one to a desire to commit theft. But he admitted that he had lost nothing. It was moreover proved that the accused was a wealthy man, the landlord of the complainant. The accused was convicted, but on revision it was contended for him that the prosecution should have but had not proved guilty intention, and that what that intention was had not been found. But the Court held that it was not necessary to prove specifically which of the several guilty intentions the accused had; and that it would have been enough if it was shown that the intention must have been one or other of those specified in this section, though it might not have been certain which it was. They then added: "In the present case, though it is not quite certain what the precise intention of the accused in committing the trespass which forms the subject of the charge was, it is clear that it must have been one or other of those specified in section 441. One of them would probably be excluded by the circumstances attending the trespass, that is, the intention to annoy. Considering that the trespass was stealthily committed, it would not be reasonable to suppose that it could have been intended to annoy any of the persons in the room that was trespassed into, though such annoyance must have resulted from it. Nor could the intention of the accused

(15) Koilash Chandra, 16 C. 667.

(16) S. 114, Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872); see also ib., s. 3, "Proved"; Somaduri 43 I. C. 405, 19 Cr. L. J. 117, Pirbax v. Raji, 54 I. C. (N.) 620, 21 Cr. L. J. 140; Lakhmi Das, 4 L. L. J. 532.

have been to intimidate any one as his subsequent conduct shows, for, as soon as he was found out, he tried to make his escape quietly. But the intention must have been to commit some offence, or to insult the modesty of the complainant's wife by intruding upon her privacy. Judging from the time, the place and the manner in which the trespass was committed, and the conduct of the accused when he was found out, it is impossible to suppose that the trespass could have been committed either unintentionally or with any innocent intention. It must have been committed with the intention of insulting the modesty of the complainant's wife, or of committing some offence though it is not quite certain what the offence intended was....It was argued that the accused must have been prejudiced, if the intention was so uncertain that the Court was unable to find affirmatively what it was, and that, if any specific intention had been alleged, it could have been disproved, just as the intention at first imputed by the complainant in his complaint to the police, namely, one of theft, has been disproved by the cross-examination of the witnesses tending to show that the ccused is a man of such position that theft would be a most improbable motive. But here we must be guided, not by the undefined possibility of the accused having been prejudiced, but by some suggestion which a reasonable man can accept, that there has been prejudice to the accused. No reasonable suggestion has been made, and none occurs to us as to how the accused, whose defence was an utter denial of the entry, could possibly have been prejudiced by reason of the absence of any specification of the intention with which the trespass was committed."[17]

View that Specific Intention Necessary.

4947. But this reasoning has not been accepted as final by the other Courts. Indeeded, in such cases of trespass, the Courts have naturally felt the justice of conviction, but they have not arrived at that result by the same process of reasoning. Thus while in the Punjab where the accused entered the house of the complainant with the object of holding illicit intercourse with his sister, the Courts supported the conviction on the ground that he knew that if detected he would inevitably annoy the person in possession[18]—a view combated in Calcutta in the case last cited,[19] some cases of the Allahabad,[20] and Madras[21] High Courts would seem to throw a doubt on the legality of a conviction itself holding that in such cases what is required is the finding of a specific intention.

So Edge, C. J., Aikman, J., said: "It is the first principle of criminal law that where a Statute creates a criminal offence, the ingredients of that criminal offence must be strictly proved, and that where the doing of an act without consent or without authority is made a criminal offence, and the Statute does not expressly put upon the accused the proof of such consent or authority, it is necessary part of the case for the prosecution to negative by evidence such consent or authority. In this case, if Brij Basi (the accused) had actually been caught in the act of sexual inter-

(17) Balmakand Ram v. Ghansamram, 22 C. 391, following Koilash Chandra, 16 C. 657; to the same effect, Kangla, 23 A. 82.

(18) Jiwan Singh, (1908) P. R. No. 17.

(19) Balmakand Ram v. Ghansamram, 22 C. 391.

(20) Brijbasi, 19 A. 74.

(21) Anon, 5 M. H. C. R. (App.) 5.

course with the wife of Ram Gopal, assuming that he knew her to be Ram Gopal's wife, the offence of criminal adultery would not have been made out without proof that such sexual intercourse was without the consent and without the connivance of Ram Gopal." Brij Basi was convicted of a house-trespass in order to commit a criminal adultery with the wife of Ram Gopal. It was consequently necessary for the support of the prosecution, to prove that if Brij Basi had sexual intercourse on that occasion with the wife of Ram Gopal, it would have been without Ram Gopal's consent or connivance. The Court cannot make assumptions against the prisoners in the absence of necessary evidence for the prosecution.[22]

The Madras Court carried the accused's case a step further, holding that he could not be convicted of trespass unless the complainant charged him with trespass with intent to commit adultery. If therefore he charged him with trespass for the purpose of committing theft, and the intention to commit theft was disproved, the accused could not then be convicted on the hypothesis that his intention was still criminal though it might have been other than that alleged.[23] The earlier view of the Allahabad Court[24] was, however, distinguished by Aikman, J., another case[25] in which the contrary was laid down, and in which the complainant had also originally alleged theft as the intention of the trespasser, but it was proved that his intention was to have carnal knowledge of the complainant's wife; and upon which his conviction was upheld though the Judge did not give any reason for distinguishing the earlier case.

Law Defective.

4948. The difficulty of the question arises from the fact that criminality under this section depends not on the use of criminal force,[1] or the unlawfulness of the entry (§§ 4929-4932), but upon the intention to commit an offence, or to intimidate, insult or annoy any person in possession. Now there can be no doubt that a midnight intruder upon a man's privacy deserves to be punished. At the same time there can be no doubt that there must be law to punish him, and the only law available is this section. But its language is either inapt or defective, and the Courts have consequently been constrained to justify their finding by reference to reasons which are as varied as they are irreconcilable with one another. For as has been seen in the foregoing discussion, some cases have justified the conviction with reference to a presumed intention, while others with reference to section 509. But neither view is wholly satisfactory or convincing, and the section needs to be amended.

4949. But when it is said that it is not necessary to find a specific criminal intention what is implied is that the finding need not specify the particular purpose for which the entry was made; but that does not dispense with the finding that the intention must in any case be criminal, that is to say, it must be an intention to commit an offence or to intimidate, insult or annoy any person. Where, therefore, the Court found the trespass to be "for theft or for some other intention or idea," the Chief Court quashed the conviction holding that it was insufficient to uphold a

(22) Brij Basi, 19 A. 74.
(23) Anon, 5 M. H. C. R. (App.) 5.
(24) Brij Basi, 19 A. 74.
(25) Kangla, 23 A. 82.
(1) Batakala, 26 M. 49.

conviction for this offence for which the intention found must be of the nature specified in this section.[2] The same view was taken in Allahabad in the case of the landlord who illegally took possession of his tenant's occupancy land, taking advantage of his temporary absence, and induced the village Patwari to enter it that the tenant had abandoned the holding. By doing so, as the Court observed: "The accused's intention possibly was to obtain possession contrary to law."

But this of itself would not constitute criminal trespass. An unlawful entry is not necessarily an offence,[3] and an intention to commit an unlawful act, not being one of the acts mentioned in this section, does not render the accompanying trespass a criminal trespass.[4] In another case one A was the tenant of the accused and as such had a house in the accused's village. A had for sometime left the village shutting up the house, but which was looked after by some of his relatives. A died of plague and thereupon the accused took possession of his house asserting his right to it as landlord. A's widow prosecuted the accused but the Court threw out her complaint holding that whether the accused's entry was right or wrong he had no intention to commit an offence or to intimidate, insult or annoy any one.[5]

4950. There can be no criminal trespass where a person takes possession of property in the absence of another. The accused, a woman, entered the compound of the complainant, an Assistant Superintendent of Police, while he was absent locking up his house. She was acquitted of this offence as there was no evidence to prove with what intention she had entered his compound.[6] The accused gave a lease of pepper on certain hills which he described as his property. As a matter of fact it included some land which was the property of Government. The lessee assigned over his right to another who entered upon possession on the strength of the lease, and took the pepper belonging to Government, whereupon the accused was prosecuted for the abetment of this offence, but the Court acquitted him holding that "the essential ingredients of criminal trespass and theft are unlawful entry and unlawful taking, but the mere execution of a document cannot be said to aid either the entry or the taking, and is by itself consistent with an intention that the person in whose favour the document is executed, shall assert his claims thereunder in due course of law.....Even assuming that the Courts are right in finding that he knew he was granting the lease of land to which he had not title, the facts proved are still consistent with an absence of intention to abet either criminal trespass or theft."[7] The Court then added: "A penal Statute must be construed strictly, and it was for the prosecution to prove either the instigation of or intention to aid in the commission of this offence."[8]

4951 Entry or Remaining must be Unlawful.—The first clause does not state that the entry therein contemplated should be unlawful. But this is necessarily implied.

Clause 2.

(2) Wariama, (1885) P. R. No. 11; Jiwan, (1885) P. R. No. 11, note, followed in Bura, (1886) P. R. No. 5. To the same effect, Sahz Ali, (1877) P. R. No. 2.

(3) S. 40.

(4) Jangi Singh, 26 A. 194; distinguishing Nandan, (1902) A. W. N. 42.

(5) Bazid, 27 A. 298.

(6) Chinna Thovi, (1895) 1 Weir 518.

(7) Paratpravan, (1889) 1 Weir 48.

(8) Ib., p. 49.

For an entry authorized by law is not intended to be punished, merely because it is made with intent to cause an annoyance to the person in possession. So if an execution creditor accompany the bailiff and enter the house of his debtor with a view to seizing his property in execution of a warrant, he could not be convicted of this offence merely because of the annoyance he thereby causes to his debtor. And in such a case even if he effects his entry before sunrise, which he could not do under law, he would not be necessarily guilty of trespass, for his entry being then illegal would only furnish one element out of the many necessary to constitute this offence.

As Muttusami Aiyar, J., said: "The act which was intended to be done after entering the house was to cause certain property to be attached in execution of a decree and as this is an act which the prisoners had a legal right to do, no intention, such as is necessary to constitute criminal trespass, can be inferred from it. The primary intention which it is reasonable to infer from forcing open the door, to attach property is an intention to violate the right of the prosecutor to exclude strangers from his house. The breaking into the house would certainly amount to an infringement of this right, and as such be an actionable wrong, but I do not see how it is criminal. It is said that it would be an illegal annoyance. If it is, every civil trespass would be so, there would be a civil right infringed, and the infringement might be regarded in one sense as causing annoyance. It has been ruled by this Court that every civil trespass is not a criminal trespass; section 441 seems to me to contemplate the entry into property in the possession of another as a means to another act and to regard the intention with which it is made in relation to that act. Here the only act to which the entry can be referred as a means, is the seizure of property in execution, an act perfectly legal in itself. There may be cases in which the ultimate object may be legal while the means employed to attain it may be criminal. But in this case there is no finding that any act was done in addition to breaking into the house to levy execution on certain goods."(9)

So where the wife of a Hindu who had been excommunicated from her caste and was found to have been living separately from her husband, entered his house to demand her maintenance, whereupon she was prosecuted for this offence, it was held that the loss of social status consequent upon excommunication from the caste did not involve the deprivation of her legal right to joint enjoyment of her husband's property, unless she was expelled therefrom by the husband, in the absence of which her entry was legal and did not amount to trespass, civil or criminal.(10) Such was presumably the view taken of the accused who having purchased a house in the occupation of the complainant at a Sheriff's sale in the High Court, was put into possession by the Sheriff's officer, after which he would not allow the complainant to re-enter it.(11) On the expiry of his lease the tenant's possession is unlawful but if he continues in possession without any reason and merely because he likes it, he could not be held to retain possession with the intention mentioned in clause 2. His act no doubt constitutes civil trespass but it may become criminal if in spite of notice to quit he persists in maintaining his possession.

(9) Jotharam, 2 M. 30.
(10) Marimuttu, 4 M. 243.
(11) Charoo Chunder, 4 C. W. N. 47.

4952. Trespass on Disputed Land.—But between these cases and those in which the accused enters upon land in the assertion of a claim of right, there is naturally a material difference.(12) For these are cases in which the entry appears or is shown to have been made with some intention, other than those specified in section 441, and the annoyance that is caused to the person in possession of the property trespassed upon, simply results from the trespass without its having been intended. But even such cases would fall into the category of criminal trespass, if the doctrine of secondary intention is once let in to explain this section (§ 4940). For if A were to enter upon the land of B with no intention of annoying him but in the bona fide assertion of his right, it may justifiably be urged that though his primary intention was to assert his own right, still, since he knew of the annoyance his act was likely to cause, he must be deemed to possess the secondary intention of annoying him, and in which case his entry would be criminal the moment it ceases to be legal.

It may then lead to such a case as this. A is warned off the land of B. A shoots a deer, and follows it on to B's land for the purpose of killing it. A trespasses. But it has been held that he does not because his intention was to shoot the game and not to annoy B.(13) Opinions may possibly differ in this case, but there would seem to be no occasion for such difference in the following case. A, an æronaut, finds his balloon taking him to the sea. He decides to drop into B's garden to save his life. He knows that by doing so he would destroy B's cabbages, and thus annoy B. A trespasses. The doctrine of secondary intention is therefore a dangerous innovation and there is no knowing what results it may lead up to. Nor can the English presumption of an intention from the natural consequences of his own acts be legitimately let in to explain this offence (§§ 4942-4945).

4953. The true view appears to be to confine the operation of the section strictly to cases in which the intention of the accused as distinct from the knowledge of likelihood, is to produce any of the results specified in the section. In this view, a trespass made in the assertion of a right, must be obviously excluded from the category of the crime. This is certainly the trend of cases.(14) But here again the question cannot be generalized, for it depends upon the nature of the right asserted, the manner of the entry, and the trespasser's belief in his right; though unfortunately the cases lack unanimity even on this subject. For, while there are cases in which the Courts have laid down that the forcible entry upon the land of another constitutes trespass without reference to the question in whom the title to the land may ultimately be found,(15) there are those in which some inquiry into the title is insisted upon, not for the purpose of legalizing the entry but for the purpose of seeing whether

---

(12) Shib Nath Banerjee, 24 W. R. 58; Punjab Singh, 6 C. 579; Shambhu Nath Sarkar v. Ramkomul, 13 C. L. R. 212; Govind Prasad, 2 A. 465.

(13) Chander Narain v. Farquharson 4 C. 837.

(14) Valappa v. Bheema Row, 41 M. 156 F. B., following Jotharam, 2 M. 30; Varthappa v. Nayakan 5 M. 382; Rayapadayachi, 19 M. 240, Manikka, 8 I. C. (M.) 318, 11 Cr. L. J. 623; Amavasaya v. Marri Polliah, 15 I. C. (M.) 317, 13 Cr. L. J. 477, (1912) M. W. N. 395; Chunder Narain v. Farquharson, 4 C. 837; Chandi Pershad v. Evans, 22 C. 123; Gobind Prasad 2 A. 465; Gaya Bhar 38 A. 517; overruling contra in Sellamuthu v. Pallamuthu, 35 M. 186; to the same effect, Rehana, (1923) 5 Lah. 20.

(15) Ram Dayal Mundle, 7 W. R. 28.

it was bona fide.[16] For, the mere assertion of a claim of right is not a sufficient defence to a charge of trespass: to be a good defence it must be a claim made in good faith, that is to say, it must be a claim in which the person must have himself believed though it may not be legally tenable.[17] Now no one can believe in a claim once hushed up by a decree binding on the party; but if in such a case the decree does not conclude his right so as to exclude all possibility of a claim, the mere fact that the person ejected in due course of law remains on the land would not expose him to the penalties of this offence.

As Straight, J., remarked: "Re-entry into or remaining upon land from which a person has been ejected by civil process, or of which possession has been given to another, for the purpose of asserting rights he may have solely or jointly with other persons, is not criminal trespass, unless the intent to commit an offence, or to intimidate, insult or annoy is conclusively proved."[18] In this case the accused held certain houses jointly with two other persons, A and B. The three had executed a mortgage by conditional sale in favour of the creditor C, who, however, obtained possession only against the accused. The latter, though ejected, continued to retain possession of the houses in assertion of the right of his co-owners, A and B, who were his wife and brother and who also refused to vacate them. C filed a complaint against the accused and A for trespass, but Straight, J., threw out the complaint, holding that since the original mortgage was joint and since rightly or wrongly both A and B alleged a joint interest in the property, C could not drive them out of the property by bringing the pressure to bear upon the accused who could still maintain his possession on the strength of the title of A and B. But in this case the result would have been different if the accused had been the sole proprietor or if A and B had not supported his claim. For it was never intended to be laid down as the law that a person could with impunity defy the decree of a competent Court in execution of which he is ejected.[19] The complainant as the assignee of the rights of the mortgagee in possession was like his assignor in peaceful possession of the property. The accused who was a relation of the mortgagor, forcibly ousted the complainant after some years' possession, on the plea that he was under the Hindu Law entitled to a share in the land and the mortgagor had no title to mortgage it with possession. It was held that the plea was a mere pretence for the forcible dispossession and that the accused had been rightly held guilty of this offence.[20]

4954. The same view was taken in another case, where the accused claiming to be the assignee of the mortgagor's right forcibly dispossessed the mortgagee in possession, it being held that though he may have become liable to ejectment, still he could not be ejected from the land save in due course of law.[21] In another case the land of A was brought to sale in execution of a money decree obtained against him by B. C was the auction-purchaser and he was physically put in possession of the land with the

---

(16) Gokul v. Seithi Roshun Lal, 2 N. W., P. H. C. R. 82; Budh Singh, 2 A. 101 (103); Kudukoli Burandni, (1882) 1 Weir 515.
(17) Devarasetti, (1884) 1 Weir 516.
(18) Gobind Prasad, 2 A. 465
(19) Tikaram, (1902) A. W. N. 6.
(20) Nandan, (1902) A. W. N. 42.
(21) Mya Zan, (1902) 1 L. B. R. 358. Dwarka Singh v. Ram Kishan, 38 I. C. (Pat.) 962, 18 Cr. L. J. 402.

usual attendant formalities. He ploughed up and manured the land and exercised other rights of ownership when the accused appeared upon the scene, and forcibly drove him out of the land. They were prosecuted under this section, and they justified their act with reference to an antecedent lease executed by the judgment-debtor many years prior to the auction sale of land, but this plea failed and the accused were convicted.(22)

So while two persons A and B, being members of a joint family and as such in joint possession of a house, could not commit trespass by each exercising his right of co-ownership, still if one of them was in exclusive possession of the joint property, the other would be guilty of this offence if he effected his entry with intent to annoy the other.(23) Such a case might be conceived of a co-sharer landlord forcibly taking possession of land of an undivided village in the exclusive possession of the other co-sharer. A mere entry upon such land would be trespass and it may become criminal if it is accompanied by the intention which the section reprobates. So in a Madras case it was said that though a co-sharer could not maintain a trespass against his co-sharer unless there has been an ouster, still such a proceeding would be justifiable if the co-sharer has committed such destruction or waste of common property as by pulling down a common wall,(24) or by carrying away a portion of the common property as by digging and carrying away turf.(25) So where A, B, C and D were co-owners of a plot of land in which they were accustomed to bury their dead, it was held that in such a case though the plot was originally held in common, it might be perhaps inferred that each of the co-owners had assented to the appropriation by a co-owner of so much as he had actually appropriated to the grave of a relative, so that if a grave were disturbed, a trespass might be established.(1)

4955. Of course, this section, like many others in the Code, is not intended to protect title but only possession as distinct from ownership. Consequently, a person having a right to possession may be guilty of this offence, unless his entry is otherwise justifiable or excusable. Such would be the case where an act is justifiable on the ground of private defence, (§ 988) or on the ground of bona fide though mistaken belief, or, indeed, on any other ground which is a sufficient answer to criminal liability. But except where a person is so exempt from liability, the only defence which avails a trespasser is that indicated in the section which is made the basis of criminality.

4956. Who may Complain?—In this connection, it will be observed that the section speaks of "property in the possession of another." This raises the question, what is possession. In a sense and to a certain extent the question may be said to have been solved by section 27 (§§ 274-277), under which "when property is in the possession of a person's wife, clerk or servant, on account of that person it is in that person's possession within the meaning of the Code." But this is the limit

Meaning "of in the Processions of another."

(22) Kailash Ghose v. Jugal Lohar, 1 C. L. J. 104 (106-110).

(23) Prankristo v. Bissonath, 15 W. R. 6.

(24) As in Cubitt v. Porter, 8 B. & C. 257.

(25) Khaja Mahomed, 3 M. 178.

(1) Khaja Mahomed, 3 M. 178; Jacobs v. Seward, L. R. 5 H. L. 478.

beyond which the Code does not admit constructive possession as entitled to protection.[2] Strictly speaking, it does not protect the landlord's possession through his tenant, or the physical possession of one which is by a jus in re aliena. It would then follow that the person immediately aggrieved is the person in physical possession of the property, whence it further follows that it is he alone who is entitled to complain.[3] But two other views are possible and have received the support of cases: one is that the landlord is as much entitled to complain as the tenant, since he is equally entitled to eject trespassers.[4] The other view is that it is open to anyone to set the criminal law in motion, and that this offence is no exception to the rule.[5] This is perfectly true, but the Court is not bound to entertain a complaint instituted by an officious intermeddler.

The accused was prosecuted for this offence at the instance of A, a municipal commissioner, who had been then sitting with B as a Committee dealing with appeals in assessment cases. The accused entered the room in spite of warning not to enter it without permission. He, however, persisted in entering it, his object being to move the Committee to reconsider their assessment which they had more than once before declined to do. He was ejected from the room, but he took his stand in the verandah and persisted in addressing the crowd assembled that no justice could be had there. He was prosecuted for this offence by A, and Petheram, C. J., and Beverley, J., held that in view of section 345 of the Procedure Code he alone could not complain: " Whether the charge is made under section 441 or 422, the prosecution must prove that the property trespassed upon was at the time in the possession of a complainant who could compound the offence under s. 345 of the Code, and, as this is the case, we think the charge must fail, even if there were no other reason, on the ground that the complainant's own statement, so far from showing that the room was in his possession, shows that it was not, but that he was merely sitting in it with other persons at the invitation and with the consent of the person, whoever he may be, as to which we know nothing, who is in possession of the room in the well-understood sense that he is the person to whom the right to immediate possession belongs."[6]

But this view has been controverted in Bombay, where it has been laid down that this section is no exception to the general rule which allows any person to complain of a criminal act.[7] Consequently, Jardine, J., held it to be no objection to a complainant prosecuting for trespass in respect of a field in the possession of his tenant. " The destruction of the crop," he held, " must have been damaging or annoying to the owner or tenant, or both, as

(2) Isur Chunder v. Seetul Das Mitter, 17 W. R. 47.

(3) Kunji Lal, 12 A. L. J. 151; Nga Po Tok, 49 I. C. (R.) 99, 20 Cr. L. J. 115; Udayappa, (1923) M. W. N. 451, 74 I. C. 856, (1924) A. I. R. (M.) 40; Nga Ton Kyi, 10 Bur. L. T. 77, 35 I. C. 810, 17 Cr. L. J. 378; Toy Gyi, 8 L. B. R. 425, 35 I. C. 810, 17 Cr. L. J. 378; contra in Prayag Singh v. Morgan, 25 C. W. N. 425, 52 I. C. 190, 22 Cr. L. J. 494 (anyone can complain).

(4) Fakir Chaand v. Fakir, 69 I. C. (L.) 370, 23 Cr. L. J. 699.

(5) Prayag Singh v. Morgan, 25 C. W. N. 425, 52 I. C. 190, 22 Cr. L. J. 499; Dhauntud Lodhi, 47 I. C. (N.) 77, 19 Cr. L. J. 881.

(6) Chandi Pershad v. Evans, 22 C. 123; Kali Nath v. Nag Chowdhury, 9 W. R. 1; Iswar Chandra Karmarkar v. Sital Das Mitter, 17 W. R. 47. in Keshav Lal, 21 B. 536.

(7) Ganesh Sathe, 13 B. 600, followed in the present case."[8] It is submitted that the person annoyed must be the person in possession, and such possession must be actual and not merely constructive, as held by Jardine, J., in the case last referred to. Any other view would make it possible for the landlord to prosecute a person let into possession by the tenant, which would be a material curtailment of the right of possession.

4957. Possession must be Actual[9] and Exclusive.—So it has been held that where the possession is not actual and exclusive, the possessor could not complain of trespass, though it may be an encroachment on the right of joint possession. Such was held to be the case of the accused who were prosecuted for this offence for having fished in a certain river, in which the complainant was shown to possess an exclusive right of fishery. But it was held that though the complainant possessed the exclusive right of fishery, it did not put the river upon which the accused entered in the exclusive possession of the complainant, and without such possession the accused could not be convicted of this offence.[10]

License and possessions without title excluded.

4958. Illegal Possession Excluded.—Again, such possession must be at least juridical and of right and not a mere license, in which the possession of the licensee is no possession at all, though he may be in actual occupancy of the land. So where the accused who was prosecuted for trespass claimed to be in possession of the land, contending that he had permitted the complainant to use it for stacking his paddy, the Court directed that "if it be found that the occupation of the land on which the paddy was stored was permissive, and that possession lay with the company (on whose behalf the accused had made the entry), there could be no trespass committed on this land by the company's servants."[11] And then the Court went on to add: "If it be found that in fact the complainant had gone beyond the boundary and commenced to build a corner of his shed on land in the possession of the company, and that the officers of the company at once intervened to prevent him, their action in removing from the land of the company the materials the complainant had placed there would not amount to mischief, nor would their entry be a trespass."[12] Of course, in order to entitle a person to complain of trespass, his possession must not be a barren one without right or title and merely permissive without possessing the characteristic of such possession as law recognizes and protects. Such possession may, however, be acquired by lapse of time, as where a person's possession though adverse or wrongful in the inception, is suffered to continue for a considerable time, though not for the statutary period so as to confer an indefeasible title on the possessor, in which case he could not be ejected by force even by a person having a better title to the property.[13] For this purpose the Court gives effect to a bona fide claim of right as much on the part of the trespasser as on the part of the person dispossessed.

(8) Keshav Lal, 21 B. 536; contra in Chandi Pershad v. Evans, 22 C. 123.

(9) Kunji Lal, 12 A. L. J. 151, 21 I. C. 681, 14 Cr. L. J. 633; Tok Gyi, 8 L. B. R. 425; 35 I. C. 810, 17 Cr. L. J. 378; Nga Tok Kyi, 10 Bur. L. T. 77, 35 I. C. 810, 17 Cr. L. J. 378.

(10) Charu Nayiab, 2 C. 354.

(11) Groves, (1882) 1 Weir 521 (522).

(12) Ib. p. 522.

(13) Ponnusami Pillai, (1898) 1 Weir 522.

So Collin, C. J., and Benson, J., said: "If she (the prosecutrix) was in possession under a bona fide claim of right, she was entitled to remain until ejected by due course of law. The accused could not eject her by force, even if he had a better legal title. If, however, possession had already been given to the accused, and the complainant was a mere trespasser, then the accused would have been justified in using such force as might be necessary to remove her. Superior title, however, in the accused would not by itself convert the complainant into a mere trespasser so as to justify him in ejecting her if she was in possession otherwise than as a mere trespasser.[14] Possession without title could be held to be entitled to legal protection only when it has been sufficiently long to raise an inference of acquiescence by the owner. Otherwise, as Lord Denman, C. J., put it: "A mere trespasser cannot, by the very act of trespass, immediately and without acquiescence, give himself what the law understands by possession against the person, whom he ejects, and drive him to produce his title, if he can without delay reinstate himself in his former possession. Here by the acquiescence of the plaintiff the defendants had become peaceably and lawfully possessed as against him. He had re-entered by a trespass; if they had immediately sued him for that trespass, he certainly could not have made out a plea denying their possession. What he could not have done on the 1st of July,[15] he could as little have done on the 11th, for his tortiously being on the spot was never acquiesced in for a moment and there was no delay in disputing it."[16]

The three questions relevant in such cases are then the strength of title and the length and peaceful nature of the possession. The question what length of possession is sufficient to invest a person with the right to hold it even by main force, if necessary, against the owner has not been and cannot be the subject of any rigid rule, but there are cases in which[17] the Courts have protected a man who held peaceful possession for about a year. This case was referred to by Cockburn, C. J., who said that "a person being peacefully in possession of a house, a person going in and taking possession without his leave commits a trespass, and all trespass implies force in the eye of the law."[18] These cases were referred to by Melvill, J., who said that they apply only to cases in which the person who is ousted has been for some time previously in peaceful and undisturbed possession. Such possession, being acquiesced in creates a presumption of title, and is what the Roman jurists designate "juridical possession," as distinguished from mere detention.[19] A mere trespasser, unless his occupation be acquiesced in, acquires no such possession, and may be expelled by main force.[20]

4959. So where the trustees of a school who were entitled to eject the plaintiff, a schoolmaster under them, after service of notice to quit ejected him without such notice, and he peacefully left, but returned the next day (1st July) and established himself in the room he had vacated on

(14) Ponnusami Pillai, (1898) 1 Weir 522.

(15) When the person elected re-entered into possession.

(16) Browne v. Dawson, 12 A. & E. 624.

(17) Doe v. Dyeball, Mood & M. 346.

(18) Asher v. Whitlock, L. R. 1 Q. B. 1.

(19) Von Savigny on Possession, s. 1; Domat's Civil Law, s. 2134.

(20) Dadabhai v. Sub-Collector of Broach, 7 B. H. C. R. (A. C.) 82 (84, 85).

the previous day, upon which the trustees gave him a legal notice and ejected him on the 11th July, whereupon he sued them in trespass founded on his last possession, but Lord Denman, C. J., threw out his case, holding that having acquiesced in the restoration of his possession to the defendants, his subsequent re-entry was a trespass and for which he and not the defendants were liable.(21) Here then only a day's possession entitled the trustees to defend it against a trespasser. But the case would not have been different if the schoolmaster had been a lessee instead of being merely a licensee. Such was the case of the accused who were lessees of land which was subsequently sold in execution of a money-decree passed against the lessor to the prosecutor who peacefully entered into possession and was permitted to plough it up and manure it and exercise other acts of ownership for a couple of months after which the accused turned out in force and ejected him. It was held "that they were not entitled to take the law into their own hands after possession had been delivered peaceably and without any objection on their part," and that their act consequently amounted to this offence.(22) Length of possession is thus immaterial if it goes with title. It is only material as showing acquiescence on the part of the person interested in disturbing it. It may thus negative the plea of an act done in the bona fide exercise of an claim of right (§§ 4779, 4958-4960).

4960. The fact that the offence relates to an entry made upon property in the possession of another, excludes cases in which the accused being himself in possession of the property refused to vacate it. The accused was a lessee from the Forest Department and during his lease constructed a house, which he was called upon to vacate under a legal notice to quit. He refused to relinquish the land until he was paid compensation for improvements, whereupon he was proceeded against under this section, but the Court held that in order to sustain a conviction under this section it must be shown that the property was in the possession of some person other than the alleged trespasser.(23)

4961. Unlawfully Remaining After Lawful Entry.—The second paragraph deals with the case of unlawfully remaining on property after effecting a lawful entry. Here again criminality depends not upon the unlawfulness of remaining on another's property, but upon that act done with the same intent as constitutes the offence under the first paragraph. Apart from such intent there is nothing criminal in unlawfully remaining upon another's land. Such is the case of a tenant on sufferance, who comes in by right but remains on by wrong. So if a person invite another into his house and the two should fall out, there is nothing criminal in the other remaining on to quarrel, nor would the fact of his having caused the other annoyance make his act a criminal trespass. But it would be so if he remained on purpose to annoy the other.

Paragraph 2.

4962. What is Entered Upon must be Property.—But in either case the thing entered upon must be "property." This term has been the subject of some reference before (§ 4791), but here it has been obviously used in a different sense as connoting immoveable property as distinct from moveable property. In other respects the leading features of the two terms are the same. For instance, the term is not intended to include an easement or an incorporeal right such as the exclusive right of fishery in a public river[24], the infringement of which would justify a suit for damage,[25] but for which the tortfeasor cannot be criminally prosecuted whether for theft or trespass.[1]

(21) Browne v. Dawson, 12 A. & E. 624; followed in Dadabhai v. Sub-Collector of Broach, 7 B. H. C. R. (A. C.) 82; Kailas Ghose, v. Jugal Lohar, 1 C. L. J. 104 (107).

(22) Kailash Ghose v. Jugal Lohar, 1 C. L. J. 104 (107, 108).

(23) Foujdar, (1878) P. R. No. 2?

4963. It is of the essence of all criminal acts punishable as such under the Code that all the ingredients mentioned in the definition as constituting the offence should be present, and that the Court should find them to be present. If it has any doubt upon a single ingredient it cannot punish the accused, for criminality depends not upon the presence of some of the ingredients but upon the presence of all of them.

Over and above these elements there are others which the Court regards as equally sufficient to negative criminality (§§ 4964-4967).

4964. Bona Fide Claim.—It is settled law that an entry upon the land of another under a bona fide claim of right does not constitute trespass. But in such a case the entry is exempt from puinshment not because of there being a special rule overriding the general law as regards criminal liability but because of the absence of the necessary intent which makes the act criminal.[2] Now, as it is the duty of the prosecution to prove, and of the accused to find the necessary criminal intent, it follows that the question of a bona fide claim is intimately associated with the question of criminality, and it need not, therefore, be raised by the defence, for in establishing the accused's guilt it must be necessarily negatived by the prosecution. So Turner, J., said: "It is the duty of the Criminal Court to determine what was the intention of the alleged offenders, and if it arrives at the conclusion that he was not acting in the exercise of a bona fide claim of right, then it cannot refuse to convict the offender, assuming, of course, that the other facts are established which constitute the offence."[3]

4965. The question of bona fides arises as soon as the entry is shown to be unlawful. It is then a question of intention, whether it was made in the assertion of a claim of right or on purpose to intimidate, insult or annoy the party in possession. This is a question of fact [4] and its determination depends upon the proved circumstances of each case. If, for example, a person is dispossessed in execution of a Civil Court's decree whether passed after a summary inquiry under section 9 of the Specific Relief Act[5] or otherwise, he could not force open the lock put upon his property by the decree-holder and

---

(24) Charu Nayiab, 2 C. 354.
(25) Bhusan Parui v. Denonath Benerjee, 20 W. R. 15.
(1) Kayaram Surma v. Nichala Katani, 15 C. 402; Bhagiram Dome v. Ahar Dome, 15 C. 388, (1878) 1 Weir. 384; Rovu Pothadu, 5 M. 390; Golla Subba Reddi, 24 M. 81, (1879) 1 Weir. 520; In Muthra v. Jawahir, 1 A. 527, a person plying a boat for hire at a distance of three miles from a public ferry was held not to be liable under this section.
(2) Budh Singh, 2 A. 101 (108).
(3) Budh Singh, 2 A. 101 (108).
(4) Devarasetti, (1884) 1 Weir 516.
(5) Act I of 1877.

insult the modesty of such woman.[19] If so, an intrusion, in consequence of an assignation, would go wholly unpunished. The Court have seen the obvious abuse of justice that this course would lead to. Consequently, they have extended the meaning of the word "intention" so as to include therein the "knowledge of the likelihood" of causing annoyance, which certainly meets the requirements of the cases in point, but it at the same time leads to anomalies wholly inconsistent with the tenor of the Code (§§ 4942-4951).

4969. But in either view such a case as the following should present no difficulty. The accused was the landlord of a house in the occupation of the complainant as his tenant. He wanted to turn him out and with that object in view he caused its roof to be removed while the complainant's wife—a pardanashin woman was inside, and whom he gave no intimation to leave before she was exposed to public view. The accused was convicted under section 509, but the Chief Court held it to be this offence as it was clear that the accused intended to annoy the complainant.[20] Such was also held to be the case where the accused entered upon the property of the complainant and cut down trees standing thereon, in which case the intent was either to commit mischief or to annoy the complainant.[21]

It has been held that where the accused devoted to his own use by cultivating the ground devoted to common and sacred uses, such as a burial ground, he could be convicted of trespass "for the intent of the defendant must be inferred from the nature of his acts, and it is scarcely possible to conceive any act more calculated to cause annoyance especially to superstitious people attaching sanctity to the relics of mortality, than the act of ploughing up a burial ground."[22] In a subsequent case this was explained to be a case in which the accused had no common right over the burial ground, which would have made a material difference. So where the accused enclosed and cultivated a footpath, the Court held it to be no case of a trespass, as the defendant, along with the rest of the public, was entitled to the use of the footpath, so that his entry could not be held to be an illegal entry on property in the possession of another with intent to annoy the person in possession.[23] But this was probably the case of a path of which the ownership vested in the public jointly. But in Bombay under the Land Revenue Code[24] all public roads are the property of Government, so that an encroachment of such a road by the accused may be trespass if it is accompanied by the requisite intention to make the trespass criminal.[25]

4970. The offence here contemplated must be something different from the trespass itself. As was remarked in a case trespass is a means to another act, and the intention must be regarded in relation to the act.[1] Such act may, however, be a continuous transaction, as

---

(19) Hopper, (1892) P. R. No. 2; Lajee Ram, (1898) P. R. 12; Phiaz Mahamad 5 Bom. L. R. 502.
(20) Dheramal, (1901) 1 U. B. R. 350.
(21) Jeenut Bebee, 1 W. R. 46.
(22) 6 H. M. C. R. (App.) 25.
(23) 6 M. H. C. R. (App.) 26: cf, Khaja Mahomed, 3 M. 178.
(24) Bom. Act V of 1879, s. 37.
(25) Fakirya Vecla (1888), B. U. C. 393.
(1) Jonathan Davay, 11 M. 30.

where a person enters upon the property of another to commit an assault which he commits; and in which case he would be liable to a conviction under this section.(2) So a police officer is not justified by the mere fact that a person is of a suspicious character in entering his house at midnight to see whether he is in the house. His act in so entering the house is a house-trespass for which he may be convicted, as the act is calculated to annoy the members of the family of the suspected person and also to insult the suspect.(3) So while a person may not be liable to a prosecution for adultery except on the prosecution of the husband, still adultery is an offence punishable under section 497 of the Code, so that a person entering the premises of another for that purpose may be convicted of this offence though he could not be convicted of adultery for want of a proper complainant.(4)

But on this point the views of the Madras Court are conflicting, for in another case the Court held that in such a case if the husband refuses to charge the trespasser with intent to commit adultery, the latter could not be convicted of trespass.(5) But the facts of this case were somewhat peculiar. The accused was discovered having trespassed into the prosecutor's house and he admitted the fact but stated that he had entered to keep an assignation with the prosecutor's wife. The husband adhered to the statement that the accused's entry was to commit theft. The Deputy Magistrate who tried the case was presumably of opinion that the entry was for the purpose stated by the accused, and he dismissed the complaint because the husband "refused to lay a complaint of house trespass with intent to commit adultery." The High Court held that though the Magistrate might have legally convicted the accused of this offence on his own confession, he was not bound to do so. It further added that the discretion had been wisely exercised in refusing to convict when the complainant absolutely refused to charge the accused with entry with intent to commit adultery. But how did the complainant know that the accused had that intention? All he could say was that he had not consented to nor connived at his entry for that purpose. For the rest, the intent of the accused was a matter of inference, upon which the complainant and the Court may well have differed.

Intent Only Necessary.

4971. It is not, of course, necessary that the trespasser should have actually committed an offence following upon his trespass—for, all that the section requires is that he should have entered "with intent to commit an offence." All that is then necessary to prove is the entry and the intention which need not be even accompanied by an overt act, for it will then amount to an attempt as distinct from a mere intention. But the proof of such intent may be given by the proof of some act as manifesting that intention. And this may even be more essential where the intent is not to commit an offence, but merely to "intimidate, insult or annoy" the person in possession. The inference must, however, be drawn from facts which warrant a conclusion that the act was inconsistent with

(2) Bashikachari, (1883) 1 Weir 528.
(3) Doraisami Pillai, 27 M. 52.
(4) (1868) 1 Weir 531.
(5) (1869) 5 M. H. C. R. (App.) 5.

any reasonable hypothesis. For instance, such inference could not be drawn in the case of the accused who secretly entered an exhibition building without a ticket. As the Court remarked, his act was undoubtedly of a fraudulent character, and his entry was civil trespass, but it was not criminal because his entry was made with intent to evade payment and not to annoy any one in possession of the exhibition.(6)

This case is not unlike that of the accused who entered a local market through a bamboo fence, instead of the regular gate to evade payment of a toll leviable upon the yarn he had smuggled in for sale, in which case the entry was held to be wrongful, but it failed to amount to this offence for want of the requisite intention.(7) So the entry of a woman into the house of a cavalry sepoy for the purpose of committing adultery is not trespass, because she had failed to obtain permission of the commanding officer, and annoyed him by her unwarranted intrusion.(8) So a person could not be convicted of this offence for driving across an open green in violation of an order issued by a Municipality.(9) So public bodies and private owners sometimes exhibit a public notice threatening to prosecute trespassers, and in such a case the question may arise whether all trespassers render themselves liable to a prosecution by the mere fact of their trespass. But even in such a case the solution of the question depends not upon the presence of the notice, but upon the presence of the intention. The notice is no doubt some evidence of the feelings of a person against trespassers and of which they might well be aware, but it would not make all entry punishable as trespass.

4972. The Courts have repeatedly insisted upon a clear finding as to the intent of the accused, without which, there can be no conviction for this offence.(10) Of course, the fact that an act is unlawful or such as the civil law will restrain, or for which it will compensate the injured party in damages is not necessarily criminal. So the fact that an act is calculated to annoy the complainant is no reason for holding it to be criminal unless it is further found to have been so intended (§ 4951). The accused obtained a redemption decree in respect of land in the possession of the complainant as a mortgagee in possession, and of which he took possession otherwise than by process of law, which fact was found by the Magistrate to calculate to annoy the complainant. But the Chief Court held it to be insufficient to sustain the conviction.(11) The same view was maintained in another case in which the accused took possession of the property claiming to have inherited it."(12)

4973. A person's entry upon the property of another taking advantage of his absence could not be held to have intended to annoy him. He could not therefore be convicted of this offence, unless there is

(6) Mehervanji Bejanji, 6 B. H. C. R. 6.
(7) Varthappal Nayallan, 5 M. 382.
(8) Kushee (Mt.), (1887) B. U. C. 328.
(9) 5 M. H. C. R. (App.) 38.
(10) Aladitta, (1882) P. R. No. 29; Asa Mal, (1884) P. R. 1 Mulchand, (1884) P. R. No. 1, note; Wariama (1885) P. R. No. 11; Jiwa, (1885) P. R. No. 11, note.
(11) Aladitta, (1882) P. R. No. 29.
(12) Asa Mal, (1884) P. R. No. 1.

evidence to show that his entry was made with intent to commit an offence.[13]

House-trespass.

442. Whoever commits criminal trespass by entering into or remaining in any building, tent or vessel used as a human dwelling, or any building used as a place for worship, or as a place for the custody of property, is said to commit "house trespass."

Explanation.—The introduction of any part of the criminal trespasser's body is entering sufficient to constitute house-trespass.

[Vessel—s. 48. Criminal trespass—s. 441.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4974).
(2) What is House-trespass (4975-4978).
(3) Building (4976-4977).
(4) Tent (4978).
(5) What is Sufficient Entry (4979-4980).
(6) Criminal Intent Necessary (4981-4982).

4974. Analogous Law.—House-trespass is as much an aggravated form of trespass as theft in a building is an aggravated form of theft. Indeed, the language of this section is closely comparable to that of section 380, reference to which may be usefully made in this connection. Referring to this section the draftsmen wrote: "There is no sort of property which it is so desirable to guard against unlawful intrusion as the habitations in which men reside and the buildings in which they keep their goods. The offence of trespassing on these places we designate as house-trespass, and we treat it as an aggravated form of criminal trespass. House-trespass, again, may be aggravated by being committed in a surreptitious or in a violent manner. The former aggravated form of house-trespass we designate as lurking house-trespass; the latter we designate as house-breaking. Again, house-trespass, in every form, may be aggravated by the time at which it is committed. Trespass of this sort has, for obvious reason, always been considered as a more serious offence when committed by night than when committed by day. Thus we have four aggravated forms of that sort of criminal trespass which we designate as house-trespass, lurking house-trespass (s. 443), lurking house-trespass by night (s. 444) and house-breaking by night (s. 446)." [14]

These sections, however, only define the terms which are constituted offences by others (ss. 448-456).

4975. What is House-trespass?—This section defines house-trespass by reference to the definition of simple trespass the existence of all the constituting elements of which are presupposed in addition to which the only essential element possessed by this offence is that the property entered into or entered upon is a "building, tent or vessel used as a human dwelling, or any building used as a place for worship or as a place for the custody of property."

(13) Chunia Thoyi, (1895) 1 Weir 518; Jangi Singh, 26 A. 194; Basid, 27 A. 298.
(14) Note N., Reprint, p. 168.

Building.

4976. The question what is a building has been considered in another connection (s. 380) and reference must be made to that discussion for the meaning of the term as there used. (§ 4153). It is not intended to comprise a railway carriage[15] or the open or walled compound attached to a house,[16] though they are popularly comprised in that term. But it is clear that whatever may be the popular notion of a building a person merely entering the open compound of a house cannot be held to have committed house-trespass, for in doing so he could not be said to enter into any building used as a human dwelling—words which could only mean the actual structure as distinct from its open purlieus. On this point the Courts are agreed and so it was held by Scott and Jardine, JJ., that there was no authority for including compounds within the words "house" or "building" used as a human "dwelling."[17] And the same view was taken by Mahmud, J., in a case in which the accused had been convicted for performing an offence of nature in his neighbour's compound.[18] So in a Burmah case, Irwin, J., said: "Entering an ordinary compound, such as both Europeans and Burmans commonly use, is not house-trespass,"[19] though the panachut or outer verandah of a Burmese dwelling is a part of his house, and a trespass therein would, it is said, be a trespass into a dwelling house within the meaning of this section.[20]

But, of course, there may be a building in the courtyard and in that case it may answer the description of a building though it may not be the main building. Such a case arose in the Punjab where the majority of the Court held a courtyard surrounded by a high brick wall and with rooms built against the wall on the inside with an outer door or gate leading into a side street as a building used for the custody of property for which it was proved to have been used.[21] This was presumably a substantial structure used as the family warehouse. But a cattle-fold or pen with a thorn-hedge round it could scarcely be designated a building, and it was so held in the case of the accused who had stolen cattle at night from such a fold and whose conviction was accordingly altered from under s. 457 to one under s. 379.[22] And this view was re-affirmed in a subsequent case in which

(15) 1 Weir 436; Sheik Saheb, (1886) B. U. C. 298.

(16) Rama, (1889) B. U. C. 484; Po Thet, 4 L. B. R. 24, 6 Cr. L. J. 134.

(17) Rama, (1889) B. U. C. 484; Sunder, (1919) P. L. R. 56, 49 I. C. 864, 20 Cr. L. J. 240; Dhanun, 86 I. C. 156, (1925) L. 459.

(18) Surja, (1882) A. W. N. 224.

(19) Po Thet, (1907) 4 L. B. R. 24.

(20) Sit Hou, 9 Bur. L. T. 204; contra in Nga Pan Hlaing, 8 Bur. L. T. 17, 26 I. C. 306.

(21) Shera, (1879) P. R. No. 35, But see Buta, 77 I. C. (L.) 809, 25 Cr. L. J. 457 an enclosed compound with no door anywhere is not a building.

(22) Sucha Singh, (1887) P. R. No. 57; followed in Gokul Chand, (1901) P. R. No. 14; Ramjan, (1905) P. R. No. 285; Kohmi, (1914) P. R. No. 24, 26 I. C. 305, 16 Cr. L. J. 1; contra in Pullabhotla, 39 I. C. (M.) 309, 18 Cr. L. J. 469.

the accused had entered the complainant's cattlepen to prosecute his intimacy with a young unmarried woman of over sixteen years of age.(23)

4977. But the view of the Court would have been probably different if the pen had been walled on four sides, though a wall may have fallen and the gap stopped with thorn. This was the inclination of the Court in which the accused was convicted of removing a bullock from such a shed though the Court declined to commit itself definitely to that view.(24) The Madras High Court had to consider a similar question in the case of the accused who had stolen a sheep from an open pen enclosed by hurdles, and it was held that such a pen even if it was walled on all sides could not be called a building.(25) The porch or portico of a building if enclosed by walls is a part of the building to which it is attached, so that an entry thereinto would be punishable as house-trespass.(1) So is a dalan or an entrance hall surrounded by a wall in which there were two door-ways without doors, and which was used for the custody of property.(2)

The question whether what was described as a building was a building within the meaning of this section must always be a question of degree and circumstance, but its ordinary and usual meaning is a block of brick or stone work covered in by a roof.(3) But as observed by Davies, J.: "The mere surrounding of an open space of ground by a wall or fence of any kind, could not by any stretch of imagination, be deemed to convert the open space itself into a building."(4) The question of house-trespass, however, depends not only upon the question whether the thing entered into is a building, but upon the further question whether it was used as a human dwelling or as a place for the custody of property. This is a question of fact and in solving it regard must be had to the normal adaptability of the thing to the purpose for which it was put no less than to its actual use. For if a modern Diogenes were to live in a tub, his place of abode could not for that alone be called a building.

4978. Of course, a thing may fail to be a "building" but may still be a "tent" which is a portable house made of some flexible covering such as skins, matting or canvas stretched and sustained by poles (§ 4156). The term "vessel" has been defined before.(5)

Tent.

4979. What is a Sufficient Entry?—House-trespass consists in "entering into or remaining" in any building, tent or vessel. Now the term "entering into" is susceptible of some ambiguity, and consequently, it is provided in the explanation that "the introduction of any part of the criminal trespasser's body is entering sufficient to constitute house-trespass." If, therefore, the trespasser puts in his head or

(23) Ramjan, (1905) P. R. No. 28.
(24) Dullee, 6 N. W. P. H C R. 307.
(25) Palani Goundon, (1896); 1 Weir 523, Kohmi, (1914) P. R. No. 24, 26 I. C. 305.
(1) Gulam Jelani, (1889) P. R. No. 16.
(2) Dad, (1879) P. R. No. 10.
(3) Per, Esher, M. R., in Movi v. Williams, (1892) 1 Q. B. 264.
(4) Palani Goundan, (1896) 1 Weir 523.
(5) S. 48.

hands or legs or any part of his trunk inside a building, his entry is complete whatever offence he may then be guilty of. But if no part of his body enters the building the entry is not complete, though the act may amount to an attempt. The accused, a thief, made a hole into a wall of the complainant's house, but on his putting his hand into it he found a cross beam on the other side barring his way. It was held that as his hand could not go through the hole there was no entry and the prisoner was convicted of only an attempted house-breaking.(6) Such was also the case of the accused who occupied the upper story of the house the ground floor of which was in the occupation of the complainant, and in the ceiling of which there was a trap-door which was kept closed by him. The accused forced open and removed this trap-door with intent to get into the complainant's premises. His act was held to constitute an attempt for which he was convicted.(7) Again, since house-trespass requires an entry into or remaining in a building, it follows that an entry upon the terrace or roof of a house is not a house-trespass, though it would be criminal trespass if it is made with the requisite criminal intent.(8)

4980. The entry if sufficient must be necessarily illegal (§§ 4951, 4958-4961). For no one can be convicted of this offence if he enters into the house of another by leave or license. So where A solicited B, a public servant, to receive a bribe, and B intending to entrap him sent him word to bring it to him at night which A did, the latter could not be convicted of house-trespass because he had made his entry with B's permission, whatever mental reservation B may have made, in according it to A.(9) And in such a case it could not be said that A's entry though legal became illegal as soon as he utilized it for the purpose of offering a bribe, because the purpose of his entry was known to B when he permitted it. But the case would have been otherwise if A had obtained permission merely to see B and then offered him a bribe. So where the accused legally entered the house of the complainant and then unlawfully remained there to commit an assault, the Court held it to be a case falling under this section.(10) But this case is no authority for supporting a view that a person should be necessarily guilty of house-trespass, if after legally entering the house he commits an assault. For under clause 2 of section 441, it is an essential ingredient of the offence that the accused should have unlawfully remained on the property, which implies his staying on after the withdrawal of the occupier's consent which made his entry legal. Such withdrawal could not be presumed from the mere fact that the entry was followed up by an assault, or the pilfering of some of the house-holder's things.

4981. Criminal Intent Necessary.—Indeed, it would even appear from the language used in the last section that the formation of criminal intent should have preceded the entry, or the unlawful stay. If the intention was subsequently formed, the accused might be convicted of the offence his act discloses, but it could not be aggravated by reason of

---

(6) Ghulam, 4 L. 399.
(7) Narshi, (1883) B. U. C. 188.
(8) Alla Baksh, (1887) P. R. No. 9; Fazla, (1890) P. R. No. 9; Mullua, (1900) A. W. N. 15.
(9) Kamarajee, (1887) 1 Weir 534.
(10) Rashikachari, (1883) 1 Weir 528.

the entry which facilitated its commission. The intent which makes the entry criminal is an intent to commit an offence or to intimidate, insult or annoy any person in possession of such property. Obviously then, the house trespassed into must be in the possession of some one other than the accused (§ 4956). And the entry therein must have been made with the purpose of committing an act which is punishable under the Code,[11] or which is intended to, and has the effect of, annoying the possessor. As regards these words, it will be observed that while the offence may be committed against any one not necessaily the possessor, the intimidation, insult or annoyance must be directed against and caused only to him. For example, a person entering into a hotel for the purpose of stealing lodgers' goods would be guilty of house-trespass though the offence did not affect the person in possession of the hotel. But a person entering a hotel to insult or annoy a guest staying there, would not be guilty of the same offence, unless he entered his private apartment for that purpose.[12]

4982. Again, while intimidation, insult or annoyance implies the presence of the party in possession, the commission of an offence does not. Consequently, no person could be convicted of criminal trespass for having entered upon property in the possession of another during his absence, if his intent was not to commit an offence. So where the accused entered the compound of the house of the complainant during his absence in order to carry on an intrigue, the Court quashed her conviction for trespass, holding that since her entry was not made to commit an offence, she could not be convicted of this offence for she could not have intended to annoy the complainant who was then absent.[13] This was the ratio decidendi of the case disposed of by Mahmud, J., in which the accused had been convicted of this offence for having got into his neighbour's vacant house for the purpose of answering the call of nature. The Court quashed his conviction for house-trespass because the compound he had entered was not a building, and for trespass because his entry was not to annoy the absent owner.[14] So where the accused was caught having entered the premises of a police lock-up to supply food to an under-trial prisoner, it was held that his act amounted to no offence, because the supplying of food to under-trial prisoners was no offence under the Code or under section 45, cl. iii of the Prisons Act.[15] The same view was taken of the accused, who had previously made over a child he had obtained in a famine to be brought up by the complainant, which the latter refused to part with and upon which the accused entered his house and recovered the child.[16]

The case of a trespasser effecting his entry into a house in order to have sexual intercourse with a female inmate, has been already considered (§ 4948).

For a further commentary, see s. 441.

---

(11) S. 40.

(12) Cf. 2 East., P. C., 492; Turner, 12 Leach 305; Rogers, 1 Leach 89; Carrol, 1 Leach 287—which were all, however, cases of burglaries.

(13) Chinna Thoyi, (1895) 1 Weir 518.

(14) Surja (1882) A. W. N. 224.

(15) Act XXVI of 1870; Lalai, 2 A. 301.

(16) Nawab Ali, (1885) A. W. N. 50

443. Whoever commits house-trespass having taken precautions to conceal such house-trespass from some person who has a right to exclude or eject the trespasser from the building, tent or vessel which is the subject of the trespass, is said to commit "lurking house-trespass."

Lurking house-trespass.

[Criminal trespass—s 441. House-trespass—s. 442.]

[For punishments, see sections 453, 454.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4983).
(2) What is Lurking House-trespass (4984-4989).
(3) Precautions to Conceal (4987).

4983. Analogous Law.—This section deals with a further circumstance of aggravation attending a house-trespass, namely, its lurking character. Lurking house-trespass is in itself a serious offence, and as such punishable with imprisonment which may extend up to two years,[17] but when such trespass is committed at night, its gravity is heightened and the offence is then punishable with imprisonment up to three years.[18] But the offence assumes a far more serious form, if in addition to these circumstances it has for its object the commission of an offence punishable with imprisonment, and a fortiori if that offence is theft.[19] But this is by no means the height of criminality, for the trespasser may further aggravate his offence by entering, prepared to cause hurt,[20] or grievous hurt[21] or even death.[22] In all such offences the two offences of lurking house-trespass or house-breaking underlie. The question what constitutes this offence is thus of far greater importance than it would seem at first sight.

4984. What is Lurking House-trespass?—The three essential ingredients of this offence are (i) trespass, (ii) the trespass being of the special kind designated house-trespass, and (iii) that trespass being made in a surreptitious manner, called "lurking." The first two questions have been already considered (ss. 441, 442). The last question depends upon what is house-trespass after "having taken precautions to conceal such house-trespass from some person who has a right to exclude or eject the trespasser." The section does not specify who such persons are, for the question of right is not a question within the cognizance of the Criminal Code. It is essentially a question of civil law, and criminality in this and other cognate offences depends upon the right determination of that question in the light of civil law. Now this being the case, it is clear that the person primarily entitled to eject the trespasser is the owner in physical possession of his house. But he is not the only person so entitled.

---

(17) S. 453.
(18) S. 456.
(19) S. 457.
(20) S. 458.
(21) S. 459.
(22) S. 460.

For as against a trespasser all persons in joint possession of it are equally so entitled, and so are his agents, and servants. Indeed, in an ordinary case of such trespass any person is entitled to eject the trespasser.[23]

But the case is different where of the family members one invites the trespasser to commit an offence, which the other members of the family resent. For instance, take the simple case of the wife inviting her paramour over to her house during the absence of her husband. And suppose that there is no question of consent or connivance on the part of the husband. Is the secret entry of the husband "lurking house-trespass?" It is apprehended not; because the precaution taken is to prevent the knowledge of the paramour's visit being known to the husband. There was no secrecy as against the person actually in possession of the house and having then the sole right to eject a trespasser. For the right to eject here spoken of is not a potential right possessed by an absent owner, but by one in physical possession of the property. For example, take the case of an owner leaving his house in charge of a care-taker, who invites thieves to come and rob it. The thieves enter and rob the owner during his absence, but in the presence of the care-taker. Could they be held to have committed lurking house-trespass? If it were so, every theft in an uninhabited house would be accompanied by the commission of this offence. But such, view does not appear to have commended itself to the Courts. On the other hand, the Courts have invariably punished trespassers secretly entering into other people's houses for the purpose of committing adultery, as offences of simple house-trespass. Nor could such a trespasser be punished for lurking, even if his object was theft, unless there was evidence to show that he had adopted some active means not merely to disguise his identity but to conceal his presence[24] (§§ 4987-4988).

4985. The collocation of the words "exclude or eject" is intended to convey a sense more or less similar, but one word is intended to supplement any defect discovered in the sense conveyed by the other. Primarily, however, the word "exclude" would suggest unlawfulness of the initial entry, while the word "eject" should apply to the expulsion of a person whose previous possession was not unlawful, as in the case contemplated in section 441, second clause. A person having no right to exclude may acquire the right to eject, as in the case of a lessee ejected on breach of condition. So while the husband has, ordinarily, no right of excluding his wife from joint possession of his house,[25] he acquires the right to eject her if she is guilty of unchastity.

4986. So the husband surprising the paramour of his wife invited into the house has the right of ejectment; but if on hearing of the arrival of the husband, the paramour hides himself from view, he does not commit this offence for he does not then intend to commit an offence, but to make good his escape unobserved by the husband. His

(23) S. 105.
(24) Budha, (1916) P. R. No. 21, 35 I. C. 513, 19 Cr. L. J. 609.
(25) Marimuthu, 4 M. 243.
I. C. 176; Bhagwana, 16 A. L. J. 383, 45 remaining on in the house is not then even trespass for it is not accompanied by the intention which makes that act criminal.

Precautions to Conceal.

4987. The lurking trespasser must conceal his house-trespass on purpose. If he enters an occupied house, and the owner fails to see him, he cannot be convicted of lurking for which the taking of a precaution is necessary. Such precautions must be to conceal his house-trespass, that is, both his entry and the criminal design to commit an offence. If he conceals his design but not his entry, as if he should secure welcome by assuming the garb of a Fakir he could not be convicted of this offence if after having gained admission he commits an offence, unless he does some act which amounts to lurking, as if ostensibly taking leave of the owner he hides himself in a cellar box or loft from which he crawls out when the house-hold is asleep. In such a case his offence is completed with his concealment. Nor is it necessary that the concealment should be perfect, for his criminality depends upon his attempt at concealment and not upon the success attending his effort.

4988. Since in all lurking house-trespass (or for that matter in house-breaking) there must be house-trespass, which requires entry into or remaining in a building, it follows that if the entry was upon the terrace or roof of a house the accused could not be convicted of house trespass, and a fortiori of lurking house-trespass, though he might be of criminal trespass punishable under section 447.(1)

4989. This and the following sections dealing with the aggravated forms of house-trespass must as such necessarily possess all the underlying elements of criminal trespass. But there is one aspect of that offence which is necessarily excluded by the nature of this trespass, namely, that in which the entry is made to intimidate, insult or annoy the person in possession of the property. This species of trespass is from its very nature of a comparatively less formidable character than that in which the entry is made surreptitiously, and in which the only object of the offender must be the commission of an offence (s. 441).

Lurking House trespass by night.

444. Whoever commits lurking house-trespass after sunset and before sunrise, is said to commit "lurking house-trespass by night."

[Criminal-trespass—s. 441. House-trespass—s. 442. Lurking house-trespass—s. 443.]

For punishment, see section 456.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4990). (2) Lurking House-trespass by Night (4991-4992).

4990. Analogous Law.—This section adds another aggravating circumstance to the offence of "lurking house-trespass" defined in the last section—that circumstance being the time of entry. So the breaking and entering of the dwelling house of another in the night time with intent to commit a felony therein is burglary at common law.(2) But this section eschews the ambiguous term "night time" which is said to include the portion of the day between sunset and sunrise if there was not sufficient twilight apart from moonlight to discern a man's face.(3) This naturally created even a greater uncertainty till it was set at rest by a provision of the Larceny Act,(4) which defines "the night to commence at nine of the clock in the evening of each day, and to conclude at six of the clock in the morning of the next succeeding day."

(1) Allash Baksh, (1887) P. R. No. 9.

4991. Lurking House-trespass by Night.—All lurking house-trespass by night must, to begin with, be a criminal trespass, which is an entry into or upon or remaining on the property of another with intent to commit an offence or to intimidate, insult or annoy any person in possession of such property. Now since the trespass is "lurking" there can be no question of intimidation, insult or annoyance caused to the person in possession. All such trespass must then have for its purpose, the sole intention of committing an offence. And since the offence is such a trespass committed at night, it follows that the first entry of the accused must be made after sunset and before sunrise. If therefore, the accused effected his entry into the building before sunset, and after sunset he entered the apartment he intended to rob, he could not be convicted of this offence, though he would be guilty of the offence described in the last section.

4992. A person who lawfully enters a house may be guilty of this offence, if he unlawfully remains therein after sunset. So if the owner should invite two men to a feast and one of them should conceal himself in the house at night, and the other being questioned about his companion should falsely assure the owner that he had taken leave, both may be convicted—the former of this offence and the latter of abetment.

445. A person is said to commmit "house-breaking" who commits house-trespass if he effects his entrance into the house or any part of it in any of the six ways hereinafter described; or if, being in the house or any part of it for the purpose of committing an offence, or, having committed an offence therein, he quits the house or any part of it in any of such six ways, that is to say—

House-breaking.

First.—If he enters or quits through a passage made by himself, or by any abettor of the house-trespass, in order to the committing of the house-trespass.

(2) 3 Co. Inst. 63; 4 Black. 224; 2 Stephen Hist. Cr. L., 56; 3 ib., 150; Polly, 1 C. & K. 77.

(3) 3 Co. Inst. 63; 1 Hale 550; 1 Hawk c. 31, s. 2; 4 Black 224.

(4) 24 & 25 Vict., c. 99, s. 1, re-enacting 7 Will. IV & 1 Vict., c. 86, s. 4.

Secondly.—If he enters or quits through any passage not intended by any person, other than himself or an abettor of the offence, for human entrance; or through any passage to which he has obtained access by scaling or climbing over any wall or building.

Thirdly.—If he enters or quits through any passage which he or any abettor of the house-tresspass has opened, in order to the committing of the house-trespass by any means by which that passage was not intended by the occupier of the house to be opened.

Fourthly.—If he enters or quits by opening any lock in order to the committing of the house-trespass or in order to the quitting of the house after house-trespass.

Fifthly.—If he effects his entrance or departure by using criminal force or committing an assault or by threatening any person with assault.

Sixthly.—If he enters or quits by any passage which he knows to have been fastened against such entrance or departure and to have been unfastened by himself or by an abettor of the house-trespass.

Explanation—Any out-house, or building occupied with a house and between which and such house there is an immediate internal communication, is part of the house within the meaning of this section.

Illustrations.

(a) A commits house-trespass by making a hole through the wall of Z's house and putting his hand through the aperture. This is house breaking.

(b) A commits house-trespass by creeping into a ship at a port hole between decks. This is house-breaking.

(c) A commits house-trespass by entering Z's house through a window. This is house-breaking.

(d) A commits house-trespass by entering Z's house through the door, having opened a door which was fastened. This is house-breaking.

(e) A commits house-trespass by entering Z's house through the door, having lifted a latch by putting a wire through a hole in the door. This is house breaking.

(f) A finds the key of Z's house door, which Z had lost, and commits house-trespass by entering Z's house, having opened the door with that key. This is house-breaking.

(g) Z is standing in his doorway. A forces a passage by knocking Z down and commits house-trespass by entering the house. This is house-breaking.

(h) Z, the door-keeper of Y, is standing in Y's doorway. A commits house-trespass by entering the house, having deterred Z from opposing him by threatening to beat him. This is house-breaking.

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (4993).
(2) What is House-breaking (4994-5002).
(3) Opening by Servant (5002).
(4) What Entry is Essential (5003).
(5) What is Included in the term "House" (5004-5005).

4993. Analogous Law.—The term "house-breaking" is a term of English law, the offence being now punishable by Statute.(5) But in English law the term has not been defined at all, though it is used there in the same sense as here.

The explanation is taken from the English Statute,(6) which enacts as follows:—

"No building although within the same curtilage with any dwelling-house, and occupied therewith, shall be deemed to be part of such dwelling-house for any of the purposes of this Act, unless there shall be a communication between such building and dwelling-house, either immediate or by means of a covered and inclosed passage leading from the one to the other."

4994. What is House-breaking?—The laws of all civilized countries, in their especial regard for the safety and security of the habitation of man, have adopted means to prescribe deterrent punishments for the forcible invasion of the dwelling houses of another for the purpose of crime; and in doing so they pay no regard to the time of the day, considering an attack upon the security and privacy of one's home sufficiently flagrant to merit drastic measures irrespective of the hour of darkness which, however, the Code classes as a distinct aggravation, and which is reflected in the higher penalty prescribed in section 456.

4995. The term "house-breaking" implies a forcible entry into a house "to break a house" being a legal phrase used to mean the removal or setting aside with violence and a felonious intent any part of a house or of the fastenings provided to secure it.(7) The section enumerates six ways of breaking, but if they are examined they will be found to reduce themselves into two main sub-heads: (i) clauses 1—3 being those in which the entry is effected by means of a passage which is not the ordinary means of access to it, and (ii) the remaining clauses being those in which the entry is effected by use of force. So illustrations (a), (b) and (c) refer to the former while the remaining five illustrations are intended to show the working of the remaining clauses. All these clauses, however, only relate to the mode of ingress, and egress, which alone converts house-trespass into house-breaking. But the act must, to begin with, amount to house-trespass—that is to say, it must be an entry made into any building, tent or vessel with intent to commit an offence or to intimidate, insult or annoy the person in possession, or if the entry was lawful, then the trespasser must illegally stay in the building with that intent. While on the subject of lurking house-trespass, it was remarked that since the lurker commits his trespass by taking care to conceal his presence from the owner, he could not intend to intimidate, insult or annoy him from whom he remains in studied concealment. His only object should then be to commit an offence. Such, however, need not necessarily be the object of the house-breaker, whose entry though forcible may not be clandestine, and who may have forced his way into the house merely to overawe and annoy the possessor.

(5) Larceny Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict., c. 96, s. 56).
(6) 24 & 25 Vict., c. 96, s. 53, re-enacting, 7 & 8 Geo. IV, c. 29, s. 8.
(7) Sw. braka, to crack, or break to cause a breach, etc.

4996. The lurker and house-breaker are classed together in the ensuing sections as being alike, but though they are so in a sense it is not necessary that they should share common purpose and intention. Again, a person may be both a lurker as well as a house-breaker, as when he steals into a house through the usual passage and being detected committing an offence, escapes by one of the six means of house-breaking. It is not necessary that either the lurker or the house-breaker should commit an offence. But if he had entered for the purpose of committing an offence, then even his egress by one of the six ways would amount to house-breaking, but which would not be the case if his entry was not to commit an offence, but merely to annoy an inmate. So it is said that "if, being in the house or any part of it for the purpose of committing an offence" he breaks the house even if he quits by any of the six ways enumerated in the section.

But as remarked before, this is not the only object for which he may be there. For if his entry was made for that purpose, it is not necessary that he should have actually committed the offence for which he had effected the entry. All that is necessary is that his ingress must amount to house-trespass, and his ingress, or if he had entered to commit an offence, then, his egress should be made in the unusual manner described in the six ensuing clauses. It is not necessary that the means so adopted should enable him to make good his escape. All that is required is that he should "quit the house or any part of it" in any of those ways. If, therefore, he quits a room of the house and then avails himself of the ordinary means of exit he is guilty of house-breaking. So if a thief enter the inner room of a house to steal and the owner waking up stand at the door to bar his way, and the thief should thereupon push him aside and attempt to escape, he would be guilty of this offence, though he may have used the ordinary passages to clear out of it.[8]

4997. Adverting now to the six ensuing clauses, it will be observed that the first clause deals with a case of the kind presented in illustration (a) which is the case of actual breaking, other instances of which may be found in the breaking of a door or window, picking the lock of a door or opening it with a false key, or even by lifting a latch, or unloosening any other fastening to doors or windows, which the owner has provided.[9] So is an entry effected by the removal of a glass of a door[10] or a window,[11] or

Clauses 1 and 2.

(8) See Fifthly, s. 445.
(9) 3 Co. Inst. 64; 1 Hale P. C. 552; Pugh v. Griffith, 7 A. & E. 827 (836).
(10) Smith, R. & R. 417.
(11) Perker, C. & P. 300; Tucker, 1 Cox. 73.

removing even a broken pane of glass.[12] The first three clauses refer to a passage made[13] or opened,[14] and one not intended for human entrance.[15] The making of a passage would apply to an act by which a new passage is made, as by making a hole in the wall, by undermining the house, cutting a hole in the roof, or the like. The opening of the passage by adopting means by which it was not intended to be opened would cover those cases in which the door or window or any other opening is unfastened by removal of the glass, hasp, bolt or chain by which it was secured. Such would be the case where the intruder pulled down the sash of a window which had no fastening, and only kept in its place by the pulley-weight,[16] or where he raised a sash-window which was shut down close, but not fastened, though it had a hasp which might have been fastened,[17] or where he pushed open a window which was fastened with wedges, but so that it could be opened by pushing against it,[18] or where he got in by lifting up the heavy flap of a caller which was not bolted,[19] or by removing the bolt of a window by inserting the hand through a broken pane which broke some more of the pane.[20]

Clause 2.

4998. Lastly, an entry effected through a passage not intended for human ingress or egress also constitutes house-breaking. Such would be the case if the entry is effected by scaling a wall,[21] or by getting down the chimney,[22] or through a gutter main or other opening such as an air-hole, the skylight or the like. Illustration (b) is an example of what is here intended.

Clauses 4 and 6.

4999. In all these three modes of effecting a passage, the offender devises means which, though desperate, have nothing to do with the use of criminal force. Clauses fourthly and sixthly also refer to an ingress or egress similarly effected. Indeed, the picking of a lock or opening it with a false key is an instance of actual breaking and so treated in English Law (§ 4997), and so is also the making of a passage by unfastening any passage, referred to in the last clause. This clause has been sometimes extended to cover the case of the removal of a tatti placed against the door of the hut of the poor villagers in this country, and there is no reason why it should not be, if the tatti was somehow fastened, it may be, with a bar or string, so long as it is fastened to prevent the entry of offenders. The fact that it was wholly insecure is nothing, for such was the window in the English cases before cited,[23] but which did not prevent the Courts from holding the offence to be house-breaking.

(12) Bird 9 C. & P. 44, Robinson, 1 Wood C. C. 327.
(13) First.
(14) Thirdly.
(15) Secondly.
(16) Haines, R. & R. 451.
(17) Hyams, 7 C. & P. 441.
(18) Hall, R. & R. 355.
(19) Russell, 1 Moo. C. C. 377.
(20) Robinson, 1 Mood C. C. 327.
(21) Emldad Ally, 2 W. R. 65.
(22) Hawk, c. 38, s. 6; 1 Hale 552; Brice R. & R. 450. But in Lewis 2 C. & P. 628, and Spriggs, 1 W. & Rob 357, it was held that entry through an aperture in the cellar window to admit light was not burglary.
(23) Haines, R. & R. 451; Hyams 7 C. & P. 441.

5000. All these four clauses are thus instances of actual breaking in English Law. Clause 5, however, deals with the case of constructive breaking, in which the ingress or egress is made, by the use of, or threat of using, criminal force. So Blackstone, referring to this rule says: "So also to knock at the door, and upon opening it to rush in with a felonious intent; or, under pretence of taking lodgings, to fall upon the landlord and to rob him; or to procure a constable to gain admittance in order to search for traitors, and then to bind the constable and rob the house; all these entries have been adjudged burglarious, though there was no actual breaking: for the law will not suffer itself to be trifled with by such evasions, especially under the clock of legal process."(24)

Clause 5.

5001. The last clause refers to entry effected by unchaining a door, or causing it to be opened by an accomplice from within. If the door was neither chained nor locked but was merely shut, the opening of it by a push would not amount to house-breaking.(25)

Clause 6.

5002. Under English Law, if a servant conspire with a robber, and let him into the house by night, it is burglary in both.(1) But if the servant pretend to agree to let in a robber intending to entrap him, it is no burglary, for the door is then lawfully opened.(2) So it is no burglary if a person leave his doors and windows open and another to enter therein with intent to commit a felony.(3) The last case would be similarly regarded in this country, and as for the first two cases they would be both treated as cases of lurking house-trespass which in point of criminality is the same as this offence.

Opening by Servant.

5003. What Entry is Essential?—In all cases of house-breaking there must be an entry or egress. The subject of entry has been before alluded to.(4) It will, therefore, suffice here to state that the entry of any part of the human body is sufficient. In England, not only the intrusion of a hand or a finger,(5) but even the insertion of any instrument held in the hand has been held to be sufficient.(6) So the insertion of a hook or other instrument into a window to draw out goods, or the pointing of a pistol to demand one's money have been held to be burglarious entries.(7) So it was held to be a sufficient entry where the accused put in his hand through a pane of glass broken by him for the purpose of undoing the window-latch.(8) In view of the explanation appended to s. 442, it may, however, be doubted if the insertion of an instrument such as a bill-hook or the like without the introduction of the felon's body would be sufficient entry for the purpose of this Code.

(24) 4 Black, pp. 226, 227.
(25) Ledga, 66 I. C. (N.) 422, 23 Cr. L. J. 278; a fortiori, if the entrance is open or has no door; Budha (1916) P. R. No. 21, 35 I. C. 176; 17 Cr. L. J. 304.
(1) Cornwall, 2 Str. 881; 1 Hale, 553; 1 Hawk., c. 38, s. 14.
(2) Johnson, C. & Mar. 218.
(3) 3 Co., Inst. 64; 1 Hale 551.
(4) Davis, R. & R. 499.
(5) Ib.; but in Hughes, 1 Leach 406; Roberts, 2 East. P. C. 487; O'Brien, 4 Cox. 400, this must be done with felonious intent, e.g., to draw out goods.
(6) 1 Hale 555; Fost 108; 1 Hawk, c. 38, ss. 11, 12; 3 Co. Inst. 64.
(7) Bailey, R. & R. 341.
(8) 1 Hawk., c. 38, s. 35; 1 Hale 557.

5004. What is Included in the Term "House"?—As remarked before the explanation extends the meaning of the term "house" as mentioned in the first paragraph, by including therein any outhouse or building if it is connected therewith by an immediate internal communication (§ 4993). Under English law, from which the explanation is taken, such communication may either be immediate or by means of a covered and inclosed passage. The term "house" in this section has been used in the same sense as a "building used as a human dwelling or any building used as a place for worship or as a place for the custody of property," within the meaning of s. 442. This reference to the house in the first clause would seem to confine the operation of this section only to a building as such, excluding therefrom a "tent or vessel" similarly used. But illustration (b) shows that a "vessel" was at any rate not intended to be excluded. There then remains the tent, and a question may arise whether it was also intended to be similarly included. In England it is laid down that theft in a tent or booth in a market, or fair is not burglary because it is a temporary and not a permanent edifice,[8] but a tent may of course be the subject of "house-trespass," and as house-trespass is the foundation of this offence, "the house" in the first paragraph was probably intended to be used in its generic sense as including the building, tent or vessel in respect of which the "house-trespass" was committed.

Explanation.

5005. The term "house" is not then synonymous with building, but comprises something more. And when it is used in the sense of a building it includes all outhouses connected with it by means of "an immediate internal communication." The "communication" here means a passage, and the passage must be both immediate and internal. Now the question whether the two houses possess an immediate common passage depends upon their construction. For example, suppose there are three or more rooms in a row, in the manner of a barrack or the railway porters' quarters, and suppose each room communicates with the others by means of a doorway in the party wall; here the three rooms though belonging to and occupied by three different households amount really to one house within the meaning of this section, so that a person robbing all the three occupants at the same time, would be guilty of only one house-breaking.[9] But if the three rooms did not intercommunicate by a common passage, as is ordinarily the case, then the fact that they were mutually accessible by each opening on to the road, would not make them parts of the same house though they may be parts of the same block. So it has been held, that if the owner of the house reside in a part of it, and let the rest out in lodgings, then if the part occupied by the lodger be severed from that occupied by the owner, that is, if there be no external communication between them, and the lodger and the owner enter the house by different outer doors, a burglary in the part occupied by each respectively must be held to have been committed in the dwelling house of the person so occupying it; but if they be not severed, and the lodger and owner enter by the

(8) 1 Hawk., c 38, s. 35; 1 Hale 557.

(9) From Ger. burg, a house, and larron, a thief; or O. Fr., burg.

outer door, then the burglary must be held to have been committed in the dwelling-house of the owner(10)

There may be an immediate internal communication between two houses, and yet the right of passage may depend upon mutual consent, as where two adjoining lodgers use a common doorway by possessing duplicate keys.

House-breaking by night.

446. Whoever commits house-breaking after sunset and before sunrise, is said to commit "house-breaking by night."

[Criminal trespass—s. 441. House-trespass—s. 442. House-breaking—s. 445.]

[For punishment, see ss. 457, 458.]

Synopsis.

Analogous Law (5006).

5006. Analogous Law.—The last section defines "house-breaking" which may be at any hour of the day or night. This section describes the offence of "house-breaking by night" which is burglary(11) of English law, which is defined in the books as "breaking and entering the mansion-house of another in the night, with intent to commit some felony within the same, whether such felonious intent be executed or not."(12) Originally, time was immaterial for the purpose of the offence,(13) but it is now of the very essence of the offence. And so now it is provided by Statute as follows(14):—

"S. 51. Whosoever shall enter the dwelling-house of another with intent to commit any felony therein, or being in such dwelling-house shall commit any felony therein, and shall in either case break out of the said dwelling-house in the night shall be deemed guilty of burglary."

This section merely supplements the common law definition of burglary.

The question when the sun sets and rises may not sometimes be the subject of ocular demonstration. In that case the fact will have to be proved by reference to the astronomical calculation fixing the time at which the sun rises and sets in a given locality.

For a further commentary on the offence defined in this section, reference should be made to s. 456.

Bailable. Summons. Cognizable. Any Mag. Comp. Summary.

Punishment for criminal trespass.

447. Whoever commits criminal trespass shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

[Criminal trespass—s. 441.]

(10) 1 Leach, n; 2 East. P. C. 503; Gibbons, R. & R. 442.

(11) 3 Inst. 63; 1 Hale 549; 1 Hawk, P. C., c. 38, s. 1; 4 Black 224.

(12) 1 Bac. Abr., tit. "Burglary" (1807 Ed.), 539.

(13) Larceny Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict., c. 96), s. 51.

(14) This section re-enacts, 7 & 8 Geo. IV, c. 29, s. 11.

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5007).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5013).
(3) Proof (5013).
(4) Form of Charge (5014-5015).
(5) Evidence of Criminal Trespass (5016-5020).
(6) Defence (5018).
(7) No Criminal Trespass. (5021-A).

5007. Analogous Law.—Section 441 defines a "criminal trespass" and this section prescribes a punishment for it—when it is an offence of the simplest kind and not otherwise provided for.

5008. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable but summons should, ordinarily, issue in the first instance. It is bailable and compoundable, and is triable by any Magistrate, and summarily.

5009. Since the entry or illegal stay on the land is one act, the accused could be only once convicted for it, and if after his conviction he persists in remaining on the land and does not give up his possession, he could not be convicted again and again for the same act so long as he does not give up possession.[15] Where the accused entered a forest and cut down reserved trees he could not be convicted both of this offence as well as under s. 52 of the forest Act.[16]

5010. The question who could be the complainant in this case is one upon which the Courts are not agreed, the Calcutta High Court being divided on the question, it being held in one case that the only person competent to complain is the person in actual possession of the property and who is competent to compromise the case.[17] But this view has not been concurred in in another case of the same Court,[18] and in Bombay[19] this offence has been held to be no exception to the general rule that any person is competent to set the criminal law in motion. But this view may at times lead to awkward results. One thing however, seems certain, that not only the person in possession of land but also its owner has the right to complain of trespassers as he has equally with the occupier and right to turn out trespassers whose possession is adverse to his ownership.[20] The person who complains is entitled to compromise the case. The fact that he had complained for his master does not confer on the latter the power to control the compromise.[21]

5011. The question whether a trespasser committing an offence is liable to the cumulative punishments for trespass as well as the offence committed, must be answered in the light of s. 441 and s. 71, where the subject will be found more fully discussed. It will, however, suffice here to state that since the actual commission of an offence is no part of the offence of trespass, there is nothing against the accused being

(15) Ma Heaya, (1908) 4 L. B. R. 276.
(16) Rup Deb, 11 A. L. J. 340, 20 I. C. 408, 14 Cr. L. J. 424.
(17) Chandi v. Evans, 22 C. 123; to the same effect, Nga Po Tok, 49 I. C. (R.) 99, 20 Cr. L. J. 115; Avudayappa, (1923) M. W. N. 451, 74 I. C. 856, 24 Cr. L. J. 824, (1924) A. I. R. (M.) 40; and see § 4956.
(18) Prayag Singh v. Morgan, 25 C. W. N. 425, 62 I. C. 190, 22 Cr. L. J. 494.
(19) Kesavlal, 21 B. 536.
(20) Fakir Chand v. Fakir, 69 I. C. 379, 23 Cr. L. J. 699.
(21) Harbons, 22 A. L. J. 820.

convicted for both, though[22] in such a case it may be a question whether the trespass was not a part of the major offence committed.

5012. The High Court has no jurisdiction to permit, on revision, the compromise of an accused convicted under this section.[23] A person convicted of this offence cannot be bound over under section 106 of the Criminal Procedure Code since the offence is not one involving a breach of peace,[24] but it is permissible to doubt the soundness of this view.[25]

5013. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the complainant had possession of the property in question.

(2) That the accused entered into or upon the property, or that he unlawfully remained there after having lawfully entered therein or thereon.

(3) That he so entered or remained there with the intention[1]—

(a) to commit an offence;

(b) to intimidate, insult or annoy the person in possession.

5014. Charge.—The charge when necessary should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you committed criminal trespass by entering into (or upon) (or by illegally remaining on) the land (describe it) then in the possession of A B, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 447 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

"And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge."

5015. A person cannot be convicted of this offence on a charge under section 147 where the common object is not specified to be criminal trespass.[2] For a conviction under this section it is necessary, and certainly desirable to specify the offence the accused intended to commit,[3] or at any rate, that he intended to commit an offence of some kind,[4] though the rulings on the subject of specifying the offence are not unanimous.[5]

5016. Evidence of Criminal Trespass—This section prescribes punishment for an offence which is generally defined in section 441.

---

(22) S. 235, ill. (b), Cr. P. C.

(23) Akshoy v. Rameswar, 43 C. 1143.

(24) Muthiah Chetty, 29 M. 190; Pantanbi, 19 M. L. J. 66.

(25) Jareni v. Gourikant, 7 C. W. N. 25.

(1) Which must be stated in the charge and proved Bhagwant Rao (1925) N. 50.

(2) Salamut Ali, 23 W. R. 59; Ariff Munshi, 18 C. W. N. 992, 22 I. C. 764.

(3) Rayapadayachi, 19 M. 240; Venkataramanuja, 6 M. L. T. 262; 3 I. C. 828.

(4) Kurnam Seshayya, 21 M. L. T. 781; 11 I. C. 797; 12 Cr. L. J. 453.

(5) Kurnam Seshayya, 21 M. L. T. 781; 11 I. C. 797; Samban, 1 Weir 533.

It has been there pointed out that this is an offence in which care should be taken that an entry which may amount to a bare civil trespass is not made the subject of a criminal prosecution. Unfortunately it is one of those sections in which the trial of the accused is often entrusted to inexperienced hands, though it requires a grasp of the principles and knowledge of civil law without which it is easy to confound civil with criminal trespass. The essential ingredients of this offence are of course (i) an unlawful entry, (ii) into or upon immoveable property, (iii) in the possession of another, (iv) with intent to commit offence or to intimidate insult or annoy the person in possession of such property.

5017. As has been pointed out before, of all these elements the last is the most important, inasmuch as it distinguishes a criminal act from what may be a purely civil trespass. Reasons have been already given for confining the word "intent" to mean actual as distinct from constructive intention (§§ 4940-4947) The fact that a trespass causes or was likely to cause annoyance to the person in possession is only of evidentiary value in determining the intention of the accused. It is of itself insufficient to justify a conviction on the assumption that every man is presumed to intend the natural consequence of his act.(6) As a maxim of English Law this presumption may be justifiable in highly penal acts where the act and effect are so closely akin as to have been necessarily indissolubly present in the accused's mind, but it is obviously inapplicable to an unlawful entry upon the land of another.

The question of intention is, however, a question of fact, but whether it has been legally inferred from a set of facts is a question of law. The fact that the trespasser knows that his act, if discovered, will be likely to cause annoyance to the person in possession does not make the entry criminal.(7) Such knowledge may be presumed on the part of any one disturbing another's possession, but he is not on that account criminally punishable. Nor does the fact that the entry was unlawful and made with an intention to obtain improper gain necessarily imply an intention to cause annoyance, which must be further proved.(8) How it must be proved must depend upon the circumstances of each case.(9) Where the intent charged is the commission of an offence the best proof of intention is no doubt the commission of the offence, itself.(10) If does not appear that criminal intent can be proved by evidence of other acts of a similar character. But a similar attempt or entry made on a previous occasion confronted by resistance from the person in possession would be evidence that it was intentional and not merely accidental. But it is quite another thing to say that because the accused had trespassed into the field of A on a previous occasion, therefore, his trespass into B's field must be criminal.

(6) Jiwan Singh, (1908) P. R. No. 17; Lakshman Raghunath, 26 B. 558.
(7) Rayapadayachi, 19 M. 240; Gaya Bhat, 38 A. 517; Tharu, 5 S. L. R. 29, 9 I. C. 895.
(8) Ganpat Ramshet, (1888) B. U. C. 390.
(9) Balmakund Ram v. Ghansamram, 22 C. 391 (406).
(10) Locost, Kel (J.) 30.

Defences.

5018. The defences open to the accused to rebut the charge may be (i) lawfulness of the entry; (ii) bona fide belief in the right of entry; and of course (iii) denial of the entry itself. He is further entitled to show that (iv) the complaint had not been laid by the person in possession; (v) that the complainant was not in possession at all; or that (vi) if in possession he had consented to the entry.[11] Again, since the offence may be legally compounded, a previous composition of the case is a bar to a prosecution for this offence.

5019. Apart from intent, the prosecution have to establish an entry on the part of the accused on land in the possession of the complainant. The latter must then establish his own actual possession on the date of the entry, which cannot be presumed from the mere fact that a decree for possession stood in his name.[12] What he has to establish is that the decree was put into execution and that he was given possession which he retained up to the moment of the trespass. It sometimes happenes that the complainant with a doubtful claim to possession, shifts his ground by charging the accused with theft. But in this case the question of possession still remains material, for if a person trespasses on land in the possession of another and sows a crop, he does not become entitled to the crops, and he who has possession of the land commits no offence whether of theft or criminal trespass if he removes the crop and appropriates it to his own use.[13] For in such a case, the maxim Quicquid plantatur solo solo cedit[14] applies.

So Adamson, C. J., of Lower Burmah, said: "if a person trespasses on land in the possession of another and sows paddy on it, that does not entitle him to property in the paddy that results from the sowing, and if a person in possession of land reaps and removes paddy that has been sown on it by a trespasser, he does not therefore commit theft.[15] A fortiori where the accused cannot be convicted of theft, he cannot be convicted of this offence. So where the accused was charged with theft of rice plants, but acquitted on the ground that the prosecution had failed to prove that the accused had not sown the crop, but the Magistrate convicted him of criminal trespass; and it was held that the conviction was inconsistent with the acquittal for theft "inasmuch as the rice plants had been sown by, and were the property of the accused, he would have been entitled to remove them, and could not properly have been treated as a criminal trespasser for so doing."[16]

5020. The question of actual possession—possession which must be at least juridical (§ 4952) if not coupled with title is then one which may sometimes raise wider issues. But the Court is not bound to go into them, but must confine its inquiry to the fact of possession

---

(11) Nand Singh, 26 P. L. R. 247.
(12) In Tok v. In Sham Ma, (1894) 1 U. B. R. 262.
(13) Nga Hmyin, 3 L. B. R. 199; 4 Cr. L. J. 465.
(14) "Whatever is fixed to the soil becomes a part of the soil and goes with it."
(15) Nga Hmyin, (1906) 3 L. B. R. (199).
(16) Oomerkhan, (1865) B. U. C. 4.

and only such facts as make it worthy of protection[17] (§§ 4956-4960). So while a co-sharer would be guilty of trespass if he constructed a building despite the protests of his other co-sharer, he counld not be convicted of criminal trespass on that account inasmuch as his intention would then be traced to the assertion of his right to the property rather than to an intention to annoy his co-sharer.[18] So the mere fact of re-entry into or remaining upon the land from which a person has been ejected by civil process, or of which possession has been given to another for the purpose of asserting rights he may have solely or jointly with other persons, is not criminal trespass, unless his act can be traced to the intention which makes it criminal.[19] The fact that the person claiming to retain possession has no title, is immaterial. It is equally immaterial that he would be ejected by the Civil Court. What is material is whether he has a sufficient claim to be called bona fide or a sufficiently long possession to be called juridical. And when there is neither, there may be yet some other intention beyond the mere intention to annoy. So where the accused entered upon the bund of the prosecutor to save his own house from flood he could not be held guilty of either mischief or trespass.[20]

5021. No Criminal Trespass.—In the following cases the Court have refused to convict the person charged of this offence Where a co-sharer erected a building upon common after his co-sharers had refused him permission to build on it,[21] where the complainant had ejected the accused, but the latter entered upon the land to prevent the complainant from harvesting the crops he had raised.[22] The fact that a person is liable to ejectment does not render his possession as that of a criminal trespasser.[23] The accused was ejected from the land and formal possession given to the landlord. He appealed against the decree and during its pendency resumed possession. He was convicted but later on the appellate Court reversed the decree for ejectment and the High Court quashed his conviction holding that his resumption of possession was without the intention mentioned in s. 441.[24] A school was built by public subscription and placed in charge of a teacher who had to lock up the school building, as his pupils all left and joined a rival school. The accused who were some of the managers of this school broke open the lock and began to hold it in that building. The Court held that as they had no intention to annoy the complainant they could not be punished for this offence.[25] Of two brothers who owned a house, one mortgaged it with possession, and the other leased it to the complainant who was given physical possession. In the absence of the complainant the mortgagee locked up the house. It was held to constitute no offence.[1]

(17) Ramdayal Mundle, 7 W. R. 28. Surwan Singh, 11 W. R. 11.

(18) Ram Sarup, 36 A. 474; Akshoy v. Rameswar, 43 C. 1143; contra Lakshman, 26 B. 558.

(19) Gobind Prasad, 2 A. 465; Appanda, (1915) M. W. N. 275, 28 I. C. 159.

(20) Modan Mondal, 41 C. 662.

(21) Ram Sarup, 36 A. 474.

(22) Appanda Natha, (1915) M. W. N. 275, 28 I. C. 159, 16 Cr. L. J. 271.

(23) Wir Singh, (1915) P. L. R. 170; 30 I. C. 455, 16 Cr. L. J. 631; Jagan Dubey, 45 I. C. (Pat.) 677, 19 Cr. L. J. 629.

(24) Bhagwan Din, 16 A. L. J. 501, 46 I. C. 160, 19 Cr. L. J. 704.

(25) Narain Das, 17 A. L. J. 334, 51 I. C. 351, 20 Cr. L. J. 463.

(1) Shadi Ram, 50 I. C. (L.) 834, 20 Cr. L. J. 354; Jambulinga, 47 M. L. J. 437.

Any Mag. Cognizable. Summons. Bailable. Comp. Summary.

448. Whoever commits house-trespass shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Punishment for house-trespass.

[House-trespass—s. 442.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5022).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5023).
(3) Proof (5024).
(4) Form of Charge (5025).
(5) Evidence of House-trespass (5026).

5022. Analogous Law.—This offence is defined in section 442, and this section provides punishment for it when it is not otherwise provided for. If the house-trespass was of any of the aggravated forms specially provided for in the ensuing sections, it must be dealt with as such and cannot be punished under this section.

House-trespass as such, is a simple entry into or remaining in the "building, tent or vessel" used as a human dwelling or as a place of worship or for the custody of property. under English law the mere entry into the house of another if made with intent to intimidate, insult or annoy him is not indictable, but if the entry is made with intent to commit felony then the felon is deemed guilty of burglary and is liable to punishment as such;[2] and which under the Statute is penal servitude for life.[3] The distinction between entry into a place of divine worship and a mansion-house is, again, one which the English law regards as of some moment. the former being treated as sacrilege and for which the offender if he breaks and enters any church or other place of divine worship and commits any felony therein, and being in such place commits a felony and breaks out of the same, is held liable to penal servitude for life.[4] There are, however, other provisions against brawling in such places[5] which provide against disturbances. Such cases would have to be dealt with either under this section, or as a public nuisance under section 296 of the Code.

5023. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable but summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both bailable and compoundable, and is triable by any Magistrate, and summarily.[6] The husband being in possession of the house an entry permitted by the wife does not justify the trespass.[7] But where the accused had entered the complainant's house at the invitation of his mistress with whom the accused was carrying on an intrigue and on the appearance of the complainant he concealed himself, it was held

(2) Larceny Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict., c. 96), s. 51, re-enacting 7 & 8 Geo. IV, c. 29, s. 11.
(3) Ib., s. 52.
(4) Ib., s. 50.
(5) 1 Mar., St. 2, c. 3; 1 Eliz., c. 2; 1 Will. & Mary, c. 18, s. 15; 52 Geo. III, c. 155; 2 & 3 Will. IV, c. 115; 9 & 10 Vict., c. 59.
(6) S. 260 (i), Cr. P. C.
(7) Bishan Singh, 74 I. C. (L.) 534, 24 Cr. L. J. 790; Chatter Singh, (1919) U. B. R. 194.

to amount to no trespass as his concealment rebutted the intention to annoy and his entry could not be held to be for the purpose of committing adultery with the complainant's mistress.(8)

For other points of practice, see (§§ 5008-5012.)

5024. Proof. The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the complainant had possession of the property in question.

(2) That such property was a building, tent or vessel used as a human dwelling or any dwelling used as a place of worship or as a place for the custody of property.

(3) That the accused entered into such building or having lawfully entered, unlawfully remained there.

(4) That he did so with intent to commit an offence or to intimidate, insult or annoy the person in possession.

5025. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you committed house trespass by entering into (or unlawfully remaining on) the house in the possession of A B, with intent to commit the offence of (or to intimidate, insult or annoy the said A B) and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 448 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

"And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge."

5026. Evidence of House-trespass.—House-trespass is an aggravated form of criminal trespass, the aggravating circumstance being that the property trespassed upon is a human habitation, the privacy and security of which is insured by law, by providing against its invasion by trespassers who violate its sanctity by intruding therein for the purpose of carrying out their criminal purpose. Such purpose may be either to annoy any of the inmates or to commit an offence. In the former case, the trespasser must necessarily get into a house where there is some one in possession, and whom he wishes to "intimidate, insult or annoy." If therefore, the accused enters a house to annoy, but not the person in possession, he could not be convicted of this offence, though he may, by his annoyance, render himself liable to a suit for damages. This shows that the mere unauthorized entry of one into the house of another is not punishable as a trespass, unless it was accompanied by a criminal intent of the kind specified in section 441. But such intent may probably be inferred from entry made in spite of protest.(9) Where, however, the entry is made with intent to commit an offence the question does not present the same difficulty, for it is then an offence independently of the presence of the person in possession. And in such a case the actual commission of the offence is not necessary, for all that the section requires is that the entry should have been effected with that intent. If the intent is accomplished, the accused may render himself liable to a further prosecution for offence. The thing trespassed into must, however, be a building, tent or vessel used as a human dwelling, or any building used as a place for worship or as a place for the custody of property. Tents and vessels not used as human dwelling but only used for the custody of property are thus excluded, so that an entry thereinto would be only punishable as a simple trespass. So if a tent is used as a meeting place or for divine worship, trespass thereinto has not the same effect as a trespass into a building. The term "human dwelling" implies a place used for human residence. A refreshment tent put up for a temporary purpose is not such a place, though the cook may sleep therein to guard its contents. So again, although a place may have been intended for and at one time used as a human dwelling, still it does not continue to remain as a human dwelling if it was discarded or abandoned at the time of the trespass.(10) For the same reason a building no longer used as a place for worship or for the custody of property would fall out of the category of a building, the protection of which is enjoined by section 442.

(8) Rupa, 22 O. C. 121, 52 I. C. 275, 20 Cr. L. J. 610.

(9) Lakshman Raghunath, 26 B. 568. The rest of this judgment in which Fulton, J., held that intent cannot be treated as identical with "wish" or "desire" is not in accordance with the accepted connotation of that concept. The subject will be found discussed before §§ 4942-4945 contra in Ram Sarup, 36 A. 474.

For a further commentary, see s. 442 (§§ 4974-4982).

Session. Cognizable. Warrant. Not bail. Not comp.

House-trespass in order to commit offence punishable with death.

449. Whoever commits house-trespass in order to the committing of any offence punishable with death, shall be punished with transportation for life or with rigorous imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[House-trespass—s. 442.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5027).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5028).
(3) Proof (5029).
(4) Form of Charge (5030).
(5) House-trespass to Commit capital Offence (5031).

5027. Analogous Law.—The phraseology of this section differs from other analogous sections in which the language used is "having made preparation for causing death"(11) or the like. But the meaning is in each case the same. For a person who trespassed in order to the committing of any offence punishable with death, must have made at least some preparation for causing death, for otherwise he could not be convicted for a mere intention not manifested in any overt act. The design to commit such offence must have been already made, and the trespass must have been committed in prosecution of that design. In short, in order to justify a conviction for this offence, there must be evidence of an intention formed to commit such offence, and that in furtherence of it the accused committed trespass. Evidence of preparation is not necessary, but it is admissible as shewing intent.

(10) S. 382.

(11) S. 382.

5028. Procudure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session.

5029. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused committed house-trespass.

(2) That he did so in order to commit an offence punishable with death.

5030. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you committed house trespass by entering into (or unlawfully remaining in) the building (or tent or vessel) of A B, used as a human dwelling (or for the custody of property) in order to the committing of the offence of——which is punishable with death, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 449 of the Indian Penal Code and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court.)

"And I hereby direct that you be tried by said Court on the said charge."

5031. House-trespass to Commit Capital Offence.—All the offences punishable with death have been set out under section 53 (§ 397). This section punishes a person who commits house-trespass with intent to commit such offence. Evidently, it is not intended to punish one who in the course of an altercation gets into the house of another and threatens to kill and bury him on the spot after the fashion of Falstaff. The section is not intended to punish such a braggadocio, but to punish one who effects his entry with that purpose. But how is such purpose to be proved? It is apprehended in the same way as any other intention. The fact that the accused had previously threatened the complainant with death, the fact of the former's intimacy with the latter's wife, and in fact any other motives which prompt men to crime would be relevant for this purpose. It will then have to be proved that the accused had formed a design to commit such crime and that his entry was made to carry it into execution. The section only deals with an entry in which the intention to commit a capital crime falls short of an attempt. For if an attempt is made, the accused would be additionally liable for that offence.

Session. Cognizable. Warrant. Not bail. Not comp.

House-trespass in order to commit offence punishable with transportation for life.

450. Whoever commits house-trespass in order to the committing of any offence punishable with transportation for life, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term not exceeding ten years and shall also be liable to fine.

[House-trespass—s. 442.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5032).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5033).
(3) Proof (5034).

5032. Analogous Law.—This section is supplementary to the last and deals with house-trespass in which the offence intended to be committed is punishable with transportation for life. In other respects the requirements of the two sections are the same.

5033. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session.

For a list of offences punishable with transportation for life, see §§ 402, 403.

5034. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused committed house-trespass.

(2) That he did so in order to commit an offence punishable with transportation for life.

5035. Charge.—see the last section (§ 5030).

Any Mag. Cognizable. Warrant. Bailable. Comp. with Court's sanction.

House-trespass in order to commit offence punishable with imprisonment.

451. Whoever commits house-trespass in order to the committing of any offence punishable with imprisonment shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd Class. Cognizable. Warrant. Not bail.

And, if the offence intended to be committed is theft, the term of the imprisonment may be extended to seven years.

[Offence.—s. 40 Theft—s. 378. House-trespass—s. 442.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5036).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5037).
(3) Proof (5038).
(4) Form of Charge (5039).
(5) Principle (5040).

5036. Analogous Law.—This section also refers to the same offence, but in which the offence intended is neither capital, nor punishable with transportation for life, but only with imprisonment as a substantive sentence. Such are most of the offences in the Code, except only a few which are punishable with only fine.

5037. Procedure and Practice.—This section provides for two cases in both of which the offence intended is punishable with imprisonment but the sentence varies according to whether the offence was theft or otherwise, and so does also the procedure. In the one case, that is to say, when the offence intended is not theft, the offence is cognizable and warrant should issue in the first instance. It is bailable and compoundable, with the permission of the Court, and is triable by any Magistrate, but if the offence is theft it is both non-bailable and non-compoundable and triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate, or a Magistrate of the first or second class, and in either case summarily.

5038. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused committed house-trespass.

(2) That he did so in order to commit an offence punishable with imprisonment.[12]

To which may be added the following aggravating circumstances:—

(3) That the offence in question was theft.

5039. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the—day of—at—you committed house-trespass by entering into (or remaining in) the building of A B used as a human dwelling (or for the custody of property in order to commit the offence)[13] (or theft), and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 451 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session, or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

5040. Principle.—This section is the last of the three commencing with section 449, in which the fact of house-trespass is aggravated by the accused's intention to commit an offence of the varying degrees of gravity. In each of them the special criminality of the accused depends not so much on account of the house-trespass, as upon that offence being committed to achieve a still greater criminal purpose; and which is upon the prosecution to establish. How it is to be established must depend upon the circumstances of each case. But in the absence of such circumstances it cannot be presumed that the accused's entry had been made with one intention rather than with another, but a person found passing into another's house at an unusual hour, or disguise, may well be presumed to have entered there for the purpose of committing an offence, which the

(12) Manhur Husain, 41 A. 587.

(13) According to Ainslie, J., in Mehar Dowalia, 16 W. R. 63, the offence must be specified in the charge.

Court would be well justified in presuming in the absence of any satisfactory explanation. But this alone would not justify a conviction under this section, for it would not justify an inference that the offence in question was punishable with imprisonment. And this has to be proved, though the prosecution are not bound to prove the specific offence the accused intended to commit.(14) But there must be a clear finding that the entry was criminal and made with such intent. It must not be left in doubt and to uncertain inference.(15) For instance, if the entry was made to have sexual intercourse with some one of the females of the house, the prosecution must adduce evidence that the accused had in view a woman, sexual intercourse with whom is an offence. If, for instance, the entry was made in order to carry on an intrigue with an unmarried relation of the complainant the accused could not be convicted of this offence, because to have such an intercourse is not criminal. But it would be otherwise if the intercourse was intended to be had with the woman who was the complainant's wife.(16) In this case the complainant must show that there has been no consent or connivance on his part to condone the offence.(17) But in Bombay it has been held that the omission of the husband to prosecute does not absolve the prisoner from criminal liability under this section or section 457,(18) and in the Punjab it has been pointed out that the Court would presume absence of collusion, connivance or consent where the adulterer entered his house during his absence to have connection with his wife.(19) Where however such evidence is considered necessary and is wanting the only section under which the accused might be convicted is section 448.(20)

Session Pres. Mag or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Cognizable. Warrant. Not bail. Not comp.

House-trespass after preparation for hurt assault or wrongful restraint.

452. Whoever commits house-trespass, having made preparation for causing hurt to any person, or for assaulting any person, or for wrongfully restraining any person, or for putting any person in fear of hurt or of assault, or of wrongful restraint, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[Hurt—s. 319. Wrongful restraint—s. 339. Assault—s. 351. House-trespass—s. 442.]

(14) Samban, (1881) 1 Weir 533. But Ainslie, J., held in Mehar Dowalia, 16 W. R. 63, that the prosecution were bound to specify such offence in the charge.

(15) Durgaiya, (1882) 1 Weir 524.

(16) (1875) 8 M. H. C. R. (App.) 6.

(17) Brij Basi, 19 A. 74; Jagannath, 1 O. L. J. 48, 23 I. C. 703; but the cases on this point are, by no means, unanimous, and, indeed, the views of the same Court are conflicting, for while in 5 M. H. C. R. (App.) 5, the Court held it to be right that the Magistrate refused to convict in the absence of complaint on the part of the husband, the same Court justified the trespasser's conviction for trespass in another case, (1868) 1 Weir 531. This conflict will be found noticed under s. 448.

(18) Bandhu, (1894) B. U. C. 689.

(19) Khanoon Ram, 60 I. C. (L.) 666, 22 Cr. L. J. 226; Anant Ram, (1921) P. W. R. 8, 59 I. C. 550, 22 Cr. L. J. 118.

(20) Veda Gurukkal, (1882) 1 Weir 533.

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5041).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5042).
(3) Proof (5043).
(4) Form of Charge (5044).
(5) Principle (5045).
(6) House Trespass After Preparation to Cause Hurt (5046-5048).
(7) Evidence of Preparation (5047).
(8) Where Preparation Not for Causing Hurt (5048).

5041. Analogous Law.—This trespasser whose entry is made after preparation for causing hurt, is also one whose trespass is committed in order to the committing of any offence punishable with imprisonment—only the former commits a special offence described in this section. Such person must then be convicted only under this section which is applicable to him. It is, however, clear that if his entry is further aggravated as when it constitutes house-breaking or lurking house trespass, he would be liable to be dealt with under section 455, which bears the same relation to this section as section 454 does to the last section. The offence may be further aggravated if such trespass is made at night (s. 458) or if the hurt caused is grievous hurt (s. 459). It will be thus apparent that sections 451, 454 and 457 are related to one another in the same way as this section and sections 455 and 458.

5042. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable, and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session. Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class.

This offence may differ in its gravity from the simplest trespass committed in the course of an altercation by which neighbours amuse themselves in this country, or it may assume its maximum gravity where a person intrudes into the zenana of another after arming himself with a formidable weapon. This section is not intended to punish the causing of hurt on such trespass for which the offender may be separately convicted (§ 525). The offence is as a rule non-bailable, but the practice of the Courts has been to admit the accused to bail if the offence is more or less of a technical character, and is not attended by any circumstance of aggravation.

5043. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused committed house-trespass.

(2) That it was committed after making preparation for—

(a) causing hurt,

(b) assaulting, or

(c) wrongfully restraining any person; or

(3) That it was committed for putting any person in fear of—

(d) hurt, or

(e) assault, or

(f) wrongful restraint.

5044. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the———day of——at———you committed house-trespass by entering into (or unlawfully remaining in) the building of A B, used as a human dwelling, having made preparation for causing hurt to the said A B [or for assaulting (or wrongfully restraining) the said A B (or for putting the said A B in fear of hurt, or assault, or wrongful restraint)] and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 452 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

5045. Principle.—Between an offence in which house-trespass is committed in order to commit an offence punishable with imprisonment and this offence there is this difference, that while the one may be an act of trespass committed with intent to cause hurt, it is not accompanied by any overt act of preparation to cause hurt, and which is alone sufficient to strike terror in the mind of the person upon whose property the trespass is committed. Such preparation may consist of entering armed with a cudgel, sword or a loaded gun intended to be used against any inmate of the house. For, the mere entry of a person armed but without such intention is not sufficient. The offence owes its aggravation to the threat implied by show of force. And if this is otherwise manifest, it is not necessary that the accused should be armed at all, for he may enter into another man's house with his clenched fist ready to strike him, and it will then be a sufficient entry after preparation made for assaulting him.

The section does not require that the preparation should culminate in the causing of actual hurt. But if hurt is actually caused, it may be some evidence of the preparation, though it is by no means conclusive, for the hurt may have been caused on a sudden impulse in consequence of a grave and sudden provocation, and in which case the accused could not be convicted of this offence though he might be of simple hurt and house-trespass. Again, though the section is generally worded, it is evident that some distinction should be drawn between an entry made after preparation to cause hurt and unlawfully remaining in the house after such preparation (§ 5041).

5046. House-trespass After Preparation to Cause Hurt.—The high penalty prescribed for this offence requires that the exact scope of this section should be properly understood. The section requires that there should in the first place be a trespass, but the house-trespass committed must be with intent to commit an offence, that offence being to cause hurt or commit assault or wrongful restraint, and that intent must be manifested in some overt act evidencing preparation to commit any of those offences in praesenti. This eliminates those cases of trespass in which the entry is made with intent to intimidate, insult or annoy another. But it does not exclude the possibility of this offence being committed by one whose trespass consists in unlawfully remaining on another's property after a lawful entry.

Such, for example, may be the case of a son-in-law entering the house of his father-in-law in order to take away his wife. He enters lawfully, but his father-in-law may refuse to deliver him his minor wife in the lawful custody of her parents and the son may then threaten to assault him and persist in remaining in the house in spite of the other's warning to leave it. His subsequent stay being unlawful he commits trespass, and his threat of assault heightens the degree of his crime to this offence. So where the husband entered the house of the complainant in which his wife had taken refuge, in order to beat her and did in fact beat her, it was held that the entry without the complainant's permission was unlawful, and constituted house-trespass and that his beating her there for which he had made the entry, aggravated his offence to one under this section.(21) A person who was always welcome to another may assume leave to enter his house, but he has no right to enter it for the purpose of committing an offence, even though that offence may be an assault on his own life who may have entered there; a fortiori he cannot assume that such permission confers on him the right to make an entry for the purpose of assaulting any of the inmates.

Evidence of Preparation.

5047. But since the criminality under this section depends upon preparation, there must be clear evidence of it. The fact that a person entered another man's house and committed an assault does not necessarily presuppose such preparation, for it may be a case of post hoc ergo propter hoc.

Nor is such preparation to be readily assumed from an empty threat which the trespasser uttered as he effected his entry. For the Court must make some allowance for the exaggeration of language which people use in a moment of excitement. It is, indeed, a common spectacle of two rustics meeting and on the slightest provocation one threatening to make a corpse of the other. But such corpses are seldom made and both parties are equally aware of it. So again, a preparation to cause hurt must not be necessarily inferred from the mere fact of an entry made by a person who is armed, for it may be his habit and he may have never thought of his arm while making the entry. The question really depends upon his intention.

Indeed, if there is the intention to commit an assault, the fact that the accused entered unarmed would be immaterial, for all that the section requires is that there should be a preparation and not that it should be adequate. So, a person entering the house of another with, say a clenched fist, ready to strike him commits this offence though his preparation is scanty, and he may be overpowered before he has the chance of even making use of it. But there must be some preparation at all events. The fact that the accused entered the house of the complainant in a moment of excitement and as they both stood abusing each other, the accused assaulted him, would not make his act punishable under this section, merely because there was an entry and an assault, and probably an intention to commit it. At the same time, the preparation need not necessarily be to cause hurt to any person at all events. For a person may achieve his illegal purpose by the mere show of force, without being required to use it. So the fact that the accused entered the house of another prepared and determined to use force should he be resisted in the commission of some other offence or in order to facilitate his escape, would not reduce his offence though it may reduce his criminality.

(21) Katakam Narasigadu, (1882) 1 Weir (3rd Ed.) 329.

Where Preparation Not for Causing Hurt.

5048. Indeed, between the two clauses of the section itself there is a noticeable difference. For other things being equal, a person who enters prepared to cause hurt cannot be treated as an offender of the same dye as one who enters prepared merely to frighten him with the causing of hurt. But this is only the simplest case and the degree of the accused's crime may be affected by a number of other circumstances—for instance, the nature of the preparation, its effect upon the inmates, the mischief threatened and the mischief done. The accused conspired with another man, Brij Mohan, to abduct a young prostitute living in the house of another prostitute, in consequence of which Brij Mohan personated a constable and entered the house in which the young woman, by name Indro resided. He told her that he had a warrant for her arrest for absconding from her natural guardian. She thereupon went off with Brij Mohan who conveyed her to the house of another prostitute in a different place, where she was found living under the protection of the accused. The warrant was a forgery, and thereupon both Brij Mohan and the accused were convicted at the same trial—the former of this offence, and the latter of abetment. Only the accused appealed; but in reviewing his case the Court found that Brij Mohan's entry under a forged warrant was unlawful entry and constituted criminal trespass. He put Indro in fear of arrest, which being unauthorized constituted wrongful restraint. He was, therefore, guilty of this offence. And as regards the accused the Court found that Brij Mohan had all along acted at the instigation of the accused, whose conviction for abetment was maintained, but the Court reduced his sentence from seven years' transportation and a fine of Rs. 100 to three years' rigorous imprisonment with a fine of Rs. 25.(22)

Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Cognizable. Warrant. Not bail. Not comp.

Punishment for lurking house-trespass or house-breaking.

453. Whoever commits lurking house-trespass or house-breaking, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years and shall also be liable to fine.

[House-trespass—s. 442. Lurking house-trespass—s. 443.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5049).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5050).
(3) Proof (5051).
(4) Form of Charge (5052).
(5) Proof of Lurking House-trespass (5053-5055).
(6) House Breaking (5055).

5049. Analogous Law.—This section prescribes a penalty for the offence of lurking house-trespass and house-breaking, not otherwise provided for. In short, it provides only for a case in which the act amounts to the offences defined in sections 443 and 444 without any of the attendant aggravating circumstances presented in the ensuing sections.

5050. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable, and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class. A person may be guilty both of lurking house-trespass and the commission of an offence (e.g., theft) in which case the appropriate section to convict him under is section 457 and not sections 456 and 380.[23] The splitting up of a graver offence into its primary ingredients is of course nowhere permitted in law.

(22) Nund Mohan Sirkar, 12 W. R. 33.

5051. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

I. In lurking house-trespass—

(1) That the accused committed house-trespass.

(2) That he did so after taking precautions to conceal his trespass from another person who had a right to exclude or eject him.

II. In house-breaking—

(1) That the accused committed house-trespass.

(2) That he effected his entrance into any part of the house described in section 445, or if he had entered with intent to commit an offence, then he quitted in any of those six ways.

5052. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you committed lurking house-trespass (or house-breaking) by entering into a building belonging to A B, and used as a human dwelling, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 453 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

"And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge."

5053. Proof of Lurking House-trespass.—The essential ingredients of this offence are (i) house-trespass, and (ii) lurking. The former has been the subject of discussion under section 442 which defines the term, while the latter is defined in section 443 as taking precautions to conceal the house-trespass from some person who has a right to exclude or eject the trespasser. There can be, of course, no lurking house-trespass where a person has a right to enter the house. So if a person should steal into a club of which he is a member to watch things he is interested in, he could not be guilty of this offence. So if the husband secretly enters his own house to detect a suspected offence, or indeed for any other purpose, he cannot be said to lurk, because he conceals his presence from those who have a right to exclude a trespasser, which he is not. But a person may be a trespasser in his own house, if he has parted with his right of possession to another (§§ 4952-4954), in which case his entry being a trespass may amount to this offence if it otherwise answers the requirements of section 443 or section 444.

5054. The precautions taken may not be sufficient, but they must have been taken all the same, and their object must be not concealment generally from detection, but concealment from detection by the person in possession. So if a person trusts to force for effecting his entry, but effects a disguise as by wearing a mask or the like, he takes precautions to conceal himself, but not his trespass. He would not then be guilty of this offence. But a person who enters by the back-door does so to conceal himself from those having the right of ejecting him, he would then be guilty of lurking. A person who takes precaution to alter his appearance so as to pass for another person who is as such permitted to enter, may perhaps be equally guilty of this offence, for there is nothing to prevent such a disguise from being regarded as a precaution taken to conceal the house-trespass.

(23) Ramchurn Kairee, 6 W. R. 39 F. B.

5055. House-breaking.—The case of house-breaking is simpler. Now as observed elsewhere (§§ 4994-5002), such a person may commit house-trespass either for the purpose of committing an offence, or with intent to intimidate, insult or annoy the person in possession. In either case it is house-breaking if his entry is made in any of the six ways enumerated (§§ 4997-5003). But if his entry was made to commit an offence, then he is guilty of this offence whether his entry or exit was so made. The specification of intention is so far material. But otherwise, it need not be specified,[24] though if the offence suggested be adultery some evidence would have to be given to show that it was not consented to nor connived at by the husband.[25] But a formal proof of this may be dispensed with if the husband was called as a witness for the prosecution, and he complained of the accused's trespass, though he was neither asked nor stated that the trespasser had not entered into his house with his consent or connivance and especially where the accused's defence was alibi and inconsistent with his subsequent plea, on appeal of consent.[1] At any rate it is by no means necessary that the husband complaining of trespass, should also complain of adultery.[2]

For further commentary, see s. 445 (§§ 4994-5005).

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Cognizable. Warrant. Not bail. Not comp.

Lurking house-trespass or house-breaking in order to commit offence punishable with imprisonment.

454. Whoever commits lurking house-trespass or house-breaking, in order to the committing of any offence punishable with imprisonment, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine; and, if the offence intended to be committed is theft, the term of the imprisonment may be extended to ten years.

[Offence—s. 40. Theft—s. 378. Lurking house-trespass—s. 443. House-breaking—s. 445.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5056).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5057).
(3) Proof (5058).
(4) Form of Charge (5059).
(5) Lurking or House-breaking to Commit an Offence (5060-5062).
(6) Evidence of Specific Intent (5063).
(7) Evidence of Lurking or Breaking (5064).

(24) Balmakand Ram v. Ghansam, 22 C. 391.
(25) Brij Basi, 19 A. 74.
(1) Ishri, 3 A. L. J. R. 652.
(2) Kangla, 23 A. 82.

5056. Analogous Law.—This section carries the offence described in the last section, a step higher, inasmuch as the trespass here committed had for its object the commission of any offence punishable with imprisonment. As, however, such trespass may have for its object not only the commission of an offence punishable under the Penal Code, but also other offences punishable under the special and local laws, and as moreover, such act may have been committed in order to intimidate, insult or annoy the person in possession, it follows that in all such cases the act would be punishable under the last section, this section being only applicable to a trespass in which the sole intent or any of the intents was to commit an offence punishable under the Code. There is again, no difference between this section and section 457 except that the former is committed by day, and the latter by night.

5057. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class. As this is another compoundable offence, the Magistrates should be careful in not splitting up one single aggravated offence into separate offences.(3) But such a course though improper is not illegal. A person convicted of this offence may be sentenced to whipping in lieu of the sentence here prescribed.(4)

5058. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused committed lurking house-trespass (s. 443) or house-breaking (s. 445).

(2) That he did so in order to commit an offence punishable with imprisonment.

5059. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you committed lurking house-trespass by entering into (or remaining in) a building in the possession of A B, and used as a human dwelling, in order to the commission of the offence of——and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 454 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or within the cognizance of the Court of Session or of the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

5060. Lurking or House-breaking to Commit an Offence.—As remarked before, this offence is an aggravated form of the offence made punishable under the last section—the aggravation consisting in the trespass being committed "in order to the committing of any offence punishable with imprisonment." Such offence need not be committed by the trespasser himself for it may be committed by his accomplice, but in effecting his entry the offender must have that object in view, which may be proved by the attendant circumstances. The last evidence of such intention is, of course, the commission of the actual offence. But the actual commission of the offence is not necessary to constitute an offence under this section. But in the view of Brodhurst and Straight, JJ., the actual commission of the offence of theft is under the latter part of both this section and section 457 necessary. As Brodhurst, J., observed: "The latter part of each section enacts that, if the offence intended to be committed is theft, the term of imprisonment may be extended from three and five years to ten and fourteen years, respectively. An intent to commit theft would not be punishable until after lurking house-trespass, or house breaking had been committed. It is evident that the Legislature never meant that a house-trespasser or house-breaker should be liable to seven and nine years' additional imprisonment, merely because he intended to commit theft. The latter portion of each of these sections was obviously framed to include the cases of house-trespassers and house-breakers who had not only intended to commit theft, but had actually committed that offence. To sentence a house-trespasser or house-breaker to the enhanced punishment of ten years' imprisonment under the latter part of section 554, because he intends to commit theft, and to sentence him also under section 380 to four years' imprisonment or any other punishment for theft in a building, would virtually be to punish him twice for the same offence, and would be grossly unjust."(5)

(3) Ramcharan Kairi, 6 W. R. 39; Ajudhia, 2 A. 644; Zar Singh, 10 A. 146. (4) S. 3. (d) Whipping Act (IV of 1909).

It may be so: but it is submitted that the actual commission of the offence of theft does not appear to be the natural outcome of the words used in defining this section. And at any rate if the latter clause implies the actual commission of offence, why should not the earlier clause have the same effect? And as regards hardship, it is sufficient to state that if a person commits the offence of lurking house-trespass or house-breaking with intent to commit an offence, he is not likely to take all the risk without being determined to commit the offence. As a rule, the commission of trespass would be followed up by the commission of the offence for which the trespass was made, but it may not be completed and in that case, as the section is worded, "its non-completion would be no ground for his exculpation under this section."

Evidence of Specific Intent.

5061. Though the section does not require proof of specific intent, still if the prosecution have facts to prove that the intention of the accused was to commit theft, it is for them to adduce such evidence. For this purpose evidence of the poverty of the accused and of the fact that his entry was made in a house containing valuable property, is relevant, as are also the other facts which make the fact of his having had that intention highly probable.(6) Such would be the fact of his previous conviction for theft or that he was a wandering vagabond having no ostensible means of livelihood.(7)

(5) Zor Singh, 10 A. 146.
(6) S. 11, Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872).
(7) Oudh Cr. Cir. No. 82 of 1885.

Evidence of Lurking or Breaking

5062. As an offence under this section must have been committed at day-time, few cases of house-breaking are likely to arise under this section. But lurking is more possible, though it is also comparatively difficult. In any case it may be established by evidence which establishes not only the entry but also the "taking of precautions to conceal it from some person who has a right to exclude or eject him. Where, therefore, all that was proved was that the accused was seen leaving the house of the complainant, and was seized one afternoon before sunset on an outcry being made by a female inmate of the house, and he was found carrying the complainant's jewels ordinarily kept in an earthen receptacle in the house, it was held that there was no evidence to support the accused's conviction for lurking house-trespass or for house-breaking, but that the accused could only be convicted of theft in a building, and his conviction was altered to one under section 380.[8]

For a further commentary under this section, see s. 457.

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st class. Cognizable Warrant. Not bail. Not comp.

Lurking house-trespass or house-breaking after preparation for hurt, assault or wrongful restraint.

455. Whoever commits lurking house-trespass, or house-breaking, having made preparation for causing hurt to any person, or for assaulting any person, or for wrongfully restraining any person, or for putting any person in fear of hurt or of assault or of wrongful restraint, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[Assault—s. 35. Hurt—s. 319. Wrongful restraint—s. 339. Lurking house-trespass—s. 443. House-breaking—s. 446.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5063).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5064).
(3) Proof (5065).
(4) Form of charge (5066).

5063. Analogous Law.—This section bears the same relation to section 453 as section 452 bears to section 450. The intention of the lurker or house-breaker in such a case need not be to commit an offence punishable with imprisonment, but it must have been made after preparation for causing hurt, etc, as stated in the section. The section is precisely the same as section 458 with the exception that the trespass is here committed by day, while the trespass under that section is committed at night.

5064. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is triable by the Court of

(8) Khuda Buksh, (1886) P. R. No. 19.

Session, Presidency Magistrate, or a Magistrate of the first class. A person convicted of this offence may be setenced to whipping in lieu of the sentence here provided.(9)

5065. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused committed lurking house-trespass (s. 443) or house-breaking (s. 445).

(2) That he did so after making preparation for causing hurt, or assaulting or wrongfully restraining some person, or for putting some person in fear of hurt assault or wrongful restraint.

5066. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you committed lurking house-trespass (or house-breaking) by entering into (or unlawfully remaining in) the building in the possession of A B and used as a human dwelling (or for the custody of property), having made preparation for causing hurt to the said A B (or for assaulting any person or for wrongfully restraining any person, or for putting any person in fear of hurt or assault or of wrongful restraint) and that you thereby committed the offence punishable under section 455 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

For a general commentary on this section see s. 458.

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Cognizable. Warrant. Not bail. Not comp.

456. Whoever commits lurking house-trespass by night or house-breaking by night, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years and shall also be liable to fine.

Punishment for lurking house-trespass or house-breaking by night.

[Lurking house trespass—s. 443; by night—s. 444. House-breaking—s. 445; by night—s. 446.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5067).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5068-5069).
(3) Proof (5070).
(4) Form of charge (5071).
(5) Lurking House-trespass or House-breaking by Night (5072-5074).

5067. Analogous Law.—Lurking house-trespass and house-breaking as such is punishable under section 453 of the Indian Penal Code; when aggravated by the offence being committed at night, it is punishable under this section. It may be further aggravated by the presence of an intention to commit an offence punishable with imprisonment (s. 457) or where it is a preliminary to the commission of theft; or where the entry is made after preparation for assaulting or wrongfully restraining any person (s. 458).

(9) S. 3 (d), Whipping Act (IV of 1909).

5068. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class.

5069. A person charged under s. 457 for trespass in order to commit theft may be convicted under this section, if the object of the trespass is proved to be the making of an immoral proposal to an inmate of the house.[10] The question is one of prejudice to the accused (§ 5081). A person convicted of this offence may be sentenced to whipping in lieu of the punishment here prescribed.[11]

For other points see s. 454, §§ 5057-5062.

5070. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) For lurking house-trespass at night—

(1) That the accused committed lurking house-trespass (s. 443).

(2) That it was committed after sunset and before sunrise.

(2) For house-breaking at night—

(1) That the accused committed house-breaking (s. 445).

(2) That it was committed after sunset and before sunrise.

5071. Charge.—It is not necessary to specify the criminal intention in the charge. It is sufficient if a criminal intention supecified in s. 441, is proved.[12] The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you committed lurking house-trespass by night (or house-breaking by night) by entering into the building (or unlawfully remaining in the building) in the possession of A B, and used as a human dwelling, after the hour of sunset and before the hour of sunrise, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 456 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or within the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

(10) Karali Prasad, 20 C. W. N. 1075; Contra in Jharu Sheik, 61 C. W. N. 696; Contra in Raghu Singh, 1 Pat. L. T. 221, 56 I. C. 592, 21 Cr. L. J. 496.

(11) S. 3 (d), Whipping Act (IV of 1909).

(12) Koilash, 16 C. 657; Balmakand v. Ghansamram, 22 C. 391; Premanundo v. Brindaban, 22 C. 994; Karali Prasad, 20 C. W. N. 1075 (1078); Ishri, 29 A. 46; Sher Singh, (1883) P. R. No. 14; Lalji Ram, (1898) P. R. No. 12; Ramrang, (1902) P. R. No. 13.

5072. Lurking House-Trespass or House-breaking by Night.— This section prescribes punishment for the offence of lurking by house-trespass or house-breaking committed at night. As such it is the aggravated form of the offence punishable under s. 453 and prescribes a punishment for the offence defined in section 444 and 446. For general observations on this offence reference should be made to the commentary under those sections. As has been there observed, the offence is susceptible of being committed under circumstances of varying degrees of aggravation, but these when of a special and definite kind give rise to distinct offences provided in the ensuing sections. The offence punishable here must not, of course, fall under any of those sections, but even as an offence under this section it may vary in its gravity in accordance with the intention of the intruder. For without possessing the intent specified in section 441 there can be no trespass, and without trespass there can be no offence punishable under this section. So where the accused who were execution-creditors accompanied an authorized bailiff, and broke open the complainant's door before sunrise with intent to distrain his property, for which they were convicted under this section, it was held that since the only finding of the Magistrate was that there was a breaking and that it was unwarranted, it failed to support the finding of the intent so as to make the entry punishable as a criminal trespass, and as that intent is the foundation of this offence, it follows that the accused could not be legally convicted of it.(13)

But though the intention disclosed by the facts must be necessarily criminal, it is not necessary that it should be specifically proved, but in that case the evidence adduced must be sufficient to establish an intention which is in any case criminal, and it is then the right of the accused to claim that it was one least culpable to himself.(14) And it would then suffice if he refutes it. Such was the case of the accused who stole into the complainant's house at dead of night and entered her bedroom. She woke up as soon as her body was touched, woke up her mother who was asleep on the same bed. He was accused of having removed the complainant's earrings. The defence was an intrigue with the complainant, who was a young widow. Both the stories were found to be false, the truth being that the accused, a well to do man, had effected his entry with a view to ravish the complainant. He was convicted of this offence, and his conviction was held good on the ground that the facts proved that his presence would and did annoy the complainant, and there was nothing to rebut them.(15)

5073. Now, of the four intentions described as criminal in section 421, the intention to commit an offence is naturally more serious than an intention merely to intimidate, insult or annoy a person in possession of property. But in the former case the criminality of an act may depend upon the volition of a third party. Of this the offence

(13) Jotharam Dvay, 2 M. 30.

(14) Balmakand Ram v. Ghansam Ram, 22 C. 391; Karali Prasad, 20 C. W. N. 1075 (1078, 1079); Mulla, 37 A. 395; explained in Ganga Bhat, 38 A. 517; Sambari, 1 Weir 533.

(15) Karali Prasad, 20 C. W. N. 1075 (1077); Md. Nasiruddin, 4 Pat. 459. Contra in Jaharu Sheikh, 16 C. W. N. 696; Milkhi Ram, (1919) P. L. R. 50.

of adultery furnishes an apt example. For the criminality of that act is declared by law to depend upon the absence of consent or connivance of the husband as it is obviously a violation of his marital right. If, therefore, a person is shown to have effected his entry at a time and in the manner so as to make it a lurking house-trespass by night or house-breaking by night and his intention is proved to have been the holding of sexual intercourse with a married woman, his act is criminal, or otherwise according as the husband did not or did consent to the act. Now ordinarily, one should presume non-consent, for there is always a presumption against immorality, and in this view the Court should be justified in condemning the accused of this offence if there is nothing to show that the husband had consented to or connived at the act. But the Courts do not appear to have considered the effect of this presumption on the criminality of such an act. For they have insisted on a formal proof of non-consent(16) holding the Magistrate well justified in refusing to convict the accused if the husband declines to admit that the intention of the accused was adultery.(17)

5074. But this was undoubtedly an extreme case, and one at variance with an earlier judgment of the same Court,(18) and that view is in consonance with that taken in Bombay.(19) Indeed the question of consent becomes only material in a case where consent is pleaded in justification of the act. If, therefore, the defence of the accused was an alibi he could not be heard in appeal to say that the failure on the part of the prosecution to prove non-consent was fatal to the charge under this section, especially if the husband had been examined as a witness for the prosecution, and the accused never ventured to raise the question of consent.(20) So where the accused was discovered in the bed-chamber of the complainant where he was sleeping with his wife, on the latter having raised an outcry that a thief was carrying away her neck ornament, and the plea of the accused was an alibi which failed, it was held that he was properly convicted under this section, and that his presence at midnight in the house of another was sufficient to raise a presumption that his visit was not innocent and that, at any rate, it raised a presumption of guilt sufficient to shift on him the burden of proving that his intention was under the circumstances innocent.(21) So in another case the Court remarked: "What we have to deal with is the case of a man, a stranger, who uninvited and without any right whatever to be there, effects an entry in the middle of the night into the sleeping apartment of two women, members of a respectable household, and who when the attempt is made to capture him, uses great violence in the effort to make good his escape. Under such circumstances, we think, a Court ought to presume that the entry was effected with an intent such as is provided for by section 441."(22)

---

(16) Brij Basi, 19A. 74; Jagannath, 1 O. L. J. 48, 23 I. C. 703.
(17) 5 M. H. C. R. (App.) 5.
(18) (1868) Weir 531.
(19) Bandhu, (1895) B. U. C. 689.
(20) Ishri, 3 A. L. J. 652.
(21) Ishri, 3 A. L. J. 652; following Balmakand Ram v. Ghansam Ram, 22 C. 391; Premanundo v. Brindabun, 22 C. 994; Mulla, 37 A. 395; explained in Gaya Bhat, 38 A. 517; Chote Lal, 40 A. 221.
(22) Koilash Chandra, 16 B. 657.

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Cognizable. Warrant. Not bail. Not comp.

Lurking house-trespass or house-breaking by night in order to commit offence punishable with imprisonment.

457. Whoever commits lurking house-trespass by night, or house-breaking by night in order to the committing of any offence punishable with imprisonment, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, and shall also be liable to fine; and, if the offence intended to be committed is theft the term of the imprisonment may be extended to fourteen years.

[Offence—s. 40. Lurking house-trespass—s. 443.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5075-5076).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5077-5079).
(3) Proof (5080).
(4) Charge (5081-5082).
(5) Proof of the offence (5083-5088).
(6) Adultery (5086).
(7) To establish title (5088).
(8) Not Guilty (5089).

5075. Analogous Law.—This offence carries the offences described in the last section a step still further, in consequence of the offence being committed by night, and the trespass being used as a means for the commission of an offence punishable with imprisonment, or for theft. As these two additional elements greatly aggravate the offence, it is incumbent on the prosecution to establish them to the satisfaction of the Court.

5076. In England a person entering any dwelling-house in the night with intent to commit any felony therein, is held guilty of felony for which he is liable to penal servitude up to seven years,[23] but should a person break into any dwelling-house for the same purpose, he is liable to penal servitude for any term not exceeding fourteen years.[24] There is thus no single provision in the English Statute law corresponding to this section, but the common law definition of burglary is closely akin to it.

5077. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class, and summarily.

5078. The elementary ingredients of this offence are lurking house-trespass by night and the commission of or an intent to commit an offence punishable with imprisonment or theft. The combination of the two offences gives rise to this offence which is heinous and punishable with the maximum term of imprisonment for fourteen years. It is not, therefore, competent to the Magistrate to split it up into the two comparatively minor offences of lurking house-trespass and theft under section 456 and 380, and punish the offender as such.(25) But since the intention required to be proved under this section is an intention to commit an offence punishable with imprisonment, it follows that the prosecution must establish it by evidence which is reasonably consistent with no other intention. The actual commission of the offence is, of course, the best evidence of it,(1) but such evidence is not invariably necessary or available, and intention must then be inferred from such other facts and circumstances as justify a legal inference that the accused had only such intention, and no other.(2) Since, no actual commission of an offence other than that of lurking house-trespass or house-breaking is required to complete this offence, the accused would be additionally liable for the actual commission of such offence. Where, therefore, the accused had committed this offence in order to commit mischief and assault, his conviction for both was held to be legal.(3)

(23) 24 & 25 Vict., c. 96, s. 54. (24) Ib., s. 56.

As however, house-breaking implies house-trespass a person cannot be legally convicted of the two offences in respect of the same act.(4)

5079. The Indian Whipping Act authorizes the substitution of the sentence of whipping on a conviction for this offence if the intention was to commit theft or other offences punishable with whipping.(5) But that act does not legalize the sentence of whipping when the act only amounted to an attempt as distinct from the completed offence here punishable.(6)

5080. Proof.—Several cases have been decided under this section in which the value of footprints(7) and of circumstantial evidence is considered.(8) The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused committed either lurking house-trespass (s. 443) by night (s. 444) or house-breaking (s. 445) by night (s. 446).

(2) That he did so in order to commit an offence punishable with imprisonment.

To which may be added the following aggravating circumstance:—

(3) That the offence in question was theft.

5081. Charge.—Under English law the specification of intent is a material part of the indictment which is there drawn up with greater precision than in this country, so that any variance between the intention alleged and that proved is fatal to the trial.(9) Where, therefore, the intent as alleged was to kill a horse, and the intent proved was merely to lame him in order to disable him from running a race, the variance was held fatal.(10) So if the indictment allege murder, and

(25) Ramchurn Koiree, 6 W. R. 39.
(1) Locost, Kel. (J.) 30.
(2) Sher Singh, (1883) P. R. No. 14.
(3) Nirichan, 12 M. 36.
(4) Khandu, (1886) B. U. C. 302.
(5) S. 3 E. Act IV of 1909.
(6) Yella, 3 B. H. C. R. 37.
(7) Mewa Singh, (1917) P. W. R. 27, 40 I. C. 305, 18 Cr. L. J. 657.
(8) Khalas, (1915) P. L. R. 79; Mechhia, (1915) P. W. R. 28, 31 I. C. 337, 16 Cr. L. J. 737.
(9) 2 East, P. C. 515; Thompson, 2 Leach 1105 n.
(10) Ib., p. 513.

the intent proved be to beat the party merely, the variance is fatal.[11] But a charge under this section need not be so precise, though it must allege that the entry was made for the purpose which makes it punishable under this section. But if the charge specifies the offence, e g., theft, and there is no evidence to prove it, it may be a question whether the accused could then be convicted under the last section, which requires no proof of a specific intention. There is no legal impediment to such a conviction though the Court would have to consider the question of prejudice to the accused in such a case,[12] regard being had to the line adopted by the prosecution and that taken by the defence.[13]

5082. The accused who were making a hole in the complainant's house ran away leaving it unfinished finding themselves interrupted. The Sessions Judge held it to be a mere preparation, but the High Court naturally held it to amount to an attempt to commit this offence.[14]

The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you committed lurking house-trespass by night (or house-breaking by night) by entering into the building belonging to A B, and used as a human dwelling (or for the custody of property) after sunset and before sunrise, in order to commit the commission of the offence of——(mention it) and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 457 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or within the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge."

Circumstances Proving Intention.

5083. Proof of the Offence.—The terms employed in defining this offence have been defined in the preceding sections—house-trespass in s. 422; lurking house-trespass in s. 443; lurking house-trespass by night in s. 444; house-breaking in s. 445 and house-breaking by night in s. 446. Such act is here declared punishable if it is done "in order to the committing of any offence punishable with imprisonment." This phrase does not convey the same sense as "in order to commit an offence" which identifies the trespasser with such offender. The phrase used, however, only presupposes the commission of the trespass for the purpose of comitting such an offence, but which need not be committed by the trespasser himself so long as his trespass is made for that purpose. So A and B may agree that A shall make a hole through C's wall and then keep a look-out while B should enter and rob the house, in which case both A and B would be guilty of this offence though A never in fact committed the theft.

---

(11) 1 Hale 561.
(12) Karali Prasad, 20 C. W. N. 1075; dissenting from contra in Jharu Sheikh, 16 C. W. N. 696.
(13) Govindas, 6 B. H. C. R. (Cr.) 76.
(14) Chandkha, 37 B. 553.

5084. The question with what intention the accused entered the house must be inferred from circumstances. The fact that the entry was made late at night would be such a circumstance and if unaccounted for, it would warrant an inference that it was for some illegal purpose. And what that purpose must be would then have to be discovered by a process of elimination. For instance, if the accused was a well-to-do man, and the complainant comparatively poor, it may be presumed that his object was something other than theft. Now, if he entered a room containing young women, the intruder might be presumed to have entered to gratify his carnal appetite. This would bring his case up to section 456.[15] And it may stop short there if the evidence fails to show that the accused had singled out some one out of the inmates, cohabitation with whom would be adultery. On the other hand, where the accused who was an ex-convict, and a notorious offender was caught in the dead of night in company with two other persons making a hole into the wall of the complainant's house, the Court felt justified in holding that the intention of the accused was to commit theft.[16] Such would be the natural inference in the case of one breaking into a shop at night,[17] or one found forcing his way into any other building used for the custody of property.

5085. A very different inference was, however, drawn where the trespasser was caught in the complainant's house where he was found in the company of the complainant's widowed daughter-in-law, a woman of loose character, and in which case he could not be convicted even under section 456 for he could hardly be said to have had the intention of committing the offence described in section 509, as his entry was held to be probably with the leave and license of the widow and in which view he was acquitted.[18]

Adultery.

5086. Where, however, the entry points to an intrigue with the complainant's wife, the complainant may charge him for this offence, but he must then allege the true intent of the accused. If, therefore, out of a feeling of shame, he alleges the accused's motive to be theft, the Court would be chary of convicting him of this section on a finding that his intent was adultery especially if the accused had had no chance of meeting that charge.[19] But the complainant is not bound in such a case of laying a complaint of adultery against the accused.[20] All that he is required to do is to convince the Court that if the intention of the accused was adultery the complainant had done nothing to connive at it,[21] and this he may establish as much by a clear averment as by making a statement inconsistent with such consent or connivance, as where he prosecutes the accused and the latter is content to rely upon an alibi as his sole defence.[22] But a case may arise where the complainant steadfastly maintains the impossibility of the entry having been to commit adultery with his wife, in which case the Court would be

(15) Muhammad Shah, (1881) P. R. No. 14.
(16) Sher Singh, (1883) P. R. No. 14.
(17) Kenaram Bousee, 4 W. R. 19.
(18) Lajje Ram, (1898) P. R. No. 12.
(19) Mangal Singh, (1901) P. R. No 31; Sarwan, (1882) P. R. No. 41.
(20) Kangla, 23 A. 82.
(21) Brij Basi, 19 A. 74.
(22) Ishri, 3 A. L. J. R. 652.

justified in proceeding on the assumption that the accused's entry had not been made with that intention.[23] But the cases on this point are conflicting (§§ 5073-5074) and while some urge the necessity of a prosecution by the husband, there are others in which such necessity is denied and it has been even held that a person may be convicted under this section even though the husband of the woman does not come forward to prosecute the accused.[24] But these were probably exceptional cases.

5087. It is not necessary for this offence that the prosecution must be able to establish a case of specific intention, for it is sufficient if they prove criminal intent, though it is not further clear whether it is adultery or theft so long as it is one or the other. But in such a case the Court is bound to punish him on an assumption that his intention was the least culpable.[25]

To Establish Title.

5088. Though this section ordinarily deals with heinous offences of a different type, it was held to apply equally to one who on the strength of a sale deed, which presumably gave him no title to the house, took advantage of the absence of the complainant, assaulted his servant and broke open the doors to effect his entry. It was argued for him that he had no intention to annoy, but the Court citing English cases held that the intention could be presumed from the act. It appears, however, to have been conceded that if the accused had effected his entry without using force then he could not have been convicted.[1] The real question in the case was the nature and strength of the claim the accused had to the house on which there is no discussion. It is stated to be a "fraudulent claim." If so the conviction was right.

5089. Not Guilty.—A person should not be convicted of this offence upon a mere confession of a co-accused.[2] The accused was convicted of this offence on the ground that some of the complainant's property was found in possession of the accused who also bore some scratches. But the accused was shown to be an enemy of the complainant and some of the property identified as the complainant's was not in the list given by him. The Court thereupon acquitted him in revision holding the evidence inconclusive.[3] In another case all that was shown is that two thefts had been committed in a village, that tracks of four men were followed from a place near the village, but later on they changed into the tracks of a pony and two men, later on the pony's tracks went off in one direction and the men's tracks were traced to another village in which the accused along with several others were arrested in possession of certain bundles containing the stolen property. It was held that the mere fact that the accused was with the party in the second village did not prove that he was one of the house-breakers, and that the case against him being doubtful, he

(23) 5 M. H. C. R. (App.) 5.
(24) Bandhu, (1894) B. U. C. 689; Subz Ali, (1877) P. R. No. 2.
(25) Balmakand Ram v. Ghansam Ram, 22 C. 391; Sarwan, (1882) P. R. No. 41; Mangal Singh, (1901) P. R. No. 31.

(1) Sellamuthu v. Pallamuthu, 35 M. 186.
(2) Nga Po Tok, (1912) 1 U. B. R. 158, 20 I. C. 136.
(3) Khalas, (1915) P. L. R. 79.

was acquitted of this offence(4); and he could not be tried for an offence under s. 411 as the bundle was not found in his exclusive possession.

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st class. Cognizable. Warrant. Not bail. Not comp.

458. Whoever commits lurking house-trespass by night, or house-breaking by night, having made preparation for causing hurt to any person, or for assaulting any person, or for wrongfully restraining any person, or for putting any person in fear of hurt, or of assault, or of wrongful restraint, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to fourteen years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Lurking house-trespass or house-breaking by night after preparation for hurt, assault or wrongful restraint.

[Hurt—s. 319. Assault—s. 351. Wrongful restraint—s. 339. Lurking house-trespass—s. 443. Lurking house-trespass by night—s. 444. House-breaking—s. 445. House-breaking by night—s. 446.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5090).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5091).
(3) Proof (5092).
(4) Proof of the Offence (5093-5094).

5090. Analogous Law.—This section and the next go together, this being a case in which the same offence is committed after preparation made for causing hurt or assault or committing wrongful restraint, while the next section presents the same offence when it is accompanied by the causing of grievous hurt or an attempt to cause such hurt or an attempt to cause death. The language of this section is closely analogous to that of sections 452 and 455 which deal with the same aggravation attending a house-trespass and a lurking house-trespass or a house-breaking by day. In each of them, however, the act may only amount to house-trespass, or lurking house-trespass by night or house-breaking by night, and the offence which the offender went prepared to commit may in fact have never been committed (§ 5047).

5091. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class. As this offence includes many minor offences such as those punishable under sections 447, 448, 452, 454 and 456, it is competent to the Court to convict the accused of any of those offences, if it finds this offence not proved.

5092. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused committed lurking house-trespass by night (s. 444) or house-breaking by night (s. 446).

(4) Mewa Singh, 40 I. C. 305.

(2) That he did so after having made preparation for—

(a) causing hurt to any person, or
(b) assaulting any person, or
(c) wrongfully restraining any person, or
(d) putting any person in fear of hurt, or (e) putting any person in fear of assault, or
(f) putting any person in fear of wrongful restraint.

5093. Proof of the Offence.—This offence is one in which criminal trespass is aggravated by its being a lurking house-trespass by night, or house-breaking by night, and these aggravations are further aggravated by the nature of the preparation made to cause hurt or the like. It is not necessary, however, that such preparation should be directed against any specific individual previously fixed upon, for so long as there is preparation made to assault or confine "any person," it is immaterial who that person is and whether he was known or unknown to the offender.

5094. The question whether the accused had made preparation to commit assault or wrongful restraint must depend upon circumstances. Ordinarily, such preparation must be more or less adapted for the purpose for which it is made, but it is not necessary. Nor need the preparation be known to any inmate of the house. So if a person enter with a loaded revolver concealed in his hip pocket he commits this offence though he may not have intended to use it except when attacked or opposed. The section punishes only the offender actually armed and not those who were merely his companions in the crime. If therefore of three house-breakers two were armed with sticks, they alone would be convicted of this offence, the third being convicted under s. 456(5)

For further commentary, see s. 452.

Session. Cognizable. Warrant. Not bail. Not comp.

Grievous hurt caused whilst committing lurking house-trespass or house-breaking.

459. Whoever, whilst committing lurking house-trespass or house-breaking, causes grievous hurt to any person or attempts to cause death or grievous hurt to any person, shall be punished with transportation for life, or imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[Grievous hurt—s. 320. Lurking house-trespass—s. 443. House-breaking—s. 445.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5095).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5096-5098).
(3) Proof (5099).
(4) Form of Charge (5100).
(5) Proof of the Offence (5101-5102).

(5) Ghulam 4, L. 399.

5095. Analogous Law.—This section is in one respect an aggravated form of the offence punishable under the last section; but the lurking house-trespass or house-breaking here need not be committed by night. This offence is, thus supplementary to those described in sections 455 and 458, and an offender may be punished under this section as well as under either of those sections.

5096. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session.

5097. This is a highly penal section exposing the offender to the risk of a life-long transportation. The Courts have, consequently, emphasised the necessity of construing its provisions strictly, and it has been held to be inapplicable where the act is proved not to amount to the completed offence of lurking house-trespass or house-breaking, but amounts only to an attempt.(6) So Straight, J., observed: "Sections 459 and 460 provide for a compound offence, the governing incident of which is that either a lurking house-trespass or house-breaking must have been committed in order to make a person who accompanies that offence either by causing grievous hurt, or attempt to cause death or grievous hurt responsible under those sections. In other words, the causing of the grievous hurt or the attempt to cause death or grievous hurt, must be done in the course of the commission of the offence of lurking house-trespass or house-breaking is being committed. The provisions of these sections being of a highly penal nature, and inflicting very severe punishment on conviction, it is necessary that they should be construed strictly; and, in my opinion, it was not contemplated that, where the principal act done by the accused person amounts to no more than a mere attempt to commit the offences of lurking house-trespass or house-breaking, the section should be applicable."(7) This view accords with that taken in the Punjab where section 460 which follows the principle of this section had been previously held to be inapplicable to an attempt.(8)

5098. It has also been held there that the section only applies to grievous hurt caused or attempted during the time the house-breaking is committed, and not after it is completed.(9)

5099. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused committed lurking house-trespass, or house-breaking.

(2) That he caused grievous hurt, or attempted to cause death or grievous hurt to some person.

(3) That he did so whilst engaged in committing lurking house-trespass or house-breaking.(10)

(6) Ismail Khan, 8 A. 649.
(7) Ib.
(8) Saifuddin, (1874) P. R. 16.
(9) Imamuddin, (1876) P. R. 17; Jaffir, (1882) P. R. 2.
(10) And not after the trespass was effected; Said Ahmad, 25 A. L. J. 515, (1927) A. 536.

5100. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you while committing lurking house-trespass or house-breaking caused grievous hurt to A B (or attempted to cause death of A B or grievous hurt to A B) and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 459 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge."

5101. Proof of the Offence.—As noted before (§§ 5096-5098) this section provides a penalty comparable only to that reserved for the most heinous crime. There is scarcely much to choose between such a desparado and a homicide. Indeed, the one may have many retrieving features which this offender has not. To begin with, he commits the highly penal offence of lurking house-trespass or house-breaking, and in doing so he attempts to take a man's life or mutilates or attempts to mutilate him. The penalty of lifelong transportation or imprisonment for ten years is thus a punishment which the section prescribes out of regard to the heinousness of the offence. But at the same time the section must be commensurately strictly construed (§§ 5096-5098). It is not, however, necessary that the accused should have made preparation for causing such injury as is necessary under sections 455 and 458. He may, indeed, have caused it on a sudden impulse and without pre-meditation. But it must be caused while committing lurking house-trespass or house-breaking. Now, it has been held that neither this section nor the next applies to an attempt which falls short of the completed offence.[11] Consequently, it follows that the injury must have been inflicted after an act ceases to be an attempt and developes into a complete offence. It has also been held that the section has no application to an injury caused after the offence is committed.[12]

It then follows that this offence could only be committed at that stage which is subsequent to an attempt and anterior to retirement with the plunder. In short, it applies only to the stage when the accused has effected his entry into the house and while he is there in concealment or committing the offence to commit which his entry is made, and the moment he leaves it, he ceases to be liable to this penalty.[13] So where the accused were surprised by a Chowkidar while engaged in making a hole in a wall of the house of the complainant, and on seeing whom they attempted to make good their escape, and to effect which they used their sticks and one of them even discharged a pistol, it was held that since the injuries were inflicted by them while their act was merely an attempt at house-breaking, they could not be convicted either under this or the next section, but only under sections 452 and 511 of the Code, and under which the accused who had let off the pistol was transported for seven years, the rest who had merely used their lathis but inflicted no serious hurt to any one, being sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for five years.(14) The same view was taken of the accused who inflicted grievous hurt upon their pursuers after they had left the premises they had broken into and plundered.(15)

(11) Saifuddin. (1874) P. R. 16 Ismail Khan, 8 A. 649.
(12) Imamuddin. (1876) P. R. No. 17; Jaffir, (1882) P. R. No. 2.
(13) Ib.

5102. There is, of course, no right of private defence of person or property available to such a felon. But if he is treated with wanton cruelty provoking him to retaliation, it may be taken into consideration in mitigation of his crime. On the other hand, the use of a fire-arm, sword or other equally formidable weapon would be regarded as an additional aggravation meriting exemplary punishment.

460. If, at the time of the committing of lurking house-trespass by night or house-breaking by night, any person guilty of such offence shall voluntarily cause or attempt to cause death or grievous hurt to any person, every person jointly concerned in committing such lurking house-trespass by night or house-breaking by night, shall be punished with transportation for life or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Session. Cognizable. Warrant. Not bail. Non-comp

All persons jointly concerned in lurking house-trespass or house-breaking by night punishable where death or greivous hurt caused by one of them.

[Voluntarily—s. 39. Death—s. 46. Grievous hurt—s 320. Lurking house-trespass (s. 443); by night—s. 444. House-breaking (s. 445); by night—s. 446.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5103).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5104).
(3) Proof (5105).
(4) Form of Charge (5106).
(5) Conditions of Constructive Criminal Liability (5107-5111).
(6) Actual Offender must be Guilty (5108).
(7) Injury must be Caused "at the time" (5109).
(8) All Persons Jointly Concerned are liable (5110).
(9) Liability of Actual Offender (5111).

5103. Analogous Law.—This section defines the constructive liability of the actual offender's associates in a case which is, otherwise, little distinguishable from the last section. The section does not introduce any novel principle, for it is the principle underlying other sections of the Code.

---

(14) Ismail Khan, 8 A. 649. (15) Imamuddin, (1876) P. R. No. 17.

5104. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and exclusively triable by the Court of Session.

5105. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That two or more persons were jointly concerned in committing lurking house-trespass by night, or house-breaking by night.

(2) That they or some of them committed such offence.

(3) That one of them caused or attempted to cause death or grievous hurt.

(4) That he did so whilst engaged in committing such lurking house-trespass by night or house-breaking by night.

5106. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you were jointly concerned with P Q, in committing lurking house-trespass by night (or house-breaking by night) by entering into the building in the possession of A B, and used as a human dwelling, and that at the time of the committing of such lurking house-trespass by night (or house-breaking by night) the said P Q, who is guilty of such offence voluntarily caused death (or attempted to cause death, or grievous hurt to A B) and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 460 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court.

"And I hereby direct that you be tried the said Court on the said charge."

5107. Conditions of Constructive Criminal Liability.—This section defines the constructive criminal liability of lurkers and house-breakers for the collateral offences of grievous hurt or homicide committed by a confederate. Such liability arises out of the highly illegal character of the adventure, in which the commission of such offences is not unnatural. At any rate those who sow such wind must be prepared to reap the whirlwind of this liability for an act committed while committing the two offences. The section, however, provides the necessary safeguards against improper extension of criminal liability. For example, it provides that in order to make a man liable for the act of another, (i) the latter must be himself guilty of lurking house trespass by night or house-breaking by night, (ii) the injury must have been caused by him at the time of committing such offence, and (iii) the person to be held liable must be jointly concerned in committing the offence of lurking house-trespass by night or house-breaking by night.

5108. The first condition is intended to ensure that the injury was caused in committing an offence upon which all the offenders were agreed, and by which every one of them made himself liable for the acts of the others, done in the course of committing the offence which was their joint adventure. Persons who were merely aiders or abettors, or who are guilty merely of an attempt, are thus excluded from imparting their criminal liability to others between whom and them there is not the full community of interests. On the other hand, since the complete offenders possess such interest with aiders and abettors and those guilty of attempt, the latter become constructively liable for the offences of homicide and grievous hurt committed by the former.

1. Actual Offender must be Guilty.

5109. But in any case, the homicide or grievous hurt or attempt to cause death or grievous hurt, must be committed "at the time of the committing of lurking house-trespass by night, or house-breaking by night." There is a slight verbal variation in this clause as compared to the opening words of section 459, but it was necessary and does not signify any change in the sense. It has, however, been held to be an expression "to some extent vague"(16) as being susceptible of a construction not limiting the time during which the criminal trespass continues, and extending it even to a prior or subsequent time, but it was held that this was not the true meaning of the expression which was intended to apply only to the time during which the criminal trespass continues; so that where the appellants and another person attempted to break into a house by night for the purpose of committing theft, and were interrupted by the inmates, one of whom was killed by one of the accused, and there was no evidence to show which of the accused caused the death, it was held that the appellants could not be punished with transportation for life under this section, as the offence of house-breaking had been only attempted and not committed.(17) The same view was taken in another case in which death was caused by the offenders when they were seized while making good their escape with the booty(18) (§ 671).

2. Injury must be Caused "at the time".

5110. Where, however, the offence is committed neither before the house-trespass under the circumstances has commenced, nor after it has ceased, but during its continuance, then the section prescribes for the liability of all those who were jointly concerned in committing such lurking house-trespass by night or house-breaking by night. Now the phrase "jointly concerned" is wide enough to include not only all such as actually took part in the commission of the offence as principals, but also those who were their aiders and abettors and committed an attempt to commit it. But such persons may be either present or absent at the fact; but is the section intended to apply

3. All persons Jointly Concerned are Liable.

(16) Per Plowden, J., in Jaffir, (1881) P. R. No. 2.

(17) Saifuddin, (1874) P. R. No. 16; followed in Jaffir, (1881) P. R. No. 2. To the same effect, Ismail Khan, 8 A. 649.

(18) Muhammad 2 L. 342; Sed Rasul, (1916) P. R. No. 27, 38 I. C. 734, 18 Cr. L. J. 350.

equally to both? It would seem not; because such persons are spoken of as "jointly concerned in committing such lurking house-trespass," which evidently refers to the act of trespass as distinct from a previous conspiracy or preparation.

4. Liability of Actual Offender.

5111. But though this phrase is wide, it is not wide enough to include the actual offender, assuming that he is known. In one case this appears to have been taken for granted,[19] but it is by no means the necessary deduction from the section, which is enacted solely with the object of defining the constructive liability of persons other than the actual offender, whose liability is left to be defined by the general law.[20] For instance, a person who voluntarily causes death may be guilty of murder, and in that case the penalty prescribed here would be wholly inadequate to his case. But in such a case it may be that the actual offender cannot be ascertained, or that the evidence against him is insufficient to justify his conviction for murder; this section would then be applicable, and enable the Court to deal with him, whereas but for this section he might have been acquitted.[21]

Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd Class. Cognizable. Warrant. Bailable. Not comp.

Dishonestly breaking open Receptacle Containing Property.

461. Whoever dishonestly, or with intent to commit mischief, breaks open or unfastens any closed receptacle which contains or which he believes to contain property, shall be punished with imprisonment of either descripton for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

[Dishonestly—s. 24. Mischief—s. 425.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5112).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5113).
(3) Proof (5114).
(4) Form of Charge (5115).
(5) Dishonestly or Mischievously Opening Receptacles (5116-5118).
(6) Meaning of "Closed receptacle" (5117).

5112. Analogous Law.—This section and the next go together, inasmuch as they both apply to the offence of dishonestly or mischievously opening a closed receptacle, but the next section refers to a case in which such receptacle was entrusted to his custody, and in opening which the offender not only commits this offence, but also abuses his trust and for which the next section provides higher punishment. In any case, this offence is complete the moment the receptacle is broken open or unfastened: if he moreover steals the property it contains, he would be guilty of theft for which he may be convicted in addition to this offence.

(19) Lukhun Das, 2 W. R. 52.
(20) Chatur, 8 A. L. J. 574, 11 I. C. 579, 12 Cr. L. J. 395.
(21) Jowala Singh, (1880) P. R. No 12; Umar Din, (1891) P. R. No. 1.

5113. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable, and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable, and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class.

5114. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That there was a receptacle closed or fastened.

(2) That it contained property, or that the accused believed that it contained property.

(3) That the accused broke it open or unfastened it.

(4) That he did so dishonestly, or with intent to commit mischief.

5115. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of—— at——you dishonestly (or with intent to commit mischief) broke open (or unfastened) a certain closed receptacle (Exhibit) belonging to A B, which contained (or which you believed to contain) certain property, to wit——and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 461 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

"And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge."

5116. Dishonestly or Mischievously Opening Receptacles.—This section provides for a very general offence inasmuch as it not only applies to an act which is an attempted theft or mischief, but also one in which it falls short of it, as in the case of unfastening a closed receptacle erroneously believed to contain property, in which case criminality lies not in the wrongful gain or wrongful loss, but in the criminal intention manifested in an overt act. In either case, however, the act is an invasion on the right of property: consequently, if the contents of a receptacle are known not to contain property, a person unfastening it could not be convicted of this offence. A human corpse is, for instance, not property,[22] and a person breaking open a coffin to steal the corpse it contains, could not therefore be convicted either of this offence or of theft, or mischief. But if the corpse wore some ornaments and the offender opened it to rifle them, he would then be guilty both of this offence as well as theft.

Meaning of Closed Receptacle.

5117. The word "receptacle"[23] is used here to signify any place or vessel which is a repository for anything. As such, it includes not only any chest, safe or closed box or closed package, but also a room, or a part of a room, such as a warehouse or godown. Such receptacle must be "closed," but need not be locked, so that it may be closed by means of a bolt or chain, but it would seem not merely shut without being fastened as by putting down the lid of a box, the opening of which could not be termed the unfastening of a closed receptacle.

(22) Ramadhin, 25 A. 129.

(23) From Lat recipio, to receive.

5118. The offence here consists in the breaking open or unfastening of any closed receptacle "dishonestly" or "with intent to commit mischief." An act done dishonestly must have been done to steal the contents of the receptacle. So where the accused who lived with his uncle, forced open a chest containing his uncle's money and clothes, and stole therefrom some money, whereupon he was convicted under section 457, Pearson, J., altered his conviction to one under this section and section 379.(24)

The intent to commit mischief must be judged by the presence of circumstances which constitute mischief under section 425 (§§ 4775-4793).

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Cognizable. Warrant. Bailable. Not comp.

Punishment for same offence when committed by person entrusted with custody.

462. Whoever being entrusted with any closed receptacle which contains or which he believes to contain property, without having authority to open the same dishonestly, or with intent to commit mischief, breaks open or unfastens that receptacle, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

[Dishonestly—s. 24. Mischief—s. 425.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5119).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5120).
(3) Proof (5121).
(4) Form of Charge (5122).
(5) Trustee Breaking Open Closed Receptacle (5123).

5119. Analogous Law.—This section is exactly the same as the last with the exception that the closed receptacle was in this case entrusted to the accused, who had no authority to open it. In other respects the offence possesses the same ingredients as the last section.

5120. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class.

5121. Proof.—The points requiring proof are enumerated under the last section, in addition to which prove:—

(5) That the accused was entrusted with such receptacle.

(6) That it was entrusted to him closed or fastened.

(7) And that he had no authority to open it.

5122. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

(24) Tasuduk Hossein, 6 N. W. P. H. C. R. 301.

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you being entrusted with a certain closed receptacle Ex——by A B, containing (or which you believed to contain) certain property, to wit——, you dishonestly (or with intent to commit mischief) broke open (or unfastened) the said receptacle, without having authority to open the same; and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 462 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

5123. Trustee Breaking Open Closed Receptacle.—A person may be entrusted with a closed receptacle, for any purpose, whether by way of security or for safe custody. In either case if it is closed and deposited, the depositee has no right to open it, but if he opens it he commits no offence unless his intention then was dishonest or mischievous. If, however, he was given authority to open it, his opening it dishonestly is not punishable, though he would be, of course, liable under the general law for any offence he may commit respecting it.

For a further commentary under this section, see section 461 (§§ 5116-5118).

CHAPTER XVIII

OF OFFENCES RELATING TO DOCUMENTS AND TO TRADE OR PROPERTY MARKS.

5124. Topical Introduction.—Forgery is necessarily an offence which originated with the invention of writing and the custom of preserving written memorials of title. The earliest trace of this offence is to be found in the writings of Bracton who gives only one instance of it which he classes as treason. This was the forging of the seals of state.(25) It was, however, the offence of crimon falsi of the civil law punishable with deportation or banishment and sometimes with death.(1) So it was enacted by the Lex Cornelia de falsis that a person that writes, seals, publicly reads, or foists in a forged will or other document, or that makes, cuts, or moulds a spurious seal wilfully and maliciously, should be punished—if a freeman, with deportation, and if a slave, with death.(2) And this provision was supplemented by the Lex Julia de vi publica, which punished for obliterating inscriptions on tombs, overthrowing a statue of column or carrying away a portion of the tomb or despoiling the dead bodies.(3)

5125. Forgery was an offence at Common Law in England and was as such defined to be "the fraudulent making or alteration of a writing to the prejudice of another man's right," for which the offender might suffer fine, imprisonment and pillory.(4) These provisions were, however, supplemented from time to time by various Statutes, the Forgery Act, 1913,(5) which codifies the law relating to forgery and kindred offences. The English Law Commissioners to whom was entrusted the duty of codifying the English Criminal Law, had proposed the following definition: all now consolidated in "Forgery consists in the false and fraudulent making of an instrument with intent to prejudice any public or private right."(6) But in the Act of 1913, it is thus defined: "Forgery is the making of a false document in order that it may be used as genuine." Then follows the definition of a false document which might be an adaptation of s. 464. The making of a false document is the foundation of forgery—the latter being distinguished from the former in the specific criminal intent accompanying it. Again, forgery is the process of making a false document while "a forged document" is such a document made. The making of a false document is not punishable unless it amounts to forgery. It is then punishable under section 465.

5126. But the chapter presents the offence in forms of varying gravity. For instance, the forgery of the record of a Court of Justice

(25) De Corona, ff., 118-b, 119-b.
(1) Inst. 4, 18, 7.
(2) Ib.
(3) Dig., 47, 12, 3, 7.
(4) 4 Black, pp. 247, 248; followed in Elsworth, 9 East, 986; Riley, (1896) 1 R. 13, 309.
(5) 3 & 4 Geo. V, c. 27.
(6) Dig., c. XXI, A. E. Act.

or a public register of the kind specified in section 466, is subject to the heavier penalty of imprisonment which may extend up to seven years, which is also the penalty reserved for forgery committed for the purpose of cheating (section 468). As compared to these offences a forgery committed merely to harm another man's reputation is a lighter offence subjecting the offender only to imprisonment for three years. But the forgery of a valuable security or a will or an authority to adopt is naturally esteemed an offence of greater heinousness, for which section 467 prescribes the maximum penalty of ten years. These sections exhaust the catena of principal offence. But there remain others, such as making or possessing forging instrument (ss. 472, 473) or possessing a forged document (s. 474)—offences which are the same as those described in sections 233, 235, 256 and 257 as applied to coins and stamps respectively. The combined effect of these sections then is to punish the making or possession of counterfeiting or forging instruments, whether those instruments relate to the making of a false coin, false stamp or of a false and forged document. Sections 475 and 476 refer to specific instances of forgery—forgery of authentication, while section 477 punishes the fraudulent cancellation or destruction of a document the forgery of which is punishable under s. 467. It will be observed that the latter section punishes the creation of a false document, while section 477 punishes the destruction of what was true, and which law esteems as of greater moment entailing the heavier penalty of life-transportation.

5127. The destruction of a valuable security or a will is not forgery, but the chapter does not merely deal with forgery, but with offences relating to documents. As such, it comprises offences which it will be difficult to bring under the category of forgery. The last section in this branch of the chapter is new and was added by the Amending Act of 1895, to remedy a defect in law, which contained no provision against false accounting as distinct from criminal breach of trust. The amendment brings the law on line with the English Law as enacted in the Falsification of Accounts Act, 1875.(7)

5128. The rest of the chapter (ss. 478-489) is also new, having been substituted for the original by the Indian Merchandise Marks Act(8) while the closing four sections (ss. 489A-489D) are also new having been added by the Currency Notes Forgery Act, 1899.(9) In their general purpose they correspond with the similar provisions (ss. 255-259) against counterfeit stamps. In England all these offences are codified as kindred offences in the Forgery Act, 1913.

Forgery.

463. Whoever makes any false document or part of a document, with intent to cause damage or injury to the public or to any person, or to support any claim or title or to cause any person to part with property, or to enter into any express or implied contract, or with intent to commit fraud or that fraud may be committed, commits forgery.

(7) 38 & 39 Vict., c. 24, s. 1.
(8) Act IV of 1889, s. 3.
(9) Act XII of 1899, s. 2.

[Person—s. 11. Public—s. 12. Document—s. 29.
Injury—s. 44. False document—s. 464.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5129-5130). (2) Meaning of Words (5131).

5129. Analogous Law.—The offence defined in this section presupposes a knowledge of "false document," a term defined in the next section, which should have preceded this section. As it it must necessarily be read as a part of the definition of "forgery."[10]

5130. This and the next section now closely correspond with the provisions of s. (1) and (2) of the English Forgery Act, 1913[11] but which contains the qualifying words "with intent to defraud or deceive" which probably comprises all that this section sets out in greater detail.

For commentary on this section, see s. 464.

5131. Meaning of Words.—"With intent to commit fraud": fraud implies an infringement of some one's legal right, though not necessarily connected with deprivation of property. An intent to defraud implies (a) an intention to deceive, and; (b) such deception involving the causing of legal injury.[12]

Making false document.

464. A person is said to make a false document—

First.—Who dishonestly or fraudulently makes, signs, seals or executes a document or part of a document or makes any mark denoting the execution of a document, with the intention of causing it to be believed that such document or part of a document was made, signed, sealed or executed by or by the authority of a person by whom or by whose authority he knows that it was not made, signed, sealed or executed, or at a time at which he knows that it was not made, signed, sealed or executed; or

Secondly.—Who, without lawful authority dishonestly or fraudulently, by cancellation or otherwise, alters a document in any material part thereof, after it has been made or executed either by himself or by any other person, whether such person be living or dead at the time of such alteration; or

(10) Abbas Ali, 25 C. 512 (521), F. B.
(11) 3 & 4 Geo. V., c. 27.
(12) Ahmed Ali, 42 C. L. J. 215, 90 I. C. 534.

Thirdly.—Who dishonestly or fraudulently causes any person to sign, seal, execute or alter a document, knowing that such person by reason of unsoundness of mind or intoxication cannot, or that by reason of deception practised upon him, he does not know the contents of the document or the nature of the alteration.

Illustrations.

(a) A has a letter of credit upon B for rupees 10,000, written by Z. A, in order to defraud B, adds a cipher to the 10,000, and makes the sum 1,00,000, intending that it may be believed by B that Z so wrote the letter. A has committed forgery.

(b) A, without Z's authority, affixes Z's seal to a document purporting to be a conveyance of an estate from Z to A, with the intention of selling the estate to B, and thereby of obtaining from B the purchase-money. A has committed forgery.

(c) A picks up a cheque on a banker signed by B, payable to bearer, but without any sum having been inserted in the cheque. A fraudulently fills up the cheque by inserting the sum of ten thousand rupees. A commits forgery.

(d) A leaves with B, his agent, a cheque on a banker, signed by A, without inserting the sum payable, and authorizes B to fill up the cheque by inserting a sum not exceeding ten thousand rupees for the purpose of making certain payments. B fraudulently fills up the cheque by inserting the sum of twenty thousand rupees. B commits forgery.

(e) A draws a bill of exchange on himself in the name of B without B's authority, intending to discount it as a genuine bill with a banker and intending to take up the bill on its maturity. Here, as A draws the bill with intent to deceive the banker by leading him to suppose that he had the security of B, and thereby to discount the bill, A is guilty of forgery.

(f) Z's will contains these words: "I direct that all my remaining property be equally divided between A, B and C." A dishonestly scratches out B's name intending that it may be believed that the whole was left to himself and C. A has committed forgery.

(g) A endorses a Government promissory note and makes it payable to Z or his order by writing on the bill "Pay to Z or his order" and signing the endorsement. B dishonestly erases the words "Pay to Z or his order" and thereby converts the endorsement into a blank endorsement. B commits forgery.

(h) A sells and conveys an estate to Z. A afterwards, in order to dafraud Z or his estate, excutes a conveyance of the same estate to B, dated six months earlier than the date of the conveyance to Z, intending it to be believed that he had conveyed the estate to B before he conveyed it to Z. A has committed forgery.

(i) Z dictates his will to A. A intentionally writes down a different legatee from the legatee named by Z's and, by representing to Z that he has prepared the will according to his instructions, induces Z to sign the will. A has committed forgery.

(j) A writes a letter and signs it with B's name without B's authority, certifying that A is a man of good character and in distressed circumstances from unforeseen misfortune, intending by means of such letter to obtain alms from Z and other persons. Here, as A made a false document in order to induce Z to part with property, A has committed forgery.

(k) A without B's authority, writes a letter and signs it in B's name, certifying to A's character, intending thereby to obtain employment under Z. A has committed forgery, inasmuch as he intended to deceive Z by the forged certificate, and thereby, induced Z to enter into an express or implied contract for service.

Explanation 1.—A man's signature of his own name may amount to forgery.

Illustrations.

(a) A signs his own name to a bill of exchange, intending that it may be believed that the bill was drawn by another person of the same name. A has committed forgery.

(b) A writes the word "accepted" on a piece of paper and signs it with Z's name, in order that B may afterwards write on the paper a bill of exchange drawn by B upon Z, and negotiate the bill as though it had been accepted by Z. A is guilty of forgery; and if B, knowing the fact, draws the bill upon the paper pursuant to A's intention, B is also guilty of forgery.

(c) A picks up a bill of exchange payable to the order of a different person of the same name. A endorses the bill in his own name, intending to cause it to be believed that it was endorsed by the person to whose order it was payable; here A has committed forgery.

(d) A purchases an estate sold under execution of a decree against B. B, after the seizure of the estate in collusion with Z, executes a lease of the estate to Z, at a nominal rent and for a long period, and dates the lease six months prior to the seizure, with intent to defraud A, and to cause it to be believed that the lease was granted before the seizure. B, though executes the lease in his own name, commits forgery by antedating it.

(e) A, a trader, in anticipation of insolvency, lodges effects with B for A's benefit and with intent to defraud his creditors, and in order to give a colour to the transaction, writes a promissory note binding himself to pay to B a sum for value received, and antedates the note, intending that it may be believed to have been made before A was on the point of insolvency. A has committed forgery under the first head of the definition.

Explanation 2—The making of a false document in the name of a fictitious person, intending it to be believed that the document was made, by a real person, or in the name of a deceased person, intending it to be believed that the document was made by the person in his lifetime, may amount to forgery.

Illustrations.

A draws a bill of exchange upon a fictitious person, and fraudulently accepts this bill in the name of such fictitious person with intent to negotiate it. A commits forgery.

[Dishonestly—s. 24. Fraudulently—s. 25. Document—s. 29.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5132).
(2) Principle (5133).
(3) Meaning of Words (5134).
(4) What is a False Document (5135-5136).
(5) What is Making (5137-5138).
(6) Signs, Seals or Executes (5139).
(7) Pre-requisites of Falsity (5140-5143).

(8) Antedating a document (5143).
(9) Execution Without Authority (5144-5145).
(10) Fraudulent alteration (5146-5147).
(11) Alterations Not Fraudulent (5148-5150).
(12) Fraudulent but Not Dishonest (5151-5152).
(13) Execution or Alteration obtained Without Free Consent (5153-5156).
(14) False Document must be Made Dishonestly or Fraudulently (5157-5166).
(15) Intent to Screen Past Dishonesty (5159-5162).
(16) Acts Fraudulent but Not Dishonest (5163-5164).
(17) Innocent Fraud (5165-5166).
(18) Forgery of One's Own Name (5167-5168).
(19) Using Fictitious Name (5169-5174).
(20) When Fictitious Name Innocent (5174).
(21) False Document When a Forgery (5175-5177).
(22) Intent Necessary to Constitute forgery (5178-5189).
(23) Damage to the Public (5179).
(24) Intention Inferred from Knowledge (5180).
(25) Injury to a Person (5181).
(26) Support any claim (5182-5184).
(27) Part with Property (5185-5186).
(28) Intent to Enter into a contract (5187).
(29) With intent to commit fraud (5188).
(30) That fraud may be committed (5189).

5132. Analogous Law.—This section defines a "false document," which is, in short, the making of a document falsely purporting to have been made by another, which the maker does "dishonestly or fraudulently." The term has thus a narrower meaning than it bears in popular parlance. For if A make a deed and affix thereto B's signature it is a false deed, but not a false document within the meaning of this section, for the falsity there depends upon the presence of the additional circumstance of dishonesty or fraud. But if a document is false, and it is so made dishonestly or fraudulently, it is not only a false document as here defined, but also a forgery, as defined in the last section. For the specific intent there described as converting a false document into a forgery is nothing different to what is not comprised in the two words "dishonestly" and fraudulently" used in describing the term "false document." The two sections are thus tautological, and they have been so held.(13)

The essential features of a "false document" may now be considered.

5133. Principle.—The object of forgery is ordinarily to cheat-to cause wrongful distribution of property by means of a false document. But in cheating as well as in forgery there is deception caused or intended to be caused by false representation—but the representation in the one case is verbal, in the other case written. Forgery may thus be merely a means to an end—that end being deception. But scripta litera remanet and the mischief that might be wrought by forgery is proportionately greater, and hence the stringent penalties provided in these sections.

(13) Abbas Ali, 25 C. 512 (521), F. B.

5134. Meaning of Words.—"Makes.....a document." This would at first blush suggest a mere preparation independently of the execution of a document. But this is not its meaning (§§ 5137-5138). "A document or part of a document": This does not comprise an alteration mentioned in the second clause but refers merely to the forgery of a part of a document as where it contains several clauses of which some are purported to be signed in the forged name of A intending thereby to bind him. "Or makes any mark denoting the execution of a document". The making of a mark to symbolize execution is included in the words "signs" and "executes." The making of a thumb-impression would be such a mark. "With the intention of causing it to be believed": Not necessarily by the person defrauded—for the intention may be to offer it as evidence in Court. "By whose authority he knows that it was not made": This means that if A, the agent of B signs it for B without B's authority, A forges if the other elements of criminality necessary to constitute forgery are present as well. "Cancellation or otherwise": Cancellation may be by erasure, as in the illustration (g), or by scratching out, as in the illustration (f).

5135. What is a False Document?—The section defines a false document by descriptive enumeration of the processes by which it may be rendered false. But in any case the falsity must affect a "document" which is elsewhere defined to be any matter expressed or described upon any substance by means of letters, figures, or marks, or by more than one of those means, intended to be used, or which may be used, as evidence of that matter.[14] Thus, besides including documents properly so called, the term is wide enough to include a picture bearing the forged signature of a well-known artist (§ 285), but which under the English Common Law has been held not to be a forgery, which it was said must be of some document or writing, though the offender was held to be nevertheless indictable as a cheat.[15] Reasons have been already given for holding the Indian rule to be otherwise (§ 285), and it may be doubted whether the precedent is now consistent with the view taken in other cases.[16] In that case the prisoner had affixed to a picture the name of one J. Linnell, an artist of repute, which he then intended to pass off as Linnell's handiwork. He was indicted both for forgery and cheating, and Cockburn, C. J., thereupon said: "We have carefully examined the authorities, and the result is that we think if a person in the course of his trade openly and publicly carried on, were to put a false mark upon an article so as to pass it off as a genuine one, when in fact, it was only a spurious one, and the article was sold and money obtained by means of that false mark or token, that would be a cheat at common law. As, for instance, if a man sold a gun with a mark of a particular manufacturer upon it, so as to make it appear like the genuine production of the manufacturer, that would be a false mark or token, and the party would be guilty of a cheat, and therefore, liable to punishment, if the indictment were fairly framed so as to meet the case; and therefore upon the second count the prisoner would have been liable to have been convicted, if that count had been properly framed; but we think that count is faulty in this respect, that although it sets out the false token, it does not sufficiently show that it was by means of such false token that the prisoner was enabled to pass off the picture and obtain the money. The conviction, therefore cannot be sustained." As to the indictment for forgery it was said that a forgery must be of some document or writing; and this was merely in the nature of a mark put upon the painting with a view of identifying it, and was no more than if the painter had put any other arbitrary mark as a recognition of the picture being his. But the question whether the false mark put upon the picture had been put "dishonestly or fraudulently" is a question of fact, and since the Court found the accused guilty of cheating, it is difficult to see why the signature was presumed to be an innocent addition. However, should such a case ever arise in this country, it will be found exactly met by the provisions of section 468.

(14) S. 29.
(15) Closs, D. & B. 460.
(16) Collins, 1 Cox 57.

5136. The document forged need not purport to be the original document, for it may purport to be merely a copy of another document which may moreover be itself a copy.[17] But in such a case the offence, though forgery, would not be punishable under s. 467.[18] The accused in a suit for possession of land attempted to support his pedigree by filing what purported to be copies of a deed of dower and a deed of security said to have been filed in a previous suit, but it was found that both the copies contained two more names of witnesses than the original. It was held that the accused had committed forgery.[19]

What is Making"?

5137. The word "making" is evidently taken from the English Statute,[20] but it is a word of uncertain import, for it may conceivably mean the writing or preparation of a document as distinct from its authentication by signing, sealing or executing it, in which case the offence of forgery would be complete as soon as a document intended to be executed by another is written, though it may be obviously inoperative and incomplete. In any other view the person may be guilty of an attempt, but he could not be charged for forgery. The question was considered in the following case: The accused Riasat Ali had ordered the Burdwan Press to print one hundred receipt forms similar to those formerly used by the Bengal Coal Company. He then corrected the proof so as to assimilate the form to that in current use of the company. At this stage he was arrested and convicted of an attempt to commit forgery under s. 465 of the Code, the Court taking the view that the commencing to print or write a document which, when completed, was intended to be a false document amounted if coupled with the intent to defraud, to an attempt to commit forgery. And on appeal it was suggested that the printing and correcting of a form, which was intended, by additions which were to be made thereto, to be a false document, was in itself the making of a part of a false document within the meaning of this section, and therefore, as such amounted to forgery.

---

(17) Nijun Ali, 6 W. R. 41.

(18) Naro Gopal, 5 B. H. C. R. 56.

(19) Essan Chunder Dutt v. Prannath Chowdhry, (1863) W. R. (F. B.) 71, 74.

(20) 1 Will. 4, c. 66, s. 16; re-enacted as 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, s. 17: "whoever makes upon any plate whatsoever any word, number.....the impression taken from which shall resemble..... any part of a bank-note, etc."

But this contention was overruled by Garth, C. J., who said: "If this were so, it seems to me that the mere printing of a single word upon a piece of paper, however innocent the word might be, would be the making of a part of a false document, if it were coupled with an intention to add such other words to it as would make it eventually a false document. In my opinion this is very far from the meaning of section 464; and I think that such a construction of the section involves a misconception, not only of the word 'make,' but also of the sense in which the phrase "part of a document" is used in the section. I consider that the making of a document, or part of a document, does not mean 'writing' or 'printing' it, but signing or otherwise executing it, as in legal phrase we speak of 'making an indenture' or 'making a promissory note,' by which is not meant the writing out of the form of the instrument, but the sealing or signing it as a deed or note. The fact that the word 'makes' is used in the section in conjunction with the words 'signs,' 'seals' or 'executes' or 'makes any mark denoting the execution,' etc., seems to me very clearly to denote that this is its true meaning. What constitutes a false document or part of a document is not the writing of any number of words which in themselves are innocent, but affixing the seal or signature of some person to the document, or part of document, knowing that the seal or signature is not his, and that he gave no authority to affix it. In other words, the falsity consists in the document, or part of a document being signed or sealed with the name or seal of a person who did not in fact sign or seal it."[21] In the end the Court held the act to amount to no more than a mere preparation, and in that view the accused was acquitted.

In this view the making of a document must be something more than its writing or preparation. It must consist of signing, sealing or executing it, but if so, the use of the word "makes" in the first clause would be a surplusage. The word has obviously been used in two senses: the one generic, as embracing all that is implied by the three clauses; and the other specific, as probably implying the preparation or fabrication of a document, so as to give it the appearance of a genuine document. The illustrations appended all suggest the same conclusion, though the word "makes" is susceptible of laxity in interpretation. For instance, suppose the debtor indorses a payment on his bond with the creditor who wipes out the indorsement and claims the entire amount he would be guilty of "making" a false document though what he did was really to unmake his debtor's indorsement.

5138. In England the word "makes" has been differently construed, but it is no authority for enlarging its meaning in this context. Indeed, the term, as used there, left no room for any other interpretation, for the provision there is directed against making upon any plate whatsoever ....any word, number, figure, device, character or ornament, the impression taken from which shall resemble, or apparently be intended to resemble any part of a bank-note. The prisoner was indicted for making upon a plate of glass by photographic process a positive impression of a foreign note, when he was apprehended. It was proved at the trial that the positive impression could be easily converted into a negative impression from which a note could be printed off, but that unless the positive impression was converted into a negative one no such printing was possible. It was objected that the act did not fall within the terms of the Statute, which did not contemplate the mere producing of an evanescent shadow, but something more advanced from which the notes could be engraved, but the objection was overruled and on a case reserved it was held to be right.(22)

(21) Riasab Ali, 7 C. 352; followed in Lim Hoe, (1894) 1 U. B. R. 279; to the same effect, Kunju Noyar, 12 M. 114.

"Signs", "Seals" or "Executes."

5139. But though the word "make is ambiguous, the words "signs, seals or executes" leave no doubt as to what is intended to be conveyed by them. Indeed, it is the signing or sealing that completes the execution of a document and converts a draft into a deed ordinarily giving it binding force and legal validity. The making of a document is then formally complete though it may still lack compliance with some legal form so as to give it the operation and effect of a conveyance. Such would be the case where the document is one the registration of which is compulsory under the provisions of the Indian Registration Act.(23) The word "signs" would include also a mark in the case of an illiterate person and so the word "seal" would include any impression made in token of authenticity. Both signing and sealing are the usual modes of executing a document in this country. The word "execution" implies completion(24) and in law a document is complete as soon as it is signed by the obligor in token of his accepting its terms.

5140. Pre-requisites of Falsity.—A document may be made "false" in any of the three ways enumerated in the section: In the first place it may be wholly fabricated with the signature and seal both forged, which is a case presented in clause(i), or the document though originally genuine may be altered in a material part, in either of which cases the forgery is effected in the absence of the real executant and without his knowledge and concurrence. But the third clause presents a case of forgery effected with the apparent consent of the other affected thereby but whose consent is inoperative because of the misconception of facts brought about by intoxication, insanity or deception. As is enacted in section 90 such consent is not "free" and a person so consenting is in the same position as if he had not consented at all (§§ 858-868).

5141. Forgery may then consist in making a document the whole or any part of which is false but if it is false in part, it must be a material part. Again, in either case the making or altering must be done "dishonestly or fraudulently." (§§ 5146-5155). These are the two elements common to the three clauses. But they do not suffice to make a document false, which requires the presence of other circumstances, somewhat diffusely set out in the three clauses of the section.

---

(22) Rinaldi, L. & C. 330.
(23) Act XVII of 1908.
(24) From Lat. ex., and segnor, to follow to the end.

Clause (1).

5142. Of these, the first clause contemplates the making, signing, sealing or executing a document or part of a document with the intention of causing it to be believed: (a) that the same had been really signed by the obligor; (b) that it had been so signed at a time when it purports to have been signed, but which in fact it was not. In either case, there is a false presentment of a fact which is not a fact, and it is done on purpose and not innocently—that purpose being to make a person believe in the existence of a fact, which is not a fact. A false document may be made either by one person signing the name of another, which he never had authority to sign under any circumstances, or by signing it without authority in the case in point. So if A, the general agent of B, empowered to execute deeds for B, should sign a document for B without his authority and under circumstances of dishonesty or fraud, he would be guilty of forgery, for in doing so, he "dishonestly signs for B causing it to be believed that he had signed it by the authority of B by whose authority he knows that it was not signed."

Ante-Dating a Document.

5143. Again, it may be that a document is otherwise validly signed and executed by the obligor, but if it is signed or executed at a time at which he knows that it was not made, he would be guilty of forgery. Illustration (b) is an example, and is taken from an old statement of law that if a party make a feoffment of land, and afterwards make a feoffment of the same land in which he falsifies the date, he is guilty of forgery.[25] A person may thus be guilty of forging a document by fraudulently antedating it. So where A by a deed dated 7th May 1868, conveyed certain lands in fee to B and he subsequently executed a long lease in favour of C antedating it the 12th March 1868, it was held that the subsequent lease having been antedated to defraud B constituted a forgery.[1] So if a stamp-vendor issues a stamp antedating it to enable the purchaser to defraud another, his antedated endorsement is a forgery under this clause. Such was the case of the accused who appealed to the Commissioner against an order of an assessor under the License Tax Act,[2] and filed stamp-paper for a copy of the assessor's decision after the period of appeal had elapsed, but upon which he had fraudulently obtained an antedated certificate, so as to make his appeal within time, it was held that he was rightly convicted of the abetment of the forgery of a document within the meaning of this clause.[3]

It will be observed that the clause does not embrace false recitals in a deed, such as the overstatement of consideration or the like intended to achieve the same purpose. Such acts are otherwise punishable,[4] but they do not make a deed a forgery, nor is such a document "false" merely because it contains a false material recital which was its main underlying purpose. A died issueless possessed of some land. B his widow entered into possession of them C intending to oust B executed a deed of usufructuary mortgage conveying A's land to D falsely describing himself as A's son. He subsequently strove to uphold his demise giving himself as the adopted son of A but it was (25) 3 Inst. 169; Pult. 46 b; 1 Hawk. c. 70, s. 2; Bac. Abridg., tit Forgery (A).

(1) Ritson, L. R. 1 C. C. 200.
(2) Act XXI of 1867.
(3) Sookmoy Ghose, 10 W. R. 23.
(4) Ss. 206, 421-424.

found that his pretensions were groundless. He was then prosecuted for forging the mortgage deed in favour of D, and it was found that both C and D had conspired to defraud B, but it was a question whether the document was "false" within the meaning of this clause. Munro, J., held that it was not, but Pinhey, J., differed apparently holding that the execution of the deed by "C, son of A" was as good as if C had executed it in the name of any other person, say X. But this view na ally did not commend itself to the third Judge to whom the cas vas referred for decision who had no difficulty in holding with Mun J., that a false description of one's status did not convert a deed o a forgery.(5)

5144. Execution Without Authority.—It is forgery to make a document for another without his lawful authority, provided that it is made dishonestly or fraudulently. The authority to execute a document for another must then have been assumed for the purpose of fraud. Such forgery may be committed by a partner, though he may be the manager of the firm, for the fraud committed by him does not merely affect himself but also affects his co-partners. The accused was the manager of the firm which stood in the name of his son Kalidas. He was also the servant of the prosecutor. He entered into certain speculative transactions for his firm contingent on the arrival of a ship at sea. The ship foundered and thereupon he transferred the contracts to the complainant, fudging up his books to show that the transactions had been entered in due course. He was prosecuted under s. 477-A for falsifying the complainant's book, under s. 468 for substituting a page in one of the books of his own firm, and for criminal breach of trust. As regards the second count, it was contended that the accused could not be charged for forgery which implied a fraud, and the fraud charged was on the firm of which the accused was the managing partner. But it was held that the fraud affected the other partners and that the accused had been therefore rightly convicted of that offence.(6) This case is not unlike that in which three persons were jointly entitled to draw money from a bank but of whom one only drew the money making two strangers to sign for the other two, and who upon being questioned by the bank clerk gave out the names of the members legally empowered to sign and draw the amount, and whereupon Patteson, J., said: "The bankers, being authorized to pay the money to three persons in particular, and to them only, pay it to one of those persons, and to two others who are strangers to the transaction, and that without any authority, genuine or colourable, from the real parties. I am, therefore, of opinion that this was a forgery with intent to defraud Jones, Lloyd and Co."(7)

5145. The question of fraud is thus all in all in the case of a document executed without authority. But there may be fraud intended and yet no absence of legal authority. Such would be the case where a person empowered to sign, used his signature to commit fraud. Again, there may be cases in which, though a person may possess no legal

---

(5) Adaikalammai v. Raman, 32 M. 90.
(6) Lalloo, 6 Bom. L. R. 553.
(7) Dixon's case, 2 Lew. 378.

authority, he may still believe in his authority, in which case he could not be convicted of this offence, whatever other offence he may be guilty of. The prisoner was both the nephew and attorney of the prosecutor. He demanded £120 from the prosecutor on account of "Holt's executors" by writing to him the following letter: "I shall be glad if you will let me have the whole or part of the amount. Let me hear from you by return post, or I will draw on you for the amount. It is time it was paid. I shall take your silence as an assent to my requirement, unless I hear to the contrary." He received no reply and thereupon he drew a cheque for the amount adding "Holt's executors" in the margin. Lord Campbell, C.J., held that there was no case to go to the jury.(8) So where the prisoner accepted a bill of exchange in the name of Ottoway with whom he had bets and dealings in bills, telegraphing and again writing to him at the same time of what he had done in his name, to which Ottoway did not reply. Byles, J., directed an acquittal holding that Ottoway's conduct amounted to an acquiescence in the prisoner's assumed authority to accept the bill for him.(9) The same view was taken by Crompton, J., in another case in which the prisoner had filled in some voting paper in the name of certain voters affixing their marks. It appeared that the prisoner had either express or implied consent of the voters in question, and he was thereupon acquitted; Crompton, J., holding that though the Statute required that the voter shall affix his mark propria manu, still the essence of the crime of forgery was making a false entry or signature knowing it to be without authority, and with intent to defraud, which was wanting in the case before him.(10)

5146. Fraudulent Alteration.—Such a case is, of course, wholly different from one in which a person fraudulently alters a deed whether it be the deed executed by himself or another person. Such alterations, for instance, as are contemplated in illustrations (a), (c), (d), (e), (f) and (g) which are clear instances of forgeries. The five material elements common to all such cases are (i) completion of the deed before its alteration, (ii) its alteration, (iii) in a material part, (iv) the said alteration being made without lawful authority, and (v) dishonestly or fraudulently. It is, of course, immaterial whether the executant of the deed was the person who altered it or another, and whether that another, was then living or dead, or that the alteration had not in fact defrauded any one in particular.

Clause (2)

5147. The alteration must, however, have been made after completion of the deed, for there is nothing wrong in altering it before its execution so as to bring it in conformity with the real intention of the executant and the alteration of a deed even after its execution is not illegal if it is not a material alteration. But it has been held in a long series of cases that an authorised material alteration of a deed after its execution has the effect of vitiating it, so that nothing can be recovered thereupon, although the alterations made can be easily detected and may be capable of elimination,—the policy of the law being that no man shall be permitted to take the charge of committing a fraud,

(8) Beardsall, 1 F. & F. 529.
(9) Smith, 3 F. & F. 504.
(10) Hartshorn, 6 Cox. 395.

without running any risk of losing by the event when it is detected.(11) But the alteration must be of a material part of the deed, though it need not be an alteration of a part of the contract.

An alteration to be material must be one which alters or attempts to alter the character of the instrument itself, which affects or may affect the contract which the instrument contains or of which it furnishes the evidence.(12) Such are, for example, alterations in the date, (13) the amount payable,(14) the time and place of payment,(15) the addition of a contracting party,(16) an alteration of the consideration,(17) or of the rate of interest,(18) or a joint into a joint and several liability,(19) or tampering with the signatures,(20) or an addition to any matter such as the sum borrowed,(21) or the land mortgaged and specified in the schedules. On the other hand, an alteration which is a mere surplusage, as the addition of the words "on demand" to a promissory note,(22) or the interpolation of the name of a subscribing witness, in a document which is not required to be attested by law,(23) or anything which does not affect the liability of the parties, would be deemed immaterial as not to wholly vitiate the deed. So if the transferee is sufficiently identified, such an addition, as filling up a blank left for his Christian name cannot affect the deed.(24) So filling in a blank with a proper date does not vitiate a document.(25)

5148. Alterations Not Fraudulent.—If the alteration is material, it is no defence to say that it was intended to correct a glaring error, or was otherwise necessary or justifiable. Of course, in such a case it is allowable to a party to correct the error or modify its terms by the execution of a fresh deed, which, though fraudulent and intended to alter the terms of the previous deed, could not then be held to be a forgery. For what is condemned by the clause is the tampering of a document after it is once completed, which bears on its face the evidence of a certain state of facts as existent on that day. But the clause does not make all such documents in every case unalterable—for the rectification of a document is permitted in law;(1) and apart from law, every alteration even though unauthorized, is not necessarily penal. In order to be penal the alteration must be both unauthorized as well as fraudu-

(11) 2 Gour's Law of Transfer (5th Ed.), §§ 1313-1316.

(12) Vazeerali v. Suryanarayana, 1 M. L. J. 388.

(13) Leeds Bank v. Walker, 11 Q. B. D. 84.

(14) III. (a); Cardwell v. Martin, 9 East 190; Walton v. Hastings, 4 Camp. 232; Cock v. Coxwell, 2 C. M. & R. 291; Hamelin v. Brudd, 19 Q. B. 306.

(15) Taylor v. Mosely, 6 C. & P. 278; Makintosh v. Haydon, Ry. & M. 362; Calvert v. Baker, 4 M. & W. 417; Hanbury v. Lovett, 16 W. R. (Eng.) 795.

(16) Gardner v. Walsh, 24 L. J. Q. B. 285.

(17) Knill v. Williams, 10 East. 431.

(18) Sultan v. Toomer, 7 B. & C. 416; Warrington v. Early, 2 E. & B. 763.

(19) Perring v. Hone, 4 Bing. 28.

(20) Mason v. Bradley, 11 M. & W. 590; Nickolson v. Revill, 4 A. & E. 675.

(21) Mangal Sen v. Shankar Sahai, 25 A. 580, F. B.

(22) Aldons v. Cornwall, L. R. 3 Q. B. 573.

(23) Surendra Nath, 39 C. 75; Haidar Ali, 17 C. W. N. 354.

(24) Eagleton v. Gutteridge, 11 M. & W. 465.

(25) Keane v. Smallbone, 17 C. B. 179. See further, 2 Gour's Law of Transfer (5th Ed.,) §§ 1313-1316.

(1) S. 35, Specific Relief Act (1 of 1877).

lent. If it is one and not the other, the accused incurs no liability under this clause.

For instance, suppose A executes a sale-deed of his land in favour of B, he afterwards discovers that the land has not ben properly described by A, and he accordingly alters its description. The alteration is made without the authority of A and it is of a material part affecting the very property conveyed, but it does not convert the deed into a forgery, because the alteration was not made dishonestly or fraudulently. Such was, indeed, the case of the accused who having purchased a certain plot of land numbered 10 in the registered sale-deed, altered it to 272, which was its correct number, and who was thereupon prosecuted under sections 193 and 471, and so far as regards the applicability of this clause it was held that though the alteration was material and unauthorized, it was not fraudulent, because the alteration had the effect of substituting the right for the wrong number of the plot sold, the identity of which was wholly unaffected[2] (§ 1948). Such was also the case of the accused who took up his plaint, after it had been filed in Court without the permission of the Court or of the reader who had charge of the record, and entered therein the number of a field from which he intended to eject the defendant, and which he had not specifically mentioned in the plaint. The accused was detected whilst making these alterations. It was held that his conduct was undoubtedly improper and amounted to a contempt of Court, but it fell short of being fraudulent, though Knox, J. felt some reluctance in finding it to be so, though he gave the accused the benefit of his doubt, holding that since the correction was made openly and with no attempt at secrecy it was at best a foolish act, but did not quite amount to a crime.[3]

5149. In another case the accused had applied to the Revenue Court for reinstatement into his tenancy land from which he had been ejected. To prove his tenancy he filed four receipts which were found to be fabricated in lieu of genuine receipts which had been lost. The Court set aside the conviction holding that they were made neither dishonestly nor fraudulently within the meaning of ss. 24 and 25.[4] To this class belong cases such as those in which the accountant falsified his accounts to conceal his previous misappropriation[5] or negligence[6] or the police constable forged a receipt to prevent his superior officer from illegally deducting a certain sum monthly from his pay to be paid over to his creditor.[7] In all such cases "the intent to defraud" is held wanting within the meaning of s. 25, since the word "intent" is construed in its primary sense as connoting his real object or motive as distinguished from its secondary sense of achieving that purpose by the means employed. As Sir John Edge, C.J. remarked: "Of two probable intentions, the one immediate and more probable, and the other remote and less probable, I do not think we should attribute to

(2) Fateh, 5 A. 217.
(3) Bisheshar Dayal, (1905) 25 A. W. N. 93.
(4) Sheo Dayal, 7 A. 459.
(5) Lal Gumul, (1870) N. W. P. H. C. R. 11; Jageshar, (1874) N. W. P. H. C. R. 56; Jiwanand, 5 A. 221; Girdhari, 8 A. 653; Jhotish Chandra, 36 C. 955; but held otherwise if the false account was made to conceal a contemporaneous fraud. Sabapati, 11 M. (411), but there is really no distinction in principle.
(6) Shankar, 4 B. 657.
(7) Syed Hussain, 7 A. 403.

the prisoner the remoter intention" (§ 5159).[8] This view has been followed in some cases of the Madras High Court, the cases of which Court are somewhat conflicting. For while in some an alteration of a document merely to secure something to which a person was legally entitled has been held to be no forgery,[9] there are cases which are not reconcilable to this view.[10] For instance, in the first case, the accused had altered a document without the authority of the executant, after its execution, with a view to prevent other people from setting up a claim to property which was admittedly in his possession and ownership. It was held that an intention to defraud implied something more than a mere deceit, and there could be no intention to defraud where no wrongful result was intended or could have arisen from the act of the accused. He was consequently acquitted.[11]

But in another case, where the accused had fabricated a conveyance from one M to himself, in respect of property of which M was admittedly his benamidar and it was found that the accused had fabricated the deed merely to confirm his title to the property which already belonged to him, the Court convicted him holding his act to be clearly fraudulent.[12] But in a similar case two Calcutta Judges had previously acquitted the accused.[13] The same Court had more recently to consider the meaning of the term "with intent to defraud" in which the accused had interpolated his own name as a witness in a Kabuliat which does not require to be legally attested and was in fact completed unattested. On the question being referred to a third Judge the accused was acquitted, the Court adhering to the view that there could be no intent to defraud where there was no intent to deceive and thereby injure the person so deceived.[14]

5150. But these cases do not harmonize with the view taken in the Punjab, where since the word "fraudulently" means no more than doing a thing "with intent to defraud"[15] the unauthorized alteration of a document filed in Court is held to be fraudulent, being intended to be a fraud on the Court.[16] Consequently, where A executed a mortgage of land No. 450 in favour of B, who sued therefor and obtained a decree, after which in execution he discovered that A had intended to mortgage land No. 449, but had fraudulently inserted in the dead its number as 450. B sued for rectification of the decree, and in support of his allegation filed the original mortgage-deed in which, however, the description of the boundaries of the property mortgaged had been apparently tampered with so as to make it in conformity with the boundaries of No. 449 which was according to B, the field really

(8) Girdhari Lal, 8 A. 653.
(9) Manicka, (1915) M. W. N. 278, 28 I. C. 102.
(10) Somasundaram, 6 M. L. J. 266, 3 I. C. 736.
(11) Manicka, (1915) M. W. N. 278, 28 I. C. 102.
(12) Somasundaram, 6 M. L. J. 266, 3 I. C. 736; contra in Kailas Chandra, 6 C. W. N. 382 dissented from.
(13) Kailas Chandra, 6 C. W. N. 382.
(14) Surendra Nath, 38 C. 75; Haidar Ali, 17 C. W. N. 354, 18 I. C. 881, 14 Cr. L. J. 129.
(15) S. 25.
(16) Gobinda Mal, (1895) P. R. No. 6; dissenting from Sheo Dayal, 5 A. 459. In Madras the cases are conflicting. In some [Godla vedu Balayya, (1902) 1 Weir 551; Somasundaram, 6 M. L. T. 266;] such alteration held fraudulent, while in others [Manicka, (1915) M. W. N. 278] held not fraudulent.

mortgaged. His suit was dismissed as based on a deed materially altered, and he was, moreover, convicted under s. 471. On appeal it was contended for him that if B altered the deed, it was to circumvent A, who had defrauded him, but the Court held that A's fraud even if proved, did not exonerate B for his counter-fraud on A, and in altering the deed, he had clearly brought himself within the penalty of this clause.[17] But such a case is clearly distinguishable from those in which the alteration is a correction, and made with that intent (§ 259-260).

5151. Fraudulent but not dishonest.—An alteration may be fraudulent, though it may not be dishonest, though a dishonest alteration must be necessarily fraudulent (§§ 243-260). In any case a fraudulent act, though intended to deceive, may be wholly unconnected with the wrongful gain or wrongful loss of property though it must involve the causing of injury as defined in s. 44.[18] The accused obtained service as a temporary subordinate in the Public Works Department on the strength of a certificate purporting to have been issued under the authority and signature of the Principal of the Engineering College at Rurki. On reference to him it was found that the certificate in question was a copy issued in the name of one Gul Muhammad which was altered to "Sheikh Muhammad Abdul Razak"—which was the name of the accused. It was proved that the accused was never a student of the College, and upon which he was convicted, the Court holding that his altering the name to suit himself was fraudulent, in the sense of its being intended and calculated to deceive those who give him employment, believing in the genuineness of his certificate.[19] But on this point a discordant note was struck in some cases,[20] though they have since been rightly overruled. The difference arose in considering "fraudulently" as being something akin to "dishonestly," and as such connected with the wrongful deprivation of property, but this is by no means the case or the necessary outcome of the defination of that term in section 25 (§§ 259-260). And since the term has nothing to do with the wrongful distribution of property, it follows that an alteration may be fraudulent, though it may not materially alter the case, as where a person alters the date in a bond filed in support of a claim in a civil suit, even though it appears that the alteration was not required to bring the claim within limitation,[21] or was not at all necessary to establish his case, his claim being perfectly good without it.[22]

5152. Between an alteration merely fraudulent and one which is as well dishonest, there is an imperceptible transition. But the two are nevertheless distinct, and the illustrations given in support of it are all cases of dishonest alterations. Indeed, wherever there is an alteration and dishonesty, little else remains to establish this offence.

(17) Gobinda Mal, (1895) P. R. No. 6.
(18) Ahmed Ali, 42 C. L. J. 215, 90 I. C. 534.
(19) Abdul Razak, (1895) P. R. No. 2.
(20) Jan Mahomed, 10 C. 584; Haradhan, 19 C. 380; overruled in Abas Ali, 25 C. 512, F. B.: to the same effect Sashi Bhushan, 15 A. 210; Kotamraju, 28 M. F. B. (90).
(21) Ram Narain, (1881) P. R. No. 14.
(22) Daya Ram, (1885) P. R. No. 16.

5153. Execution or Alteration Obtained Without Free Consent.— Lastly, there may arise cases in which a person is made to sign or alter his own deed, but which is nevertheless a forgery. Such a case is contemplated in clause 3, which presupposes the case of one who obtains another's signature well knowing of his mental incapacity to understand the meaning of his act. Such mental incapacity may arise from (i) unsoundness of mind which produces more or less prolonged incapacity, (ii) intoxication, which induces temporary incapacity, producing a condition not different from the former (§ 800), and (iii) deception, in which the executant is not appraised of the true nature of the document he is invited to subscribe to. Of course, in any case, the act must have been induced "dishonestly" or "fraudulently"—otherwise the act will be ineffectual, though no one can be convicted of forgery.

Clause (3)

5154. The question what constitutes "unsoundness of mind" within the meaning of this clause must be answered with reference to the unsoundness of mind which is a general ground for exoneration under the provisions of section 84 (§§ 750-797). Now since a person may be of unsound mind (§§ 754-756) temporarily, it follows that a person charged for availing himself of his infirmity must be shown to have been aware of it. For where insanity is temporary or intermittent a person is not wholly disqualified from entering into contracts any more than he is immune from criminal liability. Of course, a person may know another to be insane, and yet he may not act fraudulently by him; what is required is that he should knowingly take advantage of another's imbecility and make him subscribe to a deed, the nature and effect of which he is incapable of understanding. The same consequences attach to a deed taken from one whose intellect is clouded by intoxication. It is not necessary that the accused should have administered the intoxicant, but what is necessary is that he should have taken advantage of it.

5155. But in the case of a person made a victim to deception the case is different. For in that case, knowledge of his deception is only possible if the accused was either himself the deceiver or that he was his abettor. Illustration (i) presents an example. There the scribe wrote down the name of a different person, as the legatee from the one nominated by the testator, and the latter was induced to sign the will on the assurance that it contained a faithful record of his wishes. The scribe may not have been the beneficiary under the will, but he had nevertheless obtained the testator's signature to it by his deception. The will is therefore a forgery under this clause. The deception practised must, it is apprehended, relate to the nature or contents of the deed and not merely to its effect. Any misrepresentation as to the latter may render the deed void, but it will not amount to forgery.

So, for example, if in the case last supposed the testator were to order the scribe of his will to name A as his legatee and thereupon the scribe were to falsely induce the testator to believe that A was dead, and whereupon he substitutes B for A, the scribe could not be charged for forgery, though he may have achieved the same purpose by practising deceit. But it is a deceit of a kind which does not preclude inquiry and exercise of judgment. The deceit which renders a deed a forgery affect a man's cognition and not merely his conviction. Even in this respect the English rule was at one time different, for it was said that it was not forgery to fraudulently induce a person to execute an instrument on a misrepresentation of its contents.(23) So where the defendant was indicted for reading a lease to an illiterate person in other words than it was written, whereby he was induced to seal it, it was taken for granted that it would not support an indictment for forgery.(24) But it was expressly so ruled by Rolfe, B., in a case in which the executant had been made to sign a receipt for £ 12, being given to understand that it was for £ 9.(25) But in this respect the law was amended by the Larceny Act, 1861,(1) which provides generally as follows:—

"90. Whosoever, with intent to defraud or injure any other person, shall by any false pretence fraudulently cause or induce any other person to execute, make, accept, endorse, or destroy the whole or any part of any valuable security, or to write, impress or affix his name, as the name of any other person, or of any company, firm, at co-partnership, on the seal of any body corporate, company, or society, upon any paper or parchment in order that the same may be afterwards made or converted into or used or dealt with as a valuable security, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and being convicted thereof shall be liable to be kept in penal servitude or to be imprisoned."(2)

5156. The terms of this Statute are however more general than the clause which is restricted to a misrepresentation which so obscures the mental vision that a person acts on the strength of it without pausing to verify it. Consequently, if there was no such misrepresentation, the fact that a person should sign without scrutiny would not bring his act within this clause. So where the accused, a police subordinate, obtained the signature of the Police Superintendent to an order which he inserted in a heap of papers placed before him for signature, it was held that, that fact did not make the accused liable for this offence, because it did not prevent the Superintendent from knowing the nature of the document.(3) The same view was taken of the Registration moharir who presented certain indorsements for the signature of the Registrar which he signed, believing the moharir to have copied them in the Register as required, and in which case he could have verified the entries if he was so minded.(4) It must be confessed that the question of deception is a question of degree, and while there may have been deception in the latter case it was not sufficient to prevent the person deceived from ascertaining the truth. But the same thing may be said of the testator in illustration (i). For if the testator doubted the scribe he could have seen the will to ascertain that the legatee's name had been correctly written down. But he did not do so because of the confidence he reposed in the scribe—and indeed, there can be no deception without confidence. the person deceived taking upon trust what he was at liberty to examine and verify.

---

(23) Per Rolfe, B. in Collins, 2 M. & Rob. 461.
(24) Skirret, 1 Sid. 312.
(25) Chadwick, 2 M. & Rob. 545.
(1) 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 90.
(2) This overrules Danger, 26 L. J. M. C. 185, in which the fraudulent obtaining of a signature to a bill of exchange was said to be no offence.
(3) Nujeebedoolah, 9 W. R. 20.
(4) Dwarkanath Ghose, 20 W. R. 49.

5157. False Document must be Made Dishonestly or Fraudulently.—Dishonesty or fraud must underlie the making of a false document, otherwise a document though false in the general sense is not "false" in the especial sense in which that word is used here. The term "dishonestly" is a term of sufficiently precise import, and means as has been seen before, the doing of anything with the intention of causing wrongful gain or wrongful loss, that is, gain or loss, by unlawful means of property to which the person is not or is entitled (§§ 227-239). The adoption of unlawful means is one element of dishonesty; and an intention to employ it with knowledge of "its unlawfulness" is another. Consequently, if what was done was neither unlawful nor believed to be so, it would not be dishonest.

Such was the case of the accused in the Bombay case decided upon the following facts under a Bombay Regulation.(5) There the Mamlatdar is given power to assist tenure-holders in realizing rents on a signed requisition being filed for the arears due before a certain time. The accused was the manager of an estate farmed by A, from a certain landlord. The rents of thirty-two of his tenants having fallen into arrears, he drew up petitions for the same affixing thereto A's signatures imitating A's handwriting and filed them on the last day of limitation. He was prosecuted for forgery and the case of the prosecution was that the act amounted to forgery, because the signatures purporting to be A's were not A's signature, and that he had forged them to save limitation, after which the rents could not have been realized except by regular suit, and which therefore caused wrongful loss to Government in the loss of revenue due from court-fee.

On appeal, however, Melvill and Nanabhai Haridas, JJ., quashed his conviction, holding that A having sworn to have authorized the accused to sign for him the act of the accused was one done in the bona fide belief in his authority, and that apart from that circumstance, the act of the accused fell short of forgery, because it was not dishonest, inasmuch even if he had no authority from A to sign for him, and even if the accused wished to deceive the Mamlatdar into the belief that it was A himself who had signed the petition, still since the act was done merely to benefit A, whose gain could not be described as wrongful, and since no one had suffered wrongful loss, the act of the accused was not dishonest, and it was, therefore not punishable as forgery. And adverting to the plea of loss of revenue to Government the Court said: "It is sufficient for us to say that we are not disposed to regard litigation as a machinery invented for the benefit of the revenue, or to consider that avoidance of litigation is a wrongful loss to the Government."(6) It is necessary to add that the Court did not go into the question whether the act was not "fraudulent" which, it is submitted, it was, if the accused did not bona fide believe in his authority to sign for A.

5158. In this view the case is not unlike those in which a person secures a post or admission to an examination by means of forged credentials. The accused was prosecuted for forgery of three documents under the following circumstances. He was employed as a copyist in the sub-divisional office at Bhudruck, under the Balasore Collectorate. The third clerkship in that office having fallen vacant the accused applied for it to the Collector adding to his application a forged endorsement (Ex. A), purporting to have been made by the sub-divisional officer recommending him for the post. He also forged a reply from the Collector (Ex. B), appointing him to the vacant post. The sub-divisional officer having suspected the genuineness of the reply wrote a demi-official letter of inquiry to the Collector, which was posted in the local post office, whereupon the accused fabricated a letter (Ex. C), purporting to be written by the Sub-divisional officer to the post master asking him to stop the despatch of the demi-official letter. The accused was convicted for those three acts of forgeries, and on appeal it was contended for him that the documents, though false, could not be said to have been made "dishonestly" or "fraudulently." But the Court held that the first two documents (Exs. A and B) were clearly fabricated "fraudulently" if not "dishonestly," for in making them, his object was to obtain some pecuniary advantage by deceiving the Sub-divisional officer as well as the Collector. But in fabricating the third letter the object of the accused was evidently to screen himself from detection of the fraud which he had already committed by fabricating the two earlier documents. That being his intention, it could not be said that the document C was made either "dishonestly" or "fraudulently." His conviction on that count was consequently set aside(7) (§ 5159).

(5) Reg. XVII of 1827. (6) Bhabani Shankar, 11 B. H. C. R. 3

Intend to Screen Past Dishonesty.

5159. This question raises a somewhat important issue, and one upon which the Courts are divided. For while in the last case the Court was clearly of opinion that a false document made with the intention of screening the offender from the effects of past dishonesty or fraud, is neither dishonest nor fraudulent, a discordant note was struck by Banerji and Sale, JJ., in a case in which the same question came up for adjudication on the following facts. The accused was the agent of a zemindar, and as such received certain sums of money for payment into the Government Treasury on account of land-revenue. He paid smaller amounts for which he received receipts which he altered by adding figures to represent much larger sums as paid into the Treasury, which he sent to his master as vouchers in support of his statement that he had paid the amounts. He was prosecuted both for criminal breach of trust (§§ 4473-4475) as well as forgery, and the question was whether his conviction for forgery was right. The question naturally turned upon the meaning to be ascribed to the terms "dishonestly" and "fraudulently," for it was contended for the accused that since the forgery was committed not with the intention of causing any wrongful gain or wrongful loss, or of defrauding any one, but with the intention of screening the past guilt of the accused, it could not fall within the definition of forgery in section 463.

(7) Abdul Hamid, 13 C. 349.

5160. This view was sought to be supported on the strength of two cases of the Allahabad Court[8], the earlier case of the same Court[9] being neither cited nor considered, but as to them the Court said: "With all respect for the learned Judges who decided those cases, we are not prepared to accept the rule of law laid down by them, that it would not amount to forgery under the Indian Penal Code, if the intention with which a false document was made was to conceal a fraud which had been previously committed. If the intention with which a false document was made was to conceal a fraudulent or dishonest act which had been previously committed, we fail to see how that intention could be other than an intention to commit fraud; and if the intention was to commit fraud, the making of false document with that intention will come within the definition of forgery.... Nor does s. 464 stand in the way of the view we have taken; for though to constitute forgery a person must make a false document as defined in section 464 a person is said to make a false document "who dishonestly or fraudulently makes, signs, seals, or executes a document, or a part of a document, etc., so that if there is either dishonesty or fraud in the making or altering of a document falsely, the case would come under section 464"[10]

Against this view stand the cases of the Bombay[11] and Allahabad[12] High Courts which approach the question from the standpoint of section 24 (§§ 243-254) which defines "dishonestly" as the doing of anything with the intention of causing wrongful gain or wrongful loss; in other words, which makes criminality depend upon the sole question of intention. It has been, therefore, said that where the sole intention of the accused was to screen himself from detection and not to cause either wrongful gain or loss, or commit fraud, he could not be said to intend to make a false document "dishonestly" or "fraudulently" as those terms are defined in the Code[13] (§ 5148).

5161. This view has been consistently applied by those Courts in several cases. In one, the prisoner had altered an office report, with a view to screen his own negligence, he having lost a portion of a record, for which, if the report had stood in its original form, he would have been called upon to account. The purpose of the alteration made by the prisoner was to throw upon another officer responsibility for the missing document. It was held that since the intention of the accused was to screen his own neligence, and not to cause damage or injury to any one, he could not be convicted of forgery.[14] But to this the reply appears to be that though the throwing of one's responsibility upon another may not be fraudulent, the alteration which was intended to deceive those whose duty it was to make use of the document can scarcely be said to be anything short of fraudulent.

(8) Jiwanand, 5 A. 221; Girdhari Lal, 8 A. 653.
(9) Abdul Hamid, 13 C. 349.
(10) Lal Mohan Sarkar, 22 C. 313; Balkrishna, 37 B. 666.
(11) Lal Gumal, 2 N. W. P. H. C. R. 11; Jageshur Pershad, 6 N. W. P. H. C. R. 56; Mazhar Husain, 5 A. 553; Girdhari Lal, 8 A. 653.
(12) Shankar, 4 B. 657.
(13) Lal Gumal, 2 N. W. P. H. C. R. 11; Shujauddin, 20 A. L. J. 662, 68 I. C. 834, 22 Cr. L. J. 10.
(14) Ib.

The same remark would hold good in the case in which the accused who had misappropriated the pay of certain school teachers under him, tampered with the office account register by removing certain leaves, substituting for them other leaves containing false entries, whereupon Pearson, J., held that the accused could not be convicted of forgery inasmuch as his accounts were fudged "for the purpose of avoiding disgrace and punishment by concealing the frauds which had been committed."(15) In another case disposed of by Oldfield, J., the accused who was a record-keeper in a certain municipality, was called upon to produce certain orders required in a case. He searched for them, but having failed to find them he forged two orders and produced them as the original orders called for. He was prosecuted both under section 218 (§§ 2297-2299) as well as this section, but it was held that since the documents were forged to screen the accused's own negligence, they were not forgeries within the meaning of section 463.(16)

5162. In these cases there can be no doubt but that the primary and proximate intention of the accused was to screen himself, but at the same time in order to subserve that intention he also intended to use the altered documents for the purpose of deception. The fact that there was one intention, did not negative the presence of another intention, and if the latter intention was fraudulent the mental element necessary to constitute this offence would then be present. This aspect of the question was alluded to by Sir Johan Edge, C. J., in the following case: The accused who was a Treasury Accountant received a sum of Rs. 500 as a Civil Court deposit for payment to one A. He received another sum of Rs. 500 as a Revenue deposit for payment to B. The money due to A was withdrawn by the accused on a forged cheque, and when A applied for its payment, the accused made a false report to the effect that A's money was held as a revenue deposit, which was false and whereupon he was prosecuted both under section 218 as well as for forgery, but as to the latter it was held that inasmuch as the intention of the accused in making the false report was to stave off the evil day and not to defraud A or B, his act could not be said to be either dishonest or fraudulent.

"Of two probable intentions, the one immediate and more probable, and the other remote and less probable, I do not think we should attribute to the prisoner the remoter intention."(17) Kemball, J., arrived at the same result in the case of the forester whose duty it was to issue forest passes for the wood sold and the price charged therefor. As such he sold by auction the wood of a tree stated in the pass to be 0-13-9 sold for Rs. 218. He entered the same quantity in his day-book, but which he subsequently altered to 2-13-9, by changing the original "0" into a "2" after official inquiry into the sale by him had commenced. He was prosecuted for this offence, but the Court held the alteration in the quantity as traceable to neither dishonesty nor fraud, and he was accordingly acquitted.(18)

(15) Jageshur Pershad, 6 N. W. P. H. C. R. 56.
(16) Mazhar Husain, 5 A. 553.
(17) Girdhari Lal, 8 A. 653.
(18) Shankar, 4 B. 657. The head-note of this case is inaccurate.

Acts Fraudulent but Not Dishonest.

5163. The question whether an act is dishonest or not is comparatively easy, but the question of fraud is more perplexing (§§ 5159-5164). There are, however, cases in which it is clearly visible. The accused applied to the Police Superintendent at Poona for enlistment in the police force. In support for his application he presented two certificates, one of which was wholly fabricated, while the other had been altered by several material additions made after its execution. He was held to have committed the offences punishable under sections 466 and 471.[19] One Piari, wife of Amir, deserted him and thereupon he made a report to the police asking that a search might be made for her. He also engaged a pleader one Ali Zehad to assist him in the search. The accused who was the pleader's son was a clerk in the Police Superintendent's office, forged two orders purporting to have been issused by the Superintendent for the delivery of the woman from the custody of a Mt. Sibni to which she was apparently traced. It was contended that the orders though false were not made fraudulently, but the Court held that the two elements necessary to constitute fraud were both present, viz., (i) deceit or an intention to deceive, and (ii) either actual or possible injury to some one. The first was evident and the second was clear from the fact that the woman if delivered to the husband would have lost her right to remain where she was found.[20]

5164. Other cases illustrative of the same principle are to be found in the forged certificates filed with a view to gain admission either to a college lecture[21] or an examination.[22] The accused applied to the Principal, Queen's College, Benares, for admission into the second year law class, alleging that he had passed the F. A. examination and attended the first year law class in another college. The Principal allowed him to attend the second year class on condition that he produced a certificate of his having attended the first year's lectures, and for which he subsequently, produced a forged certificate purporting to have been signed by the Principal of Canning College, Lucknow. This document was a forgery, and the accused was convicted under section 471, and it was held that the forgery was committed not only fraudulently but also dishonestly, because he intended to save thereby one year's fee which he would have had to pay on the first year's lectures which he never attended. That the document was made fraudulently is undoubted, because it was intended to deceive the College authority to admit him to a second year law course.[23]

The question was similarly decided by the majority of the Full Bench of the Madras High Court,[24] in a case in which the accused was admitted to the Matriculation Examination of the Madras University as a private candidate on his producing a forged certificate, purporting to have been signed by the Headmaster of a High school,

(19) Khandu Singh, 22 B. 768.
(20) Ali Hasan, 28 A. 835.
(21) Sashi Bhusan, 15 A. 210.
(22) Kotamraju, 28 M. 90.
(23) Soshi Bhusan, 15 A. 210, relying on ill. (k).
(24) Kotamraju, 28 M. 90, F. B.

that he bore good character and had attained his twentieth year. It was held that the certificate had been fabricated fraudulently, in that it was intended to deceive the Registrar of the University who acting upon it admitted the accused to the examination. "In my view," said Sir Arnold White, C. J., "if a false document is made in fact, and there is an intention to defraud, the requirements of the law are satisfied."[25] So where the accused, who purchased revolvers and ammunition from three gunsmiths by filling up the certificates of sales with false names and addresses was convicted of forging them inasmuch as the certificates constituted false documents and they were made fraudulently though not dishonestly, because the false names and addresses were intended to deceive those who required the certificates for identification of the purchasers and the weapons.[1]

Innocent Fraud.

5165. But such cases are clearly distinguishable from those in which a person practises innocent fraud upon the public without intending to do any specific wrong to any individual. An intent to defraud implies something more than deceit. The object for which the deceit is practised has to be considered. The advantage intended to be caused need not have relation to property or be such as is implied in the term "dishonestly," but it must be something to which the party practising the deceit is not either legally or equitably entitled. There can be no intention to defraud where no wrongful result was intended or could have arisen from the act of the accused. A man cannot be convicted of forgery where his intention has been merely to secure something to which he was legally entitled, or even bona fide believed himself to be entitled.[2] Such was the case of the accused who filed a forged sanad before the settlement officer in support of his claim to purely titular distinction of "Loskur" which was unconnected with any right to property.[3] So it has been held that if a man forged a document such as a diploma of the College of Surgeons, with intent only to induce people generally or particular persons, to believe that he is a member of that college, but having no intent of committing any particular fraud, or doing any specific wrong to any individual he could not be held guilty of the offence of forgery at common law.[4]

In another case the executee of a sale deed inserted therein a clause conveying to him a strip of land to which a third party was setting up a claim. The strip belonged to the executee and his object in making the addition was merely to disarm the opposition made to his claim. It was held that the accused could not be convicted of fraudulently altering of the sale deed.[5] But this view probably carries the doctrine of criminal irresponsibility too far to be generally acceptable. Indeed, the contrary has been held by a Divisional Bench of the same Court in a case in which the accused had got up a sale deed purporting to be executed by one M by whom it had never been executed, though

---

(25) Jan Mahomed, 10 C. 584.
(1) Causley, 43 C. 421.
(2) Manicka, (1915) M. W. N. 278; 28 I. C. 102.
(3) Hodgson, 25 L. J. M. C. 78.
(4) III. (d) is taken from Ritson, 39 L. J. M. C. 10, which, however, follows an ancient rule, 3 Inst. 169; Pult. 46 (b), 1 Hawk. P. C., c. 70, s. 2; Bac. Abridg. tit; Forgery (A), 27 H. 7-3 pl. 21.
(5) Manika, (1915) M. W. N. 278, 28 I. C. 102.

he was a mere benamidar of the accused. It was argued for him that the deed deceived no one but merely confirmed the title of the accused, but the Court nevertheless confirmed his conviction holding that it did not make the deed any the less fraudulent.(6) But even this view does not stand unchallenged, since it has been held that where the accused, who was a tenant produced before the Revenue Court certain rent receipts which he had forged in lieu of the originals which were lost, the Court acquitted him holding that there was no "intent to defraud" within the meaning of s. 25(7) which, it may be submitted is arguing obscurum per obscurius since the meaning of that concept is, if at all, thus made even more obscure.(8)

5166. That the terms "fraudulently" and "dishonestly" are terms apart cannot be doubted, though in some cases they were treated as synonymous.(9) But at the same time, there must be some one to defraud and a purpose to serve, which cannot be left to conjecture. Such was the case of the accused who was found in possession of two sale deeds purporting to be executed by the same vendor in respect of the same land but in favour of two separate purchases, namely, himself and his wife. It was found that the former was copied from the latter which was a duly registered deed. The former deed was unregistered and bore a later date. The vendor supported the registered deed and laid no claim to the property which he swore belonged to the accused. The prosecution could only suggest that the second sale deed may have been made by the accused to defraud his wife or to raise money on, but the Court accepted the explanation of the accused that the second deed was intended to convey to him the property which he had himself purchased by the first deed benami in the name of his wife.(10) As rightly understood this case appears to be correctly decided, and there is nothing stated therein to call for the dissent of the Madras High Court.(11)

In the following case the Judges could not agree, and the case was ultimately acquitted by reference to a third Judge. There the accused had falsely described himself as the son of his deceased uncle, in a mortgage executed by him of properties some of which belonged to his uncle who had died issueless. It was suggested that both the accused and the mortgagee had conspired to defrand the widow. The accused pleaded adoption by his uncle but it was found against him. It was, however, found that the mortgagee who knew him well was in no way deceived. It was therefore held that the accused could not be convicted for using a false description as his act which was merely an attempt to set up his claim to an adoption could not be described as fraudulent.(12) Such was held to be also the case of the accused who had signed a bail bond in a fictitious name after informing the magistrate of it.(13) So there

(6) Somasundaram, 6 M. L. T. 266, 3 I. C. 736; dissenting from Kailas Chandra, 6 C. W. N. 382.
(7) Sheo Dayal, 7 A. 459.
(8) Abbas Ali, 25 C. 512, F. B. in which the word "to defraud" in s. 25 is held to be obscure, as it leaves to be determined whether it implies deprivation of property.
(9) Kishen Pershad, 2 N. W. P. H. C. R. 202, in which however "fraudulently" and "dishonestly" were assumed to mean the same thing.
(10) Kailas Chandra, 6 C. W. N. 382.
(11) Somasundaram, 6 M. L. T. 266.
(12) Adaikal, 32 M. 90.
(13) Venkaraju, (1910) M. W. N. 232 is nothing fraudulent in sending a message in the name of another signing for him as the sender unless it is done on purpose to injure him.[14]

For further commentary, see s. 463, (§§ 5175-5189).

5167. Forgery of One's Own Name.—From what has been said before (§ 5143) it is evident that forgery may as much be committed of the signature of another, as of one's own signature. Such a case may arise where a person executes a fraudulently antedated deed to defeat a transfer of which an example is given in illustration (b), and another example is furnished by illustrations (d) and (c) appended to this explanation, which is merely a restatement of the rule generally enunciated in clause 1. Where a bill of exchange payable to A B or order got into the hands of another person of the same name, who knowing that he is not the real payee, endorsed it for the purpose of fraudulently possessing himself of the money, he was held guilty of forgery.[15] There is, however, nothing criminal in one man signing the name of his namesake by mistake, so long as it is not done for the purpose of fraud. And subject to the same limitation, there is nothing wrong in a person using a nom de plume and passing himself off as such or signing a deed in that name. This is indeed provided in the next explanation (§§ 5169-5174). But this clause is not intended to deal with such cases. It rather refers to those acts which render a man's own deed a forgery according to the object and purpose accompanying its execution.

Explanation 1.

5168. The five illustrations appended to the explanation are intended to illustrate the working of this rule. Of these the first illustration assumes the simplest case. Of two persons of the same name one has credit at a bank, on which the other draws a cheque signing his real name, but intending to pass himself off as the customer of the bank. Here though in signing his own name the person commits forgery, because of the criminal purpose for which he uses his signature or rather because in affixing his signature, he intends that it should pass off as the signature of his namesake. In such a case his guilty intention may be inferred from his attempt to imitate the signature of his namesake, and to profit by it, by presenting the cheque for encashment or the like or his fraudulent intention may be inferred as in the illustrations (b) and (c) in the last of which A finds a cheque payable to A or order, on the road. A knows that he is not its payee, but nevertheless taking advantage of the coincidence of the payee bearing his own name, he endorses it over for payment, in which case he is as much guilty of forgery as if the cheque being payable to B or order A had forged B's name and presented it for payment. For where is the difference between the two cases? The fraud practised in each case was the same, though the similarity of names in the one case makes one or two things possible: either it was a mistake in which case the question of forgery does not arise, or A had taken advantage

---

(14) Kali Persad Banerjee, 26 I. C. (Cal.) 668.

(15) Mead v. Young, 4 T. R. 28.

of the similarity of names, in which case the fact does not affect his criminality.

Illustration (b) furnishes another instance of forgery, but it is scarcely one of the kind contemplated in the explanation. For the acceptance by A in blank under the forged signature of Z of a bill of exchange which B, afterwards draws upon him either in or without collusion with A does not amount to A's forgery of his own name. The reference to B is more in point. For if B draws on Z assuming Z's acceptance which B knew to be a forgery, his execution of the bill of exchange would be a forgery. This illustration was evidently suggested by the case,[16] in which the prisoner offered a bill of exchange payable to Barnard McCarty or order in payment of a watch. The bill purported to be drawn by "Jer. Connell" and it was endorsed as accepted by Rich Betty & Co. The jury found that the prisoner whose name was John Hevey was an entirely different person from Barnard McCarty who was existing and who had made the endorsement, and that Betty & Co., was practically a fictitious name; as though there lived a man called Beatty at the address given, and he was a clerk and had been since then imprisoned, and they finally convicted the prisoner of forgery; but on a case reserved the Judges were unanimously of opinion that the conviction could not be sustained as the endorsement had been found to be by a real person and in his correct name. In short, the case was held not to amount to forgery because the endorsement was found to be real though in fact it was worthless. In illustration (c) the case presented is the very reverse—for in it the endorsement is forged and therefore the bill is declared a forgery, illustrations (d) and (e) call for no comment, for they present the same aspect of the case as is contemplated in clause 1 and is the subject of illustration (h).

5169. Using Fictitious Name—The subject of using one's own name in place of another, is closely connected with the assumption and use of a fictitious or false name, or the name of a deceased person of credit and repute. Here again, the offence lies not in the use of a false name as in its use for a fraudulent purpose. For if one thing is more settled than another, it is that there is nothing wrong in using a fictitious name, provided it is not used for the purpose of fraud. So in an old case[17] it was agreed by the Judges that "in all forgeries the instrument supposed to be forged must be a false instrument in itself; and that if a person give a note entirely as his own, his subscribing it by a fictitious name wil not make it a forgery, the credit there being wholly given to himself, without regard to the name, or any relation to a third person." Cockburn, C. J., applied this rule to a case in which the prisoner, Robert Martin, paid a tradesman in a cheque drawn in the name of William Martin, which he gave out as his own name. He knew that the cheque would be, as in fact it was, dishonoured. It was shown that the prosecutor had accepted the cheque believing in the prisoner's statement that it was

Explanation 2.

(16) Hevey's case, 1 Leach 229; 2 East, P. C. 856.

(17) Dunn's case, 1 Leach C. C. 59 (68), followed in Martindale, 52 C. 347 (368, 369).

drawn in his own name. He was indicted for forgery, but on a case reserved, the Judges held it to be no case of forgery as the mere use of a fictitious Christian name by a person could not constitute that offence.[18] (§§ 2107-2108).

5170. The law on the subject was thus summed up by Sir E. H. East:—

"First, that if a person give a note or other security as his own note or security, and the credit thereupon be personal to himself without any relation to another, his signing such a note with a fictitious name may indeed be cheating, but will not amount to forgery, for in that case it is really the instrument of the party whose act it purports to be, and the creditor had no other security in view.

"But, secondly, that if a note be given in the name of another person, either really existing or represented so to be, and in that light it obtains superior credit, or induce a trust, which could not have been given to the party himself, it is the false instrument and punishable as forgery.

"Thirdly, that the law would be the same though the note or security were thus falsely subscribed in the presence of him who lent his money upon it, if the imposter and the party whose name is made use of were both strangers to him; for then he could not know that such imposter was not really the person whose name he assumed, and, therefore, the other would be equally deceived.[19]

5171. It is not of the essence of this offence that fraud should in fact be committed. All that is necessary is that it should have been intended. And so, it follows that if a person make use of a forged instrument with intent to defraud the prosecutor, it is forgery though the prisoner's real name would have carried with it as much credit as the assumed name. The prisoner, Samuel Whiley, went to a tradesman purchased certain goods and gave him a draft drawn by Samual Milward on a bank in London, which on presentation was dishonoured. The prosecutor admitted in evidence that he did not know the prisoner and that he should have given him credit equally whether the bill was subscribed by his real or fictitious name, and the jury found that the bill had been drawn to defraud the prosecutor; the Judges were, on a case reserved, of opinion that the conviction was right.[20] In order to justify a conviction for forgery, the forger must have, it seems, assumed the fictitious name for that particular purpose, for if the assumed name was his general alias, he could not be charged with forging the name of a "fictitious" person.[21] So where the prisoner, whose real name was John Francis issued a cheque in the name of James Cook, Junior, which was dishonoured, no person of that name having any credit at the bank, the Judge left it to the Jury to say whether the prisoner had assumed the name of James Cook, Junior, with a fraudulent purpose, and on a case reserved, twelve Judges upheld the conviction holding,

(18) Martin, 5 Q. B. D. 34 (37), See his case commented on in § 2108 ante.
(19) 2 East. P. C, 961.
(20) Whiley's case, R. & R. 90.
(21) Bontien, R. & R. 260.

that if the names were assumed for the purpose of the fraud and avoiding detection, it was as much a forgery as if the names assumed were that of any other person of known credit; though the case would have been different if the party defrauding had habitually used and become known by another name than his own.(22)

5172. Even the fact that the assumed name had been used for the purpose of general concealment and fraud would not make its use in a particular case "fictitious." It was so laid down by the Judges in a case in which the prisoner stood charged for forging an acceptance upon a bill of exchange in the name of Scott, but in which the prosecution had failed to establish that the prisoner had assumed that name for that purpose.(23) But it is apprehended that this does not lie on the prosecution in every case. It is sufficient for them to prove that the prisoner had used a name other than his own for the purpose of the fraud, and it will then be upon him to prove that the assumed name was his second name and not adopted on the particular occasion in question.(24) But though the name must be assumed for a particular purpose, it does not follow that it should be assumed to defraud any one person in particular. The accused advertised a work on English idioms purported to have been compiled by "Robert S. Wilson, M.A.," for sale at Rs 2-4, the price being payable in advance to Robert S. Wilson, M.A., Council House Street, Calcutta. He instructed the post office at Calcutta signing himself as Robert S. Wilson, to redirect the money orders to Rajam, to the postmaster of which he addressed another communication instructing him to pay the money order to his clerk Seshagiri Rau, which he did. It was found that the Seshagiri Rau was none other than the accused himself, who signed the money order in that name; that there was no such person as Robert S. Wilson nor any book of the kind advertised. The accused had in fact cheated the public using the fictitious names, and he was convicted of both cheating and forgery; of the latter offence because the accused had forged Robert S. Wilson's signatures on the money orders and so induced the post office to deliver their contents to him.(25) In another case the accused concocted a pseudonymous petition complaining against a person to the District Magistrate, whereupon he was rightly held to have been convicted of this offence.(1) In still another case the accused, a European, who was exempt from the provisions of the Indian Arms Act purchased several revolvers and ammunition from the gunsmiths to whom he gave certificates giving false names and addresses. He was convicted of forging the certificates on the ground that though the conduct of the accused was not dishonest, it was fraudulent in that it deceived the firms into selling him revolvers, and also the Government who had prescribed the forms to be able to trace the weapons and their owners.(2)

(22) Francis' case, R. & R. 90.
(23) Bontien, R. & R. 260.
(24) Peacock, R. & R. 278.
(25) Pera Raju, 13 M. 27.
(1) Sheefait Ally, 10 W. R. 61.
(2) Causley, 43 C. 421; following Toshak, 1 Den. C. C. 492, Certificate of character to admit accused to the Trinity House); Dhunum Kasee, 9 C. 53 (using document with a forged registration indorsement; Abbas Ali, 25 C. 512, F. B. (forged certificate of competency as engineer).

5173. So a person may forge a will in the name of a fictitious person living or dead,(3) and raise money thereon in which case he would be guilty of forgery, for as Patteson, J., said: "There is nothing to limit the offence to the forgery only of the wills of persons that have existed, and it has been expressly held that forgery may be committed by the false making of the will of a living person."(4)

When Fictitious Name Innocent.

5174. But the use of fictitious name is only penal when a person uses it for the purpose of fraud or deception. Consequently, where these elements are wanting a person cannot be convicted of forgery. Such was held to be the case of the mortgager who described himself as the son of his uncle, presumably to strengthen his claim to his adoption,(5) or where the accused signed a bail bond in a fictitious name after having previously informed the Magistrate of it.(6) Such again was the case of the accused who warned his confederate in a dacoity case of an arrest in a telegraphic message, for the sender of which he used and signed in the name of another who complained of the forgery of his signature but the accused was acquitted on ground that the use of the complainant's name as sender of the message, though improper, was not fraudulent inasmuch as it was used to conceal the identity of the accused and not with any view to injure the complainant.(7) The accused was the executant of a kabuliat which was attested by three witnesses including one C. B. which was the name of his landlord. It was found that "C. B." was added as the name of a fictitous person with intent to estop the landlord later on. But it was held to be no forgery.(8)

S. 463.

5175. False Document When a Forgery.—Though section 464 defines a "false document" as something distinct from "forgery" as defined in section 463, it is clear that the simple making of a false document as defined in s. 464 amounts to forgery as defined in section 463. This section, no doubt, requires that such document should have been made "with intent to cause damage or injury to the public or to any person, or to support any claim or title, or to cause any person to part with property, or to enter into any express or implied contract, or with intent to commit fraud, or that fraud may be committed," but these elements are necessarily implied in the terms "dishonestly" and "fraudulently" as used in section 464. And since the offence is complete as soon as a false document is made with the requisite intent, it follows that it is not necesary that the document in question should have been used, or published, or that the injury intended should have, in fact, been caused(9) should the document forged be on its face good and valid for the purpose for which it was created. It was so laid down by Eyre, B.,(10) and so in another place it has been said to be material that the false instrument should carry on the face of it the semblance of that for which it is counterfeited, and should not be illegal in its very frame.(11) But this

(3) Kennang, (1917) 1 K. B. 25.
(4) Avery, 8 C. & P., 596.
(5) Adaikal, 32 M. 90.
(6) Venkaraju, (1910) M. W. N. 232.
(7) Kali Prasad Banerjee, 26 I. C. 668.
(8) Haidar Ali, 17 C. W. N. 354, 18 I. C. 881, 14 Cr. L. J. 129.
(9) Sheefait Ally, 10 W. R. 61.
(10) Jones' case, 1 Leach 367.
(11) East. P. C., c. 19, s. 43, p. 943.

was never a rigid rule of law, and as the section is worded the question of resemblance is not directly relevant for the purpose of the offence, though indirectly it has a material bearing on the offence as reflecting on the question of intention. For as in the case of counterfeiting coins (§§ 282, 2440) or stamps so in the present case the intention of the accused is to practise imposition upon another by passing off the false as the true document. Consequently how can he be said to possess the intention to defraud another, when what he has done is obviously insufficient to deceive even a person using ordinary observation?

5176. In order to deceive, the instrument must then appear upon the face of it to have been made to resemble a true instrument, though the resemblance may not be exact, but it must be at least such as to deceive a person of ordinary intelligence and observation,[12] though it may be wholy insufficient to deceive an expert.[13] Nor again, is it necessary that the forged document should have been in every respect in conformity with the directions of law as to the making of a document of which it purports to be a forgery. So a conveyance may be forged on the stamped paper though even if genuine, it would have been otherwise ineffectual.[14] And so in another case the Judges were of opinion that, in order to constitute forgery it was not necessary that the instrument should be available; that though a compulsory payment by course of law could not have been enforced for want of the proper stamp, yet a man might equally be defrauded by a voluntary payment being lost to him; that if this were a sufficient defence, forged securities might be published on improper stamps with impunity, which would carry the mischief to an alarming extent; that the stamp itself might be forged; and it would be a strange defence to admit in a Court of Justice, that because a man had forged a stamp he ought to be excused for having forged the note itself, which would be setting up one fraud in order to protect him from the punishment due to another.[15]

So a man may be indicted for forging an instrument which if genuine, could not he made available, by reason of some circumstance not appearing upon the face of the instrument but to be made out by extrinsic evidence.[16] So a person may be indicted for forgery though the document forged may not conform to the form in which to be valid, it must be made,[17] nor need it be the legal evidence of the matter expressed,[18] provided that it was intended to be used as evidence of any matter[19] (§ 285). Now since the signing of a document is by no means necessary to give it this character, it follows that " signing, sealing or execution " is by no means an essential prerequisite of a false document within the meaning of s. 464 (§§ 5140-5147) and a document may be made false, though it is unaccompanied by the maker's signature.

---

(12) Collicott, 4 Taunt. 300; Jones, 1 Leach 204; Mahoney, 6 Cox 487.
(13) Hoost, 2 East. P. C. 950.
(14) Hawkeswood's case, 1 Leach 57; Lee's case, 1 Leach 258-n.
(15) Morton's case, 2 East P. C. c. 19, s. 45, p. 955; to the same effect, Teague's case, 2 East P. C., c. 19, s. 55, p. 979; Pike, 2 Moo. C. C. R. 70.
(16) McIntosh, 2 Leach, 833.
(17) Ligon, R. & R. 255; Froud, ib., 389.
(18) Sheefait Ally, 10 W. R. 61.
(19) S. 29; Sheefait Ali, 10 W. R. 61 (62).

5177. A false entry in an account book made to be evidence of a certain payment made to the prosecutor may be a forgery if it was a false entry and made "dishonestly" or "fraudulently" or with any of the specific intents enumerated in this section.[20] But it cannot be said that such an entry is per se false and amounts to forgery. Even if false, it does not necessarily follow that it amounts to forgery. The accused and the prosecutor were at account, and the former being found indebted to the prosecutor in the sum of Rs. 33-5-3, the latter asked the former to acknowledge the sum in his account book, which the accused professed to have done in Malayalam, a language unknown to the complainant, but what he had in fact written was not that the sum was due but that it had been paid in settlement of all previous accounts. The entry was unquestionably false, but the question was whether it amounted to a false document, upon which the Court observed: "In order that a document should be a false document within the meaning of section 464 it must appear that it was made with the intention of inducing the belief that such document as made by, or by the authority of one, who did not make it or give such authority. There is nothing on the face of this entry in the complainant's book to make it appear that the writing was made or authorized by him. The entry was not signed by the complainant, and contained no indication that he acknowledged it as his own statement. We cannot, therefore, say that the entry is a document which was made by the prisoner with the intention denoted by the first clause of section 454, or caused by him to be signed or executed within the meaning of the third clause of that section." The Court then converted the accused's conviction into one for attempted cheating.[21] Other cases[22] of false entries turned upon the absence of dishonesty and fraud, the accused having made the entries more to conceal their past misconduct than to perpetrate any act of dishonesty or fraud upon another (§§ 5148-5150).

5178. Intent Necessary to Constitute Forgery.—This recalls once more the question of intention—a subject, the general aspects of which have been already considered (§§ 5148-5165), but which is again referred to here with some particularity and which furnishes the true crux of the crime. Generally speaking, however, all that is implied by the intents specified in s. 463 is that the false document should have been made either dishonestly or fraudulently. But in enumerating the intents more specifically in section 463, the only object conceivable is to exclude, by elimination, all other intents though dishonest or fraudulent which do not fall into the category of anyone of the specific intents which alone make a false document a forgery, and the forger punishable under section 465.

(1) Damage to the Public.

5179. Of these intents the first speaks of an "intent to cause damage or injury to the public" which then necessarily implies that an intent to defraud any particular person is not necessary. So Maule, J., said: "The Recorder seems to have thought that, in order to prove an intent

(20) Per Holloway and Innes, JJ., in I. T. J. (L. S.) 46.

(21) Kunju Nayar, 12 M. 114.

(22) Shankar, 4 B. 657; Balwant, (1894) B. U. C. 595; Jawala Ram, (1895) P. R. No. 12.

to defraud, there should have been some person defrauded or who might possibly have been defrauded. But I do not think that at all necessary. A man may have an intent to defraud, and yet there may not be any person who could be defrauded by his act. Suppose a person with a good account at his banker's, and a friend with his knowledge, forges a name to his cheque, either to try his credit or to imitate his handwriting there would be no intent to defraud, though there would be parties who might be defrauded. But where another person has no account at his banker's but a man supposes that he has, there would be an intent to defraud in that case although no person could be defrauded."(23) "Again, there may be an intent to defraud without the power or the opportunity to defraud."(24)

The prisoner had purchased twenty shares of a certain railway of A, a broker, which stood in the name of P, but A did not send the prisoner the transfer-deed as he had then become insolvent, and he thereupon caused a boy to execute the assignment in the name of P. All calls on the shares had been paid. It was held, that the prisoner might be convicted of forgery, whether his intent was to defraud P or the Railway. As Rolfe, B., put it: "The prisoner's act was a wrongful act, whereby others might be damnified. In one respect the case may be said to be a case of misfortune, as perhaps, the prisoner considered himself entitled to the transfer; he had, most likely, contemplated helping himself by wrong to what he thought his right. I can, however, perceive no reason for doubting that the act involved a fraud.(25) The fact that a person fabricated a false document does not, however, carry with it a presumption that he had a fraudulent intent. The question of such intent, is, however, a question of fact to be found by the jury.(1) It is, however, sufficient for them to find that the prisoner had fraud in view, though the fact that he had actually defrauded some one would be the best evidence of such intent, though proof that the act could not have defrauded him, would not suffice to negative fraud."(2) So where the prisoner pledged a forged bill of exchange merely to obtain credit, it was held to be fraudulent, though the prisoner may not have intended to defraud the prosecutor.(3)

Intention Inferred from Knowledge.

5180. The question of intention is a question of inference, and in England, it has been held that the jury are bound to infer it if they are satisfied that a document was uttered by the prisoner as true, intending it to be

(23) Nash, 2 Den. C. C. 493.

(24) Nash, 2 Den. C. C. 493. It is just as well to note that the English rule on this subject has only been made clear since the passing of 24 & 25 Vict., c. 98, s. 44, which expressly declares that in an indictment for forgery a general intent to defraud without alleging an intent to defraud any particular person is sufficient. The previous Statute (14 & 15 Vict., c. 100, s. 8), on the subject, was by no means so clear, though the Judges held a general intention sufficient. But referring to it Wightman, J. (Creswell and Earle, JJ., and Bramwell B. concurring) said: "Before the late Statute it was necessary to allege an intent to defraud some one, and there must be an intention to do so now."—(1856) Hodgson, D. & B. 3.

(25) Hoatson, 2 C. & R. 777.

(1) Holden, R. & R. 154; Marcus, 2 C. & R. 356; Hoatson, ib., 777.

(2) Sheppard, R. & R. 169; Harvery, 2 St. Tr. (N. S.) 1.

(3) Birkett, R. & R. 86; Masagora, R. & R. 291; Trenfield, 1 F. & F. 43.

taken as such, and that he knew it to be forged.(4) But knowledge has been looked upon as distinct from intention in the Code (§ 341) and one may justify an inference as to the presence of the other, but it is not a necessary consequence. This was evidently implied in a case(5) decided upon the following facts: The accused, who was a copyist in the Collector's office, wrote a letter purporting to be on behalf of a jail-warder applying for a transfer, which was sent to the Inspector-General of Jails stamped with a "service" postage stamp. It was proved that the application was written by the accused, who, however, stated that it had been written at the request of the warder who, however, denied having authorized it and the accused was thereupon prosecuted for forgery, but the Court held that the intention to cause damage or injury or to commit fraud was not proved by the prosecution. It could be inferred from the mere fact that the warder had not authorized the writing of the letter. It was proved that the prisoner and the warder were strangers, which the Court considered in favour of the accused, for if he did not know the warder he could have borne no ill-will against him. It was possible that some warder's enemy induced the prisoner to write the letter, but this was a mere surmise. The Session Judge had convicted the prisoner holding that he might, at any rate, have known that the letter would injure the warder, but the Court held such knowledge insufficient, as what the section required was intention and not merely knowledge. The prisoner was therefore acquitted.(6) But in another case the Court held it to be a necessary inference which the jury should be directed to draw if they were satisfied that the accused had uttered a forged document as a true one, meaning it to be taken as such and knowing it to be forged.(7)

(2) Injury to a Person.

5181. Between an act intended to the injury of the public and one intended only to injure a person, there is no difference except one of degree. In other respects it is immaterial. Forgeries intended to injure persons are, however, more common and present less difficulties in proof. They are at the same time usually of a more serious nature than those in which no one in particular was intended to be injured. But in either case, the offence is complete with intention—it is not necessary that any person in fact should be defrauded.(8) Nor need the intention be to cause any pecuniary loss to him, for the words "damage or injury" would appear to have been used here in cognate sense as implying the doing of any "harm whatever illegally caused to any person in body mind, reputation or property."(9) The harm must have been then caused illegally—not in the sence that it was caused by means of forgery, but the harm caused must be an illegal harm, that is to say, it must be a harm the causing of which is an offence or prohibited by law or that it at least furnishes a ground for a civil action.(10) But an act which merely causes a civil injury to another is not necessarily done "dishonestly" or "fraudulently" and it must have been so done to amount

(4) Hill, 8 C. & P. 275; Cooke, ib., 582 (586); Geach, 9 C. & P. 499.
(5) Feda Hossein, 10 C. L. R. 184.
(6) Ib.
(7) Dhunum Kazee, 9 C. 53.
(8) Crooke, 2 Str. 901; Goate, 1 Ld. Raym. 737.
(9) S. 44.
(10) S. 43.

to this offence. The terms of this section are, consequently, somewhat wider than those of section 464, but, as observed before, no act not amounting to the making of a false document under that section is punishable as forgery, so that whatever may be the intention of the accused, whether to cause "injury" to the public or to any person or whether it be to support any claim or title, it must at the same time be an act which is "dishonest" or "fraudulent" as those words have been used in the Code.

(3) Support any Claim.

5182. This will be manifest from the next clause which is more general and speaks of the intent being "to support any claim or title." Now a document may be fabricated to support a righteous claim as much as to bolster up a false claim, but it does not follow that the accused is equally guilty in either case. Where, for instance, the accused who was the occupancy tenant of a certain land from which he had been illegally ejected by the landlord, applied to the Revenue Court for his reinstatement and in support of his tenancy forged and filed certain rent receipts in lieu of the genuine ones which he had lost, and whereupon he was convicted, Bordhurst, J., quashed the conviction holding that, though the documents had undoubtedly been fabricated to support his title to the land, still they had been made to replace the genuine ones lost, and though they were filed to support a claim or title, it could not be said that they had been made "dishonestly or fraudulently" so as to constitute them "false documents" within the meaning of section 464.[11] But this case may probably require reconsideration for it is not clear why they were not made "fraudulently" as that term is defined in the Code (§§ 255-263). Moreover, it is not necessary for the purpose of this offence that the claim or title should be false or unfounded, since a person commits equally an offence even if he forges a document to support a claim otherwise good [12] (§ 5159).

5183. The term "claim" is wide and is not intended to be restricted in its application to a claim to property.[13] It may, indeed, be a claim to anything, as for instance, a claim to a woman, as the claimant's wife, a claim to the custody of a child as being the claimant's child, or a claim to be admitted to attendance at a law-class in a college or to be admitted to university or other examination, or a claim to continue in service [14] or one for the possession of immoveable or any other kind of property.[15] So where the accused obtained admission to a second year lectures of a certain college on the strength of a forged certificate produced by him, to shew that he had completed the first year's course at another college, it was held that the false certificate was used to support the accused's claim to attend lectures of an advance course and was as such a forgery within the meaning of this section.[16] This view was considered and concurred in by a Full Bench

(11) Sheo Dayal, 7 A. 459.
(12) Dhunum Kazee, 9 C. 53.
(13) Soshi Bhusan, 15 A. 210 (217); contra held in Haradhan, 19 C. 380, has since been overruled in Abbas Ali, 25 C. 512. F. B. To the same effect, Khandu Singh, 22 B. 768; Kotamraju Venkatragadu, 28 M. 90.
(14) F. C. Woodward, 18 S. L. R. 199, (1925) S. 233.
(15) Soshi Bhusan, 15 A. 210.
(16) Ib.

of the Madras High Court in a case in which the accused who was a candidate for admission to the Matriculation examination of the Madras University, produced to the Registrar a forged certificate purporting to be from the Headmaster of a recognised high school which was required by the rules, and for which he was held to have been rightly convicted under section 471.[17] The accused must, however, produce the document in support of a claim or title which presupposes that such claim or title is alleged, though it need not be alleged by the person who commits the forgery, for he may be a hireling witness filing a forged document in support of his (party's) claim. Nor is it necessary that the document should be sufficient to support the claim made or the title set up.

5184. The terms "claim or title," though large, are not intended to mean a mere plea or an argument, as distinct from a demand of a right or a supposed right. So where a person made certain entries in his creditor's account-book showing re-payment of his loan which in fact was not made, the entry could not be said to have been made to support a claim within the meaning of this section, though the act of the accused might otherwise amount to forgery (§§ 5159-5165).

(4) Part with Property.

5185. A forgery which has for its object the transfer of property must be made "dishonestly" as distinct from "fraudulently," for a person who intends to cause another to part with property by means of a forged document, cannot conceivably have any other object in view. But here, again, the clause is somewhat too wide, for it may conceivably include cases in which the transfer of property is not obtained wrongfully. Such a case may arise where A deposits money with C, and intending to withdraw it, C illegally refuses to pay it unless A procures B's concurrence. A forges it, and thereupon obtains payment of what was payable to him without the concurrence.

5186. The term "property" is nowhere defined in the Code, or for that matter, in any other Indian enactment. It may, however, be defined to be anything that is the subject of ownership. As such, it includes not only such things as are ordinarily classed as property, but also those which law protects and recognizes as fit objects of ownership.[18] A college certificate has been so held.[19] It is, however, a term of varying import, as implying not only a thing which has an actual existence but also one which exists potentially, as for example, future property. The word as used here has been held to extend to both. And it could not be otherwise. For example, if A gave an order to B to buy the materials for making, and to make a silver tea-service for him and C before the tea-service was made, or the materials for making it had been bought, were to make a false letter purporting, but falsely, to be signed by A, authorizing B to deliver to D the tea-service when made, C would have committed forgery within the mean-

(17) Kotamraju, 28 M. 90, F. B.; Nga Ba Thein, 4 U. B. R. 174; 76 I. C. 225 (accused used a forged certificate to support his claim for employment).

(18) Gour's Law of Transfer (5th Ed.), §§ 182-184.

(19) Soshi Bhusan, 15 A. 210.

ing of this section by making that false document with intent to cause B to part with property, namely, the tea-service, when made.[20]

(5) Intent to Enter into Contract.

5187. Again, a false document made with intent to enter into any express or implied contract, falls into the same category. Such document must be presumably made to enable the person using it to obtain an advantage by means of the contract it enables him to enter into. Such contract may be personal or it may relate to property. In the former case, there must be presence of fraud, and in the latter case, there must be dishonesty. In the one case the accused may secure service by producing a forged certificate (§§ 5163-5165), in the second case he may obtain property by using the same means (§§ 5154-5155).

(6) With intent to Commit Fraud.

5188. Lastly, the intent of the forger may be "to commit fraud, or that fraud may be committed." Now since the document must of necessity, have been made "fraudulently" which is defined to connote an "intent to defraud," a question may arise, and has been raised as to whether this phrase is any different to the one used in section 463. In other words, is there any difference between doing a thing "fraudulently" and doing it "with intent to defraud." In the opinion of Sir Arnold White, C. J., though the two are otherwise distinguishable as in s. 239, they are intended to mean the same thing in this connection. Consequently, if a document is made false "fraudulently," it is forgery irrespective of this clause which is then superfluous.[21] But though the intent to "defraud" and to "commit fraud" is the same, still it is something more than mere "deceiving." For instance, A tells B a lie, and B believes him. B is deceived, but it does not follow that A intended to defraud B. But A tells B a lie intending that B should do something, which A conceives to be to his own benefit or advantage, and which, if done, would be to the loss or detriment of B, A intends to defraud B. So Sir James Stephen observes: "Whenever the words 'fraud' or 'intent to defraud,' or 'fraudulently' occur in the definition of a crime, two elements at least are essential to the commission of the crime; namely, first, deceit or an intention to deceive or in some cases mere secrecy; and secondly, either actual injury or possible injury, or an intent to expose some person either by actual or possible injury or an intent to expose some person either to actual injury or to a risk of possible injury, by means of that deceit or secrecy."[22]

It is not necessary that in an intent to defraud there should be present both an intention to secure a benefit or advantage to oneself and to cause loss or detriment to the other, for the presence of one without the other is sufficient. The presence of one may sometimes involve also the presence of the other, but this is rather an aggravated case of fraud and by no means the usual one. As Sir James Stephen remarked, the principal object of a fraudulent person is, in nearly every case, his own advantage. But such advantage need not be connected with pecuniary gain. For instance, such gain is not apparent in the attempt of a person to obtain admission to the examination of a university by producing a forged certifi-

---

(20) Sosi Bhusan, 15 A. 210.
(21) Kotamraju Venkatragadu, 28 M. 90, F. B.
(22) 2 Hist, Cr. L. 121.

cate, though the advantage he intends thereby to obtain is manifest.[23] But the advantage in this connection must, it is conceived, be of a character connected—though it may be remotely connected—with property or pecuniary gain. Otherwise it would be difficult to distinguish those cases[24] in which the accused had merely courted titular or social distinction by means of forged documents.

That Fraud may be Committed.

5189. Lastly arise cases in which the forger does not himself intend to commit fraud, but does an act to facilitate its commission by another. Such person may be held guilty of abetment, but the Code regards his offence as far too serious to leave his punishment to general section. It is, indeed, one of those sections in which the Code makes a 'special' provision for the punishment of the abettor. A person who knowingly scribes or attests a false document would thus be held guilty under this clause, though he may be acquitted of any intention to use the false document himself. So where a police-constable in disguise approached the accused who was alleged to be a professional forger with intent to entrap him, and asked him to substitute his name in a notice issued by a Deputy Collector, as he intended to file it in a civil suit, and the accused thereupon effected the alteration charging the prosecutor Rs. 25 for the act, it was held that the accused had brought himself within the penal visitation of s. 466—which he had, but it is submitted by virtue of this clause.[25]

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st class. Non-cog. Warrant. Bailable. Not comp. Sanction.

Punishment for forgery.

465. Whoever commits forgery shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years or with fine or with both.

[Forgery—s. 463.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5190).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5191-5194).
(3) Proof (5195).
(4) Form of Charge (5196-5197).
(5) Evidence of Forgery (5198).
(6) Handwriting Expert (5199-5201).
(7) Leading Rules for Detection of Forgery (5202-5203).
(8) Finger Prints (5204).
(9) Foot Prints (5205).

5190. Analogous Law.—This section merely prescribes a punishment for forgery not otherwise provided for. Subsequent sections provide for the same offence when accompanied by more aggravating circumstances, as where the document forged is a Court or public record (s. 466), or a valuable security, will or the like (s. 467), or the intention of the forger is to cheat (s. 468), or to harm the reputation of another (s. 469), in all of which cases the Code prescribes higher penalties of varying degree according to the nature and degree of the crime. Other sections deal with

(23) Kotamraju Venkatragadu, 28 M. 90 F. B.
(24) Jan Mahomed, 10 C. 584; Hodgson, 7 Cox 78.
(25) Haradhan Maiti, 14 C. 513, F. B.

cognate offences and present a close analogy to the corresponding offences relating to coins and stamps, as will best be seen from the following table:—

Subject.	Coin.	Stamp.	Document.
Possession of counterfeit	Ss. 239, 242	S. 259.	S. 474.
Using counterfeit as genuine.	Ss. 242, 243, 252, 253.	Ss. 259, 260.	S. 471.
Making or possessing counterfeiting instruments.	S. 235	S. 256.	Ss. 472, 473.

5191. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class. While, ordinarily, no complaint of a Court is required for the prosecution of the accused for this offence, such complaint is necessary "when such offence has been committed in any Court in respect of a document produced or given in evidence in such proceeding.(1) Complaint of the Court is then a prerequisite only in a case in which the document alleged to be forged is "produced or given in evidence." The word "produced" was added for the first time in the Procedure Code of 1898 to widen the scope of the rule by embracing cases in which a document is merely filed though it is not given in evidence.(2) The amendment was made to overrule the Madras case(3) in which a document merely filed but not tendered in evidence was under the law, as it then stood, held to afford no ground to the Court for ordering a prosecution under this section. The term forgery as used in s. 195 of the Procedure Code, is to be understood in its generic sense as implying all derivative offences generally so designated. For instance, an offence under s. 467 would be so called.(4)

5192. It is also worthy of note that the necessity of complaint arises only for the prosecution of a party to a proceeding and consequently since witnesses are not parties to a proceeding, no complaint of a court is required for their prosecution, though witnesses may be committed for trial under the more general provisions of s. 476.(5) So where the accused who acting as agent of a party to a civil suit, filed a forged document, the Court held his prosecution justifiable without sanction, as s. 195 (c) applied only to a "party" and did not extend to his agent.(6) Since complaint is only required in respect of a document produced in a "Court" which means a Court of Justice as defined in the Code(7) and since a Sub-Registrar of Assurances is not a Court, it follows that no complaint is

(1) S. 195 (c), Cr. P. C.
(2) Akhil Chandra De, 22 C. 1004.
(3) Abdul Khadar v. Meera Sahheb, (1892) 15 M. 224.
(4) Tulja, 12 B. 36.
(5) Devji, 18 B. 581 (585); Mathura Das, 16 A. 80 (83).
(6) Chand Mal, (1879) P. R. No. 9.
(7) S. 20.

required in respect of a forged document presented for registration in his office.[8]

5193. As regards the principles that should guide the Court in granting or refusing sanction, it has been already stated (§ 2171) that the Court incurs some responsibility in setting the criminal law in motion, and it must, therefore, be satisfied that it does not merely lend its aid to one party or the other without satisfying itself that a prima facie case exists to support the prosecution of the accused, and that there are reasonable chances of his conviction. It is not merely enough that reasonable suspicion attaches to the accused, but that such suspicion is strong enough to carry conviction to a judicial mind upon an impartial consideration of the facts and circumstances upon which it usually bases its judgment. The fact that the document impeached as forged has been found to be genuine by one Court is not of itself a sufficient ground to refuse sanction, even though the decision of the Civil Court was upheld on appeal which finally affirmed its genuineness, but it is a fact which though not creating a legal bar to the criminal prosecution by the accused is still a fact which the Court sanctioning or ordering the prosecution could not lightly ignore.[9] At the same time, where the prosecution of a person is ordered the judgment of the Civil Court is wholly inadmissible either for or against the accused, and the judge is not entitled to refer to it or to the opinions therein expressed to the jury.[10] An application for sanction, dismissed in default under the old law, did not amount to a refusal of sanction,[11] the application for which might be revived. Though the Court may complain against the accused for forgery, the committing Magistrate is competent to charge him for any other offence disclosed by the evidence, as for example, fabricating false evidence under s. 193.[12]

5194. The acquittal of the prisoner for one charge of forgery would not preclude his trial for the same offence based on a different document. The prisoner was charged with having forged two pattahs A and B bearing the same date and adduced in evidence by him in the same suit. No mention of any charge as to pattah B was made in the order of commitment; and the prisoner having been acquitted on an indictment for forging pattah A, it was held that the plea of autrefois acquit was inadmissible on a subsequent trial of the prisoner for forging pattah B.[13]

5195. Proof.—This offence is no exception to the general rule that the evidence against the accused justifying his conviction for this offence must prove conclusively all the ingredients of the offence charged. It is, of course, on the prosecution to prove that the document was forged, and forged by the accused. It is not for the defence to prove that it is genuine.[14] The gist of the crime is dishonesty or fraud. Where therefore the plaint was signed by the plaintiff's unauthorised agent in the name of the plaintiff and he also verified it, but the plaintiff admitted that he had authorised his agent to sign for him, it was held that though the

---

(8) See s. 195 (2), Cr. P. C.; Tulja, 12 B. 36.

(9) Gulmuhammad, (1882) P. R. No. 36.

(10) Gogun Chunder Ghose, 6 C. 247.

(11) Gopal, 10 Bom. L. R. 95.

(12) S. 195 (5), Cr. P. C. overruling contra in Subi Sani, 8 B. H. C. R. 28.

(13) Dwarkanath Dutt, 7 W. R. 15.

(14) Luchmi Singh, (1918) Pat. 36, 44 I. C. 456, 19 Cr. L. J. 344; Haidar Ali, 17 C. W. N. 364, 18 I. C. 881, 14 Cr. L. J. 129.

agent's act was improper he could not be convicted for forgery as he had not done so dishonestly or fraudulently.(15)

It is open to the accused to deny a fact and afterwards explain it by averring a fact inconsistent with his denial.(16) A person should not be convicted of a serious crime solely on the evidence of similarity of thumb impressions,(17) or of handwriting.(18) The fact that a man who files a document is intersted in establishing its contents does not raise a presumption that he had filed it knowing it to be forged. Where a man filed a document upon which he relied, but when it was discovered that the document had been forged, he fled away, it was held that his conduct was in no way consistent with his innocence.(19)

The points requiring proof are:—

(1) (a) That the accused made, signed, sealed or executed the document in question, or any part thereof, or (b) that it was made by some one else.

(2) That it was made under any of the circumstances stated in s. 464.

(3) That the accused made it dishonestly or fraudulently, or with any of the specific intents enumerated in s. 463.

5196. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you forged a certain document, to wit (describe it) with intent to cause a damage or injury to A B or to support a certain claim of title to wit——; or to cause A B to part with certain property, to wit——; or to enter into a certain contract with A B with regard to (mention the object) or with intent to commit fraud (specify it) or that fraud may be committed by P Q (or a person unknown) and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 465 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

5197. A charge is bad which does not state the intention.(20) A person charged under this section and s. 471 cannot be convicted under s. 466 read with s. 471,(21) and even where he is charged with and convicted of this offence read with s. 471 he cannot be separately sentenced as for committing two independent offences.(22) A person cannot be charged for making or causing to be made a false document, since one is

(15) Ram Sarup, 43 I. C. (Pat.) 828, 19 Cr. L. J. 236.
(16) Kali Prasad, 26 I. C. (C.) 668, 16 Cr. L. J. 76.
(17) Jassu Ram, 4 L. 246.
(18) Mhd Kobiruddin, 51 I. C. (Pat.) 775, 20 Cr. L. J. 534.
(19) Mobarak Ali, 17 C. W. N. 94, 15 I. C. 81, 13 Cr. L. J. 449.
(20) Haidar Ali, 17 C. W. N. 354, 18 I. C. 881, 14 Cr. L. J. 129.
(21) Mobarak Ali, 17 C. W. N. 94.
(22) Pirbhu Dial, (1913) P. R. No. 4; Mokand Lal, (1901) P. R. No. 26; Umrao Lal, 23 A. 84; contra in Badri Prasad, 35 A. 63, in which no cases were cited to support the view of the text.

an offence under this section, while the other is only an act of abetment. A conviction based upon such a charge cannot be upheld.(23)

5198. Evidence of Forgery.—The elements necessary for the composition of this crime are set out in the last two sections which define the offence. As there stated (§§ 5135-5136) the basis of this offence is a false document defined in s. 464 which comprises all the elements constituting the offence more specifically defined in the earlier section. A forged document is then a false document in the special sense in which that term is used in s. 474, for the falsity of the document there consists not only of its being made to resemble another, but that it is so made on purpose, that purpose being dishonest or fraudulent (§§ 5151, 5152, 5157-5165). In short, this section was not intended to punish the accused for imitating or fabricating a document, but for doing so with intent to commit fraud. The gist of the offence then lies in the criminal intent which, when not obvious, must be clearly and conclusively established.(24) The following cases illustrate the application of this principle to concrete cases. The accused Ram Sarup was the gumashta of the plaintiff Sagar Mal who instituted a suit in which the plaint was signed and verified by the accused falsely describing his own writing as "Sagar Mal ba kalam khas" (i.e., Sagar Mal by his own pen). Sagar Mal admitted that he had authorised the accused to sign for him. It was held that though the act of the accused was improper, it was not done fraudulently or dishonestly and that therefore the order for his prosecution was cancelled.(25)

In another case two persons were charged—one Haidar Ali for forgery and one Affsaruddin for its abetment. Affsaruddin was the scribe of a kabuliyat executed by Haidar Ali in favour of his landlord Chand Buksh. It was attested by three witnesses one of whom was Chand Buksh. The charge was that the name of Chand Buksh was a forgery, added to make the lessee's title secure by creating an estoppel against the landlord. The defence alleged that that signature was of an itinerant teacher. The Court held that if the accused intended to use that attestation against the landlord it might constitute the fabricating of false evidence or it might be a preparation for cheating but it did not amount to forgery because there was nothing to show that the accused had forged it or caused it to be forged by another and there was no proof of dishonesty or fraud on the part of either accused. They were therefore acquitted.(1) The accused had executed a marriage-deed in favour of one Aimona whose wealth he coveted. He was not married to Aimona and the deed contained a false recital of his marriage to her. It was held that though the deed was false the accused could not be convicted of this offence for making it because it was in reality a document executed by him though his motive for executing it was fraudulent.(2) Such might have been the intention of the accused, who had added to an entry in his account book, thumb

(23) Haidar Ali, 17 C. W. N. 354, 18 I. C. 881, 14 Cr. L. J. 129.

(24) Luchmi Singh, (1918) Pat. 36, 44 I. C. 456, 19 Cr. L. J. 344, Haidar Ali, 17 C. W. N. 364, 18 I. C. 881, 14 Cr. L. J. 129.

(25) Ram Sarup, 43 I. C. (Pat.) 828, 19 Cr. L. J. 236, following Bhavanishankar, 11 B. H. C. R. 3. To the same effect, Kali Prasad, 26 I. C. (C.) 668, 16 Cr. L. J. 76 (Signing another's name on a telegram without his authority but with no intent to injure him).

(1) Haidar Ali, 17 C. W. N. 354, 18 I. C. 881, 14 Cr. L. J. 129.

(2) Gunjar Mohammed, 69 I. C. (C.) 451, 23 Cr. L. J. 723.

marked by the debtor, words of his own to the effect that if the amount was not paid as agreed upon, he would take one and a half times the principal including interest. It was held that the addition was made as a statement by the accused and that therefore it did not amount to forgery.(3)

The following was, however, a clear case of forgery. The accused was insolvent. He wanted to take a contract from a Municipality and wanted to prove to them the return of his solvency. He owed a sum of Rs. 73-12 to the Cantonment authorities. He forged a receipt for that sum and filed it before the District Judge in support of his application for annulment of the adjudication order. He was convicted. It was argued for him that his motive was not dishonest which it was not, but it was clearly fraudulent in that he intended to deceive the District Judge into cancelling his previous order adjudging him insolvent.(4)

5199. Handwriting Expert.—Proof of falsity and fraud are then the two cardinal points which go to establish the crime and the only question that a case under this section is likely to present itself for solution is—how are they to be proved? Of these two the proof of the first must depend upon either direct or indirect or circumstantial evidence. The former may comprise the evidence of eye-witnesses, or the opinion of "experts"(5) or of those acquainted with the handwriting of the forger of the author of the genuine document,(6) or of the Court itself on the comparison of the disputed with the genuine handwriting.(7) Of these the first and third call for notice, the second depends upon the credibility of the witness, the nature and extent of his acquaintance with the handwriting and his general intelligence as disclosed or tested in his cross-examination.

5200. The evidence of a handwriting expert is, however, admissible out of a wholly different consideration. His evidence is admissible as of a person specially skilled in questions as to the identity of handwriting.(8) In order to be admissible such evidence must then be of a person specially skilled in questions as to the identity of handwriting. It is only when he is proved to possess such knowledge that his evidence becomes relevant. The Court cannot take judicial notice of such an expert, for there is no recognised institution for their training on the subject. Handwriting experts are mostly persons who set themselves up as such in business, in which case they pass themselves off as professional experts, and it is then for the Court to judge whether there is any justification for their pretensions. In England it is customary to call bank cashiers, postal officials and lithographers as such experts, it being supposed that such persons having to compare different signatures in the course of their official duties acquire an experience which qualifies them in the science of detecting forgeries. But this cannot be assumed as a matter of course, though the fact that in their official duties they have to discriminate between genuine and forged signatures, is certainly a point which tells in their favour. For as Maule, J., said: "All persons, I think, who practise a business or profession which requires them to possess a certain knowledge of the matter in hand, are experts, so far as expertness is required."(9) All the same, experts in handwriting are not in the same

(3) Badan Singh, 3 L. 373, (1923) A. I. R. (L.) 11.
(4) Abdul Ghafoor, 43 A. 225.
(5) S. 45, Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872).
(6) Ib., s. 47.
(7) Ib., s. 73.
(8) Ib., s. 45.
(9) Vander Donckt v. Thelluson, 8 C. B. 112.

favour with the courts as other experts, as for instance, a medical witness. Indeed, if truth be told, they are secretly regarded as mercenary charlatans who are ready to place their self-styled expertness at the disposal of any party valuing their evidence. Moreover, even when such an expert is otherwise above suspicion, the Court nevertheless looks askance at the testimony of experts called by a party, and at all events, as Abbot, C.J., said, it is evidence " to which no great weight should be given.....for I think it much too loose to be the foundation of a judicial decision, either by Judges or juries."(10)

5201. Indeed, it has been even denied that there can be such a thing as expertness in handwriting. As it was said in a case: Many persons, write alike; having the same teacher, writing in the same office, being of the same family—all these produce similitude in handwriting, which, in common cases, and by common observers, is not liable to be distinguished. The handwriting of the same person varies at different periods of life: it is affected by age, by infirmity, by habit,"(11) and—it may be added—by the pen he writes with, and the ink he uses, the temper he is in and the posture in which he then places himself. Writing is reducing to symbols a man's mental thoughts, and the former often vary as much as a man's mental mood. All the same with all these differences, there is an individuality impressed on a man's handwriting which is all his own and cannot be simulated. This is the vindication of experts—but though this undoubtedly affords a firm foundation for the science of handwriting, it contains so many elements of uncertainties that there is as much danger of the expert deceiving himself as of deceiving others. Consequently it is now a recognized rule of practice not to convict a person on the mere uncorroborated testimony of a handwriting expert.(12)

5202. Leading Rules For Detection of Forgery.—These are words of necessary caution, but with that reservation, there is no reason why the following analysis of the elementary rules should not prove useful, not only as aids for detecting forgeries, but also for checking the work of those who may be called to give evidence as experts:—

(1) The sole and only means of detecting forgery from the genuine handwriting, is by close comparison of the disputed with the proved or admittedly genuine handwriting. It is, therefore, necessary that the expert should have before him undisputed handwriting to afford basis for pronouncing on the character of the disputed document. For this purpose, the more specimens he has of genuine writings written at different times and with different pens the better, for it would then enable him to eliminate immaterial differences and take in only their common individual characteristics which give an individuality to the writing.

(2) The expert must be told the respective ages of the two writings as far as possible for the effect of age, disease and excitement is characteristically reflected in the handwriting.

(3) The examination for the two must at first be superficial, that is with the naked eye without the aid of a microscope or a magnify-

(10) Gurney v. Langlands, 5 B. & A. 330; to the same effect, Srikant 2 A. L. J. R. 444; Jalaluddin (1912) P. W. R. 18, 15 I. C. 979, 13 Cr. L. J. 563.

(11) Arguendo in Johnson (Mr. Justice), 29 How. St. Tr. 475.

(12) Shrikant, 2 A. L. J. 44; Jalaluddin, (1914) P. L. R. 147, 15 I. C. 979.

ing lens. It should be confined to the detection of the characteristics of differences present between the disputed and admitted hand writings and not present between the two admitted specimens of genuine hand-writing.

(4) It is universally recognized that no person is capable of producing two writings or signatures exactly identical. It therefore naturally follows that the two writings of the same person must necessarily present differences —sometimes great and deceptive, at other times small—but still differences which must be noted for the purpose of comparison, and elimination as immaterial differences, which in no way affect the question of genuineness.

(5) The aid of microscope specially constructed to expose a large surface is at this stage necessary—a magnifying lens is scarcely of any value for it possesses neither the necessary magnifying power nor does it afford that steadiness to the object and the eye which is absolutely necessary for the purpose of examination.

(6) Looking through the microscope the handwriting will reveal details of the writer's habit which the naked eye had failed to discover. It will, for instance, disclose the following points for observation:—

(a) The usual course taken by his hand in forming certain letters, whether they are formed by one continuous writing, or after pen-rests, each of which will leave a distinct dot in the continuous line which otherwise marks the course of the pen.

(b) The method of his pen-presentation will be disclosed by the uneven ink on the lines which form the letters of his handwriting. To the naked eye these lines appear evenly black, but the microscope discloses a wholly different fact. For it will appear that the line really consists of two unequal lines one of which is distinctly blacker than the other. These furrows are made by each of the split points of the pen, and a little trial will convince anyone that the writer ordinarily applies more pressure to one than to the other, according as he holds the pen with its outer end slanting in one direction or the other.

(c) The measure of pen-pressure in the admitted and disputed handwriting should become manifest. But for greater accuracy the two handwritings may be superimposed so that the two can be seen as a transparency with a strong light behind it. This feature of habitual pen-pressure is one which more than anything else assists the examiner in detecting a forgery. For while the writer's pressure being continuous and normal, the pen-furrow will be continuous and contain an even flow of the writing fluid, the forger has either to stop to look at the model, or go over the same writing over again to finish the simulation with approaching resemblance.

(d) Traces of pencil marks or tracing lines and scratching caused by rubber or erasure destroying the gloss or smoothness of the paper.

(7) Having examined so far the writings must next be compared for habitual parallelisms between the disputed and admitted handwritings. This depends upon the comparison of the furrows in the lines of each, which must present the same outlines in the two writings.

(8) At this stage care must be taken to see that the disputed handwriting is not the disguised handwriting of the same person. Where it is done by one himself conversant with the science of handwriting, it may well defy detection; but in any other case the imitation of oneself does leave behind the same peculiarities which distinguish the true from the false handwriting.

(9) The examiner may now be able to formulate a provisional opinion whether the two writings are from the same or different hands. If the latter, the writing must be closely examined to see whether it is a tracing of a copy or a freehand drawing. One of the most prominent features of forgeries made by tracing, is the general lameness of the writing as appearing in the uniform width of the lines, and the omission of the usual shading emphasis. This is due to the absence of the habitual pen-pressure, and the necessitated slow movement of the pen held closely in contact with the paper, and by which a uniform and steady flow of ink is deposited thereon; thus making what should be the heavier and lighter lines of one width and density as to shading. This method of tracing is restored to by novices but is seldom employed by expert forgers.[13]

The more usual method of tracing is to make a pencil sketch of the writing over which it is afterwards copied. But this method will produce the tell-tale pen-rests, retouchings, angularity or change of direction of lines due to hesitancy, which reveal all forgeries by copying.

(10) As compared to tracings and copy, the detection of forgery by freehand by a person who has made a study and practice of the writing to be copied, is still more difficult, and if the imitator has, moreover, practised in view of the rules by which handwriting is detected, the risk of detection is probably too remote. The two writings then present the same alignment, pen-presentation, pen-rests, angles and curves as to deceive even the writer of the genuine writing. The question may then depend only upon his reliability as a witness if he remembers that he never wrote the disputed writing. Fortunately, however, such adepts in imitation are rare, and in ordinary cases of even skilful imitators, traces of the writer's individuality are frequently left to serve as guides to the expert in his examination of the writing. For this purpose attention should be given to any hesitancy in form or movement, manifest in angularity or change of direction of lines, changed relations and proportions of letter, slant of the writing, its mechanical arrangement, disconnected lines, retouched shades or the like.[14]

(11) The examiner should not despise the crude but none the less reliable test of comparing the mode of the formation of letters in the admitted and disputed handwritings. For this purpose attention should be concentrated not on the general effect of the two writings but on the individual letters. But this does not mean that a general view of the two writings should be altogether ignored. For attention should be equally paid to the dots and the dashes, the spacings and flourishes, the habit of writing in straight or sloping lines, and the like, but these are sometimes treacherous guides, for they may be disguised, and an ambidexterous writer may be able to produce two specimens as unlike each other as possible. But in the case of letters howmuchsoever simulated, the leading characteristics are often easily detectable—such as the angular and heavy shades at certain points, the curves and angles, the loops and strokes which though subdued still remain as mangled trophies of the writer's penmanship.

(13) Hagan on Disputed Handwriting p. 90.

(14) Ames, Forgery, 72.

(12) It must be remembered that the tests though applicable to an ordinary writing with a split nib do not all apply to a writing with a stylographic pen or a pencil, or even to a writing executed with a fountain pen, for the pressure given to open the nibs of the pen on a downward movement is not possible in the other case, the result being that the writing loses most of its individual characteristics, and the only thing then available to the expert is a comparison of forms of letters and other points noted in the last rule.

5203. These are practically all the rules yet known to assist the expert in his examination of a disputed handwriting. They may be equally availed of by the Court for the purpose of comparison, which should probably give it more satisfaction than the testimony of an expert.

5204. Finger Prints.—As no two persons are alike, so their finger prints are also dissimilar. But as no two persons are wholly unlike each other, so no two finger prints are entirely dissimilar. They present some similarities but a much larger number of dissimilarities. All finger prints have been divided into four main groups, namely: (1) Arches, (2) Loops, (3) Whorls, and (4) Composites. "In Arches the ridges run from one side to the other making no backward turn; there is ordinarily no delta, but, when there is the appearance of a delta, no ridge must intervene between the 'inner' and 'outer terminus.'[15] In Loops some of the ridges make a backward turn but without twist; there is one delta. In Whorls some of the ridges make a turn through at least one complete circuit; there are two deltas. Composites are combinations of the first three." Sir E. R. Henry, who was responsible for introducing the system, states that the possibility of coincidence of any ten characteristics being found in two thumb impressions is only one in a million.[16] The larger the number of coincidences between the two impressions the greater the probability of the two being of the same hand. But in point of practice where two thumb impressions are different, the characteristic differences would be far more numerous. Nothing, of course, turns upon a few common characteristics between the two impressions. It is the aggregate differences which add to the logic of probability.

(15) E. R. Henry's Classification and use of Finger Prints, p. 20.

(16) Ib., p. 57.

5205. Foot Prints.—Similar rules apply to foot prints. Mr. Gayer in his book on 'Foot Prints' writes as follows:—"It is obvious that every individual's foot-print must have a distinct individuality, for even if there were only three common types of each of the features, and we had nothing else to go on, the total possible number of different types would be 531, 441, so that, on the average, two feet in about every million would be similar. A careful study of the illustrations and of the text will show that these figures do not err on the side of exaggeration."(17) To a similar degree features can be traced by their shoe tracks, since shoes leave distinct impressions some showing sharp edges, others rounded worn edges, others again may have holds or patches, or rubber pads or they may be shod with iron horse shoes, tips and bars.

5206. Adverting now to the evidence of intent, it is but seldom that direct evidence is likely to be available. The question must then be approached from the standpoint of acts and circumstances which are unmistakeably badges of such intention.

Session. Non-cog. Warrant. Not bail. Not comp. sanction.

Forgery of record of Court or of public register, etc.

466. Whoever forges a document purporting to be a record or proceeding of or in a Court of Justice, or a register of birth, baptism, marriage or burial or a register kept by a public servant as such, or a certificate or document purporting to be made by a public servant in his official capacity or an authority to institute or defend a suit, or to take any proceedings therein, or to confess judgment, or a power of attorney, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years and shall also be liable to fine.

[Court of Justice—s. 20. Public servant—s. 21. Document—s. 29. Forges—s. 463.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5207).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5208).
(3) Proof (5209).
(4) Form of Charge (5210-5211).
(5) Forgery of a Public Record (5212-5214).
(6) Documents Included (5215-5216).

5207. Analogous Law.—This section takes the offence of forgery punishable under the last section one step higher, owing to the importance of the documents forged. The offence must, however, be distinguished from that punishable under s. 167, though the Courts are by no means agreed on the subject. For while according to Garth, C. J. (Field, J., concurring) this section was not intended to apply to cases where a public officer, or a person acting for a public officer whose duty it is to make entries in a public book, knowingly makes a false entry, but to cases where a certificate or other document is forged by some unauthorised persons with a view to make it appear that it was duly issued by a public officer,[18] the contrary has been held in the Punjab, where this section is held to be wide enough to cover even the case of a public servant making a false record, if it was made dishonestly or fraudulently.[19] The question really depends upon the meaning to be assigned to the words "purporting to be" which are unfortunately ambiguous, for they are susceptible of being construed to mean that the document tampered with is a record or proceeding, or that the forger intended to pass it off as a record or proceeding. In the one case the existence of a genuine record or proceeding must be assumed, in the other case there need be no genuine record to correspond with the forgery.

(17) G. W. Gayer on Foot Prints, Art. 11. p. 3.

5208. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and exclusively triable by the Court of Session. For other points of practice reference should be made to the last section (§§ 5191-5195).

5209. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the document in question was a forgery (s. 463).

(2) That the accused forged it.

(3) That is was one of the kinds specified in the section.

5210. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you forged the document, exhibit—which purported to be a record [or proceeding of (or in) a Court of Justice, &c.] and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 466 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge."

5211. A person charged under the last section cannot be convicted under this section,[20] nor can one convicted under this be convicted equally under the next section.[21]

5212. Forgery of a Public Record.—This section is ambiguously worded (§ 5207) and may be construed to mean either fabrication of a document so as to pass it off as the record or proceeding of a Court

(18) Juggun Lall, 7 C. L. R. 356 (366).
(19) Mul Singh, (1895) P. R. No. 13, dissenting from Juggen Lall, 7 C. L. R. 356; to the same effect, Hari Chand (1903) P. L. R. 15.
(20) 17 C. W. N. 94, 18 I. C. 81.
(21) Girdhari Lal, 2 O. W. N. 174, 86 I. C. 993, (1925) O. 413.

of justice or tampering with such record or proceeding by a public servant. In the view of the Calcutta High Court the section is only intended to apply to the former, and to the latter only when it is done by a person other than the public servant whose duty it was to prepare that record.[22] But this view has been held in the Punjab[23] to be too narrow, the Court holding the section equally applicable to either case, provided that the act is shown to have been done "dishonestly" or "fraudulently."

But in this view the false record of a corrupt judge would be forgery, and since forgery implies the making of a false document, it is difficult to bring such record within any of the three clauses of the section[24] which describes that term. Moreover, since the Code specially enacts s. 167 which deals with this abuse, it is reasonable to suppose that it was not again intended to provide against it in this section. The section was, indeed, probably intended to apply to a case in which property is obtained or an advantage gained by means of spurious documents such as the warrant of a Civil Court or the birth, baptism, marriage or death certificate of a person. So, if a person should forge a warrant of arrest or attachment of another's property, and on its strength obtain delivery of property, he should be guilty of the offence punishable under s. 468 and a fortiori of this offence. The accused obtained employment as a bailiff and Bench Clerk in a District Court on the strength of an educational certificate issued in favour of another person, but in which he altered the name and age to suit himself, which he produced as his own certificate. He was held to have been rightly convicted under this section and section 471.[25]

5213. In another case the facts were these: The accused was alleged to be a professional forger, and the police consequently laid a trap for him by sending a constable in disguise to employ him to forge a notice by altering the name in a genuine notice issued by a Deputy Collector, and which he did on payment of Rs. 25. He was then convicted under this section. He appealed, and Sir Comer Petheram, C.J., and Ghose, J., feeling some doubt whether a person could be guilty of forging a document when the document was never intended to be used at all and whether the person who was the agent of the other for the purpose of making the document could have a wicked intention when the person who employed him, the principal, had no such intention referred the case to a Full Bench of five Judges, whose judgment was delivered by the learned Chief Justice who decided both the points in the affirmative, basing his decision on the judgement of Erle, C. J.,[1] and holding with him that the document being used for the purpose of being used to deceive the Court, must be deemed to have been used with the intention of being used for that purpose.[2] It is submitted that the same conclusion might have been more clearly deduced from the concluding

(22) Juggun Lall, 7 C. L. R. 366.
(23) Mul Singh, (1895) P. R. No. 13; Hari Chand, (1903) P. L. R. 15.
(24) S. 464.
(25) Nga Pya, (1904) 2 L. B. R. 316; following Nga Shwe The, (1893) P. J. L. R. 52.

(1) Hillman, 1 L. & C. C. C. 343.
(2) Haradhan Maiti, 14 C. 513, F. B. The words "for the purpose" occur in 24 & 25 Vict., c. 100, s. 59, which Earl C. J., had to construe in Hillman, 1 L. & C. C. C. 343.

words of s. 463 to which, curiously, no reference was made but reference to which was sufficient for the purpose of the case. For, that clause is an authority for the proposition that if the intention of the forger was that the document might be used for the purpose of fraud, his act amounts to forgery irrespective of the ultimate purpose to which it might be intended to be put by another (§§ 5157-5165). Of course, such a case is widely different from one in which the accused, whose duty it was to give copies, gave a true copy of a document which was false and known to be false to him.(3)

5214. Of course, there can be no forgery and no offence under this section, unless the alteration or addition is made dishonestly or fraudulently. The Sessions Judge of Noakhali committed one Reily, a Police Superintendent into custody for having antedated his inspection note, but the High Court quashed the commitment holding that adding the date of inspection afterwards was not antedating it, and that in any case even if it was antedated there being no reasonable suggestion of fraud, the accused could not be tried for this offence.(4) In another case the accused, a Barrister of Sierra Leone was convicted of altering, which he committed, the names of two witnesses in a summons of a Court, but the Privy Council quashed his conviction on the ground that there was no motive or intention to defraud, though the alterations were unquestionably unjustifiable and irregular.(5)

Documents Included.

5215. It will be observed that the section is not confined merely to documents made or maintained by a public servant, for it refers to a register of birth, baptism, marriage or burial irrespectively of the nature of the person by whom it may have been kept. Consequently, it has been held that the section applied to a private register of marriages of Mahomedans kept by a Kazi.(6)

5216. As regards the documents purporting to be made by a public servant, it is obvious that the document must on its face be a colourable imitation of a public document, but it is not necessary that the imitation should be too close or exact. Indeed, if the imitation is too remote, it may naturally be a question left to the jury whether the accused could have intended to use such a crude production for the purpose alleged. But otherwise, the degree of imitation has no further bearing on the case. So where the accused produced an order purporting to be from an official to a constable to deliver to bearer some cattle and it appeared that the seal impressed thereon corresponded to no official seal and the signature was a scrawl intended to be an imitation of English signature, the Court held that the difference did not vitiate the conviction, for the question was one properly left to the jury whether the accused had intended to use the document knowing it to be forged.(7) Since a plaint after it is once filed becomes a part of the record of a Court, its fraudulent alteration would be punishable under this section.(8) So where the accused indorsed payment

---

(3) Marigawda, (1891) B. U. C. 583.
(4) Reily, 5 C. W. N. 609.
(5) Taylor, (1912) A. C. 317 (353).
(6) Bacha Miah, (1891) 1 Weir 541.
(7) Prosunno Bose, 5 W. R. 96.
(8) Shama Charan, 15 I. C. (A.) 1004.

upon his mortgage which the mortgagee had filed in Court, he was held rightly convicted of this offence.(9)

Session. Non-cog. but cog. if the security is Govt. note. Warrant. Not bail. Not comp. Sanction.

Forgery of valuable security, will, etc.

467. Whoever forges a document which purports to be a valuable security or a will, or an authority to adopt a son, or which purports to give authority to any person to make or transfer any valuable security, or to receive the principal, interest or dividends thereon or to receive or deliver any money, moveable property or valuable security, or any document purporting to be an acquittance or receipt acknowledging the payment of money or an acquittance or receipt for the delivery of any moveable property or valuable security, shall be punished with transportation for life or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years and shall also be liable to fine.

[Moveable property—s. 22. Document—s. 29. Will—s. 31
Valuable security—s. 39. Forges—s. 463.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5217).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5218-5220).
(3) Proof (5221).
(4) Form of Charge (5222-5223).
(5) Forgery of a Valuable Security or a Will (5224-5230).
(6) Meaning of "which purports to be" (5227).

5217. Analogous Law.—This section advances another step in point of aggravation owing to the still more important nature of the documents forged, and the risk of proportionately more serious loss to the persons aggrieved. In other respects this section is the same as the last.

5218. Procedure and Practice.—For the purpose of procedure this section is divided into two parts—one in which the valuable security is a promissory note of the Government of India, in which case the offence is cognizable, and the rest, in which case it is non-cognizable, and in either case warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance, and it is both non-bailable and non-compoundable and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session.

5219. It is not safe to order a prosecution for this offence upon the sole evidence of an expert witness,(10) a person convicted of the abetement of this offence cannot again be convicted of using it under s. 471; since the latter section applies to persons other than the forger.(11)

(9) Abdul Rashid Khan, 12 A. L. J. 104, 22 I. C. 1005.
(10) Budhabai, 86 I. C. 428, (1925) N. 358.
(11) Ismail Panju, 89 I. C. 523, 21 N. L. R. 152; Digambar, 88 I. C. 1051, (1925) N. 440.

5220. Two persons A and B conspired to forge an account. They were both jointly tried but B was acquitted as the only evidence against him was the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice. A was convicted under this section read with s. 109. A contended that after B's acquittal he could no longer be convicted of having forged the account with B. But the Court upheld his conviction holding that the failure of the conspiracy could not affect A's individual liability for having abetted C to forge the accounts.(12) For other points of practice see s. 465 (§§ 5191-5195).

5221. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the document in question was a forgery.

(2) That the accused forged it.

(3) That the document is one of the kinds mentioned in the section.

5222. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you forged a certain document purporting to be a valuable security, to wit——(or a will made by—; or an authority to adopt given by- —to——; or an authority given to——to make or transfer a certain valuable security to wit——); and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 467 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge."

5223. A person may be charged for and convicted of forging under this section and using a forged document under s. 471,(13) though it is improper to pass on him independent sentences for the two offences.(14) A person forging a document outside the limits of the jurisdiction of the Court cannot, of course, be convicted of this offence though he may still be convicted of using it under s. 471.(15)

5224. Forgery of a Valuable Security or a Will.—The high penalty of transportation provided in this section is only applicable to the special class of documents here enumerated. They are all documents of title relating to or affecting property, and in many cases negotiable and consequently, their forgery necessarily involves grave risk to private property as well as to commerce. For it will be observed that, of the documents here enumerated (i) a valuable security, (ii) an authority to assign a valuable security or to pay or receive the same or any dividend due thereon, or (iii) a receipt, acquittance or acknowledgment

(12) Chhotalal, 14 Bom. L. R. 367.

(13) Badri Prasad, 35 A. 63; Kamatchinatha. 42 M. 558; Madhu Chinnagi, 32 I. C. (M.) 665, 17 Cr. L. J. 73; Nga Ba Sein. 3 Bur. L. J. 113; Gajanan, 77 I. C. (N.) 825, 25 Cr. L. J. 473; contra in Umrao Lal. 23 A. 84; Mokand Lal, (1901) P. R. No. 26; Prabhu Dial, (1913) P. R. No. 4.

(14) Pirbhu Dial, (1913) P. R. No. 4, 19 I. C. 183.

(15) Bhagavatty, 17 I. C. (M.) 798.

of money or valuable security or moveable property, are all documents of title relating to moveable property, while (iv) a will, and (v) an authority to adopt a son are other documents affecting the devolution of property. Law therefore naturally esteems such documents of title far above those comprised in the last section. But as the offence is serious, so proportionately strict must be the proof of the facts distinguishing section from others. It should be noted that all the documents are such of which registration is not compulsory. Consequently there is no easy means of unravelling the fraud and so prevent lasting injury.

5225. Again, since forgery is complete as soon as the forged document purports to be a valuable security, it follows that it is not necessary that the document should be prima facie good. So forgery may be committed of a promissory note on unstamped paper, even though a Statute prohibits its being stamped afterwards[16] or the document is not to be valid, in the form prescribed by the Statute.[17] So where the accused acknowledges his liability to the prosecutor by merely writing down the figure "Rs. 164" with no particulars and signed it, without stamping it, the Court held that though invalid, since it "purported to be" an acknowledgment, its tearing up amounted to the destruction of a valuable security punishable under s. 477.[18] So it has been held that a deed of gift[19] or sale[20] being compulsorily registrable "purports to be" a valuable security before its registration, so that its forgery is complete with its execution though it was awaiting registration.

5226. But there are certain deficiencies which have necessarily the effect of rendering a document so incomplete as the maker could not be punished for forging it. Such would be the case where a promissory note is wanting in signature, which without the signature signifies nothing. So where the accused altered a bank note for one pound into forty pounds and cut out the signature of the payee, upon which he was indicted for forgery, on a case reserved it was held that the want of signature was fatal to the prosecution.[21] Such a case would not even amount to an attempt. So where the accused got printed certain forms as used by the Bengal Coal Company, it was held that the fact that the accused had got the forms printed for the purpose of forging receipts of the Bengal Coal Company, could not be held to be a forgery, because there could be no forgery of a receipt of which the signature was all in all, nor even an attempt because the act had not advanced far enough so that it might be said of the act that it would have ended in forgery if not interrupted.[22] Such was the case of the accused who was found in possession of several blank stamp papers purchased in different names which the prosecution suggested were intended to be used for forging bonds in the names of those persons, but which the Court held did not convert them either into a docu-

(16) Morton, 2 East. 955.
(17) 2 East. P. C. 956; M'Intosh, 2 Leach 883.
(18) Ramasami, 12 M. 148, Kapalovoya, 2 M. H. C. R. 247, 7 M. H. C. R (App.) 26.
(19) Kashi Nath Naik, 25 C. 207.
(20) Gobind Ramappa, (1889) B. U. C. 467.
(21) Pateman, R. & R. 45.
(22) Riasat Ali 7 A. 352.

ment or a valuable security so as to make the possessor liable under this section.[23]

Meaning of "which Purports to be."

5227. The words "which purports to be" are wide, but they are not wide enough to include a document which, though it does not purport to be a valuable security, has still that effect or is evidence of a money obligation. An example will make this clear. Suppose a person were to forge a letter from a dying man, inviting him to his house as he had appointed him his heir, the accused could not be convicted under this section because the letter forged does not purport to be a will, though it may have been intended to support it. The documents contemplated by the section must be documents which of their own force are or are intended to be those enumerated in the section.[24] In this view the section has no reference to what purports to be merely a copy of an original, which, apart from the original, did not of its own force purport to be a valuable security, or an order for the delivery of moveable property. The accused had forged an order purporting to be the copy of the original order issused by a mamlatdar for the delivery of possession of moveable property, and whereupon he was convicted under this section, but the Court held this section inapplicable on the ground that the forged paper, being only a copy and unauthenticated, would not, if genuine, be a document which could give authority to deliver moveable property.[25]

5228. Lastly, this is an aggravated form of forgery, and it must, consequently, possess all the essential elements of that offence. Of these, dishonest intent or the intent to defraud as described in s. 463 is the most important.[1]

5229. The accused brought two documents (A and B), the one (A) registered, and the other (B) unregistered and wanted a lad to copy out on B in red ink the registration endorsements from A. A was the conveyance of property executed by one P in favour of the accused's wife; B purported to be P's conveyance of the same property of a later date in his own favour. It was proved that A had been duly executed and registered by P who knew nothing about B. The prosecution suggested the accused's motive for forging B to be to defraud his wife, but of this there was no evidence. It was a mere surmise. The Court accordingly held that in the absence of evidence of dishonesty or fraud the accused could not be convicted of this offence.[2] But where H had remitted a sum by money order payable to B who was advised to pay it to H's creditor P who intercepted the postman took him to one A and made him deliver the money to him misrepresenting to the postman that A was B. B was not informed of the payment. It was held that both P and A were guilty of this offence of forging a valuable security, i.e., the money order receipt.[3]

(23) Raghoonundun, 15 W. R. 19.
(24) Ib.
(25) Naro Gopal, 5 B. H. C. R. 56.
(1) Kailas Chandra Das, 6 C. W. N. 382 (384).
(2) Ib., pp. 384, 385.
(3) Jogidas, 24 Bom. L. R. 99, 66 I. C. 328, 23 Cr. L. J. 264, (1922) A. I. R. (B.) 82.

5230. As the purpose of fraud must be something more substantial than obtaining recognition to an empty title,(4) a document forged to support it fails to fall under any of the documents here enumerated, and the forger could not then be convicted under this section, or for that matter even under section 465.

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st class. Non-cog. Warrant. Not bail. Not comp. Sanction.

468. Whoever commits forgery, intending that the document forged shall be used for the purpose of cheating, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Forgery for purpose of cheating.

[Document—s. 29. Cheating—s. 415. Forgery—s. 463.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5231).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5232).
(3) Proof (5233).
(4) Form of Charge (5234).
(5) Forgery to Cheat (5235-5236).

5231. Analogous Law.—This section refers to a special case of forgery in which the document is made subservient to cheating which is the main purpose of the offender. It is not however, necessary that the forger should be himself the cheat, for all that the section contemplates is that the forger shall intend that the document shall be used for that purpose. It may then be that the forger may be convicted of this offence though he could not be of cheating.

5232. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable, but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class. For other points of practice reference should be made to section 465.

5233. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the document in question is a forgery.

(2) That the accused forged it.

(3) That in forging it he intended that it shall be used for the purpose of cheating.

5234. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you forged a certain document to wit—(describe it) intending that it shall be used for the purpose of cheating, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 468 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court)

(4) Jan Mohamed, 10 C. 584.

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

5235. Forgery to Cheat.—Forgery has been described before (§§ 5136-5189) as involving the presence of one or other of the two elements of dishonesty or fraud. As fraud when connected with the delivery of property is dishonesty, and as cheating is an offence against property, it follows that this offence has for its object the dishonest acquistion of property. Forgery is then a means to an end—that end being the wrongful acquisition or retention of property. This must be the intention of the forger, though it is not necessary that he should use the document himself for the purpose of cheating, or that he should cheat at all. He must, however, intend it to be used for cheating, which makes him at least the abettor of the cheat. So where a school-master forged a school attendance register for the purpose of obtaining a Government grant, he was held to be punishable under this section.(5) The same was held to be the case where the cashier of the prosecutor had falsified the latter's account books in his custody, his object being to deceive his employer.(6) The facts of this case are, however, not reported, and it does not appear whether the alterations in the accounts were made to conceal a past crime or to facilitate the commission of a new one. It is, however, evident, that if forgery is committed in the former case, it would not be punishable under this section, for the intent that the forged document shall be used for the purpose of cheating points to futurity and has no reference to the case supposed.

The accused, a process server was given summons for service returnable by a certain day. The server was a week late and said that he was ill, in support of which he produced a certificate countersigned by two witnesses. It was found to be forged, and upon the question arising whether his offence fell under this section the Madras Court held that it did.(7) But where the accused, who was the consignee of goods liable to octroi duty, was shown to have falsely and incorrectly read out to an octroi daroga the contents of an invoice of a consignment of goods and so making the value to appear to be less than it actually was, and he was shown to have afterwards altered the invoice so as to make it afterwards correspond with what he had dictated to the daroga, it was held that the alteration in the invoice having been made after the offence of cheating was complete, and being made by the accused for the purpose of saving himself or concealing the offence of cheating, a charge under this section was not sustainable.(8)

5236. Even where forgery is committed with intent to cheat by its means in the future the accused is not necessarily punishable under this section, for the cases supposed in the last two sections

(5) Kuppua Pillai, (1885) Weir (3rd Ed.) 336.
(6) Bannessur Biswas, 18 W. R. 46.
(7) Kamatchinatha, 42 M. 558, following Sabapati, 11 M. 411; Rash Behari, 35 C. 450, dissenting from contra in Jiwanand, 5 A. 221; Girdhari Lal, 8 A. 653.
(8) Hurmukh Rai, (1876) P. R. No. 15.

may equally fall under this—as where the accused forges a document such as a cheque or a warrant of attachment and by that means obtains money or property, in which case the offender would be liable to punishment under the last section or section 466 as the case may be. This section provides then for a case not otherwise specially provided for.

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st class. Non-cog. Warrant. Bailable. Non-comp. Sanction.

Forgery for purpose of harming reputation.

469. Whoever commits forgery, intending that the document forged shall harm the reputation of any party, or knowing that it is likely to be used for that purpose, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[Document—s. 29. Forgery—s. 463. Harm the reputation—s. 499.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5237).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5238).
(3) Proof (5239).
(4) Form of Charge (5240).
(5) Principle (5241).
(6) Meaning of Words (5242).
(7) Forgery to Harm Reputation (5243-5244)

5237. Analogous Law.—This section, again, deals with a case in which forgery is made for the purpose of "harming the reputation" of another, or which the forger "knows that it is likely to be used for that purpose." Such forgery would then have "fraud" more than "dishonesty" for its purpose.

5238. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable, but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable and is triable by the Court of Sessions, Presidency Magistrate, or the Magistrate of the first class.

5239. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:

(1) That the document in question is a forgery.
(2) That the accused forged it.
(3) That he did so intending that the document forged would harm the reputation of some one, or knew that it was likely to be used for that purpose.

5240. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you forged a certain document to wit—(describe it) intending that the same shall harm the reputation of A B (or knowing that it is likely to be used for the purpose of harming the reputation of A B) and you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 469 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

5241. Principle.—A person who forges a document intending to use it to defame another is not only guilty of forgery but of defamation as well. He is, at any rate, guilty of abetting the latter offence. But a person who forges a document with only knowledge of the likelihood of its being so used may be less blameworthy, but the difference in his case is not such as to place him in a different category. His case is, however, one deserving of consideration in passing the sentence.

5242. Meaning of words.—"Shall harm the reputation of any party": Such harm would be illegal on account of the means adopted, though it may be otherwise justifiable under any of the exceptions to section 499. "Knowing that it is likely to be used for that purpose": Such knowledge must be assumed where there is intention, but there may be knowledge without intention, as where one is hired to forge an incriminating document purporting to have been written by another whom the writer does not know. The offence lies in the use of forged writing to publish a lampoon.

5243. Forgery to Harm Reputation.—A person who publishes any imputation concerning another intending to harm his reputation or knowing it likely to harm it thereby, is guilty of the offence of defamation. But a person who forges a deed with that intention or knowledge need not necessarily be a defamer, for he may forge libellous matter without publishing it. But his criminality is nevertheless heightened by the fact that he wilfully uses his first offence to facilitate the commission of another. It may be that the person defaming another on the strength of the forged document is privileged and so escapes scotfree, but the forger cannot plead the same ground of exoneration, for he cannot be heard to say that he had the right to forge a document to support his libellous truth. The section, consequently, eschews the use of such a term as defamation, for it may then give rise to the question about the applicability of the exceptions. The question of justification is, therefore, wholly immaterial to this offence, for no one has the right to do evil so that good may come. So if a person were to send a forged pseudonymous petition charging A with the murder of B, he would bring himself within the mischief of this section, though A may have in fact murdered B.(9) Of course, the offence of the accused would be aggravated if A was innocent, but the fact that he was guilty did not justify the accused in committing forgery. But if, in such a case the petition were sent anonymously without signature or with only a nom-de-plume of the writer the case would be different. For the document could not then be held to be forgery, and the accused could not then be convicted of this offence.

5244. But this is not, of course, the only way for committing this offence. A person may forge a letter or other document to establish some compromising fact concerning another. He may, for instance, show that another person leads an immoral life by forging a letter purporting to be addressed by him to his sweetheart, or vice versa, or he may show that the other is a man of no character by forging a document purporting to be a demand of a bribe, or in fact anything likely to lower him in the estimation of his fellow-men. The offence is complete as soon as the forgery is complete. The publication is unnecessary, nor is it necessary that any person should have, in fact, been injured.

(9) Shifait Ali, 10 W. R. 61.

Forged document.

470. A false document made wholly or in part by forgery is designated "a forged document."

[Forgery—s. 463. False document—s. 464.]

Synopsis.

Analogous Law (5245).

5245. Analogous Law.—This section defining a "forged document" is a necessary corollary to section 464 which defines a document to be a false document whether it is wholly or partially false. And since the making of a false document has been shown to amount to forgery it follows that the document forged must of necessity be a forged document (§ 5132).

Session. If document a G. P. note otherwise same as forgery, Non-cog. but cog. if document a G. P. note. Warrant. Bailable. Non-comp. sanction.

Using as genuine a forged document.

471. Whoever fraudulently or dishonestly uses as genuine any document which he knows or has reason to believe to be a forged document, shall be punished in the same manner as if he had forged such document.

[Dishonestly—s. 24. Fraudulently—s. 25. Reason to believe—s. 26. Document—s. 29. Forged document—s. 470.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5246).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5247-5253).
(3) Form of Charge (5254).
(4) Fraudulent and Wilful Use of Forgery (5255).
(5) Knowledge or Reasonable Belief in Forgery (5256-5260).
(6) Evidence of Other Acts (5259-5260).
(7) What is Using as Genuine (5261-5265).
(8) Using a False Copy (5265).
(9) Use must be Fraudulent or Dishonest (5266-5270).
(10) Forgery to Conceal Previous Fraud (5269).

5246. Analogous Law.—This is a section under which not only the dishonest user of a false document but also the forger himself is prosecuted if there is evidence of use but insufficient proof of forgery. The section is all-embracing and would include not only one who uses it to defraud another as also one who stands to gain by its use,

5247. Procedure and Practice.—For the purpose of procedure this offence is divided into two parts—one in which the document is a promissory note of the Government of India, in which case the offence is cognizable and exclusively triable by the Court of Session. Otherwise, it is non-cognizable and triable by the same Court as that by which the forgery is triable, and in either case, warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance, and it is bailable, but not compoundable.

5248. If the person using the document alleged to be forged was a party to a proceeding then the sanction of the Court is a necessary preliminary condition to the institution of a prosecution under this section. But no such sanction is required where the person producing such document was only a witness.(10)

5249. The offence of using a forged document assumes a serious complexion if it is used as evidence in a Court of law, in which case it must be visited with the severest punishment allowed by law.(11) In this case the accused had filed forged powers-of-attorney in a case which he swore had been duly executed and attested, but which were eventually found to have been forged, and which the Court regarded a flagrant example of this offence. One or two other points of practice may be here noticed. A charge under this section should specify the offence according to the nature of the document forged under which the accused would have been convicted if he had been tried and found guilty of the substantive offence.(12) This is necessary because the section prescribes no sentence of its own, but makes the user punishable "in the same manner as if he had forged such a document," and which necessitates reference to the section under which he would have been so punishable.

In one case in which the prisoner had been simply charged under this section, but was sentenced to ten years' transportation with reference to section 467, the Judge considering the document to be one of the nature of those specified in that section, the High Court quashed the conviction and ordered a new trial, holding that if the Judge intended to convict the accused for using a forged valuable security, he should have been so charged.(13) But a person so charged could not be convicted of both the offences, if the evidence establishes against him a case both of forgery as well as user. So where A sued B in ejectment and B claimed the right of occupancy on the strength of his possession for twelve years, and to prove which he called the accused, a patwari, as his witness, and who supported B and produced in support of his case an entry in which B's possession had been altered from ten years to twelve years, and it was held that the alteration had been made by the accused, whereupon he was convicted both under this section as well as under section 466, Aikman, J., quashed the conviction for this offence, holding this section applicable only to a user as distinguished from the forger and adding that the same person even though

(10) S. 195, Cr. P. C., Akhil Chandra, 22 C. 1004; Debi Lal v. Dhaja Dhasi, 36 M. 392; Digumbar Ram v. Taran, 41 I. C. (C.). 603.

(11) Mohesh Chunder Sircar, 3 W. R. 13.

(12) 1 W. R. Cr. L. 10, 3 W. R. Cr. L. 8; Gangaram Mulji, 6 B. H. C. R. 43.

(13) Gangaram Mulji, 6 B. H. C. R. 43

the forger as well as the user, could not be convicted of the two offences.(14) But there would have been no objection to convict the accused in the alternative.

5250. Again, since the offence of having a forged document in one's possession with intent to use it and punishable under section 474 is necessarily implied in the offence under this section, a person cannot be convicted of the two offences, at the same time.(15) Moreover, the terms of this section may at times overlap those of section 196. In that case the proper course for the Magistrate is to charge the accused under this section and commit the case for trial to the Court of Session.(16)

5251. Where the accused files a number of forged documents in one case, he may be charged with and tried in respect of all the documents as one offence. The accused was charged with using as genuine eleven forged receipts which were put in by him in sets on three separate occasions, each set with a written statement, in three suits pending against him. A charge was framed against him in respect of the using of each set of receipts, and he was tried on these three charges and convicted and sentenced. The legality of this procedure was challenged on appeal in which it was contended that the filing of each document constituted a separate use for which the accused should have been separately tried, but it was held that as the "using" charged was putting in each set of documents with the respective written statements in the three suits and as there was nothing to show that any of the documents had been used at any other time, there was only one using in respect of each set of documents, and that the conviction could not therefore be questioned on that ground.(17)

A person charged for using two documents as forged, cannot be convicted unless it is proved that both of them were forged and he used them both. Consequently, if the forgery of one of them is not established he cannot be convicted at all.(18) The question what amounts to user will be found discussed in the sequel (§ 5261). It will suffice here to state that the mere filing of a forged document in a judicial proceeding may amount to an attempt if accompanied by the requisite intent. It should therefore be so charged.(19) But filing a list mentioning a document alleged to be forged is a mere preparation, and not even an attempt to file the document and is therefore not punishable at all.(20)

5252. The fact that on a document being denounced as a forgery, the plaintiff hastily withdrew his suit is no evidence of forgery since the

(14) Umrao Lal, 23 A. 84.

(15) Nusar Ali, 6 N. W. P. H. C. R. 39.

(16) Kherode Chunder Mozumdar, 5 C. 717; the contrary dictum in Oodum Lal, (3 W. R. 17), was explained by Jackson, J., on the ground that the trial was there held by the Court of Sessions with the aid of a jury so that no question of jurisdiction could arise.

(17) Raghunath Das, 20 C. 413.

(18) Jang Bahadur Lal, 14 C. L. J. 652.

(19) Rati Jha, 39 C. 463; Krishna Proshad v. Rabindra Nath, 13 I. C. (C.) 99; Mobarak Ali, 17 C. W. N. 94; explaining Ambika Prashad, 35 C. 820.

(20) Rati Jha, 39 C. 463; explaining Ambika Prashad, 35 C. 820.

plaintiff may well have withdrawn his suit on his apprehended failure to prove it, and there might be other reasons.[21] The fact that a person files a document is no reason for assuming that he must be personally cognizant of its falsity.[22] It is a fact which must be proved like any other fact. A series of transactions which are not the offence charged, may be used as evidence of intention.[23]

5253. A person convicted for an attempt to commit this offence may, on appeal, be convicted of this offence, provided that the accused is not prejudiced by the finding.[24] But a person cannot be convicted on the same facts both of this offence as well as that under section 466-109,[25] section 465[1] or under section 466.[2] Nor can convictions under sections 471 and 474[3] stand together.

5254. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of—— at——you fraudulently (or dishonestly) used as genuine a certain document, to wit—which you then knew (or had reason to believe) to be a forged document; and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under sections 465 or 466 or 467) and 471 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

5255. Fraudulent and Wilful Use of Forgery.—This is a somewhat general section intended to punish a person for making use of a forged document, for which he is liable to punishment under this section, if at the time of using it he (i) knew or had reason to believe the document to be forged; and (ii) he used it fraudulently or dishonestly. In order to constitute this offence, there must be both knowledge and fraudulent intention. And this is necessary, for a person may intend to practise fraud upon another by the use of a document which he may not know to be forged, in which case to convict him of this offence would be to convict him for fraud and not for using a forged document. On the other hand, a person may know that a document is forged and he may use it, but he could not be convicted of this offence if he did not use it fraudulently or dishonestly. Of this, examples have been already given when discussing the liability of the forger for making a false document to conceal a past negligent or dishonest act (§§ 5162, 5163), or when it is filed to support a true case (§ 5182). These

(21) Mutaya v. Maung Shwe Bou, 3 Bur. L. T. 152, 8 I. C. 996.

(22) Karimdad, (1913) P. R. 25, 21 I. C. 907; Ramsawmy v. Maung Shwe Bau, 3 Bur. L. T. 151, 8 I. C. 995; but see Mobarak Ali, 17 C. W. N. 94; Akbar Hussain, 89 I. C. 398, (1925) N. 294.

(23) Krishna Govinda, 43 C. 783.

(24) Lala Ojha, 26 C. 863.

(25) Godlavedu Balayya, (1902) 1 Weir, 551; Mokand Lal, (1901) P. R. No. 26.

(1) Mobarak Ali, 17 C. W. N. 94.

(2) Umrao Lal, 23 A. 84; Authoor, 24 I. C. (M.) 976; Mohund Lal, (1901) P. R. 26; Pirbhu Dial, (1913) P. R. No. 4; contra in Badri Prashad, 35 A. 63; Madu Chimnaji, 32 I. C. (M.) 665.

(3) Nuzar Ali, 6 N. W. P. H. C. R. 39; Mobarak Ali, 17 C. W. N. 94.

cases are instructive, but they refer to the fraudulent making of a false document as distinct from fraudulently using it. A person may know nothing about the one, though he would be guilty of this offence if he used it fraudulently.

The two main questions that arise under this section are then (i) whether the accused knew or had reason to believe the document to be forged; and (ii) whether he used it fraudulently or dishonestly.

5256. Knowledge or Reasonable Belief in Forgery—Now, the question whether the accused knew or had reason to believe a document to be forged, would, in many cases, be a matter of inference, for the question depends upon the proved circumstances of each case. But knowledge and belief imply a certain state of mentality. As defined elsewhere[4] "a person is said to have 'reason to believe' a thing if he has sufficient cause to believe that thing, but not otherwise." In order to enable a person to say that he had reason to believe, there must then be "sufficient cause" for belief. The word "belief" is a much stronger word than "suspect," and it involves the necessity of showing that the circumstances were such that a reasonable man must have felt convinced in his mind,[5] that the document he was filing was a false document. If he had facts brought to his notice sufficient to put him upon inquiry, and even to arouse his suspicions, still he could not be held criminally liable for filing a deed proved to be forged, unless the facts presented to him were sufficient to carry conviction to his mind.

For instance, a party may entrust his pleader to file a document on his behalf. He may have a shrewd suspicion that the document was a forgery, but he would not be justified on such slender grounds to refuse to file it, and if he files it, he could not be held liable for this offence. The defendants in a civil suit for ejectment, engaged the accused, a pleader, to defend their suit, and they gave him a certain document alleged to be a lease to be filed in support of their defence. The other party alleged the document to be a forgery, and the Sessions Judge sanctioned his prosecution holding it to be the duty of a pleader to examine all documents as to their genuineness and authenticity before tendering them in evidence and the accused having failed to do so, the Judge directed his prosecution. The accused moved the High Court to revoke the sanction, which Parson, J., had no difficulty in doing, holding that the standard of duty prescribed by the Sessions Judge was too high.

"We do not think," he added, "that any Court would be justified in ordering the prosecution of a pleader for presenting on behalf of his client, a document merely because the document was suspicious in appearance, nor do we think that pleaders are in duty bound to examine the documents given them to produce in Court, and to come to a conclusion upon their genuineness, for which conclusion, if wrong, they are liable to be criminally prosecuted. We think that a pleader is under no higher obligation than any other agent would be, and that to justify

(4) S. 26.

(5) Cf. per Melville, J., in Rango Timaji, 6 B. 402.

his prosecution it must be shown that he was a party, principal or accessory, to the concoction of the document or that he had the knowledge that it was concocted. The words in section 471 of the Penal Code, 'knows or has reason to believe,' are of general application, and the allegation must be proved as strictly in his case as in the case of any one else. It would be difficult, we think, to say that when a pleader, acting on the instruction of his client, tenders in Court a document he cannot plead and rely upon those instructions as sufficient cause."(6)

5257. Moreover, it must not be forgotten that an alteration to be suspicious, should be such as would lead a person on a casual inspection to suspect that it had been made fraudulently. As Mahmud J., remarked in a case of altered bond filed by the plaintiff's pleader, the latter could not be expected to scrutinize all documents handed to him by his client with suspicion, nor could the alterations be regarded as suspicious which became apparent only when one's attention was called to them.(7)

5258. The question of criminal liability then depends not upon any artificial rules of duty but upon those facts which convinces the Court that the accused must have believed that the document he was using is forged. For this purpose the nature of the document and the purpose for which it was filed are equally material. And if the document bears on its face visible signs of alteration, it is a fact which the Court may well take into consideration in judging of the question of the accused's mind. But the mere fact that the document was altered is not a sufficient reason for belief that it is a forgery—for it depends upon the nature and character of the alteration. There are some alterations which are clear evidence of forgery; there are others which as clearly point the other way. The alteration, on a material point, such as the names of parties, the date or the amount is a material alteration and as such may be indicative of fraud, but an immaterial alteration would not rivet the same attention. The question whether an alteration is material or immaterial may sometimes depend upon the nature of the dispute, and the purpose for which the document is filed. The purpose would not only explain the alteration but further shew whether the intention of the accused was fraudulent or otherwise.

Evidence of Other Acts.

5259. In this connection a question arises whether evidence of other similar acts, is admissible. Such evidence is clearly admissible under the Indian Evidence Act.(8) And it is admissible under English Law. So upon an indictment for disposing of and putting away a forged bank-note knowing it to be forged, proof that the accused passed other forged notes, is held to be admissible for the purpose of proving that he knew the note, which is the subject of indictment to be forged.(9) But in such case evidence of a transaction which is itself the subject of an

(6) Ranchoddas, 22 B. 317.
(7) Jiwan, (1887) A. W. N. 195 (196).
(8) Act I of 1872; s. 14, ills. (b), (d); s. 15, ills. (b), (c).
(9) Millard, R. & R. 245; Moore, 1 F. & F. 73; Whiley, 1 B. & P. (N. R.) 92; Tather Sal, ib. 94*n* (Ball. 1 Comp. 32) (Hough, R. & R. 120); Green, 3 C. & K. 209; Salt, 3 F. & F. 834; Francis, 12 Cox. 612; Colelough, 15 Cox. 92.

indictment was at one time excluded.(10) But more recent cases recognize no such distinction and admit evidence of all transactions whether they form or do not form the subject of a distinct indictment.(11) Such evidence has, however, limited value, and though receivable for one purpose, it should not be used for a purpose wholly different. For example, such evidence is admissible only to shew that the act which is the subject of inquiry, was done intentionally and not merely accidentally. If it fails to establish that fact, it could not be utilized for the purpose of adding to the probability of the accused having forged the document in suit. If this is the charge, it must be established aliunde.

5260. And even as evidence is indicative of intention, regard must be paid to the interval of some time between the two acts. As Rolfe, B., said "even in the case of an interval of twenty years between the utterings, the evidence would be receivable in principal; but I should in that case direct the jury to pay no attention to it."(12) But in another case where the interval of time was great, the Judge said that he reposed confidence in counsel that they will not give in evidence what has no tendency to prove guilty knowledge, but only to prejudice the prisoner.(13) Such evidence must not, moreover, be vague or illusory, but must be definite as to the time and place and the nature of the document forged.(14) A general allegation that the accused was suspected of forging documents or that he kept the company of professional forgers, is not only not admissible, but can have only one purpose in view, that is, to prejudice the prisoner.

5261. What is Using as Genuine?—Assuming now that a document is shown to be forged, and the accused knows it, the next question that arises is, whether the accused used it as genuine. Of course, it is no offence to use a forged document as such. The prosecution who base their case on such a document file it in Court for the purposes of evidence. The act becomes criminal as soon as a false document is used as true. But what is using a document? In the corresponding provision of the English Law, the words used are "utters, uses, publishes or tenders in evidence with either of the intents necessary to constitute the offence of forging the document," words which are wide enough to include not only what is here designated using a document but also an attempt to use it.(15) But the mere filing of a document with a view to its subsequent use in evidence is sufficient to constitute user.(16) Of course, the term "use" is not confined to the use of documents as evidence in Court or for the purpose of obtaining money. The term would, for instance, be satisfied, where a forged document

(10) Smith, 2 C. & P. 633; Smith, 4 C. & P. 411; Griffiths v. Payne, 11 A. & E. 131.

(11) Forster, 24 L. J. M. C. 134; Balls, 7 C. & P. 429.

(12) Phillips, 3 Cox. 88.

(13) Salt, 3 F. & F. 834.

(14) Millard, R. & R. 245; Moore, 1 F. & F. 73.

(15) S. 6 (2), Forgery Act, 1913 (3 & 4 Geo. V, c. 27).

(16) Bansi Sheikh, 5 I. C. 469 (477); but see Krishna Prasad v. Robindra Nath, 13 I. C. (C.) 99; Rati Jha, 39 C. 463; Mabarak Ali, 17 C. W. N. 94; explaining Ambika Prasad, 35 C. 820. The head-note of this case is wrong; Idu Jolaha, 3 Pat. L. J. 386, 46 I. C. 293, 19 Cr. L. J. 709; Fasal Ilahi, 72 I. C. (L.) 383, 24 Cr. L. J. 383, (1922) A. I. R. (L.) 346.

is filed for registration and it is registered[17] or where it is produced before the Police during investigation.[18]

The accused applied to a Superintendent of Police for enlistment in the police force. In support of his application he produced before that officer two certificates, one of which was found to be a wholly fabricated document, while the other had been altered by several additions. It was held that his presenting the two certificates constituted their user so as to justify a conviction under this section.[19] It will thus appear that the mere filing of a forged document may at times amount to its user, but this must be the case where the document as filed can be acted upon without formal proof by the person before whom it is filed. This seems to be the distinguishing feature of the Calcutta case, which might otherwise seem to lay down a different rule. In that case,[20] the accused had filed private receipts which the Court could not act upon until formally proved. It was therefore rightly held that their mere filing was insufficient to constitute such user as is contemplated by this section. But the case would have been widely different, if the documents filed had purported to be public document which the Court could receive in evidence without formal proof, in which case the mere filing of them would have been probably considered sufficient to complete their user. But in any case the involuntary production of a document in obedience to a summons from Court is not tantamount to "using" it in Court inasmuch as that term is obviously used in the sense of its being put forward in some way for one of the purposes mentioned in s. 463.[21] It may, for instance, be used by a witness if he produces it uncalled, to support a claim, though he was not summoned to produce it.[22]

5262. So in the case of a bill of exchange, its mere presentation for encashment would be sufficient to constitute its user. So where the prisoner was indicted for uttering a bill of exchange containing a forged indorsement and it appeared that he presented it for payment, whereupon the clerk noticing a difference in spelling refused payment, it appears to have been the view of the Court that uttering was completed with the presentation, but the prisoner was acquitted on a different point.[23] It has been held that uttering may be conditional, as where the accused tendered a forged bill to his banker for acceptance which the latter accepted conditionally upon its encashment and to which the former agreed, and it was held that uttering was complete, though it was conditional.[24] But the presentation of a forged note by the accus-

(17) Azimoodeen, 11 W. R. 15; Cheta Mahto, 89 I. C. (Pat.) 1050.

(18) Ramappa Hebbara, (1890) 1 Weir, 550; Sajal Lall, 60 I. C. (Pat.) 274, 22 Cr. L. J. 274.

(19) Khandusingh, 22 B. 768.

(20) Ambica Prasad Singh, 35 C. 820 (822); Mohit Kumar Mukerjee, 52 C. 881.

(21) Assistant Sessions Judge v. Rammal, 36 M. 387; Arunachella, 36 M. 392; Boddu Ramayya v. Chitturi, 28 M. L. J. 486; 29 I. C. 71; Ishar Das, 6 L. 50: Girdhari Lal, 2 O. W. N. 174; Madha v. Bhagwant, 88 I. C. 181. (1925) N. 345; 86 I. C. 993, (1925) O. 413.

(22) Asrabudin v. Kali Doyal, 19 C. W. N. 125, 28 I. C. 645; Digambar v. Ram Taran, 41 I. C. (C.) 663.

(23) Arscott, 6 C. & P. 408; Arura Mal, (1916) P. W. R. 30; 36 I. C. 154; 17 Cr. L. J. 474 (negotiation of forged hundi knowing it to be forged punishable under this section.)

(24) Cooke, 8 C. & P. 582.

ed, as a specimen of those he wanted to sell, may or may not amount to uttering it: it is a question of fact for the jury; and so Littledale, J., in a case told them: If the prisoner meant it as specimen, or that the witness might see whether the others were made according to the pattern, then, in my opinion, it would not be an uttering within the meaning of the Act. If you are satisfied that it was not uttered with intent to put it into circulation, but was to be kept as a pattern, and afterwards thrown away or put into the fire, then you may acquit the prisoner."(25)

5263. Using like uttering may be complete without manual transition out of the hands of the accused. The accused owed money to the prosecutor who pressed him for payment, whereupon the accused showed him a receipt purporting to be signed by his predecessor, but would not part with it. The prosecutor, however, snatched it away from him and it was held that he had been rightly convicted of uttering it.(1) So where the accused showed the prosecutor certain receipts purporting to be for payment of certain rates to establish his solvency and accept his security for an advance which he induced the prosecutor to make to a third party, it was held that the uttering was complete: "This was a using of the forged receipt to get money upon it, or by means of it, as much as if the prisoner himself had been the borrower of the money, and the receipt had purported that he had paid the rates, and the prosecutor had thereupon advanced him a sum of money, and had been cheated out of it by him. We, therefore, think that the conviction was according to decided cases and sound principles of law."(2)

5264. Again, a person may use a forged document even though he employs another to put it in circulation: qui facit per alium facit per se. The accused, a pawn-broker, was sued for non-return of the goods pledged by the prosecutor, whereupon he filed through his attorney a pawn-broker's ticket which he said mentioned the goods pledged. It was a forgery, and the Court in convicting him held that the fact that the prisoner had filed it through his attorney did not preclude his being convicted for uttering it.(3)

Using a false copy.

5265. Since documents includes an original as well as a copy, a person may be convicted for using the true copy of a false original,(4) or a false copy of a true original.(5) The accused wishing to establish his title to a certain mango grove put in copies of the khasra which he knew to be forged. He was held to have been rightly convicted under this section.(6) So, again, a person may be convicted of using as genuine a document which he knew to be forged, though he in the first instance produced only a copy of a copy of it.(7) A person may, for instance produce a document purporting to be the copy of a deed, horoscope or a will, in

(25) Harris, 7 C. & P. 428.
(1) Radford, 1 C. & K. 707.
(2) Ion, 2 Den. C. C. 475.
(3) Filche, D. & B. 175; Lala Ojha, 26 C. 863; Jiwan, (1887) 7 A. W. N. 195.
(4) Nujum Ali, 6 W. R. 41; Malai Singh, 28 A. 402; knowledge and intent material; Krishna Govinda, 43 C. 783; contra in Gopalakrishna, 6 M. L. T. 428, 6 I. C. 776.
(5) Krishna Govinda, 43 C. 783.
(6) Mul Singh, 28 A. 402; Mathura Prasad, 93 I. C. 66, (1926) O. 255.
(7) Nurjum Ali, 6 W. R. 41.

which cases if either the original or the copy is false he may be charged under this section, provided, of course that there is evidence of his criminality. The accused being sued for a strip of land, delivered a copy of a plaint previously filed by his pleader to show that he had omitted to include this land in that suit. The plaint purported to be a copy of the plaint served on him by the plaintiff in the previous suit, which it was, but he had interpolated certain words to suit his present defence. The plaint did not go beyond the hands of his pleader, and he was, therefore, convicted of an attempt to commit this offence, but on appeal Prinsep and Hill, JJ., held it to be a completed offence under this section. "It seems to us," they said, "that having, as we find he did, given his pleader a copy of a false document, that is to say, a copy of the plaint after it had been falsified by the interpolation already mentioned, for the purpose of using it in the trial of this suit, he intentionally and fraudulently made use of the fabricated plaint by misrepresenting or causing to be misrepresented in the copy, that the plaint as presented by him and used in the trial of that suit was set out in that copy. The object was clearly by means of this copy fraudulently to use it as genuine with its interpolations, knowing that in that state it was a forged document."(8)

5266. Use must be Fraudulent or Dishonest.—The fact that the document is forged and was so known to the accused is not decisive of his guilt. For in order to make him criminally liable he must have used it "fraudulently" or "dishonestly."

5267. These words are defined in the Code, and their bearing on the offence of forgery, has been already discussed. But, as observed before, there is a difference between making and using a document fraudulently. A person who makes it for the purpose of deception and uses it as such is not necessarily guilty of this offence. An apt example of this, is furnished by the case in which the accused had fabricated rent-receipts for genuine ones which he had lost. which he filed in a Revenue Court to establish his occupancy against the landlord who had applied for his ejectment, and who was held to have used the receipts neither dishonestly nor fraudulently so as to render himself liable under this section.(9) Here there was clearly an intention to deceive the Revenue Court, but such deception is not fraud, which presupposes the primary intention of deceiving another, whereas in the case under reference the primary intention of the accused was to make up for his lost receipts.

So where the accused was found to have produced a forged receipt to induce his superior officer from doing an illegal act, the Court held it to be no case for conviction under this section. In this case the creditors of a constable applied to the Superintendent to deduct Rs. 2 per month out of the debtor's pay until the amount of Rs. 18 due to him was repaid. The Superintendent acceded to their request and Rs. 8 were so recovered for which the creditors passed a receipt. The constable altered the figure 8 into "18" and showed the altered receipt to the Superintendent with a view to induce him to cancel his order for monthly deductions. He was convicted of this offence, but Petheram, C. J.,

(8) Lala Ojha, 26 C. 863. (9) Sheo Dayal, 7 A. 459.

and Straight, J., quashed the conviction, holding that the Superintendent's order for deducting the accused's pay was illegal, as his pay could not be deducted except upon a proper attachment by a Civil Court, and "therefore it comes to this, that the appellant used the altered receipt in order to induce his superior officer to refrain from doing an illegal act. This, to our minds, was the real intent in the mind of the prisoner, and we do not think that in a criminal case we ought to speculate as to some other intent over and above this that might have presented itself to him. For it does not, in our opinion, at all necessarily follow that because the appellant objected to have his pay put under monthly stoppages to satisfy his creditor's debt, that he therefore necessarily contemplated setting up the altered receipt to defeat his creditor's claim. In this view of the matter, we think there was a doubt in the case to which the appellant was entitled" and he was accordingly acquitted.(10)

5268. In another case the Court held that the production of a forged deed in support of a true case is punishable under this section, since such act though not dishonest is nevertheless fraudulent.(11) In another case the accused being anxious to secure recognition from a settlement officer of the title of Loskur, which carried with it no emoluments, presented a forged sanad purporting to have been granted by a Rajah, but it was held that the intention of the accused was to produce a false belief in the mind of the settlement officer, and that he had no intention to defraud him.(12) The distinction between the two is rather fine, but the decision might be supported on the ground that where the deception is practised without intention to commit any particular fraud, or doing any specific wrong to any individual, there is no "intent to defraud" which is the essence of "fraudulently."(13)

Forgery to conceal Previous Fraud.

5269. So a forged document filed to conceal a previous dishonest, fraudulent or negligent act, is according to one view not fraudulent, because the primary intention of the accused is then to save himself and not to defraud another.(14) But the harmony of this view was disturbed in a Madras case in which the accused who was a pleader's clerk, having failed to file an execution petition within the period of limitation, altered the date of the decree so as to bring it within time, whereupon he was held to have been rightly convicted both under this section, as well as under section 193.(15)

5270. However, such cases are very different to those in which the forged document is used to obtain wrongful gain or cause wrongful loss, or in which the intent to defraud is plainly visible. The accused, a head constable of police, was in charge of a cattle pound into which 73 heads of cattle were one day impounded, and the fact was noted in the police diary by one A. The owners of the cattle afterwards appeared and had some conversation with the accused, whereupon the accused

(10) Syed Hussain, 7 A. 403.
(11) Bansi Sheikh, 51 C. 469.
(12) Jan Mahamed, 10 C. 584.
(13) Hodgson, 25 L. J. M. C. 78.
(14) Lalit Mohun Sarkar, 22 C. 313 (321); Sabapati, 11 M. 411; Lal Gumal, 2 N. W. P. H. C. R. 11; Jogeshur Pershad, 6 N. W. P. H. C. R. 56; Jiwanand, 5 A. 221; Mazhar Hussain, 5 A. 553; Girdhari Lal, 8 A. 653; Shankar, 4 B. 657.
(15) Godlavedu Balayya, (1902) 1 Weir 551.

asked A to alter the figure "73" to "13" but which he declined to do. The alteration was, however subsequently made and fine for only 13 heads of cattle recorded as received. He was held to have been rightly convicted of this offence.(16)

Making or possessing counterfeit seal, etc., with intent to commit forgery punishable under section 467.

472. Whoever makes or counterfeits any seal, plate or other instrument for making an impression, intending that the same shall be used for the purpose of committing any forgery which would be punishable under section 467 of this Code, or, with such intent, has in his possession any such seal, plate or other instrument knowing the same to be counterfeit, shall be punished with transportation for life, or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Session. Non-cog. Warrant. Bailable. Not comp.

[Possession—s. 27. Counterfeits—s. 28.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5271).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5272).
(3) Proof (5273).
(4) Form of Charge (5274).
(5) Principle (5276).
(6) Meaning of Words (5277).

5271. Analogous Law.—This section and the next correspond with sections 235, 255, and 256 which relate to the possession of instruments for counterfeiting coins or stamps. The object in each case is to prevent forgery by punishing a preparatory act.

5272. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable, but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance It is bailable but not compoundable and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session A person found in possession of several seals of different descriptions with intent to commit forgery, may be separately charged for possession of every seal, and for which he may be separately convicted, unless it appears that the different seals were intended for the purpose of committing one particular forgery.(17)

5273. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the seal, plate or other instrument in question was capable of being used for committing forgery.

(2) That the accused made or counterfeited it or had it in his possession.

(3) That he had as in (2) with intent that it shall be used for committing forgery, or in the case of possession, he knew the same to be counterfeited.

(16) Rughoo Barrick, 11 W. R. 44. (17) Goluk Chunder, 13 W. R. 16.

(4) That such forgery was punishable under section 467.

5274. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of ——at——you made (or counterfeited) a seal, Ex——(or plate or instrument) for making an impression, intending that the same shall be used for the purpose of committing any forgery punishable under section 467 of the Indian Penal Code, [or had in your possession the seal, Ex——(or plate, or instrument) intending that the same shall be used for the purpose of committing any forgery which would be punishable under section 467 of the Indian Penal Code] and that you thereby committed an offence puinshable under section 471 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge."

5275. Principle.—This section does not punish the mere possession of forging instruments other than those used for forging the documents mentioned in section 467. As that section refers to such documents as wills and receipts, it follows that this section does not merely apply to instruments used for forging a valuable security such as notes, cheques, bills of exchange, and the like. At the same time it is obviously intended to be restricted only to instruments specially made or adapted for the special purpose of forgery. A pen and inkpot may be instruments necessary to execute a will, but a person could not be convicted of this offence, even though he was ready to use them for forging it.

5276. Again, the mere making or being in possession of such plates or instruments does not expose the maker or possessor to the penalty of this section, for the gist of the crime is intention or knowledge, which, however, may be inferred from mere possession unaccounted for. The accused was found in possession of a number of counterfeit seals together with instruments for making them, as also a forged document purporting to be a judgment of a Civil Court. He could not account for their possession, and on the other hand, repudiated their possession, holding them to have been placed there by his enemy which was not possible, and the Court consequently held that as the accused could not explain his possession, it might be reasonably inferred that his possession was with an intent to use them fraudulently. He was accordingly convicted under this section.(18)

5277. Meaning of Words.—"Or other instruments": must be read "ejusdem generis with seal or plate. The word is susceptible of two meanings, first, a tool used for any work or purpose, or secondly, a writing expressive of some act, contract, process or proceeding.(19) It is here used in the former sense.

(18) Kisto Soonder Deb, 2 W. R. 5.

(19) Per Hawkins, J., in Reley, (1896) 1 Q. B. 309 (314).

For a further commentary under this section, reference should be made to sections 235, 255, and 256.

Session. Non-cog. Warrant. Bailable. Not comp

Making or possessing counterfeit seal, etc., with intent to commit forgery punishable otherwise.

473. Whoever makes or counterfeits any seal, plate, or other instrument for making an impression, intending that the same shall be used for the purpose of committing any forgery which would be punishable under any section of this Chapter other than section 467, or with such intent, has in his possession any such seal, plate or other instrument, knowing the same to be counterfeit, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[Possession—s. 27. Counterfeits—s. 28.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5278).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5279).
(3) Proof (5280).
(4) Charge (5281).
(5) Possession of Seal, Plate or other Forging Instruments (5282).

5278. Analogous Law.—This section is exactly the same as the last from which it differs only in the fact that the forgery intended is not of the serious nature described in section 467, and the punishment prescribed is consequently less. In other respects the two sections are identical.

5279. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable, but warrant should, ordinarily, issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable and is exclusively triable by the Court of Sessions. For other points see under section 472.

5280. Proof.—The points requiring proof under this section are the same as those in the last section except that instead of (4) prove:—

(4) That the forgery was punishable otherwise under this chapter than under section 467.

5281. Charge.—The charge should be in the form given under the last section.

5282. Possession of Seal, Plate or Other Forging Instrument.—The making of a seal for the purpose of forgery need not be the duplicate of the genuine seal, since it is not essential for the offence of forgery that the seal made should correspond with any other seal. The counterfeiting of a seal implies imitation of the original, though the imitation need not be exact, but it must be sufficient to impose upon a person of ordinary intelligence. The seal, plate or instrument imitated may be by itself insufficient to produce the finished impression. It may for instance, be the mere negative of a seal (§ 2462) of itself insufficient to produce the forgery, but it must be specially adapted for that purpose. For instance, pen and ink, erasure and lens are necessary for forgery, and they may in a sense be then designated forging implements, but they are not intended to be comprised in the section which relates exclusively to such instruments as are devised for that special purpose. But if they are found in such combination as to suggest an intended forgery the possessor may be conceivably punished under this section (§ 2475).

The question what constitutes possession must be answered here in the same sense as in section 236 (§§ 2469-2474), and so must be the question of intention and knowledge (§§ 2568-2569).

Session. Non-cog. Warrant. Bailable. Not comp.

Having possession of document described in section 466 or 467, knowing it to be forged and intending to use it as genuine.

474. Whoever has in his possession any document, knowing the same to be forged, and intending that the same shall fraudulently or dishonestly be used as genuine shall, if the document is one of the description mentioned in section 466 of this Code, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine; and if the document is one of the description mentioned in section 467, shall be punished with transportation for life, or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[Dishonestly—s. 24. Fraudulently—s. 25. Possession—s. 27. Document—s. 29.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5283).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5284).
(3) Proof (5285).
(4) Principle (5286).
(5) Criminal Possession of Forged Document (5287-5288).

5283. Analogous Law.—This section corresponds to sections 242 and 243 relating to coins, and section 259 relating to stamps....It is another instance where the Code punishes a mere preparation as distinct from an attempt.

The gist of this offence is possession, which is used here in the sense already discussed (§§ 2470-2474) which is thus defined in English Law[20] with special reference to this offence:—

"S. 45. Where the leaving any matter in the custody or possession of any person is in this Act expressed to be an offence, if any person shall have any such matter in his personal custody or possession, or shall knowingly and wilfully have any such matter in the actual custody or possession of any other person, or shall knowingly and wilfully have any such matter in any dwelling-house or other building, lodging apartment, field or other place, open or inclosed, whether belonging to or occupied by himself or not, and whether such matter shall be so had for his own use or for the use or benefit of another, every such person shall be deemed and taken to have such matter in his custody or possession within the meaning of this Act."

(20) Forgery Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict., c. 98), s. 45.

5284. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable, but warrant should, ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable and is exclusively triable by the Court Session.

5285. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the document was forged.

(2) That it was in possession of the accused.

(3) That he held its possession knowing it to be forged, and intending that the same shall be used fraudulently or dishonestly as a genuine document.

(4) That the document was one described in section 466 or 467.

5286. Principle.—This is one more instance where the Code punishes a mere preparation as distinct from an attempt—the reason being the heinous character of the offence and the great danger of permitting the accumulation of forged documents awaiting employment at the earliest favourable opportunity. It is not necessary that the possessor should himself use them, or that they should have been used at all, but what is necessary is that he must hold them knowing the purpose for which they are destined—that purpose being their fraudulent or dishonest user as genuine documents. Such a person may stand in the position of an abettor, though the provisions of abetment as defined in the Code do not apply to him.

5287. Criminal Possession of Forged Document.—On the analogy of section 242, 243 and 259 relating to coin and stamps this section constitutes the possession of a forged document an offence, provided that it was accompanied by those elements which make such possession criminal. These are the gist of the offence whether it relates to a document or to a coin or stamp, the possessor in each case being required to possess knowledge that the thing in his possession is forged, and intending that it is to be used fraudulently or dishonestly as a genuine document. The question what constitutes possession is important, but has been discussed before (§§ 2470-2474). It will therefore suffice here to state that possession implies control, and to be criminal it must be exclusive, though it may be joint. For instance, two or more inmates of a house may be in joint possession of a receptacle used for the custody of a forged document, though there may be more inmates sharing with them joint possession of the house. The question of possession is, of course, a question of fact dependent upon proof of the facts and circumstances of each case. Besides possession, there must be knowledge that the document is a forgery. This may be the subject of proof, but it is more likely to be a matter for inference. For instance, if a person is found in possession of several counterfeit seals and forged documents, which he cannot satisfactorily account for, the Court may well be justified in presuming guilty knowledge and an intention to use them fraudulently.(21) So a person who merely files in Court or takes with him for filing a forged document may be convicted under this section, though he could not be convicted for using it under the provisions of section 471.(22) Where A takes a Hundi from B knowing that the latter had fabricated it, A is guilty of this offence, and if he negotiates it he is guilty of the offence punishable by s. 471.(23)

5288. The question whether the document was intended to be used fraudulently may be solved having regard to the nature of the document and the purpose, if genuine, it would have served. If for instance, a person had filed a suit for money against the accused and the latter was found in possession of a forged acquittance, an inference would be justifiable that the accused knew it to be forged and was in possession of it with the intention of using it in his defence. Proof of intention is then no less than the proof of knowledge an inference from circumstances. But the presence of both must be clearly made out, and the judge must direct the attention of the jury to the necessity of finding them. He must, moreover, draw their attention to the fact that the document, if forged, should be found to fall under the description of documents mentioned either in section 466 or 467.(24) A mere "tracing or attempt to portray a pedigree" is not such a document.(25)

Session. Non-cog. Warrant. Bailable. Not comp. Sanction. S. 195 (c) Cr. P. C.

Counterfeiting device or mark used for authenticating documents described in section 467, or possessing counterfeit marked material.

475. Whoever counterfeits upon, or in the substance of, any material, any device or mark used for the purpose of authenticating any document described in section 467 of this Code, intending that such device or mark shall be used for the purpose of giving the appearance of authenticity to any document then forged or thereafter to be forged on such material or who, with such intent, has in his possession any material upon or in the substance of which any such device or mark has been counterfeited, shall be punished with transportation for life or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[Possession—s. 27. Counterfeit—s. 28. Document—s. 29.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5289).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5290).
(3) Proof (5291).
(4) Form of Charge (5292).
(5) Counterfeiting or Possession of Authenticating Device (5293).
(6) Criminal Possession of Such Device (5294).

(21) Kisto Soonder Deb, 2 W. R. 5. 36 I. C. 154, 17 Cr. L. J. 474.
(22) Hatim Moonshee, 8 W. R. 11. (24) Abaji Ramchandra, 16 B. 165.
(23) Arura Mal, (1916) 8 W. R. 30. (25) Ib.

5289. Analogous Law.—This section is supplementary to section 472 and extends criminality to another preparatory act necessary, though not invariably so, for forging a document defined in section 467. It is conceivable that the provisions of this section will overlap those of section 472 and other sections, but it creates a special offence and prescribes a penalty which must be resorted to in a proper case arising under it. Where the forgery is punishable otherwise than under section 467, the provisions of the next section should apply. The two sections thus deal with the same offence committed under circumstances of varying gravity, measured by the nature of the document whether belonging to the important class of those specified in section 467 or in any other section.

5290. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable, but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session. The offence requires sanction if it is committed by the party to any proceeding in any Court in respect of a document produced or given in evidence in such proceeding.(1) The meanings of terms used in this clause of the Procedure Code have been already set out (§§ 2170-2179).

5291. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused counterfeited upon, or in the substance of, any material, a device or mark.

(2) That such device or mark is used for the purpose of authenticating any document prescribed in section 467.

(3) That the accused intended to use it for the purpose of giving the appearance of authenticity to a document.

(4) That such document was forged or thereafter to be forged.

Or prove—

(1) That the accused was in possession of any material or substance.

(2) Upon which the device or mark was counterfeited.

(3) That the device or mark was such as is used for the purpose of authenticating any document prescribed in section 467.

(4) and (5) as (3) and (4) above.

5292. Charge.—A charge under this section should distinctly specify whether the accused is to be tried under the first or the second part of the section, and in either case it should specify the particular paper or papers bearing a counterfeit mark or device which the accused was alleged to have had in his possession with the intent mentioned in the section.(2) It may be worded thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you counterfeited upon (or in the substance of) any material, to wit—(describe it) a device, to wit——(or mark) used for the purpose of authenticating any document, to wit——[or that you were in possession of any material, to wit——upon (or the substance) in which any device or mark used for the purpose of authenticating a document, to wit] intending that such device (or mark) shall be used for the purpose of giving the appearance of authenticity to some document then forged, to wit——(or to be forged on such material) and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 475 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

(1) S. 195 (c), Cr. P. C. (2) Abaji Ramchandra, 15 B. 189.

"And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge."

5293. Counterfeiting or Possession of Authenticating Device.—A document is authenticated by affixing the signature or seal of the executant, and this section is then intended to prevent the forgery of a person's signature, or mark used in lieu of signature, by engraving it on a plate or other substance or forging it on a paper so that it may be used for the purpose of authenticating a forged document. Where the substance is a seal or plate the offence would equally fall under the terms of section 472, but this offence may be committed under circumstances not covered by that section, as where a person forges only the signature of another upon a document which is a forgery. But whatever the substance or the nature of the device or mark, it must correspond to something used for authenticating a genuine document, and such document must be one of those specified in section 467.

The counterfeiter must, moreover, intend that the device or mark prepared shall be used for authenticating a forged document. A person may know that a device is to be so used, but he cannot be convicted under this section unless there is the proof of intention. Such would be the case of a person who is employed to engrave a plate, and who knowing of the purpose for which it is to be used engraves it,(3) but at the same time communicates with the authorities of the design of his employer (§ 2475). The intention to use the device or mark for the purpose of forging may have to be gathered from circumstances. A person found in possession of a number of forged documents with counterfeit seals which he is unable satisfactorily to account for, may be presumed to possess the intention of using the seals for the purpose of committing forgery.(4) But such documents and seals must have been clearly traced to the possession of the accused. The fact that they were found in a place to which others had access is sufficient to negative his possession.(5) So again, if there were found in the possession of another person they could not be used against him on the bare allegation that the two belonged to the same gang.(6)

5294. Criminal Possession of Such Device.—The first clause which is limited to the counterfeiter would require not merely proof of possession but also of the fact that the device or mark was counterfeited by the accused. Such proof may not be always available. It would be then advisable to charge the

Clause (2).

(3) Benjamin Bannen, 2 Moody 309.
(4) Kisto Soonder Deb, 2 W. R. 5.
(5) Raghoonundun, 15 W. R. 19 (21).
(6) Abaji Ramchandra, 15 B. 189.

accused under the second clause, which is more general and deals with a person who is in possession of "any material upon or in the substance of which any such device or mark has been counterfeited." It will be observed that this clause does not punish a person for mere possession of counterfeiting materials. What is punishable is a material bearing some counterfeit device or mark sufficient for the purpose of giving the appearance of authentication. This clause is not then intended to include such acts, for instance, as the possession of blank bonds purchased in the names of other persons, and one or two bearing certain genuine signatures, since, though they may have been intended for forgery, they could not be said to bear any device or mark possessing the appearance of authentication(7)—a phrase which necessarily excludes the existence of a genuine signature.

476. Whoever counterfeits upon, or in the substance of, any material, any device or mark used for the purpose of authenticating any document other than the documents described in section 467 of this Code, intending that such device or mark shall be used for the purpose of giving the appearance of authenticity to any document then forged or thereafter to be forged on such material, or who, with such intent, has in his possession any material upon or in the substance of which any such device or mark has been counterfeited, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Session. Non-cog. Warrant. Not bail. Not comp. Sanction. S. 195 (c) Cr. P. C.

Counterfeiting device or mark used for authenticating documents other than those described in section 467 or possessing counterfeit marked material.

[Possession—s. 27. Counterfeit—s. 28. Document—s. 29.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5295).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5296).
(3) Proof (5297).
(4) Charge (5298).
(5) Principle (5299).

5295. Analogous Law.—This section is exactly the same as the last, the only difference being in the nature of the document in respect of which the offence is committed, which must be "other than the documents described in section 467."

5296. Procedure and Practice.—This offence requires sanction in a case arising under section 195 (c) of the Procedure Code, the operation of which has been already set out (§§ 2170-2181). It is noncognizable but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both nonbailable and non-compoundable and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session. The policy of making this offence nonbailable when the offence in the last section is bailable may be question-

(7) Raghoonundun, 15 W. R. 19 (20, 21).

ed. That offence is naturally an aggravated form of the offence here described, and the points calling for notice in each case are the same.

5297. Proof.—The points requiring proof are the same as those mentioned in the last section, but instead of proving that the document was one of those mentioned in section 467, prove:—

(2) That such device or mark is used for the purpose of authenticating a document other than those described in section 467.

5298. Charge.—For form, see § 5292.

5299. Principle.—This section is enacted to prescribe a reduced penalty for the offence described in the last section, in view of the fact that the document in respect of which it was committed is not of the same importance as documents enumerated in section 467. In all other respects the two offences are identical, and the commentary under the last section should be read as a commentary also under this section.

Session. Non-cog. Warrant. Not bail. Non-comp.

Fraudulent cancellation, destruction, etc., of will, authority to adopt or valuable security.

477. Whoever fraudulently or dishonestly, or with intent to cause damage or injury to the public or to any person, cancels, destroys or defaces or attempts to cancel, destroy or deface, or secretes or attempts to secrete any document which is or purports to be a will or an authority to adopt a son, or any valuable security, or commits mischief in respect to such document, shall be punished with transportation for life, or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[Person—s. 11. Public—s. 12. Dishonestly—s. 24.
Fraudulently—s. 25. Document—s. 29. Will—s. 31.
Valuable security—s. 30. Injury—s. 44. Mischief—s. 425.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5300).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5301).
(3) Proof (5302).
(4) Form of Charge (5303).
(5) Fraudulently Tampering with a Valuable Security (5304).
(6) Acts Punishable (5305-5306).

5300. Analogous Law.—This section is scarcely an instance of forgery, the essence of which is the making of a document and not its destruction. But in so far as the section refers to cancellation or defacement the offence may amount to forgery.

5301. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session. It being so, a Magistrate is not competent to dispose of a case arising under this section as one of mischief.[8]

5302. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the document in question is, or purports to be a will, or an authority to adopt or a valuable security.

(2) That the accused cancelled, destroyed, defaced or secreted it, or attempted to cancel, destroy, deface or secrete the same.

(3) That he did so fraudulently or dishonestly or with intent to cause damage or injury to the public or to any person.

5303. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you fraudulently [or dishonestly, or with intent to cause damage or injury to A B (or to the public)] cancelled [or destroyed, or defaced, or attempted to cancel, destroy, deface or secreted or attempted to secrete, or committed mischief in respect of] a document, Ex——which is [or purported to be] a will [or an authority to adopt or any valuable security] and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 477 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge."

5304. Fraudulently Tampering with a Valuable Security.—Out of the documents enumerated in section 467, this section singles out three documents as deserving of special protection against their being tampered with. These are a will, an authority to adopt a son, and a valuable security. An authority to adopt a son must necessarily be executed by a Hindu amongst whom alone is the adoption of a son valid. A will may be executed by anyone, whether a Hindu, Mahomedan or a Christian, and though a Mahomedan cannot will away more than one-third of his property, that fact has no bearing on the present question, since it is enacted to protect all wills irrespective of their validity or sufficiency. In short, the section protects not only what is a valid deed, but also what "purports to be" a deed, though its validity may be doubtful.[9] So the fact that the document was not duly stamped,[10] or was unsupported by consideration,[11] or inadmissible for want of registration[12] could not take it out of the category of a "valuable security" as that term is understood in this connection[13] (§ 288-289).

(8) (1888) 1 Weir 552.
(9) Mali Muthu, 4 R. 251.
(10) 7 M. H. C. R. (App.) 26.
(11) Kotha Goundan, (1890) 1 Weir 554; Ramaswami, 12 M. 148.
(12) Ramaswami, 12 M. 148.
(13) (1888) 1 Weir 552.

Acts punishable.

5305. The acts punishable under this section may conceivably amount to mischief within the meaning of section 425. But it is not on that account punishable under the more general provisions of that section. For, being an act committed in respect of a document of the description here mentioned, law prescribes a special penalty, which alone must be resorted to. So where the accused tore up a promissory note delivered to him by the complainant who had come to demand payment, and the Magistrate convicted him under section 426, it was held that the offence being one specially provided for in this section, and being as such exclusively triable by the Court of Session, the Magistrate had no jurisdiction in the case.(14)

5306. This section is applicable to such acts as the tearing up of a pattah(15) or a paper containing a statement of account between the accused and the prosecutor.(16) So a document may be defaced by rendering the writing illegible by erasing or spilling ink over it. So the document may be made unavailable for the purpose for which it was intended by secreting it. Secretion implies concealment, and there are various modes of secreting a document, as by falsely giving out that it is lost, stolen or destroyed, or by otherwise causing its disappearance from the custody of a person who was interested in upholding it. The question whether the secretion was made fraudulently or dishonestly must depend upon the nature of the document and the purpose its secretion was calculated to serve. For instance, a person interested in defeating the claims of a legatee may suppress a will—a person prejudiced by an adoption may suppress an authority legalizing it. It has been stated before, that the fact the document is inoperative for want of stamp, consideration or registration is immaterial; it is equally immaterial that the document was duly registered and the act of the accused failed to achieve the purpose for which it was committed, for an act is fraudulent if it is done with intent to defraud irrespective of the consequence.

5307. This is a highly penal section subjecting the offender to the maximum penalty of life-long transportation. All its essential constituents must, therefore, be strictly proved. A person who destroys or secretes a document is not necessarily guilty of this offence, because he may have done it under a claim of right. For example, a person in custody of a document is not bound to produce it unless he is legally compellable to do so. If, therefore, he declines to produce whenever called upon, he could not be proceeded against under this section as a matter of course, unless his act was both manifestly illegal and fraudulent.

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st class. Non-cog. Warrant. Bailable. Not comp.

Falsification of Accounts.

477-A. Whoever being a clerk, officer or servant, or employed or acting in the capacity of a clerk, officer or servant, wilfully, and with intent to defraud, destroys, alters, mutilates or falsifies any book,

(14) Madurai (In re), 12 M. 54.
(15) Nittar Mundle, 3 W. R. 38.
(16) Ramaswami, 12 M. 148 (154).

paper, writing, valuable security or account which belongs to or is in the possession of his employer, or has been received by him for or on behalf of his employer, or wilfully, and with intent to defraud, makes or abets the making of any false entry in, or omits or alters or abets the omission or alteration of any material particular from or in, any such book, paper, writing, valuable security or account, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

Explanation.—It shall be sufficient in any charge under this section to allege a general intent to defraud without naming any particular person intended to be defrauded or specifying any particular sum of money intended to be the subject of the fraud, or any particular day on which the offence was committed.

[Valuable security—s. 30. Omission—s. 33. Abets—s. 107 Clerk or servant—s. 381 (§§ 4167-4168). Intent to defraud—s. 463.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5308-5310).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5311).
(3) Proof (5312).
(4) Form of Charge (5313).
(5) Falsification of Accounts (5314).
(6) Clerk, Officer or Servant (5315-5317).
(7) Falsification by Act or Omission (5318-5320).
(8) "Intent to defraud" (5319-5320).

5308. Analogous Law.—This section is new, and was added by the Indian Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1895,[17] in consequence of a glaring defect in law noticed in an unreported Calcutta case[18] in which the accused was shown to have defrauded a bank to the extent of three lakhs of rupees, but he had, nevertheless, to be acquitted because it was not proved that the three lakhs had been abstracted upon any one particular occasion or in any particular sums. This section was consequently enacted to meet such cases, and to make the falsification of books and accounts punishable even though there is no evidence to prove misappropriation of any specific sum on any particular occasion.[19]

5309. The section is drawn from the English Statute,[20] the provisions of which run as follows:—

"S. 1. That if any clerk, officer or servant, or any person employed or acting in the capacity of a clerk, officer or servant, shall wilfully and with intent to defraud,

(17) Act III of 1895, s. 4.
(18) Shama Churn Sen, Cal., unrep.
(19) Law Member's Speech, Proceedings Legislative Council, Gazette of India, Pt. 6, dated 31st March 1894, p. 152.
(20) Falsification of Accounts Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict., c. 24), s. 1.

destroy, alter, mutilate, or falsify any book, paper, writing, valuable security, or account which belongs to or is in the possession of his employer, or has been received by him for or on behalf of his employer, or shall wilfully and with intent to defraud, make or concur in making any false entry in, or omit or alter, or concur in omitting or altering, any material particular from or in any such book, or any document or account, then in every such case the person so offending shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and be liable to be kept in penal servitude for a term not exceeding five years, or to be imprisoned with or without hard labour for any term not exceeding two years.

"S. 2. It shall be sufficient in any indictment under this Act to allege a general intent to defraud without naming any particular person intended to be defrauded."

5310. The falsification of accounts as such, is not forgery, but it may assume such a form as to amount to forgery.(21)

It has been held in England that a person residing in Paris, and omitting from his daily account receipts of certain sums which he sent daily to his employers in London could be indicted in England.(22) So where the accused who was the principal store-keeper at Antigua purchased certain stores in England at a nominal price agreed upon between him and the seller which price he charged to the Government in his returns to the Navy Office and by collusion with the seller the latter made to him an allowance, by which the Government were defrauded to a large amount and whereupon he was convicted in England, it was held that the English Courts had jurisdiction holding that "it appeared that the several false charges made by the defendant by which he had defrauded the Government had been in the several returns made by him from Antigua to the Navy Office in London. There was thereby an offence committed in London where such false returns where received, and where the fraud had been completed by their having been there allowed, upon which the jurisdiction of the Court attached."(23)

It may be added that this offence is extraditable both in England(24) as well as in this country.(25)

5311. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable, but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable and is triable by the Court Session, Presidency Magistrate or a first class Magistrate.(1) This section enables the prosecutor to frame a general charge about the falsification of accounts, but it does not purport to override the provisions of section 234 of the Procedure Code, nor its terms enlarged by the amendment of section 222,(2) of the Procedure Code which applies only to criminal breach of trust or dishonest misappropriation of property.(3) Consequently, while it is legal to charge a series of false entries in an account as a single

(21) Arton, (1896) 1 Q. B. 509 (517).
(22) Per Lord Alberston, C. J., in Oliphant, (1905) 2 K. B. 67 (73).
(23) Munton. 1 Esq. 62; 8 R. R. 556.
(24) Arton, (No. 2), (1896) 1 Q. B. 509, 517.
(25) Indian Extradition Act, Sch. I.
(1) Before the amendment of the Criminal Procedure Code by Act XVIII of 1923 this offence was exclusively triable by the Court of session. A Magistrate first class who started an inquiry into this offence was competent to try the case where the amending Act came into force before the accused was charged. Since pending proceedings were not saved by the amendment; Rajib Lochan, 28 C. W. N. 998.
(2) Shama Churn Sen, Cal. unrep
(3) Matilal Lahiri, 26 C. 60.

offence,[4] it is illegal to combine with such a charge three specific defalcations constituting offences under s. 409.[5] In other words, while it is legal to charge all false entries, whether they relate to a single or several of the defalcations, in a single charge, if it is proposed to charge for the defalcations separately no more than three can be tried together, and in that case it is not legal to combine three defalcations with three false entries as distinct offences, on the ground that they really amount to the same offence. For other points relating to procedure reference must be made to the last paragraph.

5312. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused was a clerk, officer, or servant, or acted in any such capacity.

(2) That he destroyed, altered, mutilated or falsified the book, paper, writing, valuable security, or account in question.

(3) That such book, paper, etc., belonged to or was in the possession of his employer, or had been received by him for or on behalf of his employer.

(4) That the accused did as in (2) wilfully and fraudulently.

Or, instead of (2), prove:—

(2) That the accused made or abetted the making of any false entry in, or omitted or altered, or abetted the ommission or alteration of some material particular from or in such book, paper, etc.

5313. Charge.—The charge should conform to what has been said before (§ 5311). It should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the———day of———at———you being a clerk [or officer or servant, or employed or acting in the capacity of a clerk, officer, or servant], wilfully and with intent to defraud, destroyed [or altered, mutilated or falsified] any book to wit—[or paper, writing, valuable security, or account] which belonged to [or was in the possession of] your employer A B, [or which was received by you for or on behalf of your employer the said A B [or you wilfully and with intent to defraud, made or abetted the making of any false entry to wit—in (or omitted or altered the omission or alteration of any material from) any such book, etc.,] and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 477-A of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the court of Session or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

5314. Falsification of Accounts.—This section is enacted to punish the falsification of accounts by a clerk, officer or servant or one acting as such (§§ 4166-4177). The falsification made punishable is stated to be of any "book, paper, writing, valuable security or account." These must belong to the employer, though it is then immaterial, in whose custody they were at the time of their falsification. The falsification punishable may be effected by (i) destruction, (ii) alteration, (iii) mutilation, or (iv) falsification by (a) the making of a false entry, (b) omission or alteration of a material particular, or (c) abetment of (a) or (b).

(4) Aiyagiri, (1912) M. W. N. 545, 14 I. C. 603, 13 Cr. L. J. 251. (5) Kasi Viswanathan, 30 M. 328 Raman Behary, 41 C. 722.

Of course, whatever the nature and extent of the falsification, it must not have been due to mere carelessness or negligence, but must be made both wilfully and fraudulently.

5315. Clerk, Officer or Servant.—The words "clerk, officer or servant" have been taken from the English Statute (§ 5309) and they are intended to include not only persons who are legally so appointed but also those who act in that capacity whatever illegality may taint their appointment, or whether they were under any obligation to perform their duties, or were or were not paid for performing them.(6) So it is immaterial by whatever designation the accused was known, as director, partner,(7) manager or secretary, so long as he did perform the duties of a clerk, officer or servant. So where a partner of a firm had been appointed as such to manage the business of the firm, and to write its accounts, he was held to be liable under this section for falsifying them.(8)

5316. The accounts must, however, belong to or be in the possession of his employer, which must be clearly established, for, this section is not intended to punish a person for maintaining incorrect or false accounts, but for maintaining false accounts not his own. Where therefore it appeared that the accounts the accused was maintaining were his own property, he was acquitted although their falsity was proved.(9)

5317. Again, the accused must be shown to have destroyed, altered, mutilated or falsified any book, etc. If he secretes without destroying it, the section would appear to be inapplicable. If the accused is charged for falsifying it, it is not sufficient to show that the cash in hand does not tally with the corresponding entry in the accounts, but that the latter is false. The accused, a rate collector, kept for the overseers a set of books which showed the state of accounts as between the overseers and the parish authorities. In one of these books, called the overseers' receipt and payment book, he made an entry: "25th of March 1898. Balance in hand, £431 10*s.* 5*d.*" That sum was the correct balance, for which the overseers were responsible to the parish, and ought to have been in the possession of the defendant, but was not. He was unable to produce the amount. He was indicted for the falsification of the overseers' receipt and payment book by making the above entry. It was held that the entry in question was not a "false entry" within the meaning of the Act.(10) The alteration of a "paper" mentioned in the section must it appears, be an account paper, e.g., a balance sheet.(11) So where the accused had removed the unused Court fee stamps affixed to applications

(6) Annasami, (1901) 1 Weir 554; following Foulkes, L. R. 2 C. C. 150.
(7) Mahamed v. Mhd. Idris, 88 I. C. 189, (1925) S. 328.
(8) Laloo Ghella, 6 Bom. L. R. 553.
(9) Palin, (1906) 1 K. B. 7.
(10) Williams, (1899) 63 J. P. 103.
(11) Daulat Rai, (1915) P. R. No. 28, 29 I. C. 105.

and Vakalatnamas (powers of attorney) and pasted thereon old used stamps misappropriating their value but had made no alteration in the registers, it was held that no offence under this section had been made out.(12)

5318. Falsification by Act or Omission.—An entry may be falsified by the addition of a new entry as much as by the alteration of an existing entry, or by the omission of an entry which ought to have been, but is not made. The section, however, makes this difference between an entry made, and one altered or omitted, that in the case of an alteration or omission the entry must be material, but even in the case of an addition materiality would probably determine the "intent to defraud." Again, such entries might be either manipulated by the accused himself, or their making might be abetted by him. In either case the accused is equally liable if he intended to defraud by his act or omission, alteration or abetment. So it has been said in an English case that a person may be guilty of making a false entry, although he does not make such entry with his own hands, but fraudulently and wilfully procures it to be made by a third person acting innocently and without any knowledge that the entry is otherwise than true.(13)

The accused was the debt-collector of A. As such he recovered on 22nd February £8 14*s*. 10*d*. on behalf of his employer. His duty was to account to A's cashier, B, for all sums received during the day, which B entered in the cash book. On the day in question he gave B a slip on which he had written. "Sheppard, on account £5," which B credited in his account. He was indicted for abetting the making of a false entry by B, and he was held to have been rightly convicted.(14) In another case the accused was employed by the prosecutors as their assistant at Paris, his duty being to realise bills in Paris, note such payments on slips of paper and send them on to London where they were posted up in the prosecutors' account books. He fraudulently omitted to notify certain payments, and in consequence of which those payments were not entered in the prosecutors' accounts in London. He was held to have been rightly convicted under the Statute for omitting and concurring in omitting these sums from the prosecutors' books in London.(15)

Intent to Defraud.

5319. The term "wilfully" has not been defined in the Code, but it is evidently intended to imply conscious determination as distinguished from ignorant incompetency. It excludes all cases in which the account is ill-kept or incorrect and misleading, but in which there is the absence of an "intent to defraud." These words are taken from the English Statute, but they are also used in section 25 in defining "fraudulently." That term has, however, been used in a special sense, as already seen. It excludes an act done to conceal a previous fraudulent or dishonest act (§§ 5159-5164), but this section has been enacted to embrace a case not only of falsification accompanying an embezzlement, but also of a falsification made in order to conceal a past fraudulent or dishonest act involving pecuniary loss to the employer;(16) so one which merely secures him priority to which

(12) Bidhudananda, 47 C. 71.
(13) Butt, 15 Cox 504.
(14) Per Coleridge, C. J., in ib.
(15) Oliphant (1905) 2 K. B. 67.
(16) Rash Behari Das, 35 C. 450; following Annasami, (1901) 1 Weir 554 (556).

he was not entitled.[17] The accused, a forest clerk, was charged under this section for altering the cash book and his office register so as to show that certain sums received as "compounding fees" had been paid into the Government treasury, though as a matter of fact they had been embezzled by the Forest Guard, whose duty it was to collect them, and upon which he was convicted under this section; but on appeal it was contended for him that since the embezzlement had preceded the alterations, the accused could not be said to have intended to defraud, which pointed to futurity and not to a past fraud, but the Court held the words equally applicable to both. "The effect," they said, "is exactly the same as if a person forged a receipt to conceal the fact of his having retained money instead of paying it into the treasury, and in such a case there would clearly be an intent to deceive."[18]

So in another case it was said that a debtor who forges a release to screen himself from liability to pay the debt cannot but be held guilty of forgery, because he intended by the forgery to cover a dishonest purpose.[19] This view has been followed by a Calcutta Bench in a case in which the accused had made false entries in a chalan, showing payment of moneys into treasury, but which he had, in fact, misappropriated, whereupon he was held to have made himself amenable to this offence.[20] In so holding, the Court did not advert to the accused's liability for forgery, but it is evident that the same expression could not be differently constructed in the two sections, and these cases[21] may then be taken to hold accordingly.

5320. The question of intent to defraud is a question of fact which must be left to the jury. So where the tendency of a summing up was to withdraw from the jury the consideration of the circumstances bearing on the question of intent to defraud, the conviction was quashed.[22]

Of Trade, Property and other Marks.

5321. Topical Introduction.—These sections (ss. 478-489-D) relating to trade and property marks constitute an offence which falls into the general category of cheating, by using false tokens, and which was so regarded by common law. So where the prisoner was indicted for keeping and exposing for sale and selling to one H. A. F., a picture upon which he had unlawfully painted the initials of a well-known artist, it was held to be cheating by use of false token at common law and Cockburn, C. J., in delivering the judgment of the Court of criminal appeal said: "We have carefully examined the authorities, and the result is, that we think if a person in the course of his trade openly and publicly carried on, puts a false mark or token upon an article so as to pass it off as a genuine one, when in fact it was only a spurious one, and the article is sold, and money obtained by means of that false mark or token, that is a cheat at common law."[23] Between an ordinary cheat and the

(17) Narain Dutt, 47 A. 948.
(18) Annasami, (1901) 1 Weir 554.
(19) Sabapathy Pillay, 11 M. 411; Kotamraju, 18 M. 90.
(20) Rash Behari Das, 35 C. 450.
(21) Rash Behari Das, 35 C. 450; following Lalit Mohan Sarkar, 22 C. 313 (321); Annasami, (1901) 1 Weir 554; Sabapathy Pillay, 11 M. 411; Kotamraju, 18 M. 90.
(22) Drewett, (1905) 69 J. P. 37.
(23) Class, 27 L. J. M. C. 541. But the conviction was quashed on account of defective indictment which did not state that the prisoner was able to pass off the picture by means of the false initials.

user of a false trade-mark, there is, however, this difference, that while the former achieves his purpose by means of verbal misrepresentation, the latter attains the same by means of visual misrepresentation. The difference between the two classes of cases is then merely the difference of degree, the cardinal principle underlying the two offences being the same.

5322. The rest of this chapter consists of two sets of sections—ss. 478-489 against counterfeiting trade-marks and ss. 489A-489-D against counterfeiting bank and currency notes. Of these the sections relating to trade-marks were objected to as an instance of over-legislation. It was said that in protecting trade and property marks by criminal sanction, criminal law would be overstrained, but this was not the opinion concurred in by the Law Commissioners, who generally approved of the protecting provisions as being made a part of the Criminal Code,[24] and which eventually they were. But though these sections now form a part of the Penal Code, it is so more as a matter of convenience than as of right. For as was observed in a Madras case: "Ordinarily, the infringement of a trade-mark is rather a civil than a criminal wrong, but as civil proceedings may require much time and expenditure to bring them to a conclusion, the Legislature, in its anxiety to protect traders, has allowed a resort to the Criminal Courts to provide a speedy remedy in cases where the aggrieved party is diligent, and does not by his conduct show that the case is not one of urgency. If, therefore, the person aggrieved fails to resort to the Criminal Courts within a year of the offence coming to his knowledge, the law assumes that the case is not one of urgency and it leaves him to his civil remedy by an action for injunction."[25]

5323. These sections, as originally enacted, were recast in 1889, when the present sections were substituted for those thereby repealed.[1] That Act makes other provisions as to the cost of defence or prosecution,[2] the limitation of prosecutions[3] and the consequence of unintentional contravention of ss. 480, 482 or 485.[4] It also enables the Court to order the forfeiture of goods in contravention of s. 482 or 486, 488,[5] and finally it formally extends the chapter on abetment to all the ensuing sections.[6]

The provisions of this Act relating to trade and property marks closely correspond with those of the English Statute[7] relating to Merchandise Marks, which will be referred to in appropriate places.

478. A mark used for denoting that goods are the manufacture or merchandise of a particular person is called a trade-mark,

Trade-mark.

and for the purposes of this Code the expression "trade-mark" includes any trade-mark which is registered in the register of trade-marks kept under the Patents, Designs and

(24) 2nd Rep., ss. 302-307.
(25) Ponnusami Tevan, 22 M. 488.
(1) Act IV of 1889, s. 9.
(2) Ib., s. 14.
(3) Ib., s. 15.
(4) Ib., s. 8.
(5) Ib., s. 9.
(6) Ib., s. 22.
(7) 50 & 51 Vict., c. 28.

Trade-Marks Act, 1883, any trademark which, either with or without registration, is protected by law in any British possession or Foreign State to which the provisions of the one hundred and third section of the Patents, Designs and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, are, under Order in Council, for the time being applicable.

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5324-5327).
(2) Meaning of Words (5328).
(3) What is a trade-mark (5329-5332).
(4) Trade Description (5333).
(5) General Get-up (5334-5335).
(6) Copy-right is not a Trade-mark (5336).

5324. Analogous Law.—This definition of "trade-mark" corresponds with the following definition of the same term in the English Merchandise Marks Act, 1887,[8] which is identical.

"S. 3. 'Trade-mark' means a trade-mark registered in the register of trade-marks kept under the Patents, Designs and Trade Marks Act, 1883,[9] and includes any trade-marks which, either with or without registration is protected by law in any British Possession or Foreign State to which the Provisions of the Patents, Designs and Trade Marks, Act, 1883, are, under Order in Council, s. 103 for the time being, applicable."

For the purpose of the Patents, Designs and Trade-Marks Act, 1883,[10] a trade-mark must contain the following essential particulars:—

'S. 64 (1) (a) A name or an individual or firm printed, impressed, or woven in some particular or distinctive manner; or

" (b) A written signature or copy of a written signature of the individual or firm applying for registration thereof as a trade-mark; or

" (c) A distinctive device, mark, brand, heading, label or ticket.

" (d) An invented work or invented words, or

" (e) A word or words having no reference to the character or quality of the goods, and not being a geographical name."

(2) There may be added to any one or more of the essential particulars mentioned in this section any letters, words, or figures, or combination of letters, words, or figures, or of any them, but the applicant for registration of any such additional matter must state in his application the essential particulars of the trade-mark, and must disclaim in his application any right to the exclusive use of the added matter, and a copy of the statement, and disclaimer shall be entered on the register.

5325. This definition of the word has been formulated only for the purpose of registration under the Statute, but it affords a fair indication of what law implies by a trade-mark. That term, however, is not confined to only such marks as have been registered under the Statute, for a mark, though unregistered, may be equally a trade-mark if it acquires by usage a certain notoriety, the use of which may then be protected, and its infringement would be punishable under the Code, because the term as here defined

(8) 50 & 51 Vict., C. 28, s. 3.
(9) 46 & 47 Vict., c. 57.
(10) As amended by the Act of 1888, (51 & 52 Vict., c. 50, s. 10 (1).

is wider, though it includes a trade-mark which is either registered or protected, by the Statutes specified in clause 2.[11]

5326. The reference in the second clause of this section to s. 103 of the Patents, Designs and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, would include international arrangements for the protection of inventions, designs and trade-marks which it empowers the King to make by an order in Council. This section enables His Majesty to protect by executive action, British Patents in foreign countries and foreign patents in the British Empire.

5327. In India there is no system of registration of trade-marks, nor is there any provision for a statutory title to a trade mark, so that the rights of parties setting up rival claims to the ownership of a trade-mark, is determined in accordance with the principles of the common law of England.[12] A Trade Mark under this chapter would then comprise:—

(1) A trade Mark registered under the English Patents, Designs and Trade-Marks Act, 1883.

(2) Protected by His Majesty's order in Council under s. 103 of the said Statute.

(3) Other trade-marks not so registered or protected, title to which must be proved by exclusive user.

5328. Meaning of Words.—"The expression includes any trade-mark": The word "includes" is important, and signifies that the term is not confined to only registered or protected marks, which are trade-marks by enumeration, though they may not be used to "denote that goods are the manufacture or merchandise of a particular person." Marks denoting this are, however, trade-marks whether they are or are not registered or protected.

5329. What is a Trade-mark?—This section defines a trade-mark to mean "a mark used for denoting that goods are the manufacture or merchandise of a particular person." This is the general definition of the term and a mark which conforms to it is a trade mark, whether it is or is not registered or protected. The section, however, defines registered and protected marks to be included in the term—which are, therefore, trade-marks, because they are so declared by Statute irrespective of their use to denote goods of a particular person. Registered or protected trade-marks thus possess an advantage over other marks, inasmuch as the Court will take judicial cognizance of their being trade-marks on proof of their registration or protection under the Trade Marks Act. In other cases the fact must be established by proof that it is a mark appropriated and exclusively used by one person to denote that certain goods are his manufacture or merchandise. As such it may include even a property-mark defined in the next section, but which is rather used to bear a somewhat different significance as will be seen in the sequel.

5330. Generally speaking, a trade-mark is some symbol, consisting of a picture label, word or words, which is applied or attached to a trader's goods, so as to distinguish them from the similar goods of other traders, and to identify them as his goods, or as those of his successors in the business in which they are produced or put forward for sale. So where the words "The National Bank of India" were found to be stamped upon gold bars with the view to inform the public that the bars were the merchandise of the Bank, imported, sold and guaranteed by it, they were held to become the trade-mark of the Bank and the accused who imitated it was convicted under ss. 482 and 420.(13) The same view was taken in another case in which the complainants who were dealers in hand-made sugar, stamped their bags with the name of their firm the imitation of which was punishable under s. 482.(14)

(11) Nil Money Nag, 19 C. W. N. 957, 30 I. C. 1007, 16 Cr. L. J. 719.

(12) British American Tobacco Co. v. Mahbub Buksh, 38 C. 110; Hanuah v. Jagannath & Co., 42 C. 262.

A trade-mark may or may not be registered; if it is registered or protected it is a trade-mark though it may not be used as such, but otherwise a mark ceases to be a trade-mark if it is not used for denoting that the goods are the manufacture or the merchandise of a particular person. A bank called the Chartered Mercantile Bank of India, London and China, used to import from England gold bars impressed with the name of that bank, and other words denoting the touch of gold and the names of the London bullion brokers, which impression obtained currency in the market. That bank stopped business in 1893 and was succeeded by the Mercantile Bank of India, who prosecuted the accused for possessing a die which made an impression similar to the impression on the gold bars imported by the Chartered Bank, whereupon he was convicted, under sections 485 and 486 of the Code, but on appeal the Court held that the prosecution having failed to give any evidence of their using the mark, or that they had acquired any exclusive right to use it from their predecessors, the Chartered Bank, the accused could not be convicted of this offence.(15)

5331. "The right to a trade-mark," observed Lord Cranworth, "is a right closely resembling, though not exactly the same as copyright. The word 'property' when used with respect to an author's right to the production of his brain, is used in a sense very different from what is meant by it when applied to a house or a watch. It means no more than that the author has the sole right of printing or otherwise multiplying copies of his work. The right which a manufacturer has in his trade-mark is the exclusive right to use it for the purpose of indicating where, or by whom, or at what manufactory, the article to which it is affixed was manufactured. If the word 'property' is aptly used with reference to copyright, I see no reason for doubting that it may be with equal propriety applied to trade-marks. But I further think that the right to a trade-mark may, in general, treating it as property, or as an accessory of property, be sold and transferred upon a sale and transfer of the manufactory of the goods on which the mark had been used to be affixed, and may be lawfully used by the purchaser. Difficulties, however, may arise where the trade-mark consists merely of the name of the manufacturer. When he dies, those who succeed him (grandchildren or married daughters, for instance), though they may not bear the same name, yet ordinarily continue to use the original name as a trade-mark, and they would be protected, because, according to the usages of trade, they would be understood as meaning no more by the use of their

(13) Lakumal, 8 S. L. R. 199, 27 I. C. 902.

(14) Latif Miyam, 39 A. 123.

(15) Anookool Chunder Nundy, 27 C. 776.

grandfather's or father's name, than that they were carrying on the manufacture formerly carried on by him. Nor would the case be necessarily different if, instead of passing into other hands by devolution of law, the manufactory were sold, and assigned to a purchaser. The question in every such case must be, whether the purchaser in continuing the use of the original trade-mark would, according to the ordinary usages of trade, be understood as saying more than that he was carrying on the same business as had been formerly carried on by the person whose name constituted the trade mark. In such a case I see nothing to make it improper for the purchaser to use the old trade-mark, as the mark would, in such a case, indicate only that the goods so marked were made at the manufactory which he had purchased."(16) "The fundamental rule is, that one man has no right to put off his goods for sale, as the goods of a rival trader, and he can not, therefore, be allowed to use names, marks, letters or other indicia, by which he may induce purchaser to believe that the goods which he is selling are the manufacture of another person. A man may mark his own manufacture, either by his name, or by using for the purpose any symbol or emblem, however unmeaning in itself, and if such symbol or emblem comes by use to be recognized in trade as the mark of the goods of a particular person, no other trader has a right to stamp it upon his goods of a similar description. That is, what I apprehend is usually meant by a trade-mark, just as the broad arrow has been adopted to mark Government stores, a mark having no meaning in itself, but adopted by and appropriated to the Government."(17)

5332. A trade-mark may then comprise any name, real or fancy name, such as Holloway's pills, American Leather Cloth Co.,(18) Pear's soap or Howgua's mixture,(19) Perri's Medicated Mexican balm,(20) Stone ale,(21) Coleman's mustard,(22) John Bull brand,(23) Bovril,(24) or the like. But the question whether a certain word is or is not a trade-mark, is simplified by the section which defines it to include only marks which are registered or protected under the Patents, Designs and Trade-Marks Act.

5333. Trade Description. A trade-mark must be distinguished from what is merely a trade-description, such for example, (a) as to the number, quantity, measure, gauge or weight of any goods; or (b) as to the place or country in which they were made; or (c) as to the mode of manufacturing or producing them; or (d) as to the material of which they are composed; or (e) as their being the subject of an existing patent privilege or copyright, and the use of any figure, word, or mark which according to the custom of the trade is commonly taken to be an indication of any of the other matters.(25) A "false trade-description" means a trade-description which is false in material respect as regards the goods to which it is applied, and includes every alteration of a trade-description, whether by way of addition, effacement, or otherwise, where that alteration makes the description false in a material respect, and the fact that a trade-description is a

(16) Leather Cloth Co. v. American Leather Cloth Co., 11 H. L. C. 523 (534, 535).

(17) Ib., p. 538; following per Lord Langdale in Perry v. Truefitt, 6 Beav. 66.

(18) Leather Cloth Co. v. American Leather Cloth Co., 11 H. L. C. 523.

(19) Pidding v. How, 8 Sim, 477.

(20) Perry v. Truefitt, 6 Beav. 66.

(21) Thompson v. Montgomery, (1891) A. C. 217.

(22) Coleman's Trade Mark application (No. 2), (1894) 2 Ch. 115.

(23) Paine & Co.'s Trade Mark, (1893) 2 Ch. 567.

(24) In re Trade-Mark No. 58, 405; "Bovril," (1896) 2 Ch. 600.

(25) Merchandise Marks Act. 1887 (50 & 51 Vict., c. 28), s. 3; Indian Merchandise Marks Act (IV of 1889), s. 2.

trade-mark or part of a trade-mark, does not prevent such trade-description from being a false-trade-description.(1) Now while the using of a false trade-mark is punishable under the Code, the using of a false trade-description is only punishable under the provisions of section 6 of the Indian Merchandise Marks Act, 1889. The distinction between the two is not often well marked, but nevertheless it has to be made, if only for the purpose of meting out the appropriate penalties.

5334. General Get-up.—Besides trade-description one trader may generally imitate the get-up of the wares of another trader, and if the imitation is so close as to be reasonably calculated to deceive intending purchasers mistaking the goods for the goods of another, the Court will restrain the imitator by injunction from selling his goods under a get-up, which is the colourable imitation of another's goods, but the former cannot be proceeded against under these sections, because the get-up does not constitute a trade-mark within the meaning of this section.(2)

5335. It was so held in a case in which the prosecutor, who had for many years carried on business as a vendor of ground coffee, sold it in round tin boxes containing a pound each. The label affixed to these boxes consisted of an orange-coloured paper band, upon which was printed the prosecutor's signature. It also contained a picture of a railway engine and truck. The accused sold coffee in similar boxes bearing a similar band coloured, however, pink but bearing his signature in imitation of that of the prosecutor. It further contained the picture of a steamer instead of a railway engine. It was held that the get up of the two boxes was undoubtedly similar, but that it did not constitute the prosecutor's trade-mark; the facsimile of his signature did, but then the accused's tins bore the facsimile of his own signature, and there was therefore no infringement of his trade-mark.(3)

The same principle ran through another case in which the parties were rival importers of fish hooks imported by them in packets bearing the labels of two fishes crossed with their heads and tails pointing upwards. The prosecutor claimed exclusive trade-mark in the design, on the ground that they had received wide reputation and were known as "mach marka" ("fish marked"), but it was held that the popular description of a commodity did not constitute a trade-mark, and that the device of the two fishes did not constitute a trade-mark or trade-description calling in the penalties of the Code or the Merchandise Marks Act. At the same time the Court was not prepared to say that the prosecutor would not obtain redress if he resorted to a civil proceeding.(4) So in another case in which the defendant was found to have sold brandy in bottles of the same size and shape as used by the plaintiff, and bearing a similar label printed in gold on white ground and encircled by a wreath of vine leaves and grapes,

(1) Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict., c 28), s. 3; Indian Merchandise Marks Act (IV of 1889), s. 2.

(2) Stephen Abkyun v. Petley, (1903) 10 Bur. L. R. 84; Narumal v. Bombay Co., 8 S. L. R. 39, 25 I. C. 998.

(3) Stephen Abkyun v. Petley, (1903) 10 Bur. L. R. 84.

(4) Bakaullah Mallik, 31 C. 411. This view would appear to be in conflict with that taken by Lord Cranworth in Seixo v. Provezende, L. R. 1 Ch. 192; and Sir Charles Hall, V. C. in Cope v. Evans, L. R. 18 Eq. 138 (148).

but containing in the centre thereof the defendant's instead of the plaintiff's name, it was held that there was unquestionably imitation of the get-up, but no infringement of any trade mark.(5) But in another case in which Calvert & Co. prosecuted the accused for counterfeiting the get-up of their tooth powder boxes, it was broadly laid down that the trade-mark as here defined "included the whole design on the top of the box and the black label pasted round the side" but for which no authority is cited, and the point is rather assumed than discussed.(6)

5336. Copyright is Not a Trade-mark.—Although it is conceivable that books may be described as goods being the subject of trade, still it does not necessarily follow that their title is a trade-mark capable of protection by means of penalties reserved for infringement of a trade-mark. The prosecutor was the descendant of an astrologer by name Chandu, who flourished some three hundred years back, and in whose name a calendar called "Shrichandu Panchang" was annually issused from Jodhpur. The accused brought out a rival calendar also calling it by the same name, whereupon he was prosecuted under section 482 for pirating the prosecutor's trade-mark, but the Court threw out his complaint, holding that the prosecutor's title to the name did not constitute a trade-mark, inasmuch as the phraseology used in this section did not appear to contemplate books.

As Fulton, J., observed: "The word 'manufacture' is not a term usually applied to books, but even if it may correctly be applied to the whole process by which books are prepared, it certainly seems impossible to apply it to that portion of the process known as authorship which, though most important, is ineffectual without printing and publication. Similarly, it cannot be argued successfully that these calendars were the merchandise of the descendants of Shri Chandu and it is not alleged that they were ever sold by them. We must construe section 478 in its ordinary grammatical sense,and if this test be applied, it will, I think, be found that the definition of trade-mark is not sufficiently elastic to protect the rights of authors. Copyright Acts and the general civil law may or may not be sufficient to protect them, but however this may be, we cannot distort the language of the Penal Code so as to bring within its provisions literary piracy, as alleged in this complaint."(7)

479. A mark used for denoting that moveable property belongs to a particular person is called a property-mark.

Property-mark.

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5337).
(2) What is a Property-mark (5338-5340).
(3) Moveable Property (5339).
(4) "Belonging to a Particular Person" (5340).

(5) Hennessy & Co. v. Keatin, (1908) 8 Ir. R. 43; O. A. 24 T. L. R. 534.
(6) Nilmoney Nag v. Durga, 19 C. W. N. 957, 30 I. C. 1007.
(7) Radha Krishna v. Kissonlal, 3 Bom. L. R. 883 (1886).

5337. Analogous Law.—The distinction between "trade-mark" and property-mark" is peculiar to this Code; it is non-existent in English law. But the distinction here observed is important, because its infringement entails the penalty prescribed in section 481 and a property-mark, unlike a trade-mark, need not be either rigistered or protected, so as to entitle the owner to proceed against persons falsely using it.

5338. What is a Property-mark?—A trade-mark is a mark for denoting that goods are the manufacture or merchandise of a particular person. A property mark is a mark used for denoting that moveable property belongs to a particular person. The one refers to ownership of a symbol: the other to rights in property. But both the trade and property-marks have the same purpose in view, namely the protection of one's goods against their fraudulent imitation by another, and both may be used by the manufacturer as well as the merchant. For example, the Singer Manufacturing Co., are known to make both sewing machines as well as bicycles, and it is conceivable that they might make motor cars, swords and cutlery as well. Now they have distinctive marks for each of their goods which is their trade-mark, but they may choose to designate all their goods as "Singer's make" to distinguish them from similar goods manufactured by other makers, in which case the expression "Singer's make" would become their property-mark entitled to protection under this section.

So again, a merchant may stamp his wares with his own name or with any device, though they may not bear any recognized trade-mark, in which case the impression would be his property-mark within the meaning of this section. The National Bank of India imported from England, for sale in India, bars of gold, of uniform touch, weight and size, with the words "National Bank of India" "impressed thereon in Guzerati, as "Nasranna Bank" which on account of their uniform quality obtained a special value in the market. The accused placed on the market similar bars of gold marked "Nasranna Bank," whereupon he was prosecuted under section 481; and the question was whether the National Bank had any property-mark in the bars. It was contended for the accused that the term was flexible being intended to denote a mark impressed to denote that a certain thing was one's own property, and that the moment it ceased to belong to the owner by whom the mark had been impressed, the property-mark ceased to be so; or in other words the property-mark ceased with the ownership of goods. But as the Court remarked: "This interpretation assumes that a property-mark put upon any article by any person to denote his ownership is confined to that article and no other property belonging to him. But I think that a property-mark is intended to denote ownership over all moveable property belonging to him whether it is all of one kind or different kinds. So long as the person owns moveable properties, his property-mark which has been or may be impressed upon them remains his, though any particular article out of it may after such impression pass out of his hands and cease to be his."(8)

(8) Dabyabhai, 6 Bom. L. R. 513 (515).

Moveable Property.

5339. Property-mark must, however, relate to moveable property, which is here used collectively as denoting goods of a person. The term is, moreover, wide enough to include one class or species of properties belonging to a single owner. So in the case last cited, though the National Bank may have impressed a large number of bars with their distinctive property-mark, the fact that some of them were sold, and replaced by others bearing the same mark, would not in any way affect the Bank's right to the property-mark which, like the trade-mark, acquires all the essential attributes of property so as to be capable of assignment(9) and protection.

"Belonging to a Particular Person."

5340. Ordinarily, a property-mark is used for the same purpose as a trade-mark, and the expression "belonging to a particular person" does not necessarily imply his ownership. For instance, suppose that the gold bars imported by the National Bank were tested by a firm of assayers of repute, say A B, who impressed thereon their name as indicating that the gold was of a certain uniform quality, and these bars were then further impressed by the National Bank would not A B's impression on the bars be as much a property-mark as that of the National Bank has been held to be?

For a further commentary on the meaning of this term see s. 481.

Using a false Trade-Mark.

480. Whoever marks any goods or any case, package or other receptacle containing goods or uses any case, package or other receptacle with any mark thereon, in a manner reasonably calculated to cause it to be believed that the goods so marked, or any goods contained in any such receptacle so marked, are the manufacture or merchandise of a person whose manufacture or merchandise they are not, is said to use a false trade-mark.

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5341-5345).
(2) What is using a False Trade-mark (5346-5347).
(3) There must be an Infringement of a Trade-mark (5348-5349).
(4) Right Depends Upon User (5350).
(5) Right Lost by Abandonment (5351).
(6) Manner "reasonably calculated to deceive" (5352-5353).
(7) True Test Stated (5354-5355).
(8) Truth is No Justification (5356-5358).
(9) Coincident Similarity Expected (5359).

(9) Anookool Chunder Nundy, 27 C. 776.

5341. Analogous Law—This and the next section define the offence of using a false trade or property mark, for which s. 482 prescribes the penalty. It will be observed that while section 478 restricts "trade-mark" to a mark used, or registered or protected under the Trade Marks Act, this section defines the offence more generally, by including therein all marks whether in use, protected or registered or not—the essence of the offence being imitation so as to practise deception.

5342. The phrase "marks any goods or any case, package or other receptacle containing goods, or uses any case, etc," is evidently used in the same sense as the English phrase "apply a trade-mark or mark or trade-description to goods" which are explained to bear the following meaning:—

"S. 5. (1) A person shall be deemed to apply a trade-mark or mark or trade-description to goods who (a) applies it to the goods themselves; or (b) applies it to any covering, label, reel or other thing in or with which the goods are sold or exposed or had in possession for any purpose of sale, trade, or manufacture; or (c) places, encloses or annexes any goods which are sold or exposed or had in possession for any purpose of sale, trade, or manufacture, in, with, or to any covering, label, reel, or other thing to which a trade-mark or trade-description has been applied; or (d) uses a trade-mark or mark of trade-description in any manner calculated to lead to the belief that the goods in connection with which it is used are designated or described by that trade-mark or mark or trade description."(10)

5343. The mark here referred to must be on "any case, package or other receptacle." But these words would evidently include also a "covering," which in the two Acts is defined to include "any stopper, cask, bottle, vessel, box, cover, capsule, case, frame or wrapper."(11) But evidently the marking of such case or covers would be complete, whether the mark "is woven, impressed or otherwise worked into or annexed or affixed to the goods or any covering label, reel or other thing." In such a case the term used in the two Acts(12) is "apply."

5344. The word "goods" includes any article of merchandise including books,(13) and is thus defined in the Merchandise Marks Act 1889.(14)

"2. (4) 'Goods' means anything which is the subject of trade or manufacture.'

5345. This is practically the same as the corresponding definition in the English Statute, in which the term is defined to mean "anything which is the subject of trade, manufacture, or merchandise."(15)

5346. What is Using a False Trade-mark?—A person is said to use a false trade-mark, if he marks any goods or marks or uses any case, package or other receptacle with any mark thereon "in a manner reasonably calculated to cause it to be believed" that the goods so marked or contained in any such receptacle are the manufacture or

(10) Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict., c. 28), s. 5; adapted in the Indian Merchandise Marks Act, 1889 (IV of 1889), s. 5.
(11) Ib., s. 5.
(12) Ib., s. 5.
(13) Kanai Das Bairagi v. Radhashyam Basack, 26 C. 232; followed per Fulton, J., in Radhakrishna v. Kisson Lal, 3 Bom. L. R. 883.
(14) Act IV of 1889, s. 2; 50 & 51 Vict. c. 28.
(15) 50 & 51 Vict., c. 28 s. 3 (1).

merchandise of a person whose manufacture or merchandise they are not. Law thus protects not only the manufacturer but also the merchant or importer who sells goods made by another under his own trade-mark.(16) A person who marks goods or their covering with another's trade mark may be either the manufacturer or a merchant who may mark similar or inferior goods with a reputed brand, in the hope of passing them off as goods, for which there is a readier sale. Such person commits the double offence of defrauding the manufacturer and cheating the buyer.

5347. But the particular mischief provided against here is that in which there is the counterfeiting of another's trade-mark, and which postulates (i) that what was counterfeited was a trade-mark within the meaning of that term as used in section 478, and (ii) that the accused counterfeited it by making use of it, (iii) in a manner calculated to deceive.

(1) There must be an Infringement of a Trade-mark.

5348. The first question has been already considered. It presupposes the existence of a legal right in another the infringement of which law deems it necessary to punish. If then there was no trade-mark to which anybody had a right, its use by another person would not be punishable under this section. To be punishable, it must be a device used by one upon goods similar to those of the other which bore a similar trade-mark. No one has an absolute right to any particular trade-mark, and the fact that a certain mark was registered by one for a certain class of goods, does not prevent another from adopting it for other goods, provided that it is different, though it may belong to the same class.

5349. The plaintiff Eno had for several years used the words "Fruit Salt" as his trade-mark for a saline aperient. The defendant applied to register "Fruit Salt" as his trade-mark for a baking powder. Eno supposed, and it was found that the defendant had adopted those words from "Eno's Fruit Salt," and Kay, J., refused him permission to register the trade mark as one calculated to deceive the public into a belief that the baking powder contained "Eno's Fruit Salt" as one of its ingredients, but this judgment was reversed on appeal by the majority of the Judges who held that since the name was applied to a totally different thing, the plaintiff had no right to complain. As Lindley, L. J., remarked: "He has sought to obtain the benefit of the words, although not the benefit of the trade."(17) Against this judgment there was, however, another appeal to the House of Lords where again the Judges differed, but the majority of the Court agreed in restoring the judgment of Kay, J., which was consequently restored.(18) A different view was, however, taken where the plaintiff used "Neostyle" as a trade-mark for a duplicating machine, and the defendant used the word to designate their paper used for the "Neostyle" duplicator.(19)

---

(16) Latif, 39 A. 123.

(17) Dunn's Trade Marks, 41 Ch. D. 439 (451); reversed O. A. Eno v. Dunn, 15 App. Cas. 252.

(18) Eno v. Dunn, 15 App. Cas. 252, Per Lords Watson, Herschell and Macnaghten (contra Lords Halsbury, L. C., and Lord Morris).

(19) Neostyle Manufactring Co. v. Ellam's Duplicate Co., (1904) 21 R. P. C. 589.

There is, indeed, no objection to two persons adopting the same trade-mark, provided that it is not done with intent to deceive, nor is it in fact calculated to deceive. So the Court allowed two rival companies to use "Dunlop" as their "trade-mark," when there was enough to distinguish one company from the other—as where one called itself the "Dunlop Motor Company" and the other adopted the name of "Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co."[20] In this case the decision turned on the fact that the business of the two companies, though similar, was not identical. But if such had been the case the plaintiff should have certainly obtained an injunction, as did Brooks, the maker of cycle saddles, which bore the mark "Brooks," and who had as such gained wide popularity and in infringement of whose right the defendant placed on the market similar saddles marked also "Brooks," and which was held to be clearly an infringement of the plaintiff's trade-mark.[21] The same view was taken in another case in which the defendant entered upon the scene with his "Valentine Extract Company" which had been the plaintiff's trade-mark for many years, and who also traded in meat extracts, which were popularly known by the name of "Valentine."[22] It may be that the names are not the same but similar, but if they are calculated to deceive, the Court will restrain their use by an injunction. So where the plaintiff who had for many years stamped his goods, such as tobacco pipes, cigar and cigarette holders, with the letters "G. B. D." plain cut and enclosed in an oval ring he was held entitled to restrain the defendant who imitated his trade-mark but varied the plaintiff's initials to "J. B. D." which was held to be insufficient to prevent deception.[23]

Right depends upon User.

535o. The plaintiff described their belting as "Camel hair belting," though they had latterly added "Reddaway's" by way of caution, but it was held to be no reason to entitle the defendant to describe his belting as "Camel hair belting."[24] So where A used a trade-mark for his galvanized iron sheets, the leading features of which were a rising sun and the words "Sun brand" impressed below, it did not perevent B from using the same mark for iron generally and for rolled drawn and galvanized wire and strand.[25] The fact that A had registered his mark for such class of goods is immaterial, if he did not in fact use it, as it has been said that user is the life of a trade-mark, and non-user the death of it.[1]

So Bacon, V. C., observed: "If, then, they never did manufacture iron wire, would it be a reasonable construction of the Statute to say that, because a man manufactures only one out of a class of goods, he shall be able, by registering a trade-mark applicable to all the class, to

(20) Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co. v. Dunlop Motor Co., (1907) A. C. 430: followed in Waring Gillow, Ltd. v. Gillow & Gillow Ltd., (1917) 33 R. P. C. 173, 32 T. L. R. 389.

(21) Brooks & Co., Ltd. v. The Norfolk Cycle Co., (1899) R. P. C. 523.

(22) Valentine Meat Juice Co. v. Valentine Extract Co., (1900) 83 L. T. 259.

(23) Ruchon v. M'Colgan, (1901) R. P. C. 262.

(24) Reddaway v. Banham, (1896) A. C. 199; the same question similarly decided in John Smidt v. Reddaway & Co., 32 C. 401 (410).

(25) Braby & Co.'s Application, 21 Ch. D. 223.

(1) Per Chitty, J., in Monson & Co. v. Boehm, 26 Ch. D. 398 (406).

exclude the manufacture, of any of the other twelve articles of manufacture, and prevent another person who has adopted a trade-mark in connection with any of those articles from designating his particular goods by that mark? That would be a most unreasonable construction of the Act of Parliament."(2) This view was affirmed on appeal,(3) Cotton, L. J., observing: "Even if a trade-mark can be registered which is not in actual use, it ought to be restricted to those goods in connection with which it is going to be used. In my opinion it is not the intention of the Act that a man registering a trade-mark for the entire class, and yet only using it for one article in that class, can claim for himself the exclusive right to use it for every article in the class."(4)

Right lost by Abandonment.

5351. But where a person had not only registered his mark but made use of it, mere suspension of its use without abandonment was not sufficient to destroy the right.(5) The plaintiff used to manufacture soap for export to the Colonies, which bore the registered trade mark of a Kangaroo with the word "The Colonial" enclosed in an oval frame. He had, however, ceased to manufacture the soap for several years, when the defendant put upon the market soap bearing a similar trade-mark. The plaintiff sued for an injunction and the question was, whether the fact of non-user disentitled him to it. It was held that though mere non-user for a sufficient time is good evidence of abandonment, it is abandonment and not non-user that deprives a man of his right to a trade-mark.(6) And the question of abandonment is a question of fact. Indeed, the Court may allow two identical trade-marks to be registered for the same article, and it, therefore, follows that the fact that one person has established his right to a trade-mark does not negative the possibility of another person possessing a similar right.

In the case last cited the plaintiff was a registered owner of the trade-mark he used on his soap made for export to the Colonies. The defendant coincidentally hit upon a similar trade-mark which he used on his soap also sent out to the Colonies. The two marks were identical, but the defendant was shown not to have imitated the mark of the plaintiff's who had, however, stopped his manufacture of the soap since five years. The plaintiff sued for an injunction but the Court refused it and allowed the defendant to register his trade-mark, though it was identical with that of the plaintiff on the ground that both parties had used it independently, and each party claimed it bona fide.(7) But this was probably an extreme case, and one in which the plaintiff's objection to the defendant's use of his trade-mark was sentimental as he had ceased to do the same business since five years. The case is nevertheless instructive, as it shows that mere similarity of device is by no means conclusive to establish a case for injunction, much less for a prosecution under the Code.

(2) Edwards v. Dennis, 30 Ch. D. 454 (463).
(3) Ib., p. 473.
(4) Ib., p. 474; followed per North, J. in Hart v. Colley, 44 Ch. D. 193 (199).
(5) Crossby v. Lightowler, L. R. 2 Ch. 478.
(6) Monson & Co., v. Boehm, 26 Ch. D. 398 (400).
(7) Monson & Co. v. Boehm, 26 Ch D. 407, 408.

Manner "reasonably calculated to deceive."

5352. That question depends upon knowledge that another person has the right to a similar trade-mark, and the use of a similar mark to pass off one's goods as the goods of another. This is the essence of the crime. The use of a similar mark by one upon goods resembling the goods of another is a mute representation that the former were the same as the latter. Knowledge of the previous use of a similar trade-mark by another is therefore essential. But there may be such knowledge and yet his act may not be criminal, though it may afford sufficient ground for an injunction. This must depend upon a variety of circumstances.

For instance, suppose a person were to use empty bottles of a celebrated perfume and filling therein inferior liquid, sell the stuff as the original perfume, could there be any doubt but that the false trade-mark was used "in a manner reasonably calculated to cause it to be believed that the goods contained in such receptacles" were the goods of another person whose goods in fact they were not. On the other hand, where the resemblance between the real and the alleged imitation, though considerable, is not sufficiently close to enable the Court to hold that the one was the base imitation of the other, the Court will stay its hand and refer parties to the Civil Court. The question is one of degree. Where, for instance, the trade-mark used by the accused was a crescent encircling a crown over the letters A. M. R., and the one used by the complainant was a crescent encircling a star over the letters A. G. M., the Court threw out the complaint for this offence holding it to be a case for damages in the Civil Court.(8)

The prosecutors, the Holland-Bombay Trading Company used to import white shirtings bearing the mark "H.B.T.C. 40000," a label with a design of one lion and a snake and an oval stamp containing the words "Sole Importers, Holland-Bombay Trading Company, Limited," and a buff heading. The accused had in their possession for purposes of sale some packages of white shirtings bearing the mark "H.P.F.C. 40000," a label with two lions and two snakes and an oval stamp containing the words "Sole Importers, Holland Export Company," and a buff heading. The initial letters H. B. T. C., in the complainant's and H. P. F. C., in the accused's marks were printed in similar types and were similar in size and colour. The colour and size of the labels as also the colour, size and type of the oval stamps in both were similar. The complainants having established their right to their trade-mark, it was held that the accused had used a false trade-mark within the meaning of this section, and were liable to conviction under sections 482 and 486.(9)

5353. Such would have been the view taken of the defendant in the following case, which was however instituted on the civil side for an injunction. The plaintiffs, the Anglo Swiss Condensed Milk Company, had been since 1867 carrying on business as makers and vendors of condensed milk and other dairy products. Their trade-mark was the

(8) Rasool Khan, (1912) M. W. N. 85; following Surja Prasad v. Mohabir, 11 C. W. N. 887; Bahaullah, 31 C. 411; Dowlat Ram, 32 C. 431.

(9) Holland-Bombay Trading Co. v. Buktear Mull, 8 C. W. N. 421.

portrait of a woman with a pail on her head, held by her left hand, and another pail in her right hand, above which were the words "Milk-Maid" and underneath being the words "Trade Mark." The defendants put on the market condensed milk contained in tins similar to those of the plaintiffs, which had pasted on them the figure of a half length milk-maid in conjunction with the words "Dairy-Maid" and "Registered Trade Mark." The condensed milk was stated to be that of the Anglo-Danish Milk Company, but which was only an alias for the defendant, whereupon Kay, J., said: "The defendant, with full knowledge of all that, chose to put upon his tins of condensed milk, which are exactly the same size, shape and form as the plaintiff's tins of condensed milk, labels with the words which I have just read. It is very likely that a tradesman who buys the defendant's tins of milk to sell again may know perfectly well the distinction between them and the plaintiff's, but are they or are they not calculated to deceive people who know the plaintiff's condensed milk by the terms "Milk-Maid" or "Dairy-Maid" brand, and who go to retail shops and inquire for it in that way? I have not the faintest doubt about it. It is not only calculated to deceive, but there seems to be no reasonable doubt whatever why the defendant should have done that which he has done except with the design and intention of committing a direct fraud upon the plaintiffs, and to enable him to acquire some of their custom and to pass off his goods as and for those of the plaintiffs. To my mind the evidence proves that there was a direct intention to commit a fraud."(10)

True Test Stated.

5354. This case is instructive, for it shows that the similarity need not be sufficient to deceive the connoisseur but if it is sufficient to deceive a casual customer it "is reasonably calculated" to deceive within the meaning of this section. It was so held in a case in which the accused was charged with having sold cigars in boxes labelled with a trade-mark alleged to be a counterfeit presentment of the complainant's registered label. The Magistrate acquitted the accused holding that other firms had sold cigars of the "Sirdar" brand overlooking the other facts contended for, namely, that two labels were calculated to lead purchasers to believe that the cigars sold in the accused's boxes were those made by the prosecutor. The case was consequently remanded for the trial, the Court observing: "The Magistrate should bear in mind that he has to consider the general effect of the labels and how the labels would be likely to strike the incautious or unwary purchasers such as are to be found more particularly in the mofussil. It must also be borne in mind that many of the purchasers would be unable to read what is on the labels, but would be attracted by the general effect of the label."(11)

5355. This was also the view propounded by Lord Selborne, L. C., in which the plaintiffs were shown to have exported to Bombay, Turkey red yarn or twist with a label affixed to the inner covering of each bundle, and also affixed in a conspicuous manner to the wrappers of the samples intended to be shown to customers. The device on the label consisted of two elephants in the upper corners of a green and gold ticket with a drooping cloth or banner suspended between them and a certain inscription thereon. Goods bearing this label were commonly known in Bombay as "be hathi" which in the Guzerathi language means "Two Elephants." Orders were placed with the defendants for Turkey red yarn or twist with instructions that the labels thereon were to be of the same colour and equal in size to those of the plaintiffs. The defendants whose label hithertofore had been the Ganpati figure, changed it, by associating therewith two elephants in the two upper corners with a drooping cloth or banner suspended between them, on which were inscribed the words "Prime Turkey red." The difference between the two tickets was material and apparent, but nevertheless it was held to be a clear infringement of the plaintiff's trade-mark.

(10) Anglo-Swiss Condensed Milk Co. v. Metcalf, 31 Ch. D. 454 (458, 459).

(11) Nallaga v. Rangasami, (1895) 1 Weir 556 (557).

As Lord Selborne, L. C., observed: "But although the mere appearance of these two tickets could not lead any one to mistake one of them for the other, it might easily happen that they might both be taken by natives of Aden or of India unable to read and understand the English language, as equally symbolical of the plaintiff's goods. To such persons, or at least to many of them, even if they took notice of the differences between the two labels, it might probably appear that these were only differences of ornamentation, posture, and other accessories, leaving the distinctive and characteristic symbol substantially unchanged. Such variations might not unreasonably be supposed to have been made by the owners of the plaintiff's trade-mark themselves for reasons of their own; especially as it was a common practice in those markets for the same traders (the plaintiffs among others) to affix to their inner packages, sometimes one form of mark, and sometimes another, for reasons more material to themselves than to the ultimate consumer....It is true that deception in fact is not in this case proved; but there is a large body of trustworthy evidence to the effect that such deception would be liable, and very likely to occur, at all events with the more ignorant class of consumers, particularly in the upcountry districts, and with this evidence my own judgment concurs. Nor am I able to conceive any satisfactory explanation, under all the circumstances of this case, of the adoption by the defendants of that particular device—two elephants at the upper corners of the ticket with a cloth or banner suspended between them—knowing as they did the plaintiff's ticket, knowing also the character and circumstances of the markets, and entering as they did upon this particular branch of trade with the direct object of competing with and underselling the plaintiffs, unless it was because they had a desire and intention to approach to the plaintiff's trade-mark as nearly as they possibly could. For such desire and intention no motive can be suggested, except that of getting some part of the benefit of the good-will and reputation of the plaintiff's trade."(12)

Truth is No Justification.

5356. The same view was enunciated by Lord Cranworth, L. C., in another case in which the plaintiff, Baron do Seixo a Portuguese nobleman, exported port wine from his quinta or estate bearing the following marks: the figures of a crown and eagle with the letters "B.S." (meaning Barao or Baron de Seixo) on the head of the cask, and a crown with the word Seixo and the year of the vintage, at the bung-hole. The plaintiff claimed that his wine was known in the London market as "Crown Seixo" and that it had as such acquired a great reputation. He complained against the defendants of the infringement of his trade-mark. The latter were also three Portuguese, one of them a Baron, and they had put on the market 100 pipes of port marked on the head of the casks with the figure of a crown, and the letters "C.B." and the words "Seixo de Cima" (meaning "Upper Seixo") and the date of the vintage, and at the bung-hole a Crown with the letters "C.B." the words "Seixo de Cima" and the year 1861. They defended this mark on the ground that they had rented a quinta adjoining the plaintiff's which they believed was known as the "Quinta do Seixo"; they contended that the word "Seixo" meant stony or pebbly and that other quintas were so called. The Crown they said was a coronet which one of the defendants had the right to use; and "C.B." meant "Caldas Brothers." Attention was also called to the apparent difference between the two labels, which was conceded, but it was held not to be the question, or not the sole question to be considered.

(12) Johnson v. Orr Ewing, 7 App. Cas. 219 (225, 226).

"The principle on which relief is given in these cases is that one man cannot offer his goods for sale representing them to be the manufacture of a rival trader....It is obvious that, in these cases, questions of considerable nicety may arise as to whether the mark adopted by one trader is or is not the same as that previously used by another trader complaining of its illegal use, and it is hardly necessary to say that, in order to entitle a party to relief, it is by no means necessary that there should be absolute identity; what degree of resemblance is necessary from the nature of things, is a matter incapable of definition a priori. All that Courts of Justice can do is to say that no trader can adopt a trade-mark so resembling that of a rival, as that ordinary purchasers purchasing with ordinary caution, are likely to be misled. It would be a mistake, however, to suppose that the resemblance must be such as would deceive persons who should see the two marks placed side by side. The rule so restricted would be of no practical use."(13) And then his Lordship added: "I do not consider the actual physical resemblance of the two marks to be the sole question for consideration If the goods of a manufacturer have, from the mark or device he has used, become known in the market by a particular name, I think that the adoption by a rival trader of any mark which will cause his goods to bear the same name in the market, may be as much a violation of the rights of that rival as the actual copy of his device."(14)

5357. The question that the defendant could justify individual use of the symbols was no answer to the claim, "for that did not justify them in adopting a device or brand the probable effect of which would be to lead the public, when purchasing their wine, to suppose that they are purchasing wine produced from the vineyards, not of the defendants, but of the plaintiff."(15) This is obvious. For if an article was (13 Seixo v. Provesende, L. R. 1 Ch. 192 (196).

(14) Ib. pp. 196, 197.

(15) Ib. pp. 197, 198.

well known in the market as the manufacture of "Smith" another person, though Smith by name,(16) was not entitled to place a similar article on the market under the same name, and the fact that his description was truthful is no defence to an injury done to another person's business, for sic uteri tuo ut alienum non loedas.(17) The plaintiff was a corset maker and his initials "C.B." were stamped on all corsets made by him. The defendants also made corsets and stamped their initials as "C. B. & Co.," "C.B." being also their initials. "C.B." was printed by them in larger type than "& Co.," and it was in evidence that the plaintiff's corsets had obtained wide notoriety as "C.B." corsets. It was held that the plaintiff was entitled to restrain the defendants from stamping their corsets with the initials "C. B. & Co." It was added that the fact that the plaintiff held certain registered trade-marks, in relation to one of which he had disclaimed the exclusive right to the letters "C. B." did not preclude him from preventing the use of the letters "C.B." by his rival in the trade.(18)

The case is, of course, worse where the defendant adopts a new name so as to be able to stamp his goods with the well-known mark of another trader.(19) On this point the rule is that while as a general rule a person is at liberty to assume any name he pleases, he must not do so to perpetrate fraud, and the Court would interfere if a particular name were affixed with the view of making a dishonest reputation which was likely to cause damage to another, or which would, even apart from damage, have the tendency to mislead.(20) The plaintiff was the proprietor of "Holloway's Pills." The defendant who had some years ago bought a drysalter's business from a man named Holloway, began to use that name in connection with his pills. The plaintiff was held entitled to restrain him from using the name of Holloway in connection with pills.(21)

5358. But in such a case the fact that one Smith has chosen to call his goods by his own name would not preclude the second Smith from calling his goods by his right name, provided that he takes sufficient care to state that he is a different Smith to his namesake whose similar goods are also on the market. Such may be the case by adopting an obviously different trade-mark or by a change in the size, shape or colour of the receptacle, or by a clearly worded notice printed in a conspicuous place so that it might be seen by all caring to handle the goods. This was the ratio decidendi of Jessel, M. R., in a case in which the Singer Manufacturing Company complained of the infringement of their trade-mark "Singer" printed on all their sewing machines by the defendants who placed on the markets sewing machines which they

(16) Jamieson & Co. v. Jamieson, (1898) 14 T. L. R. 160.

(17) "Use your own property in such a manner as not to injure that of another."

(18) Beyer v. Bard, (1898) 25 R. 1142; 35 Sc. L. R. 913. To the same effect, Jameson v. Dublin Distillers Co., (1900) 1 Ir. R. 43, in which the plaintiff restrained the defendant from selling whisky as "W. Jamieson's Whisky," their own whisky being well known in the trade as "Jamieson's Whisky."

(19) Pinet (F.) et cie v. Maison Louis Pinet, Ltd., [1898] Ch. 179.

(20) Nicholson & Co. v. Buchanan, (1902) 19 R. P. C. 321.

(21) Holloway v. Clent, (1903) R. P. C. 525; to the same effect, Cash, Ltd. v. Cash, (1902) T. L. R. 299.

described as "our sewing machines" but upon which they placed their distinctive trade-mark surrounded by the words "Newton Wilson & Co, Manufacturers 144, High Holborn," whereupon Jessel, M.R., held that since the defendant's trade-mark was different and round which was printed their names, which could only mean that they were the manufacturers, and they so described themselves in their catalogue and from all of which it could not be said that persons with ordinary sights and ordinary minds ran any chance of being misled. The plaintiff's suit for injunction was consequently refused,[22] and that decision was affirmed on appeal.[23] It may be added, that the case would have resulted differently if the defendants had placed the word "Singer" on their machines.[24]

Coincident Similarity Excepted.

5359. The plaintiff who carried on business as Jamieson & Co., at Aberdeen, as a manufacturer of harness composition, sued the defendant, George Jamieson who was also a manufacturer of harness composition at Aberdeen. It appeared that there were two other manufacturers of harness composition named Jamieson at Aberdeen, one being Peter Jamieson, who was prior in date to the others. The receptacles used by all of them were similar, though they were common to the trade. It was held that the distinctive features of the plaintiff's tins were the signature "Jamieson & Co.," and the trade-mark, and the defendant's goods had no similarity to the plaintiff's goods except in features that were common to the trade and that he had not passed off his goods as those of the plaintiffs. A man is not bound to use extra precautions to avoid confusion between his goods and those of other persons in the trade, if such confusion arises solely from similarity of his own name with theirs, and from the use of features common to the trade; but such a case must be distinguished from the case where the name of a particular trader has in the market, come to denote his goods.[25]

5360. Nor, again, is it any defence that the quality of the defendant's goods was the same; for the rule is not intended solely for the protection of the purchaser, but of the trader as well, and the question of quality is no answer to him.[1]

5361. From this discussion it is evident that the question whether one mark was calculated to deceive, then depends not only upon the nature, extent and position of the similarity, but upon other circumstances, which have all to be taken into consideration, and upon the consideration of which depends the question of infringement no less than the question of criminality.

(22) Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Wilson, 2 Ch. D. 434 (444, 445) C. A. 451. It may be noted that on exactly similar circumstances the Scotch Courts came to a different conclusion and issued an injunction against the defendants; Singer Co. v. Kimball, 11 Court of Sess. Cas. (3rd Ser.) 267, cited in Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Wilson, 2 Ch. D. 434 (449).

(23) Ib., per James, L. J., arguendo, p. 449, citing Wolberspoon v. Currie, L. R. 5 H. L. 508. To the same effect, Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co. v. Dunlop Lubricating Co. (1899) R. P. C. 12.

(24) Jamieson & Co., v. Jameson, (1898) 14 T. L. R. 160.

(25) Ib.

(1) Starey v. Chilworth Gunpowder Co. 24 Q. B. D. 90.

481. Whoever marks any moveable property or goods or any case, package or other receptacle containing moveable property or goods, or uses any case, package or other receptacle having any mark thereon, in a manner reasonably calculated to cause it to be believed that the property or goods so marked, or any property or goods contained in any such receptacle so marked, belong to a person to whom they do not belong, is said to use a false property-mark.

Using a false property-mark.

[Property-mark—s. 479.]

Synopsis.

Analogous Law (5362).

5362. Analogous Law.—This question what constitutes a "property-mark" has been before considered (§ 5338). The present section merely defines the phrase "using a false property-mark" and as such its language is identical with that used in the last section to the commentary on which reference should be made for further information.

Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Non-cog. Warrant. Bailable. Comp. with Court's sanction.

482. Whoever uses any false trade-mark or any false property-mark shall, unless he proves that he acted without intent to defraud, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine or with both.

Punishment for using a false trade-mark or property-mark.

[Trade mark—s. 478. Property mark—s. 479. Using false trade-mark—s. 480. Using false property-mark—s. 481.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5363-5365).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5366-5369).
(3) When Criminal Proceedings are Improper (5368).
(4) Proof (5370).
(5) Form of Charge (5371).
(6) Principle (5372-5373).
(7) Meaning of Words (5374).
(8) Fraudulent Use of False Trade-mark (5375-5382).
(9) Quality Immaterial (5378).
(10) What is Using Trade-mark (5379).
(11) Reasonably Calculated (5380-5381).
(12) Proximity of Business (5382).
(13) Possible Defences (5383-5385).

5363. Analogus Law.—This section prescribes punishment for using a false trade or property mark. But a person may use a false trade-description as distinct from a false trade mark in which case the act is not a Code offence though it is punishable under the following provision of the Merchandise Marks Act.[2]

(2) Act IV of 1889; Kanchi Dorassamy (In re), 7 M. L. T. 309, 6 I. C. 683; Anath Nath Dey, 40 C. 281.

"6. If a person applies false trade-description to goods, he shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, and unless he proves that he acted without intent to defraud, be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees, and in the case of a second or subsequent conviction with imprisonment which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

Penalty for applying a false trade-description.

"7. If a person sells, or exposes or has in possession for sale or any purpose of trade or manufacture, any goods or things to which a false trade-description is applied, he shall, unless he proves—

Penalty for selling goods to which a false trade-description is applied.

"(a) that, having taken all reasonable precautions against committing an offence against this section, he had at the time of the commission of the alleged offence no reason to suspect the genuineness of the trade-description, and

"(b) that, on demand made by or on behalf of the prosecutor, he gave all the information in his power with respect to the persons from whom he obtained such goods, or things, or

"(c) that otherwise he had acted innocently,

"be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three months or with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees, and in case of a second or subsequent conviction with imprisonment which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both."

5364. The provisions of this section are modified by sections 8 and 9 of the Merchandise Marks Act which run as follows:—

"8. Where a person is accused under section 482 of the Indian Penal Code, of using a false trade-mark or property-mark by reason of his having applied a mark to any goods, property or receptacle in the manner mentioned in section 480 or section 481 of that Code, as the case may be, or under section 6 of this Act of applying to goods any false trade-description, or under section 485 of the Indian Penal Code of making any die, plate or other instrument for the purpose of counterfeiting a trade-mark or property-mark and proves—

Unintentional contradiction of the law relating to marks and descriptions.

"(a) that in the ordinary course of his business he is employed, on behalf of other persons, to apply trade-marks or property-marks or trade-descriptions, or, as the case may be, to make dies, plates or other instruments for making or being used in making trade-marks or property-marks, and that in the case which is the subject of the charge he was so employed and was not interested in the goods or other thing by way of profit or commission dependent on the sale thereof, and

"(b) that he took reasonable precaution against committing the offence charged, and

"(c) that he had at the time of commission of the alleged offence, no reason to suspect the genuineness of the mark or description, and

"(d) that on demand made by or on behalf of the prosecutor, he gave all the information in his power with respect to the persons on whose behalf the mark or description was applied,

"he shall be acquitted.

"9. When a person is convicted under section 482 of the Indian Penal Code of using a false trade-mark, or under section 486 of that Code of selling, or exposing or having in possession for sale or any purpose of trade or manufacture any goods or things with a counterfeit trade-mark applied thereto, or under section 487 or section 488 of that Code of making, or making use of a false trade-mark, or under section 6 or section 7 of this Act of applying a false trade-description to goods, or of selling, or exposing or having in possession for sale or any purpose of trade or manufacture any goods or things to which a false trade-description is applied or is acquitted on proof of the matter or matters specified in section 486 or section 7 or section 8 of this Act, the Court convicting or acquitting him may direct the forfeiture to Her Majesty of all goods and goods by means of, or in relation to which the offence has been committed, or but for such proof as aforesaid, would have been committed.

Forfeiture of goods.

"(2) When a forfeiture is directed on conviction and an appeal lies against the conviction, an appeal shall lie against the forfeiture also.

"(3) When a forfeiture is directed on an acquittal and the goods or things are of value exceeding fifty rupees an appeal against the forfeiture may be preferred within thirty days from the date of the direction, to the Court to which in appealable cases appeals lie from sentence of the Court which directed the forfeiture."

5365. The same Act makes further provision for the punishment of a person for abetment in India of acts done out of British India in any place in British India in which he may be found.[3]

5366. Procedure and Practice.—A prosecution for an offence under this section must be instituted within three years of the commission of the offence, or one year of its discovery by the prosecutor whichever period first expires.[4] This offence is non-cognizable, but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, and compoundable with the permission of the Court and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first or second class.

5367. The ordinary procedure applicable to offences under the Code has been in some particulars modified by the special provisions of the Merchandise Marks Act[5] which authorizes the Court to order forfeiture of the goods on a conviction had under this section. It has also power to order the payment of costs of the prosecution or defence according to the result of the trial and the conduct of the parties, which may be recovered as fine.[6] In awarding costs the Court will, it is conceived, be guided by the general principles which regulate the subject in civil proceedings.

When Criminal Proceedings are Improper.

5368. It will be observed that an infringement of one's trademark by another in a manner calculated to deceive gives rise to a liability which may be enforced either by a prosecution under the Code, or by a civil suit for an injunction and damages. The evidence required in each case is the same, and though beyond prescribing a rule of limitation for the institution of criminal proceedings, the Legislature has given no indication of when the party aggrieved should be entitled to resort to one proceeding rather than another, yet it is evident that the dual remedies to which the aggrieved party becomes entitled cannot be resorted to at his sole discretion. It would seem that the first and foremost thing that the Criminal Court has to see is that a party coming to it for redress does so promptly. If there was any undue delay it will refer the complainant to the Civil Court, rather than allow its process to be abused by dilatory proceedings. So it was observed in Madras: "Ordinarily, the infringement of a trade-mark is rather a civil than a criminal wrong, but as civil proceedings may require much time and expenditure to bring them to a conclusion, the Legislature,

(3) Act IV of 1889, s. 22.
(4) S. 15. Merchandise Marks (Act IV of 1889).
(5) Act IV of 1889, ss. 8 and 9.
(6) Ib; s. 14; Ganpat, 16 Bom. L. R. 78.

in its anxiety to protect traders, has allowed resort to the Criminal Courts to provide a speedy remedy in cases where the aggrieved party is diligent, and does not by his conduct show that the case is not one of urgency."[7] But apart from laches and delay, the nature of the dispute may be one more suitable for adjudication by the Civil rather than the Criminal Court.

As Maclean, C.J., observed: "It seems to me that when a case of this class is brought into a Criminal Court, if the Magistrate is of opinion that there is a bona fide dispute as to whether the complainant has any trade-mark at all, or whether the accused is or is not entitled to use the mark he is using....he should not deal with the matter as a criminal matter, but leave it to the complainant to maintain, if he can, in a Civil Court the right which he claims. If after the decision of the Civil Court it be found that he has a trade-mark, the case could then be properly brought into a Criminal Court under the section to which I have referred."[8] So where the accused has reason to deny that the prosecution has any exclusive right to the trade-mark,[9] or that the trade-mark claimed could at all be a trade-mark within the meaning of section 478,[10] or where the case originally started for infringement of a trade-mark drifted later on into use of a trade name which the accused has used for several years,[11] the case was held to be a fit one for trial by the Civil Court.

5369. The Merchandise Marks Act also provides for the acquittal of the accused on his proving that his contravention of the law relating to marks and descriptions was unintentional (§§ 5360-5361). It would be observed, that contrary to the general view of crime adopted in the Penal Code, these sections provide for the punishment of the accused on the mere proof of infringement of a person's trade-mark coupled with the fact that such infringement is calculated to deceive which is then sufficient to establish a prima facie case for conviction, on a presumption made that the infringement was intended to defraud, it being then on the accused to prove that he had acted without such intention.

5370. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the prosecutor had a right to a trade-mark.[12]

(2) That the trade-mark of the accused was similar to it.

(3) That it was marked or used in a manner reasonably calculated to cause it to be believed that the goods or receptacle so marked are the manufacture of the prosecutor.

(4) That the goods were not in fact his manufacture.

5371. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

(7) Ruppell v. Ponnusami, 22 M. 488.
(8) Dowlat Ram, 32 C. 431; Anath Nath Dey, 40 C. 281.
(9) Doulat Ram, 32 C. 431.
(10) Bakaulla Malik, 31 C. 411.
(11) Anath Nath Dey, 40 C. 281.
(12) Use for six years sufficient; Lakhan Chanda, (1925) C. 149.

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you used a certain trade-mark (or property-mark), to wit——to denote that certain goods were the maunfacture of A B, whose manufacture they were not (or were the property of A B whose property they were not) in a manner reasonably calculated to cause it to be believed that such goods were the manufacture (or property) of A B; and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 482 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

"And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge."

5372. Principle.—The offences in this series commencing with that here described take a line of their own as regards proof and punishment. They are really civil delicts which have been constituted offences by the Statute in order to facilitate prompt disposal of cases. At the same time cases may arise when the fraud has been so cunningly plotted and so audaciously persisted in as to justify the awarding of condign punishment. The offences relating to the infringement of trade and property marks have a dual purpose in view. In the first place they are designed to protect the consumer against a deception being practised on him by palming off on him goods different to those he believed himself to be buying. In the second place they protect the trader himself by preventing the imitation of his goods and thus cause him loss by destroying his credit. Where the first object is manifest it is clearly a code offence,[13] where it is not so manifest, the act may still be punishable under the Merchandise Marks, or be a case for redress in the Civil Court[14] (§ 5368).

5373. In ordinary offences under the Code the burden of proving mens rea or criminal intent is on the prosecution, and it lies on it to prove all the elements necessary to bring the offence home to the accused.[15] But in these quasi crimes law presumes fraudulent intent from an imitation which is reasonably calculated to deceive. The proof of fraudulent intent is unnecessary[16] (§ 5369). At the same time the presumption it creates is rebuttable and may be rebutted by the accused who may prove that he had acted innocently, and that he had no such intent (§§ 5363-5365). The intent to defraud is thus still an essential element of the offence, but the Code makes a departure from the ordinary rule by inferring it from the fact of imitation. The question, therefore, affects proof but not the principle.

5374. Meaning of Words—"Whoever" includes a body corporate.[17]

5375. Fraudulent Use of False Trade-mark.—All the essential elements that go to constitute this offence have been the subject of a previous discussion (§§ 5346-5361). This section merely prescribes a (13) Ganpat, 16 Bom. L. R. 78, 24 I. C. 834.

(14) Kanchi Doraisamy, 7 M. L. T. 309; 6 I. C. 683.
(15) General Introduction, §§ 51, 52.
(16) Seena Haniff & Co. v. Lipton, Ltd., 7 Bur. L. T. 116, 23 I. C. 689.
(17) Ib.

penalty for an act described in the two preceding sections which practically define the offence. Their immediate purport is to define what is using a false trade or property mark. According to the definition there given a trade-mark is false if (a) it is an imitation of an existing trade-mark, and (b) it is used in a manner calculated to deceive purchasers of the goods, upon which it is placed, into a belief that the goods are the goods of the owner of the first trade-mark. Consequently, a person may as much commit this offence by using his own trade-mark on goods which are not his manufacture as one who copies that trade-mark and under its colour offers spurious goods. The gravamen of the offence is fraud, but it is fraud practised on the public by visual and not verbal representation. If the representation made is verbal the offence may conceivably be cheating, but it is not the offence here described. This offence is mainly directed against fraudulent traders who impose on the public by selling them goods which the public purchase judging from their appearance as the goods of a maker whose goods they intend to purchase. It may be that besides the deception practised by the close imitation of the trade-mark by which the character and quality of goods are customarily known in the market, the trader verbally induces a purchaser by making a false representation, he may be guilty both of this offence as well as of cheating. On the other hand, it is just conceivable, that in making such representation he may have been himself deceived, in which case he may claim exoneration on the grounds set out in section 8 of the Merchandise Marks Act.[18] These are, however, exceptional cases.

5376. In a normal case, the trader who uses a false trade-mark is either the manufacturer or the seller of goods who wishes to draw custom of a well-known rival in the same line. For this purpose he imitates the design, shape and colour of the former's trade-mark. But being well aware of the risk, he avoids too close an imitation. But at the same time he copies enough of the leading features of the original so as to give his counterfeit wares the appearance of the original article. He does not intend to deceive the expert middleman but the consumer, and the sole test in such cases therefore is not whether a cautious purchaser would be deceived, but whether an incautious purchaser is likely to be imposed upon. (§§ 5352-5355). For this purpose regard must be had to the class of people among whom the goods are sold, the means of identification in vogue among them and the probability of their mistake. (§§ 5354-5355). It is not, however, necessary that some one in fact should have been deceived, for all that sections 480 and 481 require is that the goods must be reasonably calculated to cause such deception.[19] Indeed, the fact that some one in particular was actually deceived is immaterial, for it may be that he was an unreasonable man, and it does not necessarily follow that because some one was deceived by the trade-mark it was reasonably calculated to deceive him.[20]

5377. But in some cases the necessity of actual deception is insisted on. So Giffard, L. J., said: "The first thing to be observed

(18) Act IV of 1889.
(19) Braham v. Beachim, 7 Ch. D. 848; Jay v. Ladler, 40 Ch. D. 649
v. Dean, 13 Ch. D. 512 (516).
(20) Civil Service Supply Association

in cases of this description is, that it would not be safe for any plaintiff to come into Court until he could prove instances of persons having been actually deceived, for the Court would have to try a hypothetical case, and a number of people would be brought forward by the defendant to say, and probably truly, that the thing done would never have deceived them, and in their opinion was not calculated to deceive."[21] This was, however, said to account for the delay which had been pleaded against the plaintiff, and it does not appear to be a pre-requisite of a proceeding taken to protect one's right to a trade-mark. As Lord Herschell said: "The eye must be the judge in such a case as this, and the question must be determined by placing the designs side by side, and asking whether they are the same, or whether the one is an obvious imitation of the other."[22] The comparison must, however, be made from the stand-point of the likely purchasers, having regard to their class, character and the degree of observation and intelligence, so that the imitation of the plaintiff's mark cannot be justified by showing either that the device or inscription on the counterfeit mark is ambiguous and capable of being understood by different persons in different ways, or, that a person who carefully and intelligently examined and studied it might not be misled,[23] which must be judged by having regard to the closeness of the imitation, and the nature of the goods sold under each trade-mark and the reputation in which it is held in the market.

Quality Immaterial.

5378. Ordinarily, the counterfeit goods are not of the same quality as those imitated. But this is not necessary, for Lord Coleridge, C.J., said of the English Statute: "The Act is directed against the abuse of trade-marks, and the putting off on a purchaser of, not a bad article, but an article different from that which he intends to purchase and believes that he is purchasing."[24] In this case, the respondents who were manufacturers of gunpowder, entered into a contract with the Government to supply powder. Owing to an accident they were unable to manufacture the powder themselves, and in order to carry out their contract they bought German powder, and put it into barrels supplied by the Government, and labelled them with their own trade-mark. The powder was as good in quality as of the respondent's own manufacture contracted for, but no indication was given that it was of German manufacture. It was held that they were guilty of using a false trade-mark; "They changed the barrels in which their own powder was contained, and put their own name on the labels. This was a false description used in order to save their contract and avoid the penalties, and any loss which they might incur through the Government buying in against them. They broke the contract in using their trade-mark, and there was an intent to defraud, for, what they did was done in order to save their contract, and to make the Government believe that they had an article which they had not."[25]

(21) Lee v. Haley, L. R. 5 Ch. 155 (160).

(22) Hecla Founary Co. v. Walker Hunter & Co., 14 App. Cas. 550 (555).

(23) Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Loog, 8 App. Cas. 15 (18).

(24) Starey v. Chilworth Gunpowder Co., 24 Q. B. D. 90 (96).

(25) Ib., p. 96.

What is a Using Trade-mark.

5379. The phrase "whoever uses" is wide, but it is qualified by the false trade or property mark, so that only a person who actually marks or applies the mark is liable for this offence. The tradesman who merely sells goods bearing a false trade-mark is not liable under this section, though he may be under section 486, nor is a person who uses a receptacle bearing the genuine trade-mark for fraudulent purposes, for he does not use a counterfeit mark though he may be offering for sale counterfeit goods, and may be as such liable. A and B were two rival manufacturers of mineral waters. B obtained possession of empty bottles, the property of A, and moulded with A's name, and filled therein water of his own manufacture which he sold to his customers. It was held that B was guilty of selling goods under a false description. The Magistrate found that B had no intent to defraud, but Lord Coleridge, C. J., held an intent to defraud the purchasers not a necessary ingredient of the offence.(1) It is certainly not the part of the definition of this offence, though its existence is implied and inferred from the fact of imitation. So it was observed by Lord Hatherley, L. C., that where a person actually copies the design of another, it is natural to suppose that it was done in order to attract his customer. It is not however necessary, nor indeed is it the case, that there should be an exact resemblance between the original and the counterfeit, and where the imitation is not of itself suggestive of fraudulent intent it may be inferred from the fact that the counterfeit was "reasonably calculated" to pass for the original.(2)

"Reasonably Calculated."

5380. But how is this to be decided? The evidence of a witness or two, that they were in fact deceived, is obviously insufficient, for it may be their own fault that they were deceived.(3) But such evidence is admissible,(4) though it is by no means conclusive. The evidence of experts, that is to say tradesmen who have occasion to handle such goods is entitled to greater weight.(5) But the question of reasonable likelihood is not a pure question of fact, and it is, moreover, contingent upon other questions. If, for example, A accuses B of the infringement of his trade-mark, the Court will have to try at least the following issues:—

(i) Was the mark infringed, a trade-mark?

(ii) Was it exclusively the property of A?

(iii) Was it used by him?

(iv) Did B use A's trade-mark?

(v) Was it used in a manner reasonably calculated to deceive the public?

(vi) Did it have in fact that effect?

(1) Wood v. Burgess, 24 Q. B. D. 162 (164).

(2) Wotherspoon v. Currie, L. R. 5 H. L. 508 (512). The text is not founded upon any actual words used by Lord Hatherley, L. C.

(3) Civil Service Supply Association, Ltd. v. Dean, 13 Ch. D. 512.

(4) Ib.

(5) Semble, per Cotton, L. J., in Lyndon's Trade Mark, 32 Ch. D. 109 (118).

5381. But these are not all. For there may be issues suggested by the nature of the defence taken. But out of the issues set out, issue (v) has been held to raise a question of law.(6) It is rather an inference of law from certain facts which would have to be proved. As Bowen, L. J., said: "It seems to me that a trade-mark is calculated, by its resemblance to another already on the register, to deceive, if in the course of its legitimate use in the trade it is likely to do so. In considering the question whether this result is probable, it seems to me that we must look at the circumstances of the case. We must consider whether blurring is likely to take place: we must consider, in the case of a stamp, whether, having regard to the special class of articles on which the impression is to be made, there is likely to be such indistinctness as is calculated to deceive. It seems to me that in many cases we may be obliged to regard the size of the article upon which the mark is intended to be made or fixed, and the material or the ground work, so to speak, upon which it is to be placed. I think it would not be wrong to consider the probability, if an impression had to be made on a hard substance, of some letters being more likely to take with distinctness than others, or parts of the design being likely to come out with more perfection, while other parts would remain more imperfectly represented. We ought also to have regard to the effect likely to be produced in the particular article by wear and tear. All these seem to be things which a man of common sense and business habits would take into account if he were asking himself the question whether one trade mark is so like another as to be calculated in the probable course of its use in trade, to deceive."(7)

Proximity of Business.

5382. Again, since the object of these provisions is to protect one trader from defrauding another, the place where the counterfeit goods were sold is material. For no one would complain of a tradesman using another's trade-mark in a place where the latter had no business, and where, therefore, the former could not be said to intend to trade upon his reputation. It was so held in a case in which the plaintiffs sold coal having business in Pall Mall (London) carried on under the name of "The Pall Mall Guinea Coal Company." The defendants started a similar business in another street under the same name, and after some time removed it to Pall Mall, when the plaintiff sued for an injunction which Malins, V. C. granted, restricting it, however, to their business in Pall Mall, and this limitation was held to be right on the ground that "in all probability if the same name were used in some other street it would lead to no mistake or deception."(8) So in another case the plaintiff who had a right to the firm—name "Carriage Bazar" was held entitled to restrain the defendant from setting up a shop in the same street and call it the "New Carriage Bazar."(9)

5383. Possible Defences.—These are then the principal elements which constitute this offence. But they are not the only elements to

(6) Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Loog, 11 Ch. D. 656 (662).

(7) Per Bowen, L. J. in Lyndon's Trade Mark, 32 Ch. D. 109 (119, 120), following Worthington & Co.'s Trade Mark, 14 Ch. D. 8; Rosing's Application, 54 L. J. (Ch.) 975.

(8) Per Giffard, L. J., in Lee v. Haley, L. R. 5 Ch. 155 (162).

(9) Boulnois v Peake 13 Ch. D. 513-n.

be considered. For, there remains the defence (i) that the accused had acted without intent to defraud. But how is this to be proved. It is obviously a negative proposition upon which his bare statement would be insufficient. At the same time if he had no such intention it should not be difficult to establish it. For instance, he may show that his trade-mark was either registered or protected which would be a sufficient answer, for the procedure prescribed for registration precludes all possibility of an intention to defraud on the part of a person who applies for it. So again, (ii) he may show that the similarity was unintentional and not intended, as where he is shown to have been ignorant of the existence of the other trade mark, or being aware of it, it is common use in the trade.(10)

Indeed, words in common use are not fit to be registrated as trade-marks, and (iii) the reason for their non-registration is a sufficient justification for their use by the accused. (iv) He may, moreover show that though the two trade marks are similar, the goods to which they are applied are not the same. This is always a good defence because no one has or can acquire an absolute monopoly in a trade-mark. It is only protected so long as it is necessary for the carrying on of one's trade, and consequently, the accused could justify his use by showing its abandonment on the part of the prosecutor. So again, (v) a trade-mark to which a trader had originally an exclusive right may, in course of time, become publici juris, and the exclusive right may be lost. The proper test of this having happened is that the use of the trade-mark by other persons has ceased to deceive the public as to the maker of the article. Such are, for example, "Gladstone bag," "Brougham," "Wellingston Boots," "Worcestershire Sauce," "Harvey's Sauce," "Chlorodyne," and numerous other articles which were at one time proprietary and have since become publici juris, and are used both by the trade and the public to designate the shape or quality without distinction of the seller.

But what is the test by which a decision is to be arrived at whether a word which was originally a trade-mark, has become publici juris? "I think," observed Sir G. Mellish, L. J., "the test must be, whether the use of it by other persons is still calculated to deceive the public, whether it may still have the effect of inducing the public to buy goods not made by the original owner of the trade-mark as if they were his goods. If the mark has come to be so public and in such universal use that nobody can be deceived by the use of it, can be induced from the use of it to believe that he is buying the goods of the original trader, it appeals to me, however hard to some extent it may appear on the trader, yet practically as the right to a trade-mark is simply a right to prevent the trader from being cheated by other persons' goods being sold as his goods through the fraudulent use of the trade-mark, the right to the trade-mark must be gone."(11)

5384. Again, (vi) the maxim Ex turpi causa non oritur actio is as much applicable to trade marks as to other domains of law. Consequently, "if the trade-mark contains a false representation calculated to deceive the public, a man cannot by using that which is in itself a fraud, obtain—I do not say an exclusive right—but any right at all."[12] So where a person sold under the name of "Mexican Balm" some composition which never came from Mexico, but which was said to be composed from some wonderful herbs to be got only in Mexico, the Court refused to protect his trade-mark against an infringement.[13] The same view prevailed in another case in which the plaintiff sold his tea as "Howqua's Mixture" announcing it to be an extraordinary mixture made up by some great man in China, when in point of fact it was made in England.[14] (vii) Then there is the question of delay, and (viii) limitation. The object of a criminal prosecution in such cases is to afford the aggrieved party prompt relief if he is sufficiently diligent and does not by his conduct show that the case is not one of urgency.

(10) Alexander Pirie & Sons v. Goodal, (1892) 1 Ch. 35 (40).

(11) Ford v. Foster, L. R. 7 Ch. 611 (628).

If, therefore, the person aggrieved fails to resort to the Criminal Courts within a year of the offence coming to his knowledge, the law assumes that the case is not one of urgency, and it leaves him to his civil remedy by an action for injunction.[15] In this case the complainant prosecuted the accused under this section as well as section 486, alleging that they had exclusive right to the use of the word "Bahadur" as applied to cigars which they had sold under that trade-mark since 1886, and that in 1893 or 1894 the accused infringed their right by offering for sale cigars which he designated "Rai Bahadur." The prosecution was started four years later in 1898, and the Court held "it to be barred by the one year's limitation prescribed by section 15 of the Merchandise Marks Act."[16] This view was followed in Burmah, where the accused had been twice before, in 1908 and 1910, prosecuted and acquitted of selling oil in the Burmah Oil Co's. second hand tins, on the ground of limitation. They then filed a third complaint embodying the same grievance. It received a similar fate.[17]

5385. (viii) Lastly, he may prove that he had acted "without intent to defraud" either the owner of the trade-mark or his customer. Such a case arose where the accused who sold the oil of the Burmah oil Co. in a Standard Oil Co.'s tin. It appeared that the two companies had agreed to allow its tins to be used by the other, but it was provided that the Burmah Co. must use the Standard Co.'s tins by putting on the caps the word "Victoria." The accused sold eight tins, of which only two bore that word, the remainder being sold with plain caps. The accused proved that these tins were sold at the Burmah Oil Co.'s price and the purchases were informed that the tins contained the oil of the Burmah Oil Co. It was held that he could not be convicted of this offence as he had acted "without intent to defraud"[18] (§§ 5363-5365).

(12) Per Sir G. Mellish, L. J. in Ford v. Foster, L. R. 7 Ch. 611 (631).
(13) Perry v. Truefit, 6 Beav. 66.
(14) Pidding v. How, 8 Sim. 477.
(15) Ruppell v. Ponnsami, 22 M. 488.
(16) Ib.
(17) Mahomed Jewa v. Wilson, 4 Bur. L. T. 83, 10 I. C. 787, 12 Cr. L. J. 246; following Ruppell v. Ponnusami, 22 M. 488.
(18) Abdul Rashid, 16 A. L. J. 476, 46 I. C. 402, 19 Cr. L. J. 722.

483. Whoever counterfeits any trade-mark or property-mark used by any other person shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Counterfeiting a trade-mark or property-mark used by another.

Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Non-cog. Warrant. Bailable, Comp. with Court's sanction.

[Person—s. 11. Possession—s. 27. Counterfeits—s. 28.]
Property-mark—s. 472. Trade-mark—s. 478.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5386).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5387).
(3) Proof (5388).
(4) Form of Charge (5389).
(5) Counterfeiting a Trade-mark (5390-5391).

5386. Analogous Law.—This section differs from the last in that the accused in committing this offence goes the length of forging another-man's trade-mark for the purpose of imposition, which accounts for the enhanced punishment.

5387. Procedure and Practice.—No prosecution can be instituted under this section on expiration of three years next after the commission of the offence, or one year after the first discovery thereof by the prosecutor, whichever period first expires.[19] The offence is non-cognizable, but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable and compoundable with the permission of the Court and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class. The costs of the prosecution or defence may be ordered to be paid by the Court at the close of the trial, and such costs would then be recoverable as fine.[20] It has also the power to order forfeiture of goods in accordance with the provisions of section 9 of the Merchandise Marks Act (§ 5362).

5388. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the mark in question is a trade-mark (section 478) or property-mark (section 479).

(2) That it was so used by the prosecutor or some other person.

(3) That the accused counterfeited it.

5389. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:

"That on or about the——day of——at——you counterfeited a trade-mark or property-mark, Exhibit——used by A B, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 483 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

(19) Merchandise Marks Act (IV of 1889), s. 15.

(20) Ib. s. 41.

"And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge."

5390. Counterfeiting a trade-mark.—The question what amounts to the counterfeiting of a trade-mark is a question of degree. For, having regard to the use of the term "counterfeiting" in another connexion (§§ 2439-2444), the counterfeit need not be the exact copy of the original. At the same time the two must possess some features in common; otherwise one cannot be called a counterfeit of the other. As used in connexion with trade-mark the term is probably used in a somewhat special sense as implying the exact reproduction of a trade-mark for the purpose of attracting custom. The term has obviously no application to the use of a receptacle bearing the original trade-mark for enclosing goods of another make. Nor would it extend to a trade-mark which is merely a colourable imitation of another, but which otherwise possesses features intended to distinguish it from the original. The question then resolves itself into this: What does the appearance of the two trade-marks suggest? Did the spurious trade-marker intend to impose on the public by the similarity of his design or did he intend to use it as the original?

5391. But this distinction is somewhat too fine; and in practice the prosecution prefers to charge the accused both under section 482 as well as under this section and section 486.

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st class. Non-cog. Summons. Bailable. Not comp.

Counterfeiting a mark used by public servant.

484. Whoever counterfeits any property-mark used by a public servant, or any mark used by a public servant to denote that any property has been manufactured by a particular person or at a particular time or place, or that the property is of a particular quality or has passed through a particular office, or that it is entitled to any exemption or uses as genuine any such mark knowing the same to be counterfeit, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[Public Servant—s. 21. Counterfeit—s. 28. Property-mark—s. 479.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5392).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5393).
(3) Proof (5394).
(4) Form of Charge (5395).
(5) Counterfeiting Mark of a Public Servant (5396).

5392. Analogous Law.—This section presents an aggravated form of the offence ordinarily punishable under the last section—the aggravating circumstance being due to the mark being the mark of a public servant. In other respects it generally corresponds with the last two sections.

5393. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable, and summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate, or a Magistrate of the first class.

[For other points of practice reference should be made to section 482 (§§ 5367-5369).]

5394. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the thing in question was a property-mark or some other mark.

(2) That such mark is used by some public servant.

(3) That it was used to denote that the property had been manufactured by a particular person; or at a particular time or place; or that the property was of a particular quality, or had passed through a particular office, or was entitled to some exemption.

(4) That the accused counterfeited it, or that he used the mark as genuine, and in the latter case he knew it to be counterfeit at the time he used it.

5395. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

That on or about the——day of——at——you counterfeited any mark (or property-mark) to wit——used by a public servant, to wit——to denote that some property was manufactured by a particular person, to wit——[(or at a particular time or place, to wit——) (or that the property is of a particular quality, to wit——or has passed through a particular office, to wit——) or that it is entitled to a certain exemption, to wit——)] [or used as genuine a mark, to wit——knowing the same to be counterfeit] and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 484 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court.)]

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

5396. Counterfeiting Mark of a Public Servant.—This section prescribes a penalty for two offences, (i) counterfeiting a mark of a public servant, and (ii) using such mark. In its terms, this section goes beyond the two previous sections relating to using a false or counterfeit trade or property mark inasmuch as it protects all marks whether trade or property marks so long as they are (a) used by a public servant to denote (b) that any property has been manufactured by any person, or (c) at a particular time and place, or (d) that the property is of a particular quality, or (e) has passed through a particular office; or (f) that it is entitled to any exemption. A mark used for any other purpose is not then within the protection here enacted.

The common instance of a property-mark used by a public servant is the broad arrow which is exclusively used by Government to denote that the article to which it is affixed is the property of Government

Of other marks used by a public servant and falling into the category of those enumerated in this section, there are a large number used by several departments of Government for different purposes. And since the Government of this country is both a manufacturer as well as a merchant it has necessarily to use marks to protect its manufacture and merchandise. In some cases it has to use marks to protect its customs and other duties in which case a person who obtains exemption of such duties by stamping on his goods a false Government mark thereby inducing its officers to pass them duty-free commits this offence. In other respects the ingredients of this offence are the same as of the last section.

Session. Pres. Mag or Mag. of 1st class. Non-cog. Summons. Bailable. Not comp.

Making or possession of any instrument for couterfeiting a trade-mark or property-mark.

485. Whoever makes or has in his possession any die, plate or other instrument for the purpose of counterfeiting a trade-mark or property-mark, or has in his possession a trade-mark or property-mark for the purpose of denoting that any goods are the manufacture or merchandise of a person whose manufacture or merchandise they are not, or that they belong to a person to whom they do not belong, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

[Possession—s. 27. Counterfeiting—s. 28. Trade-mark—s. 478. Property-mark—s. 479.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5397-5398).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5399).
(3) Proof (5400).
(4) Form of Charge (5401).
(5) Possession of Counterfeiting Instrument (5402-5404).
(6) Possession of a Trade-mark When Criminal (5404).

5397. Analogous Law.—This section is the adaptation of sections 235, 256 and 472 relating to possession of instruments for counterfeiting coins, stamps and forging documents. Evidently the Code views the possession of instruments for counterfeiting coins as of the same degree of criminality as this section, though it regards the case of stamps more serious. The underlying principle of the four sections is, however, the same, viz., to punish a preparatory act in order to thwart the greater mischief which it might otherwise lead up to.

5398. The Code does not contain any provision corresponding to the following, which would, however, furnish equally a good defence to a charge under this section:—

"S. 6. Where a defendant is charged with making any die, block, machine, or other instrument for the purpose of forging, or being used for forging a trade-mark, or with falsely applying to goods any trade-mark or any mark so nearly resembling a trade-mark as to be calculated to deceive, or with applying to goods any false trade-description, or causing any of the things in this section mentioned to be done, and prove—

"(a) That in the ordinary course of his business he is employed on behalf of other persons, to make dies, blocks, machines, or other instruments for making, or being used in making, trade-marks, or as the case may be, to apply marks or description to goods, and that in the case which is the subject of the charge he was so employed by some person resident in the United Kingdom, and was not interested in the goods by way of profit or commission dependent on the sale of such goods; and

"(b) That he took reasonable precaution against committing the offence charged; and

"(c) That he had at the time of the commission of the alleged offence no reason to suspect the genuineness of the trade-mark, mark, or trade-description; and

"(d) That he gave to the prosecutor all the information in his power with respect to the persons on whose behalf the trade-mark, mark, or description was applied—he shall be discharged from the prosecution, but shall be liable to pay the costs incurred by the prosecutor, unless he has given due notice to him that he will rely on the above defence."(21)

5399. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable and summons should, ordinarily, issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate, or a Magistrate of the first class. For other points of practice reference should be made to s. 482 (§§ 5367-5369).

5400. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused made or had in his possession the die, plate, or other instrument in question.

(2) That such die, etc., was for the purpose of counterfeiting a trade-mark or property-mark.

Or prove—

(1) That the accused had in his possession the trade-mark or property-mark in question.

(2) That he possessed such trade-mark or property-mark, the former for the purpose of denoting that goods bearing such mark were the manufacture or merchandise of some person, and the latter to denote that such goods belonged to him.

(3) That such goods were not the manufacture or merchandise of that person, or that they did not belong to him.

5401. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you made (or had in your possession) a certain die. Exhibit——(or plate or instrument, to wit——) for the purpose of counterfeiting the trade-mark (or property

(21) (1887) 50 and 51 Vict., c. 28 s. 5.

mark) of A B, for the purpose of denoting that certain goods, to wit—— are the manufacture (or merchandise) of the said A B whose manufacture or merchandise they are not [or (in the case of property-mark) that they belong to the said A B to whom they do not belong] and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 485 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court.)

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

5402. Possession of Counterfeiting Instrument.—The three main questions that this section raises are (a) did the accused make, or was he in possession of (b) a die, plate or other instrument for counterfeiting a trade-mark or property-mark and (c) was his possession for the purpose of counterfeiting another person's trade or property-mark. These questions however presuppose the existence of an exclusive prior right to trade or property-mark in another, the protection of which is the foundation of this offence. This is, indeed, necessarily implied in the word "counterfeiting" which, as elsewhere explained, means the imitation of a genuine thing with the object of passing off one for the other. It is, in fact, the making of a facsimile for the purpose of fraud. The question whether the die, plate or other instrument was a counterfeiting instrument, must depend upon its nature and adaptability for the purpose alleged. In this respect, the present section does not lay down any rule at variance with those enacted in other similar sections (ss. 235, 256, 472). It is also a common ingredient of those offences that the instrument must not only be a counterfeiting instrument but it must be in possession for the purpose of counterfeiting. The two concepts appear similar but are in fact materially different, for while counterfeiting instruments might be seen in any museum or old curiousity shop, the keeper of either does not necessarily keep them for the purpose of counterfeiting which is the gist of the crime.

5403. The question how this purpose is to be proved, must depend upon the existence of those circumstances from which criminal intention and knowledge is legitimately inferred. The possession of goods bearing counterfeit marks, their previous sale and the like are amongst such circumstances. So the possession of counterfeit trade labels produced from the die or plate in possession of the accused would inevitably connect one with the other and explain what might otherwise require further explanation.

Possession of a Trade-mark When Criminal.

5404. But this is not the only act the section is intended to punish; for clause 1 refers to possession of a trade-mark or property-mark for the purpose of falsely labelling goods. Here it is not necessary that the trade-mark or property-mark should be counterfeit, or that they should have been in fact used for the purpose of falsely marking goods. If they were, it will be a fact of great evidentiary value as showing the purpose for which the marks were held, but apart from their actual use, a person may be punished for merely possessing them with that object in view. It is not necessary that the possession of the accused should be traced to any fraudulent purpose, for the present is one of those offences in which law makes an act criminal apart from fraud, though it is justifiable to infer it from the unwarranted use of another person's trade-mark (§§ 5352-5353). And since the legitimate owner of a trade-mark may be guilty of misapplying it, it follows that the fact that the accused had the right to possession of the trade-mark, is not a sufficient answer to this charge, provided that the prosecutor has facts sufficient to bring the offence home to the accused. If, for instance, a person prepares labels bearing his own trade-mark to denote goods not of his make, he may be convicted under this section—for law reprobates the use of false labels, and this section punishes such a preparatory act in the interest of commerce, irrespective of the intention of the offender.

Selling goods marked with a counterfeit trade-mark or property-mark.

486. Whoever sells, or exposes, or has in possession for sale or any purpose of trade or manufacture, any goods or things with a counterfeit trade-mark or property-mark affixed to or impressed upon the same or to or upon any case, package or other receptacle in which such goods are contained shall, unless he proves— Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Non-cog. Summons. Bailable. Comp. with Court's sanction.

(a) that, having taken all reasonable precautions against committing an offence against this section, he has at the time of the commission of the alleged offence no reason to suspect the genuineness of the mark, and

(b) that on demand made by or on behalf of the prosecutor, he gave all the information in his power with respect to the persons from whom he obtained such goods or things or

(c) that otherwise he had acted innocently, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year,or with fine, or with both.

[Possession—s. 27. Counterfeit—s. 28. Trade-mark—s. 478. Property-mark—s. 479.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5405-5406).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5407-5409).
(3) Proof (5410).
(4) Possession of Goods Bearing Counterfeit Trade-mark (5411-5416).
(5) Goods with False Trade-mark Excluded (5411-5413).
(6) Possession for Trade (5414).
(7) What is Sale or Possession (5415-5417).

5405. Analogous Law.—This section may be said to constitute the abetment of the offence defined in section 482, for while the latter section punishes the user of a false trade or property-mark—who may be either the manufacturer or the wholesale importer or merchant—this section extends its penalty to those who promote the circulation or consumption of such goods, but for whose co-operation they might not secure the necessary market.

5406. It will be noted that this is once more a section in which criminality is enacted to consist in merely selling, exposing or having in possession for sale, goods apart from intention or knowledge of their bearing counterfeit trade mark. Indeed, the seller of goods impliedly warrants that the goods he is selling bear genuine trade-mark, and so it is now enacted in the Merchandise Marks Act, the provisions of which run as follows:—

Implied warranty on sale of marked goods.

S. 17. On the sale or in the contract for the sale of any goods to which a trade-mark or mark or trade-description has been applied, the sellers shall be deemed to warrant that the mark is a genuine mark and not counterfeit or falsely used, or that the trade-description is not a false trade-description within the meaning of this Act, unless the contrary is expressed in some writing signed by or on behalf of the seller and delivered at the time of the sale or contract to and accepted by the buyer."

But both this section of the Merchandise Marks Act as well as the present section create only a presumption which is rebuttable and may be rebutted by proof of his innocence.

5407. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable and summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable and compoundable with the court's permission and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate, or a Magistrate of the first or second class. For other points of practice reference should be made to section 482 (§§ 5366-5369). This offence is subject to the same limitation as that offence (§ 5367).

5408. It will be observed that this offence is complete as soon as a person is found in possession for sale or trade, any goods bearing a false trade-mark: it is not necessary that the sale should take place within the jurisdiction of the Court.[22] So if the accused has such goods in his possession, which he intends to sell elsewhere, it does not deprive the Court where he had possession, to try him for this offence. So where certain tins of ghee bearing a counterfeit trade-mark were consigned from Etawah to Rangoon and the accused was found in possession of them in Calcutta, it was held that the Magistrate there had jurisdiction to try him there, though the destination of the goods was Rangoon.[23] But, of course, in such a case, the person who sells them at Rangoon would be equally liable to be tried there, so that several Courts may have concurrent jurisdiction to try the same or several persons who offend against its provision.

5409. As the section is worded, criminality is here presumed from the mere fact of sale—apart from intention, dishonesty or fraud—it being then on the accused to establish his innocence on any of the grounds set out in clauses (a), (b) and (c) of the section.[24] Under these clauses two defences are open to the accused; the first being that furnished by clauses (a) and (b) read together, and the second being that indicated by clause (c). The first defence presupposes that the person charged believed the trade-mark in question to be a genuine trade-mark. The

---

(22) Yusif Mahamod v. Bansidhur, 25 C. 639.

(23) Ib.

(24) Holland Bombay Trading Co. v. Buktre Mull, 8 C. W. N. 421.

second defence presupposes that the person charged did not know that the trade-mark in question was the trade-mark of any firm or person.[25]

5410. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused sold, or exposed, or had in his possession for sale, or some purpose of trade or manufacture, the goods or things in question.

(2) That such goods or things bore a trade-mark or property-mark.

(3) That the said trade-mark or property-mark was counterfeit.

Defences.—The above establishes a prima facie case of culpability against the accused, who may, however, rebut the charge by proving the following:—

(a) That at the time mentioned in (2) he had no reason to suspect the genuineness of the mark; and that he had taken all reasonable precautions against receiving into possession, etc., goods bearing a counterfeit trade-mark.

(b) That a demand being made by or on behalf of the prosecutor, he gave all information as to the source of his supply.

(c) That he otherwise acted innocently—that is to say either that he did not know that the mark was the trade-mark of any other person or that the latter had ceased using it, or had in fact abandoned it, or that it was a publici juris or of common use in the trade, or that its registration misled him, or that the goods covered by the false trade-mark were distinct or indeed any other defence which negatives criminality either by showing up the defects of the prosecution (§ 5383) or establishing the absence of dishonesty and fraud.

5411. Possession of Goods Bearing Counterfeit Trademark.—

Goods with False Trade-mark Excluded.

There is a notable difference between the possession of goods bearing a false trade-mark and those in which the trade-mark used is counterfeit. The user of a false trade-mark is punishable under section 482 but the seller of goods bearing such marks is not made anywhere liable. And the reason for this is not far to seek. For while the distributing middleman against whom this section is directed, might reasonably provide against counterfeit marks, it will be setting up an impossible standard to expect him to judge as to, and decide upon the character of marks which may happen to be a colourable imitation of another with established right to priority and protection.

5412. The section then excludes all such cases, which may, however, be made the subject of redress in a civil proceeding. But while it is so, it may not always be simple to decide whether a label is false or counterfeit, for the difference between the two is merely one of degree though the term "counterfeit" presupposes a much closer imitation of the model than the term "false"; but the object of the two, is the same, namely, to deceive the public into a belief that the spurious is the real trade-mark.

(25) Ilahi Baksh, (1897) A. W. N. 99.

And as there is not and there cannot be any rigid test as to the closeness of imitation, cases are not wanting in which a false trade-mark has been treated as a "counterfeit" one entailing on the accused the penalty prescribed by this section. For instance, where the complainant (A) had been for many years importing a certain cloth bearing a certain face plate and the number "K 68," and the accused were charged with having imported similar cloth bearing a somewhat similar face plate and the number "H 68," the Court held the latter to be undoubtedly a counterfeit of the complainant's symbol "K 68" and so rendering him liable to a conviction under this section.(1)

5413. The simplest instance of counterfeit trade-mark is afforded where one forges the trade-mark of another by impressing on goods a facsimile copy of the original trade-mark. Between such imitation and that in which the two trade-marks cannot be said to be the same though they are undoubtedly similar, there is a difference. That the Code does not intend to use the concepts "counterfeit" and "false" interchangeably appears to be evident from the language used in section 480 which defines using a false trade-mark. It has been there pointed out (§ 5378) that a person affixing a trade-mark to which he is legally exclusively entitled, may be guilty of using a false trade-mark if he applies it to goods not of his manufacture. But such person could not be said to have used a counterfeit trade-mark, nor would the seller of such goods be liable under this section for selling goods bearing a false trade-mark.

This distinction appears to have been conceded by Woodroffe, J., in a case in which the facts were as follows: The prosecutor (A) had indented for a certain quantity of woollen shawls from Germany, bearing his own trade-mark, but as the consignment arrived too late, he refused to take delivery and the goods were put up to auction and purchased by B who commenced selling them without removing A's trade-mark which he was called upon to do. A prosecuted him both under sections 482 and 486, and he was convicted by the Magistrate, but on revision the conviction was set aside under both the sections as on the facts proved, the goods could not have been held to bear a false or counterfeit trade-mark,(2) because the trade-mark had been put on the shawls with A's permission and it could not be said that in declining to deface the shawls by removing A's labels, there was any deception. The case was indeed the same as if A had himself sold his consignment to B and the latter had then sold them to the public.

5414. The section punishes one for being in possession of goods bearing a counterfeit trade-mark. Such possession implies consciousness of the spurious character of the trade-mark which it is the business of the tradesman to guard against. The section has, of course, no application to persons who are in possession of such goods for purposes other than that of trade or manufacture. Common carriers, wharfingers and purchasers of such goods may, for instance, be in possession of them, but they cannot be prosecuted because their possession may be in the course of, but not for the purpose of, trade.

Possession for Trade.

---

(1) Hargobind v. Ralli Brothers, Dass, 32 C. 969; Shyou Sheman & Co. (1902) P. R. 35. v. Solaman, 4 R. 16.

(2) Motilal Premsuk v. Kanhai Lal

These words are intended to restrict the prohibition only to persons who are dealers or sellers of such goods, who are therefore directly responsible for their distribution.

What is Sale or Possession ?

5415. But persons may deal in such goods and yet be not in possession of them. Such are, for instance, commission agents and intermediaries between the manufacturer and the importer who bring about the sale of goods, but who could not be deemed to sell them within the meaning of this section. Nor, indeed, does the mere fact that the goods have been consigned to them for delivery to the purchaser amount to their possession so as to make them liable under this section. Such possession must be evidently actual and not merely symbolical or constructive. Consequently, where the goods were seized on the way, at the instance of the complainant before they could ever reach the accused's place of business, much less pass into his possession, it was held that the accused could not be convicted under this section though the goods were shown to bear counterfeit trade-mark.(3)

5416. The question of possession may present some difficulty in the case of a firm of several partners some of whom are dormant. It has been held in the Punjab that where goods were found in the possession of a firm as against the individual possession of any of its members, and where there was very little credible evidence to show that any particular member of the firm took a special or peculiar share in the transaction, the members should not have been convicted individually, but that they ought to have been charged and convicted as a firm.(4) But this view suggests difficulties, if it is intended to extend liability to one who is merely in constructive possession of such goods.

5417. The position of a person selling goods with a false property-mark is the same, and since books have been held to fall into the category of "goods," it follows that book-seller importing and offering for sale the pirated edition of a book would be held punishable under this section.(5)

Making a false mark upon any receptacle containing goods.

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Non-cog. Summons. Bailable. Not comp.

487. Whoever makes any false mark upon any case, package or other receptacle containing goods, in a manner reasonably calculated to cause any public servant or any other person to believe that such receptacle contains goods which it does not contain or that it does not contain goods which it does contain, or that the goods contained in such receptacle are of a nature or quality different from the real nature or quality thereof, shall, unless he proves that he acted without intent to defraud, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years or with fine, or with both.

[Person—s. 11. Public servant—s. 21 Intent to defraud—s. 25. Trade-mark—s. 478.]

(3) Hargobind v. Greaves, Cotton & Co., (1902) P. R. No. 32.

(4) Hargobind v. Ralli Brothers, (1902) P. R. No. 35.

(5) Kanai Das v. Radha Shyam, 26 C. 232.

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5418).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5419).
(3) Proof (5420).
(4) Form of Charge (5421).
(5) Principle (5422).
(6) Falsely Marking Goods (5423-5425).
(7) Defence No Intent to Defraud (5426).

5418. Analogous Law.—This section is somewhat general and would include many cases of offences otherwise punishable, as for instance, under section 482. The primary object of the section is however different, being to punish persons who smuggle contraband goods without payment of duty by deceiving custom officers by means of a false and misleading trade-mark. So the importation of dutiable goods into a country by evading payment, by falsely labelling them as goods admitted duty free, would be punishable under this section, while one who makes use of such goods would be liable under the provisions of the next section.

5419. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable and summons should, ordinarily, issue in the first instance It is bailable but not compoundable and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate, or a Magistrate of the first or second class. For other points of practice, see s. 482. (§§ 5366-5369).

5420. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused made some mark upon some case, package or other receptacle containing goods.

(2) That such mark was a false mark.

(3) That he did so in a manner reasonably calculated to deceive a public servant or other person into a belief—

(a) That such receptacle contained goods which it did not contain; or

(b) that it did not contain goods which it did contain; or

(c) that the goods contained in such receptacle were of a nature or quality different from the real nature or quality thereof.

Against which the accused may prove in defence:—

(1) That he had acted without intent to defraud (§§ 5383-5385).

5421. Charge.—The charge under this section or section 488 should run thus:

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you made (or made use of) a false mark, to wit——upon a case, to wit——(or package or other receptacle containing goods) in a manner reasonably calculated to cause a public servant, to wit——(or any other person, to wit——), to believe that such case contains goods, to wit——which it does not contain [or that it does not contain goods which it does contain (or that the goods contained in such receptacle are of a nature or quality different from the real nature or quality thereof)], and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 487 [or section 488] of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

5422. Principle.—This section is much wider in its terms than section 482 or 486, and punishes the false marking of a case or package for the purpose of deception; such mark may or may not be a trade or property mark, and, of course, it need not be registered or protected. The criminal intent underlying the act is furnished by the mark being made in a manner reasonably calculated to deceive. The marker may be frustrated in his calculation, but it must have been his intention manifested by the nature of the mark and the purpose for which it was made. There is no necessity of proving such intention, but it is presumed from the mark and the manner of using it.

5423. Falsely marking Goods.—Since a "false mark" is wider than a false trade or property-mark and causing an erroneous belief in any person other than a public servant is wider than persons contemplated in sections 480 and 481, it follows that this section might, unless reasonably construed, become a legal purgatory for an act which could not be punished as falling under any of the preceding sections. The section is, of course, intended to meet cases of false marks on packages put on to evade duty. For instance, tea, tobacco and spirits are subject to heavy duty in England. If, therefore, a person were to pack these in cases and mark them as "corn flour" or other article admitted duty-free or subject to smaller duty, he would be clearly punishable under this section. So if an Indian trader were to export rifles beyond the frontier in cases marked "Assam Tea, Orange Pekœ," or say, "Purest Mocha Coffee," he should be held similarly liable. So again, a person may smuggle into British India contraband goods, such as opium, marking the packages as something else, in which case the person, if in British India, might be punished either under this section or the next according to circumstances.

5424. These are obvious instances of the working of this rule. But they do not exhaust the various modes in which such fraud might be perpetrated. For example, this section is powerless to deal with the case of a person who packs tobacco in an old tea tin, bearing the tea dealer's original trade-mark, in which case the offence would be punishable under section 482, though his object was to evade the payment of duty for which this section makes special provision.

5425. Again, the section does not define a "false mark," but it is manifestly intended to denote a mark descriptive of the goods placed on the case or package enclosing them. Such mark must then be both visible as well as misleading, and from its position, nature and design it must be reasonably calculated to deceive. The fact that some one was in fact deceived, may be some evidence of such intention (§§ 5354-5355), but it is neither conclusive nor sufficient (§§ 5380-5381). On the other hand it is not necessary that some one should have been in fact deceived—for the likelihood of deception is all that is necessary, though such likelihood must be reasonable—that is to say, it must be both natural and probable under the circumstances of the case (§§ 5380-5381).

Defence—No Intent to Defraud.

5426. The section presumes fraud from the falsity of the mark and the manner of using it (§ 5422). But such presumption is rebuttable, and the accused is permitted to rebut it by showing that there was in fact absent from his mind the intention to defraud, which law presumed from the circumstances of his case. Innocence may be thus established by shewing that the accused did not know of the contents of the package—as, where he had been merely accommodating another by carrying it for him, or that the mark was not false, or that it was of itself insufficient to deceive (§§ 5382-5383).

Punishment for making use of any such false mark.

488. Whoever makes use of any such false mark in any manner prohibited by the last foregoing section shall, unless he proves that he acted without intent to defraud, be punished, as if he had committed an offence against that section.

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5427).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5428).
(3) Proof (5429).
(4) Charge (5430).
(5) Making use of a False mark (5431).

5427. Analogous Law.—The last section punishes the making of a false mark upon any case, package or other receptacle containing goods—while this section punishes the making use of any such false mark, provided that it was used "in a manner reasonably calculated to cause any public servant or any other person to believe that such receptacle contains goods which it does not contain, or that it does not contain goods which it does contain, or that the goods contained in such receptacle are of a nature or quality different from the real nature or quality thereof." The difference between the two sections then turns upon the fact that while the last section punishes for falsely marking the case, etc., this section punishes for making use of goods so marked (§ 5431).

5428. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable and summons should, ordinarily, issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class. For other points of practice reference should be made to the commentary under section 482.

5429. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused made use of some mark upon some case, package or receptacle containing goods.

(2) and (3) as in s. 486.

5430. Charge.—See form under section 487 (§ 5421).

5431. Making Use of a False Mark.—The concept "makes use" in this section is in its sense somewhat different to "uses" which occurs in s. 482. It is rather intended to mean putting into such use as to be advantageous to the user. Such use must be made in a manner reasonably calculated to deceive a public servant or any other person into a belief that the goods correspond to the mark and so to act upon that belief. It may be that a person both falsely marks the goods and then makes use of it, in which case his offence would be punishable either under section 487 or this section, but not both, for the marking would then be regarded as subservient to its user.

For further commentary, see s. 487 (§§ 5422-5426).

Tampering with property-mark with intent to cause injury.

489. Whoever removes, destroys, defaces or adds to any property-mark, intending or knowing it to be likely that he may thereby cause injury to any person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Non-cog. Summons. Bailable. Not comp.

[Person—s. 11. Injury—s. 44. Property-mark—s. 479.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5432).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5433).
(3) Proof (5434).
(4) Form of Charge (5435).
(5) Tampering with Property-mark (5436).

5432. Analogous Law.—This section is confined to tampering with only a "property-mark." It has no application to a case of tampering with a trade-mark. And the reason for this is clear. For the obliteration of a trade-mark can profit no one, unless it was made out of mischief or with intent to substitute another trade-mark in which case it will be punishable as such. This secton is evidently intended, to cover cases in which a property-mark, say, a broad arrow on some Government property is removed to facilitate its misappropriation.

5433. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable and sommons should, ordinarily, issue, in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first or second class. For other points of practice reference should be made to section 482 (§§ 5366-5369).

5434. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the mark in question was a property-mark.

(2) That the accused altered, defaced, destroyed or removed it.

(3) That he did so intending or knowing it to be likely that he may thereby cause injury to any person.

5435. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you removed (or destroyed, defaced or added) to a property-mark, to wit——(describe it), intending (or knowing it to be likely), that you may thereby cause injury to A B, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 489 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

"And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge."

5436. Tampering with Property-mark.—This is the only section under the present group expressly requiring proof of criminal intention or knowledge on the part of the accused. This was obviously necessary in view of the fact that an alteration or removal of a property mark may be as much innocent as done for some ulterior criminal purpose. In such a case the privity of the offender is punishable as the act having been done with intent to cause injury though the injury intended by the offender may be different to that intended by another at whose instance he had removed or defaced the property-mark. A person who steals a gentleman's cutlery or clothes marked with his crest, monogram or initials, may remove the tell-tale marks himself or take them to a Smith for their removal. In the former case his later act would merge in the former offence of theft, but in the latter case the Smith would at least be guilty of this offence if he knew that the property was the proceeds of theft.

Of Currency-Notes and Bank-Notes.

5437. Topical introduction.—These four sections have been added to the Code by the Currency Notes Forgery Act, 1899[6] in order to make better provision for the protection of currency and bank-notes against forgery. The present Code, as orginally enacted, contained no reference to offences relating to paper currency, as no such currency was then in existence in this country. Consequently, offences which would now be punishable under these sections, were formerly dealt with under the general provisions applying to the forgery of valuable securities, section 467 being held to apply for forging a currency-note, section 471, for uttering such notes, and section 472 for being in possession of counterfeit plates. The provisions of section 467 afforded sufficient means dealing both with forgery generally and with forgery of currency-notes. But it was at times difficult to secure a conviction under the other sections. These sections are, therefore, intended to fill in the gap which those sections left in the general law in their applicability to paper currency.

5438. In England, such provisions have existed since the passing of the Forgery Act, 1861,[7] which punished with penal servitude for life "whoever shall forge, or alter, or shall offer, utter, dispose of, or put off knowing the same to be forged or altered" any note of a bank or banker.

---

(6) Act XII of 1899, s. 2.

(7) 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, s. 12, re-enacting 1 Will. IV, c. 66, s. 3: 16 & 17 Vict., c. 23, s. 41; but the Act of 1861 enlarged its terms by extending the penalty to the notes of not only the Banks of England and Ireland as the previous Statutes had done, but also to the notes of other bankers,

As compared to this section the provision made in these sections is far-reaching.

Counterfeiting currency notes or bank-notes.

489-A. Whoever counterfeits or knowingly performs any part of the process of counterfeiting any currency-note, or bank-note shall be punished with transportation for life or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years and shall also be liable to fine. Session. Cognizable. Warrant. Not bail. Not comp.

Explanation.—For the purposes of this section and of sections 489-B, 489-C and 489-D, the expression "bank-note" means promissory note or engagement for the payment of money to bearer on demand issued by any person carrying on the business of banking in any part of the world, or issued by or under the authority of any State or Sovereign Power and intended to be used as equivalent to, or as a substitute for, money.

[Counterfeiting—s. 28.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5439).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5440).
(3) Proof (5441).
(4) Charge (5442).
(5) Meaning of Words (5443).
(6) Principle (5444).
(7) Counterfeiting of Currency and Bank-notes (5445).

5439. Analogous Law.—The counterfeiting of a note is forgery, and the offence might just as well be punished as such, as indeed, it used to be before the passing of the Currency Notes Forgery Act, 1899. But it will now be wrong to resort to that general section when the Code contains a special provision applicable to such offence. The section is in its wording closely analogous to sections 231 and 255, which relate to the same offence relating to coin and stamps respectively.

5440. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable and warrant should, ordinarily, issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and exclusively triable by the Court of Session.

5441. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That accused "counterfeited" or performed any part of the process of counterfeiting.

(2) That what was counterfeited or attempted to be counterfeited was a currency-note or bank-note.

5442. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That you on or about the——day of——at——counterfeited (or knowingly performed a part of the process of counterfeiting, to wit——) a currency-note (or a bank-note) of the value of—rupees, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 489-A of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

"And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge."

5443. Meaning of words.—"Performs any part of the process of counterfeiting," i.e., such process as may result in counterfeiting. It excludes a mere act of deception.(8)

5444. Principle.—The Code enacts three sections having the same purpose in view—sections 231, 255, and the present section: of these three sections this section and section 231 (and its derivative s. 232) are intended to protect the currency of the country from debasement, while section 255 which relates to the counterfeiting of a government stamp is intended to protect one source of the public revenue. The act punishable in each case, however, is the counterfeiting or knowingly performing any part of the process of counterfeiting—a phrase which excludes a mere preparation, but includes an attempt at counterfeiting. The Explanation extends the protection of the section to all bank-notes, whether Indian or foreign, and this was necessary, because such notes being payable to bearer on demand take the place of current coin, and as such may be exchanged for money in all countries and which justifies their protection against forgery whatever may be their origin. The offence is thus an international one, for all countries are agreed in hunting down the note-forger.

5445. Counterfeiting of Currency and Bank-notes.—In England all currency-notes are issued by the Banks of England and Ireland. All currency-notes there are, therefore, bank-notes there being no such thing as currency-note, as distinct from a bank-note. But in this respect the rule is just the reverse in this country. For here no bank is empowered to issue currency-notes which are issued only by the Mint under the Currency Departments of the Government of India and the principal Local Governments. The only bank-notes in existence in this country are then what are more appropriately called promissory notes. But in order to merit the protection of this section such notes must be payable to bearer and on demand. It does not matter by what name the instrument is called—if it is negotiable—it comes within the mischief the section is intended to provide against.

A Hundi or a cheque payable to bearer on demand is, thus, a bank-note for the present purpose. Such note must, however, be issued by a banker, for it is only such notes that obtain a wide circulation and are exposed to danger of being counterfeited that call for the special protection here given. The term "counterfeiting" is a concept sufficiently defined and explained elsewhere (§ 282). But the phrase "performs any part of the process of counterfeiting" requires a word by way of explanation. It is, no doubt, used here in the same sense as elsewhere (ss. 231, 255). But it is just as well to add that the process here spoken of must be a process which must be necessary for counterfeiting. Suppose, for instance, a trickster intending to cheat another of his money, were to persuade him to part with it in return for notes which he professed to make and to convince whom of his competency he takes a piece of paper and by a crude contrivance produces an impression of a note thereupon, could he be said to perform any part of the process of counterfeiting? It is apprehended not, because the process performed was just sufficient to cheat, but no part of it was necessary for the forgery.(9)

(8) Meerza 10 Bur. L. T. 255, 38 I. O. 746, 18 Cr. L. J. 362.

For further commentary, see ss. 231. 255 and 463.

Using as genuine forged or counterfeit currency notes or bank-notes.

489-B. Whoever sells to, or buys or receives from, any other person, or otherwise traffics in or uses as genuine, any forged or counterfeit currency note or bank-note, knowing or having reason to believe the same to be forged or counterfeit, shall be punished with transportation for life, or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years and shall also be liable to fine.

Session. Cognizable. Warrant. Non-bail. Not comp.

[Person—s. 11. Reason to believe—s. 26 Counterfeit—s. 28 Bank note—s. 489-A, Expl.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5446).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5447).
(3) Proof (5448).
(4) Form of Charge (5449).
(5) Trafficking in Forged Notes (5450-5451).
(6) "Sells, receives, traffics in" (5451).

5446. Analogous Law.—This section prohibits trafficking in forged notes. Similar offence relating to coins is punishable under sections 239-241, and that relating to stamps under s. 258, but the language used in this section is somewhat different, though the sense is in each case the same.

5447. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session.

5448. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the note in question was forged or couterfeited.

(2) That the accused sold to, or bought or received from some person or trafficked in or issued as genuine such note.

(3) That when he did so he knew or had reason to believe note to be forged or counterfeited.

5449. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

(9) Meerza, 10 Bur. L. T. 255, 38 I. C. 746, 18 Cr. L. J. 362.

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you sold to A B [or bought from A B or trafficked in (specify it)] a forged (or counterfeit) currency note, to wit——(or bank note), knowing (or having reason to believe), the same to be forged (or counterfeit) and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 489-B of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge."

5450. Trafficking in Forged Notes.—This offence is intended to stop the circulation of forged notes by punishing those who deal in them, "knowing or having reason to believe" them to be forged. This phrase has been the subject of a previous discussion (§§ 339-342), and it must be understood here in the same as used there. It does not cast on the accused the necessity of shewing that he did not know that the note was forged, but places the onus on the prosecution who must establish that there was sufficient cause to believe that the note was forged, and whereupon the onus shifts on to the accused. Such cause may be furnished by the crudeness of the forgery, so that he who runs can see that the note is forged and not genuine. But this pre-supposes knowledge of the details of the original which may be presumed in one constantly required to handle such notes, but it may not be right to presume it in the case of a rustic who was probably a stranger to paper currency. Even in the case of the former, the strength of the presumption would vary according to the origin of the note. If, for instance, it is of the currency of the country the presumption would be as natural as it would be strong, but it would diminish as the note was of a foreign country or bank, so that if such note rarely happens to be the medium of exchange in this country, the accused could not be expected to discriminate between the original and the counterfeit.

"Sells, Receives, Traffics."

5451. Next, the transactions reprobated are sale, purchase, receipt and trafficking in such notes. Consequently, if a forger makes the present of a forged note to another, the former could not be punished nor the latter, unless he received it with at least reasonable belief in its forgery. But he who sells a forged note profits by it if he sells it with the same knowledge or belief; for whether he had acquired it for value or for nothing, he knew it to be forged and his selling it as true amounts to cheating by false visual representation which is the gist of the offence of forgery. The counterpart sale is purchase and a person who purchases such a note with the same knowledge or belief must of necessity do it for the purpose of putting it in circulation. Such a person is held liable whether he purchases it for value or "receives" it otherwise, since his object is in each case presumed to be the same.

A necessary exception to the rule is furnished by a detective purchasing or receiving such note from the forger or his accomplice with a view to bring him to justice. His case may, however, be said to be covered by the general exceptions,[10] but which would not save a mere collector of curios, though justice would not be overstrained if he is not classed as a receiver within the meaning of this section.[11] It is really intended to punish those who make and those who knowingly circulate forged notes. Consequently, persons who traffic in them are punishable here though it may be difficult to bring home to them any individual instance of the purchase or sale of such notes. The phrase "traffic in" implies dealing in a commodity as a matter of trade, so that a trafficker in such notes is a trader in them, whether his trade consists in importing or exporting such notes or of exchanging or selling them. The phrase has been used in the same sense in s. 371 (§ 3935). The seller of forged notes is punishable under this section even though the sale be to the buyer apprised of their forgery. The offence is directed against traffic in false notes and all that is necessary is that the accused must know of their falsity and so knowing use them.[12]

Possession of forged or counterfeit currency notes or bank notes.

489-C. Whoever has in his possession any forged or counterfeit currency-note or bank-note knowing or having reason to believe the same to be forged or counterfeit and intending to use the same as genuine or that it may be used as genuine shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years or with fine, or with both.

Session. Cognizable. Warrant. Bailable. Not comp.

[Reason to believe—s. 26. Possession—s. 27. Counterfeit—s. 28.] Forged—s. 463.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5452).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5453).
(3) Proof (5454).
(4) Form of Charge (5455).
(5) Criminal Possession of Forged Notes (5456).

5452. Analogous Law.—This section carries criminality as regards forged notes a step further by punishing their possession when it is accompanied by an intention to use them as genuine. In this respect this section is analogous to sections 242 and 243 relating to coins and s. 259 relating to stamps.

5453. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable and warrant should, ordinarily, issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session.

(10) S. 79.
(11) This is the necessary effect of the next section which punishes possession of such notes only when the possessor intends to use them as genuine.
(12) Bhika Ram, 7 L. 80.

5454. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the note in question was forged or counterfeited.

(2) That the accused was in possession of it.

(3) That at the time of his possession he knew it to be forged or had reason to believe it to be so.

(4) That he intended to use it as genuine. or that it might be used as genuine.

5455.—Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the- day of——at——you had in your possession a forged (or counterfeit)currency note(or bank note), to wit- knowing (or having reason to believe) the same to be forged (or counterfeit) and intending to use the same as genuine or that it may be used as genuine, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 489-C of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge."

5456. Criminal Possession of Forged Notes.—The term "possession" as used in criminal law bears a sense at variance from its sense in civil law. But its meaning here as elsewhere in the Code is the same. As elsewhere observed, possession implies exclusive control, and such control must then be established over the notes which must of course, be forged or counterfeited. But though a note may be forged and its possession traced to the accused, the two other essential elements which make that possession criminal are knowledge or reasonable belief that the note was forged, and its possession with the intention of foisting it on the public. Such intention, relating as it does to a future conduct could only be proved by collateral circumstances, such as that the accused had palmed off such notes before, or that he was in possession of such and similar notes in such large numbers that his possession for any other purpose is inexplicable.

The subject has been already discussed before in connection with similar offences relating to coins and stamps (§§ 2511-2583), to which, reference should be made for further information, if necessary.

Session. Cognizable. Warrant. Not bail. Not comp.

Making or possessing instrument or materials for forging or counterfeiting currency notes or bank notes.

489-D. Whoever makes, or performs any part of the process of making, or buys or sells or disposes of, or has in his possession any machinery, instrument or material for the purpose of being used, or knowing or having reason to believe that it is intended to be used for forging or counterfeiting any currency-note or bank-note, shall be punished with transportation for life, or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[Reason to believe—s, 26. Counterfeiting—s. 28 Forging—s. 463.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5457).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5458).
(3) Proof (5459).
(4) Form of Charge (5460).
(5) Making and Sale of Forging Instruments (5461).

5457. Analogous Law.—This offence is the same as is made punishable under sections 233 and 234, relating to coins, 256 and 257 relating to stamps, and section 485 relating to trade-marks. It should, moreover, be compared with section 489-A, which is intended to arrest a similar act directed to forging a note. These sections then prohibit preparatory acts from three stages:—

First, by punishing the making or attempting to make a counterfeiting instrument (ss. 233, 234, 257, 289-D).

Secondly, by punishing the purchase or sale of such an instrument (ib.)

Thirdly, by punishing for being in possession of it (ib.).

Other sections, similarly, punish other more progressive acts such as making use of such instrument for the purpose of counterfeiting and performing any part of the process of counterfeiting or the like.

It will be thus seen that in matters relating to currency and stamps the penal provisions of the Code have been pushed to the extreme verge beyond which it is impossible to extend them. But since such remote acts must be proved to have been done with the knowledge or belief that they are subservient to a contemplated forgery, there is not any undue extension of the doctrine of criminal liability—though as the act is further remote from the objective the connecting links between the two must be necessarily continuous and strong.

5458. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is cognizable and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session.

5459. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the thing in question was a machinery, instrument or material, necessary for or used in forging or counterfeiting a currency note or bank note.

(2) That the accused—

(a) made it, or

(b) performed any part of the process of making it, or

(c) bought it, or

(d) sold it, or

(e) disposed of it, or

(f) had it in his possession.

(3) That the accused knew or had reason to believe that it was intended to be used for forging or counterfeiting any currency or bank note.

5460. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you made (or performed any part of the process of making, or bought or sold or disposed of, or had in your possession) an instrument (or material), to wit——for the purpose of being used (or knowing or having reason to believe that it is intended to be used) for forging (or counterfeiting) a currency note, to wit——(or a bank note, to wit——) and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 489-D of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge."

5461. Making and Sale of Forging Instruments.—As has been observed before (§§ 5275-5282), this section does not penalize the making and selling of a machinery, instrument or material, which may be used for forgery or counterfeiting, but only penalizes it when the accused makes or sells it knowing or having reason to believe that it is intended to be so used, the burden of proving which is on the prosecution.[13] The reason for this qualification is obvious, for machineries and instruments in ordinary use, such as printing presses and copying machines may be used for forgery, but their manufacture and sale could not be punished unless the maker or vendor makes or sells them on purpose so that they may be used for forgery, in which case; his knowledge of the criminal purpose renders his act one of abetment for which this section prescribes a special penalty.

The question whether the machinery or instruments in respect of which the charge is made is adapted for the purpose of counterfeiting, is a question of fact which is the duty of the prosecution to prove, if necessary, by expert evidence. The evidence must shew that the instruments are such as will produce spurious notes as may in circulation ordinarily impose upon the word. It is not necessary that the resemblance is perfect, but it must be sufficient to deceive people of ordinary intelligence who are familiar with currency notes.[14] "There may of course, be cases, where though the ultimate object of the possessor may clearly be counterfeiting, the particular articles found are of such rude or imperfect nature as to indicate unmistakeably that the work was only in an experimental stage, and that they could not be intended for utilization in the preparations of finished counterfeit.[15] Where therefore the accused was found to have collected materials and was acquiring knowledge for the purpose of counterfeiting notes, but the instruments he had collected were incapable of making even passable notes, he was convicted of this offence but on appeal to a Bench of the High Court the two Judges differed, and the case being laid before a third Judge he was acquitted. Of course, it is not necessary that for the purpose of this section the accused must be shown to be in possession of a complete outfit for counterfeiting. All that is necessary is that the instruments found must be a part of that outfit.

(13) Abdul Rahman, 21 M. L. J. 766, 11 I. C. 241, 12 Cr. L. J. 377. (14) Ib.

For further commentary, see s. 234 et seq.

(15) Abdul Rahman, 21 M. L. J. 766, 11 I. C. 241, 12 Cr. L. J. 377; following Tirumala, 1 Weir 219.

CHAPTER XIX.[16]

OF THE CRIMINAL BREACH OF CONTRACT OF SERVICE.

5462. Topical Introduction.—These exceptional provisions of the Indian Penal Code have no prototype in the criminal law of Europe. They were, however dictated by considerations which gave rise to a special enactment called the Workman's Breach of Contract Act, 1859,[17] the provisions of which were somewhat more general than of the three following sections, the enactment of which was thus justified by the authors of the Code:

"We agree with the great body of jurists in thinking that, in general, a mere breach of contract ought not to be an offence, but only to be the subject of a civil action.

"To this general rule there are, however, some exceptions. Some breaches of the contract are very likely to cause evil such as no damages, or only very high damages can repair, and are also very likely to be committed by persons from whom it is exceedingly improbable that any damage can be obtained. Such breaches of contract are, we conceive, proper subjects for penal legislation.

"In England it would be unnecessary to provide a punishment for a stage-coachman who should however maliciously or dishonestly, drive on leaving behind a passenger whom he is bound to carry. The evil inflicted is seldom very serious; the country is everywhere well inhabited; the roads are secure. The means of conveyance can easily be obtained, and damages sufficient to compensate for any inconvenience or expense which may have been suffered, can easily be recovered from the coach proprietors. But the mode of performing journeys and the state of society in this country are widely different. It is often necessary for travellers of the upper classes, even for English ladies, ignorant perhaps of the native languages, and with young children at their breasts, to perform journeys of many miles over uninhabited wastes, and through jungles in which it is dangerous to linger for a moment, in palanquins borne by persons of the lowest class. If as sometimes happens, these persons should, in a solitary place, set down the palanquin and run away, it is difficult to conceive a more distressing situation than that in which their employer would be left. None but very high damages would be any reparation for such a wrong. But the class of people by whom alone such a wrong is at all likely to be committed can pay no damages. The whole property of all the delinquents would probably not cover the expense of prosecuting them civilly. It, therefore, appears to us that breaches of contract of this description may, with strict propriety, be treated as crimes.

(16) Sections 490 and 492 have been repealed with effect from 1st April 1926.

(17) Act XIII of 1859 (Repealed by Act III of 1925).

"The law which we have framed on this subject applies, it will be perceived, only to cases in which the contract with the bearers is lawful. The traveller, therefore, who resorts to the highly culpable, though we fear, too common practice of unlawfully compelling persons against their will to carry his palanquin or his baggage will not be protected by it. If they quit him, it is what they have a legal right to do, nor will they be punishable, whatever may be the consequence of their desertion.

"Another species of contract which ought, we conceive, to be guarded by a penal sanction is that by which seamen are bound to their employers. The insubordination of seamen during a voyage often produces fatal consequences. Their desertion in port may cause evils such as very large damages for which it would not be worth while to sue. If ship in the Hugli, at a critical time of the year, is compelled by the desertion of some of the crew to put off its voyage for a fortnight, it would be mere mockery to tell the owners that they may sue the runaways for damages in the Supreme Court. We also think that the persons who contract to take care of infants, of the sick and of the helpless, lay themselves under an obligation of a very peculiar kind and may with propriety be punished if they omit to discharge their duty. The misery and distress which their neglect may cause is such as the largest pecuniary payment would not repair; they generally come from the lower ranks of life, and would be unable to pay anything. We therefore propose to add to this class of contracts the sanction of the penal law."

"Here we are inclined to stop. We have, indeed, been urged to go further, and to punish as a criminal every menial servant who, before the expiration of the term for which he is hired, quits his employer. But it does not appear to us that in the existing state of the market for that description of labour in India, good masters are in much danger of being voluntarily deserted by their menial servants, or that the loss or inconvenience occasioned by the sudden departure of a cook, a groom, a hur karu or a khidmutgar, would often be of a very serious description. We are generally apprehensive that by making these petty breaches of contracts offences, we should give not protection to good masters, but means of oppression to bad ones."[18]

Repeal of Sections 490, 492.

5463. Sections 490 and 492 have since been repealed by the Workmen's Breach of Contract (Repealing) Act, 1925 with effect from 1st April 1926.[19] A Bill[20] to repeal them was introduced by the Home Member in the Legislative Assembly on the 15th September 1924, when he justified it on the following grounds: "An enactment of this kind has been considered for some time to be out of place in the general law of the country, although it is possible that it may be wanted in some out the way places. And if that be the case, it should be provided for by the local legislatures and not by the general law. The reason why the repeal is not being effected at once and is going

(18) Note P. Reprint, pp. 170, 171.
(19) See s. 2, Act III of 1925.
(20) Bill No. 29 of 1924, published in the Gazette of India, Pt. V, dated 20th September 1924, p. 139.

to be effected on the 1st April 1926, is that notice must be given in order that the local legislatures may have time to enact anything that may be necessary and also employers and employees may have time to consider their own position when the law is gone."[21]

490. [Repealed by the Workmen's Breach of Contract (Repealing) Act.][22]

Pres. Mag or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. (S.198 or P. C.) Non-cog. Summons. Bailable. Comp. Summary.

Breach of contract to attend on and supply wants of helpless person.

491. Whoever, being bound by a lawful contract to attend on or to supply the wants of any person who, by reason of youth, or of unsoundness of mind, or of a disease or bodily weakness, is helpless or incapable of providing for his own safety or of supplying his own wants, voluntarily omits so to do, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees, or with both.

[Voluntary—s. 39.]

(1) Analogous Law (5464-5465).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5466).
(3) Deserting a Helpless Person (5467-5469).
(4) Desertion must be Voluntary (5468).
(5) Curators, Hospital Servants excluded (5469).

5464. Analogous Law.—This section remains as it was originally drawn as clause 465, but the scope of which the Law Commissioners proposed to extend in the following words: "We are not prepared to punish as a criminal every menial servant who quits his employer, without a certain notice upon the expiration of the term for which he is hired under ordinary circumstances. But we conceive that this clause may be improved in one respect. It seems, as it stands, not to be applicable to any but those servants who have contracted specially to attend upon the sick, insane, etc., but we think it should be made to apply to servants who are, or ought to be in attendance upon a sick or insane master, though they may have only contracted with him in the ordinary way, while he was of sound body and mind, and to servants whether engaged specifically for the purpose or not, who by the lawful command of their employers have been ordered to take care of young children and have not objected to do so."[23] But this would have surely carried the doctrine of criminality to the region of altruism, which, outside Utopia, would not be held to constitute even an actionable wrong much less a crime. The Legislature, of course, could not introduce such a dangerous innovation, and the section was consequently passed unamended as suggested.

---

(21) 4 Debates, dated 15th September 1924, pp. 3424, 3425.
(22) S. 2, Act III of 1925.
(23) 2nd Rep., § 329.

5465. These provisions must be regarded as supplementary to section 1 of the Workman's Criminal Breach of Contract Act, under which any artificer, workman or labourer receiving an advance from his employer for doing any work, is liable to be convicted and sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for the maximum period of three months, unless he had lawful or reasonable excuse for not performing the work.[24] This Act is, however, in the first instance only applicable to the presidency towns, though the local Government have power to extend its operation to other territories within their jurisdiction.[25]

5466. Procedure and Proof.—No Court can take cognizance of this offence except upon a complaint made by some person aggrieved by such offence.[1] It is, therefore, non-cognizable and summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both bailable and compoundable, and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate, or a Magistrate of the first or second class, and may be tried summarily.

The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused entered into a contract to attend on, or supply the wants of a person.

(2) That such contract was legal.

(3) That such person was then helpless or incapable of providing for his own safety or of supplying his own wants.

(4) That such helplessness or incapacity arose from—

(a) youth; or

(b) unsoundness of mind; or

(c) disease; or

(d) bodily weakness.

(5) That accused omitted to attend on such person, or to supply his wants.

(6) That he did so voluntarily.

5467. Deserting a Helpless Person.—This section has no reference to a traveller, but refers to one who is helpless or incapable of taking care of himself, to look after whom the accused was employed, and who after accepting the engagement deserts the person "voluntarily." The servant liable under this section must, again, be not a general servant, but one who is specially retained for the supervision of the helpless person. Such an engagement may be made with a general domestic servant, but for such an engagement his general duties do not make him amenable to this section. The accused was employed by the prosecutor, as his ordinary cook. One day while the former's wife was seriously ill, the cook absented himself, whereupon he was prosecuted had pleaded guilty, holding that the prosecutor had not proved that the accused was under any special agreement to look after the meals of the prosecutor's wife during her illness.(2) But this finding was reduced to an obiter in view of the finding that the accused had lawful excuse for leaving as his own child was ill and though he absented himself in the morning he sent in a substitute in the evening and in the meantime other cooks were easily available.

(24) Act XIII of 1859, s. 112.
(25) Ib., s. 5.

(1) S. 198, Cr. P. C.

All the same it is evident that a cook—or for that matter any general servant—is under no legal obligation to attend on his sick or insane employer unless he was specially retained for the purpose or consents to the change of duties. It may be a question whether infants' wet and dry nurses, who are specially retained to supply their wants, would fall within this section for absenting themselves from duty without excuse, as where they leave with the object of coercing their employer to increase their wages, or otherwise submit to their terms. It is submitted that the section is wide enough to punish such recalcitration. The fact that the attendant was not in sole charge of the disabled person does not, of course, matter, though it will, probably, be admitted in mitigation of the sentence. The words "who is helpless or incapable of providing for his own safety or of supplying his own wants" must then be read to define the extent of helplessness or incapacity, and not the result of the servant's desertion, which is punishable independently of the result upon the helpless or incapacited person.

Desertion must be Voluntary.

5468. But the servant's desertion must have been "voluntary." Indeed, desertion is by no means necessary—for the offence would be complete, if the servant being employed to attend on or to supply the want of a person, voluntarily omits to attend on him or to supply his wants, though he may not actually withdraw himself from the service of his employer. The term "voluntarily" has been defined in section 39 (§§ 339-342), and as the term is understood in the Code, it means a wilful omission to attend on the person. Such wilfulness may arise from any cause. But it must arise from something more than mere carelessness or negligence. It must be an omission of which the accused is conscious, though he may not advert to the consequence. Such a case may be supposed of a thievish attendant who starves his insane employer, feeding himself on his master's victuals, or one who being required to keep watch by a sick bed leaves the room and goes off to sleep elsewhere. The omission must be voluntary, but its duration is not stated. Consequently, even delay to supply the wants of a person may expose the servant to the penalties of this section.

Curators, Hospital Servants Excluded.

5469. Lastly, it is not necessary that the legal contract must take the shape of service. For there are persons, such as curators of a lunatic, doctors and compounders in the hospital who may render themselves liable to the penalties of this section if agreeing to look after their patients they are guilty of voluntary omission. But since such obligation must arise from a contract they could not be punished for a mere dereliction of their ordinary duties, though they may enjoin the same attendance and care.

(2) Solomon, (1887) B. U. C. 354.

492. [Repealed by the Workmen's Breach of Contract (Repealing) Act.][3]

(3) S. 2, Act III of 1925.

CHAPTER XX

OF OFFENCES RELATING TO MARRIAGE

5470. Topical Introduction.—This Chapter consisting of six sections (ss. 493-498) penalizes conjugal infidelity and other offences connected therewith in a manner materially different from the English law. This was conceded by the first commissioners who said: "As this is a part of the law in which the English inhabitants of India are peculiarly interested, which we have framed on principles widely different from those in which the English law on the same subject is framed, we think it necessary to offer some explanations."(4) Before considering these explanations, it would probably be useful to state that this Chapter punishes four principal offences relating to marriage, these being cohabitation obtained by fraudulently inducing a belief in the woman that she is the accused's wife (s. 493), allied to which is the mock marriage punishable under s. 496. The offence of bigamy is provided against in sections 494 and 495, but those provisions had to be made necessarily elastic so as to provide for the diverse customs of the various races inhabiting the Peninsula. The third offence of adultery is a departure from the English Law, under which adultery is not a crime, but merely a misconduct against which the aggrieved party has no redress against the adulterer or adulteress except in damages awarded in a suit for divorce or a judicial separation. The offence of seduction of a married woman is one closely cognate to the offence of adultery, so that, really speaking there are only three offences constituted in this chapter. And of these the first punishable under section 493 was constituted an offence in spite of the trend of the English cases which held such connection not to amount to a rape.(5) But this view has since been overruled by the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885,(6) which now expressly declares such act to amount to rape (§§ 4004-4006). Such a case is clearly contemplated by s. 375, cl. 4, and the question in such cases may arise whether the offence is one to be disposed of under this section, or whether it is one which amounts to rape (§§ 4004-4006).

5471. The offence of bigamy punishable under sections 494 and 495 materially differs from the corresponding rule of English Law, under which monogamy being the universal practice, the rule is simpler But under these sections the criminality of the second or subsequent marriage depends upon the practice of the caste or race to which the accused belongs. If polygamy or polyandry was sanctioned by usage, one could not be convicted for doing an act in conformity with custom —nor could law enforce monogamy upon a people with the same assurance as the abolition of Suttee since the one is by no means as revolting

(4) Note Q., Reprint, p. 171.

(5) Saunders, 8 C. & P. 265; Barrow, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 156; Williams, 8 C. & P. 286; Clark, Dears C. C. 397; Middleton, 12 L. J. M. C. 84; contra in Dee, L. R. Ir. 468.

(6) 48 & 49 Vict., c. 69, s. 4.

as the other. In this view it might appear somewhat anomalous that the Code constitutes adultery an offence when it tolerates polygamy and polyandry. But as has been elsewhere seen, adultery was always an offence in this country, and its recognition by the Code is by no means an innovation. Moreover, it is an offence which if not avenged by, is apt to lead to sharp reprisals occasioning disturbance and breach of peace which it is the duty of law to prevent. The Law Commissioners, however, viewed the offence from the humanitarian stand-point, but there is a school of thought which considers it a fallacious view holding that the punishment of the act is inconsistent with personal liberty. The subject will have to be again considered presently.(7)

493. Every man who by deceit causes any woman who is not lawfully married to him to believe that she is lawfully married to him and to cohabit or have sexual intercourse with him in that belief, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years and shall also be liable to fine.

Session. Non-cog. s. 198, Cr. P. C. Warrant. Not bail. Not comp.

Cohabitation caused by a man deceitfully inducing a belief of lawful marriage.

[Man—s. 10. Woman—s. 10.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5472).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5473).
(3) Proof (5474).
(4) Form of Charge (5475).
(5) Principle (5476).
(6) Cohabitation by Deceitful Assurance of Marriage (5477-5479).
(7) "Cohabit or have Sexual Intercourse" (5479).

5472. Analogous Law.—The act here punishable may also be punished as rape.(8) It is, indeed, now so punishable under English Law. The conflict between s. 375, cl. 4, and this section has not as yet attracted the notice of the Courts of this country. The section has, in fact, remained a dead letter as no reported case appears to have been decided under it.

5473. Procedure and Practice.—No Court shall take cognizance of an offence under this section, except upon a complaint made by some person aggrieved by such offence.(9) The offence is, therefore, non-cognizable and warrant should, ordinarily, issue in the 1st instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session. This offence is non-cognizable, but the offence of rape falling under clause 4 of s. 375 is not, and it may be a question when an offence is rape and not this offence. Probably a single act would be treated as rape, while cohabitation for some time would more appropriately be treated as an offence falling under this section.

(7) S. 497.
(8) S. 375, "Fourthly."
(9) S. 198, Cr. P. C.

5474. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused cohabited with the prosecutrix.

(2) That he was not legally married to her.

(3) That she had consented to the cohabition believing that she had been lawfully married to him.

(4) That such belief in her was induced by deceit on the part of the accused.

5475. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you deceitfully caused a certain woman, to wit—who was not lawfully married to you, to believe that she was lawfully married to you, and, in that belief, she cohabited or had sexual intercourse with you; and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 493 of the Indian Penal Cod,e and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge."

5476. Principle.—The commission of the offence here described is only possible when the woman is at least fourteen years of age. If she is below that age, her consent is immaterial, and cohabitation with her is rape. If she is above that age the accused may induce her to believe him as her lawfully married husband. Such mistake is quite possible in a country favouring infant marriages, and where after marriage girls do not cease to reside with their parents. Again, such deception may be caused by the man going through the ceremony of marriage which he knows does not bind him. Such a possibility is not unusual in this country, where the bewildering admixture of races and customs, religions and castes makes the question of marriage at once an intricate and uncertain problem. But the section is not intended to punish one for contracting a marriage which turns out to be illegal. It only punishes a man for obtaining the body of a woman by deceitfully assuring her that he had acquired that right by jus maritii. Such a case presupposes at least three things: (a) knowledge on his part that the marriage, if any contracted, does not bind the parties; and (b) belief in her that it is a binding marriage, (c) such belief being due to the man's deceitful assurance or act.

5477. Cohabitation by Deceitful Assurance of Marriage.—A man may cohabit with a woman under a variety of circumstances, amongst others, under a promise of marriage intending never to fulfil his promise, in which case his conduct is as egregious as when he obtains access to her by falsely inducing her to believe that he is her lawful husband. But law does not punish one, as it does the other act, because the assurance in the one case still leaves the woman the option to refuse, which she cannot do in the other case (§ 3997). There was, however, deceit in both the cases, though the deceit in the one case related to a future act, while deceit in the other case referred to an act alleged to be past. Now such deceit may be caused by going through a mock ceremony of marriage which has no binding effect in law. Suppose, for instance, that a Mahomedan were, in hope of a rich dowry, to personate a Hindu and obtain the hand of a rich landholder's daughter in marriage, which the latter, of course, believed to be binding upon both, but which the former knew to be a deception and a snare. He would be clearly guilty of an offence described in s. 496, and if he cohabits with the woman he pretended to marry he would be then guilty of this offence. So again, a man may deceive the woman by making her believe that the ceremony he was undergoing with her constituted a valid marriage, though, in fact, it was wholly insufficient. This offence is thus a species of cheating, but in which the false representation takes the form of mock-marriage.

5478. Of course, the section only punishes an act where such deception is practised before she consents to have sexual intercourse with him. If, therefore, a man marry a woman in the bona fide belief that the marriage is effective, and afterwards discovers some flaw rendering it inoperative, after which he continues to cohabit with her, he could not be said to have had sexual intercourse after causing belief in her marriage by deceit. In one sense it would be so, because any sexual intercourse had with her after the man is made aware of the invalidity of her marriage, would answer all the requirements of this section, but it scarcely appears to have been its intention. If that were indeed the case the accused would have to be punished separately for each individual act of intercourse, which is, of course, absurd.

"Cohabit" or "have sexual intercourse."

5479. It would seem that one essential distinguishing feature of this offence as compared to s. 496 is that the accused cohabits or has sexual intercourse with the woman. The collocation of the two terms "cohabit" and "have sexual intercourse" would at the first blush, seem to suggest that the former is used in a sense distinct from the latter. But it is not so, for though the word "cohabit"(10) literally means no more than "to live together," still the word has come to mean cohabitation as husband and wife, and accompanied by sexual intercourse.

Marrying again during the lifetime of husband or wife.

494. Whoever, having a husband or wife living, marries in any case in which such marriage is void by reason of its taking place during the life of such husband or wife, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Session. Pres. Mag or Mag. of 1st class. Non-cog. (s. 98, Cr. P. C.) Warrant. Bailable. Comp. with Court's sanction.

Exception.—This section does not extend to any person whose marriage with such husband or wife has been declared void by a Court of competent jurisdiction,

(10) Lat. co, with, and habito, to dwell—lit., to live together.

nor to any person who contracts a marriage during the life of a former husband or wife, if such husband or wife, at the time of the subsequent marriage, shall have been continually absent from such person for the space of seven years, and shall not have been heard of by such person as being alive within that time, provided the person contracting such subsequent marriage shall, before such marriage takes place, inform the person with whom such marriage is contracted of the real state of facts so far as the same are within his or her knowledge.

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5480-5484).
(2) Personal Marriage Laws (5483).
(3) Procedure and Practice (5485-5487).
(4) Proof (5488).
(5) Form of Charge (5489).
(6) Principle (5490).
(7) Criminal (5491-5492).
(8) Second Marriage When Void (5493-5496).
(9) Where Both Parties are Christians (5493).
(10) Law as to Form and Essentials of Marriage (5494).
(11) Form and Essentials distinguished (5495-5498).
(12) Christian Marriages Contracted Abroad (5499-5500).
(13) Marriage of Christian to Non-Christian (5501-5503).
(14) Christian and Non-Christian Marriage in Christian Country (5504-5506).
(15) Removal of Disability on Change of domicile (5507).
(16) Indian Converts (5508-5510).
(17) Position of Hindu Converts (5509).
(18) Presumption of Polygamy (5510).
(19) Ceremonial, an Index of the Obligation Implied (5511-5512).
(20) Marriage of Hindu and Mahomedan Apostates (5513-5514).
(21) Status of Indian Converts (5515).
(22) Dissolution of Native Converts Marriage (5516).
(23) Mahomedan Law (5517).
(24) Proof of Marriage (5518).
(25) Christian Marriage (5518).
(26) Christian Marriages in India (5520-5523).
(27) Jewish Marriage (5524).
(28) Foreign Marriage (5525).
(29) Parsis (5526).
(30) Buddhist (5527).
(31) Mahomedan Marriage (5528-5532).
(32) Muta Marriage (5531).
(33) Apostacy Dissolves the Marriage (5532).
(34) Hindu Marriage (5533).
(35) Inter-caste Marriages (5534-5535).
(36) Hindu Divorce (5536-5537).
(37) Invalidity of Marriage Due to First Marriage (5538).
(38) Exceptions to Criminality (5539-5542).
(39) Absence of Seven Years (5543-5546).
(40) Bona Fide Belief in Death Whether a Defence (5547-5548).
(41) Mistaken Belief (5548).

5480. Analogous Law.—This section punishes the offence of what is known in English Law as "bigamy," but that term is clearly inapplicable to the offence here described, for it assumes a second marriage necessarily illegal, but which, having regard to the customs of the people in the Orient, is not necessarily the case. The English rule against bigamy is, therefore, wholly inapplicable to a non-Christian Asiatic of whatever persuasion. It will, however, apply to Christians amongst whom monogamy is the rule and bigamy both a sin and a crime.

The provisions of the English Statute[11] against bigamy run thus:—

S. 57. Whosoever, being married, shall marry any other person during the life of the former husband or wife, whether the second marriage shall have taken place in England or Ireland or elsewhere, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years.

5481. It will be observed that this section does not use the term "bigamy," which, though now used to designate the offence, is a misnomer, since its root meaning[12] implies no more than that the man was married twice, and not having a plurality of wives at the same time.[13] According to the canonists, "bigamy" consisted in marrying two virgins successively one after the death of the other, or in once marrying a widow.[14] But whatever may be the correct meaning of the term, it is unquestionable that the solecism has now come to signify the offence punishable under the Statute last cited, and in a modified form under this section. But since that term has not obtained the same currency in this country, there may perhaps be yet time to call the offence by its true designation of "criminal polygamy."

5482. The question of criminality under this section is a somewhat vexed question, and depends upon the personal law, usage and custom of the person as regards matrimony. For instance, since polygamy is permitted by law in the case of Hindu and Mahomedan males, this section has no application to them, though since Hindu and Mahomedan women are not permitted the same liberty, but are restricted to monogamy, their marriage to another husband during the lifetime of their first or former husband would expose them to the penalty of this section. But since polyandry is customary in certain parts of Southern India, e.g., Malabar, the women there would stand on the same footing as Hindu and Mahomedan men elsewhere. On the other hand, since Christianity, Buddhism and the Zoroastrian faiths sanction only monogamous intercourse, polygamy by a husband or wife during the lifetime of the other would constitute such offence.

Personal Marriage Laws.

5483. The Hindu and Mahomedan marriages are not generally the subject of any statutory enactment, which, however, regulates the marriages of Christians,[15] and native converts to Christianity,[16] while the

(11) Offences against the Person Act, 1861, (24 & 25 Vict., c. 100), s. 57.

(12) From bi, twice, and Gr gamos, marriage—lit., "twice-married."

(13) So Blackstone says: "Another felonious offence, with regard to this holy state of matrimony, is what our law corruptly calls 'bigamy,' which properly signifies 'being twice married,' but with us is used synonymous to 'polygamy,' or having a plurality of wives at once'"; 4 Black 163, citing 3 Inst. 88.

(14) Bac. Abridg., title "Bigamy."

(15) Act XV of 1872.

(16) Act XXI of 1866.

Parsi Marriages and divorce are the subject of another enactment.[17] The Civil Marriage Act, 1872, [18] as amended by Act XXX of 1923, further provides for the solemnization of marriages between parties when neither of them professes the Christian, the Jewish, the Hindu or the Mahomedan. or the Parsi or the Buddhist, or the Sikh or the Jain religion[19]; or between persons who profess the Hindu, the Buddhist the Sikh or the Jain religion. The Indian Divorce Act[20] enables a person to obtain divorce if either party thereto is a Christian,[21] on the ground of his wife's adultery, but if the petitioner be the wife, then on any of the following grounds: (i) conversion of her husband from Christianity to some other faith, and marriage with another woman; (ii) his being guilty of incestuous adultery; or (iii) of bigamy with adultery; (iv) marriage with another woman with adultery; (v) rape; (vi) sodomy; (vii) bestiality; (viii) adultery, or desertion for at least two years.[22]

In all such cases the validity of a marriage must be judged with reference to the enactment under which it was contracted or by which it is regulated. In other cases appeal must be made to the personal laws of the parties or to usage or custom, and in the last resort to the legal presumption arising from cohabitation and reputation, but such presumption is insufficient to establish marriage in a case arising under this section, or section 495, 497 and 498.[23] This discrimination is justified by the higher degree of certainty required in a criminal proceeding, in which the strict proof of every material point is insisted on.[24] But the requirmments of the law would be probably satisfied if it is proved by the evidence of a person who was present at the performance of the ceremony which according to the rites and custom of the caste constituted a binding marriage.

5484. These are simple cases, but in a country passing through a state of transition other questions arise. There are, for example, the case of conversion before and after marriage, apostacy and the like, questions which will have to be presently considered, but which further complicate the question as to the status acquired by the ceremony of marriage, the legitimacy of the issue, and the commission of this offence.

5485. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is one of those of which no Court is competent to take cognizance, except upon a complaint made by some person aggrieved by such offence.[25] Such person is, of course, in the first place, the wife, or the husband in derogation of whose married rights the second marriage was contracted. The offence is, therefore, non-cognizable, but warrant should, ordinarily, issue in the first instance. It is bailable and compoundable with the permission of the Court, and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class. Before the pass-

(17) Act XV of 1865.
(18) Act III of 1872.
(19) Ib., s. 2.
(20) Act IV of 1869.
(21) Ib., s. 2, as amended by s. 2, Act XXX of 1927.
(22) Act IV of 1869, s. 10.
(23) Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872) s. 50 proviso; Pitambur Singh, 5 C. 566, F. B.
(24) Kallu, 5 A. 233.
(25) S. 198, Cr. P. C.

ing of the Act amending the Code of Criminal Procedure,[1] this offence was not compoundable and it was accordingly held that once the complainant had launched the prosecution, for this offence, he was incompetent to withdraw from it,[2] but the Courts had found this provision too inelastic with the result that the legislature has now enabled them to permit withdrawals from the prosecution.

5486. The Procedure Code does not indicate as to who should be considered the person aggrieved for the present purpose. But it is obvious that the word "aggrieved" is intended to refer to a persons who is injured by the second marriage. And it is evident that such persons may be several, and not only the one primarily affected by the marriage. For instance, if the wife contracts a second marriage during the lifetime of her husband, the latter[3] as well as the second husband would be persons so "aggrieved,"[4] though the latter's brother could not under the unamended law be put in the same class,[5] though the husband might be himself a lunatic, and therefore incapable of vindicating himself.[6] It is however now possible that where the person aggrieved is a purdanashin or is a minor, idiot or a lunatic, or is from sickness or infirmity unable to make a complaint, some other person may, with the leave of the Court, make a complaint on his or her behalf.[7] In order to legalize the initiation of proceedings for this offence it is not necessary that he should complain specifically of this offence, or under this section. He may have, for instance, written his complaint at the suggestion of the Police Superintendent,[8] or he may have merely complained that the accused had taken or kept his wife, but that would not prevent the Court from charging the accused under this section if he finds an offence under that section established by evidence.[9]

5487. As to the venue for this offence, it is provided by the English Statute[10] that "such offence may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, determined and punished in any country or place in England or Ireland, where the offender shall be apprehended or be in custody, in the same manner in all respects as if the offence had been actually committed in that country or place," and this would probably, be the rule in this country.[11] This offence was before the Act of 1923 amending the Code of Criminal Procedure, triable exclusively by the Court of Session. Where therefore the Magistrate had in the course of his enquiry examined witnesses for the defence and discharged the accused it was held that its legal effect was an acquittal.[12]

5488. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) Act XVIII of 1923.
(2) Ujjala Bewa, 1 C. L. R. 523.
(3) Deputy Legal Remembrancer v Sarna Kahni, 26 C. 336 (337), following Bai Rukshmoni, 10 B. 340; Ujjala Bewa, 1 C. L. R. 523; Gudru Subbamma, 14 I. C. (M.) 204; Lala, 32 A. 78.
(4) P. 337.
(5) Imtiazan, 25 A. 132.
(6) Bai Rukshmoni, 10 B. 340.
(7) S. 198, proviso, Cr. P. C., added by Act XVIII of 1923.
(8) Ruri (1919) P. R. No. 5, 48 I. C. 493, 20 Cr. L. J. 3.
(9) Ujjala Bewa, 1 C. L. R. 523.
(10) 24 & 25 Vict., c. 100, s. 57.
(11) Cf. s. 179, Cr. P. C.
(12) Dal Chand v. Ram Lal, 75 I. C. Oudh 727.

(1) That the accused had already been married.[13]

(2) That such marriage was legal.

(3) That the person with whom he was married was still alive.

(4) That the accused married another person.

(5) That such subsequent marriage was void by reason of its taking place during the life of the first consort.

5489. Charge.—The charge should run thus.

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you having a wife (or husband), to wit——living, married again A B, which marriage is void by reason of its taking place during the lifetime of such wife (or husband) to wit——, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 494 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Sessions (or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge."

5490. Principle.—"The Legislature has thought just," says Blackstone, "to make polygamy a felony, by reason of its being so great a violation of the public economy and decency of a well ordered state."[14] In England the offence was viewed in the light of the profanation of a religious ceremony, and was originally considered only of ecclesiastical cognizance till it was constituted a felony by the Statute passed in 1603.[15] This Statute was found to be defective and has been twice amended, but the law on the subject did not satisfy the draftsmen who wrote: "The law of England on the subject of bigamy appears to be in some cases too severe, and in others too lenient. It seems to bear a close analogy to the law of perjury. The English Law on these two subjects has been framed less for the purpose of preventing the profanation of a religious ceremony. It, therefore, makes no distinction between perjury which is intended to destroy the life of the innocent, and perjury which is intended to save the innocent; between bigamy which produces the most frightful suffering to individuals, and bigamy which produces no suffering to individuals at all. We have proceeded on a different principle; while we admit that the profanation of a cermony so important to society as that of marriage is a great evil, we cannot but think that evil immensely aggravated when the profanation is made the means of tricking an innocent woman into the most miserable of all situations. We have therefore proposed that a man who deceives a woman into believing herself his lawful wife when he knows that she is not so, and induces her, under that persuasion, to cohabit with him, should be punished

---

(13) Formal proof of marriage is necessary; Pitambur, 5 C. 566, F. B.; Arshed Ali, 13 C. L. R. 125; Kallu, 5 A. 233; Santok Singh, (1898) A. W. N. 186; Dal Singh, 20 A. 166; Nazir Khan, 36 A. 1. It may be proved by one who was present and saw the ceremony performed; Subbarayan, 9 M. 9.

(14) 4 Black 163.

(15) 1 James I, c. 11, amended and re-enacted as 9 Geo. IV, c. 31; 24 & 25 Vict., c. 95.

with great severity."[16] But the Draconian severity of the draft section,[17] which these observations were intended to support was not approved by the Legislature which was content to re-enact the English rule adapting it to the racial requirements of this country.

5491. Criminal Polygamy.—The offence of criminal polygamy punishable under this section follows the course of bigamy which has been constituted a felony by statute (§§ 5480-5482). Following that Statute the section enacts a rule as well the three exceptions to which it is subject, the rule being that a person contracting a second marriage during the lifetime of the first married consort is criminal, and the exceptions being in favour of (i) those amongst whom such marriages are not void, or (ii) those whose first marriage has been declared void by a Court, or (iii) those whose consort has not been heard of for at least seven years, and of which fact the person contracting the second marriage informs beforehand the other party to it.

5492. It will be noticed that the section makes no reference to intention, knowledge, fraud or deceit, but constitutes the mere contracting of the second marriage a crime. It is then possible that a person may offend against the rule without being fully conscious of it. But the rule is enacted in the interest of the peace of society (§ 5490), and the mens rea is furnished by the knowledge of the voidability of the second marriage necessarily implied in one who contracts it, which might at first appear conflicting and contradictory. Of course, this is the very essence of the crime, for if the second marriage is not void, criminal law cannot puinsh what the civil law does not prevent. The voidability of the second marriage depends upon the validity of the first marriage, and upon the fact that the second marriage was a valid and sufficient marriage, but for the existence of the first marriage. The validity of a marriage depends upon (i) the religion of the parties, (ii) their domicile, and (iii) the performance of ceremonies constituting the marriage. These elements would afford solution to many rulings.

5493. Second Marriage When Void.—The question when the second marriage of a person is void, thus depends upon other questions. In the simplest case of persons both observing monogamy, the second marriage can be void only when the first marriage was valid. If, therefore, the first marriage was for any reason void, though it may not have been avoided, neither party could be punished for contracting a second marriage. So where the first marriage took place within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity or affinity, it will offer no impediment to a second marriage by either party, though it may not have been formally annulled.[18] So where the first marriage was between a Protestant man and a Roman Catholic woman solemnized by a Catholic priest in England, not in accordance with the ritual of the Church of England, and the ceremony was performed in Latin which

(1) Where Both Parties are Christians.

(16) Note Q, Reprint, p. 172.

(17) That section ran thus: "Every man who by deceit causes any woman, who is not lawfully married to him according to the law of marriage under which she lives, to believe that she is lawfully married to him according to that law, and to co-habit with him in that belief, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to 14 years, and must not be less than two years, and shall also be liable to fine."

(18) Chadwick, 11 Q. B. 173.

the witness did not understand, and could not therefore swear that the ceremony of marriage according to the Church of Rome was read, Willes, C.J., directed an acquittal, though he seemed to be of opinion that if the witnesses could have sworn to the ceremony performed according to the Church of Rome the marriage could have been a good marriage, though the contracting parties belonged to opposing sects.[19] But Lush, J., held in a case that in an indictment for this offence everything must be proved most strictly, and, therefore, where the only evidence given of the first marriage was that the parties had been married in Scotland by a Roman Catholic priest, who had many times previously performed similar ceremonies that, it was insufficient without proof of the law of Scotland as to such marriages.[20]

Law as to form and essentials of Marriage.

5494. The question whether the first marriage was in fact performed is distinct from its validity, which has to be established on a prosecution for this offence. The validity of the first marriage, may, however, depend as much upon the personal laws of the parties as upon the lex loci contractus. In England it is enacted that marriages contracted abroad to be valid, must be legal under English law.[21] Consequently, the marriage of a man with the sister of his deceased wife being until recently invalid in England as contrary to God's law,[22] such marriage contracted by Christian British subjects temporarily resident abroad, but really domiciled in this country, though vaild in the former country, and duly celebrated according to the forms required by the law of that country, was held to be absolutely void.[23] In this case arising out of an administration-suit the deceased, W. L. Brook, a British subject permanently resident in England, had been married to one Emily Armitage, the sister of his deceased wife in Denmark according to the rites of the Danish church, where such marriages were legal. The question was whether the issue of such marriage was legal under English Law, which, of course, depended upon the legality of the deceased's marriage with his deceased's wife's sister in Denmark. In support of its legality it was contended that it was a settled rule of international law, that the validity of every contract (and marriage was a contract) depended upon the law of the country in which it was made, from which it followed that a foreign marriage, valid according to the law of a country where it was celebrated was good everywhere.

The soundness of this dictum was conceded,[24] but the Lord Chancellor (Lord Campbell) held it subject to a necessary qualification, and added: But while the forms of entering into the contract of marriage are to be regulated by the lex loci contractus, the law of the country in which it is celebrated, the essentials of the contract depend upon the lex domicilii, the law of the country in which the parties

(19) Lyon's case, (1738) 1 East P. C. 469.

(20) Savage, 13 Cox 178.

(21) Foreign Marriages Act (55 & 56 Vict., c. 23), s. 19, which, however, only justifies the text by prohibiting the solemnization of marriages of British subjects abroad inconsistently with international law or the comity of nations.

(22) So declared by 28 Hen. VIII, c. 7, which declaration was renewed in 28 Hen. VIII, c. 16 and 32 Hen. VIII, c. 38.

(23) Brook v. Brook, 9 H. L. C. 193.

(24) But in Sottomayer v. De Barros, L. R. 5 P. 94 (100); this proposition was held to be too wide.

are domiciled at the time of the marriage, in which the matrimonial residence is contemplated. Although the forms of celebrating the foreign marriage may be different from those required by the law of the country of domicile, the marriage may be good everywhere But if the contract of marriage is such, in essentials, as to be contrary to the law of the country of domicile, and it is declared void by that law, it is to be regarded as void in the country of domicile, though not contrary to the law of the country in which it was celebrated."(25) His Lordship, however, added that the marriage would have been a legal one if the parties had abandoned their English domicile, and were domiciled in Denmark.(1) This case is then an authority for the following proposition: The forms of entering into the contract of marriage are regulated by the lex loci contractus, but the essentials of the contract depend upon the lex domicilii.

Form and Essentials Distinguished.

5495. Now this may raise the question as to what is a form and what is an essential of marriage. The learned Lords held that an absolute prohibition on the ground of consanguinity was not merely a form but an essential. But a marriage contracted in England by a French couple who had crossed over specially to evade the parental consent necessary to its validity in France, was held to be valid as the necessity of consent was merely a form prescribed by the Code Napoleon, the non-observance of which did not vitiate the conjugal union.(2) Adverting to this and similar cases Lord Campbell, L. C. said: "If a marriage is absolutely prohibited in any country as being contrary to public policy, and leading to social evils, I think, that the domiciled inhabitants of that country cannot be permitted, by passing the frontier and entering another State in which this marriage is not prohibited, to celebrate a marriage forbidden by their own state, and immediately returning to their own state, to insist on their marriage being recognized as lawful."(3)

5496. But if so, there is a sharp conflict on this point between the English and American law, for in the latter country the validity of such marriages has been affirmed. So the Courts there have upheld a marriage between a Mulatto and a white woman made in Rhode Island, where such marriages are legal, in the State of Massachusetts, where they were at the time of the decision illegal.(4) And, indeed, while the marriage of two French subjects in England without the requisite consent of their parent or guardian has been held to be valid in England it has been held to be invalid in France, but though, according to the jus gentium, the English tribunal ought to respect the French law, the former refuse to award a decree of nullity on the basis of the French decree.(5) So while the incestuous marriage of nephew and

(25) Brook v. Brook, 9 H. L. C. 193 (207, 208); to the same effect, see Story's Conflict of Laws, § 113-A; Harford v. Morris, 2 Hagg Con. Rep. 423, 434; Warrender v. Warrender, 2 Cl. & F. 488.

(1) Ib., pp. 212, 213.

(2) Simonin v. Mallac, 29 L. J. P. & M. 97; Steele v. Braddell, Milw. E. R. (Ir.) 1; Ogden v. Ogden, (1908) P. 46.

(3) Brook v. Brook, 9 H. L. C. 193 (220).

(4) Meadway v. Needham, 16 Mass. R. 157; to the same effect, Sutton v. Warren, 10 Mete. Mass. R. 451; Wightman v. Wightman, 4 John Cas. in Ch. 343.

(5) Simonin v. Mallac, 29 L. J. P. M. & A. 97, cited Per Sir R. Phillimore, in Sottomayer v. De Barros, L. R. 2 P. 81 (87); reversed (C. A.) L. R. 3 P. 1, but on a different point.

aunt contracted in England was upheld in the State of Massachusetts in America,[6] that decision was dissented from by the English House of Lords.[7]

But that decision, again, was animadverted upon by Sir R. Phillimore in a case in which he had to pronounce on the validity of a marriage between first cousins contracted by two Portuguese subjects in England, such marriage being deemed incestuous in Portugal if made without the Papal dispensation, though it is legal in England. He was of opinion that the Court of the place of contract of marriage, is not bound to recognize the incapacities affixed by the law of the domicile on the parties to a contract of marriage, if such capacities do not exist according to the lex loci contractus, and to pronounce a marriage otherwise valid, to be null and void by reason of such incapacity.[8] This view was overruled on appeal by Cotton, L. J.,[9] who was of opinion that the personal incapacity to contract a marriage continues to affect a person so long as he is domiciled in the country where the incapacity is recognized, and that, therefore, since the parties' marriage was bad according to the law of Portugal, the Courts in this country were bound to declare its invalidity, and could not do otherwise.[10] But on the case being remitted to the Probate Division for investigating the question of domicile, Sir James Hannen found that the husband's domicile was English, though that of the wife was Portuguese, which raised a new question not disposed of by the Court of appeal, whether a marriage of a foreigner domiciled in England, with a woman subject by the law of her domicile to a personal incapacity not recognized by English law, must be declared invalid by the tribunals of England. And he held that the English Courts were not bound to give effect to an incapacity existing in a foreign State.[11]

5497. As Sir C. Cresswell said in another case: "Every nation has a right to impose on its own subjects restrictions and prohibitions as to entering into marriage contracts, either within or without its own territories; and if the subject sustain hardships in consequence of those restrictions, their own nations only must bear the blame. But what right has one independent nation to call upon any other nation equally independent to surrender its own laws in order to give effect to such restrictions and prohibitions....? As far as the law of nations is concerned, each must have an equal right to claim respect for its own laws. Both cannot be observed; would it not then be more just, and therefore, more for the interest of all, that the law of that country should prevail, which both are presumed and agree to be bound by? Again, assume that one of the parties is English, would not an English subject have as strong a claim to the benefit of English law as a foreign subject to the benefit of foreign law?"[12]

(6) Sutton v. Warren, 10 Mete. Mass. Rep. 451.

(7) Brook v. Brook, 9 H. L. C. 193 (220, 221).

(8) Sottomayer v. De Barros, L. R. 2 P. 81.

(9) James and Bagally, L. JJ., concurrent.

(10) Sottomayer v. De Barros, L. R. 3 P. 1 (6, 7), reversing L. R. 2 P. 81.

(11) Sottomayer v. De Barros, L. R. 5 P. 94 (103).

(12) Simonin v. Mallac, 2 Sw. & Tr. 67 followed in Sottomayer v. De Barros, L. R. 5 P. 94 (102, 103).

The Court then cited instances of injustice which any other view would cause. "Suppose, a woman domiciled in North Carolina, with such an amount of colour in her blood as would arise from her great grandmother being a Negress, should marry in this country should we be bound to hold that such a marriage was void?" Or suppose a priest or monk domiciled in a country where the marriage of such a person is prohibited were to come to this country and marry an English woman, could the Court be called on at the instance of the husband to declare that the marriage was null and to give "legal sanction to his repudiation of his wife?"(13) The Court then compared the position of a French couple married in England to evade the law of France as to parental consent necessary to validate a marriage, and the marriage of the parties in which the consent of the Pope could dispense with the prohibition, and added: "If there be a distinction, which I am unable to perceive, why is greater value to be attached by the tribunals of this country to the permission of the Pope than to that of the father?"(14) The Court then finally held the marriage valid and dismissed the wife's petition for the declaration of its nullity.

5498. An attempt has been made to distinguish these cases on the ground that the prohibition in them was local and not general according to the law of Chrsitendom. Such would be marriages between persons in the direct line of consanguinity, or in the collateral line within the degree of brother and sister, both which classes of marriages are by the usage and practice of Christian States and the general current of Christian law and authority, considered as incestuous, unnatural, and destructive of civilized life.(15) The canonists recognized this distinction between an impassable impediment (impedimentum dirimens) and those which were removeable by a papal or episcopal dispensation (impedimentum impediticam). But the distinction between the two is scarcely radical or easily perceptible. For the marriage of one with the deceased wife's sister was at one time held to be incestuous, and against the law of God (§ 5494), though its legality has now been established by Statute.

Christian Marriages Contracted abroad.

5499. In the case last supposed, both parties were Christians, and both were either British subjects or both were foreigners. But cases may arise, and have arisen where one of the contracting parties may be a non-Christian, or one a British subject and another a foreigner, and the question may then be as to what should be the guiding principle for determining the validity of the first or second marriage. The case, where both parties are foreigners would appear to present no difficulty, for then the validity of their marriage would be solely judged by the same test. For the cases last cited are authorities for the proposition that the sole test in such cases is not the lex loci contractus, but the lex domicilii has also to be taken into account. And of the two the question of domicile is comparatively more important. For as was pointed out in Brook's case,(16)

(13) Sottomayer v. De Barros, L. R. 5 P. 94 (104).
(14) Ib., 106.
(15) Story's Conflict of Laws, § 114; Griotino on Peace and War (De Bello et Pace), 1, 2. c. 5, s. 13, § 2.
(16) Brook v. Brook, 9 H. L. C. 193.

if the contracting parties had abandoned their English domicile and become established in Denmark then their marriage would have been valid, and so presumably would have been the decision in Sottomayer's case.

5500. The same point arose in a case in which the question was, whether an Englishman A was validly married to a native of New Zealand B. The evidence given was of the husband who swore that he had migrated to New Zealand in 1828 before it became an English Colony, that his marriage with B had been solemnized according to the laws, customs and usages of that island, that he had since then lived with B as his wife. There was then no minister of any Christian Church in New Zealand, nor any register of marriages. The decision ultimately turned upon the fact that the Court was unable to accept the husband's uncorroborated statement, but Sir W. Pagewood, V. C., intimated his opinion that if these facts had been established, the principles laid down by Lord Stowell,[17] should have applied. Lord Stowell had to deal with a case of a marriage of an Englishman celebrated at the Cape of Good Hope, a year after its surrender to the British, by the Chaplain of the British garrison, under a license from the Commander-in-Chief. The husband was twenty-one and by Dutch law which was the lex loci contractus at the Cape, he was not entitled to marry without the consent of his parents till thirty, and in other respects the formalities of the Dutch law were not complied with.

Lord Stowell said: "It is true, indeed, that English decisions have established this rule, that a foreign marriage, valid according to the law of the place where it is celebrated, is valid everywhere else; but they have not, e converso, established that marriages of British subjects, not good according to the law of the place where they are celebrated, are universally, and under all possible circumstances to be regarded as invalid in England. It is therefore, certainly to be advised that the safest course is always to be married according to the law of the country, for then no question can be stirred; but if this cannot be done on account of legal or religious difficulties, the law of the country does not say that its subjects shall not be married abroad. And even in cases where no difficulties of that insuperable magnitude exist, yet, if the contrary practice has been sanctioned by long acquiescence and acceptance of the one country that has silently permitted such marriages, and of the other that has silently accepted them, the Courts of this country, I presume, would not incline to shake their validity upon these large and general theories."

Marriage of Christian to non-Christian.

5501. But these remarks apply to marriages as between Christians, and do not touch the larger question of marriages between a Christian and a non-Christian. This was the view of Lord Brougham in the leading case,[18] in which referring to the lex loci contractus, he said: "But the rule extends, I apprehend, no further than to the ascertaining of the validity of the contract and the meaning of the parties, that is, the existence of the contract and its construction. If, indeed, there go two things under one and the same name in different countries—if that which is called marriage is of a different nature in each—there may be some room for holding that we are to consider the thing to which the parties have bound themselves, according to its legal acceptance in the country, where the legal obligation was contracted. But marriage is one and the same thing substantially all the Christian world over. Our whole law of marriage assumes this; and it is important to observe, that we regard it as a wholly different thing, a different status from Turkish or other marriages among infidel nations, because we clearly never should recognize the plurality of wives, and consequent validity of second marriages standing the first, which second marriages the laws of those countries authorize and validate. This cannot be put upon any rational ground, except our holding that infidel marriage to be something different from the Christian, and our also holding Christian marriage to be the same everywhere."[19]

(17) In Ruding v. Smith, 2 Hagg. Cons. R. 371.

(18) Warrender v. Warrender, 2 Cl. & F. 488 (532).

Consequently, a Christian being tied to monogamy cannot contract a polygamous marriage either in a Christian country where such marriages are prohibited, or in a non-Christian State where they are permitted. And since the term "marriage" to a Christian means a strictly monogamous marriage that is to say "the voluntary union of one man and one woman to the exclusion of all others,"[20] it follows that an alliance of a Christian with a non-Christian in a non Christian country with the member of a polygamous race is no marriage at all. But it does not thence follow that under no circumstance can a Christian marry a non-Christian. But it does follow that a Christian cannot marry a polygamous person whether a Christian or not, for a marriage which admits of polygamy on either side is no marriage in the special sense, in which it is understood throughout the Christendom.

5502. For instance, it is well known that among a sect of Christians called Mormons polygamy is a part of the doctrine and is customary in Utah where the sect flourishes. The petitioner who was an ordained priest of that faith married the respondent, Miss Hawkins, in the Salt Lake city in the territory of Utah, according to the rites and ceremonies of the Mormons. The petitioner afterwards renounced Mormonism and resumed his domicile in England. The respondent remained a Mormon and married another man in Utah, whereupon the petitioner sued her for divorce, which elicited the question whether the petitioner had been legally married to the respondent, so that the Court could dissolve that marriage; and Lord Penzance held that the petitioner had not been validly married to the respondent, inasmuch as the law of England did not recognize the marriage of two persons with the possibility of pluarlity of husbands or wives. It defines rights and obligations on the assumption of monogamy and it cannot therefore, be appealed to when the very foundation upon which it is built is lacking: "The inconsistencies that would flow from an attempt of this sort are startling enough. Under the provisions of the Divorce Acts the duty of cohabitation is enforced on either party at the request of the other, in a suit for restitution of conjugal rights.

(19) Warrender v. Warrender, 2 Cl. & F. 488 (531, 532).

(20) Per Lord Penzance in Hyde v. Hyde, L. R. 1 P. & M. 130 (133).

But this duty is never enforced on one party if the other has committed adultery. A Mormon husband, therefore, who had married a second wife would be incapable of this remedy, and this Court could in no way assist him towards procuring the society of his wife if she chose to withdraw from him. And yet by the very terms of his marriage compact, this second marriage was a thing allowed to him, and no cause of complaint in her who had acquiesced in that compact. And as the power of enforcing the duties of marriage would thus be lost so would the remedies for breach of marriage vows be unjust and unfit. For a prominent provision of the Divorce Act is that a woman whose husband commits adultery may obtain a judicial separation from him. And so utterly at variance with a Christian marriage is the notion of permitting the man to marry a second woman that the Divorce Act goes further and declares that if the husband is guilty of bigamy as well as adultery, it shall be a ground of divorce to the wife. A Mormon, therefore, who had according to the laws of his sect, and in entire accordance with the contract and understanding made with the first woman, gone through the same ceremony with a second, might find himself in the predicament, under the application of English Law, of having no wife at all; for the first woman might obtain divorce on the ground of his bigamy and adultery, and the second might claim a decree declaring the second ceremony void as he had a wife living at the time of its celebration; and all this without any act done with which he would be expected to reproach himself or of which either woman would have the slightest right to complain.

5503. "These difficulties may be pursued further in the reflection that if a Mormon had married fifty women in succession, this Court might be obliged to pick out the fortieth as his only wife, and reject the rest. For it might well be that after the thirty-ninth marriage the first wife should die, and the fortieth union would then be the only valid one, the thirty-eight intervening ceremonies creating no matrimonial bond during the first wife's life."(21) The principle of this decision was followed by Stirling, J., in a case in which the question arose as to the validity of the marriage of the testator William Bethell, an Englishman, to Tippo, a native of Bechuanaland in South Africa, proved to have been solemnized there in accordance with the religious customs of that tribe, which permitted polygamy. It was proved that Bethell had changed his domicile to Bechuanaland, though not permanently, that he refused to marry Tippo in church, though a minister was available, that he often described Tippo as his girl, but made a certain provision if she remarried, whereupon the Court held that the union of Bethell with Tippo was not marriage according to the law of England, because that marriage did not preclude Bethell from contracting another marriage, and so long as there is this possibility there is not that "voluntary union for life of one man and one woman to the exclusion of all others," which is the only marriage recognized in Christian countries.(22) In this case Bethell was, and remained a Christian even after his marriage to Tippo, and the latter remained a heathen; but if suppose Tippo had become a convert to Christianity, then there could be no question about the legality of

(21) Hyde v. Hyde, L. R. P. & D. 130 (136, 137).

(22) Bethell v. Hildyard, 38 Ch. D. 220 (234).

Bethell's marriage. And even if without becoming a Christian, Tippo had belonged to a monogamous creed, even then the legality of her marriage to Bethell could not have been questioned.

Such a case, indeed, arose in England, in which the petitioner Francis Brinkley sued for a declaration of the validity of his marriage[23] with Yasu Tanka, a Japanese lady, celebrated in Japan in 1886, according to the laws in force in that country. The petitioner was an Irishman, a retired officer of the Royal Artillery, having his domicile in Ireland. His petition was opposed by the Attorney-General, but the petitioner having proved that according to the laws of Japan the petitioner could not again marry during the lifetime of his Japanese wife, the Court held it to be a valid marriage.[24] This case is then an authority for holding that the laws of Christendom do not forbid marriage with non-Christian, but they require that the non-Christian shall belong to a sect of which monogamy is an established doctrine. Consequently, there is nothing against a European Christian marrying an Asiatic non-Christian, a Jew or a Parsi, for instance.

Christian and Non-Christian Marriage in Christian Country.

5504. But this does not exhaust all the possible contingencies. For the cases hitherto considered have been of alliances of a Christian with a non-Christian in a non-Christian country. But the same rule does not necessarily extend to such marriage solemnized in a Christian country, for in that case the marriage is held valid on the ground that "of foreign (religious) professions the common law taketh no knowledge."[25] The petitioner was an English Christian lady, who had married the respondent, a Hindu gentleman, belonging to the twice-born caste, in England, where the latter had been to study. A child was born of the marriage after which the husband returned home to India, which was his native country, where he was employed in the Civil Service, and where he contemplated a remarriage into his own caste, whereupon the petitioner sued him for a judicial separation on the ground of desertion. Desertion was proved, but the question of judicial separation depended upon the validity of the marriage. The respondent contended that being a Hindu and under religious disability to marry out of his caste, his marriage to the petitioner was a nullity, but the Court held that whatever religious disability may have attached to the respondent's marriage to the petitioner in India, English Law could take no note of it when the marriage was solemnized on English soil under English Law.

As the learned Judge said: "Whether nationality or domicile be considered, why should another country in which the individual's act towards an inhabitant thereof takes place according to its laws, and has to be adjudicated upon, hold itself bound in its decision to apply the law of the country foreign to it, and to hold that the individual has carried with him a personal law of incapacity not recognized by the law where the act takes place."[1] The Court then went on to add "that a man marrying an English girl domiciled in this country does not carry with him a disability

(23) Under the Legitimacy Declaration Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict., c. 93).

(24) Brinkley v. Attorney-General, L. R. 15 P. 76 (80).

(25) Co. Litt. 132-b, cited and followed per Sir Gorell Barnes in Chetti v. Chetti, (1909) P. 67 (74).

(1) Chetti v. Chetti, (1909), P. 67 (85).

of a personal character imposed by the law of his own country, which would prevent him from entering into a marriage with her in this country, the marriage being one which would be recognized by the law of England as valid between persons domiciled there."[2] The view of Court then was that a religious disability attaching to a foreigner, is only an impedimentum impedients and not an impedimentum dirimens, a formal and not an essential impediment, similar in fact to the necessity of parental consent in the case of a Frenchman.[3]

5505. One deduction from this decision is that a polygamous Indian contracting marriage with a European Christian in a Christian country, whether in church or at the registry office, becomes bound to monogamy, so that he is afterwards, during the lifetime of his Christian wife and continuance of the marriage, precluded from marrying again upon his return to this country, though such marriage may be in accordance with the rules of his caste, and though his community may refuse to recognize the validity of his first Christian marriage, in consequence of which he may have been even outcasted. Such a person would then offend in the eye of the law by his second marriage, even though he may otherwise earn the commendation of his community.

But the case would have been different if the marriage had been performed in this country and not in Europe, for then the lex loci being in favour of polygamy, his first marriage, though contracted in church would be void, and he would be free to marry again and again without incurring the odium of contravening the law. All these points were not considered in the case last cited,[4] which was stated to be unique, though there is another case in which the decision of the Court was given consistently with the same principle.[5] There a Turkish gentleman resident in England as Vice-Consul for Turkey to the English Government, had married an English lady, born in India, in a church according to the rites of the Church of England. Soon after their marriage the couple went to reside in Turkey, but after some time the wife left on a short visit for England, and in her absence the husband obtained a decree of divorce from her in a Turkish Court on the ground that the marriage was not in accordance with Turkish law and was consequently, null and void. The children of this union sued the trustees of the settlement made by the husband, and the Court held the ex parte decree obtained in Turkey, to be no bar to the rights of the children who were entitled to the benefit of the settlement made in England.[6]

5506. But in these cases the religious and personal disability was held to have ceased to exist as soon as the person set his foot on English soil. The case would then have been widely different if the husband in the two cases had married the English Christian ladies in India and Turkey respectively. For then the religious disability being tied round their necks, the ceremony of marriage gone through would have been as ineffective to tie the nuptial knot as if they had in fact never gone through that ceremony. But, of course, such disability might be circumvented by the

(2) Ib., p. 87; following Ogden v. Ogden, (1908) P. 46.
(3) Ogden v. Ogden, (1908), P. 46; followed in Chetti v. Chetti, (1909) P. 67 (87).
(4) Chetti v. Chetti, (1909) P. 67.
(5) Colliss v. Hector, L. R. 19 Eq. 334.
(6) Ib.

person declaring himself a non-Hindu, in which case his marriage, if performed according to the requirements of the Civil Marriages Act,(7) would be valid. So again, it may be that without resorting to the special provisions of that Act, the Christian wife may be converted to the faith of Islam, or join the Arya Samaj or Brahmo faiths, after which her renunciation of her former faith would do away with the impediment which her religion placed upon her.

Removal of Disability on Change of Domicile.

5507. But not only the change of religion, but the change of domicile affects the question of marriage. For example, the marriage with a person's deceased wife's sister was at one time illegal in England, and was declared to be against God's law by Statute (§ 5494). If, therefore, the husband came out to this country in the service of Government, would he have been subject to the same disability during his stay in this country? It has been held not.(8) But there must have been a change of domicile, which for the purpose of marriage must be a permanent change, and not merely a change for a temporary purpose, as in the case of civil servants, missionaries and the like. This question was much considered by the Privy Council in a Colonial appeal from Ceylon,(9) in which the petitioner, an Englishman, resident in Ceylon, while employed in the Colonial Civil Service, sued his wife also then resident there, for a dissolution of his marriage on the ground of her adultery. The District Court awarded him the decree, but the Supreme Court of Ceylon threw out his petition, holding that it had no matrimonial jurisdiction over Englishmen, resident in Ceylon, except where the marriage was contracted in the island. The husband appealed to the Privy Council, and it was contended for him that though the petitioner was not a permanent resident of the island, still his residence there was long enough and of such a degree of permanence as to be recognized as a matrimonial domicile, but Lord Watson who delivered the judgment of the Privy Council, overruled this contention, holding that nothing short of a permanent domicile was required in a locality to give to its Courts matrimonial jurisdiction to pass a decree for divorce a vinculo.

In holding so their Lordships concurred without reservation in the views of Lord Penzance,(10) who had said: "It is the strong inclination of my own opinion that the only fast and satisfactory rule to adopt on this matter of jurisdiction, is to insist upon the parties in all cases referring their matrimonial differences to the Courts of the country in which they are domiciled. Different communities have different views and laws respecting matrimonial obligations, and a different estimate of the causes which should justify divorce. It is just and reasonable, therefore, that the differences of married people should be adjusted in accordance with the laws of the community to which they belong, and dealt with by the tribunals which alone can administer those laws. An honest adherence to this principle, moreover, will preclude the scandal which arises when a man and a woman are held to be man and wife in one country and strangers in

(7) Act XV of 1872.
(8) Lopez v. Lopez, 12 C. 706, F. B.
(9) Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier, (1895) A. C. 517.
(10) In Wilson v. Wilson, L. R. 2 P. & D. 442.

another."[11] Words to the same effect were used in another case, in which Lopez, L. J., said: "As a general rule, it may be stated that jurisdiction in matters matrimonial depends upon the domicile of the parties to a marriage at the time of the commencement of the proceedings for a divorce. The English Divorce Court has jurisdiction to dissolve the marriage of any parties domiciled in England at the commencement of such proceedings, and this independently of the residence of the parties, the allegiance of the parties, the domicile of the parties at the time of the marriage, the place of the marriage, or the place where the matrimonial offence or offences have been committed."[12] Now since the jurisdiction to divorce is a part of the matrimonial jurisdiction of the Court, it follows that the lex loci cannot bind parties not subject to local jurisdiction.

5508. Indian Converts.—But the case of native converts to Christianity stands on a different footing. Being natives of India, they are members of a community where polygamy is the rule, monogamy an exception. The fact that they are converts to Christianity does not imply any necessary religious obligation of monogamy. For as observed by Innes, J., a profession of Christianity does not ipso facto impose any such obligation, although doubtless the tendency of Christianity is adverse to polygamy.[13] Polygamy as an offence exists only by Statute, and the only Statute against polygamy is 9 Geo. IV, c. 74 s. 70, of which, however only applies to persons in India professing the Christian religion at the time of the second marriage.[14] Consequently, if a Christian married a Christian woman and then relapsing into Hinduism remarried a Hindu woman, the Statute could not touch him, because he was not a professed Christian, but a professed Hindu at the time of his second marriage, nor indeed, could his second marriage be held to be void for the purpose of the present section, for Hindu law sanctions polygamy and in readmitting a Christian to caste, Hindu law altogether ignores the status which he had just abandoned together with all obligations contracted under it, and consequently, it does not recognise anything as a marriage which was not entered upon by him as a Hindu, and with Hindu forms and ceremonies. Such a person, then could not be convicted of this offence,[15] though he would, of course, be liable for maintaining his Christian wife.[16]

Position of Hindu Converts.

5509. The same question was indirectly involved in a suit instituted for another purpose, which was ultimately disposed of by the Privy Council. There, the parties were residents of Bellary of Hindu origin, but had become converted to Christianity, and the question was whether one of them, a widow, was entitled to a share of the family property or only to maintenance. It was clear that if the parties were governed by Hindu Law she was entitled to no share. Consequently, it was contended for her that in India the status of religion as regards natives is the status of law; that the law was the religion both of Hindus and Mahomedans, and the Hindu law being a law of religion, could not apply to persons who

---

(11) Ib., cited per Lord Watson in Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier, (1895) A. C. 517 (540, 541).

(12) Goulder v. Goulder, (1892) P. 240.

(13) Anon, 3 M. H. C. (App.) 7; Muthusami v. Masilamani, 33 M. 342; Antony, ib., 371.

(14) Anon, 3 M. H. C. (App.) 7.

(15) Ib.

(16) 4 M. H. C. R. (App.) 3.

were not Hindus, but were Christians, who must be governed by the English law. But these contentions were overruled by Lord Kingsdown, who delivering the judgment of their Lordships, said: "Considering the case, then, with reference to parcenership, what is the position of a member of a Hindu family who has become a convert to Christianity? He becomes, as their Lordships apprehend, at once severed from the family and regarded by them as an outcaste. The tie which bound the family together is, so far as he is concerned, not only loosened, but dissolved. The obligations consequent upon and connected with the tie must, as it seems to their Lordships, be dissolved with it. Partnership may be put an end to by a severance effected by partition, it must, as their Lordships think, equally be put an end to by severance which the Hindu law recognizes and creates. Their Lordships, therefore, are of opinion, that upon the conversion of a Hindu to Christianity the Hindu law ceases to have any continuing obligatory force upon the convert. He may renounce the old law by which he was bound, as he has renounced his old religion, or if he thinks fit, he may abide by the old law, notwithstanding he has renounced the old religion."(17)

Later on their Lordships intimated as their opinion that the change of religion does not necessarily imply the rejection of all old customs, but at the same time custom implies continuance and a custom adhered to in one generation may be abandoned in the next: "If a family of converts retain the customs in part of their unconverted predecessors, is that election of theirs invariable and inflexible? Can neither they nor their descendants change things in their very nature variable, as dependent on the changeful inclinations, feelings, obligations of successive generations of men? If the spirit of an adopted religion improves those who become converts to it, and they reject, from conscience, customs to which their first converted ancestors adhered, must the abandoned usages be treated by a sort of fictio juris as still the enduring customs of the family? If it be not so as to things which belong to the Jurisdiction of Conscience, is it so as to things of convenience or interest? Surely, in things indifferent in themselves, the tribunals which have a discretion and have no lex fori imposed on them, should rather proceed on what actually exists than what has existed, and informing their own presumptions have regard rather to a man's own way of life than to that of his predecessors. Though race and blood are independent of volition, usage is not.(18)

Presumption of Polygamy.

5510. This precedent is then an authority for the two following propositions: (i) that in the case of a Hindu the existence of polygamy would be presumed until the contrary is shown; but (ii) in the case of a Hindu or Mahomedan convert to Chritianity, the question whether he still retained the custom of polygamy is a question of fact,—its continuance is not inconsistent with his conversion, but it cannot be presumed, but must be proved. A native convert thus takes an intermediate place between a Hindu and a European Christian, but he has the right to join either the former or the latter, whether he chooses to retain or reject polygamy as a part of his creed. There is, however, a dictum of Wilson, J., in a Full Bench case of the Calcutta Court which points to a different conclusion.

(17) Abraham v. Abraham, 9 M. I. A. 194 (237, 238).

(18) Abraham v. Abraham, 9 M. I. A. 194 (243, 244).

In that case the parties were also East Indians, but there was nothing to suggest that they were of Hindu or Mahomedan origin. On the contrary, their names suggested a Portuguese origin.[19] The petitioner A sued B for the restitution of conjugal rights. B pleaded the invalidity of his marriage with A, on the ground that he had been previously married to A's sister since deceased. It was proved that B had formally married A's sister, while she was on her death-bed and with whom he had previously formed an illicit connection. A's sister died in 1871 and the respondent married A in 1877. On hearing B's defence A amended her plaint by claiming either the restitution of conjugal rights or the nullity of her marriage with B, and the question depended upon the status conferred on A by her marriage with B, in view of the fact that she was proved to be B's deceased wife's sister.

The question was referred to the full bench, for whom Wilson, J., delivered the judgment. He held the English common law as well as the statutory prohibition inapplicable to Christians domiciled in India and not of European origin, whom he held to be bound only by the customary law of the class to which they belonged.[20] This is in entire harmony with the view of Innes, J. before referred to.[21] But in distinguishing the judgment of Lord Kingsdown[22] he permitted himself to say: "And we do not suppose the law could permit native converts (if one can imagine their desiring such a thing), to choose for themselves some marriage law wholly repugnant to Christian ideas, converts from Hinduism, for instance, to retain their former right to marry more wives than one, or converts from Mahomedanism their former freedom of divorce."[23] But as to this all that need to be stated here is, that whatever may be the intention of law against polygamy among Christians, there is at present no law prohibiting it, and if Christian converts from polygamous creeds desire to continue polygamy, their conversion to Christianity of itself offers no effective impediment, howmuchsoever distasteful such a course may appear to the more enlightened members of that community.

5511. Ceremonial, an Index of the Obligation Implied.—But whatever may be the law affecting Christian converts, there can be no doubt that no person, whether a convert or a non-domiciled British can throw up the obligations and duties undertaken or implied by his marriage. For instance, if a Christian was married to another Christian in church, that fact is alone sufficient to carry with it a pledge on the part of parties usually implied in such marriages. If, therefore, the parties are resident, but non-domiciled Europeans, monogamy is most certainly one of such pledges. If a domiciled native, whether a Hindu or a Mahomedan, it is as certainly not, whether he was married in church to a Christian or otherwise. But if in the former case, suppose the marriage was solemnised not in church, but in a mosque according to the rites of Islam, could it be doubted that the same pledge can by no means be assumed? Such a marriage may not be, as indeed it is not, a marriage in the Christian sense, but for that very reason it does not imply those obligations which are a recognized part of that marriage. So again, in the latter case, either the marriage of a Christian with a non-Christian contracted in church may or may not

(19) Lopez v. Lopez, 12 C. 706 (720), F. B.
(20) Ib., p. 731.
(21) 3 M. H. C. R. (App.) 7.
(22) Abraham v. Abraham, 9 M. I. A. 195.
(23) Lopez v. Lopez, 12 C. 706 (722), F. B.

be valid, but it could not place on the non-Christian any unusual restriction as to his right of polygamy, any more than if he had been married in his own house according to the rites of his caste. But in either case, if the marriage is valid, it is valid for all time, unless it is legally dissolved. Its obligations cannot be cast off by a mere change of religion, whether the conversion be real or colourable. Nay more, the status created by the first marriage cannot be superseded by a second marriage celebrated between the parties according to a different form which ordinarily creates a different status.

5512. The plaintiff in a case, by name Nawab Mirza alias Stuart Skinner, married the defendant Badshah Begum alias Charlotte Skinner, when they were both Christians in the English form in a church at Meerut. They then reverted to their original faith of Islam and then got remarried according to Mahomedan Law. Charlotte was the daughter of an Englishman, one Martine Blake, of the Bengal Civil Service, by a Mahomedan woman. On the death of Stuart Skinner, she claimed one-third of her husband's estate according to the English law of inheritance, or otherwise Rs. 50,000, which was her dower fixed at her second marriage, and one-eighth of the remaining estate according to Mahomedan law. The defence taken was a divorce which was, however, not proved, so that the only question that remained for decision was the right acquired by the plaintiff under the two marriages with the deceased. The case was finally decided by the Privy Council before whom the question went up as to the legality and effect of the two marriages; but their Lordships had no difficulty in holding that the legal status created by the first Christian marriage could not be affected, and remained unaffected by the parties' subsequent marriage according to Mahomedan law. But since Stuart Skinner was a Mahomedan at the time of his death, his widow Charlotte Skinner could only inherit his estate as his widow.

In holding so, Lord Watson, who delivered the judgement of the Privy Council, said: "One of the many peculiar features of this suit arises from the circumstance that in the case of spouses resident in India, their personal status, and what is frequently termed the status of the marriages is not solely dependent upon domicile, but involves the element of religious creed. Whether a change of religion made honestly after marriage with the assent of both spouses, without any intent to commit a fraud upon the law, will have the effect of altering rights incidental to the marriage, such as that of divorce, is a question of importance, and it may be of nicety. In the present case that question does not arise for decision, unless it is shown that Stuart Skinner did, in fact, divorce Badshah Begum according to Mahomedan form."(24) Their Lordships, moreover, refrained from expressing any opinion as to the effect of a change of religions by the spouses, their domicile remaining the same, upon the rights of one or other of them which are incidental to marriage.(25) In this case the conversion was merely a reversion to the original faith, and though their Lordships took care to reserve the point, there can be no doubt that if the divorce alleged had been proved, it could not have affected the lady's status already created by her former marriage.

(24) Skinner v. Skinner, 25 C. 537 (546), P. C. (25) Ib., p. 546.

Marriage of Hindu and Mahomedan Apostates.

5513. This was the ratio decidendi of another case decided upon the following facts: The accused originally a Hindu and an illegitimate child of Kshatri parents, was duly married according to Hindu rites to another Kshatri by name Dukhi. She then became converted to Mahomedanism and married a Mahomedan by name Quzaffar, whereupon Dukhi prosecuted her for this offence, of which she was convicted. She moved the High Court in revision, urging that her marriage to Dukhi was not valid, as they belonged to different castes and could not have married under Hindu law; that even if her former marriage were valid, it became dissolved under Hindu law by her conversion to another faith, and that in any case her second marriage was not void under Mahomedan law. The first contention was evidently supported on the ground of the accused's illegitimacy which conferred on her no status, but the Court held it to be no impediment to the validity of her marriage to a Kshatriya, if other Kshatriyas recognized her, as they had in fact done, as belonging to their caste.

The second contention was sought to be supported by reference to the view of Hindu law expounded in a case,[1] in which it was held that Hindu law regarded an apostate wife as civilly dead, but the Court dissented from it, holding that, that may be so as regards her civil rights, but it found no authority in Hindu law for the position that a degraded person or an apostate is absolved from all civil obligation incurred before degradation or an apostacy. So far as the matrimonial bond was concerned, the Court considered such a view as contrary to the spirit of the Hindu law which regards that bond as absolutely indissoluble.[2] The Court considered the third contention important and not altogether free from difficulty. It was sought to be supported on the authority of Mahomedan law,[3] which lays down that when the wife becomes a convert to the Mussalman faith, and the husband is an unbeliever, the Magistrate is to call upon him to embrace Islam, and if he does so, the woman continues as his wife, but if he refuses, the Magistrate must separate them; and if the wife embrace the Mahomedan faith in a foreign country, and the husband is an unbeliever, separation takes place on the expiration of three months.[4] The Court held that the accused had not complied with the terms of this law, in that she had not given the requisite notice, nor did her conversion to Islam in a foreign country suffice to dissolve her Hindu marriage: "A sacred and solemn relation by marriage cannot, we think, be regarded as terminated simply by the change of faith of either spouse without notice to the other, or the intervention of a Court of Justice."[5] Consequently the Court declined to interfere with her conviction.[6]

5514. In this case, the Court did not consider the question whether her conversion was sincere or merely colourable, made to evade her matri-

(1) So held in Rahmad Beebee v. Rokeya Beebee, 1 Norton's L. C. on Hindu L., 12.

(2) Ram Kumari, 18 C. 264; citing Manu, vv. 156-158, IX, 46, and following Government of Bombay v. Ganga, 4 B. 330; Administrator-General of Madras v. Anandachari, 9 M. 466; Millard, 10 M. 218.

(3) Hedaya, Bk. 2, c. 5 (Grady's Ed. of Hamilton's Translation, pp. 64, 65); Bailie's Dig., 2nd Ed., pp. 180, 181.

(4) Similar provisions are enacted by Act XXI of 1866.

(5) Ram Kumari, 18 C. 264 (271).

(6) Ram Kumari, 18 C. 264; Nandi, 1 L. 440; Lazar, 30 M. 550; Jamna Devi v. Mulraj, (1907) P. R. No. 49; Rurri, (1919) P. R. 5, 48 I. C. 493, 20 Cr. L. J. 3.

monial obligation. If such had been the case, her second marriage would have been void as a fraud on the law. It was evidently the view of the Privy Council in a case in which a Christian widow began to cohabit with another Christian by name John, who had been already married to a Christian wife, who was then alive. John and the widow wished to legalize their connection, and so both turned Mahomedans, and as John became then qualified to contract a polygamous marriage, he married the widow in accordance with Mahomedan law. The High Court at Allahabad expressed doubts of the legality of this marriage, which their Lordships of the Privy Council thought they were well warranted in entertaining.(7)

The same question was viewed from another stand-point in Madras, in a suit for administration of the estate of the deceased A, who was by birth a Brahmin, and had married, according to Hindu law, a girl aged eight years, in 1849. Two years later, he became converted to Christianity, and in 1858 he married a Christian C in a Christian form. The latter marriage was found to be bona fide, but nevertheless it was held to be invalid, because the conversion of A to Christianity after his marriage to B did not dissolve that marriage, and so long as that marriage was subsisting, A could not marry C according to the Christian form in church, so that A's marriage with C was invalid in spite of the fact that he had gone through the form of marriage with her.(8) A somewhat converse case is presented by the facts of the following case. The accused, Irisi, by birth a Pariah girl, was during the famine of 1877 baptized to Christianity. She was then an infant. In 1885 Irisi was married to one Sabban in accordance with the form and custom of the Pariahs, to which Sabban, also belonged. A month after her marriage Sabban discarded her alleging that he had been deceived into marrying a Christian, whereupon the Catholic priest Millard married her to a Christian according to the Christian form of marriage. Irisi and Millard were both convicted, the former of this offence, and the latter of abetment and the legality of their conviction depended upon the validity of Irisi's first Pariah marriage; and that depended upon whether Irisi had relapsed into Hinduism at the time of marriage, which the Court held proved on the evidence adduced in the case. Her first marriage being then valid, her second marriage was necessarily void, since that marriage was contracted before her first marriage had been legally dissolved under the Native Converts' Marriage Dissolution Act, 1886,(9) and in that view the Court affirmed the convictions of both the girl and the priest.(10)

Status of Indian Converts.

5515. This case once more confirms the view expressed before as to the difference in status between a European Christian and a native convert. The status of the former is essentially a Christian status, and whether he is permanently domiciled in this country or not, he is presumed to continue to possess that status, though it is open to him to change it by avowed conversion to a polygamous faith. On the other hand, the status of a native convert is not necessarily a Christian status, for it all depends upon circumstances. His conversion to Christianity does not necessarily imply a repudiation of all Pagan Customs, for while professing that

(7) Skinner v. Orde, 14 M. I. A. 308 (324).

(8) Administrator-General v. Anandachari, 9 M. 466 (470, 471).

(9) Act XXI of 1866.

(10) Millard, 10 M. 218.

religion he may conform to or observe any or all the customs of his Pagan faith, so long as they are not necessarily inconsistent with Christianity. The question as to what customs a native Christian observes is then a question of fact, but it is a fact which the Courts determine having regard to the costume adopted by the family,[11] the change of names, manner and habits of life[12] and in fact other similar acts from which the Court may reasonably infer that the intention of the parties was to copy the faith and mode of living of European Christians, and so become a class apart of what is ordinarily termed "East Indians."

So referring to this distinction Lord Kingsdown said: Their Lordships collect from the evidence that the class known in India as "Native Christians," using that term in its wide and extended sense as embracing all natives converted to Christianity, has subordinate divisions forming again distinct classes, of which some adhere to the Hindu customs and usages, as to property; others retain those customs and usages in a modified form: and others again have wholly abandoned those customs and usages, and adopted different rules and laws as to their property. Of this latter class are the 'East Indians,' a class well defined in India, the members of which follow in all things, the usages and customs of the English resident there, and though they cannot claim the exemption from jurisdiction, nor the privileges of a personal law, which the British subjects in the limited sense of the terms of the jurisdiction of the charters of the Supreme Courts enjoy, in other respects, in the common bond of union in religion, customs, and manners, approach the class of British subjects."[13]

Their Lordships' remarks were, of course, confined to customs regulating the devolution of property, because that was the only question before them, but it is evident that persons entitled to retain customs of one kind are equally entitled to retain customs of another kind, if they are not necessarily inconsistent with the change of faith. So in another case the accused, a Hindu convert to Christianity, married a Christian woman according to the rites of the Roman Catholic religion. He subsequently renounced Christianity and again became a Hindu, marrying a Hindu woman according to the Hindu rites, his Christian wife being then alive. It was held that the accused could not be convicted of bigamy, since the second marriage was not forbidden by Hindu law.[14] But he would have committed this offence if he had married a Hindu woman according to Hindu rites without himself becoming reconverted to Hinduism.[15]

Dissolution of Native Converts, Marriage.

5516. That the change of faith does not necessarily involve a change in the matrimonial status is recognized by the very Statute enacted with the professed object of legalizing under certain circumstances, the dissolution of native converts to Christianity.[16] Under that Act a non-Christian native married before his or her con-

(11) Skinner v. Orde, 14 M. I. A. 309 (324).
(12) Abraham v. Abraham, 9 M. I. A. 195 (240, 241).
(13) Ib.
(14) Antony, 33 M. 371; following Proceedings, 3 M. H. C. R. (App.) vii.
(15) Lazar, 30 M. 550.
(16) Act XXI of 1896, Prefatory words and Preamble.

version to the Christian faith may petition the Court for the dissolution of his or her marriage, and the Court shall thereupon issue notice to the other party to the marriage and call upon him or her to cohabit with the convert. If the respondent declined to cohabit the case shall be adjourned for a year, the parties being in the meantime free to persuade each other to reconsider their position, but if the spouse is after the year still recalcitrant, then the Court may decree the dissolution of their marriage.(17) But the dissolution of the marriage is decreed, not because the marriage becomes void upon a party's conversion to another faith, but because in consequence of such conversion there is desertion and the repudiation of matrimonial obligation by the other party. The procedure enacted by this Act is not unlike that enjoined by the Mahomedan law upon a conversion of a married person to that faith.(18)

5517. Mahomedan Law.—The question whether a person's second marriage is void so as to expose him to the penalty of this section may thus involve reference to the personal law of the party, affected as it may be by the change of religion, the law of domicile, the performance and observance of ceremonies and custom peculiar to each sect of family. For instance, it is a recognized doctrine of Mahomedan law that a Mahomedan minor may on attaining puberty repudiate her marriage by an unauthorized person, e.g., her mother, since the marriage of an infant by any person other than the father or grandfather is voidable at the option of the infant upon attaining puberty, the difference between the Sunni and Shiah scholars on this point being that while the former regard such marriage voidable, but not void, the latter regard them as void till ratified by the minor on attaining puberty.

Hence, where the accused Badal, a Mahomedan woman, was married to the prosecutor one Jai Lal Shaikh when aged five years, by her widowed mother. Jai Lal was in jail when the girl attained puberty, whereupon her mother got her again married to the second accused Puran. On his release from jail Jai Lal induced Badal to return to him, but as she refused, he prosecuted both her and her second husband for this offence and adultery respectively. The Court, however, held her first marriage with the prosecutor not proved, and it further held that even if it had been established the accused could not have been convicted, because on attaining her puberty Badal must be deemed to have repudiated her first marriage by her contracting the second marriage with her co-accused.(19) But here the result would have been different, if Badal had been married in the presence of, or with the consent of her father, though the latter may not have himself given her away in marriage.(20) So, again, Mahomedan law prescribes a period of iddat, during which a woman who has lost her first husband cannot re-marry. But the period of such iddat may be curtailed by custom recognized as valid and binding on the parties. Where, therefore, B who was the father of A, remarried her within (17) Ib., ss. 15, 17.

(18) Ram Kumari, 18 C. 264.
(19) Badal Aurat, 19 C. 79; Hub Ali, 21 A. L. J. 187. (1923) A. I. R. (A.) 329 (in which the girl was twice married before her puberty).
(20) Sheikh Alimuddin, 10 C. W. N. 982; distinguishing Badal Aurat, 19 C. 79.

the period of iddat that is, within only three months of the death of A's husband, whereupon A was convicted of this offence and B of abetting her, the Court upheld the conviction applying the general law, to which A and B had not set up any variation by custom.[21] It has been said before that polygamy is permissible to a Mahomedan, but while it is so, it is nevertheless limited to four wives so that his marriage to a fifth wife is illegal even though one of the four be kept partially divorced.[22]

5518. Proof of Marriage.—The validity of a marriage no less than its sufficiency must depend upon the personal law of the parties, and the ceremonious observance recognized by the community as sufficient to constitute marriage. In this respect again, matrimonial law may be divided into Christian and non-Christian laws. To constitute a valid marriage by the common law of England, it must have been celebrated in the presence of a clergyman in holy orders.[23] But this is the ordinary rule only confined to England and Ireland,[24] but it does not extend to the Colonies and England's dependencies.[25] For instance, if the presence of a minister in holy orders is impossible, marriage-tie may be completed otherwise. For, as observed by Willes, J., after an exhaustive examination of the authorities, the presence of the priest was a sine qua non to a valid marriage, since it was the duty of the priest to see that the parties were not within the prohibited degrees and not to marry them, if there was that or any other impediment to their marriage.[1] His presence was in later times required as of a trustworthy witness.[2] His presence was thus necessary but not indispensable till it appears to have been so made by the Council of Trent. The necessity of the presence of an ordained minister to solemnize a Christian marriage has been now finally settled in England, in a case in which the husband who was himself a minister in holy orders had married himself to his wife there being no third person present. He had by this marriage a son, who claimed his father's estate. which was opposed by his second son, on the ground that the deceased had not been legally married to the claimant's mother. The legality of the marriage was considered by three Judges, whose judgment was delivered by Willes, J., who upon a review of authorities held the presence of a clergyman by no means necessary for a Christian marriage, though the presence of a minister was ordinarily required to solemnize and witness it.

(1) Christian Marriage.

As was observed by the Lord Chancellor in the leading case:[3] "Marriage is a contract, which ought according to the ancient usage, to be confirmed by the priestly benediction; and, properly speaking, this ought to be given by the proper parochial minister, or some one

---

(21) Bibi (Mt.) (1882) P. R. No. 43.
(22) Rabnawaz, (1875) P. R. No. 43.
(23) Millis, 10 Cl. & F. 534; Beamish v. Beamish, 9 H. L. C. 274.
(24) Beamish v. Beamish 9 H. L. C. 274 (353).
(25) Maclean v. Cristall, Perry's Orient Cas. 75.
(1) Beamish v. Beamish, 9 H. L. C. 274 (314, 315). The judgment of Willes, J., was reversed, but on a different point, ib., pp. 359, 360.
(2) Ib., p. 320.
(3) Millis, 10 Cl. F. 753.

authorised by him according to the rules of the church. Other ceremonies are also to be observed. None of all this, however, is essential to the validity of the marriage." But the essence of marriage is the expression of an agreement by the parties that they shall thereafter live as man and wife, all else is ceremony.(4) "The subsequent giving of the ring and joining of hands, and publication of the fact of marriage by the minister, are in their nature, and are stated to be symbolical and declaratory of a marriage which has already taken place by the consent of the parties. The blessing is as of persons who have already consented together in wedlock, and anciently, as well in England as abroad, the nuptial benedictions were given only at a first marriage, the rest of the service consist of thanksgiving, exhortation and prayer."(5)

5519. The want of a person to give away the bride is not visited by the general law with any consequences.(6) So the omission of the giving of the ring, and the subsequent part of the ceremony is for civil purposes non-essential, so is an omission by the minister to give the proper warning. But the case in which these observations occur was reversed on appeal to the House of Lords, who, however, expressed their dissent only from the conclusion arrived at by Willes, J., and his associate Judges, and this they did reluctantly, both because the result of their finding was to stamp the children of the deceased with the stigma of bastardy as well as because they felt bound by an earlier decision of the same House in which, however, the finding had been arrived at by the majority of six to five.(7) All the same the learned Law Lords guarded themselves by confining their decision only to holding that according to the common law of England and Ireland, a Christian marriage required the presence of a minister of the church to solemnize it, and that since the same person could not be both the bridegroom as well as the minister, the plaintiff's father's marriage was invalid. They, however, declined to say what would have been the law if the plaintiff's father had been married on board a ship by the captain, or in a colony of this country. Indeed, the Council drew their Lordships' attention to a case in which the strict doctrine of the leading precedent(8) was held to be inapplicable,(9) whereupon Lord Cranworth said that in the case before them at least the question was left open.(10) But marriages by necessity have been since recognized, and the maxim, "Consensus facit matrimonium," long understood to be the universal law in Christendom, still expresses the true view of marriage, though such consent must be as decreed by Pope Alexander III per verba de presenti.(11)

5520 Christian Marriages in India.—However, whatever may be the common law applicable to England and Ireland, Christian marriages in India are now the subject of a special enactment,(12) which

(4) Litt., s. 39; cited Beamish v. Beamish, 9 H. L. C. 274 (329, 330).
(5) Beamish v. Beamish, 9 H. L. C. 274 (330).
(6) Ib., pp. 333, 331.
(7) Ib., pp. 314, 315.
(8) Millis, 10 Cl. & F. 534.
(9) Maclean v. Cristall, Perry's Orient. Cas. 75.
(10) Beamish v. Beamish, 9 H. L. C. 274 (353).
(11) Per Lord Campbell, L. C. in Beamish v. Beamish, 9 H. L. C. 274 (335).
(12) Act XV of 1872.

prescribes the special procedure for the solemnization of Christian marriages declaring marriages otherwise solemnized as void.[13] Under that Act Christian marriages may be solemnized by (i) an ordained minister of the church according to the rites of any denomination to which the minister may belong; (ii) by a minister licensed to solemnize marriages; (iii) by a person licensed to grant certificates of marriage between native Christians; and (iv) by a marriage registrar, who must be a Christian, though in his absence or during his illness his duty may be discharged by the District Magistrate.[14] The time ordinarily fixed for solemnizing marriage is between 6 a.m. and 7 p.m., and the place the church, though exception is permitted in certain cases, as where marriage is solemnized at a different hour under a special license or in a place other than a church, when a church is not within five miles of the place.[15] A notice of an intended marriage to be solemnized by a minister of religion is to be given and affixed in some conspicuous part of the church in which the marriage is to be solemnized.[16] If the intended marriage be by registry, a similar notice must be served on the marriage registrar, who is to affix it to a conspicuous place in his office. When the contracting parties are minors, marriage may be solemnized with the consent of the father, or if he is dead a guardian of the person of the minor.[17]

5521. The minister may solemnize marriage according to such form or ceremony as he thinks fit to adopt, but it should be solemnized in the presence of at least two witnesses.[18] A marriage once solemnized shall not be invalid on account of any misdescription as to the dwelling of the parties, want of consent, or any irregularity as to the notice, certificate, time and place and registration of the marriage.[19] The presence of two witnesses is, however, necessary.

5522. Proof of such marriage may be established by the evidence of persons who were present at its solemnization, or by a certified copy of the marriage register or certificate. In England, marriage is usually proved by the production of the Parish or other register, or a certified extract therefrom. But a marriage celebrated abroad requires a higher degree of proof, for it must then be proved by the evidence of a witness then present, who must be able to describe the ceremony so as to enable the Court to judge whether it would suffice to constitute a marriage in law.[20] He must also be able to identify the parties.[21] Identification by photographs is admitted for the purpose of identification,[22] but it is held insufficient for the present purpose.[23] So where in a divorce-case the petitioner, the husband, showed to a witness a photograph of his wife and asked him if that was not the woman who was seen in a compromising situation with the co-respondent, the Court remarked that it could not allow a photo-

(13) Act XV of 1872, s. 4.
(14) Ib., s. 7.
(15) Act XV of 1872 10, 11.
(16) Ib., s. 12.
(17) Ib., s. 19.
(18) Ib., s. 25.
(19) Ib., s. 77.
(20) Ib., s. 80.
(21) Allison, R. & R. 109; Millis, 10 Cl. & F. 534.
(22) Mainwaring. 26 L. J. M. C. 10; Simpson, 15 Cox. 323.
(23) Tolson, 4 F. & F. 103.

graph to be shown to a witness for the purpose of identification except under very special circumstances.(24)

And since the onus of proving a previous lawful marriage is on the prosecution, it must be discharged by proof both of the marriage as well as its validity, and this duty cannot be dispensed with merely because the accused admits a prior marriage,(25) because the prosecution cannot rely upon any statement of the accused to fill in a gap in their own case.(1) If any of the parties to the marriage was a minor, evidence must be adduced to show that it had been solemnized with the consent of the father (2) or that the father being dead consent of the guardian of the person had been previously obtained, though if evidence of this is lacking it may be presumed from a subsequent approval. Moreover, the want of consent is now a mere irregularity which does not vitiate a marriage after it is once solemnized.(3)

5523. Christian marriages celebrated abroad are now the subject of a special enactment.(4) This Statute only applies to European British subjects or when one at least of the parties, is a British subject.(5) These provisions allow of a marriage being solemnized before a lay marriage-officer, after notice published as in the case of Christian marriages before considered. It also enables specially empowered captains of a ship (6) and British consul,(7) to solemnize such marriages on the sea and in foreign territory respectively. And in such case the marriage certificate or its copy would be evidence, though not a sufficient evidence to prove it. For it must be proved at least by presumptive evidence of the performance of a ceremony and that it constituted a good marriage according to the law of the place. So where A, a soldier in the British army at St. Domingo, married the widow of another soldier in a chapel, by a person attired as priest, and the service was conducted in French, but interpreted into English, by a person who officiated as clerk, after which the parties cohabited together as man and wife for eleven years, Lord Ellenborough held the marriage sufficiently proved,(8) though the woman afterwards said that she did not know that the person officiating was a priest; for the same answer would probably be given by most persons who are married there.(9) And so the fact that the marriage of a Protestant had been solemnized by a Roman Catholic priest, was no ground for holding it invalid,(10) a fortiori where one of them, a Protestant misrepresented himself to be a Roman Catholic.(11)

---

(24) Frith v. Frith, (1896) P. 74; Naguib, (1917) 1 K. B. 359.
(25) Frith v. Frith, (1896) P. 74.
(1) Truman, 1 East, P. C. 470; Flaherty, 2 C. & K. 782; Savage, 13 Cox. 178, dissenting from Newton, 2 M. & Rob. 503; s. c. Sub nom. Simmonsto, 1 Cox. 30.
(2) Basanta Kumar, 26 C. 49.
(3) Butler, R. & R. 61; Morton, R. & R.19; James, R. & R. 17; Smith v. Huson, 1 Phill. 287.
(4) Christian Marriage Act (XV of 1872), s. 77; to the same effect, Marriage Act, 1823 (4 Geo. 4, c. 76, s. 14); Birmingham, 8 B. & C. 29.
(5) Foreign Marriage Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict., c. 23).
(6) Ib., s. 1.
(7) Ib., s. 12.
(8) Ib., s. 18.
(9) Per Le Blanc, J., in The Inhabitants of Brampton, 10 East 282 (291).
(10) Griffin, 14 Cox. 308.
(11) Orgill, 9 C. & P. 89.

Jewish Marriage.

5524. And if the marriage was solemnized under the Jewish law, evidence must be given of a written contract between the parties,[12] since a marriage between Jews is incomplete without a written contract, witnessed by at least two witnesses.[13]

Foreign Marriage.

5525. In a prosecution for bigamy it lies on the prosecution to prove a previous valid marriage of the accused which constitutes his offence. Where such marriage took place in a foreign country, e.g., Egypt, it is on the prosecution to prove by calling independent evidence the factum of marriage and its validity, by the evidence of an expert. The accused, an Egyptian by birth and a Mahomedan by religion, was indicted for bigamy in that he had gone through the ceremony of marriage in England with two English women in 1903 and 1914. The accused examined himself to prove that he had been duly married in Egypt in 1898, which rendered his second marriage of 1903 invalid. The Court did not consider the effect of the prisoner's Egyptian marriage, but held his own evidence insufficient to prove it, holding that a foreign marriage could only be proved by independent evidence of witnesses to the essential ceremonies and of an expert as to its validity.[14]

Parsis.

5526. A marriage between Parsis is now governed by the Parsi Marriage and Divorce Act, 1865,[15] the provisions of which are on the subject exhaustive, but which as to the form of celebration generally follows the provisions of the Christian Marriage Act before abstracted. It may be proved by production of the marriage certificate or a certified copy of the entry in the marriage register.[16]

Buddhist.

5527. Since the Buddhist law recognizes polygamy,[17] a Buddhist male can commit no offence in marrying himself to several wives at the same time.

5528. Mahomedan Marriage.—Under Mahomedan law, marriage is a civil contract resembling a sale, and requires the presence of not only the father, but also a vakil and a kazi who is the officiating priest and reads the Sigha or the marriage formula The Sigha recited at the marriage of minors is different from that recited at the marriage of adults. The performance of the akd is a sine qua non without which no marriage is complete.[18] And in the case of the re-marriage of an adult widow, no marriage is legal where the widow has not given audible consent.[19] There is otherwise no specific ceremony enjoined, and no religious rites are, of course, necessary to make a marriage valid. But usage has established a uniform procedure which is as a rule followed in this country. A Mahomedan mar-

(12) Horn v. Noel, 1 Camp. 61; Althausen, 17 Cox. 330; Nassilskie, 61 J. P. 520; Weinberg, 33 L. J. N. S. 239.
(13) Nathan v. Woolfe, (1899) T. L. R. 250.
(14) Naguid, (1917) 1 K. B. 359.
(15) Act XV of 1865.
(16) Parsi Marriage and Divorce Act (XV of 1865), ss. 6-8.
(17) Mi Kin Gale v. Mi Kin Khan, (1910) U. B. R. 42, 8 I. C. 1169; Mi Mc v. Kishwe Ma, 39 C. 492, P. C.
(18) Badal Aurot, 19 C. 79; Bulanda, (1910) P. W. R. 33, 8 I. C. 94.
(19) Shabebi v. Kamaruddin, 15 C. W. N. 991.

riage is solemnized in the house of the bride's father, in the presence of the parties and their agents or vakils, and the guests invited to witness it. A deed called kabinnamah was at one time usually drawn up embodying the contract and the obligations which the husband incurs as to the payment of the dower, custody of the children, and the like. It must be attested by the walis or guardians of the parties, and may be attested also by their vakils and other witnesses. Such deeds are now becoming rare and have fallen into desuetude in the United Provinces, Bihar and other strongholds of the Indian Islam. Other localities have adopted other local variations, such as the exchange of presents, providing a new robe to the bridegroom, but these are social amenities engrafted upon the simplicity of the Hedaya, which makes marriage depend upon consent expressed by the parties,[20] and in this respect a Mahomedan marriage is indistinguishable from the English marriage as defined by Willes, J. (§§ 5518-5519).

5529. Under Mahomedan law marriage is a civil contract resembling a sale, and as is the case with other contracts, freedom of contract in the contracting parties is one of the essential conditions of its validity. Minority of the bridal pair is no bar to marriage provided the consent of the contracting parties is given by their parents,[21] or other persons duly authorized for the purpose of binding them.[22] But in the latter case the marriage of a Shiah minor who has neither attained puberty nor discretion remains fazul or an invalid marriage and can become valid only when the minor gives her consent after attaining puberty and mature understanding to perfect it,[23] while in the case of minors of other sects the marriage itself is valid if it is contracted by the father or paternal grandfather. If consented to by a more distant guardian the minor, immediately upon attaining puberty[24] or completion of her fourteenth year,[25] has the option of cancelling or confirming it;[1] but in this case till it is cancelled or confirmed the marriage remains a good marriage. In the case of a woman married after attaining puberty, it follows that her own consent is essential.[2] Words of proposal and acceptance must either be uttered by their contracting parties in the presence of each other, or they may be uttered by their agents or vakils in each other's presence, and in the presence and hearing of two males or one male or two female witnesses, who must be sane and adult Moslems, the whole transaction being completed at one meeting.[3] Besides the witnesses and the vakils or agents of either party, there must be present a Kazi who is the officiating priest and reads the Sigha.

5530. A Mahomedan cannot, however, marry a Hindu for has not the Koran declared: "Marry not a woman of the polytheists

(20) 1 Hedaya, p. 72.
(21) Hashan v. Khuda Buksh, (1880) P. R. 70-n.
(22) Sobrati v. Jungli, 2 C. W. N. 245.
(23) Soulate Begum v. Fakhiruddin, 20 C. 90; Mulha Jehan v. Mahommed, 26 W. R. 26 P. C.
(24) Bindi v. Mt. Bugli, (1909) P. R. No. 73, 2 I. C. 814.
(25) Atkia Begam v. Md. Ibrahim, 36 I. C. 20 P. C.
(1) Kullan v. Mt. Piari, (1879) P. R. No. 157.
(2) Bindu v. Mt. Bugli, (1909) P. R. No. 73, 2 I. C. 814; Sabati Babi v. Kamaruddin, 15 C. W. N. 991.
(3) Aklemannessa v. Mahomed Hatem, 31 C. 849.

until she embraces Islam."[4] This leaves him however liberty to marry a woman belonging to a monotheistic sect, as a Christian, a Jew [5] or even a Parsi.[6] But in the case of a mixed marriage with a Hindu, the prohibition is personal, so that while the marriage is invalid, the offsprings are not illegitimate. But as polygamy is permitted to Mahomedans the question about the validity of his marriage to a person of different religious persuasion, is scarcely material for the present purpose, except that if the marriage be valid the wife would be liable if she contracts another marriage unless her first marriage with a Mahomedan was invalid or she had been validly divorced by her husband. But the validity of a divorce depends not merely upon the form as on the lex loci contractus of the marriage. The applicant, a Mahomedan, sued for a writ of mandamus and a license authorizing him to marry in London an English woman. It appeared that he had married another English woman before, but whom he alleged to have divorced by a deed executed in India. But the Court of appeal held this divorce ineffectual inasmuch as his first marriage being an English marriage could only be divorced by the lex loci contractus, i.e., according to the English law and not according to the law of India (§§ 5541-5542). Consequently, it held the first marriage an impediment to the applicant's second marriage in England.[7]

Muta Marriage.

5531. Mahomeden law recognizes the muta or a temporary marriage of which the two essentials are that (i) its duration should be definitely fixed by agreement between the parties,[8] and (ii) a sum of money must be paid to wife as a dower.[9] As a nika stands higher than muta the latter might be superseded by the former.[10] But for the purpose of this offence a muta is an impediment during its continuance.

Apostacy dissolves the Marriage.

5532. Under Hindu law apostacy does not dissolve the marriage tie (§ 5513), but under Mahomedan law apostacy of the husband has that effect, so that the wife is set free to re-marry. But in order to have that effect the apostacy must be to a non-Islamic religion, and not merely a conversion from one sect to another, e.g., to the Ahmadiya sect.[11] One Azizul Haq and Jaitan, both Mahomedans of the Hanafi school, were husband and wife. Some years after their marriage, the husband Azizul Haq became a Christian, but within a month and a half he reverted to Islam. During this interval the woman Jaitan re-married one Abdul Aziz to whom her father gave her away in marriage. The husband prosecuted the wife for bigamy, and her father and second husband for its abetment. But the High Court quashed the commitment holding that the apostacy of the husband had ipso facto dissolved the nuptial tie.[12]

---

(4) Sale's Koran.
(5) 1 Hedaya, 85; 1 Fatawa Alamgiri, 398.
(6) Mufatib Sharaya, 274.
(7) Anwaruddin, (1917) 1 K. B. 634.
(8) Shobarat Singh v. Jafri Bibi, 19 C. W. N. 255 P. C.
(9) Akbar Husain v. Shoukhat, 19 M. L. J. 525, 31 I. C. 657.
(10) Baqar Mirza v. Mehdi Hasan, 19 O. C. 246.
(11) Narantakath v. Parakkal, 45 M. 986.
(12) Abdul Gani v. Azizul Haq, 39 C. 409; followed in Ghan v. Tajji, (1916) P. L. R. 114.

5533. Hindu Marriage.—The same question necessitates an excursion into the requirements of a Hindu marriage, for which, however, apart from Act XXX of 1923, there is no statutory law, and the ceremonial observances as to which are regulated by the usage of the caste to which the parties belong.(13) Nevertheless the usages of the twice born all over the country conform to certain well defined rules, the deviation from which is seldom permitted. There is, for instance, the betrothal or engagement called sagai, the usual ceremony attending which is faldan or the exchange of cocoanuts and other presents. This marks an irrevocable step for the girl, for unless the bridegroom dies or refuses to marry, she is not free to get engaged to any other person. After sagai, follows the marriage which is completed by the pair walking round a post to the recitation of mantras which constitutes the lagna or the ceremony of marriage. Under Hindu law the proper person to give away a girl in marriage is her own father and in his absence the mother. But a Hindu marriage is a sacrament, and once duly solemnized cannot be rendered invalid on the ground that it was brought about without the consent of the guardian in marriage or even in contravention of an express order of the Court.(14) It can be avoided for fraud but till it is set aside by a decree of Court it will support a charge for bigamy.(15)

A Hindu marriage is indissoluble except by custom. The caste panches cannot release the wife from her tie of marriage by the continued absence of the husband in a foreign country.(16) Apostacy does not dissolve a Hindu marriage without a decree of Court. Hence where a Hindu wife became a convert to Mahomedanism and married a Mahomedan, she was held guilty of this offence, though the Court judged her leniently as she was found to have acted through ignorance of law.(17)

5534. Inter-Caste Marriages.—There is no Shastric prohibition against intermarriages of persons of two different castes, though such marriages have fallen into desuetude, but this is only so by custom and not by the force of any positive law. As such the force of prohibition varies in each locality and its pristine rigidity has become greatly relaxed by the march of education; and in the Punjab where caste restrictions have never been so rigid as in the plains of Hindustan, such marriages are, within the limits, quite customary. However, as a rule, they are subject to the rule that a man is competent to marry a woman inferior in caste to his own, but not vice versa.(18) But this too does not appear to be an inflexible rule in the Punjab, where the marriage of a Brahmin with a Rajput woman has been as much "upheld"(19) as the marriage of a Jat with a Brahmin woman.(20) So there may be an intermarriage between a Minhas Rajput of the Gujrat district and a woman of the Vaishya caste.(21) Even in the United Provinces a

(13) Subbarayan, 9 M. 9.
(14) Gajjanand, 2 L. 288; following Maya Devi v. Ramchand, (1916) P. L. R. 20, 31 I. C. 186.
(15) Gajjanand, 2 L. 288.
(16) Ganga, 19 Bom. L. R. 56, 39 I. C. 308, 18 Cr. L. J. 468.
(17) Nandi, 1 L. 440, (Sentence 3 months' simple imprisonment).
(18) Nathu v. Gokal, (1893) P. R. No. 57; Pirthu Singh v. Bhola, (1883) P. R. No. 29.
(19) Ralla Ram v. Assaram, (1890) P. R. 48.
(20) Sahib Ditta v. Bela, (1900) P. R. No. 50.
(21) Khairu v. Fakirchand, (1900) P. R. No. 57.

marriage beween a Bania male and a woman born of a Brahmin father and a Bania mother, who is recognized by the husband's caste as a Bania, has been held to be valid.[22] As a rule intercaste marriages amongst Shudras are quite customary, so that if such marriage is proved, its validity is presumed.[23]

5535. Under Hindu law marriage is a sacrament, and as such indissoluble, without the option of divorce in case of misconduct. And since Hindu men are permitted polygamy while women are strictly confined to monogamy, it follows that while women may be exposed to the risk of this offence, men are by their personal law exempt from its provisions. In this respect Mahomedans and the Asiatics generally share the same immunity, for polygamy is the law of the East as monogamy is the rule of Christendom. But since polyandry is a rare exception confined to narrow tracts it may be generally asserted that this is a section which applies to women of whatever race or religion, though its application to men depends upon his personal law.

Hindu Divorce.

5536. But this is a general statement, and as such it has necessary limitations. For India is a continent and not a country, and its inhabitants differ so much in their religious observances and special usages as to make a general statement regarding them somewhat misleading. For instance while it is undoubtedly the rule that the marriage tie is unseverable amongst the three higher classes, it is equally true that Sudras, such as Telis, Kunbis and the like do recognize the custom of divorce, called "chorchutti," which, in the eye of the caste, amounts to civil death of the parties, solemnized as such by the giving of what is called the Marti Jiti feast. Thus if A a Sudra married B, A has the option of divorcing B if she misconducts herself with another and whereupon he gives a feast to the caste in token of his being dead to her, while her paramour gives another feast to symbolize his marriage to her. But here while B by her misconduct might force A to divorce her she could not divorce A of her own free will.

In other words, the right of divorce is the right of the husband and not of the wife, so much so that even if a local custom should be otherwise, the Court will refuse to give effect to it as being opposed to the spirit of Hindu law. Such a case arose in Bombay where it was proved in the case of Talapda Koli caste inhabiting the district and neighourhood of Surat that a woman might leave her first husband whenever she chose and without assigning any reason and contract a second marriage during his lifetime and without his consent; but the Court held such custom opposed to the spirit of Hindu law, so that a second marriage contracted by a Hindu woman of this caste exposed her to the penalties of this section.[24] This view was reaffirmed in another case in which the accused's husband, being a leper, she proposed to remarry and referred the matter to her caste panchayat who declared her first marriage void and sanctioned her second marriage whereupon her former husband prosecuted her for this offence,

---

(22) Madan Gopal, 34 A. 589.

(23) Mahantawa v. Gangawa, 33 B. 693 (697), following Inderun v. Ramasamy, 13 M. I. A. 141; Fakirganda v. Gangi, 22 B. 277.

(24) Karsan Goja, 2 B. H. C. R. 117.

of which she was convicted, the Court holding that her caste people had no authority to declare a marriage void, and that though the accused had acted in the bona fide belief that the consent of the caste made her second marriage valid, yet it only mitigated her offence but could not exculpate her.(25)

5537. But the latter finding cannot be readily acceded to. And as to the former, while it is true that the caste cannot create law, it could certainly declare a caste custom, and error communis facit jus. The weak point in the defence in the last case was an ex parte decision given by the caste to which the husband was no party. If he were present and received what he afterwards claimed his marriage expenses, then it would have been difficult to hold that the accused was still guilty. This was the distinguishing feature in the Madras case in which the Court upheld the decision of the caste given in the presence of both husband and wife, who declared that the parties had been divorced according to the caste usage. It was contended that a custom that dissolves a Hindu marriage must be regarded as immoral, but the Court was unable to fall in with that view and held that there was nothing immoral in a custom which did not ignore marriage as a legal institution, but provided a special mode for its dissolution. The fact that there was money payment did not make the custom immoral, and among the inferior castes similar customs are known to prevail.(1) The soundness of this view cannot be questioned even in Bombay,(2) where the Court has conceded to the husband the right of divorcing his wife for a sufficient reason, if such divorce is permitted by the caste. For instance, such divorce is permitted amongst Rajput Gujarats for the wife's incontinence.(3)

5538. Invalidity of Marriage Due to First Marriage.—This section does not punish for the error of contracting a void second marriage, but only when it is void by reason of its taking place during the life of the first spouse. This can only be the case where the first marriage was monogamous, which under the personal law of the parties precluded the possibility of a second valid marriage. In England it has been held that a marriage which is voidable merely, is sufficient to support an indictment for bigamy.(4) So a marriage by a minor in Ireland, without consent, which by the Irish Marriage Act was voidable only within a year, was held to support a conviction for bigamy if it was not avoided.(5) The same rule was held to apply to a marriage voidable for impotence of one of the parties.(6) A marriage is a subsisting marriage even after a decree nisi for its dissolution until it is dissolved by the decree absolute.(7)

(25) Sombhu Raghu, 1 B. 347; followed per West, J., in Mathura Naikin v. Esu Naikin, 4 B. 545 (569, 570); Keshav v. Bai Gandi, 39 B. 538; Bai Ganga, 19 Bom. L. R. 56, 39 I. C. 308.

(1) Sankaralingam v. Subban Chetti 17 M. 479 (480). To the same effect, Tholasingam, (1896) 1 Weir 568 (569); Chamia (Mt.), 7 C. L. R. 354; Jukai (Mt.) 19 C. 627; Ramji Teli v. Ragho Teli, 12 C. P. L. R. 19.

(2) Pinhey, J., explained want of consent on the part of the husband to be the gist of the ruling in Government of Bombay v. Ganga, 4 B. 330 (332).

(3) Umi, 6 B. 126.

(4) 3 Co. Inst. 88.

(5) Jacobs, 2 Mood. C. C. 140.

(6) A v. B, 27 L. R. Ir. 608.

(7) Hulse v. Hulese, L. R. 2 P. & D. 259.

The section requires that the second offence should be void by reason of the first, which must then be void or at least voidable. If it is void, there cannot of course be bigamy for the first marriage being a nullity is as good as if it had never taken place. It could not then be any "reason" for invalidating the second marriage. So Lord Hale said: "If a woman marry A, and in the lifetime of A marry B; and after the death of A, and whilst B is alive, she marry C, she cannot be indicted for bigamy in her marriage with C, because her marriage with B was a mere nullity."[8] So the marriage of an idiot or of a lunatic not in a lucid interval is void, because he is deemed in law incapable of entering into such a contract. As was observed by Brett, J., "A marriage is after all a contract, and like other contract, may be set aside for the same reason. So it may be dissolved if it was brought out by coercion, fear, fraud or undue influence."[9] But such marriage is not void but voidable, and, therefore, till it is set aside it will suffice to support a charge of bigamy. But this rule cannot be extended to a Hindu marriage which under Hindu law is a sacrament and indissoluble by whatever fraud it may have been compassed.

5539. Exceptions to Criminality.—Under English Law the charge for bigamy may be rebutted by (i) seven years' absence of the spouse or (ii) a bona fide belief in the spouse's death (iii) the dissolution of the first marriage. The section enacts the first and third exceptions and it will have to be seen whether in doing so it is intended to exclude the second exception. The first exception is a natural deduction from the section itself, for since this offence can only be committed so long as the first marriage is valid and subsisting, it follows that if it is legally dissolved by the decree of a Court of competent jurisdiction it can no longer stand in the way of the second marriage. This clause refers to a declaration made only by a Court of comptent jurisdiction from which it has been inferred that the Code does not recognize a similar declaration made by a caste panchayat, so that if a Hindu woman refers to her caste the question of the invalidity of her first marriage by reason of her husband's suffering from incurable leprosy, and the caste permit her to remarry declaring her first marriage null and void, such declaration would go for nothing since a caste punchayat is not "a Court of competent jurisdiction."

This view first taken by Melvill and Nanabhai Haridass, J. J.,[10] was evidently re-affirmed by West, J., who, however, said: "There is, perhaps, some room for doubt, whether, in framing the provisions of the Indian Penal Code as to offences relating to marriage, the conditions of life and the nature of the matrimonial relations amongst the lower castes, were very distinctly kept in view by the Indian Lgislature. But, in so far as the series of cases are instructive, the lesson they teach is that of the gradual subjugation of the sectional rules to the general law of the Hindu community."[11] But as to which it is sufficient to add that the section could have had no such object in view, and that at any rate in recognizing a judicial declaration as an exception it was more drawing on the corresponding rule of

(8) 1 Hale 693; Wiltshire (Earl), 6 Q. B. D. 366.
(9) Scott v. Sevright, 15 P. D. 21 (24).
(10) Sambhu Raghu, 1 B. 347.
(11) Mathura Naikin v. Esu Naikin, 4 B. 545 (570).

the English law than suppressing any sectional rules of Hindu law. Indeed, that such was not its object may be easily proved by reference to the very clause to which reference was made by the High Court. For if divorce is customary the Court may validly declare the dissolution of marriage, though it has no power to decree a dissolution.[12]

5540. Such declaration presupposes a previous dissolution made in accordance with custom, so that all that the Court can do is to declare the dissolution as a fact though it has no power to create a new jural relation between the parties. So it has been held that while the Court has power to give effect to the decision of a panchayat if it is in accordance with Hindu law or the custom of the caste, it is not bound to recognize all panchayat decision as final. So a Hindu husband does not lose his marital rights by his continued desertion[13] or a mere deprivation of caste which may be temporary, so that if the panchas declare a marriage dissolved on that ground the Court will not give effect to such decision.[14] It has already been stated that Hindu law does not prohibit polygamy and that at any rate the prohibition is except under certain circumstances, merely directory and not imperative.[15] Consequently, polygamy can never be a reason for a valid dissolution of a Hindu marriage.

5541. On the other hand, under Mahomedan law marriage is a civil contract, and may at any moment be dissolved by the husband by pronouncing the formula. "I hereby divorce thee," or words to that effect three times in her presence,[16] or even in her absence,[17] if the declaration was intended by him to dissolve the marriage, and on such a divorce, the Court would be justified in granting a similar declaration, and on such a declaration being made the first exception should certainly be a bar to a prosecution for this offence.

In the case of Christians[18] and Parsis,[19] there can be no divorce except under a judicial decree of the Court passed under the Acts providing for it.

5542. Although the clause speaks of the decree of a Court of competent jurisdiction as alone being a sufficient exception, it is likely that a decree passed by a court of incompetent jurisdiction would be just as much a defence if the party acted upon it in good faith and without being aware of that defect.[20]

Clause 3.

5543. Absence of Seven Years.—Another exception here enacted is also borrowed from the English Law under which the present Statute excepts from its operation "any person marrying a second time, whose husband or wife shall have been continually absent from such person for the space of seven years then last past, and shall not have known by such person to

---

(12) Mathura (Mt.) v. Kalicharan, 1 C. P. L. R. 18; Bisheshur v. Matagholam, 2 N. W. P. H. C. R. 300; Kudomees Dasi v. Joteeram, 3 C. 305.

(13) Ganga, 19 Bom. L. R. 56; 39 I. C. 308, 18 Cr. L. J. 468.

(14) Bisheshur v. Matagholam, 2 N. W. P. H. C. R. 300; contra in Sinammal v. Administrator-General, 8 M. 169.

(15) Viraswami v. Appaswami, 1 M. H. C. R. 375.

(16) Hamid Ali v. Imtiazan, 2 A. 71.

(17) Sherif Saib v. Usnabibi, 6 M. H. C. R. (Civ.) 452; Vadake v. Odakel, 3 M. 347.

(18) Act IV of 1869.

(19) Act XV of 1865.

(20) S. 79.

be living within that time."[21] This provision is based on antecedent law[22] and the general presumption which absence of this period creates under the following provision of the Indian Evidence Act:—

"108. Provided that when the question is whether a man is alive or dead, and it is proved that he has not been heard of for seven years by those who would naturally have heard of him if he had been alive, the burden of proving that he is alive is shifted to the person who affirms it."

5544. As a married person is naturally a person who "would naturally have heard" of his partner, the fact that he does not hear of his existence for a period of seven years creates a presumption that the person is dead, though such a presumption may afterwards be rebutted. But it is a presumption which is natural and upon which most persons act. Consequently, the section declares it to be an exception; but subject to this condition that the real state of facts as to his absent spouse were communicated to the person with whom the second marriage is contracted. This proviso is an improvement on the English rule which does not enjoin the same uberrima fides as is here enacted. But under both laws the seven years' absence otherwise exculpates the accused though it may be proved that he had other means readily available to ascertain the truth which he did not avail himself of.[23] In other words, the presumption arising from the seven years' continuous absence, though not irrebuttable, is yet sufficient to negative criminality for this offence,[24] or to put it differently, proof of seven years' absence carries with it the presumption of the accused's previous spouse's death and consequently of his innocence, unless the prosecution then show that in spite of the lapse of those years the accused did in fact know—and not merely that he had the means of ascertaining—that his spouse was alive at some time during the seven years, failing which the accused is entitled to be acquitted.[25]

The fact that he had himself deserted his wife is immaterial for this purpose.[1] The accused's first wife had left him sixteen years, and it was proved by the second wife that she had known him for nine years living as a single man, and had never heard of the first wife, who was, however, shown to have been living seventeen miles from where the defendant resided. He was, however, a poor labourer, and this exception was held to exculpate him.[2] So where on the trial of a woman for bigamy, it appeared that her husband had been absent from her for more than seven years, and there was no evidence that at the time of her second marriage she knew that he was alive, but there was evidence that she had the means of acquiring knowledge of that fact, had she chosen to make use of them, it was held that the facts found, justified an acquittal.[3] But where the prisoner A was shown to have been married to his wife B in 1865, but there was no evidence of the pair having ever separated, or as to when, if they separated, they last saw each other, the Court held this exception inapplicable to

(21) 24 & 25 Vict., c. 100, s. 57.
(22) 1 Hale, 693; 4 Black, 164; 1 East. P. C. 466; Cullen, 9 C. & P. 681; Jones, C. & M. 614; Briggs, 26 L. J. M. C. 7.
(23) Cullen, 9 C. & P. 681; Jones, Carr. & M. 614; Briggs, 26 L. J. M. C. 7; Curgerwen, 35 L. J. M. C. 58; Dane, 1 F. & F. 328; Cross, 1 F. & F. 510; Twyning, 2 B. & Ald. 386.
(24) Curgerwen, L. R. 1 C. C. 1; Heaton 3 F. & F. 819.
(25) Curgerwen, L. R. 1 C. C. 1, followed in Faulkes, (1903) 19 T. L. R. 250.
(1) Faulkes, (1903) 19 T. L. R. 250.
(2) Jones, C. & Mar. 614.
(3) Briggs, Dears & B. 98.

support the prisoner's second marriage in 1882, the Court holding that there was proof of the existence of a state of things and no evidence of the cessation of that state of things, consequently the presumption was that the existing state continued. That presumption could only have been displaced by evidence, and since no evidence displacing it was forthcoming the prisoner was rightly convicted of this offence.(4)

5545. In order that this exception should avail the prisoner, it is then necessary for him to prove both (i) separation as well as (ii) continuous absence for at least seven years as also (iii) that the prisoner had not heard of such person as being alive within that time; in addition to which, this clause further requires proof of (iv) communication of these facts to the other party to the second marriage, before it is contracted. This exception merely creates a presumption in favour of the innocence of the accused, it cannot be used to establish his guilt. The prisoner married four women in succession as follows. In 1864 he married his first wife A. Four years later in 1868 he married B, while A was alive, for which he was convicted. He again married C in 1879, and in 1880 he married D, upon which he was again indicted. It was contended for the prisoner that he could not be convicted for his bigamous marriage with D, as his previous marriage to C was void by reason of the existence of B in 1868. But the prosecution contended that since the prisoner's convicton in 1868 only proved that his wife A was alive in 1868, but there was no presumption that a person alive in 1868 was still alive in 1879; on the other hand the presumption rather was that a person not heard of for seven years was dead,(5) but on a case reserved this contention was overruled, Lord Coleridge, C. J., holding that in a prosecution for this offence, there could be no presumption in favour of the discontinuance of life, that the presumption was in favour of its continuance, and that the question whether a person was dead at a given time so as to render a marriage valid, was a question of fact and not of law, and it was on the prosecution to prove all facts necessary to establish the guilt of the prisoner. "The prisoner was only bound to set up the life; it was for the prosecution to prove his guilt."(6) As Hawkins, J., put it: "If she (A) was alive, the prisoner was entitled to be acquitted; if she was dead, he was rightly convicted. There was proof that Ellen (A) was alive in 1868; there was presumption that her life continued. The only evidence to the contrary was that the prisoner presented himself as a bachelor to be married in 1879; whether that would have satisfied the jury that his former wife was then dead, was a question for them to decide, but it was not left to them for decision."(7) And the conviction was therefore quashed.

5546. It is thus evident that while the legislature sanctions a presumption that a person who has not been heard of for seven years is dead, it does not sanction a presumption of the converse proposition that when a person has been seen or heard of within seven years, he must be presumed to be still living. Indeed, the question whether a person was living at any given time, cannot be decided on any ficti-

(4) Per Coleridge, C. J., in Jones, 11 Q. B. D. 118 (119).
(5) Lumley, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 196 (199).
(6) Wiltshire, 6 Q. B. D. 366 (369).
(7) Ib., p. 370.

tious rules of law. It is a question of fact, and like any other fact must be established by evidence.

5547. Bona Fide Belief in Death: Whether a Defence.—Again, although the clause presumes innocence from the fact of the spouse's continuous absence for seven years, it does not expressly admit of the other exception permitted in English Law, namely, bona fide belief in the former spouse's death at the time of the second marriage. The omission to this reference has led to the divergence of views between the English and Indian cases, for while it has been held in England that even though the seven years have not elapsed before the second marriage, yet if the prisoner, at the time of the second marriage, in good faith and on reasonable grounds, believed that his first wife was dead, he ought to be acquitted,[8] the contrary has been laid down in Bombay in a case[9] already commented upon (§§ 574, 575). In that view in spite of the omission in this section to except a bigamous marriage contracted in bona fide belief of the former spouse's death, there is the authority of the general exceptions in favour of the view that a person cannot be convicted of this offence if the second marriage was contracted in the bona fide belief of the former spouse's death, even though there may not have been evidence of the spouse's absence for seven years. But in such a case, good faith at least requires that the person contracting the second marriage informs his would-be partner of the fact of his first marriage and of all the circumstances connected therewith.[10]

Again, there cannot be good faith without some inquiry where inquiry would have been the means of eliciting the truth. Consequently, the combined effect of the general exception here foreshadowed and the special exception enacted in the section would appear to be this that if the spouse was continuously absent for a period of seven years and had not been heard of, the other party is free to re-marry, provided that that fact is communicated to his intended partner before their marriage. In that case, the requirement of law is satisfied without inquiry or proof of bona fide belief that the other party had in fact died.[11] But where the seven years' continuous absence is not complete, the party may still rely on the general exception, but in that case he must show not only the absence but the fact that he had made inquiries and had reasonable grounds for believing the other party to be dead.

Mistaken Belief.

5548. A mistake of fact is a good defence to a charge under this section. A Mahomedan girl was married by her grand-father to one B. On attaining her puberty she exercised her option and obtained an ex parte decree cancelling her marriage. But this decree was afterwards set aside and later on her suit withdrawn. She then went through the form of marriage with one K who was charged under section 494-114 but on his showing that

(8) Tolson, 23 Q. B. D. 168; overruling contra in Gibbons, 12 Cox 237; Bennett, 14 Cox 45; following Turner, 9 Cox 145; Horton, 11 Cox 670; Moore, 13 Cox 544; followed in Karim Baksh (1918) P. W. R. 31, 46 I. C. 40, 19 Cr. L. J. 680.

(9) Sambhu 1 B. 347.

(10) Enai Bibi, 4 W. R. 25.

(11) Muhammad Nissa (Mt.), (1900) P. R. 1.

he had married on the faith of the ex parte decree the Court quashed his conviction.(12)

Same offence with concealment of former marriage from person with whom subsequent marriage is contracted.

495. Whoever commits the offence defined in the last preceding section having concealed from the person with whom the subsequent marriage is contracted, the fact of the former marriage, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Session. Non-cog. (s. 198, Cr. P. C.,) Warrant. Bailable. Not comp.

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous law (5549).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5550).
(3) Proof (5551).
(4) Principle (5552).
(5) Bigamy by Deceit (5553-5556).
(6) What is such Concealment (5555).

5549. Analogous Law.—This offence is the aggravated form of bigamy punishable under the last section, the circumstance of aggravation being the concealment of fact of the previous marriage to the person with whom the second marriage is contracted. The disclosure of this fact is insisted on in the preceding section, and the draftsmen regarded its nondisclosure as a special point of aggravation, which they explained in the following words: "The act which, in the English Law, is designated as bigamy is always an immoral act. But it may be one of the most serious crimes that can be committed. It may be attended with circumstances which may excuse, though they cannot justify it.

"The married man who, by passing himself off as unmarried, induces a modest woman to become, as she thinks, his wife, but in reality his concubine, and the mother of an illegitimate issue, is guilty of one of the most cruel frauds that can be conceived. Such a man we could punish with exemplary severity.

"But suppose that a person arrives from England, and pays attentions to one of his country woman at Calcutta. She refuses to listen to him on any other terms than those of marriage. He candidly owns that he is already married. She still presses him to go through the ceremony with her. She represents to him that if they live together without being married she shall be an outcast from society, that nobody in India knows that he has a wife, that he may very likely never fall in with his wife again, and that she is ready to take the risk. The lover accordingly agrees to go through the forms of marriage. It cannot be disputed that there is an immense difference between these two cases."(13) The last section then provides only for a case supposed (12) S. 79; Karim Baksh, (1918) P. W. R. 31, 46 I. C. 40, 19 Cr. L. J. 680; contra in Narantakath v. Parakkal, 45 M. 986.

(13) Note Q, Reprint, pp. 171, 172.

in the last paragraph; the case of non-disclosure would have to be punished under this section.

5550. Procedure and Practice.—No Court shall take cognizance of this offence except upon a complaint made by some person aggrieved by such offence. The brother of the husband of the woman who committed bigamy is not a person so aggrieved[14] (§§ 5485-5487). This offence is non-congnizable, but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but non-compoundable, and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session. For other points of practice calling for notice reference should be made to the last section (§§ 5485-5487).

5551. Proof.—The points requiring proof are the same as those required to prove an offence under section 494 (§5488), in addition to which, prove:

(5) That the accused had before his second marriage concealed from his spouse the fact of his previous marriage.

5552. Principle.—The sole point of difference between this section and the next is the concealment of the accused's previous marriage from the person with whom he goes through the form of the second marriage. It is not necessary that the concealment should have affected the consent given to the second marriage, nor, indeed, is its operation upon the mind of the other at all material, the only point material being that he had concealed the fact of his previous marriage. But this fact could not be lost sight of in awarding punishment. For if the non-disclosure was immaterial it may have been equally unintentional, and if unintentional there was no intention to deceive, and deception is its underlying principle.

5553. Bigamy by Deceit.—This section merely prescribes an enhanced punishment for the offence of bigamy when it is committed by a person who conceals from the other person with whom he contracts the second marriage the fact of his previous marriage. Now since the offence is in essence bigamy it follows that all the elements necessary to constitute that offence must be present here also. For instance, of the two marriages, the previous marriage must have been a valid marriage, and a marriage which was known to be subsisting at the time of the second marriage. If, therefore, the previous marriage was invalid, or had been lawfully dissolved, its non-disclosure is wholly immaterial, for the second marriage being valid, there is no offence of bigamy, and except in a prosecution for bigamy the fact of such non-disclosure is immaterial.

5554. Again, the section punishes for a concealment of the fact of the former marriage, only when that marriage offers an impediment to the validity of the subsequent marriage. Consequently, a person belonging to a polygamous race, such as for instance, a Hindu or a Mahomedan would, ordinarily, be under no obligation to inform the fact of his previous marriage to his subsequent spouse, though in such a case he may incur other penalty for his non-disclosure. Suppose, for instance,

---

(14) Hanuman, (1908) 11 O. C. 148.

a Mahomedan married man conceals not only the fact of his marriage, but also his caste, from a person in a place where he is unknown and where he contracts a Christian marriage with a Christian woman from whom he conceals both his religion, as well as his previous marriage. His second marriage is, of course, void, and he could not therefore be punished under this section, but it does not thence follow that he may not then be punished for cheating, or under the provisions of the next section.

What is Such Concealment?

5555. The question what amounts to the concealment of the fact of the former marriage is evidently a question of fact. For there may be as much concealment by making a misleading statement as by making no statement at all. For instance, A may say to B to whom he is engaged to contract a second marriage: "I was married to C but I am now a widower;" the fact being that C was still alive, though A had separated from her, and in fact C had not been heard of for seven years. Could A be convicted of this offence? It is clear that his liability under the last section depends upon whether this statement is sufficient to bring his case within the exception to that section. But if it is not, then he may be convicted under that section, though he could not be under this section because he had not concealed the fact of his previous marriage, and it is all that is necessary to save his case from this penalty. In other words, this section must be restricted only to cases where there has been no mention made at all of the fact of the previous marriage, the last section alone being applicable to other cases where that fact is mentioned but explained away.

5556. Again the criminality of the act necessarily admits of degree. For instance, there is on the one hand, the person who knowing of the averseness of the other to marry him if the fact of his previous marriage were known, conceals that fact and so compasses the ruin of the person for whom marriage was merely a trap; while on the other hand, there is a child of tender years who is made to go through a second marriage by her guardian, neither of whom informs the husband of the first marriage, in which case she could not be punished under this section. This was the view of Parsons and Ranade, JJ., in a case in which the accused, who was a child of ten, was remarried to the prosecutor by her mother during the lifetime of her first husband, upon which she was convicted under this section, but the Court quashed her conviction on the ground that she had not attained sufficient maturity of understanding to judge of the nature and consequence of her conduct on the occasion of her second marriage[15] (§§ 746-749). The question whether the gravity of this offence depended upon the length of separation from the husband, was considered in a case in which the accused remarried on her husband having absented himself for sixteen months, whereupon she was convicted under this section by Loch and Kemp, JJ., though Glover, J., was in favour of indulgence.[16] Here the prisoner was the wife of a tea garden coolie, who used to absent himself on duty for long periods. During one such absence she contracted a second marriage. She appears to have acted on a casual report that her husband was dead, but she took no steps to ascertain the truth of this report, nor did she believe it, for she neither broke her bangles nor performed the other obsequial rites customary in her caste. At any rate her second marriage was not contracted in the bona fide belief of the death of her first husband, and as she had failed to inform her second husband of her previous marriage, the Court convicted her under this section, and thought it to be no case for mercy.(17)

(15) S. 83; Godi, (1896) B. U. C. 876. (16) Enai Bibi, 4 W. R. 25.

Marriage-ceremony fraudulently gone through without lawful marriage.

496. Whoever dishonestly or with a fraudulent intention, goes through the ceremony of being married, knowing that he is not thereby lawfully married, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years and shall also be liable to fine.

[Dishonestly—s. 24. Fraudulently—s. 25.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5557-5558).
(2) Section 493 Distinguished (5558).
(3) Procedure and Practice (5559-5560).
(4) Proof (5561).
(5) Form of Charge (5562).
(6) Principle (5563).
(7) Fraudulent Mock-marriage (5564-5567).
(8) Not Lawfully Married (5565).
(9) Local Amendment (5567).

5557. Analogous Law.—This section punishes the offence of contracting a mock-marriage, with the object of achieving a dishonest or fraudulent purpose. The essence of the offence is deception, whether of the other party to the marriage or a third person. The section is somewhat widely worded, but it is not to be construed so as to include offences otherwise expressly provided for. A person who contracts a bigamous marriage may become liable under this section, but bigamy is punishable otherwise and it is not contemplated here. The essence of the offence here is that the marriage-ceremony should be fraudulently gone through and that there should be no lawful marriage. The parties to the marriage, or at least one of the parties to the marriage must have knowledge that there is no marriage,(18) and, of course, in that case only that party could be liable under this section.

Section 493 Distinguished.

5558. This section is somewhat akin to section 493, but from which it is easily distinguishable. In the first place that section only affects the man, while this section affects a person of either sex. That section again requires no form to symbolize marriage—a mere verbal deception that the woman is married is sufficient, though if the decep-

(17) Ib., p. 26.

(18) Sheikh Alimuddin 10 C. W. N. 982; Rama Soma, (1873) B. U. C. 77.

tion may as well be by going through a form of marriage—but it is not necessary under that section, though it is the very essence of this offence. Again, while this offence is complete without cohabitation or the holding of a sexual intercourse on faith of the marriage, it is a sine qua non of the offence punishable under s. 493. These distinctions between the two offences are, however, more academic than practical—for a person who deceives another into a belief that he is married to her, will ordinarily go through some form of marriage, and thereupon he would ordinarily also cohabit or have sexual intercourse with her. The two sections require revisions, for they multiply offences creating a distinction without any noticeable difference.

5559. Procedure and Practice.—No Court shall take cognizance of an offence punishable under this section except upon a complaint made by some person aggrieved by such offence. For what persons are so aggrieved reference must be made to ss. 494 and 498 (§§ 5486-5487). This offence is, therefore, non-cognizable, and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable and is exclusively triable by the Court of Session.

5560. A person who merely allows another to go through the form of a mock-marriage in his house cannot be said to abet the commission of this offence, such a person may be said to facilitate the commission of this offence within the meaning of section 120, but this section is clearly inapplicable inasmuch it was not his duty to give notice of the intended marriage or to put a stop to it.[19]

5561. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That accused went through the form of marriage.

(2) That he was then aware that it did not bind him.

(3) That he went through the form of marriage dishonestly or fraudulently.

5562. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of—at——you dishonestly (or fraudulently) went through the ceremony of being married to A B, knowing that you were not thereby lawfully married, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 496 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session (or the High Court.)

"And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge."

5563. Principle.—This section is really enacted to meet a case which is neither bigamy nor an offence punishable under s. 493. All the same it is an abuse of the holy state of matrimony for the purpose of dishonesty and fraud, and therefore deemed an offence of the same gravity as bigamy. But even here the question must naturally depend upon the nature of the dishonesty and fraud for if the ceremony was gone through merely for the purpose of keeping appearances, it will constitute no offence, though it was in a sense intended to be a fraud upon society. This was, however, not the purpose of the section, for the authors were aware of this form of deceit and regarded it venial unless it amounted to bigamy. For as they put it: "Suppose that a person arrives from England, and pays attentions to one of his countrywoman at Calcutta, she refuses to listen to him on any other terms than those of marriage. He candidly owns that he is already married. She still presses him to go through the ceremony with her. She represents to him that if they live together without being married she shall be an outcaste from society, that nobody in India knows that he has a wife, that he may very likely never fall in with his wife again, and that she is ready to take the risk. The lover accordingly agrees to go through the form of marriage."[20] Here the husband was clearly guilty of bigamy, and he may even be guilty of this offence, if the imposition intended on society could be held to be a fraud upon it. But this is not the sense in which that term has been used here. It is rather used in the narrower sense in which it is defined in section 25 (§§ 258-263).

(19) Kundun, (1864) W. R. 13.

5564. Fraudulent Mock-marriage.—The mischief which this section is intended to reach is that which debases the sanctity of the marriage oath for the purpose of dishonesty or fraud. Ordinarily, such deception would be practised upon an innocent person who is induced under the make-believe of a marriage to establish conjugal relationship. But the fraud may be collateral to the marriage and both parties may be privy to it; as in the case where a legacy is payable to A on her marriage to B, to which both A and B are averse, but who go through a form to satisfy the executor that they are duly married, which they are not, and whereupon A recovers the legacy payable to her. So a person may go through the form of marriage with an heiress with the single purpose of robbing her, in which case he would be guilty of this offence if the ceremony he goes through has not had the effect of lawfully marrying them which he knew.

Not Lawfully Married.

5565. The phrase "knowing that he is not lawfully married" rather points to a form of ceremony which is insufficient to constitute marriage. It does not apply to a case where the form was right, though the marriage was void or voidable owing to a personal defect or disqualification in either of the contracting parties. In such a case a person may be guilty of bigamy, but he could not be punished for this offence. This section rather applies to a case when there is only a show of marriage for some ulterior and fraudulent purpose. It has application rather to a marriage which is left incomplete owing to the omission of a necessary form,[21] than to a marriage which so far as the form went was complete, but which was rendered void owing to the fact that the parties were within the prohibited degree of consanguinity or that the wife had been already married to another.[22] But it is

(20) Note Q, Reprint, p. 171.
(21) Sheikh Alimuddin, 10 C. W. N. 982.
(22) Roma Sona, (1873) B. U. C. 77.

apprehended that this section should equally apply to a case in which a party adopts on purpose a wrong form so as to get out of the responsibility of a marriage, as where a Mahomedan represents himself to be a Christian and thereby induces Christian parents to give him their Christian daughter in marriage which is solemnized in Church. So again, the section should equally apply to a sudra passing himself off as a kulin Brahmin and thereby obtaining in marriage a daughter and rich dowry from a zeminder, in which case the form may be correct, but he would be nevertheless guilty of this offence, because he knew that it was insufficient to constitute his legal marriage and there was the superadded fraud which is the gist of crime.

5566. As was, indeed, remarked by the draftsman: "We do not at present propose any law for punishing a person who, without practising any deception, or intending any fraud, goes through the forms of a marriage which he knows to be invalid. The difficulty of framing such a law in this country is great. To make all classes subject to one law would, evidently, be impossible. If the law be made dependent on the race, birth place or religion of the offender, endless perplexity would arise. Races are mixed, religion may be changed or dissembled. An East Indian, half English, half Asiatic by blood, may call himself a Mahomedan or a Hindu; and there exists no test by which he can be convicted of deception. We by no means intend to express an opinion that these difficulties may not be got over. But we are satisfied that this part of the penal law cannot be brought to perfection, till the law of marriage and divorce has been thoroughly revised."(23)

Local Amendment.

5567. Under this section the woman, though a particeps criminis is exempted from punishment for reasons which the Law Commissioners considered sufficient.(24) But this exemption has had to be withdrawn in the Punjab Frontier districts,(25) the North-West Frontier Province(1) and Baluchistan.

Adultery.

497. Whoever has sexual intercouse with a person who is and whom he knows or has reason to believe to be the wife of another man, without the consent or connivance of that man, such sexual intercourse not amounting to the offence of rape, is guilty of the offence of adultery and shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, or with fine, or with both. In such case the wife shall not be punishable as an abettor.

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st class. Non-cog. (S. 198, Cr. P. C.). Warrant. Bailable. Comp.

[Reason to believe—s. 26. Rape—s. 375.]

(23) Note Q, Reprint, pp. 172, 173.

(24) 2nd Rep., s. 355; cited s. 497, post.

(25) By rule No. 1 of the Frontier Rules of 5th January 1872, which, however, is not retrospective—Khana, (1872) P. R. No. 10. Nor can solitary punishment be awarded to the adulteress, inasmuch as she is punished under the Regulation and not the Code; Manawar, (1875) P. R. No. 4; but the jurisdiction of the Court trying her is as in the case of the male accused—Rassul, (1876) P. R. No. 18; Halim, (1881) P. R. No. 34; the local Court may try a person even though her husband was temporarily quartered there; Kharak Singh, (1881) P. R. No. 36.

(1) Frontier Crimes Regulation (III of 1901).

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5568-5570).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5571-5578).
(3) Offence Continuing (5574).
(4) Who may Complain (5575).
(5) No Conviction Without Complaint (5576).
(6) Proof (5579).
(7) Charge (5580).
(8) Principle (5581).
(9) What is Adultery (5582-5593).
(10) There must be Sexual Intercourse (5582-5584).
(11) Woman must be Married (5585).
(12) Meaning of Marriage (5586-5587).
(13) Knowledge and Reasonable Belief Essential (5588-5589).
(14) Consent or Connivance of the Husband (5590).
(15) What is Connivance (5591-5595).
(16) Condonation of Adultery (5596).

5568. Analogous Law.—This section marks a noticeable departure from the English Law, under which adultery is not an offence. The question was considered and dismissed by the first Law Commissioners with the following words:—

"The following positions we consider as fully established: First, that the existing laws for the punishment of adultery are altogether inefficacious for the purpose of preventing injured husbands of the higher classes from taking the law into their own hands; secondly, that scarcely any native of the higher classes ever has recourse to the Courts of law in a case of adultery for redress against either his wife or her gallant; thirdly, that the husbands who have recourse in cases of adultery to the Courts of law are generally poor men, whose wives have run away; that these husbands seldom have any delicate feelings about the intrigue, but think themselves injured by the elopement; that they consider their wives as useful members of their small households; that they generally complain, not of the wound given to their affections, nor of the stain on their honour, but of the loss of a menial whom they cannot easily replace, and that, generally, their principal object is that the woman may be sent back. The fiction by which seduction is made the subject of an action in the English Courts is, it seems, the real gist of most proceedings for adultery in the mofussil. The essence of the injury is considered by the sufferer as lying in the 'per quod servitium amisit." Where the complainant does not ask to have his wife again, he generally demands to be reimbursed for the expenses of his marriage.

"These things being established, it seems to us that no advantage is to be expected from providing a punishment for adultery. The population seems to be divided into two classes, those whom neither the existing punishment, nor any punishment which we should feel ourselves justified in proposing, will satisfy and those who consider the injury produced by adultery as one for which a pecuniary compensation will sufficiently atone. Those whose feelings of honour are painfully affected by the infidelity of their wives will not apply to the tribunals at all; those whose feelings are less delicate will be satisfied by a payment of money. Under such circumstances, we think it best to treat adultery merely as a civil injury.

"Some who admit that the Penal law now existing on this subject is in practice of little or no use, yet think that the Code ought to contain a provision against adultery; they think that such a provision though inefficacious for the repressing of vice, would be creditable to the Indian Government, and that, by omitting such a provision, we should give a sanction to immorality. They say, and we believe with truth, that the higher class of natives consider the existing Penal law on the subject as far too lenient, and are unable to understand on what principle adultery is treated with more tenderness than forgery or perjury.

"These arguments have not satisfied us that adultery ought to be made punishable by law. We cannot admit that a Penal Code is by any means to be considered as a body of ethics, that the legislature ought to punish acts merely because those acts are immoral, or that, because an act is not punished at all, it follows that the legislature considers that act as innocent. Many things which are not punishable are morally worse than many things which are punishable The man who treats a generous benefactor with gross ingratitude and insolence deserves more severe reprehension than the man who aims a blow in a passion, or breaks a widow in a frolic, yet we have punishments for assault and mischief, and none for ingratitude. The rich man who refuses a mouthful of rice to save a fellow-creature from death may be a far worse man than the starving wretch who snatches and devours the rice; yet we punish the latter for theft, and we do not punish the former for hard-heartedness.

"That some classes of the natives of India disapprove of the lenity with which adultery is now punished we fully believe, but, this, in our opinion, is a strong argument against punishing adultery at all. There are only two courses which, in our opinion, can properly be followed with respect to this and other great immoralities; they ought to be punished very severely, or they ought not to be punished at all. The circumstances that they are left altogether unpunished does not prove that the legislature does not regard them with disapprobation; but when they are made punishable, the degree of severity of the punishment will always be considered as indicating the degree of disapprobation with which the legislature regards them. We have no doubt that the natives would be far less shocked by the total silence of the Penal law touching adultery than by seeing an adulteror sent to prison for a few months while a coiner is imprisoned for fourteen years. An example will illustrate our meaning. We have determined not to make it penal in a wealthy man to let a fellow creature, whose life he could save by disbursing a few pice, die at his feet of hunger. No rational person, we are convinced, will suppose, because we have framed the law thus, that we do not hold such inhumanity in detestation; but if we had proposed to punish such inhumanity with a fine not exceeding fifty rupees, we should have offered a gross outrage to the feelings of mankind; that we do not think a certain act a proper subject for penal legislation, does not prove that we do not think that act a great crime; but, that thinking it a proper subject for penal legislation we purpose to visit it with a slight penalty, does seem to indicate that we do not think it a great crime. Nobody proposes that adultery should be punished with a severity at all proportioned to the misery which it produces in cases where there is strong affection and a quick sensibility to family honor. We apprehend that among the higher classes in this country nothing short of death would be considered as an expiation for such a wrong. In such a state of society, we think it far better that the law should inflict no punishment than that it should inflict a punishment which should be regarded as absurdly and immorally lenient.

"There is yet another consideration which we cannot wholly leave out of sight. Though we well know that the dearest interests of the human race are closely connected with the chastity of woman and the sacredness of the nuptial contract, we cannot but feel that there are some peculiarities in the state of society in this country which may well lead a humane man to pause before he determines to punish the infidelity of wives. The condition of the women of this country is, unhappily, very different from that of the women of England and France, they are married while still children; they are often neglected for other wives while still young. They share the attentions of a husband with several rivals. To make laws for punishing the inconstancy of the wife, while the law admits the privilege of the husband to fill his zenana with women, is a course which we are most reluctant to adopt. We are not so visionary as to think of attacking by law, an evil so deeply-rooted in the manners of the people of this country as polygamy. We leave it to the slow, but we trust the certain, operation of education and of time. But while it exists, while it continues to produce its never failing effects on the happiness and respectability of women, we are not inclined to throw into a scale, already too much depressed, the additional weight of the penal law. We have given the reasons which lead us to believe that any enactment on this subject would be nugatory, and we are inclined to think that if not nugatory it would be oppressive. It would strengthen hands already too strong. It would weaken a class already too weak. It will be time enough to guard the matrimonial contract by penal sanctions when that contract comes just, reasonable and mutually beneficial."(2)

(2) Note Q, Reprint, pp. 173, 174.

5569. In thus regulating this offence to the domain of civil law the authors were making a departure from the pre-existing law under which it was treated and punished as a crime.(3) It was ordained an offence of high degree in the institutes of Manu,(4) and it was held penal under the Code Penal of France, and indeed of all the European countries with the exception of England; and some of the most celebrated English lawyers have considered its omission there as a defect. These facts weighed with the second Law Commissioners who recommended its insertion in the Code subject, however, to certain qualifications which they justified thus:—

"355. While we think that the offence of adultery ought to be omitted from the Code, we would limit its cognizance to adultery commited with a married woman, and considering that there is much weight in the last remark in Note Q. regarding the condition of the woman of this country, in deference to it we would render the male offender alone liable to punishment. We would, however, put the parties accused of adultery on trial together, and empower the Court in the event of their conviction, to pronounce a decree of divorce against the guilty woman, if the husband sues for it, at the same time that her paramour is sentenced to punishment by imprisonment or fine."(5)

5570. These recommendations were mainly given effect to by the Legislature with the result that adultery is now constituted a crime though in a special and narrow sense.(6)

5571. Procedure and Practice.—No court shall take cognizance of this offence except upon a complaint made by the husband of the woman, or, in his absence, made with the leave of the Court by some person who had care of such woman on his behalf at the time when such offence was committed.(7) Provided that where such husband is a minor under the age of 18, or is an idiot or lunatic, or is from sickness or infirmity unable to make complaint, some other person may, with the leave of the Court, make a complaint on his behalf.(8) The offence is non-cognizable, and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both bailable and compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first class.

5572. Now though the offence is compoundable, still it is a rule applicable to all compoundable cases that no composition of such offences is allowed after the accused has been committed for trial or after he has been convicted and an appeal is pending, without the leave of the Court to which he is committed or before whom the appeal is to be heard.(9) It has accordingly been held that where the accused is committed to the Court

(3) Reg. XVII of 1817; Reg. VII of 1819; Act II of 1845.

(4) The punishment prescribed by Manu is death by torture of the offenders: Code, ch. viii, vv. 371-372: "Should a wife proud of her family and the great qualities of her kinsmen, actually violate the duty, which she owes to her Lord, let the king condemn her to be devoured by dogs in a place much frequented; [v. 372] And let him place the adulterer on an iron bed well heated under which the executioners shall throw logs continually, till the sinful wretch be there burnt to death." This rigour of the early law was however, relaxed in the later Institutes of Vishnu in which the offenders could be let off with a fine (Bishnu, ch. v, vv. 40-42).

(5) 2nd Rep., s. 355.

(6) Literally, the term means sexual connection by a married person with one who is not his or her wife or husband; from Lat. adultero—ad, to, and alter, other.

(7) S. 199, Cr. P. C.

(8) S. 199, proviso added by Act XVIII of 1923.

(9) S. 345 (5), Cr. P. C.

of Sessions on a charge of adultery and that Court permits the withdrawal of the charge on the husband expressing his unwillingness to prosecute the case, it is not a matter for interference in revision.[10] But the Magistrate has no jurisdiction to permit withdrawal of a complaint after the case has once been committed by him, and if, therefore, he permits such a withdrawal it is an act, by which the Sessions Judge is not bound, but if the latter erroneously acquit the accused acting upon such a compromise, the High Court refused to set aside the acquittal when the husband was not desirous of pressing his complaint.[11] The husband is, in such cases, the dominus litis and though after a committal or conviction he has not the absolute power of withdrawal which he possessed before those stages are reached, still the Court seldom refuse permission unless the offence is one in which the withdrawal of the husband would entail acquittal of the accused of another charge for which the Courts had power to punish him independently of the husband's volition. Such may be the case where the accused stands charged for house-breaking with intent to commit adultery[12] (s. 457).

5573. But in a case presenting no such circumstance of aggravation the husband is ordinarily left to prosecute the case as far and offering such evidence as he chooses. So where the husband charged the accused under this and the next section but refused to examine his wife or to adduce other evidence to prove the fact of his marriage, whereupon the Magistrate discharged the accused, which order was however set aside in revision by the Session Judge who ordered a retrial and examination of the wife, but this order was again set aside by Prinsep and O'Kinealy, JJ., who considered the order for retrial erroneous in view of the fact that there had not been any improper exclusion of evidence and the Sessions Judge had not exercised a proper discretion in ordering a retrial suo motu.[13]

Offence Continuing.

5574. Adultery is a continuing offence, so that a person once convicted of the offence may again and again be convicted of it if he is guilty of holding sexual intercourse after his first conviction. Of course, his conviction for one act does not justify his repeating the very act for which he had been punished.[14] His subsequent acts are rather in the nature of aggravations calling for more condign punishment.

Who may Complain ?

5575. The right to complain of an offence under this section is limited to the husband, the wife and to persons specified in s. 199 of the Code of Criminal Procedure (§ 5571). In the first place the person solely entitled to complain of the act is the husband for it is an offence against his marital right. But his complaint is necessary only to set the law in motion, so that if the Court is once seized of the case upon his complaint, his death does not necessarily have the effect of putting an end to the prosecution, though it is then desirable that such charges should be withdrawn by the

(10) Jamni, 5 B. H. C. R., 27 note; followed in Ramlo, 5 B. H. C. R. 27.

(11) Gumbheer, 2 N. W. P. H. C. R. 234; to the same effect, Mohun, (1871) P. R. No. 8.

(12) 5 M. H. C. R. (App.) 5.

(13) Chunder Nath Ghose v. Nundolal, 11 C. 81.

(14) Emaji, (1880) B. U. C. 150.

prosecution.[15] The existence of this provision is intended to prevent unnecessary intrusion into another man's privacy. A husband who has been living apart from his wife, is not precluded from complaining of this offence; nor can his complaint be dismissed on that account.[16]

No Conviction Without Complaint.

5576. The special provision of law requiring a complaint as a condition precedent to the Court possessing jurisdiction to take cognizance of offences under this and the next section, has resulted in some diversity of views as to the meaning of s. 238 (3) of the Procedure Code which precludes the Court from convicting an offender under this and the next section, even though he be found to have committed those offences "when no complaint has been made as required by that section" i.e., s. 199.[17] It has been held that the word "complaint" in this section means a complaint to a Magistrate as defined in s. 4 (h) of the Procedure Code and does not include one to the Police.[18] The want of such complaint cannot be made good by his complaint of any other offence, e.g., s. 366,[19] or by his evidence as a prosecution witness on a charge of rape against the seducer of his wife,[20] unless he has expressed a desire that the offender should be punished even if found guilty of ss. 497 or 498.[21] On the other hand, the fact that the commission of that offence was involved in the graver offences, does not preclude the trial of the accused for those offences without such complaint, but if the only offence proved is that punishable under this or the next section then the court cannot convict the offender of it without the complaint of the persons mentioned in s. 199 of the Procedure Code. Of course, if the husband has complained, the fact that he has exaggerated the facts or failed to mention this offence as appropriate to his case, would not prevent the court from convicting of it, provided it is satisfied that the husband's complaint was inclusive of the offence.[22]

5577. The view of the Punjab Chief Court appears to be that if the husband complains of this offence, the Court has no jurisdiction to convict the accused of the offence described in the next section,[23] but later cases recognize the fallacy of this view,[24] for whether the accused be guilty of adultery or abduction or of both, the only impediment in the way of the Court to taking cognizance of the case is that offered by section 199 of the Procedure Code, and it stands no longer in the way as soon as the husband has complained. But complained of what? The accused may be guilty of adultery and the husband may merely complain of house-trespass and theft, being from a feeling of delicacy or shame reluctant to complain of the real offence of which he knows the accused to be guilty. Is the Magistrate then empowered to convict the accused of adultery or abduction if that be the offence disclosed by the evidence. The question has

(15) Anon, 4 M. H. C. R. (App.) 55.
(16) Maung Kala v. Nga Kin Mya, 38 I. C. (R.) 433, 18 Cr. L. J. 321.
(17) S. 238 (3), Cr. P. C.
(18) Tara Prasad Laha, 30 C. 910 F. B.; Kailas Kumari, ib., 285; Jagobundoo, ib., 415; Kallu, 5 A. 233.
(19) Kallu, 5 A. 233; followed in Bangaru, 27 M. 61; Arunachalam, 45 M. L. J. 543, 74 I. C. 949, 24 Cr. L. J. 837.
(20) Chemoa Gora, 29 C. 415; following Kallu, 5 A. 233.
(21) Bhawani Dutt, 38 A. 276.
(22) Jatea Sheikh, 20 C. 483; Alli, 23 A. 209; Brahama Dat, 24 O. C. 232, 64 I. C. 134, 22 Cr. L. J. 442.
(23) Sher Singh, (1873) P. R. No. 18.
(24) Nihal Singh, (1874) P. R. No. 17; Rahmatulla, (1883) P. R. No. 10; Faiz Ahmed, (1879) P. R. No. 5; Hashmat, (1882) P. R. No. 19; Piran Ditta, (1895) P. R. No. 23.

arisen in connection with cases in which the accused were prosecuted for house-trespass, house-breaking and other similar offences in which the conflict of views between the several Courts has been already noticed (§§ 4947-4954).

5578. The legality of conviction in such cases has been affirmed in the Punjab in several cases which are instructive. So where the prosecutor complained to a Magistrate under s. 371 (habitually dealing in slaves) but his statement of facts in the complaint clearly indicated a case under section 498, his conviction under that section was justified by the Court, who observed: "All that a complainant has to do is to state to the Magistrate the facts upon which he relies, and it is for the Magistrate to decide whether any and what offence has been committed. If the facts, as stated, disclose an offence under section 498 of the Penal Code, the Magistrate cannot act except upon the complaint of the husband, or of some one having charge of the wife on behalf of the husband, but it is quite sufficient for the husband to state the true facts in his own language, and it is then for the Magistrate to apply the law to those facts."(25) But in another case the husband complained of abduction under s. 498 and the Magistrate convicted the accused of bigamy, but it was held that he was not justified in convicting the accused of a charge of which the husband had not complained(1) though in another case a complaint for bigamy was held to justify the accused's conviction for abduction.(2) And so a charge of rape was held to justify a conviction for adultery,(3) and a complaint of abduction a conviction for adultery.(4) In any case the complaint must be made to a Magistrate, for a report made to the police is not a complaint sufficient to confer on the Magistrate jurisdiction to take cognizance of the case.(5)

5579. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused had sexual intercourse with a woman.

(2) That such woman was married.(6)

(3) That the accused knew or had reason to believe it.

(4) That the connection was held without the consent or connivance of her husband.(7)

(5) That the sexual connection so held does not amount to rape.

5580. Charge.—A charge of adultery alleging commission of offences between two dates is legal where it is impossible, in the circumstances of the case, to assign particular dates on which sexual intercourse took place.(8) The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the———day of———at———you committed adultery by having sexual intercourse with A B, the lawful wife of C D, (25) Piran Ditta, (1895) P. R. No. 23.

(1) Faiz Ahmed, (1879) P. R. No. 5.
(2) Hashmat, (1882) P. R. No. 19.
(3) Rahmatulla, (1883) P. R. No. 10.
(4) Nihal Singh, (1874) P. R. No. 17.
(5) Jit Mal, (1888) P. R. No. 4 Narain Singh, (1888) P. R. No. 25.

(6) It must be proved by independent evidence; Bahu Dhondi, 17 Bom. L. R. 75, 27 I. C. 837, 16 Cr. L. J. 213; Gopal, (1925) R. 328.

(7) Acquiescence post and post facto sufficient; Munir, 91 I. C. 533, (1926) A. 189.

(8) Bhola Nath, 51 C. 488.

whom you knew (or had reason to believe) to be the wife of C D, without the consent or connivance of the said C D, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 497 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

5581. Principle.—This section defines the offence of adultery in a special narrow sense, as having carnal knowledge of a married woman with knowledge or reasonable belief that the woman was married and without the consent or connivance of her husband. The offence can only be committed by man, the woman being exempt from punishment as an abettor, and of course as an adulteress. But the man may be married or unmarried, though the woman he ravishes must be married, for if she is unmarried he commits no offence by the mere fact of having sexual intercourse with her. The offence is thus held punishable not because of the connection had with woman, but for the collateral purpose of preserving the peace and sanctity of family life.

5582. What is Adultery?—As has been observed before, the offence designated as adultery here consists in having carnal knowledge of a married woman with knowledge of that fact, without the consent or connivance of her husband. The section, of course, assumes that the intercourse was had with the consent of the wife, for otherwise the offence would be rape and not merely adultery. In adultery then the woman is necessarily the abettor, and but for the saving clause in her favour she would have been equally liable for the act as a co-accused (§§ 1023, 1024). The criminality of the act is defined to lie in having sexual intercourse with a married woman. Under s. 376, penetration is held to be sufficient to constitute the sexual intercourse necessary to the offence of rape,[9] and it is apprehended that penetration of the male organ is equally necessary to constitute the sexual intercourse necessary to this offence.[10] But without penetration there may be an attempt, or it may even fall short of it.

(1) There must be Sexual Intercourse.

So where the wife went over to the shop of the accused to have sexual intercourse, but was at once followed and entrapped before she could have connection, her act was held not to go beyond the mere stage of preparation.[11] In another case the accused was discovered with a married woman in a room but before he could hold sexual connection with her, her husband surprised them both, whereupon the accused was convicted of an attempt to commit this offence, but the conviction was quashed on the ground that the act was not sufficiently proximate to the commission of the offence to constitute an attempt.[12] This was also the view of the Madras Court in which Shephard, J., said: "Adultery being an act which requires the consent of both the parties, it appears to me that for a man to be guilty of an attempt it is not sufficient that he was found in a place

(9) S. 376, Expl.

(10) Madhub Chunder Giri, 21 W. R. 13.

(11) Paira Ram, (1902) P. R. No. 25.

(12) Ghulam Mahomed, (1879) P. R. No. 13, followed in Paira Ram, (1902) P. R. No. 25.

in which adultery might have been committed, and that he was minded to commit it. Because he was so minded and had entered the woman's room it does not necessarily follow that, but for the interruption, the offence would have been consummated.(13)"

5583. But this must not be understood to suggest that a person cannot be convicted of this offence unless he is surprised flagrante delicto. Indeed, this is neither necessary nor possible, the more so in view of the fact that the offence is by its nature committed in secrecy, and the woman is not likely to make a disclosure disadvantageous to herself. The fact must be inferred from the surrounding circumstances of cohabitation or the like.(14) For instance, if the accused trespasses into the apartment of a married woman and remains there sufficiently long to be able to consummate the act, the Court would be justified in holding that he had achieved the purpose of his visit for which he had both time and opportunity, and more could not be reasonably expected.(15)

As Markby, J., observed in a case: "Then it is said that familiarity, even culpable familiarity, does not constitute adultery, and that, even if full credence be given to the witnesses, they do not establish conclusively the fact of sexual intercourse. It is contended that actual sexual intercourse must be proved, and cannot be presumed, and that penetration ought to be proved. I have already said that this must be proved, but I know of no law in this country which requires any particular kind of proof of adultery, or which recognizes any different degrees of proof in different cases. Differences in the proof required of the same fact in different cases very often arise out of the circumstances of the case. You can hardly presume sexual intercourse in a charge of rape, because, by the hypothesis, one of the parties is doing her best to prevent the act. The hypothesis in adultery is precisely the reverse, and the evidence differs accordingly. I knew of no authority for saying that the evidence of sexual intercourse must be stronger on a charge of adultery than in a suit for a divorce. The best proof available must always be produced, but in both cases evidence of opportunities sought for and obtained, and of familiarities which point strongly to an inference of guilt, are sufficient to establish the fact of sexual intercourse.(16) To which Birch, J., added: "To go further than this, and require absolute certainty, would go to the length of excluding altogether circumstantial evidence.(17) A conviction for this offence or that made punishable by the next section is not invalid merely because it proceeds upon the uncorroborated evidence of the husband and the wife, especially when they were subjected to no cross-examination.(18)

5584. Of course, in such a case, a person could not be convicted of committing an indecent assault upon a married woman, for such assault implies want of consent on the part of the woman, which is presumed in a case under this section.

(13) Basava Chary, (1889) 1 Weir 569.
(14) Hunter, 61 I. C. (A) 238, 22 Cr. L. J. 382.
(15) Madhub Chunder Giri, 21 W. R. 13 (16, 17).
(16) Ib.
(17) Ib., p. 20.
(18) Syed Munir, 14 N. L. R. 28, 42 I. C. 760, 18 Cr. L. J. 1016.

(2) Woman must be Married.

5585. Again, the woman with whom connection is had must be married, that is to say lawfully married to another, of which there must be strict[19] and formal proof. The evidence of the husband or of the wife, or of both that they were married may for this purpose be quite sufficient.[20] Indeed, the question whether two persons were married or not is a question of fact and not of law.[21] But this view has not been acceded to in other cases in which the Courts seem to require stronger proof the nature of which was, however, not indicated.[22] In one of these cases the Court observed that under section 50 of the Indian Evidence Act,[23] marriage in such cases must be strictly proved in the regular way.[24] But that section merely enacts that an opinion on that relationship is insufficient. It does not exclude it, nor does it prescribe any special mode of proof, in the absence of which the Court must be guided by those general principles which regulate the sufficiency of evidence. And it is apprehended that while the evidence of eye-witnesses to the marriage is in every case desirable,[25] it is not the sine qua non of legal proof and the evidence of the married couple should suffice if it is believed in, especially if it was not assailed by the accused. But where a foreign marriage has to be proved, the Courts insist upon proof of its factum by independent evidence of its essential ceremonies, and its validity by the evidence of an expert.[1] A woman is not the wife of a man within the meaning of this and the next section if their marriage is voidable, as in the case of Sunni Mahomedans in whose case the wife has that option in certain cases (§ 5517).

Meaning of Marriage.

5586. The question what constitutes marriage has been already considered (§§ 5493, 5494). As pointed out there, marriage is an elastic term and is patent of different meanings. In England it means a monogamous marriage solemnized in accordance with the rites of the Church or the rules of law (§§ 5493, 5494). In non-Christian countries and as applied to non-Christian communities it bears a different sense and its validity must be judged by applying different tests and in accordance with the lex loci by which it is regulated (§ 5494). This must depend upon the personal law of the parties, and the custom and usages of the caste to which the parties belong. So a nika marriage is a well recognized form of Mahomedan marriage and it will be sufficient to support a matrimonial offence whether of bigamy or adultery.[2] So pat marriages in the Mahratta countries[3]

(19) Smith, 4 W. R. 31, 4 W. R. Cr. L. 10; Pitambur, 5 C. 566, F. B.; Arshad Ali, 13 C. L. R. 125; Kallu, 5 A. 233; Santok Singh, (1898) A. W. N. 186; Dal Singh, 20 A. 166; Nazir Khan, 36 A. 1; Bhagu, 17 Bom. L. R. 75; Danesh v. Tafir, 7 C. W. N. 143.

(20) Subbarayan, 9 M. 9; Syed Munir, 14 N. L. R. 28, 42 I. C. 560.

(21) Subbarayan, 9 M. 9; Wadhawa v. Fatteh Muhammad, (1894) P. R. No. 5; Piran Ditta, (1895) P. R. No. 23; contra in Akhbar Khan, (1882) P. R. No. 40.

(22) Pitambur Singh, 5 C. 566, F. B., overruling Wazira, 8 B. L. R. (App.) 63, followed in Kallu, 5 A. 233; Dal Singh, 20 A. 166; Buddhu, 42 A. 401; Petero, 2 S. L. R. 22, 10 Cr. L. J. 235; Bechar, 5 S. L. R. 270, 15 I. C. 813, 13 Cr. L. J. 541.

(23) Act I of 1872.

(24) Pitambur Singh, 5 C. 566 F. B.

(25) Subbarayan, 9 M. 9.

(1) Povey, Dears C. C. 32 (36); Savage 13 Cox 178; Lindsay, 66 J. P. 505; Naquib, (1917) 1 K. B. 359 (362) dissenting from Neacton, 2 Moo. & R. 503.

(2) Judoo, 6 W. R. 60, 4 W. R. Cr. L. 1.

(3) Ramjee Teli v. Rayho Teli, 12 C. P. L. R. 19.

and sagai marriages among the low caste Hindus, such as the Korio of Bihar[4] are customary, and a woman remarrying could not be convicted of bigamy or of this offence. Indeed, in questions arising out of marriage relationship in this country with people of diverse races each following its own customs, the question of custom is necessarily paramount[5] and, therefore, by them the factum and validity of a marriage must be judged.

5587. But of course there is a limit to the domain of custom and if it is immoral and illegal the Courts are precluded from recognizing or giving effect to it. Such a custom was set up by the accused who justified his elopement with the prosecutor's wife which had the effect of natra marriage with her and which he claimed to be sanctioned by usage, though the Court had no occasion to go into that question.[6] It is, however, evident that no Court could tolerate an elopement though it may have become sanctified by the usage of caste and acquired an euphemistic appellation.

(3) Knowledge and Reasonable Belief Essential.

5588. But the fact that the woman was married is not conclusive of the accused's guilt, for there still remains the equally material question whether the accused knew or had reason to believe her to be the wife of another man. This does not mean that the accused should know who the husband of the woman is, for all that is necessary is that he should know that she has a husband though the accused may not know him. Such knowledge may be gained in the case of Hindu women by the outward insignia of married life, by the dress worn, the parting of the hair, the application of red ochre in the part and on the forehead, the use of bangles and other ornaments, the application of turmeric on the hands and body, and, indeed, by numerous other indications which even a casual observer could not mistake.[7] Similar signs are also visible in the case of Mahomedan females, though the indications in their case are not so well marked. Even woman of other nationalities usually wear some token of their marriage, a wedding ring for instance, but in their case the external symbols are still less marked. But in any case these indicia are significant though by themselves insufficient to impute knowledge in the accused.[8]

Again, since Hindu and Mahomedan girls are by custom married before they attain puberty, a person cohabiting with a young woman of this class may be presumed to know that the chances are that she is married. At any rate, that fact may well give him reason to pause and inquire, and if he does not, he could not be acquitted of having had no reason to believe her to be a married woman. But this doctrine of presumption must not be pushed too far, for while it is true that young Hindu and Mahomedan girls are as a rule married, it is also true that some of them lose their husbands and pass through life in single blessedness. But here again, there are the tell-tale signs of widowhood, the shaven head or cropped hair, the absence of ochre bangles or ornaments, and a plain covering for body. But in the case of Maho-

(4) Bissuram, 3 C. L. R. 410.
(5) Chamia, 7 C. L. R. 354.
(6) Manohar Raiji, 5 B. H. C. R. 17.
13 (17).
(8) Madhub Chunder Giri, 21 W. R 13.
(7) Madhub Chunder Giri, 21 W. R.

medans the external signs are again less certain and in the case of Christians the widow's weeds are not confined to the peroid of widowhood. All the same, these, when present, afford a certain indication of single or married life which should put the accused upon inquiry.

5589. But since the presence of this knowledge or reasonable belief must be established by the prosecution, since it constitutes the mens rea, it follows that the prosecution must shew facts from which the Court could legitimately infer that the accused had reason to believe that the woman was married. If he was a friend of the family, or lived in the neighbourhood it is natural to infer such knowledge. But if he was a stranger then the prosecution may have to rely upon other circumstances, such as those indicated before. They were relied upon in the case of the Tarkessur Mahant who was prosecuted for this offence, in that he was found to have received in his private chamber a Brahmin woman where both were one day apprehended. The Court held that the facts that the woman not only wore the dress of a married woman but was well known in the neighbourhood of Tarkessur, and that her intercourse with the accused was long continued, were sufficient to hold that the accused had at least reason to believe that he was misconducting with a married woman, and in that view his conviction was upheld.(9)

(4) Consent or Connivance of the Husband.

5590. Another requirement of law, and one which has also to be satisfied by the prosecution is that the adultery complained of had not been consented to or connived at by the husband. This is necessary, for the offence is intended to preserve his bed unsullied and if he elected otherwise law cannot help him against himself: Volenti non fit injuria.(10) This is a principle of other applicability, but it is equally applicable to this offence. And in this respect the rule here coincides with the English rule which holds the husband's consent to bar his action though his improper conduct, not amounting to consent, goes only in the reduction of damages.(11) On the same principle, a husband has no right to turn his wife away on account of her adultery at which he connived; he cannot complain of that to which he was a willing party.(12) The term "consent" is here intended in the wider sense as denothing a consent whether express or implied. It means a permission to the paramour of his wife to have connection with her. Such consent may be implied from the fact that he admitted the accused into a brothel of which his wife was an inmate, or that he presented her to him in accordance with a vicious religious custom of a certain sect which ordains that the first fruit of married life shall belong to the priest. The question of consent presents no difficulty. Such consent must, of course, be free and not brought about by anything prohibited in s. 90 (§§ 859-867). It may be given before or after the act, as consent subsequently given will at least amount to condonation of the act, and it has in other respects the same legal effect.(13)

---

(9) Madhub Chunder Giri, 21 W. R. 13 (17).

(10) Ib.

(11) "What is consented to cannot injure."

(12) Duberby v. Gunning, 4 T. R. 651.

(13) Wilson v. Glossop, 20 Q. B. D. 354.

What is Connivance?

5591. The term "connivance"[14] is not so easy to describe. It has no doubt acquired a well defined sense in law, but the question whether a given set of circumstances constitute such connivance is not always easy to answer. Connivance is an act of the mind, and implies knowledge of and acquiescence in the act. As applied to this offence, it is the toleration of the act by the husband which he may not approve of but he does not disapprove. It is, in short, a voluntary blindness to the act. But it is not merely negligence or inattention, but something more than the mere negligence, inattention or overconfidence, dulness or apprehension or mere indifference. There must be intentional concurrence.[15] To establish connivance it is requisite, not that the party conniving should actually be an accessory before the fact, so as to have taken any active measure to bring about the result of adultery, but that he should be cognizant that such a result would follow from certain transactions that he approved of and consented to.[16] As such, there is scarcely any difference between connivance and consent.

So where the husband after some angry discussion with his wife respecting the impropriety of her conduct told her she must either choose her paramour or himself and that he could not live with her any longer if she continued her previous intimacy, after which she deliberately left her husband with full knowledge on his part that she was going to join the adulterer, but which he did nothing to prevent, it was held to be no case of connivance, Sir C. Cresswell observing: "I cannot construe that into a willing consent that the adultery should be committed. It is an unwilling consent, given because she would not comply with the condition he insisted upon of giving up the improper intimacy. By connivance I understand the willing consent of the husband, that the husband gives a willing consent to the act, although he may not be an accessory before the fact; that, although he does not take an active part towards procuring it done, he gives a willing consent and desires it to be done. What this man desired was, not that the act should be done, but she should not torment him by keeping up an intimacy of this character, and at the same time living with him as his wife and she should give up the one or other."[17]

5592. And so in another case[18] Hill, J., told the jury that "in order to establish connivance by the husband, it must be shown that he gave, a willing consent to the adultery. Mere negligence, inattention, dulness of apprehension, or indifference will not suffice: there must be an intention on his part that she should commit adultery." But as Dr. Lushington said: "Facts, to constitute connivance, must have a direct and necessary tendency to cause adultery to be committed or continued."[19] "The word 'conniving,'" observed, Lord Westbury, L. C., "is not to be limited to the literal meaning of wilfully refusing

(14) From Lat. connivo, to wink.

(15) Rogers v. Rogers, 3 Hag. 57; Phillips v. Phillips; 1 Rob. 145; Allen v. Allen 30 L. J. P. M. & A. 2; Gipps v. Gipps, 11 H. L. C. 1.

(16) Glennie v. Glennie, 32 L. J. P. M. & A. 17.

(17) Marris v. Marris, 31 L. J. P. & M. 69; Todd's Divorce Bill, (1896) W. N. 60 (3).

(18) Stone v. Stone, 1 Rob. Ec. Rep. 99 (101).

(19) Gipps v. Gipps, 11 H. L. C. 1 (14).

to see, or affecting not to see or become acquainted with that which you know or believe is happening, or about to happen. It must include the case of a husband acquiescing in, by wilfully abstaining from taking any steps to prevent, that adulterous intercourse which, from what passes before his eyes, he cannot but believe or reasonably suspect is likely to occur. Still more must 'conniving at' include the case of a husband who, having discovered the adulterv of the wife, takes a sum of money from the adulterer upon an engagement not to complain of the acts of the wife, but to abandon his legal remedy, and then leaves the wife in such a situation as cannot but facilitate the continuance or renewal of the adulterous intercourse."(20)

5593. But in order to establish a case of connivance "it is not necessary to prove connivance to actual adultery, any more than it is necessary on other side to prove an actual and specific fact of adultery. If a system of connivance or the improper familiarity, almost amounting to proximate acts, be established, I shall infer a corrupt intention as to the result, and shall not call for more direct proof."(21) And so Sir William Wynne said: "Connivance is the word used. It has been argued that it must be such as to show knowledge of, and privity to the actual commission of adultery, but that is not so. If there has been such extreme negligence to the conduct of his wife, such an encouragement of acquaintance and familar intimacy as was likely to lead to the consequence that ensued—an adulterous intercourse, it would subject him deservedly to a refusal of the sentence he prayed." "Connivance" said Lord Chelmsford, "is a figurative expression meaning a voluntary blindness to some present act or conduct, to something going on before the eyes, and is inapplicable to anything past or future."

5594. From these pronouncements it is manifest that "connivance" may amount to consent, but it is not in all respects equivalent to consent. Its essential elements rather are (i) extreme negligence, and (ii) consciousness that it may lead to impropriety. Such, for instance, was the case of the prosecutor who complained against the accused under the next section, but it was proved that his wife had ceased to live with him since six or seven years and that the prosecutor had taken no steps to complain against the accused though he was aware of his claim to have married her by nikah. It was held that the husband's omission to prosecute for so long a time amounted to connivance of the adultery complained of.(22) The same view was taken in another case in which the husband separated himself from his wife, who till then had been a virtuous woman, merely because she had run him into debt. After separation he ceased writing to her, made her no allowance and never went to see her. She thereupon led the life of a prostitute and the petitioner sued her for divorce but his desertion of her was held to have disqualified him from obtaining the divorce he had prayed for.(23) In this case the petition was filed within two years of the desertion but the same view was taken in several English cases, in which, however,

(20) Per Sir William Scott in Moorson v. Moorson, 3 Hag. Ec. Rep. 95.

(21) Gilpin v. Gilpin, 3 Hag. Ec. Rep. 150.

(22) Gipps v. Gipps, 11 H. L. C. 1 (27); Kartar Singh, 90 I. C. 156, (1925) L. 406.

(23) Jasimaddin v. Chohak, 1 C. W. N. 498.

the period of desertion was greater, amounting to eight[24] and sixteen years.[25] But time is immaterial where the husband lives upon his wife's prostitution.[1]

5595. But apart from other circumstances the court may legitimately infer connivance from a mere delay to prosecute the adulterer, though it is capable of explanation.[2] Ignorance of the misconduct of his wife is one such explanation,[3] though whether the circumstances were more consistent with ignorance than with connivance is a question of fact which must depend upon the individual circumstances of each case. Connivance is a sufficient defence to a charge of adultery though it may not have been connivance of the wife's misconduct with the accused.[4] So Lord Westbury said: "If a husband is proved to have connived at the adultery of his wife with A, he cannot obtain a dissolution of marriage on account of her adultery with B; nor if he has connived at adultery committed by his wife with a particular person at one time, can he complain of adultery committed with the same person at a subsequent time. It would be contrary to the spirit of the Act[5] and highly prejudicial to public morality, if any other interpretation were adopted. It would be a disgrace to the law to suppose that a husband may connive at the adultery of his wife on Monday, and yet be at liberty to complain of the repetition of the adultery on Tuesday."[6]

5596. Condonation of Adultery.—The section speaks only of connivance but not of condonation of the crime. But under the law of divorce, condonation has equally the effect of disqualifying the aggrieved spouse from complaining of the wrong.[7] Condonation differs from connivance in that it is a pardoning remission or forgiveness of the adulterer after the act which has the effect of releasing the injury. The question may then arise whether it has equally that effect upon the injury viewed as a crime. It is no doubt true that since condonation does not imply acquiescence or antecedent negligence amounting to connivance, the act of the accused amounts to this offence as soon as it is committed, and that what is an offence does not cease to be an offence by any subsequent condonation on the part of the injured party unless such condonation amounts to a composition.[8] In ordinary cases, the two are scarcely distinguishable since a person condones what he compromises and compromise implies condonation. If the condonation takes the form of a composition for money, the amount not paid but promised could not be recovered, because the object of the agreement being illegal, the agreement is altogether void as contrary to law and public policy.[9] If, therefore, that element disappears

(24) Holloway v. Holloway, 5 A. 71 (76).
(25) Heyes v. Heyes & Mason, L. R. 13 P. D. 11.
(1) Hawkins v. Hawkins, L. R. 10 P. D. 177.
(2) Coleman v. Coleman, L. R. 1 P. & M. 81.
(3) Williams v. Williams, 3 C. 688 (692).
(4) Ib., p. 692.
(5) His Lordship was dealing with the Divorce Act (20 & 21 Vict., c. 85), s. 29.
(6) Gipps v. Gipps, 11 H. L. C. 13 (14).
(7) Divorce Act (20 & 21 Vict., c. 85), s. 30; Keats v. Keats, 28 L. J. P. & M. 57.
(8) S. 345, Cr. P. C.
(9) Gipps v. Gipps, 11 H. L. C. 1 (24).

from the legal view of the subject there remains scarcely any difference between a previous connivance and a subsequent condonation. Moreover, since condonation disqualifies a person from obtaining a divorce, it is scarcely just that the doors of the Criminal Courts should be open to him when those of the Civil Courts are closed. The Punjab Chief Court appears to have proceeded upon this view in dismissing the husband's complaint when it appeared that he had after the act complained of and before filing his complaint, divorced his wife.(10)

Enticing or taking away or detaining with criminal intent a married woman.

Pres. Mag or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Non-cog. (s. 199. Cr P. C.) Warrant. Bailable. Comp.

498. Whoever takes or entices away any woman who is and whom he knows or has reason to believe to be the wife of any other man, from that man, or from any person having the care of her on behalf of that man, with intent that she may have illicit intercourse with any person, or conceals or detains with that intent any such woman, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

[Woman—s. 10. Reason to believe—s. 26. Takes or entices—s. 361.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5597-5598).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5599-5603).
(3) Sentence (5603).
(4) Proof (5604).
(5) Form of Charge (5605).
(6) Principle (5606).
(7) Meaning of Words (5607).
(8) Abduction of Married woman (5608-5616).
(9) Woman Enticed must be Married (5610).
(10) Accused must Know that the Woman was Married (5611).
(11) Taking must be From the Husband (5612-5613).
(12) Divorced and Deserted Women Excluded (5615-5616).
(13) "Conceals or detains any such women (5617-5618).

5597. Analogous Law.—The special provisions of this section are necessarily limited and controlled by those of sections 361 and 366, the result being that this section would apply only to cases not falling within the scope of those sections. For instance, a girl wife aged below sixteen may be taken or enticed away from the lawful guardianship of her husband or any other person, in which case the accused would be guilty both of this offence as well as of that punishable under, s. 366, but inasmuch as this is a minor offence as compared to that described in section 366 the accused may justifiably be convicted of that offence though the husband had only complained of this offence, and vice versa.(11) But could the Police take cognizance of the offence holding it to be one under section 366 without the husband's complaint as required by section 199 of the Procedure Code? It would certainly so appear, for the only prohibition enacted in the Procedure Code is that which prevents the Courts from taking cognizance of this offence without the complaint of the husband.[12] It does not extend the disqualification to any inquiry at all into offences committed in respect of married women without the consent of their husbands.

(10) Hukam Din v. Allachi, (1879) P. R. No. 27.

(11) Jatra Sheikh v. Reasab Sheikh, 20 C. 483; contra in Kallu, 5 A. 233.

5598. Another point left in doubt by the section is that relating to the criminal liability of the wife as an abettor. Under the last section she is expressly exempted, but is she equally exempt under this section though the section makes no express exemption in her favour? It has been held that in spite of the absence of express exemption she must be treated as exempt, because this offence is as compared to adultery a minor offence and it would be inconsistent to exempt her from the one without exempting her from the other.[13]

5599. Procedure and Practice.—No Court shall take cognizance of this offence unless upon a complaint made by the husband of the woman, or, in his absence, by some person who had care of such woman, or some other person mentioned in s. 199 of the Code of Criminal Procedure Code.[14] As such, the offence is non-cognizable and warrant should, ordinarily, issue in the first instance. It is both bailable and compoundable, and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first or second class. A prosecution under this section does not abate with the death of the complainant husband.[15]

As to what amounts to a complaint justifying judicial action under this section, (see § 5576).

5600. In cases arising under this section, the accused usually challenges the legality of the prosecutor's marriage to the woman enticed away, and as often as not he sets up his own marriage to her in justification of the act. The Criminal Courts consider the issues so raised sufficient to refer the complainant for redress to the Civil Court, but this is an erroneous procedure and a dereliction of duty; for as pointed out by the Punjab Chief Court the fact that the prosecutor has the Civil Courts open to him does not affect his right to set the criminal law in motion, and the Criminal Court has no authority to refuse a hearing and to pass an order which entails upon him the delay and expense of a civil suit,[16] and, it may be added, defeats the object the Legislature had in view in enacting this section. Since the object of this section is to protect the marital rights of the husband, it follows that if he divorced his wife after her abduction and then files the complaint it will be dismissed.[17]

5601. Since this offence may conceivably be included in the offence punishable under the last section, a person convicted of adultery could

(12) S. 199, Cr. P. C.

(13) Natha Singh, (1883) P. R. No. 11; Phulla v. Jiwan, (1871) P. R. No. 6, Mohun Gunsham, (1871) P. R. No. 8, overruling Syud Ahmed, (1868) P. R. No. 17.

(14) Magistrate is, of course, incompetent to act upon Police report; Bhana, (1910) P. R. No. 32, 8 I. C. 1150, 12 Cr. L. J. 50.

(15) Mary Din 4 L. 7.

(16) 2 P. Cr. C. s. 50.

(17) Hukam Din v. Allachi, (1879) P R. No. 27.

not upon the same facts be also convicted of enticing under this section.[18] It should be added that since this section contemplates criminality committed under diverse circumstances, the finding should specify only those proved: that is to say, whether the accused had (i) taken away, or (ii) enticed away the married woman, or whether the taking or enticing away was (iii) from the husband, or (iv) any other person having the care of her on his behalf, and whether the taking or enticing away was (v) with intent to have illicit intercourse with her or whether her concealment or (vi) detention was with that intention. At the same time where the facts do not warrant the finding on such exclusive particulars, there appears to be nothing illegal in recording a finding in more general terms.[19]

5602. It is perhaps unnecessary to add that this is a continuing offence and the offender is always liable to prosecution for each act of detention, and an acquittal in respect of one detention is no bar to a fresh charge for a subsequent detention[20].

Sentence.

5603. It has been held that the accused should be treated with leniency where it appears that the woman abducted was of bad character married to an immature boy[21] or that the woman was an active abettor,[22] or that the husband was indifferent.[23]

5604. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the woman was married.[24]

(2) That the accused knew or had reason to believe that she was the wife of another man.[25]

(3) That she was at the commission of the offence living under the care of her husband or some one else on his behalf.

(4) That the accused (i) took, or (ii) enticed her away from her husband or that other person; or (iii) concealed, or (iv) detained her.

(5) That his intention in doing as in (4) was that she might have illicit intercourse with some man.

5605. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of ——at ——you took away (or enticed away or concealed or detained) AB the wife of CD whom you

(18) Pochun Chung, 2 W. R. 35.
(19) Mothoora Nath Roy, 22 W. R. 72 (73).
(20) Nadar 4 L. L. J. 535, 73 I. C. 524, 24 Cr. L. J. 636.
(21) Ram Chand (1911) P. W. R. 29, 12 I. C. 220, 12 Cr. L. J. 500.
(22) Lal Khan (1914) P. W. R. 20, 24 I. C. 836, 15 Cr. L. J. 524; Chandgi, 99 I. C. 84, (1927) L. 91.
(23) Gahra, 91 I. C. 1008, (1926) L. 176.
(24) Which must be proved independently of the admission of the accused; Phikku, 89 I. C. 464, (1925) O. 701; Gopal, 94 I. C. 603, (1925) R. 328.
(25) Which must be proved by the prosecution by adducing formal evidence; Bhandaram, 61 I. C. (C.) 652, 22 Cr. L. J. 412.

then knew (or had reason to believe) to be the wife of the said CD from the said CD (or from EF who had the care of the said AB on behalf of CD) with intent that the said AB might have illicit intercourse with some person (if known, name him); and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 498 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

"And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge."

It is said that the omission to state that the person abducted was a married woman and that the accused knew it is a curable defect if the accused had not in fact been misled by it[1]: it is nevertheless a most material ingredient of the charge.

5606. Principle.—This is another section in enacting which the Code makes a departure from the English law under which though infants of tender years are protected against their being kidnapped or abducted, no special legislative sanction protects the husband against the seducer of his wife. It views such act in the light of a single wrong redressable merely in damages. But the line between crime and a civil wrong is conventional, and varies with the nature of the mischief and the state of society, the mischief to be averted and the remedy found efficient for the same.

5607. Meaning of Words.—"Takes or entices away:" This would include every form of elopement, whether the first proposal came from the paramour or the faithless wife.[2] It embraces every form of seduction culminating in the going away of the wife from her husband's coverture. "Who is and whom he knows to be the wife of another man": All that is required is that the woman should be married and her seducer must be aware of it. It is not necessary that he should know her husband (§§ 5588-5589). "From any person having the care of her on behalf of that man": This would exclude a case where the wife runs away from her husband's parents or other person and is then seduced to have illicit intercourse with another. Consequently, if a married woman leave her husband alone, and then take up with another, and there be no evidence of adultery against him, he may be wholly immune, though his intention may have been to have illicit intercourse with her. "Illicit intercourse" means, of course, sexual intercourse which is illegal. A woman taken away from her husband with his connivance would not then expose the accused to the penal visitation of this section. "Any such woman" means not a woman who has been taken or enticed away, but a woman who is and whom the offender knows to be the wife of another man.[3]

5608. Abduction of Married Woman.—The principle underlying the punishment of adultery is carried a step still further in this section which punishes the abduction of a married woman of whatever age or nationality, and irrespective of her consent. As such, in enacting these two sections the Legislature intended to protect and preserve the marital rights of the husband against their violation by a seducer. And since

(1) Obiter in Allah Din, 101 I. C. 451, (1927) L. 432. (But the accused were acquitted upon other grounds).

(2) Kumarasami, 2 M. H. C. R. 331.

(3) Alabaksh, (1891) P. R. No. 16.

women are the weaker vessel, law only punishes the male offender even though he may have been overpowered by the solicitations and entreaties of the faithless wife, so that his "taking away" may be in fact no more than a mere passive acquiescence in a course planned and executed by the wife. As Scotland, C.J., said: "I do not think that the facts found of the woman having been the tempter, and the prisoner in the first instance reluctant to yield to her solicitations, can render the case different from one in which the advances and solicitations are on the part of the man, and the woman complies, and willingly leaves her husband, and cohabits with the man. All that can be said is, that her consent is given under circumstances of greater profligacy in the one case than in the other." It is the taking or enticing of the wife from the husband for the illicit purpose that constitutes the offence. If, whilst the wife is living with her husband, a man knowingly goes away with her in such a way as to deprive the husband of his control over her with the intent stated in the section, that, I think, is a taking from the husband within the meaning of the section. The wife's complicity in the transaction is no more material on a charge under this section than it is on a charge of adultery.(4)

5609. The difference between "taking" and "enticing" has been already considered (§§ 3807-3811). These words have been used here in the same sense in which they have been used in section 361. As under that section so under this, "taking" of a person is complete the moment such person is removed from the control of the husband, while "enticing" does not even require "taking" the woman "enticed" being merely induced to leave her husband and go to the seducer otherwise unassisted by him. It is not necessary the accused taking, enticing, concealing or detaining a married woman should intend to have illicit intercourse with her himself. He equally commits this offence if he intended to dispose her of in marriage to some other person(5) (§ 3811). Indeed, it is not necessary that the person taking or enticing may himself entertain designs upon her virtue for he may be merely acting for another who may have that intention. But in that case the seducer must be aware of the intention of his principal, added to which he must be aware of the fact that the woman was married.

The section uses the words "takes, entices, conceals or detains" in connection with the offence of the accused. If he does not do anything to amount to any of these things he may still be liable for adultery, and if besides committing that offence he takes, entices, conceals or detains her, he may be convicted of this offence as well. But before he can be convicted of it there must be evidence of his taking or enticing her from the husband or guardian, or her concealment or detention with intent to have illicit intercourse with her. Detention does not imply restraint. If a man keeps a woman under his protection in a house provided by him with the knowledge and intent specified in the section it is her detention.(6) But where the woman was free to leave her seducer but was unwilling to do so she could not be held to have been detained by him.(7) It is

(4) Kumarasami, 2 M. H. C. R. 331.
(5) Naurang, 13 A. L. J. 251, 28 I. C. 651, 16 Cr. L. J. 315; Gobindu, (1919) P. R. No. 10, 51 I. C. 842, 20 Cr. L. J. 554.
(6) Bansi Lal, (1913) P. W. R. 36, 21 I. C. 467, 14 Cr. L. J. 595.
(7) Lachman Chamar, 18 A. L. J. 311, 56 I. C. 209, 21 Cr. L. J. 417.

said that a person takes a married woman from her husband even though the latter should connive at it[8]; but this seems scarcely the intention of the section.

Woman Enticed must be Married.

5610. And it is incumbent upon the prosecution to establish it, for the section requires not only proof of the fact that the woman was married, but also that the accused was aware of it. Of course, marriage here must be proved with the same degree of strictness as in the case of bigamy or adultery[9] (§§ 5586-5587). It is not sufficient merely to prove that the complainant and the delinquent woman lived together as man and wife,[10] or that they were so regarded by society and intimate friends, for the opinions of such persons though relevant are expressly declared to be insufficient to prove a marriage in a proceeding under this section.[11] But no proof will suffice to establish a marriage between Hindus belonging to widely different castes, e.g., a Bania and Jhiwari in the Punjab.[12] So again not only the factum but also the validity of the marriage must be established, unless it be apparent, for the fact that a certain form of marriage was gone through does not necessarily make the marriage valid unless by law or custom such marriages are recognized. For instance, there is a law called the "Alyasantan law" prevalent in Canara under which the woman is free after marriage to contract another marriage, provided that the marriage expenses of her first marriage are returned to her first husband. Such marriage though customary and regulated by the Code of Bhutalapandya is still not a "a marriage" as that expression is understood in this section[13] and sections 494-498. That term is confined here to signify a marriage in which the woman is enjoined strict monogamy. All other marriages howmuchsoever customary are not marriages within the meaning of this section.

Accused must know that the Woman was Married.

5611. Again, not only must the woman be married, but the accused must be aware of it. How this knowledge is to be brought home to the accused has been the subject of a previous discussion (s. 497), and it will, therefore, suffice here to state that the facts and circumstances necessary to be established under the last section must also be established under this section.

Taking must be from the Husband.

5612. Then the taking or enticing away must be from the husband or from any other person having the care of her on his behalf. This means that the woman must have been at the time of her elopement living in coverture. For, as has been pointed out by the Madras High Court, this section and the last have been enacted for the protection of the husband.[14] Consequently, if the wife leave her husband's protection before any attempt is made to take or entice her away, her subsequent seducer cannot be dealt with under this section though he may render himself liable for

(8) Ganesh Ram, 54 I. C. (Pat.) 619, 21 Cr. L. J. 139.
(9) Pitambar Singh, 5 C. 566, F. B.; Sobrati v. Jungli, 2 C. W. N. 245.
(10) Arshed Ali, 13 C. L. R. 125.
(11) Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 50.
(12) Mokandi v. Mohri, (1893) P. R. No. 17.
(13) Koraga, 6 M. 374.
(14) Kumarasami, 2 M. H. C. R. 331. Pahlwan, (1915) P. W. R. 5, 27 I. C. 840, 16 Cr. L. J. 216.

adultery.[15] This suggests the question, when is the wife with her husband so that her enticement is from him for the purpose of this offence. Ordinarily, the wife must be found living with her husband, but her residence in her husband's house during his absence on business is still her residence with him, so that her removal from his house during his absence would entail the penalty here prescribed. Then again in this country where polygamy is sanctioned, a man may keep his wife in a separate house maintaining her there, in which case she should still be under the protection of her husband though he may not continuously reside with her,[16] but in such case, of course, it must be established that the accused was aware or had reason to believe her to be married. And he must have known this at the time of the enticement. If, therefore, the woman first deserts her husband and then goes to the accused of her own accord[17] or if he picks her up in a brothel house or on the road, he could not be convicted of this offence, for though in such a case he may have enticed her, he did not entice her away from her husband.

5613. Besides her husband, the wife may be in charge of any other person on his behalf in which case the provisions of the section equally apply. Such person may be the wife's parents or other relations to whom she may have gone on a temporary visit in which case living with them, she continues to be under the protection of her husband. The same protection would extend even if she is lodged in a boarding house or a hotel, the husband paying for her board and residence in which case her abduction would, subject to the same reservation, be still punishable under this section. Indeed, her place of residence is in such cases comparatively immaterial; what is material is her husband's protection and its knowledge by the accused. So where the wife left her husband and began to live with her parents who gave her away in marriage to another, and the husband took no notice of her for six or seven years after which he prosecuted her alleged nikah husband for abduction and adultery, the Court threw out his complaint on the ground that the lapse of time betokened his desertion and connivance at the offence.[18]

5614. Thus then the husband's remedy may be lost by delay and desertion no less than by connivance and consent. But a mere ill-treatment or cruelty does not amount to desertion, though it has evidentiary value, if the case of the accused is that the woman was not enticed but was driven out of her husband's house by his own maltreatment. But the question whether she was enticed or left of her own accord is a question of fact for the determination of which her treatment is not all in all. For instance, where the wife, a young woman, twenty years old, confessed to her having been disgusted with her lot in her husband's house where her husband used to beat her, and being willing to exchange her life of drudgery and hard living for that of a Calcutta prostitute, whereby she expected to get good food, clothes, and money, but this was her secret inclination which she could not have given effect to without the assistance of the accused, a procuress who led her the way to a brothel house, it was held that this was sufficient for her conviction under this section.[19]

(15) Pahlwan, (1915) P. W. R. 5, 27 I. C. 840, 16 Cr. L. J. 216.

(16) Multy Khan v. Mungloo, 5 W. R. 50.

(17) Pochun Chaung, 2 W. R. 35; Mihan Singh, (1883) P. R. No. 15.

(18) Jasimaddin v. Ichohak, 1 C. W. N. 498 (500).

(19) Srimotee Poddee, 1 W. R. 45.

Divorced and Deserted Women Excluded.

5615. It has been said before (§ 5610) that the section only extends to women who are married and which fact is known to the accused. It has, therefore, no reference to a woman who though married at one time was afterwards divorced by her husband. So where the husband was found to have divorced his wife after her abduction, he was held disqualified to complain under this section.(20) In another case, the complainant, a Mahomedan, stated that he had married six women, out of whom he kept the two first partially divorced by pronouncing the formula of divorce only once or twice and not three times as required, in order to legalize his marriage with the fifth and sixth, and so keep within the law which permitted him only four wives. Accused was charged with abducting or committing adultery with the complainant's sixth wife, but it was held that since the first two wives had not been divorced, they still remained good wives so that his marriage to the fifth and sixth wives was illegal under the personal law to which he belonged, and consequently the accused could not be convicted of this offence for taking away his sixth wife.(21) The accused who had kept the wife who had been either divorced ed or discarded by her husband for many years allowing her to go and do as she pleased was held to have committed no offence under this section since the accused could not be said to have known that she was married when the husband had himself suffered her to act as if she were not.(22)

For other cases, see s. 494.

5616. Assuming now that the woman was legally married, the next requirement of the law is that the accused should have known or have reason to believe her to be married (§§ 5588-5589). And the intention of the accused must be that she should have illicit intercourse with any person. This makes it clear that it is not necessary that the abductor should himself intent to have such intercourse with her. Indeed, the abductor may be a pimp acting for another in which case his criminal responsibility could not be any less because he was the hired mercenary of the real seducer. Indeed, the real venom of criminality lies in the withdrawal of a married woman from her husband for an immoral purpose—it is then immaterial who holds illicit intercourse with her. The abductor may or may not himself be aware of it. For instance, he may be enlisting recruits for his brothel or he may intend to dispose of a woman to other persons willing to pay for her, in all of which cases he intends that the woman should have illicit intercourse with any person, which is all that is necessary for the offence. It is not even necessary that she should actually have such intercourse(23) or that she should even be aware of the purpose for which she was taken away.

5617. "Conceals or detains any such woman."—The section punishes not only the taking or enticing away of a married woman, but also her concealment or detention with the same intent, namely, the intent that she may have illicit intercourse with any person. The words "conceals or detains" do not necessarily imply wrongful confinement of the wife. They are rather intended to be applied to the enticing or inducing a wife to

---

(20) Hukam Din v. Allachi, (1879) P. R. 27.
(21) Rabnawaz Khan, (1875) P. R. 1.
(22) Pahlwan, (1915) P. W. R. 5, 27 I. C. 840, 16 Cr. L. J. 216.
(23) Gaman, (1899) P. R. No. 9.

withdraw or conceal herself from her husband, and assisting her to do so, as much as to physical restraint or prevention of her will or action.[24] Such concealment or detention may be brought about simply by the influence of allurements and blandishments or it may be the result of coercion and restraint. Indeed, the only question material is whether she was taken or enticed away, concealed or detained; it is then immaterial for the purpose of the present case how that result had been brought about. It may affect the question of the accused's responsibility under some other provisions of the Code, but it is not a question that need be canvassed for the purpose of this offence.

5618. Again, when it is said that "any such woman" was concealed or detained, what is implied is that the woman concealed or detained was a married woman and known as such to the accused. It does not refer to such a woman taken away or enticed.[25] In other words, the offence is complete whether the woman is merely taken or enticed away, or is merely concealed or detained, provided that the accompanying intention is in each case the same.

(24) Sundara Das, 4 M. H. C. R. 20; Abdul Wahid Khan, 103 I. C. 559, (1927) O. 318.

(25) Niadir, 10 A. 580; followed in Ala Baksh, (1891) P. R. No. 16.

CHAPTER XXI

OF DEFAMATION

5619. Topical Introduction.—The foundation of civil society rests upon mutual aid and trust which makes co-operation necessary and possible. Such co-operation must assume the existence of the love of fame, reputation and character as a mainspring of individual action. Indeed, its operation is co-extensive with the moral law. The right then of every person to the character and reputation which his conduct deserves, stands on the same footing with the right to the enjoyment of his life, liberty, health, property, and all the comforts and advantages which appertain to a state of civil society, inasmuch as security to character and reputation are indispensably essential to the enjoyment of every other right and privilege incident to such a state. This cannot be denied, and it is a theme upon which the views of all nations are unanimous. The subject they, however, differ upon is the appropriate remedy. It is manifest that the circumstances on which the title to a remedy must depend are (i) the injurious quality or consequence of the calumny, (ii) the mode or extent of publication, (iii) the motive and intention of the party in publishing it, and (iv) the collateral circumstances connected with the publication.(1) And these will have to be presently considered.

5620. As has been elsewhere observed, the three main divisions of the Code comprise offences against the state, those against the person and those relating to property. This chapter may be said to refer to offences relating to reputation, and as such it should find its logical place in the part relating to personal injuries, where the next chapter relating to threats of injury should also find a more appropriate place. The law of defamation is based upon the fundamental principle that the reputation of a member of society, the esteem in which he is held by it, the credit and trust it reposes in his intelligence, honour and integrity, is his valuable asset, and that the love of reputation being a great moving principle of human action, must be encouraged and protected. The traces of this offence will consequently be found in the earliest records of human history.

The Psalms of David cursed the tongue that imagined wickedness and with lies cut like a sharp razor.(2) So the publication of false reports affecting the character of others was prohibited by the Mosaic Law,(3) though it appears to have prescribed no punishment. But the laws of Solon punished calumniators by an arbitrary fine, and the same penalty was sanctioned by the law of the Twelve Tables. And the civil law assigned to libel a distinct place in the corpus juris, the libeller being liable both to a prosecution as well as an action for damages. And this double remedy was open not only to the person actually defamed, but also to any member of his family, if they tended collaterally to expose him to degradation and contempt.(4) It is not clear whether the civil law admitted

(1) Folkard's Libel (5th Ed.) 15.
(2) Psalm 52, see also ib., 5, 10, 14, 24.
(3) Exod. xxiii, 1.
(4) Heineccious, pt. 7, s. 118.

truth as a justification, but it was at any rate regarded as a qualified defence. The civil law on this subject has influenced the modern legislation of Western Europe, where the offence is enacted substantially in the form adopted in the Code. But in this respect the law of England marks a departure in that it places civil and criminal responsibility on distinct grounds, regarding the mischief to the private individual as the basis of the former, the mischief to society the foundation of the latter.

English and Indian Standpoints.

5621. The offence of defamation for which this chapter makes provision is presented here in a form materially at variance on two important points from that in which the offence is understood in English Law. Even the very principle underlying the two offences is different. For while under English Law the gist of the offence of defamatory libel is said to lie in its tendency to provoke breach of the peace,(5) the Code regards its essence to lie in its tendency to cause that description of pain which is felt by a person who knows himself to be the object of the unfavourable sentiments of his fellow-creatures, and those inconveniences of which a person who is the object of such unfavourable sentiments is exposed.(6)

Referring to these two standpoints the authors wrote. "It appears to us evident that between the offence of defaming and the offence of provoking to a breach of peace, there is a distinction as broad as that which separates theft from murder. Defamatory imputation of the worst kind may have no tendency to cause acts of violence. Words which convey no discreditable imputation whatever may have that tendency in the highest degree. Even in cases where defamation has a tendency to cause acts of violence, the heinousness of the defamation, considered as defamation, is by no means proportioned to its tendency to cause such acts: nay, circumstances which are great aggravations of the offence, considered as defamation, may be great mitigations of the same offence, considered as a provocation to a breach of the peace. A scurrilous satire against a friendless woman, published by a person who carefully conceals his name, would be defamation in one of its most odious forms. But it would be only by a legal fiction that the satirist could be said to provoke a breach of the peace. On the other hand, an imputation on the courage of an officer contained in a private letter, meant to be seen only by that officer and two or three other persons, might, considered as defamation, be a very venial offence. But such an imputation would have an obvious tendency to cause a serious breach of the peace."(7) In short, such an offence, viewed from the standpoint of provocation to breach of peace would vary in its gravity not according to the gravity of the libellous words but the power of retaliation. This is obviously a fallacious standpoint and the Code did well to discard it.

Libel and Slander.

5622. There is a difference on yet another point between the two systems. English Law discriminates between libel and slander, or defamatory words written and spoken, punishing only for the written words, and leaving the speaker to be dealt with by the civil

(5) Wegner, 2 Stark, N. P. 245, 19 R. R. 712; Brooke, 7 Cox 251; Adams, 22 Q. B. D. 66; Eusor, 3 T. L. R. 366.

(6) Parwari, 41 A. 311.

(7) Note R., Reprint, pp. 175, 176.

law. Here again the Code presents a noticeable departure in that it recognises no such distinction, classing both as defamation and punishing them as such. This deviation from the English standard may appear novel, but it had sufficient reason to commend itself. So the authors wrote: "By the English Law, defamation is a crime only when it is committed by writing, printing, engraving, or some similar process. Spoken words reflecting on private character, however atrocious may be the imputations which these words convey, however numerous may be the assembly before which such words are uttered, furnish ground only for a civil action. Herein the English Law is scarcely consistent with itself. For if defamation be punished on account of its tendency to cause breach of the peace, spoken defamation ought to be punished even more severely than written defamation, as having that tendency in a higher degree. A person who reads in a pamphlet a calumnious reflection on himself, or some one in whom he is interested, is less likely to take a violent revenge than a person who hears the same calumnious reflection uttered. Public men who have by long habit become callous to slander and abuse in a printed form, often show acute sensibility to imputations thrown on them to their faces. Indeed, defamatory words, spoken in the presence of the person who is the object of them, necessarily have more of the character of a personal affront, and are, therefore, more likely to cause breach of the peace than any printed libel.

"The distinction which the English criminal law makes between written and spoken defamation is generally defended on the ground that written defamation is likely to be more widely spread and to be more permanent than spoken defamation. These considerations do not appear to us to be entitled to much weight. In the first place it is by no means necessarily the fact that written defamation is more extensively circulated than spoken defamation. Written defamation may be contained in a letter intended for a single eye, spoken defamation may be heard by an assembly of many thousands. It seems to us most unreasonable that it would be penal to say in a private letter, that a man is dissipated, and not penal to stand up at the Town Hall, and there, before the whole society of Calcutta, falsely to accuse him of poisoning his father.

"In the second place, it is not necessarily the fact that the harm caused by defamation is proportioned to the extent to which the defamation is circulated. Some slanders, and those slanders of a most malignant kind, can produce harm only while confined to a very small circle, and would be at once refuted if they were published. A malignant whisper addressed to a single hearer, and meant to go no further, may indicate greater depravity, may cause more intense misery, and may deserve more severe punishment than a satire which has run through twenty editions. A person, for example, who, in private conversation, should infuse into the mind of a husband suspicions of the fidelity of a virtuous wife, might be a defamer of a far worse description than one who should insert the lady's name in a printed lampoon.

"It must be allowed that, in general, a printed story is likely to live longer than a story which is only circulated in conversation. But, on the other hand, it is far easier for a calumniated person to clear his character, either by argument or by legal proceedings, from a charge fixed in a printed form, than from a shifting rumour, which nobody repeats exactly as he heard it. In general, we believe, a man would rather see in a newspaper a story discreditable to him which he had the means of refuting, than know that such a story, though not published, was current in society."(8)

5623. This was admitted by the English Law Commissioners who said: "The truth of the general abstract proposition is undeniable that when the subject of publication is in its own nature noxious and offensive, any mode of publication must be objectionable, and can be material only as regards the extent and degree of the mischief likely to be occasioned by it." They allowed that slanderous and abusive language may be much more likely to provoke the party to whom it is applied when spoken in the presence of many others than if addressed to him by letter, where an interval was allowed for the subsidence of sudden resentment; as also that a law which "with a view to the public peace merely prohibited written insult, would be incommensurate with its object, viz., the preservation of the peace which is quite as likely to be broken in consequence of an oral as of a written insult."

"Each mode of publication," they observed, "may, in truth, be more pernicious than the other when the comparison is made of different injurious consequences." They remark, however, that in ordinary cases there is this marked distinction between oral and written communication, as regards the mind and intention of the publisher and the effect of the thing published that, "the committing of injurious and defamatory matter to writing evinces a more determined and deliberate purpose than is ordinarily to be inferred from mere words spoken. Communications by writing are therefore likely to make stronger impressions than such as are merely oral. They are permanent and capable of wider diffusion." Conceding that "distinctions founded merely on a consideration of the particular mode of communication must be in a great measure arbitrary and artificial, and dependent on reasons of collateral policy and convenience," they still defended that distinction on the ground that when "considerations of extrinsic policy are taken into the account, and allowed to operate in restraint of criminal liability, it is obvious that a dstinction founded on the mode of publication, including within its scope such modes as, by their capability and facility of diffusion and their permanency, must ordinarily be considered as the more dangerous, and excluding such as are merely oral, may well consist with general convenience."

5624. They then urged two objections to the inclusion of slander among offences on the ground of (i) general inconvenience and (ii) the facility of proof. The first they explained that "to make mere oral communications penal when they reflected on the characters of individuals, would be a very heavy restraint on the ordinary intercourse of mankind, and would necessarily and unavoidably occasion much and vexatious litigation, and would weaken the great securities for the discharge of legal as well as moral obligations, the love of reputation, and the fear of public censure and disgrace." As to the second they said: "In the next place, the proof of an offence committed by the writing and publishing of illegal matter is far more definite and complete than where the offence is merely oral, when so much depends on tone and manner, the situation of the speaker, the circumstances under which he spoke, the understanding and memory of the hearers."(9)

(8) Note R, Reprint, p. 177.

But these objections were not found insuperable to the assimilation of slander with defamatory libel, by the Select Committee of the House of Lords who in 1843 proposed to alter the existing law with these pertinent remarks: "At present, while for many words reduced into writing which in any way tend to injure reputation, though communicated to only one individual, the law gives a remedy, there is no remedy, without proof of special damage, for mere words, however injurious to reputation, and however publicly spoken unless they impute an idictable offence, or apply to a man in his business or import that he is labouring under an infectious disease, so that falsely and maliciously to impute in the coarsest terms and on the most public occasion, want of chastity to a woman of high station and unspotted character, or want of veracity or courage to a gentleman of undoubted honesty and honour, cannot be made the foundation of any proceeding civil or criminal; whereas an action may be maintained for saying that a cobbler is not skilful in mending shoes, or that any one has held up his hand in a threatening posture to another. The Committee conceive that these distinctions, which are quite peculiar to the law of England, do not rest on any solid foundation, and that wherever an injury is done to character by defamation there ought to be redress by action." This recommendation was, however, not given effect to in the Statute which, though otherwise amending the law, still retained the distinction between oral and written slander.(10) But these reasons appeared more cogent to the authors of the Code and their views have been given effect to by the Legislature.

5625. While therefore the Code makes no distinction between a spoken and a written defamation it leaves that distinction to be taken into consideration in apportioning the punishment. In other words, the Code regards the mode of publication as by no means essential to the constitution of the crime, though it regards it material for the purpose of determining its gravity. And so there exist two sections (ss. 501-502) intended to arrest the dissemination of defamatory matter by means of printed or engraved matter. In the same way it views the question about the offence having a tendency to breach of peace, regarding it as an aggravation rather than an essential element of the crime. And this gives rise to a fresh offence punishable under section 504, namely, the giving of intentional insult with intent to provoke breach of the peace. This offence may then be said to present somewhat closer analogy to defamatory libel of English Law, though the latter then admits of the exceptions like those enacted under section 499 but which the former takes no account of. Insult may then be regarded as a form of defamation, viewed from a different standpoint and constituting a different offence. Sedition dealt with under section 124-A is another species of the same offence, though it has been placed under a different category and is now regarded as a distinct offence. So is also s. 153 which is defamation of a class as such and has otherwise become a distinct offence.

5626. But they all belong to the same genus, though they are now no longer subject to the same exceptions. These ten exceptions refer to cases in which words prima facie libellous are not punishable. This may be classed under two main heads: those in which truth spoken for the public good is no offence, and in which case the question of bona fides is immaterial[11] and those in which bona fides and not truth are material. In the one case the words must be true and uttered for the public good whatever may be the speaker's motive or intention; in the other case publication must have been made bona fide, though it may not be true.

---

(9) 6th Rep., p. 48.

(10) 6 & 7 Vict., c. 96.

5627. These exceptions, save one omission, generally follow the lines of English Law, but one of them at least is not in consonance with the published recommendation of Lord Macaulay's Committee. Instead of the first exception as now enacted it proposed to except the publication of truth at all times and under all circumstances, and they based their innovation on the following reasoning: First, that in some cases of prosecution for defamation the truth of the imputations alleged to be defamatory ought to be a justification; secondly, that in the vast majority of such cases if not in all, truth, if it be not a justification, ought to be a mitigation; and from which they held a third proposition established, viz., that in all cases of prosecution for defamation, if the defendant avers that the imputations complained of as defamatory are true, the Court ought to go into the question of the truth of those imputations. This, they said, ought to be done not only in justice to the public and to the defendant, but in justice to the innocent complainant, for to clear his fame is his first object.[12] But this surely is not the object of the offence, nor indeed, could it be generally said that a complainant who applies to the Court for protection against a libel comes to Court to clear himself and not to punish his assailant. The Legislature has, therefore, wisely negatived the suggestion to make truth as an all-sufficient defence. This section makes another departure, conscious or otherwise, from the English Common Law in that it does not extend the same immunity to judges, jurors and counsel, parties and their witnesses which they enjoy in England since their privilege is only subject to the General Exceptions (7) to (9).

Defamation.

499. Whoever by words either spoken or intended to be read, or by signs or by visible representations, makes or publishes any imputation concerning any person intending to harm or knowing or having reason to believe that such imputation will harm the reputation of such person, is said, except in the cases hereinafter excepted, to defame that person.

Explanation. 1.—It may amount to defamation to impute anything to a deceased person, if the imputation would harm the reputation of that person if living and is intended to be hurtful to the feelings of his family or other near relatives.

Explanation. 2.—It may amount to defamation to make an imputation concerning a company or an association or collection of person as such.

---

(11) Exceptions 1 & 4. (12) Note R.

Explanation 3.—An imputation in the form of an alternative or expressed ironically, may amount to defamation.

Explanation 4.—No imputation is said to harm a person's reputation, unless that imputation directly or indirectly, in the estimation of others lowers the moral or intellectual character of that person, or lowers the character of that person in respect of his caste or of his calling, or lowers the credit of that person, or causes it to be believed that the body of that person is in a loathsome state, or in a state generally considerad as disgraceful.

Illustrations.

(a) A says: "Z is an honest man; he never stole B's watch," intending to cause it to be believed that Z did steal B's watch. This is defamation, unless it fall within one of the exceptions.

(b) A is asked who stole B's watch. A points to Z, intending to cause it to be believed that Z stole B's watch. This is defamation, unless it fall within one of the exceptions.

(c) A draws a picture of Z running away with B's watch, intending to be believed that Z stole B's watch. This is defamation, unless it fall within one of the exceptions.

Imputation of truth which public good requires to be made or published.

First Exception—It is not defamation to impute anything which is true concerning any person, if it be for the public good that the imputation should be made or published. Whether or not it is for the public good is a question of fact.

Public conduct of public servants.

Second Exception.—It is not defamation to express in good faith any opinion whatever respecting the conduct of a public servant in the discharge of his public functions, or respecting his character, so far as his character appears in that conduct, and no further.

Conduct of any person touching any public question.

Third Exception.—It is not defamation to express in good faith any opinion whatever respecting the conduct of any person touching any public question, and respecting his character so far as his character appears in that conduct and no further.

Illustration.

It is not defamation in A to express in good faith any opinion whatever respecting Z's conduct in petitioning Government on a public question, in signing a requisition for a meeting on a public question, in presiding or attending at such meeting in forming or joining any society which invites the public support, in voting or canvassing for a particular candidate for any situation in the efficient discharge of the duties of which the public is interested.

Fourth Exception.—It is not defamation to publish a substantially true report of the proceedings of a Court of Justice, or of the result of any such proceedings.

Publication of reports of proceedings of Court.

Explanation.—A justice of the Peace or other officer holding an enquiry in open Court preliminary to a trial in a Court of Justice is a Court within the meaning of the above section.

Fifth Exception.—It is not defamation to express in good faith any opinion whatever, respecting the merits of any case, civil or criminal, which has been decided by a Court of Justice, or respecting the conduct of any person as a party, witness or agent, in any such case, or respecting the character of such person, as far as his character appears in that conduct, and no further Merits of case decided in Court or conduct of witnesses and others concerned.

Illustrations.

(a) A says: "I think Z's evidence on that trial is so contradictory that he must be stupid or dishonest." A is within this exception if he says this in good faith, inasmuch as the opinion which he expresses respects Z's character as it appears in Z's conduct as a witness, and no further.

(b) But if A says: "I do not believe what Z asserted at that trial, because I know him to be a man without veracity." A is not within this exception, inasmuch as the opinion which he expresses of Z's character, is an opinion not founded on Z's conduct as a witness.

Sixth Exception.—It is not defamation to express in good faith any opinion respecting the merits of any performance which its author has submitted to the judgment of the public, or respecting the character of the author so far as his character appears in such performance, and no further.

Merits of public performance.

Explanation.—A performance may be submitted to the judgment of the public expressly or by acts on the part of the author, which imply such submission to the judgment of the public.

Illustrations.

(a) A person who publishes a book, submits that book to the judgment of the public.

(b) A person who makes a speech in public, submits that speech to the judgment of the public.

(c) An actor or singer who appears on a public stage submits his acting or singing to the judgment of the public.

(d) A says of a book published by Z: Z's book is foolish; Z must be a weak man. Z's books is indecent; Z must be a man of impure mind." A is within this exception, if he says this in good faith, inasmuch as the opinion which he expresses of Z respects Z's character only so far as it appears in Z's book, and no further.

(c) But if A says: "I am not surprised that Z's book is foolish and indecent for he is a weak man and a libertine." A is not within this exception, inasmuch as the opinion which he expresses of Z's character is an opinion not founded on Z's book.

Censure passed in good faith by person having lawful authority over another.

Seventh Exception.—It is not defamation in a person having over another any authority, either conferred by law or arising out of a lawful contract made with that other, to pass in good faith any censure on the conduct of that other in matters to which such lawful authority relates.

Illustration.

A judge censuring in good faith the conduct of a witness, or of an officer of the Court; a head of a department censuring in good faith those who are under his orders; a parent censuring in good faith a child in the presence of other children; a schoolmaster, whose authority is derived from a parent, censuring in good faith a pupil in the presence of other pupils, a master censuring a servant in good faith for remissness in service; a banker censuring in good faith the cashier of his bank for the conduct of such cashier as such cashier—are within this exception.

Accusation preferred in good faith to authorized person.

Eighth Exception.—It is not defamation to prefer in good faith an accusation against any person to any of those who have lawful authority over that person with respect to the subject matter of accusation.

Illustration.

If A in good faith accuses Z before a Magistrate; if A in good faith complains of the conduct of Z, a servant, to Z's master; if A in good faith complains of the conduct of Z, a child, to Z's father—A is within this exception.

Imputation made in good faith by person for protection of his or other's interests.

Ninth Exception.—It is not defamation to make an imputation on the character of another, provided that the imputation be made in good faith for the protection of the interest of the person making it, or of any other person or for the public good.

Illustrations.

(a) A, a shopkeeper, says to B who manages his business: "Sell nothing to Z unless he pays you ready money; for I have no opinion of his honesty." A is within the exception, if he has made this imputation on Z in good faith for the protection of his own interests.

(b) A, a Magistrate, in making a report to his superior officer, casts an imputation on the character of Z. Here, if the imputation is made in good faith, and for the public good, A is within the exception.

Tenth Exception.—It is not defamation to convey a caution, in good faith, to one person against another, provided that such caution be intended for the good of the person to whom it is conveyed, or of some person in whom that person is interested, or for the public good.

Caution intended for good of person to whom conveyed or for public good.

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5628-5629).
(2) Principle (5630).
(3) Meaning of Words (5631).
(4) What is Defamation (5632).
(5) "Makes or Publishes" (5633-5638).
(6) Is Communication to the Person Defamed Publication? (5634).
(7) Negligent Communication Excepted (5635-5636).
(8) Negligence When Inexcusable (5637).
(9) Communication in Confidence (5638).
(10) Publication by Printer (5639-5641).
(11) Publication by Repetition (5642-5644).
(12) Mitigating Circumstances (5644).
(13) Publication may be by Words or Signs (5645-5646).
(14) Imputation must be Harmful (5647-5650).
(15) What is an "imputation" (5647).
(16) What is "harm" (5648).
(17) No Actual Harm Necessary (5649-5650).
(18) Ingredients of a Guilty Mind (5651-5652).
(19) Person Defamed must be Certain (5653).
(20) Reputation must be Harmed (5654-5666).
(21) What is Reputation (5654).
(22) Words Defamatory though Reputation Not Harmed (5655).
(23) Words Obviously Defamatory (5656-5661).
(24) Ambiguous Words (5662-5665).
(25) Neutral Words (5666).
(26) Defamation of the Dead (5667-5672).
(27) Feelings of the Family must be Hurt (5670-5671).
(28) No Civil Remedy (5672).
(29) Defamation of a Class (5673-5675).
(30) A Class may Defame (5675).
(31) Defamation by Innuendo (5676-5678)
(32) What is "Harming the reputation" (5679-5685).
(33) Harm to Caste (5682-5684).
(34) Harm to Credit or Calling (5685).
(35) Publication of Truth for Public Good (5686-5688).
(36) What is Truth (5689-5692).
(37) Only Truth of Libel must be Proved (5691).
(38) Existence of Rumour is No Defence (5692).
(39) Publication must be for Public Good (5693-5697).
(40) What is "Public good" (5695-5696).
(41) Public Interest Distinguished (5697).
(42) Criticism of Public Servants (5698).
(43) What Opinion is Protected (5699-5708).
(44) Opinion must be Fair and Honest (5702-5704).
(45) Personal Attack Not Privileged (5705-5708).

(46) Criticism on Public Question (5709-5711).
(47) Publication of Judicial Proceedings (5712-5716).
(48) What is "a substantially true report" (5713-5714).
(49) Comments on Judicial Proceedings (5715).
(50) Jurisdiction Immaterial (5716).
(51) Report of Preliminary Judicial Inquiry (5717-5718).
(52) Mode of Publication Immaterial (5718).
(53) Report of Non-judicial Public Proceeding (5719-5720).
(54) Comment on Cases (5721-5725).
(55) Privilege of Party to Judicial Proceeding (5725).
(56) Literary Criticism (5726-5731).
(57) Opinion must Relate to the Merits (5729-5731).
(58) Censure by One in Authority (5732-5737).
(59) Accused must be in Authority (5733-5734).
(60) Authority may be legal, contractual or social (5735).
(61) Authority may be limited or unlimited (5736-5737).
(62) Complaint to Authority (5738-5739).
(63) What Persons are in Authority (5740-5743).
(64) Accusation (5744-5745).
(65) Accusation must be Made in Good Faith (5746).
(66) Statements Made in Self-defence or Defence of Another (5747-5753).
(67) What "interest" is Necessary (5750).
(68) Test of Public Good (5751).
(69) Privilege of the Press (5753).
(70) Privilege of Judge, Counsel, Parties and Witnesses (5754-5759).
(71) Absolute Privilege under English Law (5755).
(72) Absolute Civil Immunity (5756).
(73) Indian Rule the Same (5757-5758).
(74) Common Law Privilege (5759-5760).
(75) Indian Rule (5761).
(76) Pleaders and Parties (5762-5763).
(77) Witnesses (5764).
(78) Privileges of Party and Witnesses Compared (5765).
(79) Limits of the Privilege (5766-5767).
(80) Privilege Arising from Interest or Duty (5768-5769).
(81) Advice Gratis When Protected (5770-5772).
(82) Caste Disputes (5773-5776).
(83) Matters of Public Interest (5778).
(84) Caution in Good Faith (5779).
(85) Undue publicity (5780).
(86) Communication in Confidence (5781).
(87) Unnecessary Aspersion (5782).
(88) Statement to Pleader (5783-5784).
(89) Legislators' Absolute Privilege (5785)

5628. Analogous Law.—The two main distinctions between the English Law of libel and the offence here defined consist in that (i) whereas English Law views the crime as having a tendency to provoke breach of peace, the Code views it as an offence on account of the mental suffering of the person defamed, and (ii) while English Law excludes spoken words from the category of the crime,[13] regarding them as of comparatively minor importance and as such sufficiently redressed in compensation, the Code makes no such distinction, though it does not consider the question as wholly immaterial in apportioning the punishment.

(13) 2 Salk. 417; Langley, 6 Mod. 125, Parwari, 41 A. 311.

5629. This section first defines the offence and then it sets out the ten exceptions to which it is subject. Of these the first was made the subject of much comment, the question before the draftsmen being whether truth alone should at all times be a sufficient justification or whether it should be qualified by necessity. Lord Macaulay's Committee were of the first opinion, which they justified in a long minute, but the Legislature did not fall in with their views, the result being that truth alone is not a sufficient justification of defamation. The remaining exceptions follow generally the lines of the English statute law known as Fox's Libel Act,(14) though they differ in minor details which will be presently considered.

The Code is, of course, exhaustive of the law of libel as applicable to this country, though its provisions are naturally subject to those of the Government of India Act which exempts legislators from its authority in respect of speeches made by them in the House.(15)

5630. Principle.—This offence is intended to protect one's personal reputation as the other offences are designed to protect persons against other injuries to their person and property. The principle underlying each case is the same, for as the Law Commissioners observed: "It is difficult to suggest any good reason for making penal restraints for the protection of property or for the safety of the person, which would not be equally applicable to the providing for the protection of reputation."(16) But since such protection must necessarily be made subject to the protection of society, it follows that the protection of personal reputation must necessarily admit of exceptions in favour of the interest of society which law justly esteems greater than the interest of an individual. This accounts for the ten exceptions to which the offence is subject, and the particular operation of which will have to be more fully discussed in the sequel.

As regards the special privilege of Judges, Jurors, and Counsel the enactment of this section has engendered some difficulty. Under the English Common Law, Judges and Counsel are both absolutely privileged. This rule is held to be equally applicable to this country in respect of their civil liability, since there is no statutory enactment to the contrary but the interposition of this section is held to qualify their privilege as regards their criminal liability which would be determined in accordance with the general law here enacted subject only to its own exceptions resulting in their privilege being limited by good faith; which applies equally to all litigants and their legal advisers and witnesses. At one time some courts were disposed to hold this qualification enlarged by the common law but the courts are now agreed that there is no room for such extension; but at the same time while so holding they draw a line between parties and pleaders presuming in the case of the latter good faith until the contrary is shewn.

5631. Meaning of Words.—"By words spoken," i.e., words spoken and not reduced to writing; "or intended to be read," i.e., words written for publication, words entered in one's confidential diary would thus be excepted. "By sign or visible representations": Illustration (b) is an example of such sign, and illustration (c), of such verbal representation which may consist of anything in the nature of a caricature, and effigy, sign, or a statue or the like.

(14) 3 & 4 Wm. IV, C. 85.
(15) S. 67 (7); s. 72-D (7).
(16) 6th Rep., p. 48.

"Makes or publishes any imputation," that is to say, the words and signs or visible representations must convey some imputation against any person. The word "make" is used in the general sense of including all those who in any way contribute to it, so that if one dictates and another writes, both make such an imputation. This sense is further amplified in the word "publishes," which means giving publicity to a thing by circulating it to other persons. The word implies something more than a mere communication by the defamer to the person defamed (§ 5633). The term "imputation" implies an allegation of fact and not merely a term of abuse which may amount to an insult, but is not defamation (§ 5647).

"Concerning any person": The term person here includes a Company or Association or body of persons, whether incorporated or not[17]; but not a newspaper[18] or any abstract concept.

"That such imputation will harm the reputation," i.e., actual harm is not necessary.[19] A person's own opinion of himself is not his reputation. It rather means the opinion of others about him. The good name one bears or the esteem in which one is held in society is one's reputation. This is evident from explanation 4. The moral character there spoken of must be understood as used in a general sense, so that if a person speaks of a minister of religion calling him an atheist, it will be libellous, because it will be an attack both upon his calling as well as his moral character. But, of course, where the harm is trivial, the provisions of s. 95 should apply[20] (§§ 5653, 5654).

"Anything which is true.....if it be for the public good": That is to say, truth alone is never a defence to a prosecution for defamation. In order to be a defence the imputation made or published must be both true as well as made for the public good. The question whether an imputation was for the public good is, of course, declared to be a question of fact. But exceptions 2 and 3 give instances of two such imputations which are not only protected as being for the public good, but which are further protected in that they need not be true if only they are made bona fide. The same policy dictates the rest of the exceptions.

For other words, see the discussion below.

5632. What is Defamation?—Defamation is, in short, an imputation made against another person, which is and believed by the maker to be injurious to his reputation. Such imputation may be made in one or more of the four ways specified in the section, that is to say: (i) by spoken; or (ii) written words; (iii) by signs; or (iv) visible representa-

---

(17) S. 11.
(18) Mg. Sein, 4 R. 462.
(19) McCarthy, 9 A. 420, Gobind Pershad v. Gurth, 28 C. 63; Pimento, 22 Bom. L. R. 1224 (1228); Bhikh Chand, 96 I. C. 116, (1926) S. 258; contra in Anand Rao, 17 Bom. L. R. 82 (92), 27 I. C. 57 (is unsound).
(20) Mg. Sein, 4 R. 462.

tions. It must be "made" or "published," and the maker must have at least reason to believe that such imputation will harm the reputation of the person to whom it relates. This constitutes the general offence, but it is otherwise subject both to the general exceptions and the special exceptions here set out.

The gist of the offence lies in the dissemination of harmful imputation. It is, of course, manifest that a person is not responsible for holding an opinion, harmful to another man's reputation. This cannot be averted, and it would be a counsel of perfection to expect otherwise. The Code is not concerned with whatever opinion one may hold of another, howmuchsoever that opinion may in his estimation be detrimental to the character and reputation of another. If then a number of persons hold definite views about a man's character, he cannot complain, because he knows that he is considered a person of evil repute. So far they are within their rights—but the moment they give expression to their thoughts they make themselves amenable to the penalties of this section, unless, of course, their case is saved by one or other of the ten exceptions to which the rule is subject.

5633. "Makes or publishes."—The offences then lie in the dissemination of harmful information concerning another. This is expressed in the section by the words "makes or publishes." The word "make" is intended to refer to the originator of the imputation, but it is equally applicable to one who though not its author, repeats, writes or copies it. The word "makes" is intended to supplement the sense of "publishes,"[21] which is no doubt used here in its etymological sense as connoting "to make public" or to make known to people in general. It is thus evident that if a person merely compose a libel, but refrain from making it public, he could not be held liable for this offence, though he had no doubt "made" it within the meaning of this section. So again, since publication implies communication to the public or the people, whose hostility it is intended to arouse, it follows that it is no publication if the libeller merely communicates his libel to the person defamed. Such communication may amount to an insult and be punishable as such, but it is not publication for which he could be held liable under this section.

Publication then implies communication to at least one person other than the person defamed. And so it has been held in England that there can be no publication unless the libel is communicated to a third person, though that person be the complainant's wife, who though considered one person with her husband in actions of tort as well as contract,[22] is nevertheless sufficiently a third person for the purpose of publication of libel.[23] The question whether the libel had in fact been communicated to a third person is, therefore material, for upon it depends the question of publication. It is not enough that the libeller posted it to a third person, or that the third person received it, for what has to be proved is communication and not an opportunity afforded for it.[24] So where A sent a libellous note to B to be made over to the plaintiff, which he did without reading it himself, which he could have if he so desired, it was held to be no

(21) From Lat. publicus, for populicus, from populus, people.
(22) Phillips v. Barner, 1 Q. B. D. 436.
(23) Wenman v. Ash, 13 C. B. 836; Jones v. Williams, 1 T. L. R. 572.
(24) Burdett, 4 B. & Ald. 143.

publication of the libel therein complained of.[25] A letter containing a defamatory statement was sent by A to B to whom the communication was privileged being made in confidence during B's absence: it was opened by C. The Court held it to be no publication to C.[1]

Is Communication to the Person Defamed Publication?

5634. This raises the question whether the communication of libel only to the party libelled amounts to its publication within the meaning of this section. Under English Law, it is settled that it is sufficient publication in a criminal proceeding,[2] though not in a civil proceeding, in which publication means communication to a third party.[3] The difference between the two proceedings is explained on the ground that an indictment for a libel being sustained on the ground of its tendency to produce a breach of the peace its communication to the complainant is sufficient.[4] But in a civil proceeding where damages are awarded for injury to reputation, no such damages can be presumed to have been incurred unless the libel is promulgated to a third party. And since this is the underlying principle of the offence as here defined, it follows that in order to constitute publication the libel must have been communicated to a third person, and that its publication to the party defamed is insufficient, though it may amount to some other offence, such as criminal intimidation or insult.[5] This view seems to be consistent with the language of the section, which makes the causing of intentional harm to one's reputation the gist of the crime. And since it is explained that no imputation is said to harm a person's reputation unless it lowers it in the estimation of others,[6] it follows that there can be no publication unless it reaches at least a third person, in whose estimation the reputation of the person defamed could possibly suffer. Moreover, the Code has made other provision for punishing the communication of a calumny to another person,[7] from which again, it may be inferred that the term "publication" was used here in the special sense in which it is understood in the English Civil Law, and not in the narrower sense in which it has passed current in the criminal law of libel.

This was the view of the majority of the Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court, in which the accused had sent a notice of suit to the prosecutor, a policeman who had made a search of his house for stolen property without a warrant and in consequence of which he claimed damages, adding at the same time that the search was malicious and mala fide and that the prosecutor had made it with a view to obtain a bribe, words which were sufficiently defamatory if their communication in a closed cover to the complainant could amount to their publication, and this was, therefore, the question referred to the Full Bench of five Judges, four of whom held it to be no publication which they held required communication to a third

(25) Clutterbuck v. Chaffers, 1 Stark, 471; Day v. Bream, 2 Moo. & Rob. 54.

(1) Powell v. Gelston, (1916) 2 K. B. 615.

(2) Harvey, 2 St. Tr. (N. S.) 1; Holt, 4 T. R. 436; Topham, 4 T. R. 129; Phillips v. Jansen, 2 Esp. 624.

(3) Clutterbuck v. Shaffers, 1 Stark, 471; Day v. Bream, 2 Moo. & Rob. 54; Komul Chunder Bose v. Nobin Chunder Bose, 10 W. R. 184; Bishwa Nath v. Keshab, 7 C. W. N. 74; Mohamed Ismail Khan v. Mahomed Tahir, 6 N. W. P. H. C. R. 38.

(4) Wegener, 2 Stark, 245; Shepherd v. Trustees of the Port of Bombay, 1 B. 477.

(5) Sadashiv v. Atmaram, 18 B. 205.

(6) Expl. 4.

(7) Ss. 504, 506.

person.[8] The contrary was laid down by Duthoit, J., who laid emphasis on the fact that defamation may be completed both by "making" as well as "publishing," and that the term "making" must be something distinct from "publishing" and was quite applicable to a communication only made to the person defamed. This would at first sight appear to be unanswerable, and taken alone it is so, but in construing a Penal Statute regard must be had both to the context as well as to its purpose, and these are decidedly in favour of the view taken by the majority of the Court, and Fulton, J., of the Bombay High Court.[9] In this view the term "publication" must bear the same sense both in civil[10] as well as criminal proceeding.

Negligent Communication Excepted.

5635. Now, the question that a communication to a third person is necessary to constitute publication raises other questions. Should such communication be intentionally and consciously made or would it do if it reaches the third party, it may be by accident or mistake? Here again English Law differentiates between a civil and criminal proceeding, holding the writer liable in the one case even if the publication to the third person was made by accident or inadvertence, but exonerating him from criminal liability unless the communication was made at least with his knowledge. These rules are naturally the outcome of the different principles which govern personal liability in the two cases. In the one case a person is held civilly liable for his negligence and the natural consequence of his own act, but in the other case a person could not be punished for his negligence, for negligence is human and not always a crime.

Even as regards civil liability law stops at negligence, holding a person not liable for what is a mere accident or misfortune. So if the writer of a letter locks it up in his own desk, and a thief comes and breaks open the desk and steals the letter publishing its contents, the owner could not be held liable for the publication.[11] But if a person enclose libel in a letter intended for A but he by mistake addressed it to A's employer B who opened and read it, the writer would be civilly liable for his mistake and he could not be heard to say that he had duly intended to communicate it to A[12]; but in such a case his mistake would protect him against a criminal prosecution. So where the defendant, who was the publisher of a print, called the "Bookseller" inserted therein by mistake a notice of a dissolution of partnership under the wrong heading of "First Meetings under the Bankruptcy Act" the Court held, in a suit for damages, that it amounted to publication[13] though of course it would have been a complete answer to an indictment.[14]

(8) Per Sir Comer Petheram, C. J. (Oldfield, Brodhust, Mahmood, JJ., contra Duthoit, J.), in Taki Husain, 7 A. 205.

(9) Sadashiv v. Atmaram, 18 B. 205.

(10) Komul Chunder Bose v. Nobin Chunder Bose, 10 W. R. 184; Biswa Nath v. Keshab, 7 C. W. N. 74; Mahomed Ismail v. Mahomed Tahir, 6 N. W. P. H. C. R. 38.

(11) Per Lord Esher, M. R., in Pullman and another v. Hill & Co., (1891) 1 Q. B. 524 [527].

(12) Fox v. Broderick, 14 Ir. C. L. R. 453; Thompson v. Dashwood, 11 Q. B. D. 43.

(13) Shephard v. Whitaker, L. R. 10 C. P. 502; Stubs v. Marsh, 15 L. T. 312.

(14) Abingdom (Lord), 1 Esp. 228; Munslow, (1895) 1 Q. B. 758; Brett v. Watson, 20 W. R. (Eng.) 723; Blake v. Stevens, 4 F. & F. 232. It was pointed out by Russell, C. J., in Munslow, (1895) 1 Q. B. 758 (761), that the amendment of the libel law in 1843 requiring the publication to be made "maliciously" was made to except cases of mistake and accident.

5636. There were five partners in the firm of Pullman and Company, of whom two held some land as their private property. The defendant had a dispute with these two about a hoarding on the land, but in which the firm was in no way interested or concerned. The defendant, however, knew the two Messrs. Pullman to be sole partners in the firm. He addressed a libel to them as "Pullman & Co.," at their business address, which was in the ordinary course of business opened by a clerk of the firm who had authority to open all letters addressed to the firm. In a civil suit for damages it was held that there was publication to the clerk.(15) But since the publication was merely the result of a mistake, it is evident that if the case had to be decided on indictment the finding of the Court would have been otherwise. So where A sent a servant to his study to fetch a certain paper which he wished to show to B. The servant by mistake fetched a libellous writing which A made over to B who read it aloud to C, it could not be treated as publication of the libel either to B or C.(16) So a person could not be held accountable for a publication which he had no reason to anticipate. For instance, if A send a libellous letter in a closed cover to B, and B shows it to a friend, A could not be charged with its publication.(17) So where A sent such a letter to B, who thereupon sent for A in the presence of his friend C, and questioned him as to its authorship, at the same time disclosing its contents to B in the hearing of C, it was held to be no publication by A.(18)

Negligence When Inexcusable.

5637. It is thus clear that there can be no publication for the purpose of this section unless it is made at least with consciousness of the fact—an intention to publish it to him is not necessary. So it was held to be sufficient where the writer dictated it to a scribe in the language understood by him.(19) This qualification is necessary, because if a libel is uttered before an audience however large in an unknown tongue, it cannot be publication to them, for they may hear but cannot understand, and without understanding they cannot harm the reputation of him concerning whom the libel was spoken.(20) So it will be no publication if it is couched in cryptic language so that it is not understood by any one except by the person attacked, for in that case, though the words were spoken they bore no meaning to those who listened to them which could in any way prejudice them against the complainant. But of course, such language must be distinguished from the language of irony and satire, which rather than fall flat upon the audience reaches them in a form which should be an aggravation of the crime.

A libel may not be intended to influence any person in particular, nor need it be so addressed. It will suffice if it will in fact reach the ears of the third person, in a manner which the libeller could have easily foreseen. So a libel may be published if it is written on a postcard though the (15) Pullman and another v. Hill & Co., (1891) 1 Q. B. 524; Boxsius v. Goblet Freres and others, (1894) 1 Q. B 842.

(16) Paine, 5 Mod. 167.

(17) Barrow v. Lewellin, Hob. 62.

(18) Fowville v. Nease, Dudley, S. C. (Amer.) 303.

(19) Pullman and another v. Hill & Co., (1891) 1 Q. B. 524; Varnakote v. Kotalmana., (1900) 1 Weir 579 (580). The law is the same in America; Keen v. Ruff, 1 Clarke (Iowa) 482; Sunder v. Andrews, 6 Barbour (N. Y.) 43; M'-Combs v. Tuttle, 1 Blackford (Md.) 431.

(20) Hurtert v. Weines, 26 Iowa 134

postcard be addressed to the person libelled,(21) or if it is telegraphed to him in a language easily decipherable.(22) In such cases it is no defence to say that the accused had an interest in making the communication, and that the party to whom it was addressed had a corresponding interest in receiving it, or that it was sent bona fide and without malice.(23) Indeed, the fact that the open communication had reference to a matter of mutual interest to parties justifies the making of a communication, but not making it in an unnecessarily offensive form.

So where the tradesman sent a bill for a small amount written on a postcard upon which he wrote: "Your plea of illness for not paying this trifle is a mere moonshine. We will place the matter in our solicitor's hands if we have not stamps by return, if it cost us ten times the amount." It was held that though this might have been privileged if sent in a cover, as sent written on the back of a postcard it was a libel, because postcards were intended to be the vehicle of ordinary communication, not of defamatory matter. So where A, an orthodox Hindu, attended a Hindu widow remarriage opposed by the orthodox community and thereupon his spiritual preceptor, B, declared him out of caste till he performed a prescribed penance and sent a registered postcard of similar purport to A, the Court held the missive to constitute publication of the matter which the Court held to be defamatory.(24)

Communication Confidence.

5638. So there may be publication if a person sends a written libel to another in a language unknown to him, and of which fact the writer is aware, in which case he may be presumed to know that the receiver will have it read which is then a sufficient publication. So where a person filed a defamatory petition before a superior public officer who in the ordinary course of official routine sent it on to a subordinate officer for enquiry, it was held to be sufficient publication in the place where the petition was received for which the writer might prima facie be held liable, whether or not he expressly asked for inquiry.(25) So conversely a person who employs an amanuensis to copy a libel, publishes it before it is sent out, or one who prints it, is sufficiently guilty of publication.(1) And it is no defence in such cases to say that the communication to the intermediary was made in confidence and that he was under pledge not to disclose, for he may not disclose it to others, but the disclosure to him is publication. As Lord Coleridge, C. J., referring to libel sent by a telegram said: "It would be extending the doctrine of privileged communication to a most alarming degree if the transmission of a telegram were put upon the same footing as that of a sealed letter. Although the clerks are prohibited under severe penalties from disclosing the contents of telegrams passing through their hands, still there is a disclosure to them."(2)

(21) Williamson v. Freer, L. R. 9 C. P. 393; followed in Sankara, 6 M. 381; Thiagaraya v. Krishnasami, 15 M. 214; Chattel v. Turner, (1896) 12 T. L. R. 360; Beamish v. Dairy Supply Co., (1897) 13 T. L. R. 484; Sudgrove v. Hob, (1901) 2 K. B. 1.

(22) Whitfield and others v. South East Ry. Co., E. B. & E. 115; Somerville v. Hawkins, 10 C. B. 583; Robinson v. Jones, 4 L. R. (Ir.) 391; Smith v. Crosker, (1889) 5 T. L. R. 441; Robinson v. Robinson, (1897) 13 T. L. R. 564.

(23) Robinson v. Jones, Ir. L. R. 4 Ex. D. 391.

(24) Ib.

(25) Raja Shah, (1889) P. R. No. 14.

(1) Pullman and another v. Hill & Co., (1891) 1 Q. B. 524; Varnakote v. Kotalmana, (1900) 1 Weir 579.

(2) Williamson v. Freer, L. R. 9 C. P. 393 (394).

5639. Publication by Printer.—This is the ordinary rule, but the liability of a printer is placed on an exceptional footing. For he is in possession of an appliance affording facility for the widest publication, and his accountability for his act is therefore commensurately greater. As has been elsewhere seen (§ 1272) all printers are required to make a declaration of their being in possession of a printing press(3) and a further declaration has to be made by the printer and publisher of a "printed periodical work, containing public news"(4) the effect of which is then as follows:—

Office copy of declaration to be prima facie evidence.

"7. In any legal proceeding whatever, as well civil as criminal, the production of a copy of such declaration as is aforesaid attested by the the seal of some Court empowered by this Act to have the custody of such declarations, shall be held (unless the contrary be proved) to be sufficient evidence, as against the person whose name shall be subscribed to such declaration, that the said person was printer or publisher (according as the said words of the said declaration may be) of every portion of every periodical work whereof the title shall correspond with the title of the periodical work mentioned in the declaration.(5)

5640. Now the word "publishes" as used in section 499 does not only include the publisher within the meaning of s. 7 of the Press and Registration of Books Act, but also any printer, compositor, proof reader, and indeed, any one whether or not connected with the press and having to read the communication, it follows that besides the declared printer and publisher, many others connected with the press may be concerned with the publication of a libel. But, of course, as will be presently seen, all persons merely publishing a libel do not by that very fact make themselves criminally liable (§ 5643), though even in this respect printers and publishers are necessarily subject to exceptional liability. For as is enacted in the section before cited such declarant is deemed to have published the libel whether as a matter of fact he knew it or not.(6) But the presumption so created is rebuttable, and may be rebutted, by the editor, printer or the publisher who may shew that the libel complained of had been published in his absence and without his knowledge, and that he had in good faith placed the temporary management of the newspaper during his absence in competent hands.(7) In this respect the rule here follows the rule of English Common Law, as amended by the Statute of 1843,(8) under which the proprietor of a newspaper was held criminally liable for the publication of a libel in its columns, though he may now, since the passing of the Statute of 1843, show that the libel was in fact published without his authority, consent or knowledge and that the publication did not arise from want of due care and caution on his part.(9)

5641. But the case of a joint-stock printing company is necessarily exceptional. For having employed a competent manager to do a lawful

(3) Press and Registration of Books Act (XXV of 1867), s. 4.
(4) Ib., s. 5.
(5) Ib. s. 7.
(6) McLeod, 3 A. 342; in which, however, the liability was based on English Law.
(7) Ramasami v. Lokananda, 9 M. 387; Mokand Ram (Pundit), (1883) P. R. No. 1; Phanendra Nath Mitter, 35 C. 945 (953).
(8) 6 & 7 Vict., c. 96, s. 7; Holbrook, 4 Q. B. D. 42. In Ramasami v. Lokananda (9 M. 387), the English Statute was, of course, held not to apply to India, though the Court declared the effect of Act XXV of 1867 to be substantially the same.
(9) Emmens v. Pottle, 16 Q. B. D. 354 (357).

act, the share-holders must be taken to authorise him to do it in a lawful and not in an unlawful manner, so that the same constructive liability could not be extended to them merely because of their being the proprietors of the printing press. The case of an actual editor and printer is of course different. The one is presumed to edit all matter submitted to his judgment, and the other gives publicity to it by undertaking to print it. He makes profit by printing it, and he should be presumed to know the character of what he prints. So Lord Tenderden, C. J., said: "Surely a person who derives profit from, and who furnishes means for, carrying on the concern, and entrusts the conduct of the publication to one whom he selects, and in whom he confides, may be said to be caused to be published what actually appears, and ought to be answerable, although you cannot show that he was individually concerned in the particular publication."(10)

So in another case Lord Esher, M. R. said: "The proprietor of a newspaper who publishes the paper by his servants, is the publisher of it and he is liable for the acts of the servants. The printer of the paper prints it by his servants, and therefore he is liable for a libel contained in it."(11) But whether a proprietor, printer or publisher, or even an editor, the presumption of law is in every case rebuttable and may be rebutted by showing that the publication was merely accidental. But it is no defence that the publication was made because it was a bona fide communication received from a correspondent. As Best, C. J., put it: "If a man receives a letter with authority from the author to publish it, the person receiving it will not be justified, if it contains libellous matter, in inserting it in the newspapers. No authority from a third person will defend a man against an action brought by a person who has suffered from an unlawful act.(12)

5642. Publication by Repetition.—The term "publication" is wide enough to include a repetition or republication of a libel already published, for tale-bearers are as bad as tale-makers. So if a newspaper reproduce a libellous article from another, it makes the article its own, and is liable to all the consequences resulting from its publication, though the fact that the article was merely a re-print would be conducive to mitigation of the sentence or damages awarded.(13) But this may be done out of compassion but cannot be claimed as of right. For law considers it no mitigation that one should give currency to a libel which another has originated. As Best, C. J., put it: "Because one man does an unlawful act to any person, another is not to be permitted to do a similar act to the same person. Wrong is not to be justified or even excused by wrong."(14) And it is no defence that the libeller indicated the source of his information. So where A told B that C was bankrupt and that his horses had been seized from the coach on the road and that he had been arrested, and thereupon B went about telling every one: "A says C's horses have been seized from the coach on the road, and he himself has been arrested and that the bailiffs are

(10) Gutch and others, Moo. & Malk. 548.

(11) Per Wills, J., in Keenslow, (1895) 1 Q. B. 758 (765).

(12) DeCrespigny v. Wellesley, 5 Bing., 392 (402).

(13) Tallutt v. Clark, 2 M & Rob. 312. Saunders v. Mills, 6 Bing. 213; Watkin v. Hall, L. R. 3 Q. B. 396; McPherson v. Daniels, 10 B. & C. 270.

(14) DeCrespigny v. Wellesley, 5 Bing 404.

in house," it was held that C could sue B though the latter had merely repeated what A had told him.(15) So where A told C: "Thou art a sheep-stealing rogue, and farmer Parker told me so," A was held liable, it being immaterial whether Parker had or had not in fact told him so.(16) A rumour was current that a fall in the shares of a certain railway was due to the failure of its chairman. The defendant repeated the rumour in the following words: "You have heard what has caused the fall. I mean the rumour about the South Eastern Chairman having failed." The Court held that the existence of the rumour afforded no defence to its publication by the defendant.(17)

As Littledale, J., said: "As great an injury may accrue from the wrongful repetition as from the first publication of slander; the first utterer may have been a person insane, or of bad character. The person who repeats it gives greater weight to the slander. A party is not the less entitled to recover damages in a Court of law for injurious matter published concerning him, because another person previously published it. That shews, not that the plaintiff has been guilty of any misconduct which renders it unfit that he should recover damages in a Court of law, but that he has been wronged by another person as well as the defendant, and may consequently, if the slander was not published by the first utterer on a lawful occasion, have an action for damages against that person, as well as the defendant."(18) Again, the fact that the first publication was privileged does not render its second and subsequent publication privileged(19) and so contrarywise the fact that a defamatory statement made out of Court was afterwards repeated in Court on a privileged occasion as witness in a case, does not preclude his prosecution for the statement made out of Court, though he could not be prosecuted for having repeated that statement in Court.(20)

5643. The principle of these cases has been followed in this country in cases decided under the next section. So where the accused was accused of publishing a defamatory article shown to have been extracted from another paper, West, J., said: "The Indian Penal Code makes no exception in favour of a second or third publication as compared with a first, and such an exception would obviously be made a means of defeating the principal provision of the law of defamation."(21) A person prosecuted for republishing libellous matter cannot be heard to say that another journal publishing the same matter had not been prosecuted,(22) nor is the recovery of damages against one journal

(15) McPherson v. Daniels, 10 B. & C. 263.

(16) Gardiner v. Atwater, (1756) Sayer 265; Meggs v. Griffith, Cro. Eliz. 400; Read's case, Cro. Eliz. 645; Lewis v. Walter, Cro. Jac. 406; Davis v. Lewis, 7 T. R. 17.

(17) Watkin v. Hall, L. R. 3 Q. B. 396 (401).

(18) McPherson v. Daniels, 10 B & C. 263 (272, 273), cited with approval by Blackburn, J., in Watkin v. Hall, L. R. 3 Q. B. 396 (401); Speight v. Gosney, 60 L. J. Q. B. 231.

(19) Tidman v. Ainslie, (1854) 10 Exch, 63; Mills and wife v. Spencer and wife, Holt N. P. 533; McGregor v. Thwaites, 3 B. & C. 24.

(20) Periyasawmi, (1886) 1 Weir 581 (584).

(21) Howard, 12 B. 167, following Holt, 8 Cox 411; Waithman v. Weaber, 11 Price 257-n, Kerr 8 C. & P. 117.

(22) Holt, 8 Cox 411.

accepted even as mitigation in an action against another journal for a repetition of the libel.[23]

Mitigating Circumstances.

5644. But in considering the effect of repetition the Court may appropriately take into consideration the circumstances of the case, such as the mode and manner of the publication, and the fact whether the republication was a malicious exaggeration or invention, or merely a reckless repetition of a rumour more due to the bad taste than the bad intention of the accused. So the Court may take into consideration the fact that wider publicity was given to the libel by its insertion in a newspaper,[24] and even in the case of the printer of a newspaper the Court discriminates between the first printer and another who has taken only a subordinate part in disseminating the matter already made public. So it has been held by Lord Romer that if he published it in the ordinary way of his business, the nature of the business and the way in which it was conducted must be looked at, and if he succeeds in showing (i) that he was innocent of any knowledge of the libel contained in the work disseminated by him, (ii) that there was nothing in the work or circumstances under which it came to him or was disseminated by him which ought to have led him to suppose that it contained a libel, and (iii) that when the work was disseminated by him, it was not by any negligence on his part that he did not know that it contained the libel, then, although the dissemination of the work by him was prima facie publication of it, he may nevertheless on proof of the before mentioned facts, be held not to have published it. But the onus of proving such facts lies on the defendant, and the question of publication or non-publication is a question of fact and not one of law.[25] The defendants were the proprietors of an extensive circulating library, and as such received and circulated books amongst the subscribers. As such they circulated one which contained a libel for which they were sued. It was shown that they had been in the habit of receiving and putting into circulation all books received without exercising any scrutiny for which they entertained no establishment, thinking it cheaper to pay for the libel than for a regular establishment. It was held that the defendants were civilly liable.[1] But of course, in such a case, there could be no question of criminal liability, for, though the defendants published the libel they had done so without criminal intention.

5645. Publication may be by Words or Signs.—Again if what is done amounts to publication, the fact that it was done by words spoken or written or by means of signs or visible representation is immaterial, though the mode of publication is undoubtedly a question which the Court should take into consideration in judging of the gravity of the offence. But it is otherwise immaterial as is clear from illustration (b) which is an instance of defamation committed by signs, and illustration (c) in which A defames Z by means of a visible representation, namely, a picture. So where a libellous placard was erected by the roadside, and the defendant sat by, saying nothing but constantly pointing to the placard so as to attract to it the attention of the

(23) Kerr, 8 C. & P. 177; followed in Howard, 12 B. 167.

(24) Janardhan, 19 B. 703.

(25) Vizetelly v. Mudie's Select Library, (1900) 2 Q. B. 170.

(1) Ib.

passers-by, it was held to be evidence of publication which should have been left to the jury.(2) Of course, words and signs, however, libellous in themselves, do not amount to defamation unless they are published and no publication however broadcast is libellous unless it is made in one of the four ways here specified. Of these the words spoken need not be spoken by the defamer, for he may put them into a gramophone or utter them through a telephone or through an infant who does not understand their purpose, in which case he would be deemed to have spoken them in the same way as if he had himself uttered them: Qui facit per alium facit per se.(3)

But the words uttered must be uttered to the hearing of at least one person other than the person defamed. If they are uttered however aloud in a desolate moor they do not constitute this offence. In the same way words written must be "intended to be read" by others. If therefore a person records a libel in his own private diary intended for his own amusement, he could not be held liable for writing down a libel. So if a person put up a libellous placard and take it down again before any one could read it, it is no publication; but if it was exhibited long enough the jury may presume its publication unless the defendants shews that as a matter of fact no one read it.(4) The fact that a person merely intends another to read his writing does not suffice to make his writing libellous—for he may have written it with no immediate thought for publication, in which case the writer could not be punished for writing what he intended to be read but which he did not intend to publish.(5) The use of signs must serve the same purpose, namely, of publication, but in that case the mere use of signs would hardly suffice to constitute defamation, but there is nothing to prevent other evidence being given to explain their meaning.

5646. The same object may be achieved by means of a visible representation, such as a caricature, effigy, statute or bust depicting the subject in a manner calculated to arouse popular ridicule, hatred or contempt. Indeed, the use of visible representation is use of pictorial language which may appeal even to a wider circle, producing among them an impression more deep-rooted than what could be created by a descriptive letter-press. For instance, if a person burns another in effigy could it be denied that the onlookers would be more deeply impressed than if he had merely inveighed against his character?(6) So it was held to be a libel on a person where the accused fixed up a gallows and other ignominious or reproachful sign against a man's door.(7)

The defendants were the proprietors of a well-known wax exhibition known as Madam Tussaud's Exhibition in which were exhibited life-like wax figures of well-known people as well as criminals. As such they exhibited the effigy of the plaintiff Monson—alleged to be a notorious anarchist who had been tried for having shot a young man

(2) Hird v. Wood, 38 Sol. J. 234; Spall v. Massey and others, 2 Stark, 559.
(3) "He who employs another to do a thing is as good as if he had done it himself."
(4) 2 Starkie's Libel, p. 16, Note (n).
(5) Taki Husain, 7 A. 205 (222), F. B
(6) Eyre v. Garlick, 42 J. P. 68.
(7) Hawk, P. C. 542; Jefferie v. Duncombe, 11 East 226.

in Scotland but discharged on the jury having returned the verdict of "Not proven." They advertised their exhibits by means of Sandwitch boards, and in the newspapers with the words "See the Chamber of Horrors (extra room 3*d*) and the instruments of torture—See vaillant the anarchist and Monson of Ardlamont—Admission to the Exhibition and Entertainment 6*d*." The plaintiff applied for an interim injunction to restrain the defendants from exhibiting the plaintiff's model and advertising it. The defendants said that they intended to cast no imputation whatever upon the plaintiff, but asserted that the plaintiff had become a notorious person, and contended that where a man had become notorious, either for creditable or discreditable reasons, they were at liberty to exhibit his effigy, and so to gratify the public curiosity which had been aroused with regard to him. The Court held that the plaintiff was entitled to the injunction, but though the Court of appeal disallowed an interlocutory injunction holding that though the question whether the publication of such a model amounted to a libel was for the jury who had not then decided, still they unanimously agreed that no one had the right to exhibit the bust, portrait or effigy of another even though it be his faithful likeness, even for the purpose of gratifying public curiosity, if it has the effect of bringing the original into disrepute.[8]

And the fact that the representation was true did not justify the publication, for no one has the right to perpetuate another's disgrace and keep it constantly before the public by means of portraits and effigies. It may be that when a person is on his trial the newspapers have the right to publish his portrait as supplementing the report of judicial proceedings, but that right does not enure for all time. Indeed, the lives of criminals would be an intolerable burden if law offered no protection even to the reputation of such person. There are no doubt circumstances and occasions when such a publication would be legal, but as will be presently seen, law then has regard to other considerations which are rather in the nature of an exception.[9]

5647. Imputation must be Harmful.—It is then clear that (i) there must be a publication (§§ 5633-5642), and (ii) that what is published must amount to words, signs or visible representation (§§ 5645-5646). The section next requires (iii) that what is published must be an "imputation," and (iv) it must be harmful to the reputation of another. The word, "imputation"[10] is a word of evil significance and implies the attribution of evil, the making of an accusation, allegation, insinuation or a charge against a person. Such imputation may be made in any of the ways in which human thoughts are communicated to others, directly or indirectly, by a declaration as much as by way of exclamation, a feigned interrogation, expression or conjecture, irony or innuendo. And the imputation may be made not only in the language of words but by pictorial representation so long as it is sufficiently expressive and conveys a meaning harmful to the reputation of another person (§§ 5645-5646). For since the protection of personal reputation is the object

(1) What is an Imputation?

(8) Monson v. Tussands Ltd., (1894) 1 Q. B. 671 (687).

(9) 5th Exception.

(10) From Lat. imputatio, a charge.

of its solicitude, law only punishes publication of an imputation if it is intended to harm or which the accused knows or has reason to believe will harm the reputation of some person.

(2) What is Harm?

5648. The question whether an imputation will have the effect depends in a great measure upon what is "harm" in the eye of the law. That term is not defined in the Code, but it has been used in defining "injury"[11] which is merely harm illegally caused, and as such the two words bear practically the same meaning, for if "harm" does not amount to "injury" it is damnum sine injuria and as such it is neither civilly actionable nor criminally indictable. The harm must then amount to injury, and the injury must be to a man's reputation. If it causes injury to his property without necessarily affecting his reputation, it is not a harm within the meaning of this section. The section then protects the injury or harm of a special kind—that which has a tendency to affect his reputation though it may do so directly or indirectly.[12] Moreover, it is not a part of the definition that the imputation made, should have in fact caused any harm to another person's reputation for it bases criminal responsibility upon the intention, knowledge and belief of the maker of the imputation.

(3) No Actual Harm Necessary.

5649. It is not consequently necessary that a person complaining of defamation should show that he had actually suffered any harm in reputation.[13] It will suffice if he shows that the accused intended to harm it or that he knew or had reason to believe that it will harm it. In other words, the question in such cases is not what harm the complainant had suffered but whether the accused intended to inflict any harm upon him. From this it is clear that a person who makes an imputation against another need not obtain credence from the public. In fact he may be then and there discredited, the reputation of the complainant may be too well established to be shaken by his scurrility. But law protects one by punishing the other on account of his depraved intention and its tendency to cause harm. It is one of those cases in which law punishes the archer as soon as the arrow is shot, no matter if it fails to hit the target. The accused who was a dismissed clerk in the Public Works Department, sent an anonymous petition to the Governor-General complaining of the Executive Engineer as having blindly appointed another person as a store-keeper "who was in irons for a year or two for embezzlement of Government money." He was convicted of this offence and in defence he urged that his petition had done no harm to any one; but the Court considered that question immaterial, holding that the accused's criminality depended upon his belief, of which the nature of the imputation made by him afforded ample presumption.[14] It may happen that the defamer defeats his object by the very fact of his exaggeration in which case his imputation carries with it its own refutation, but in that case surely he could not be heard to say

---

(11) S. 44.

(12) Per Mahmood, J., in Taki Husain, 7 A. 205, F. B.

(13) Pimento, 22 Bom. L. R. 1224, 59 I. C. 202, 22 Cr. L. J. 58; Ram Narain, 22 A. L. J. 639.

(14) Thakur Dass, 6 N. W. P. H. C. R. 86. To the same effect, Govind Pershad Pandey v. Garth, 28 C. 63; Anon, (1883) 1 Weir 575.

that he was exempt from punishment because forsooth nobody could be found to believe in his libel.[15]

On the other hand, if the accused had reason to believe that his imputation will harm another man's reputation, it is nothing that he had not been actuated by malice, for malice is no part of the definition of this offence, though the Courts have somewhat unnecessarily assumed its existence as necessary for the constitution of the crime[16]; for though "malice" is necessary under the English definition of libel, it is by no means necessary for the offence in the Code. So where the accused gave out that the complainant should be outcasted for having had intercourse with a pariah woman, and the Magistrate acquitted him holding that, in the absence of actual ill-will, the imputation made by the accused must be accepted as being made bona fide, and thereupon Kindersley and Muttusami Aiyar, JJ., said: "In this view he is mistaken. Conscious violation of law to another's prejudice is sufficient, though there may be no malice in fact. When defamatory words are prima facie libellous, legal malice must be presumed until a case of privilege is made out by the accused, and in the present case the conduct of the accused in violently and publicly talking about the complainant in the manner he did, seems to go beyond a legitimate desire to protect the interests of those to whom he made the imputation."[17] As to this it is submitted that the fiction of a legal malice is the creature of English Law and no part of the definition, and the question whether the violent and public accusation amounted to defamation was a question of fact and not one of law.

5650. The only question of intentionality that is material for the constitution of this offence is whether at the time the accused made the imputation he (a) intended to harm, or (b) knew, or (c) had reason to believe that his imputation will harm the reputation of the person concerning whom it was made. The question is one of probability dependent upon the nature of the imputation and the time and place and manner of making it. The fact that it did in fact harm is immaterial except as evidence reflecting upon the question of intention.

5651. Ingredients of a Guilty Mind.—The offence does not require that any one's reputation should be intentionally harmed. For if it is harmed in fact and in consequence of the statement of the accused the latter would be criminally liable, if, in the words of the section he knew or had reason to believe[18] that his statement would cause the harm.[19] It is not necessary that the words should be maliciously published, for conscious violation of law to another's prejudice is sufficient though there may be no malice in fact.[20] Such was the case of the accused who had reason to believe that the complainant had had intercourse with a pariah woman, but which fact he published broadcast. The undue publicity to an imputation otherwise privileged if only published amongst members of the accused's caste, was held to be the

(15) Senthinathaiyar v. Gnanamuthu, (1884) 1 Weir 594.
(16) Palani Asari, (1882) 1 Weir 613.
(17) Palani Asari, (1882) 1 Weir 613 (614).
(18) S. 26.
(19) Kewala Nandgir, (1913) P. W. R 34, 21 I. C. 478.
(20) Palani Asari, 1 Weir 614.

gist of the crime.[21] A harm intended but not effected is no defence to the charge, provided the injury was likely though not actually suffered (§§ 5649-5651). On the other hand, evidence of malice is inadmissible where the statement is not prima facie libellous.[22] It was so held in a case in which the complainant had advertised for sale replicas of a painting by Ravi Varma. The accused who signed himself as "Anti-Humbug" wrote in the same paper doubting the genuineness of the original. The Court held that the non de plume alone was suggestive but it was no part of the imputation which was not libellous. Consequently, there being no libel it was not open to the complainant to prove that the accused had been actuated by malice.

Malice is an answer to a plea of fair comment and if there was no prima facie case of libel at all, any proof of malice would be irrelevant. Where the accused pleads good faith the complaint may prove malice. To prove malice, extrinsic evidence of malice is not necessary. The words of the libel and the circumstances attending its publication may themselves afford evidence of malice.[23] The use of violent language does not necessarily prove malice.[24] It may be due to excessive zeal. As the section is worded, there can be no defamation of a person of whom the accused had no knowledge. The contrary has been laid down in England in a case in which the defendant had satirized a fashionable foible, of men motoring about with women passing them off as their wives, illustrating it by a purely imaginary character of "Artemus Jones," whereupon a Barrister of that name sued the writer for libel. It was found that the defendant did not refer to the plaintiff at all with whom he was not even acquainted. But nevertheless the Court held the defendant liable for the libel, holding that, in an action for libel, it is no defence to shew that the defendant did not intend to defame the plaintiff, if reasonable people would think the language to be defamatory of the plaintiff.[25] Such contretemps is not possible under the Code since the imputation made concerning "any person" must be at least believed to harm the reputation of "such person." In other words, a random shot not directed against any particular man or class of men is outside the scope of the offence.

5652. This is sufficient to exclude terms of common abuse, and those reflecting upon one's female relations, abuses which if strictly construed are highly defamatory but which are not ordinarily intended to be used or taken seriously, and which could not then be said to harm the reputation of persons alluded to.[1] So where a pleader in the course of a judicial proceeding made an objectionable reference to his adversary who retorted by calling the pleader a "liar," Straight, J., held the case covered by s. 95, though it might been disposed of as an empty abuse not intended to convey any harmful imputation.[2]

(21) Palani Asari, 1 Weir 614 Salar Mannaje v. Herejee Row, 1 Weir 614 Sankara, 6 M. 381.

(22) Narasinga v. Kasturiranga, (1911) M. W. N. 226, 9 I. C. 279.

(23) Motilal Raha v. Indra Nath, 36 C. 907.

(24) Laugleton v. Bishop of Sodar and Man, L. R. 4 P. C. 495 (598).

(25) Jones v. Hulton and Co., (1909) 2 K. B. 444 O. A.; Hulton and Co. v. Jones, (1910) A. C. 20.

(1) Bihari, (1883) A. W. N. 36, in which the complaint related to "beti ki gali, bahin ki gali" (imputing unchastity to daughter and sister).

(2) Vansittart, (1883) A. W. N. 46.

5653. Person Defamed must be Certain.—As to the person defamed the section speaks of an imputation in connection with "any person"—the "person" here being used in the sense in which it is defined in section 11. Now since the term as there defined, "includes any company or association or body of persons, whether incorporated or not" it follows that this offence may be committed as much against a natural person as against what is called a juridical person. So where misconduct is imputed to the Police with reference to a case,(3) or where insolvency is imputed to one member of a firm, either he or the firm may complain, for it is a reflection on the credit of both.(4) But in such a case a distinction must be made between libel on an individual and a libel upon a class—that is to say, if the libel relate to a general body of men as distinct from any of its individuals then no individual member of that body could arrogate to himself the right to complain. For instance, "if a man wrote that all lawyers were thieves, no particular lawyer could sue him, unless there is something to point to the particular individual."(5) But in this case if the libel had been that "all lawyers of the place A are swindlers" it would then give each lawyer in A a right to complain.

Explanation 2.

So where the accused said that "Scorton Nunnery is a brothel of prostitution" it was held that in doing so he was attacking the individual characters of the body of whom the Scorton Nunnery consisted and that as such his words were indictable.(6) So the accused was indicted for having published libel in a book in which he stated that an aide-de camp of the Governor of Leeward Island had whipped a negress of his own while she was pregnant and that on her complaining to the Governor he lashed her the more in consequence of which he was dismissed. It appeared that at the time of the alleged incident the Governor had eight aides-de-camp and the indictment charged the accused with libel concerning the eight, but there was no proof that it applied to any one of them, whereupon it was argued that the libel was not a libel on the body of aides-de-camp at large, but Abbot, J., said: "I have not the slighest particle of doubt that a count might be so framed as to this being a libel against the eight; for if it were otherwise, a person might publish a libel of one of eight persons, and the facts being so false, no human being could apply it to any one of them, he must go unpunished though he may have brought eight persons into slander and reproach"(7) (§ 5662).

5654. Reputation must be Attacked.—Again, the causing of harm made punishable by this section is only such as affects a person's "reputation. Now a person's estimate of one's self is not his reputation, so that a harm which merely causes him mental and bodily pain does not

What is Reputation.?

(3) Pratap Chandra Gupta, 29 C. W. N. 904, 90 I. C. 387, (1925) C. 1121.

(4) Harrison v. Berington, 8 C. & P. 708 Cook v. Batchellor, 3 Bos. & Peel, 150; Forster v. Lawson, 3 Bing. 452.

(5) Per Willes J., in Eastwood v. Holmes, 1 F. & F. 347 (349).

(6) Per Alderson, B., in Gathercole, Lew. C. C. 254; Gopabandhu, 1 Pat. 414, 67 I. C. 609, 23, Cr. L. J. 433.

(7) Hatchard, (1817) unrep. cited in Folkard's Libel (5th Ed.) pp. 821, 822.

injure his reputation.[8] That word is intended to denote the estimation in which a person is held by others, the character imputed to him in the community in which he lives. Reputation is the esteem in which a person is held by the community, and harm to reputation must then be an injury which that esteem suffers in the estimation of others. From this it follows, first, that the communication of a libel only to the person libelled is not defamation, and it is so settled (§ 5634), and, secondly, that the words of common abuse such as "you idiot," "you scoundrel," and others, which convey no definite imputation harmful to one's reputation do not constitute defamation. It has also been so held both in England[9] and in this country.[10] But words of mere abuse may amount to defamation, and defamation may be interspersed with abuse in which it is for the Court to disentangle abuse from defamation and judge of the effect of one in the light of the other. It all depends upon what was meant by the speaker and understood by the by-standers.

The complainant Sundar Lal had sent out an intimation that there would be a festival in which banner would be consecrated and Brahmins fed. The accused a Brahmin felt aggrieved at what he considered his supersession and called the complainant a Kori Chamar. He was in fact a Kayastha, with the result that the other priests refused to officiate at the ceremony. The term, though intended merely to belittle the complainant, had a far-reaching effect, and the Court held it to amount to defamation.[11] So where the defendant addressing the plaintiff said: "You are a thief; you robbed Mr. Lake of £30," the Court held the words to be too specific to amount merely to abuse, though it was open to the defendant to shew that they were taken in their literal sense by the by-standers who listened to the whole conversation, though previously unacquainted with the matter to which the words related.[12] But where the words used were general as that "you are a thief, a rogue and swindler," the defendant was held precluded from giving evidence to explain the particular transaction which he had in his mind at the time, since he did not in any way expressly refer to it in the presence of his hearers.[13]

The accused was a pleader for the defendant in the case of Ram Ghulam v. Mendai Lal then being heard in the Court of a Munsiff, and the question was the general respectability and status of the parties. The accused was arguing for the defendant, and under instruction from his client said: "Why, who was Ram Gulam's father? He died when he was scraping grass." At this Ram Gulam put his head in a small door in the Munsiff's Court, and said: "What does Amir Hasan know of pleading? Up to yesterday he and his father were pedlars, and hawked about small wares through the streets." These expressions gave rise to mutual prosecutions and both parties were fined, but their

(8) From Lat. reputare, to think over, a reckoning consideration; hence, good reputation, favourable regard, public esteem, general credit, good name.

(9) Minors v. Leeford, Cro. Jac. 114; Penfold v. Westcote, 2 Bos. & P. N. R. 335.

(10) Amir Hasan, (1883) A. W. N. 167.

(11) Bachcha, 6 I. C. (All.) 876.

(12) Haukinson v. Bilby, 16 M. & W. 442; Tomeinson v. Brittlebank, 4 B. & Ad. 630.

(13) Martin v. Loei, 2 F. & F. 654; Read v. Ambridge, 6 C. & P. 308.

convictions were quashed by Straight, J., who said: "The language of section 499 is no doubt open to the most elastic application, but Magistrates will act wisely in refusing to adapt it to cases in which no real harm has been done, or where a civil remedy might more appropriately be sought. In the present instance Amir Hasan's remark with regard to Ram Gulam was a most improper one, especially from a pleader, and the latter's retort was equally objectionable; but the proper person to have taken notice of the matter was the Munsiff in whose presence the observations were made, and to the order and decency of whose proceedings they were an undoubted interruption." He then quashed both the proceedings holding the words to amount to no more than vulgar abuse which did not amount to defamation.(14)

Words Defamatory though Reputation Not Harmed.

5655. But of course the transition from abuse to defamation is narrow and imperceptible. But in each case the Court must be guided by the sound sense of seeing that its process is not abused, and that at the same time the law is not too narrowly interpreted so as to become a dead letter. The gravity of the offence must, no doubt, be measured by the harm caused, but at the same time the causing of actual harm should not be made a sine qua non to the initiation of proceedings. Indeed there is no inflexible standard for judging the question of harm. For in a country people by communities so complex and diverse as India, the question of harm to reputation must be considered from the personal standard of the complainant. If, for instance, a person were to speak of another as having taken water from the hands of a pariah, the question whether the accused intended any harm depends upon the caste of the complainant. If he was a Christian, the statement may have been made to establish the equality of all men. If he was a Hindu, the statement must have been made to put him out of the caste. The question then depends upon a variety of circumstances other than merely the words spoken. But apart from these circumstances there still remain imputations which will be defamatory to whomsoever addressed. In such case the question is one of construction, for words may be defamatory not only for what they express but also for what they suggest. For this purpose the effect of words may be considered in the following order: words that are (i) obviously defamatory (§§ 5653-5654), (ii) ambiguous (§5659-5665), (iii) neutral (§ 5666).

(1) Words Obviously Defamatory.

5656. Of these, the first class calls for no particular notice. For words that are obviously defamatory are prima facie punishable, unless their use is justified under any of the exceptions to be presently considered. Such words could only be excused on the ground that they were meaningless, being words of vulgar abuse. Such would be the expression "you are a thief"(15) or a rogue (16) in which case the words are plainly defamatory unless they are shewn to have been used in their secondary sense. So where the defendant told the complainant that he had stolen his apples, he was not allowed to prove that it was only an expression, and that what he meant to say was that the com-

(14) Amir Hasan, (1883) A. W. N. 167.
(15) Blumby v. Rose, 1 Roll. Abr. 73; Slowman v. Dutton, 10 Bing. 402.
(16) Esufalli, 20 Bom. L. R. 601, 46 I C. 411, 19 Cr. L. J. 731.

plainant had removed them under an unfounded claim of right.(17) So where a person was accused of blackmailing, it was held to be plainly actionable(18) and it would be also punishable under this section.

So the word " pettifogger " as applied to a lawyer has a well-known meaning which the Courts could not ignore.(19) So where a person charges another with undue intimacy with a woman of another caste in consequence of which she became pregnant, he knows that his words are clearly defamatory, though he may have couched them in the form of a circular warning to caste people.(20) Such is the statement made by a person against another with whom he had a dispute about a plot of land that he was an ex-convict which had nothing to do with the claim.(21) So while the accused was under examination, the complainant asked the Magistrate to question him if he had not been convicted, whereupon, before the Magistrate could decide upon the relevancy of the question, the witness exclaimed: "I was convicted, because I had Kasim Saheb's wife in my house," which he repeated in spite of a warning by the Magistrate, it was held that he was guilty of defaming Kasim's wife.(22)

5657. Words which impute the commission of a crime to another are clearly defamatory. So words charging a person with having committed treason,(23) murder,(24) or homicide,(25) or an attempt to commit either,(1) robbery,(2) or house-breaking,(3) assault with intent to rob,(4) pocket-picking,(5) theft,(6) extortion,(7) forgery,(8) or embezzlement,(9) bigamy,(10) or adultery,(11) committing an unnatural offence,(12) or maintaining a brothel,(13) perjury,(14) or subornation of perjury,(15) cheating(16) and conspiracy,(17) or conspiring to commit a crime,(18)

(17) Cf. Rowcliffe v. Edmonds, 7 M. & W. 12.

(18) Edsall v. Brooks, 2 Robb. (N. Y.) 29; Robb. (N. Y.) 284; Marks v. Samuel, (1904) 2 K. B. 287.

(19) Bailey v. Kalamazoo Publishing Co. (1879) 4 Ch. (Mich.) 251.

(20) Ramanand, 3 A. 664; Shirgowda, 3 Bom. L. R. 188.

(21) Ramasami Naidu, (1895) 1 Weir 612.

(22) Syed Husain, (1881) 1 Weir (3rd Ed.), 357.

(23) Waldegrave (Sir William) v. Ralph Agas Cro. Eliz 191; Stapleton v. Frier, Cro. Eliz. 251.

(24) Peake v. Oldham, Cowp. 275; s. c. sub nom Oldham v. Peake, 2 W. Bl. 959; Button v. Hayward, 8 Mod. 24.

(25) Ford v. Primrose, 5 D. & R. 287; Edsall v. Russell, 4 M. & G. 1090.

(1) Scott v. Hilliar, Lane, 98; Preston v. Pinder, Cro. Flliz. 308.

(2) Lawrence v. Woodward, Cro. Car., 277; Rowcliffe v. Edmonds, 7 M. & W.12.

(3) Somers v. House, Holt 39.

(4) Lewknor v. Cruchley, Cro. Car. 140.

(5) Baker v. Pierce, 6 Mod. 23; Stebbing v. Warner, 11 Mod. 255.

(6) Leyman v. Latuner, 3 Ex. D, 15, 352.

(7) Neve v. Cros Sty. 350; Jones v. Herne, 2 Wills. 87, contra in Anon, 3 Leon, 231, overruled.

(8) Baal v. Baggerley, Cro. Car. 326; Jones v. Herne, 2 Wills. 87.

(9) Williams v. Stott, 1 C. & M. 675.

(10) Heming v. Power, 10 M. & W. 564; Delany v. Jones, 4 Esq. 191.

(11) Slander of Women Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict., c. 51).

(12) Thompson v. Nype, 16 Q. B. 175; Wolnoth v. Meadows, 5 East. 463; Colman v. Godwin, 3 Doug. 90.

(13) Brayne v. Cooper, 5 M. & W. 249; Huckle v. Reynolds, 7 C. B. (N. S.), 114.

(14) Ceely v. Hoskins Cro. Car. 509; Holt v. Scholefield, 6 T. R. 691; Roberts v. Camden, 9 East 93.

(15) Guerdon v. Winterstud, Cro. Elliz. 308; Harris v. Dixon, Cro. Jac. 158; Bridges v. Playdel, Brown & Golds 2; Harrison v. Thornborough, 10 Mod. 196.

(16) Gordon Cumming v. Green and others, (1891) 7 T. L. R. 403.

(17) Tibbot v. Haynes, Cro. Eliz. 191.

(18) Cookaine (Sir Thos.) v. Witnain, Cro. Eliz. 49; Leversage v. Smith, Cro. Eliz. 191; Passie v. Mondford, Cro. Eliz. 747; Deane v. Eton, 1 Blus 201; Crofts (Sir Harbert) v. Brown, 3 Blus. 201.

bribery and corruption[19] and indeed, any offence which has a tendency to lower one in the estimation of his fellowmen, are defamatory. And so it has been held that to call a man an ex-convict,[20] bankrupt,[21] a gambler,[22] or an outcast,[23] is actionable, though when words such as cheat,[24] swindler,[25] rogue, rascal, villain, vagabond,[1] common-filcher,[2] or the like are used merely as abusive epithets they cannot be regarded in the same light, though they may then constitute insult, and be, as such, punishable under s. 504. And it is so because having obtained currency in another sense they could not be said to have been used in the belief that they will be seriously taken by the by-standers so as to affect the reputation of the person to whom they are applied. But such would be the case where a person is charged with suffering from a contagious or loathsome disease the result of which may well be expected to exclude the complainant from society. So where a person is said to be suffering from plague, leprosy, venereal disease[3] or smallpox[4] he has the right to complain. So since virtue is the pride of womanhood, to charge a woman with unchastity[5] is highly defamatory and the more so if her children are called bastards.[6]

5658. And so in the case of-professional men it will be highly defamatory to make imputations touching the efficiency, honesty or integrity of the person who lives by his profession. So to charge a religious preacher with immorality or other misconduct which would be a reason for his degradation is libellous.[7] So to charge a clergyman with drunkenness,[8] or incontinence,[9] lying in the pulpit,[10] or misappropriating the money given to charity is clearly libellous[11]; and since barristers are presumed to be learned in the law, to speak of one as a dunce,[12] or a jackanape,[13] or that he has been guilty of unprofessional conduct, or that he has disclosed his instructions to the other side and deceived his client,[14] or that he wantonly led his client astray to feather his own nest, would entail the same consequence[15]; and the same protection is extended to solicitors and attorneys. Therefore to say of an attorney that he has no more law than

(19) Bendish v. Lindsay. 11 Mod. 194.
(20) Fowler v. Dowdney, 2 M. & Rob. 119; Bell v. Byrne. 13 East 554.
(21) Robinson v. Merchant, (1845) 7 Q. B. 918; Bhikam Chand, 98 I. C. 124, (1927) S. 54.
(22) Tikam Das, 96 I. C. 499, (1927) S. 58.
(23) Yusuf Beg Saheb v. Mhd. Sayad, 99 I. C. 943, (1927) M. 397.
(24) Savage v. Robery, 5 Mod. 398; Davis v. Miller, 2 Str. 1169.
(25) Savile v. Jardine, 2 H. Bl. 531 Black v. Hunt, 2 Ir. L. R. 10; Ward v. Weeks, 7 Bing. 211.
(1) Stanhope v. Hopkins, 2 Lev. 214.
(2) Goodale v. Castle, Cro. Eliz. 554.
(3) Villers v. Monsely, 2 Wils. 403; Taylor v. Perkins, Cro. Jac, 144.
(4) Brooke; v. Wise, Cro. Eliz. 878 Grimes v. Lovel, 12 Mod. 242; Whitfield v Powel, 12 Mod. 248.
(5) Cook v. Wingfield, 1 Str. 555.
(6) Davis, case (Anne), 4 Rep. 17; Salter v. Browne, Cro. Car. 436.
(7) Pemberton v. Colls, 10 Q. B. 461.
(8) Folkard's Libel, p. 124, citing A 63.
(9) Evans v. Gwyn, 5 Q. B. 844; Highmore v. Harrington (Earl and Countess of), 3 C. B. (N. S.) 142; Hartly v. Herring, 8 T. R. 130.
(10) Cranden v. Walden, 3 Lev. 17; Sarrum (Bishop of) v. Nash, Buller's N. P. 9; Drake v. Drake, 1 Roll. Abr. 366.
(11) Highmore v. Harrington (Earl and Countess of), 3 C. B. (N. S) 142.
(12) Peard v. Jones, Cro. Car. 382; Bankes v. Allen, 1 Roll. Abr. 54.
(13) Palmer v. Boyer. Cro. Eliz. 342; Brooke's case, Mod. 409.
(14) Snag v. Gray, 1 Roll. Abr. 57.
(15) Anon, 3 Salk, 328; Lake, 2 Ventr. 28.

a goose,[16] or the devil,[17] or that he is both a knave and a fool, or that he lives by cheating,[18] or that "he is only an attorney's clerk and a rogue, he is no attorney,"[19] or that he is a turncoat,[20] and will betray his client,[21] or that your attorney is a bribing knave and has taken £20 of you to cozen me,"[22] or that an attorney has been guilty of professional misconduct and ought to be struck off the rolls have been all held to be actionable, and would clearly be defamatory under this section. In England words[23] that an attorney had defrauded his creditors and had been horsewhipped off the course at Doncaster[24] have been held to be not actionable, though it is submitted they will be clearly defamatory, being words tending to lower his general reputation. But in his case too, words which are merely abusive must be distinguished from those that are intended to be defamatory.

5659. So since skill and capacity are necessary in a medical man, to charge him with having caused the death of a patient through his ignorance and culpable negligence is libellous[25] so it is defamatory to call him a quack or a mountebank,[1] but if the surgeon is a quack, there would be probably no defamation in calling a spade a spade.[2] But to say of a qualified man that he had ignorantly or unskilfully administered the wrong medicines or in excessive doses would be defamatory.[3] But under the peculiar law of slander in Engand (§§ 5628-5629), to charge a physician with adultery unconnected with his professional conduct is not actionable,[4] but a different fate will await such a defamer in this country. In England a physician is presumed to be a scholar, so a statement that "he is no scholar" is slanderous, because it is said that no man can be a good physician unless he be a scholar,[5] but this is pushing the doctrine of prosecution too far, for indeed, an ordinary physician will blush to think that law imputes to him scholarship the denial of which is actionable. But a schoolmaster must be a scholar, and so to say of him that he is a dunce and incompetent to teach[6] or that he is a habitual drunkard[7] is actionable, and it will be equally punishable under the next section.

5660. And so since honesty and integrity in a high degree is required of all public servants in the discharge of their duties, to charge a judicial officer with corruption[8] or being a blood-sucker.[9] is action-

(16) Baker v. Morfue, 2 Keble 202.
(17) Day v. Buller, 3 Wils, 59.
(18) Anon, (1638) Cro. Car. 516; Powel v Jones, 1 Lev. 297.
(19) Hardwick v. Chandler, 2 Stra. 1138.
(20) Annison v. Blofield, 1 Roll. Abr. 55: Shire v. King, Yelv 32.
(21) Martyn v. Burling, Cro. Eliz. 589; Garr v. Selden, 6 Barb. (N. Y.) 416: Foot v. Brown, 8 Johns. 64.
(22) Yardley v. Ellill, Hob. 8.
(23) Byrchley's case 4 Rep. 16; Phillips v. Jansen, 2 Esp. 624.
(24) Doyley v. Roberts, 3 Bing. N. C. 835.
(25) Poe v. Mondford, Cro. Eliz. 620: Watson v. Vanderlash, Hetl. 71; Edsall v. Russell, 4 M. & Gr. 1090.
(1) Allen v. Eaton, 1 Roll. Abr. 54.
(2) Collins v. Carnegie, 1 A. & E. 695.
(3) Collier v. Simpson, 5 C. & P. 73; Tutty v. Alewin, 11 Mod. 221; Secor v. Harris, 18 Barb. 425; Edsall v. Russell, 12 L. J. C. P. 4.
(4) Ayre v. Craven, 2 A. & E. 2.
(5) Cawdry v. Highley, Cro. Car. 270.
(6) Watson v. Vanderlosh, Hetl. 71.
(7) Hume v. Marshall, 42 J. P. 136; Goslett v. Garment, (1897) 13 T. L. R. 391.
(8) Coesar v. Curseny, Cro. Eliz. 305; Carn v. Osgood, 1 Lev. 280; Alleston v. Moor, 1 Hetl. 167; Masham v. Bridges, Cro. Car. 223; Isham v. York, Cro. Car. 15: Beamond v. Hastings, Cro. Jac, 240; Aston v. Blagrave, 8 Mod. 270.
(9) Hilliard (Sir Christopher) v. Constable, Cro. Eliz. 306.

able, and would be here punishable as defamation; but comments upon his intelligence may not fall into the same category, for they may be privileged under Exception 2.

5661. But to say of a banker or trader that he is insolvent,[10] or of a merchant that he is a sharper or a "cheating knave and keeps a false debt-books,"[11] or that he uses false weights,[12] or that he adulterates the goods he sells,[13] or that he professes to sell lamb but supplies coarse mutton,[14] or that he is an infernal rogue and swindler,[15] and indeed any imputation which reflects upon his credit, honesty or capacity for business may become defamatory.

(2) Ambiguous Words.

5662. Between words plainly defamatory and those which are ambiguous, there is this difference that while in the case of the former the complainant has merely to prove their publication upon which the Court will presume an intention to defame, in the case of the latter the complainant must not only prove their publication but also that they were used in the sense defamatory. As Lord Herscell, L. C., said: "People not unfrequently use words, and are understood to use words, not in their natural sense, or as conveying the imputation which in ordinary circumstances and apart from their surroundings they would convey, but extravagantly and in a manner which would be understood by those who hear or read them, as not conveying the grave imputation suggested by a mere consideration of the words themselves."[16] In order to show that the words though ambiguous were well understood by those to whom they were published in a sense defamatory of the complainant, the complainant may prove the surrounding circumstances, as also the sense in which they were taken by the hearers. So where the person defamed was only mentioned by his initials, it is allowable to give evidence as to their meaning, by shewing that from what preceded and followed, the prosecutor and no one else could have been understood, that it was he whom the people understood by the allusion.[17] So where in a written libel the name of the person traduced was left blank, general evidence by those who knew him was admitted for the purpose of proving that he was the person meant.[18]

So where the defendant wrote that "in some of the Irish factories cruelties were practised," the plaintiff was permitted to give evidence to show that the defendant specially referred to him by innuendo, and Lord Cottenham, L. C., in the course of his judgment observed: "If a party can publish a libel so framed as to describe individuals, though not naming them, and not specifically describing them by any express form of words, but still so describing them that it is known

(10) Johnson v. Lemmon, 2 Roll. R. 144, Robinson v. Merchant, 7 Q. B. 918; Harrison v. Bevington, 8 C. & P. 708; Gostling v. Brooks, 2 F. & F. 76; Brown v. Smith, 13 C. B. 596.

(11) Crawford v. Dale, 3 Salk 327.

(12) Griffiths v. Lewis, 7 Q. B. 61; Prior v. Wilson, 1 C. B. (N. S.) 95.

(13) Jesson v. Hayes, 1. Roll. Abr. 63.

(14) Crisp v. Gill, 29 L. T. (O. S.) 82.

(15) Johns v. Gittings, Cro. Eliz. 299.

(16) Australian Newspaper Co. v. Bennett, (1894) A. C. 284 (287, 288).

(17) Per Ellenborough, C. J., in Du Bost v. Bercsford, 2 Camp 512.

(18) Per Abbot, C. J., in Bourke v. Warren, 2 C. & P. 307.

who they are as the jurors have found it to be here; and if those who must be acquainted with the circumstances connected with the party described, may also come to the same conclusion, and may have, no doubt, that the writer of the libel intended to mean those individuals, it would be opening a very wide door to defamation if parties suffering all the inconveniences of being libelled were not permitted to have that protection which the law affords. If they are so described, that they are known to all their neighbours as being the parties alluded to and if they are able to prove to the satisfaction of a jury that the party writing the libel did intend to allude to them, it would be unfortunate to find the law in a state which would prevent the party being protected against such libels."[19] So where the prosecutor complained of a newspaper libel, upon a person not named but described as "a member of the aristocracy of refined taste and studious habits, and an artist of more than ordinary ability," and the accused editor of the newspaper filed an affidavit to the effect that he had made inquiries from the writer of the article who denied that the imputation was directed against the prosecutor, Cockburn, C. J., held that, that was sufficient to clear the prosecutor and the rule was discharged by consent.[20]

5663. But in a recent case the Court of appeal appear to have inclined the other way. In that case the defendants published in their paper called the Sunday Chronicle, an article received from their Paris correspondent descriptive of a motor festival at Dieppe and of the gaiety then prevailing in the following words: "Upon the terrace marches the world, attracted by the motor races—a world immensely pleased with itself, and minded to draw a wealth of inspiration—and, incidentally, of golden Cocktails—from any scheme to speed the passing hour....Whist! there is Artemus Jones with a woman who is not his wife, who must be, you know—the other thing." The plaintiff who bore the name of Thomas Artemus Jones complained of the allusion as libellous to him. It was proved that the defendant's correspondent had invented the name Artemus Jones as an imaginary character and the defendants contended that since the name Artemus Jones had been coined by the writer of the article and was not intended to refer to any person in existence, it was not a libel on anybody and a fortiori not on the plaintiff himself. But Lord Alverstone, C. J., held that the question for consideration was not what the writer of the article intended, but whether the person referred to in the libel would be understood by persons who knew him to refer him to the plaintiff and in that view the Court held the plaintiff entitled to damages.[21] But as has been elsewhere explained,[22] this is not the stand-point of the Code, or of the section, which regards criminality from the subjective stand-point—so that in the case last assumed the plea of the defendant would have been a sufficient defence.[23]

(19) Le Fanu v. Malcolmson, 1 H. L. C. 637 (664).

(20) Gower (Lord Ronald) v. "The man of the World," (1879) Ms. cited Folkard Libel (5th Ed.), 823.

(21) Jones v. E. Hulton & Co., (1909) 2 K. B. 444 (453); following Abrath v. North Eastern Ry. Co. 11 App. Cas. 247 (253, 254).

(22) General Intro. §§ 51-54.

(23) Cf. also s. 80.

5664. In the construction of words the Court or the jury as the case may be, has to take into consideration the figure of speech, so that words which may at first appear laudatory may, on close examination, be found to have been intended to be defamatory. So a person may call an attorney "an honest lawyer," meaning thereby that he was dishonest.(24) And where the intention is clear the accused will not be heard to say that he had merely used the epithet in jest for as Joy, C. B., said: "The principle is clear that a person shall not be allowed to murder another's reputation in jest. But if the words be so spoken that it is obvious to every bystander that only a jest is meant, "no injury is done and consequently no action will lie."(25)

5665. But where the words used are plain and unambiguous, the Court must construe them literally, but where they are unintelligible, as where they are slang expressions varying in sense or having a local meaning, the Court will call evidence to elucidate their meaning. In such cases "the Judge must decide if the words are reasonably capable of two meanings; if he so decide, the jury must determine which of the two meanings was intended."(1) "It is for the Court to determine whether the words used are capable of the meaning alleged in the innuendo, and it is for the jury to determine whether that meaning was properly attached to them."(2) For this purpose evidence of subsequent libels is admissible to explain the meaning of the one in controversy, even though such libels be published after the proceeding,(3) and in judging of the meaning and effect of such libel the Court is to have regard to the time and place of publication, the relationship between parties, and in fact the whole circumstances of the case.(4) So where the defendants published in the newspaper in the list of "Births" that Mrs. M. had given birth to twins, evidence was admitted to show that Mr. and Mrs. M. had been married only one month, upon which the Court held that the words amounted to a charge of unchastity and were therefore actionable.(5)

Neutral Words.

5666. The last is an illustration of the use of neutral words, that is to say, words which by themselves signify nothing but which are nevertheless defamatory and are intended to be so, but which require an explanation. Such are slang phrases, and words used in a special local, technical or customary sense. So to call a stock-jobber, a lame-duck is libellous for it is understood to mean that he had not fulfilled his obligations with respect to stocks and shares.(6) Such are the words "blackleg" and "blacksheep."(7)

(24) Boydell v. Jones, 4 M. & W. 446; Brown, 11 Mod. 86; Hick's (Str. Baptist) case, Hob. 215.

(25) Donoghue v. Hayes, (1831) Hayes Ir. Exch. 265.

(1) Per Sir Montague Smith in Jenner v. A'Beckett, L. R. 7 Q. B. 11; Grant v. Yetes, 6 App. Cas. 158 (1886), 2 T. L. R. 368.

(2) Per Lord Herschell, L. C., in Australian Newspaper Co. v. Bennett, (1894) A. C. 284 (287).

(3) Capital and Counties Bank v. Henty & Sons, 5 C. P. D. 514, O. A. 7 App. Cas. 741.

(4) Churchill v. Gedney, 53 J. P. 471.

(5) Morrison v. Ritche & Co. (1902) 4 F. 645.

(6) Morris v. Langdale, 2 Bos. & Pul. 284.

(7) McGregor v. Gregory, 12 L. J. Ex. 204; O'Brien v. Clement, 16 L. J. Ex. 77; Barnett v. Allen, 27 L. J. Ex. 412.

5667. Defamation of the Dead.—The first explanation is enacted to extend the sense of the term "person" as used in the main clause where it is obviously used in the sense in which it is defined in section 11 (§ 133). In extending, however, the offence to a person deceased, the clause follows the lead of English Law, which in its turn borrows its provisions from civil law enacted at a time when the reverence paid to the deceased ancestors amongst the Romans was as much a part of their religion as it is a part of the established creed of all nations of the East. In this respect the rule may be said to be founded upon the same principle upon which the law of libel is explained in England, namely, in its tendency to provoke breach of the peace. So Mr. Starkie wrote: "The same conclusion is to be drawn from the consideration that the law punishes libels on the dead as well as on the living, out of the just apprehension that otherwise the family of the deceased would visit the insult as a personal affront to themselves; and one reason, and that a forcible one, for punishing libels, even on the subject of religion, is the consideration that to revile a man's religion cannot but be regarded as an indirect affront to himself."[8] Accordingly the question of defamation in such a case is made to depend not on the intention or belief of the defamer but upon the susceptibilities of the near relatives of the deceased. But in laying down this test the clause does not enlarge the definition but rather restricts it by an additional qualifying limitation. It in fact enacts that (i) the imputation must amount to defamation—that is to say it must be such as would have been defamatory to the deceased if he were living; and (ii) it must be made with intend to hurt the feelings of his family or other near relatives.

Explanation 1.

5668. Now the first question demands that the imputation made must be such as would have been harmful to the reputation of the deceased if it had been made when he was alive. So far the question depends upon the harm caused and not the harm intended—for in the case of a deceased, the latter test is clearly inapplicable. Now since the first defining clause makes the offence depend upon the accused's intention, knowledge and belief, it follows that cases falling under it will not necessarily fall under this explanation. At the same time, there are cases there contemplated in which the harm intended was also the harm likely to be caused, which would furnish apt illustration of what is here implied. Such was an imputation made against the deceased wife of a baronet, imputing adultery to her with one of her menial servants.[9] In another case the accused stated that the prosecutor had purchased a commission in the Army and become a Colonel of the Militia out of the proceeds of his father's embezzlements, and it was held that the prosecutor was entitled to take the opinion of the jury as it was a libel upon him.[10]

So where the accused, a clergyman, published a libel upon the deceased Queen Mary to the following effect: "Mary's Epitaph. Here lies King James' disobedient daughter, who was addicted, etc.," he was held to be

(8) Folkard's Libel, 45 Comm.
(9) Weaver and others, E. T., 2 Geo. IV.
(10) White v. Tyrrell, 5 Ir. C. L. R. 498.

guilty of making it, though he was shown to have written it from the dictation of another person.(11) A similar view was taken of the bookseller who, in the year 1824, published a libel on George II, whereupon Abbot, L. C., told the jury that human society and human nature were so constituted that the honour and dignity of a father were connected with that of a son; and that there was no son who would not be disturbed and disquieted by imputations of that character, from which it must follow that its effect must be to bring the son into scandal and disgrace. If it was defamation, it could not be entitled to the latitude which should be afforded to the discussions of the events of the reign and of the character of the late King; and it must have the effect of disturbing the minds of his present majesty and the other members of his family, and of bringing them into disgrace.(12)

5669. This is exactly the view this explanation takes of the matter (§§ 5671-5672); that is to say, the imputation must not only be defamatory of the deceased, but it must also hurt the feelings of his near relatives. Such was held to be the case of the accused who in an obituary notice of one Sir Charles Nicoll, K.C.B., said that the deceased could not be called a friend to his country, for he changed his opinion for a red ribbon, and voted for that pernicious object, the excise. It was stated that this passage was published to vilify and defame the memory of the deceased knight and to stir up the hatred and evil will of the people against his family, upon which an information was granted.(13) But in a similar case where the charge for publishing a libel on the late Earl Cowper, with intent to disgrace his memory, omitted to add that it was intended to create ill-blood or throw scandal on the children and family of Earl Cowper, or to provoke them to a breach of the peace, the verdict of guilty was given, but the judgment was arrested on account of the omission, Lord Kenyon, C. J., observing: "To say that the conduct of a deceased person can at no time be canvassed; to hold that, even after ages are past, the conduct of bad men cannot be contrasted with that of the good, would be to exclude the most useful part of history. And therefore it must be allowed that such publications may be made fairly and honestly. But let this be done whenever it may, whether soon or late after the death of the party, if it be done with a malevolent purpose to vilify the memory of the deceased, and with a view to injure his posterity as in R. v. Critchley, then it is done with a design to break the peace, and it becomes illegal.(14)

Feelings of the Family must be Hurt.

5670. The question that the imputation made against the deceased was such as would have harmed his reputation is, therefore, material, but what is more material is the fact that its publication must be intended to be hurtful to the feelings of his family or other near relatives. It will be observed that the word "intended" is advisedly used—for the accuser may know or have reason to believe that such consequence will ensue it is not sufficient, if his primary intention was different. For instance, he may be writing a history in which case he may feel compelled to record a fact distasteful to the relatives of the accused, but he could

(11) Pain, Holt Rep. 294; Taylor, 3 Salk, 198.

(12) Hunt, (1824) 2 St. Tr. (N. S.) 69.

(13) Critchley, (1734) 4 T. R. 129-n.

(14) Topham, (1791) 4 T. R. 126. The prosecution failed for the same reason in Labouchere, 12 Q. B. D. 320; Eusor, (1887) 3 T. L. R. 366.

not then be held liable for this offence, since criminality under this clause depends upon the criminal's primary intention being to hurt the feelings of the family of the deceased.

5671. The question who are members of his family or other near relatives must depend upon the nature of the imputation and the likelihood of its reflecting upon the honour and credit of the survivors. For instance, if a married woman is attacked in her virtue, her husband is certainly her near relative to complain of it,(15) but if suppose her father's honesty had been in question it is doubtful if her husband would be a "near relative" entitled to complain. But the children of the deceased are such relatives and directly interested in upholding the honour of their father.(16) The applicant, the Duke of Vallombrosa, applied to the Queen's Bench that a criminal information should be filed against the non-applicant, Henry Labouchere, proprietor of the newspaper Truth for publishing a libel upon his deceased father, about whom the non-applicant had published that he was "an army contractor who was nearly hanged on a charge of supplying as meat to a French Army Corps, the flesh of soldiers who had died in hospital or who had been killed in battle. Luckily for him the first Empire came to an end before the trial could take place, and the contractor having retired to Italy and purchased a dukedom, became a grand seigneur, and an ardent adherent of the Bourbons." Lord Coleridge, C. J.,(17) in refusing the rule said that the filing of criminal information(18) was an extraordinary remedy and discretionary in the Court, and that no case had been made out in favour of it (i) because the libel affected only the private individual who had been assailed in his private capacity,(19) and (ii) the complainant was resident abroad. But at the same time the Court left it open to the complainant to proceed against the accused if he was so advised by indictment.(20) In this case, the fact that the son had the right to complain was neither questioned, nor denied and it could not be, for if the son is not a near relative who else could be so treated? The same view may be taken of the brother or grandson of the deceased, though a cousin of the deceased was apparently not so regarded.(21)

(15) Weaver, E. T. 2 Geo. IV.
(16) Hunt, 2 St. Tr. (N. S.) 69.
(17) Denman, Field, Hawkins and Mathew, JJ., concurrent.
(18) The initiation of a public prosecution by the Court directing the filing of a criminal information after which the State becomes the prosecutor, has nothing akin in the procedure of this country, though s. 190 of the Cr. P. C. approaches it. The other mode of proceeding by indictment is what may be called an initiation of a criminal proceeding on complaint. In ordinary cases criminal information is granted only "where some person in a public or official position was attacked in relation to such position, or where the attack was of so cruel and outrageous a sort as to make it a matter which interested the public and called for interference of the Court as representing the public and charge with the defence of its interests."—Labouchere, 12 Q. B. D. 320 (326)
(19) Per Lord Coleridge, C. J., in Labouchere, 12 Q. B. D. 320 (329): "If a peer is libelled as a peer for his conduct in Parliament, or as Lord Lieutenant (if he is one) or as Magistrate, or as the holder of a public office, it would undoubtedly be almost of course (all other conditions being fulfilled) that the court should interfere in his behalf. But that a peer in private matters is entitled to and interference at the hands of this Court which the Court would not extend in favour of the humblest subject of the Queen. I respectfully but emphatically deny."
(20) Labouchere, 12 Q. B. D. 320.
(21) Luckumsey v. Hurbun, 5 B. 580.

No Civil Remedy.

5672. Again, this is one of those cases in which while the Code gives criminal relief, the party feeling wronged has no corresponding civil remedy. It was so held in a case in which at the funeral of the plaintiff's cousin, the defendants who were his castemen reviled the deceased calling him patit (i.e., fallen) and an outcast sinful man, attendance at whose funeral should be visited with fine by the caste, whereupon several persons left it. The plaintiff sued the defendants for damages, but his suit was thrown out by West, J., on this short ground: "Slander of A as a ground of action by B would lead to infinite litigation."[22] The same view has prevailed in other cases, in which the right of the brother to sue for damages for defamation of his sister was denied[23] and so in other cases it has been held that the father could not sue for the defamation of his daughter[24] or the husband for the defamation of his wife and calling his children bastards.[25] This is clearly an anomaly, and is so recognized[1] but nevertheless it exists and marks the different stand-points from which the two branches of law view the question in the case of such responsibility.

Explanation 2.

5673. Defamation of a Class.—That the subject of defamation may be "any person" the word "person" being understood in the sense in which it is defined in s. 11 leads to the conclusion, more explicitly set out in explanation 2, but which is only intended to amplify what was already implied in the definition (§ 133). But in considering the question of the defamation of a class, two points must be clearly borne in mind. First, that the class must not be too large to cease to be distinct from the members of a certain trade or profession—as for example, law or medicine. So if a person were to inveigh against the lawyers as a class calling them thieves,[2] or the medical men as a class of cut-throats in disguise, or the police force as a hot-bed of corruption, there would be no indictable libel because the class is too large and the generalization too sweeping to affect any of its composing members.[3] So while a statement, such as that "all men are liars," could not be made the subject-matter of a complaint for this offence, a statement that the Scorton Nunnery is a "brothel of prostitutes,"[4] or that an aid-de-camp of the Governor of Leeward Island was guilty of indecent brutality upon some negro woman,[5] or that a murder had been committed by certain Jews recently arrived from Portugal, and living near Broad-street which led to the barbarous treatment of Jews in several parts of the country,[6] or that the clergy of a certain diocese were guilty of a certain conduct reflecting upon their character, were all held to be libellous, and they would be so held under this clause.[7]

So while there may be defamation of a college or a hospital or of the general body of trustees of a fund,[8] the municipality or district council

(22) Luckumsey v. Hurbun, 5 B. 580 (583); Varajlal v. Rambat, 26 B. 259 (265).
(23) Subbaiyar v. Kristnaiyar, 1 M. 383.
(24) Daya v. Param Sukh, 11 A. 104.
(25) Brahmanna v. Ramokrishnama, 18 M. 250; Varajlal v. Ramdat, 26 B. 259 (265).
(1) Balkrishna, 17 B. 573 (575).
(2) Eastwood v. Holmes. 1 F. & F. 346; Osborn, 2 Barnard 138, 166.
(3) Le Fanu v. Malcolmson, 1 H. L. C. 637.
(4) Gatherco'e, 2 Lew. C. C. 254.
(5) Hotchard, (1817), Unrep, cited in Folkard's Libel (5th Ed.) 821, 822.
(6) Orme, 2 Salk. 224.
(7) Williams, 5 B. & Ald. 595.
(8) Griffin, Cas. Temp. Hardw. 39; Booth v. Briscoe, 2 Q. B. D. 496.

or police or Magistrate of a certain town, still where those institutions are generally made the theme of libellous attack it is too wide to hurt any one and it therefore ceases to be criminal. Secondly: Though the defamation of a class is conceivable, the mischief the offence is intended to guard against is that which is levelled at individual reputation. Consequently, in considering this class of cases, the Court has more regard to the effect produced than to the object aimed at, though of course in taking into consideration the one, it does not shift the centre of responsibility from the other.

5674. These considerations appear to be present in the choice of words used in this explanation, which enlarges the sense of "person" merely to "a company or an association or collection of persons, as such" which means a body of men considered in the aggregate. It is, of course, not necessary that the company or association should be incorporated, but what is necessary is that the libel complained of must have affected them all so that every individual could predicate of himself that the imputation was calculated to harm his own reputation as one member of that large body which had been made the libeller's target. But in such cases, no less than in the case of individual libel, the imputation made must amount to defamation. The accused who were members of the Reddi caste convened a meeting of their caste in the village at which they denounced the members of another caste, the Balijas, as inferior to their own with whom they should hold no intercourse, and that the village servants should not serve them. The latter consequently refused to serve them and the Reddies ceased associating with them. It was held that it was no case for conviction, because all that the accused had done was to express an opinion about their own superiority and that at least it was a case in which "one caste had combined against another, and, however inconsiderate and oppressive such combination may be, it is not penal unless it is for one of the purposes specified in section 141. If any of the civil rights of the complainant and his castemen is injured, the remedy is a suit for damages."(9)

A Class may Defame.

5675. The explanation only refers to where the persons defamed form a class. It has no reference to where the persons defaming are also a company, or an association or collection of men. But the section applies equally to "whoever" defames any person, which term is equally comprehensive and sufficient to include a body of men as distinct from its individual members. This view is in harmony with English law under which a corporation aggregate is liable both civilly and criminally in its corporate capacity in the same manner and to the same extent as an individual. So Lord Blackburn said: "I quite agree that a corporation cannot commit crime in one sense—a corporation cannot be imprisoned, if imprisonment be the sentence for the crime; a corporation cannot be hanged and put to death, if that be the punishment for the crime. In all those senses a corporation cannot commit a crime; but a corporation may be fined or may pay damages, and I must totally dissent, notwithstanding what Bramwell,

(9) Venkata Reddi, (1885) 1 Weir 575.

L. J., said, or is reported to have said[10] from the supposition that a corporation that incorporated itself for publishing a newspaper could not be fined, or an action brought against it for libel, or that a corporation that commits a nuisance could not be convicted of the nuisance, or the like."[11]

5676. Defamation by Innuendo.—The third explanation expatiating on the meaning of the word "imputation" has also been already considered (§§ 5647-5651). As there remarked, a defamatory imputation may be as much conveyed by a direct accusation, as in a more guarded but equally forcible language. The language of irony and sarcasm is, indeed, if anything often more forcible and impressive than a bald statement. At the same time it provides a wider range for attack. For it is then necessary for the prosecution to establish that the words though innocent in appearance were intended to be used in a libellous sense. So it may be libellous to say of an attorney that he is an honest lawyer meaning thereby that he is the reverse of honest. But since this is not the meaning that the words used primarily bear, it cannot be presumed but must be established by proof of other circumstances such as the time, mode and manner of the conversation, the previous relations between the parties and the sense in which they were understood by the hearer. The question in what sense certain words were used is a question of fact, though whether they amount to libel is a question of law.[12] But the Court can take judicial notice of words which have gained currency in a certain sense. Such are, for instance, words such as Judas,[13] Shylock, Pettifogger,[14] and Ananias[15] blackleg, blacksheep,[16] and there are many more colloquial, local and other words which have by usage passed into popular parlance which require no explanation.

Explanation 3.

5677. But there are others the meaning of which is not quite apparent, in which it will be for the jury to find as to what was the speaker's meaning. This they may do from the context as where the words used were: "Thou art a clipper, and thy neck shall pay for it," in which case, though the word "clipper" was general and may mean a

(10) Pharmaceutical Society v. London and Provincial Supply Association, 5 Q. B. D. 310 (313)), reversing s. c. 4 Q. B. D. 313; O. A. 5 App. Cas. 857—in all of which the question turned on the meaning of the word "person" as used in the Pharmacy Act—a term which has been expressly held to include a juridical person in the Code.

(11) Pharmaceutical Society v. London and Provincial Supply Association, 5 App. Cas. 857 (869, 870).

(12) Roberts v. Camden, 9 East 96; Oldham v. Peake, Cowp. 278; Le Fanu v. Malcolmson, 1 H. L. C. 637 (664); Wakley v. Healey, 7 C. B. 605.

(13) Hoare v. Silverlock, 12 Q. B. 624.

(14) Bailey v. Kalamazoo Publishing Co. (1879), 4 Chaney 251. But Lord Bramwell sitting in the same Court in another case of malicious prosecution said: "A corporation is incapable of malice or of motive. If the whole body of share-holders were to meet and in so many words to say 'prosecute so and so, not because we believe him guilty but because it will be for our interest to do it,' no action would lie against the corporation, though it would lie against the share-holders who had given such an unbecoming order.—" Abrath v. North Eastern Ry. Co., 11 App. Cas. 247 (251). But the rest of the Court had no occasion to support or dissent from this dictum. And, at any rate, the language of the Code is sufficiently clear.

(15) Which means a deliberate liar—Australian Newspaper Co. v. Bennett, (1894) A. C. 284.

(16) McGregor v. Gregory, 11 M. & W. 287; O'Brien v. Clement, 16 M. & W. 166; Barnett v. Allen, 1 F. & F. 125.

clipper of wool, cloth or the like, its association with the following words "and thy neck shall pay for it" may wholly change its meaning.[17] So the phrase "He is a lame duck" is sufficiently expressive as meaning a dishonest fellow who is not likely to fulfil his contract.[18] So the words "he is a healer of felons" may be explained to mean that he harbours them[19]; so to say that a man is "Man Friday" to another is by itself insufficient to support the averment that the term imputed undue subserviency and self-humiliation.[20] So to say of a shopkeeper that "His shop is in the market" is, standing alone, innocent, though it may mean that his shop is for sale and that the tradesman is bankrupt.[21]

So where it was said of a person that he had left his country for his country's good, evidence was allowed to be given to show that what was intended was that he had been transported. So where the defendants charged the plaintiff of having been guilty of "felonious practices," by which they meant unnatural crimes, May, C. J., said: "The question was, whether the paragraphs charged as libellous, read and interpreted by the light of surrounding circumstances, did or did not convey to the minds of persons of reasonable intelligence an imputation upon the plaintiff that he had been guilty of unnatural crimes. That the question was not what the defendant, in his own mind, intended by such language, but what was the meaning and inference that would be naturally drawn by reasonable and intelligent persons reading the said paragraphs."[22] But having regard to the different stand-point from which the Code views criminality, it is clear that this is only a subordinate question, the principal question being the question of intention, knowledge and belief which is the sole test of criminality.[23]

5678. In cases of expressions alleged to be ambiguous "the Judge must decide if the words are reasonably capable of two meanings; if he so decide, the jury must determine which of the two meanings was intended.[24] In other words, it is the province of the Judge to say whether the words are capable of bearing the alleged meaning; it is then for the jury to determine whether they do in fact bear that meaning.[25] For this purpose it is open to either side to prove facts tending to show that the words were used in their secondary and not their primary sense. Hence if the defendant or the accused can get either the Court or the jury to be in his favour, he succeeds. The prosecutor, or plaintiff, cannot succeed unless he gets both the Court and the jury to decide for him.[1] As Lord Blackburn said: "If the words were reasonably capable of a meaning which, in the opinion of the Court, would be libellous on the plaintiffs personally, I think there can be no doubt that it ought to have been left to the jury to say whether

(17) Naben v. Miecock, Skin. 183; Walter v. Beaver, 3 Lev. 166.
(18) Morris v. Laughdale, 2 Bos. & Pul. 284.
(19) Pridham v. Tucker, Hob. 126.
(20) Fordes, 2 L. J. Ex. 109.
(21) Ruel v. Tatnell, 43 L. T. 507.
(22) Bolton v. O'Brien, 16 L. R Ir. Q. B. D. 97 (108); Hankinson v. Bilby, 16 M. & W. 445.
(23) General Introduction, §§ 2, 53.
(24) Dictum of Sir Montague Smith, arguendo in Simmons v. Mitchell, 6 App. Cas. 156 (158).
(25) Per Lord Herschell, L. C., in Australian Newspaper Co. v. Bennett, (1894) A. C. 287.
(1) Capital and Counties Bank v. Henty & Sons, 5 C. P. D. 514, O. A. 7 App. Cas. 741.

the words bore that meaning."[2] Of course, in construing the meaning of ambiguous words, "the meaning of the words is to be gathered from the vulgar import, and not from any technical legal sense.[3]

An imputation none the less fulfils the requirements of the clause because it is safaguarded by the use of such cautious expressions as "I think," "I understand," or "I hear so." These are, on the other hand, meaningless qualifications answering the same purpose as "I heard a bird sing that you had committed a felony" or "I dreamt so."[4]

Explanation 4.

5679. What is Harming the Reputation.—This explanation is intended to define the term "harm" as applied to reputation in connection with the definition of this offence. It does not, however, cover all cases in which defamation may be committed—for the actual harming of one's reputation is by no means necessary for the purpose of the offence. Moreover, as Straight, J., said: "That explanation does not apply where the words used and forming the basis of a charge are per se defamatory. When an expression, used verbally or in writing, is doubtful as to its significance and some evidence is necessary to decide what the effect of that expression will be, and, whether it is calculated to harm a particular person's reputation, it is possible that the principle enunciated in explanation 4 of section 499 might, and would, with propriety be applied."[5] But cases are conceivable in which the words are defamatory, though they do not fall within the terms of this explanation. Such was held to be the effect of the words written by the accused with reference to the prosecution: "Mrs. McCarthy will take no notice of anything written by H. G. Scott, he already having shown himself a coward, dishonest man, and something worse than either, which the Court held to be per se defamatory, apart from this explanation.[6]

5680. So far, however, as this explanation goes, it is comprehensive enough to comprise most cases of defamation. For even in the last case, the words used could not but have been believed by the speaker to lower the complainant's moral and intellectual character in the estimation of others, and that is sufficient for the offence. The character may be lowered "directly or indirectly" by the imputation—that is to say, the imputation may either in express terms hold the other up to infamy or the words used may have that effect though they did not expressly convey that impression. They do not suggest that the person libelled should himself be direct means of publishing the libel to others.[7]

5681. The object of this explanation is to indicate the general tenour of the harm to a person's reputation which enters into the definition of "defamation." As such, it mentions that person's character with reference to his (i) physical, (ii) moral, or (iii) intellectual capacity, (iv)

(2) Capital and Counties Bank v. Henty & Sons, 5 C. P. D. 514, O. A. 7 App. Cas., p. 777; Kuppusawmy v. Doraiswami, 19 M. L. J. R. 714 (717).

(3) Per Buller, J., in Colman v. Godwin, 3 Doug 91. (Earl of) v. Mordant, 1 Lev. 277; to the same effect, Townshend (Lord) v. Dr.

(4) Per North, C. J. in Petersborough Hughes, 2 Mod. 166.

(5) McCarthy 9A, 420.

(6) Ib.

(7) Taki Husain, 7 A. 205; Sankara, 6 M. 381.

with reference to his caste or creed, and (v) credit. In every case the standard it prescribes is the variable standard of "others"—such "others" being men who come in contact with him whether socially or in business. With regard to the imputation affecting one's body, the explanation merely refers to a state when his body is described as loathsome or in a disgraceful state. Such would be the case where it is alleged that a person is suffering from leprosy, plague, cholera, small-pox or a venereal disease. These words are not intended to be used in their figurative sense as, for instance, in the case of a Hindu who has been outcasted for partaking the forbidden food, or who has otherwise rendered himself ritually loathsome. But such person may, however, complain if the imputation has lowered him in the estimation of his caste. But it will not affect his "moral or intellectual character." These words are intended to refer to the sense of morality and intellectual capacity, affected by one's being called a liar, a dishonest man a fool and incapable or the like. So to charge a man with bigamy would be defamation, if bigamy is an offence in his case, for it would then affect his moral and in fact he would be then charged with having committed a crime, and since such an accusation lowers a person's moral character, an imputation to that effect is defamatory.

Harm to Caste.

5682. So a person may suffer in his reputation by being lowered in the estimation of his castemen. Such would be prima facie the case if he is declared an outcaste for doing an act obnoxious to the orthodox community.(8) Such was the case of the prosecutor who having attended the solemnization of a Hindu widow marriage forbidden by his caste, the accused who was his guru or spiritual guide, published a notice broadcast declaring him to be an out-caste and forbidding the accused's disciples and the public of the town to associate with him until he obtained his absolution. It was held that the publication constituted this offence.(9) So where the accused falsely published a circular stating that the complainant had been outcasted on account of his having gone to England for education, the Court held the accused guilty though his act was found to be the outcome of an overzeal to preserve the purity of his caste and was actuated by no malice towards the complainant.(10) But the same view was taken in a converse case in which one Bachcha, being disappointed for not having been invited to officiate at a religious ceremony at the complainant's house, falsely gave out that he was a Kori Chamar, which scared the other priests from visiting his house for that purpose.(11)

This clause has led to a crop of cases all arising out of caste disputes and the alleged transgression of its unbending mandates. So where the complainant was put out of caste by a panchayat of his caste fellows on the ground that there was an improper intimacy beween him and a woman of his caste, and some of whom circulated a letter to the members of their caste generally, stating the fact of the complainant's excommunication and the reason therefor and requesting all castemen to refrain from dining with him or receiving him into their houses,

(8) Sankara, 6 M. 381.
(9) Sankara, 6 M. 381; Ramanand, 3 A. 664.
(10) Makund Ram, 6 A. L. J. 472, 2 J. C. 226.
(11) Bachcha, 6 I, C. 876.

the statements were held to be defamatory and the undue publicity given and the trivial occasion taken advantage of for that purpose, were held not to save them under any of the exceptions.[12] In another case, the complainant, a Brahmin, who had been put out of caste, was readmitted into it by the executive committee of the caste after the performance of expiatory ceremonies. This re-admission was not approved of by the accused, who formed a faction of the caste, who after an interval of six months distributed in the bazar to all classes, a leaflet describing the complainant as doshi (or sinner), which carried with it the penalty of excommunication from society. It was held that the indiscriminate circulation of the leaflet constituted defamation.[13]

5683. But neither this clause nor anything else in this explanation refers to a social dislike unconnected with the caste or calling of the accused. For instance, the killing of kine is wholly revolting to the religious and social instincts of Hindus. Where, therefore, the accused gave out that a Mahomedan who lived amidst Hindu surroundings, had killed a cow in his own compound, whereupon he was subjected to social denunciation, and who then complained of this offence, it was held that this explanation did not bring his case within the definition of the offence, inasmuch as such imputation could not be said to lower his moral or intellectual character, or to lower his character in respect of his caste or calling or to lower his credit. It was merely an imputation that he had done an act harmless in itself, but annoying to his neighbours.[14] The case would have been, of course, different if the accused had charged the complainant with killing a pig instead of a cow, in which case he would have suffered in respect of his caste. So it would seem if a person were to call a European a Eurasain, half-caste, or a pickaninny, the latter could not be said to suffer in his caste, though the epithet might be resented by him as insulting to him.

5684. The question of caste defamation is intimately connected with the question of privilege, and as often as there is the accusation of this offence, there is the defence of justification. The two questions are indeed, so intimately connected with each other that they will have to be rediscussed in the sequel (§§ 5773-5781).

Harm to Credit or Calling.

5685. Defamation affecting one's credit or calling may equally affect one's intellectual or moral character. The clauses are not thus mutually exclusive. For a merchant may be defamed by attacking his honesty or capacity for business as much as by detracting his financial stability. But such an imputation must be unequivocal, and at least used in a defamatory sense. For instance, if a person merely says: "I will not receive any cheques drawn on any of the branches of the Capital and Counties Bank," the inference is far fetched that the speaker intended any reflection upon the solvency of the Bank.[15] But the case would have been different if the speaker had added "for they cannot be expected to meet

(12) Ramanand, 3 A. 664.
(13) Thiagaraya v. Krishnaswami, 15 M. 214.
(14) Sikandar Khan v. Jammu, 5 C. P. L. R. (Cr.), 53.
(15) Capital and Counties Bank v. Henty and Sons, 5 C.P.D. 514, O. A. 7 App. Cas. 741.

all their liabilities." It is not defamatory to publish the fact that a person is indebted to another and the extent of his liability to him.(16) So where the creditor placarded the fact that the debtor's goods should be sold for payment of his debt, and the debtor, a solicitor, thereupon complained of undue publicity given to his financial strait which had the effect of injuring his practice, Bramwell, B., told the jury that in his opinion this was no libel, "because it was not libellous to publish of another that he owed money" and the jury returned a verdict of not guilty.(17) But this does not mean that one is licensed to proclaim another's indebtedness without necessity. For if a person had once become bankrupt, it is no reason to remind others of his misfortune years afterwards when his credit was thoroughly rehabilitated.

5686. Publication of Truth for Public Good.—The stringent provisions of the definition before set out would be unworkable, were it not for the salutary rules which the section recognises as special exceptions to criminal liability. Of these the first exception recognises the publication of truth as a sufficient justification if it is made for the public good. In this respect, the rule coincides with English Law as amended by Lord Campbell's Act, 1843,(18) which runs as follows:—

Exception 1.

"6. On the trial of any indictment of information for a defamatory libel, the defendant having pleaded such plea as hereinafter mentioned, the truth of the matter charged may be inquired into, but shall not amount to a defence, unless it was for the public benefit that the said matters charged should be published. To entitle the defendant to give evidence of the truth of such matters charged as a defence to such indictment or information, it shall be necessary for the defendant, in pleading to the said indictment or information, to allege the truth of the said matters charged in the manner now required in pleading a justification to an action for defamation, and further to allege that it was for the public benefit that the said matters charged should be published, and the particular fact or facts by reason whereof it was for the public benefit that the said matters charged should be published; to which plea the prosecutor shall be at liberty to reply generally denying the whole thereof. If after such plea the defendant shall be convicted on such indictment or information, it shall be competent to the Court in pronouncing sentence, to consider whether the guilt of the defendant is aggravated or mitigated by the said plea and by the evidence given to prove or disprove the same: Provided always, that the truth of the matters charged in the alleged libel complained of by such indictment or information shall in no case be inquired into without such plea of justification: Provided also, that in addition to such plea, it shall be competent to the defendant to plead a plea of not guilty: Provided also that nothing in this Act contained shall take away or prejudice any defence under the plea of not guilty which it is now competent to the defendant to make under such plea to any action or indictment, or information for defamatory words or libel."

5687. Under this provision the plea in defence would be a sufficient answer if the accused justified his libel on the ground that (i) it was true, and (ii) that its publication was for the public benefit, but (iii) such defence cannot be inquired into unless it is expressly pleaded. In this respect the Indian rule is not different for though there is no express provision in the Procedure Code compelling the accused to expressly plead

(16) Coghlan, (1865) 4 F. & F. 316.
(17) Coghlan, (1865) 4 F. & F. 316.
(18) 6 & 7 Vict., c. 96, s. 6. The law, as previously administered, did not admit truth as a justification; Burdett 4, B. & A. 95: Brigstock, 6 C. & P. 184; Lake v. Hatton, 11 Mod. 99, 5 Coke 125; De Libellis Famosis. It was even said that "the greater the truth, the greater the libel." And this maxim still remains good, except as modified by the Statute

his justification on the ground of truth, it is implied in section 106 of the Indian Evidence Act,[19] and this is what was probably meant by Straight, J., who said: "As a matter of practice, I must point out to the Judge that he should have required the counsel for the accused, distinctly and separately to put to Badrul Hasan (the complainant) in cross-examination, each and all of the matters upon which evidence was to be produced on the other side. Indeed, if an advocate fails to do this, it is a subject for serious consideration whether he should subsequently be allowed to tender proof as to the material incidents of which he has not cross-examined[20]. Of course, this rule of practice does not go far enough, and so far as it goes, it is apt to be abused. For to be kept within limits it requires that the accused shall cross-examine only on the points upon which he relies in his defence. It does not enable him to direct a general attack upon the character of the prosecutor, and thus defame him in Court in the guise of cross-examination, and further blast the very reputation for the protection of which he had come to Court.[21]

5688. Truth for the public benefit is then a sufficient justification of this offence, both under the English Law as well as under the Code. But under neither systems is truth any justification in case of defamation of the state, called sedition[22] or of one's religion.[23] And in a civil proceeding under both the systems, truth alone, apart from its public benefit, is a sufficient justification. This rule was recommended by the first Law Commissioners for adoption in the Code (§§ 5628-5629), but the Legislature considered its extension unjustifiable, unless it is published for the public benefit.

5689. What is Truth?—There must be then truth in the first place and this suggests the question what is truth? It is apprehended that where truth is set up as a defence it must extend to the entire libel. It is not sufficient that only a part of the libel is true, though this may be some mitigation in a civil suit for damages,[24] though it has no effect in a criminal proceeding. But the truth of an allegation need not be literally proved, for it will suffice if it is proved in substance. So where the accused was indicted for publishing a libel on the prosecutor contained in the following words: "L., B. and G. are a gang who live by card-sharping," and the accused justified the libel giving several specific instances in which persons named had been cheated by the trio at cards. Cockburn, C. J., held that it was sufficient to sustain the plea that two specific instances had been proved in substance, and that it was not necessary to prove the other instances alleged.[25] In this case the accused had proved two specific instances of cheating, which is sufficient to constitute a habit, but if he had only proved one instance, the verdict might have been different. So where the plaintiff was characterized a "libellous journalist," proof that he had libelled one man who had recovered from him £100 damages was held insufficient.[1] So where the libel was headed "How lawyer B

(19) Act I of 1872, s. 105.
(20) Dhum Singh, 6 A. 220.
(21) S. 500, Comm.
(22) S. 124; Duffy, 9 Ir. L. R. 329; O'Brien, 12 Ir. L. R. 29; M'Hugh, (1901) 2 Ir. L. R. 569.
(23) S. 298.
(24) Per Tindal, C. J., in Clarke v. Taylor, 2 Bing N. C. 664; McGregor v. Gregory, 11 M. & W. 287; Churchill v. Hunt, 2 B. & Ald. 685; Roberts v. Brown, 10 Bing. 519 Fleming v. Dollar, 23 Q. B. D. 388.
(25) Labouchere, 14 Cox. 419.
(1) Wakley v. Cooke and Healey, 19 L. J. Ex. 91.

treats his clients" followed by a report of a particular case in which one client of lawyer B had been badly treated, it was held that proof of one instance did not justify the heading which suggested that B generally treated his clients badly.(2) So the statement that the plaintiff, a proctor, had three times been suspended from practice for extortion is not justified by proof that he had been once so suspended.(3)

5690. So where the defendant had published an article exposing the "homicidal tricks of those imprudent and ignorant scamps who had the audacity to pretend to cure all diseases with one kind of pill, and that several of the rotgut rascals had been convicted of manslaughter and fined and imprisoned for killing people with enormous doses of their universal vegetable boluses" adding that the plaintiff's system was "one of wholesale poisoning," and it was proved at the trial that the plaintiff's pills, when taken in large doses, as recommended by the plaintiffs, were highly dangerous, deadly, and poisonous, and that two persons had died in consequence of taking large quantities of them, and that the people who administered these pills were tried, convicted, and imprisoned for the manslaughter of these two persons, it was held a sufficient justification, although the expressions "scamps," "rascals" and "wholesale poisoning" had not been fully substantiated, though the main charge and gist of the libel had been amply sustained.(4)

The defendant-company from time to time published by way of warning notices of persons convicted of travelling without a ticket. As such, they published a notice stating that the plaintiff had been convicted of travelling without a ticket and sentenced to a fine of £1 or three weeks' imprisonment in default. As a matter of fact the period of imprisonment in default of payment of fine was only a fortnight and not three weeks as alleged. But the error was held to be immaterial as it could not have made any difference in the effect which the notice would produce on the mind of the public.(5) But the error was held to be material where the plaintiff who had been convicted of a breach of a bye-law and fined one shilling was described as having been fined one shilling, or in default to imprisonment for three days WITH HARD LABOUR, the last three words being printed on a separate line in large capital letters.(6) So where the defendant described the plaintiff as having challenged his opponent to a duel, and then spent the whole of the night preceding in practising with his pistol, killing his opponent, for which he was guilty of murder, proof that the plaintiff had killed his opponent and had been tried for murder was insufficient, for the charge of pistol practising was considered a separate and substantial charge and it was not justified.(7)

Only Truth of Libel must be Proved.

5691. Then again, it is no answer to a charge to prove the truth of one imputation, when the imputation complained of is different. For instance, if a person charged another for being a habitual seducer of women, proof that he had been convicted of theft or other offences would be no justification, but rather an aggravation of the crime. So

(2) Bishop v. Latimer, 4 L. T. 775.
(3) Clarkson v. Lawson, 6 Bing. 266.
(4) Morrison v. Harmer, 3 Bing. N. C. 707; Edsall v. Russell, 4 M. & Gr. 1090.
(5) Alexander v. North Eastern Ry. Co., 34 L. J. Q. B. 152.
(6) Gaynn v. S. E. Ry. Co., 18 L. T. 738; Biggs v. G. E. Ry. Co., 16 W. R. (Eng.) 908.
(7) Helsham v. Blackwood, 11 C.B. 128.

where the complaint relates to a charge made against himself, the accused cannot justify it by proving its truth against his servant. As A. L. Smith, L. J., said: "He puts on record what in substance amounts to a statement that the plaintiff's men are rogues, but not the plaintiff himself. It is like pleading to a statement of claim, alleging that the defendant had said the plaintiff stole a pair of boots, that what the defendant said was that the plaintiff's footman stole the boots, and that was true."(8) From this it follows that the accused justifying his libel cannot both deny as well as justify it. He could not be heard to say: "I am charged with calling B a knave; I say I never said it, but if I did I was right."

As Lord Coleridge, C. J., puts it(9) adopting the words of Byles, J.(10): "The law is plain that, if you wish to dispute the sense given to the words in the libel, you must do so by the plea of not guilty, and if you wish to justify, you must confess and avoid." This rule is not based upon any artificial rule of English pleading but upon the sound sense recognized in another connection that the same person cannot be heard to affirm and deny at the same time; he cannot blow hot and cold. A libeller cannot be permitted to set up hypothetical defences, the success of which must depend upon the truth of one out of two or more inconsistent statements. Nor can he materially vary the complainant's version and then offer evidence to justify it. For such evidence would be in proof of a statement never alleged, and it can have no relevancy in justifying the statement alleged, but not admitted by the accused. For instance, if A complained against B for having charged him with theft of some tablets excavated in Asiatic Turkey; B could not be heard in defence to say that he had only said that the men employed by A had stolen such tablets and that he was prepared to prove that fact. Such defence amounts to a denial of A's charge and it does not let in evidence of the theft.(11)

Existence of Rumour is No Defence.

5692. Then again what is admissible under this exception is proof of the truth of the libel and not of its persistency. The fact that a certain statement is in every body's mouth is no proof of its truth. It may, indeed, be the very reverse, and at any rate, it is inadmissible to establish the defence of justification under this exception. For if A says that the complainant B is insolvent, it is no justification for B to repeat the statement either in a qualified or unqualified form. He cannot, for instance, go about telling his friends. "A says that B is insolvent," and it is no defence to him that A had in fact told him so.(12) For A may have told a lie, but would that justify B in repeating it? A person who hears a libellous statement made concerning another, is at least bound to take ordinary precaution of keeping it to himself till he is convinced of its truth. He has no right to take it for granted that it is true, and thus give a wider publicity to a calumny which, but for his publication might have died with its orginator. So it is agreed that a previous publication by another of the same defamatory words is no justification for their repetition; still less is it any evidence of their truth.(13) Each repetition is a fresh defamation, and the accused by

(8) Rassam v. Budge, (1893) 1 Q. B. 571 (576, 577).
(9) Rassam v. Budge, (1893) 1 Q. B. 571 (574, 575).
(10) In Bremridge v. Latimer, 12 W. R. (Eng.) 878 (879).
(11) Rassam v. Budge, (1893) 1 Q. B. 571 (576); following Bremridge v. Latimer, 12 W. R. 878 (879).
(12) M'Pherson v. Daniels, 10 B. & C. 263.
(13) Newman, 22 L. J. Q. B. 156.

repeating A's words has made them his own, and is as legally liable as if he had invented the story himself. "To succeed in the action, the defendant must not merely show that A did in fact say so, but must go on to prove that every statement which A is reported to have made is true in substance and in fact."(14) But if he proves its truth the fact that he heard it from A is immaterial, for what is material is its truth and not the source of its publication.

5693. Publication must be for Public Good.—Secondly, no amount of truth will justify a libel unless its publication was for the public good. This is an essential part of the rule, and one without which truth goes for nothing. The question whether the publication was or was not for the public good is declared to be a question of fact: and it is dependent upon the matter published, the nature, occasion and extent of the publicity and the actual good thereby accomplished. For example, it may be for the public good to publish a fact, but it may not be for the public good to give it undue publicity, in which case its publication could not be justified under his exception and on the ground that what the accused had published was true and that its publication was for the public good. The complainant had been put out of caste by a panchayat of his caste-people, on the ground of his alleged improper intimacy between him and a woman of his caste, whereupon the accused who were members of the panchayat, circulated a letter to the members of their caste generally, stating that the complainant and the woman had both been put out of caste and the reason for the same, and requesting the members of the caste not to receive them into their houses or to dine with them. It was held that though the panchayat had acted within its rights, and so would have been probably the accused if they not only contented themselves by circulating the fact of the complainant's excommunication and the reason therefor, but they went out of their way in suggesting that the complainant had committed an offence by having improper relations with the woman, and in saying so they had brought themselves within the penal visitation of the section.(15)

In another case the prosecutor (N) had similarly incurred the social displeasure of his caste people by attendinng a widow-marriage which though legal(16) was opposed to the views of the orthodox community and whereupon his guru S published a circular proclaiming N an outcaste and forbidding his disciples and the public in general to associate with N until he had duly atoned for his sin. He also sent a registered postcard of similar purport to N. It was held that though the accused's publication to his disciples was privileged, his publication of the fact to the complainant in an open postcard which might have been read, even by those who were not his disciples, rendered his act criminal, by reason of the undue publicity given to the sentence passed on N.(17) In delivering his judgment, Muttusamy Aiyyar, J. referring to the words of this exception, said: "The first exception is, no doubt inapplicable to this case, and it cannot be said that the denunciation of an act expressly sanctioned by the Legislature, as the widow-marriage is by Act XV of 1856, is conducive to public good within the meaning of the Indian Penal Code. It seems to me that the act denounced must be some unpermitted act, and that the (14) Odger's Libel, (4th Ed.), 178.

(15) Ramanand, 3 A. 664.
(16) Act XV of 1856.
(17) Sankara, 6 M. 381; Madanjit, 4 Bur. L. T. 48, 9 I. C. 775.

good contemplated, must be that of the general public as contra-distinguished from what is regarded as a spiritual benefit by a particular sect."[18] The learned Judge then went on to add that the act of the accused though not protected under this exception, was still protected under exception 7.

5694. The view that undue publicity given to truth takes the case out of this exception, has been followed in Bombay by Jardine, J., in a case in which the accused, who was a Municipal Commissioner of Thana wrote to the Secretary of the Municipality, asking him why the Municipality was employing the complainant as its Inspector, for he was a dismissed servant of the Local Board, "and it is understood that he is also dismissed from the Forest Department and that the said Inspector is also fined by the Local Board." Before the Municipality could take any action on his letter, the accused published the letter in a newspaper and thereupon the complainant prosecuted him both for sending the letter to the Secretary as well as to the newspaper. The imputations made were true and held to have been made in good faith, but nevertheless the accused was convicted because of the undue publicity given to them.[19]

The publication of a private communication in a newspaper has ordinarily been regarded as sufficient to forfeit the benefit of this exception, unless there are other weighty reasons to justify it. But the fact that a certain matter is of public interest, is not alone sufficient to publish it in the papers; nor is such publication privileged because it purports to be a report of the proceedings of a public body. The defendants published in their newspaper at Manchester a report of the proceedings of a meeting of the board of guardians for a poor law union at which ex parte charges were made against the plaintiff, who was the medical officer of the union workhouse, of negligence in not attending to the pauper patients when sent for. The defendants justified their publication on the ground of privilege, alleging that being a report of the proceedings, it was as privileged as the publication of a judicial or parliamentary proceeding. But the Court of Appeal[20] held that though the matter was certainly one of public interest, still that alone did not justify its publication in the public press - still less because the complaint was ex parte and had not been till then inquired into and was in fact untrue.[21] But if it was untrue, its publication could not be defended on the ground of public good, for it can never be conducive to public good to publish a falsehood.

What is Public Good ?

5695. But if the imputation made is true, it may then be protected if it is made for the public good. This raises the question, what is public good. Primarily the term "public good" implies good of the public which term has been defined to include any class of the public or any community.[22] It would, of course, justify the publication of matters for the good of the State, Government and other public institutions, such as the Army and Navy and the Church, public justice and the departments of public instruction and public works and in fact all departments in which public servants

(18) Sankara, 6 M. 381; Madanjit, 1 Bur. L. T. 48, 9 I. C. 775.

(19) Janardhan, 19 B. 703; following Pursell v. Sowler, 1 C. P. D. 781, O. A. 2 C. P. D. 215; Sankara, 6 M. 381 (306); Thiagaraya v. Krishnaswami, 15 M. 214 (217); followed in Leandro Mascarenhas, (1895) B. U. C. C. 700 (771).

(20) Cockburn, C. J., Mellish, L. J., Baggallay, J. A., and Bramwell, J. A.

(21) Per Mellish, L. J., in Purcell v. Sowler, C. P. D. 215 (221, 222).

(22) S. 12.

are employed,[23] whose acts and proceedings are of public importance, so that the publication of a truthful imputation concerning them should be prima facie for the public good. So in England a criticism directed against the conduct of public men, such as Ministers, Generals, Judges and members of public bodies, has been held to be privileged. But besides these there are others who are equally within the rule. Such are, for instance, authors, actors, lawyers, doctors, and in fact all other professional men whose acts concern the welfare of the public, so that the publication of truth concerning them would be protected if it was for the public good.

Again, a subject may become one of public interest if the public or any section of it become interested in it. Such, for example, may be the question, whether Hindus returning home from Europe should be re-admitted into the caste, or whether marriage expenses should not be curtailed, or whether widow marriage should be tolerated, or whether converts to other faiths should be re-admitted within the fold of Hinduism, in all of which cases it should be justifiable to publish facts bearing upon the question. But in such cases it would not legalize the publication of lampoons by persons under no legal or social duty or obligation to contribute to the discussion. The question of privilege is then intimately bound up with the interest of the community, and it may be that the publication of one person was privileged, though it did not justify the same publication by another.

5696. But the rule is different if the matter be of national importance in which all persons have equally a right to feel interested. Such was the case of the defendant who had published a libel upon the plaintiff, a naval architect in connection with his plan for converting the old wooden line of battleships of the British Navy into ironclad turretships. The libel complained of was in fact a report prepared by the defendant, subjecting the plaintiff's plan to a scientific criticism, which concluded with the following words upon which alone the charge of libel was based. "These plans would have no weight whatever from the known antecedents of their author, but they derived weight from the approval of Mr. Watts, the late Chief Constructor of the Navy." It was contended that these words contained an innuendo that the plans submitted by the plaintiff were worthless. The Court held that the innuendo made was privileged, on the ground "that every man has a right to discuss freely, so long as he does it honestly and without malice, any subject in which the public are generally interested, to state his own views and to advance those of others for the consideration of all or any of those who have a common interest in the subject, and that, whilst he does so, he has a privilege attaching to such right of free discussion, of the same character which has been held to attach in numerous instances in which liberty of speech has been allowed upon grounds of public and social convenience, where the speaker or writer and the person or persons addressed have had a duty or interest in common, the existence of which is held to rebut the inference of malice."[24]

Public Interest Distinguished.

5697. It will be observed that where a matter is one of public interest, it is not even necessary that the imputation should be true if it is made in good faith. This is exceptions 2 and 3 (§§ 5698-5710). The salient difference between those exceptions and this would then appear to be this—that while the imputation in this case must be true, good faith being immaterial, the imputation protected by those exceptions must be made in good faith, it being then immaterial, whether it was or was not true. It then follows that if the publication was both true and made in good faith, it is immaterial if it was also malicious and made by the maker with no thought to the public good. But if it is not true, then good faith necessarily implies the absence of malice and the presence of a certain degree of honesty.[25]

(23) S. 21.

(24) Per Brett, J. cited with approval by Willes, J., in Henwood v. Harrison, L. R. 7 C. P. 606 (621).

5698. Criticism of Public Servants.—This is especially necessary where the person affected by the imputation is a public servant. As has been elsewhere remarked, public servants are an object of special solicitude on the part of the legislature, for the nature of their duties enjoins observance by them of a higher code of ethics, as it entitles them to a special measure of protection. So the Procedure Code prescribes a summary remedy for taking security for keeping the peace from a person who "disseminates or attemps to disseminate, or in anywise abets the dissemination of any matter concerning a Judge which amounts to criminal intimidation or defamation under the Indian Penal Code.[1] And since the term "defamation" in the Procedure Code has been obviously used in the sense here defined, it follows that though the remedy there prescribed is summary, the exceptions to which the accused may appeal in each case are the same. Indeed, so far as regards this exception, there is nothing in it which would not equally apply to a civil suit for damages. So Couch, J., referring to this exception and exception 9, said: "These are provisions of the criminal law; but the same rules ought to be applied to civil proceedings for defamation; and where a person would not be punishable under the criminal law, he ought not to be liable to pay damages to the person upon whose conduct or character he has expressed an opinion or made an imputation."[2]

Exception 2.

These observations were made in a case in which the plaintiff E. I. Howard, Director of the Public Instruction in the Bombay Presidency, had sued the printer of the Times of India for defaming him in a series of articles in which the defendant accused the plaintiff of prostituting his official position for the purpose of securing private gain made on the sale of school books, of which he had improperly appropriated the copyright. The defendant justified the publication on the ground of truth, and at any rate as made bona fide and for the public good adverting to which the learned Judge said: "Every subject has a right to comment on those acts of public men which concern him as a subject of the realm, if he does not make his commentary a cloak for malice and slander. A writer in the public press has the same right as any other person, and it is his privilege if indeed, it is not his duty, to comment on the acts of public men which concern not himself only but which concern the public and the discussion for which is for the public good. And where a person makes the public conduct of a public man the subject of comment and it is for the public good, he is not

(25) S. 52.
(1) S. 108 (c), Cr. P. C.
(2) Howard v. Mull, 1 Bom. H. C. R. (App.) 85 (91).

liable to an action if the comments are made honestly, and he honestly believes the facts to be as he states them, and there is no wilful misrepresentation of fact or any misstatement which he must have known to be a misstatement if he had exercised ordinary care."(3) Applying these principles the Court found that the defendant had given no evidence of the truth of the imputation and disbelieving the evidence as to the writer's good faith, it awarded Rs. 2,500 damages to the plaintiff, adding: "A person whether the publisher of a newspaper or otherwise, unless he acts in good faith, cannot, by saying that he is seeking for a public inquiry into the conduct of a public man, exempt himself from liability for publishing matter of a defamatory nature."(4)

So in another case, the accused, the editor of a local newspaper, published an article referring to the rule for admission into the public service and complaining of the Collector having employed a clerk in the following words: "Has his (the complainant's) character been inquired into? Does no one remember that this very man was sent by the Subordinate Judge of Sholapur to be prosecuted? Are not the proceedings instituted by the Subordinate Judge to be found on the record?" The Magistrate found that it was literally true that the complainant had been prosecuted, but it was equally true that the prosecution had, to the accused's knowledge, been withdrawn, whereupon M. Melvill and F. Melvill, JJ., held that although the statement made by the accused contained only the truth yet it contained only half the truth, and it was not for the public good that an imputation should be conveyed by a statement which was misleading because it was incomplete."(5) Good faith does not imply merely the absence of ill-will, for there may be neither ill-will nor good faith.(6) And this exception requires the presence of good faith which presupposes a reasonable degree of care and caution in making an imputation which is on its face libellous. In such cases, the accused may not be able to establish the truth of his imputation, but he must at least show that he had reasonable grounds for publishing it. Failing to show himself truthful, he must at least show that he was an honest blunderer and not merely a reckless gossip.

5699. What Opinion is Protected?—But this does not mean that the imputation may be based upon nothing, or that if it is alleged to be based upon a fact it is protected even though the fact alleged is not a fact. For what this section is enacted to protect is an "opinion" and not a statement of fact, though it may be even in the form of an opinion. And so if an utterance contained both a statement of fact as well as an expression of opinion, the latter cannot be justified unless the former is proved. For as Kennedy, J., said: "A comment cannot be fair which is built upon facts which are not truly stated."(7) So it was said in another case: "That a fair and bona fide comment on a matter of public interest is an excuse of what would otherwise be a defamatory publication, is admitted. The very statement, however, of this rule assumes the matters of fact commented upon to be somehow or other ascertained. It does not mean that a man may invent facts, and comment on the facts so invented in what would be a fair and bona fide

(3) Howard v. Mull, 1 Bom. H. C. R. (App.) 85 (91).
(4) Howard v. Mull, 1 Bom. H. C. R. (App.) 85. p. 97.
(5) Kakde, 4 B. 298.
(6) Palani Asari, (1882) 1 Weir. 613.
(7) Joynt v. Cycle Trading Co., (1904) 2 K. B. 292 (294).

manner on the supposition that the facts were true. If the facts, as a comment upon which the publication is sought to be excused, do not exist, the foundation of the plea fails.[8]

This was emphasized by Lord Herschell, L. C. who in delivering the judgment of the Privy Council said:[9] "There is no doubt that the public acts of a public man may lawfully be made the subject of fair comment or criticism, not only by the press, but by all members of the public. But the distinction cannot be too clearly borne in mind between comment or criticism and allegations of fact, such as that disgraceful acts have been committed, or discreditable language used. It is one thing to comment upon or criticize, even with severity, the acknowledged or proved acts of a public man, and quite another to assert that he has been guilty of particular acts of misconduct."[10] These observations occur in a case in which the appellants published a libellous attack upon the respondent who was the Resident Commissioner in Zululand, in their paper called the Natal Witness in which they charged the respondent with incompetency to discharge the duties of that office adding that from information received, if correct, the respondent had maltreated, abused and assaulted some Zulu chiefs. In a later issue of the same paper, the appellants returned to the attack adding that the fuller details since received confirmed their previous information. But, as a matter of fact, the appellants had received no information, and the Privy Council then held that as the opinion expressed by the appellants was alleged to be founded upon facts, it could not be justified unless the facts alleged were proved.[11]

5700. Of course, as already observed (§ 5691) where what is required to be proved is a fact, its proof cannot be dispensed with or excused by proof of a rumour howmuchsoever persistent, though if the fact was falsely stated by the informer, the person receiving it without verification though after reasonable scrutiny, may well plead justification. The accused published a report, stated to be "From inquiries made by our reporter," that the mother of a deceased lady had applied for the exhumation of her body, because she had been killed by her husband about whose cruelty to her it contained a graphic description. It was proved that the reporter upon whose inquiries the whole report was alleged to be based, had made no inquiry at all: he had merely read certain affidavits made ex parte which were in fact wholly false. It was held that the accused was not justified in publishing the libel and he was fined £50.[12] So where the accused published a book entitled "Letters from a staff officer in the Crimea" in which he observed that Lord Cardigan was not present when most needed, owing to his horse taking fright, swerving and galloping to the rear, but in a note it was added that the author had relied on statements furnished by officers actually engaged in the charge, but as the excellence of Lord Cardigan's horsemanship is unquestionable, the idea that his horse ran away with him is no doubt erroneous. There was no evidence that the statements were based upon the account given by

(8) Lefroy v. Burnside (No. 2) 4 L. R. Ir. 556 (565, 566).
(9) Davis v. Shepstone, 11 App. Cas. 187 (190).
(10) Ib.
(11) Ib., at pp. 190, 191.
(12) Andrew Gray, 26 L. J. P. 668.

any such officer, and the Court of Queen's Bench thereupon held the statement to be libellous.(13)

So where a Dublin newspaper asserted that the plaintiff who was the manager of the Queen's Printing Office in Ireland had corruptly supplied Freeman's Journal with official information and surreptitious copies of official documents, it was held that the defendant having failed to prove that fact, could not fall back upon fair comment and bona fide belief that such information got in advance of other papers could not have been otherwise obtained.(14) The same principle underlay the case of the defendant who wrote "A History of New Zealand" in which he charged the plaintiff, a lieutenant in the Kai Iwi cavalry with having charged at some women and young children who were harmlessly hunting pigs and cut them down gleefully and with ease, that he had dismissed a subordinate who protested against his barbarity and that he was ever afterwards nicknamed by the Maoris as "Koburn" (the murderer). The defendant justified these facts on the ground that they had been reported to the Governor of New Zealand by a hearsay witness who forwarded a copy of it to him. Huddleston, B., told the jury that it was no defence whatever that the charges were made in the bona fide belief that they were true and without any malice towards the plaintiff.(15) An Indian Judge would have said that there was no good faith in publishing defamatory statements professedly hearsay. So where the defendant stated that the Marquis of Salisbury had given the plaintiff a cheque to be used "in connection with the so called fair trade meeting of the unemployed which preceded the riotous meetings in Trafalgar Square," Huddleston, B., held that there was no defence for the statement except an absolute justification.(16)

5701. It is thus clear that law discriminates between a mere comment and a statement of fact, and that where the one is based upon the other the latter must be positively proved, otherwise the comment cannot be justified. But if the fact is proved, it does not necessarily follow that the comment is then justifiable, for even (i) the comment must be made in good faith and (ii) it must be confined to (a) the conduct of a public servant, or (b) to his character so far as it appears in that conduct. And a line must be drawn between hostile criticism on a man's public conduct, and the motive by which that conduct may be supposed to have been influenced; there is no right to impute to a man in his conduct as a citizen, even though it be open to disapprobation any base, sordid, dishonest or wicked motive, without any just cause for any such imputation. Any mistaken belief in the existence of any such motive is no justification and will be no defence to a charge of defamation.(17)

(i) Opinion must be Fair and Honest.

5702. The first implies that the opinion expressed is fair and honest, though it may be otherwise erroneous. "It is always for the Judge to say whether the document is capable in law of being a libel. It is,

(13) Calthorpe, 27 J. P. 581.
(14) Lefroy v. Burnside, (No. 2), 4 L. R. Ir. 557.
(15) Bryce v. Rusden, (1886) 2 T. L. R. 435; Brenon v. Ridgway, (1887) 3 T. L. R. 592.
(16) Peters v. Bradlaugh, (1888) 4 T. L. R. 467.
(17) Hiranand, 76 I. C. (S.) 230.

however, for the plaintiff, who rests his claim upon a document which on his own statement purports to be a criticism of a matter of public interest, to show that it is a libel, i.e., that it travels beyond the limits of fair criticism, and therefore it must be for the Judge to say whether it is capable of being so interpreted. If it is not, there is no question for the jury, and it would be competent for him to give judgment for the defendant."(18) "What is the meaning of a 'fair comment'"? said Lord Esher, M.R.; "I think the meaning is this: Is the article, in the opinion of the jury, beyond that which any fair man, however, prejudiced, or however strong his opinion may be, would say of the work in question? Every latitude must be given to opinion and to prejudice, and then an ordinary set of men with ordinary judgment must say whether any fair man would have made such a comment on the work. It is very easy to say, what would be clearly beyond that limit; if, for instance, the writer attacked the private character of the author. But it is much more difficult to say what is within the limit. That must depend upon the circumstances of the particular case.... Mere exaggeration, or even gross exaggeration, would not make the comment unfair. However wrong the opinion expressed may be in point of truth, or however prejudiced the writer, it may still be within the prescribed limit. The question which the jury must consider is this: Would any fair man, however exaggerated or obstinate his views, have said that which this criticism has said."(19)

"The criticism is to be 'fair,' that is, the expression of it is to be fair. The only limitation is upon the mode of expression. In this country a man has right to hold any opinion he pleases, and to express his opinion, provided that he does not go beyond the limits which the law calls 'fair' and although we cannot find in any decided case an exact and rigid definition of the word 'fair,' this is because the Judges have always preferred to leave the question what is 'fair' to the jury ....It must be assumed that a man is entitled to entertain any opinion he pleases, however wrong, exaggerated, or violent it may be, and it must be left to the jury to say whether the mode of expression exceeds the reasonable limits of fair criticism."(20) "The comment must be such that a fair mind would use under the circumstances, and it must not misstate facts because a comment cannot be fair which is built upon facts, which are not truly stated, and further, it must not convey imputations of an evil sort, except so far as the facts truly stated warrant the imputation."(21)

5703. An opinion cannot be held to be honest and fair or given in good faith if instead of attacking the work, it attacks the individual by ascribing to him base and sordid motives or drags into the discussion the events of his past and private life, the only object of which could be the gratification of private malice. So Cockburn, C.J.,

(18) Per Collins, M. R. in McQuire v. Western Morning News Co., (1903) 2 K. B. 100 (108, 111, 112): Kookey v. Edeveain, (1897) 14 T. L. R. 34.

(19) Merivale and Wife v. Carson, 20 Q. B. D. 275 (280, 281).

(20) Ib., per Bowen, L. J., pp. 283, 284; to the same effect, Wason v. Walter, L. R. 4 Q. B. D. 73 (96).

(21) Per Kennedy, J., in Joynt v. Cycle Trade Publishing Co., (1904) 2 K. B. 292 (294); Fernandez, 13 Bom. L. R. 1187, 12 I. C. 971, 12 Cr. L. J. 595.

said: "A line must be drawn between criticism upon public conduct and the imputation of motives by which that conduct may be supposed to be actuated; one man has no right to impute to another, whose conduct may be open to ridicule or disapprobation, base, sordid and wicked motives, unless there is so much ground for the imputation that a jury shall find, not only that he had an honest belief in the truth of his statement, but that his belief was not without foundation....I think the fair position in which the law may be settled, is this: That where the public conduct of a public man is open to animadversion, and the writer who is commenting upon it makes imputations on his motives, which arise fairly and legitimately out of his conduct, so that the jury shall say that the criticism was not only honest but also well founded, an action is not maintainable. But it is not because a public writer fancies that the conduct of a public man is open to the suspicion of dishonesty, he is therefore, justified in assailing his character as dishonest."(22) An article published in the Saturday Review imputed to the plaintiff a motive that in advocating the evangelization of China in his paper the British Empire, he was anxious only to increase the circulation of his own paper and so put more money into his own pocket; that he was an imposter, and that he had issued a list of fictitious subscribers to induce others to subscribe. The jury found that the writer honestly believed the imputations contained in the article to be well founded, but the Court held the proper limits of fair criticism to have been exceeded.(23)

5704. The same view was taken in the case of the Hampshire Advertiser which imputed to the plaintiff who was the ex-mayor of Winchester, partiality, and corruption and ignorance of his duties as mayor and justice of the peace for the borough, whereupon Parke, B., held the libel proved adding that while "every subject has a right to comment on those acts of public men which concern him as a subject of the realm, if he do not make his commendatory a cloak for malice and slander; but any imputation of wicked or currupt motives is unquestionably libellous."(24) Cockburn, C. J., gave a similar direction to the jury in the case of the plaintiff, a Q. C. and a Member of Parliament who being appointed Recorder of Newcastle, the Law Magazine and Review declared it to have been a reward for the plaintiff having steadily voted for his party, whereupon Cockburn, C. J., told the jury that while a public writer was fairly entitled to comment on the distribution of Government patronage still he was entitled to assert that there had been a corrupt promise or understanding that the plaintiff would be thus rewarded if he always voted according to order. The jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff, but the damages awarded was only 40*s*.(25)

The plaintiff who falsely described himself as an M. D., advertised a new cure for consumption which he claimed to have invented. The Pall Mall Gazette denounced him as a quack and an impostor like (22) Campbell v. Spottiswoode, 32 L. J. Q. B. 199; to the same effect, per Vaughan Williams, L. J., in Joynt v. Cycle Trade Publishing Co., (1904) 2 Q. B. 292 (298).

(23) Campbell v. Spottiswoode, 32 L. J. Q. B. 199.

(24) Parmiter v. Coupland, 8 L. J. Ex 202.

(25) Seymour v. Butterworth, 3 F. & F. 372.

"scoundrels who alter, base and forge coin." There was evidence that the plaintiff held only an American diploma and that his publication contained statements that were fallacious, delusive, exaggerated, and alarming. Cockburn, C. J., directed the jury that if the defendant really believed that the plaintiff's system of treatment was worthless "then he had a right to maintain that it was so; and that, even if in drawing inferences of imposture and bad intention he fell into error, yet if he wrote honestly, and with the intention of exercising his vocation as a public writer fairly and with reasonable moderation and judgment, he is entitled to the verdict."(1) A public writer is not to be held liable for failing to prove all he has written to the letter: it is a question for the jury whether, under the circumstances, misstatements contained in a commentary or criticism were made recklessly, and with a want of ordinary care and caution.(2) On this ground cases have been decided in which rasping criticism of public servants has been held to be justifiable, though it was couched in a language all of which could not be literally justified.

(ii) Personal Attack Not Privileged.

5705. But as has been already observed, a fair criticism does not justify a personal invective. So Crompton, J., said: "It is the right of all the Queen's subjects to discuss public matters; but no person can have a right on that ground to publish what is defamatory merely because he believes it to be true. If this were so, a public man might have base motives imputed to him without having an opportunity of righting himself.(3) So, in the same case, Cockburn, C. J., said: "Public affairs could not be conducted by men of honour with a view to the welfare of the country, if we were to sanction attacks upon them, destructive of their honour and character, and made without any foundation. I think the fair position in which the law may be settled is this: that where the public conduct of a public man is open to animadversion, and the writer who is commenting upon it makes imputations on his motives which arise fairly and legitimately out of his conduct, so that a jury shall say that the criticism was not only honest, but also well founded, an action is not maintainable. But it is not because a public writer fancies that the conduct of a public man is open to the suspicion or dishonesty, that he is therefore justified in assailing his character as dishonest."(4) This is exactly what is here enacted. It is not defamation to attack the conduct of a public servant in the discharge of his public functions, and in doing so one may even attack his character, but it must be only so far as it appears in that conduct. For instance, it is perfectly legitimate to pass strictures upon the severity of sentences passed by a judge attributing it to his inexperience, but it would be wrong to attribute it to his racial prejudice unless there is some other fact to support that inference (§§ 5686-5688).

5706. Indeed, it will often happen that criticism, though otherwise bona fide, is couched in language which is susceptible of being con-

(1) Hunter v. Sharp, 4 F. & F. 983.
(2) Per Erle, C. J., in Turnbull v. Bird, 2 F. & F. 526.
(3) Campbell v. Spottiswoode, 3 B. & S. 369 (779); Bryce v. Rusden, 2 T. L. R. 435; Parmiter v. Coupland, 6 M. & W. 107.
(4) Campbell v. Sporttiswoode, 3 B. & S. 369 (776).

strued as defamatory. But in such a case, some allowance must be made for human infirmity and the warmth of feeling aroused by the discussion. In that case, those who fill "a public position must not be tóo thin-skinned in reference to comments made upon them. It would often happen that observations would be made upon public men which they knew from the bottom of their hearts were undeserved and unjust; yet they must bear with them, and submit to be misunderstood for a time, because all knew that the criticism of the press was the best security for the proper discharge of public duties."(5)

5707. So even a private question may become a public question if the attention of the question is directed to it. So where the defendant presented a petition to Parliament praying for the removal of a Judge on the ground that he had thirty-two years before, when a barrister, falsely pledged his honour for the purpose of deceiving an election committee of the House of Commons, the question referred to in the petition became a matter of high public concern on which all newspapers were justified in commenting and in severe terms.(6) So a private question may become a public one if the public are called upon to support it. The prosecutor Dr. Hall of Allahabad, inserted an advertisement inviting public subscriptions to his eye hospital. The accused, who was the editor of the Indian Medical Gazette, stigmatized this advertisement as unprofessional, adding: "The medical transactions of the institution are set forth in the advertisement. The advertiser is certainly entitled to be congratulated on his marvellous success; but it is hardly consistent with the feelings and usages of the medical profession to herald them forth in this fashion. We are not surprised to find that the line he has elected to adopt has not met with the approval of his brother-officers serving in the same province, and we have no hesitation in pronouncing his proceedings in this matter unprofessional." Hall prosecuted the editor and publisher of the paper who justified their libel under exceptions 1, 3, 6, and 9, and Stuart, C. J., held that though Hall's eye infirmary was private, he had made it a public question by his advertisement for public subscription and he had, moreover, further submitted it to the judgment of the public within the meaning of exception 6 and the publication was, moreover, held to be protected by exception 9.(7) So the presentation of a petition to Parliament against quack doctors is a matter for public comment,(8) and so is also the appointment of an individual to an office under Government.(9)

5708. So the public career of a member of Parliament, or of any candidate for Parliament, is a matter of public interest in the constituency, but not his private life and history. As Denman, C. J., said: "However large the privilege of electors may be, it is extravagant to suppose that it can justify the publication to all the world of facts injurious to a person who happens to stand in the situation of a candidate.(10) So the capacity

(5) Per Cockburn, C. J. in Seymour v. Butterworth, 3 F. & F. 372 (376, 377).
(6) Wason v. Walter, L. R. 4 Q. B. 1.
(7) McLeod, 3 A. 342.
(8) Dunne v. Anderson, 3 Bing. 88.
(9) Seymour v. Butterworth, 3 F. & F. 372; Turnbull v. Bird, 2 F. & F. 508; Lefroy v. Burnside (No. 2), 4 L. R. (Ir.) 556.
(10) Duncombe v. Daniell, 8 C. & P. 222.

of a naval architect who had prepared a plan for adoption by the Admiralty, was held to be a matter of public interest so that a report thereon of the Board of Admiralty is privileged.(11) So evidence taken before a Royal Commission is a matter publici juris and everyone has a perfect right to criticise it.(12) So a public meeting convened whether to deliberate or to hear an address, is a matter of public interest justifying a fair comment on the conduct thereat of all persons who take any part therein.(13) A question may thus become public not only by reason of its character and importance to the community, but by the fact of its having been submitted to the public judgment. So the working of all public institutions such as colleges and schools, hospitals and hotels, serais, railways, post office and the telegraph, municipalities, district councils and local boards, asylums and homes are matters of public interest so that persons connected therewith or writing thereon may be the subject of this exception. So in England it has been held that the management of the poor and the administration of the poor-law in each local district, are matters of public interest,(14) so is the official conduct of a way-warden,(15) but a private trust is not such a matter(16) though a public benevolence such as a Hindu or Mahomedan endowment, or the Christian church or charity are such matters.(17)

5709. Criticism on Public Question.—In this, as indeed, in all other respects, the rule is the same whether the subject of criticism be a public servant or a public question. It may even be added that the true rule rather relates to the public question than to the person whether a public servant or otherwise. For an opinion respecting the conduct of a public servant in the discharge of his public functions is really an opinion touching a public question within the meaning of Exception 3. This was evidently present in the minds of the draftsmen who referring to this exception wrote: "There are public men who are not public functionaries; persons who hold no office may yet take a very active part in urging or opposing the adoption of measures in which the community is deeply interested. It is clear, therefore, that every person ought to be allowed to comment in good faith on the proceedings of these volunteer servants of the public, with the same freedom with which he is allowed to comment on the proceedings of the official servants of the public."(18) Consequently, the rules applicable to public servants apply equally to all persons concerned with any public question. Such a question must, it is apprehended, be one in which the public are interested. It must in fact be a question affecting the public good (§§ 5686-5689, 5695)—a question which relates to the Government or any of its public departments, its relations with its allies, tributaries and foreign countries, its act and measures, plans and policy, the laws proposed and enacted, the collection of taxes, and indeed all matters which affect the public welfare,

Exception 3.

(11) Henwood v. Harrison, L. R. 7 C. P. 606.

(12) Per Wickens, V. C., in Mulkeru v. Ward, L. R. 13 Eq. 622.

(13) Davis v. Duncan, L. R. 9 C. P. 396.

(14) Per Cockburn, C. J., in Purcell v. Sowler, 2 C. P. D. 218; South Hetton Coal Co., v. North Eastern News Association (1894) 1 Q. B. 133.

(15) Harle v. Catherall, 14 L. T. 801.

(16) Wilson v. Fitch, 41 C. 363.

(17) Kelly v. Tinling, L. R. 1 Q. B. 699; Booth v. Briscoe 2 Q. B. D. 496, Gathercole v. Miall, 15 L. J. Ex. 179; Walker v. Brogden, 19 C. B. N. S. 65.

(18) Note R.

the society in general or any section of it in particular or any subject such as the religion or religious or social usages and practices of a class or community, all of which are public questions within the meaning of this Exception.

5710. The rules that govern the criticism of public questions or of persons in relation to such questions require that (i) if the criticism be an expression of opinion merely, it must be fair and honest, but (ii) if it be alleged to be based upon a fact that fact must be proved. It is then no defence to say that though the fact was not proved, still the accused believed it bona fide (§§ 5699-5701).

5711. A person commenting on the conduct of a public man, must not asperse his private character except so far as it bears upon his public conduct, but otherwise the Court considers him entitled to considerable latitude. It is not, indeed, necessary that the comment must be true, but what is necessary is that it must be plausible and not malicious. The law is that, where a matter is of public interest, the Court ought not to weigh any comment on it in golden scales, that some allowance must be made for heated passion and what the writer might consider righteous indignation. The fact that the language was exaggerated, or even grossly exaggerated does not make the comment necessarily unfair, if it was such as any fair man might have made in the circumstances.[19] So where the accused published his view concerning a municipality that the members knew that there was not one among them fit to be a Chairman and that the Government had ordered that the Chairman should be a Revenue Divisional Officer, which was a fact, the Court acquitted the accused holding that his statement did not exceed the limit of fair comment.[20]

Exception 4.

5712. Publication of Judicial Proceedings.—The policy which dictates the exemption of criticisms on matters of public moment, also dictates the exemption of the publication of proceedings of a Court of Justice, which are also exempted under English law. "A fair account of what takes place in a Court of Justice is privileged. The reason is, that the balance of public benefit from publicity is great. It is of great consequence that the public should know what takes place in Court; and the proceedings are under the control of the Judges. The inconvenience, therefore arising from the chance of injury to private character is infinitesimally small as compared to the convenience of publicity."[21] "The only foundation for the exception is the superior benefit of the publicity of judicial proceedings which counterbalances the injury to individuals, though that at times may be great.[22]

(19) Merivale v. Carson, 20 Q. B. D. 275 (280): Edmondson v. Birch & Co., Ltd. (1907) 1 K. B. 371 (380); Murlidar v. Narayandas, 8 S. L. R. 143, 27 I. C. 205.

(20) Subroya v. Abdul Kadar, (1914) M. W. N. 351, 23 I. C. 725.

(21) Per Lord Campbell in Davison v. Duncan, 2 E. & B. 229 (231).

(22) Ib., Per Wightman, J. to the same effect per Lawrence, J., in Rex v. Wright, 8 T. R. 293 (298). "Though the publication of such proceedings may be to the disadvantage of the particular individual concerned, yet it is of vast importance to the public that the proceedings of Courts of Justice should be universally known. The general advantage to the country in having these proceedings made public, more than counterbalances the inconvenience to the private persons whose conduct may be the subject of such proceedings."

But in England the same rule is extended to the report of parliamentary proceedings.[23] "Otherwise," as Cockburn, C. J., asked, "where would be our confidence in the Government of the country or in the legislature by which our laws are framed, and to whose charge the great interests of the country are committed—where would be our attachment to the constitution under which we live,—if the proceedings of the great council of the realm were shrouded in secrecy and concealed from the knowledge of the realm? How could the communications between the representatives of the people and their constituents, which are so essential to the working of the representative system, be usefully carried on, if the constituencies were kept in ignorance of what their representatives are doing? What would become of the right of petitioning on all measures pending in Parliament, the undoubted right of the subject, if the people are to be kept in ignorance of what is passing in either house?"[24]

These reasons are equally applicable to justify the exemption of the publication of proceedings of the Imperial and Provincial Legislative Councils, and of the local bodies such as the district councils and the municipalities. Indeed, the proceedings of all public bodies and tribunals are necessarily public and their publication would be privileged on that very ground apart from the rule here enacted. But apart from the rule, even the proceedings of a Court of Justice are not privileged in the two following cases: (i) when their publication is prohibited by the Court before whom the proceedings are pending,[25] and (ii) where the publication is obscene or blasphemous.[1] As to the first the Court now seldom prohibit the publication of proceedings before them,[2] though they undoubtedly possess that power.[3] But in the recent prosecution for sedition the Courts availed themselves of this power by prohibiting the publication of the seditious matter charged and the formula for the preparation of bombs disclosed in the course of judicial proceedings. But the legality of absolute prohibition in all cases may well be questioned, for in the words of Turner, L. J., the only power which the Courts possess is to prevent the publication of its proceedings pending litigation, except where the matter is obscene or blasphemous.[4]

The accused, Richard Carlile, was indicted for publishing Tom Payne's "Age of Reason," which was held to be a blasphemous attack on the founder of Christianity. He read the whole of it at his trial. After his conviction his wife published a full, true and accurate report of his trial entitled "The Mock Trial of Mr. Carlile," in which she republished the whole of the book "The Age of Reason" as a part of the proceedings at the trial. It was held that though the report was a true report of the proceedings, it was unlawful to publish even a correct account of the proceedings in a Court of Justice, if such an account contained matter of a scandalous, blasphemous or indecent

(23) Wason v. Walter, L. R. 4 Q. B. 73 (89).
(24) Ib., p. 89.
(25) Per Turner, L. J., in Brook v. Evans, 29 L. J. Ch. 616.
(1) "Evening News," (1866) 3 T. L. R. 255.
(2) Levy v. Lawson, 27 L. J. Q. B. 282.
(3) Brook v. Evans, 27 L. J. Ch. 616.
(4) Per Turner, L. J., in Brook v. Evans, 29 L. J. Ch. 616.

nature.(5) Indeed, where the matter published is scandalous, blasphemous or indecent, its publication could only be justified as conducive to the advancement of learning. So such proceedings might have been published in a bona fide law report, and so again the scientific aspect of a question, howmuchsoever indecent in the popular eye, might be discussed in a medical magazine.

What is a Substantially True Report ?

5713. These are, however, exceptional cases. But otherwise the rule justifies the publication of all judicial proceedings, and it does not matter whether their publication was malicious, for if the publication is lawful, malice is immaterial. And so this exception does not require that the report shall be published in good faith, though it does require that it shall be substantially true. In this respect the English rule is coincident. For it has been held there that such a report need not be verbatim, and need not state all that occurred in extenso. It may indeed, be abridged or condensed, but in doing so it must not cease to be "substantially a fair account of what took place in Court."(6) And though "it is sufficient to publish a fair abstract,"(7) an abstract is not fair if it is partial or garbled, as where it suppresses the entire evidence of one material witness which would have told in the plaintiff's favour.(8) But the question whether the abstract is fair, is one of fact which must be left to the jury in each case.(9)

5714. A report may be substantially true, even though it is not a report of the whole proceedings. Such reports are issued by the press, of trials which continue from day to day, in which case the report of so much of the proceedings as has already taken place is equally protected.(10) But a post facto report of the proceedings cannot be true if it publishes proceedings only favourable to one party and omits all mention of it as affecting the other. So where the defendant set out at length the opening of the counsel for the prosecution, but entirely omitted the examination and cross-examination of the prosecutor, the only witness, merely saying that his testimony supported the statement of his counsel, the jury considered the report unfair and the plaintiff was awarded £10 damages.(11) The Judge's summing up is a distinct part of the proceedings,(12) and so is his judgment and decree which may then be separately published.

Comments on Judicial Proceedings.

5715. But there is a wide difference between a report of judicial proceedings and comments thereupon. The former is privileged if, apart from good faith, it is substantially true, but the latter is privileged only if it is made in good faith as a comment upon a matter of public interest. A sensational headline to the report is a comment, and if it is not justified may constitute a libel. The Observer published a true and correct

(5) Mary Carlile, 3 B. & Ald. 167.
(6) Per Lord Campbell, C. J., in Andrews v. Chapman, 3 C. & K. 289.
(7) Per Mellish, L. J. in Milissich v. Lloyds, 46 L. J. C. P. 406; per Byles, J., in Turner v. Sullivan, 6 L. T. 130.
(8) Duncan v. Thwaites, 3 B. & C. 580; Rumney v. Walter, 8 T. L. R. 256.
(9) Milissich v. Lloyds, 46 L. J. C. P. 404.
(10) Lewis v. Levy, 27 L. J. Q. B. 282; Kimber v. The Press Association, (1893) 1 Q. B. 65.
(11) Pinero v. Goodlake, 13 L. T. 676.
(12) Millissich v. Lloyds, 46 L. J. C. P. 404.

account of some proceedings in the Insolvent Debtor's Court, but headed it with the words "Shameful conduct of an attorney," which were not justified. It was held to be libellous.(13) In another case, a report of the hearing of a charge of perjury before a Magistrate was headed "wilful and corrupt perjury" and stated that the "evidence before the Magistrate entirely negatived the story of the plaintiff." The jury gave a verdict for the defendant, but the Court overruled it and entered a verdict for the plaintiff with nominal damages.(14)

So it was held to be libellous to publish a highly-coloured account of criminal proceedings mixed with the report's own observations and conclusions upon what passed in Court, headed "Judicial Delinquency" and insinuating that the plaintiff, described as "our hero," had committed perjury.(15) The same view was taken of a report of a trial which set out the speech of the counsel for the prosecution, and then added: "The first witness was R. P., who proved all that had been stated by the counsel for the prosecution," but owing to the absence of a piece of formal evidence in no way bearing on the merits of the case, "the jury, under direction of the learned Judge, were obliged to give a verdict of acquittal, to the great regret of a crowded Court, on whom the statement and the evidence, so far as it went, made a strong impression of their guilt."(16) The captain of a vessel was charged before a Magistrate with an indecent assault upon a lady on board his own ship. The defendant's newspaper published a report of the trial interspersed with comments of its own, in which the lady was commended and the guilt of the accused was assumed. It was held that the report as published was neither fair nor dispassionate.(17) Where a report contains both a report as well as comments, the fact that the report is true does not justify the comments which must be otherwise justified.(18) But where comments have to be made, it is not advisable to intersperse them with the report, for such a course may raise an inference that the report was only made with a view to justify the comments. So Lord Campbell, C. J., advised newspaper editors always to keep distinct their comments from reports, so that the two might be judged apart from each other.(19)

Jurisdiction Immaterial.

5716. It will be observed that all that the exception requires is that the proceeding must be of a Court of Justice, and that it must be substantially true. If these conditions are satisfied, it does not then matter whether the proceedings were of a Court possessing no jurisdiction,(20) or that they were ex parte, (21) or that the hearing was not in open Court but in the Judge's chambers (22) or in jail.(23)

(13) Clement v. Lewis, 3 B. & Ald. 702; Bishop v. Latimer, 4 L. T. 775; Boydell v. Jones, 4 M. & W. 446; Flint v. Pike, 4 B. & C. 473.

(14) Lewis v. Levy, 27 L. J. Q. B. 282.

(15) Stiles v. Nokes, 7 East. 493.

(16) Lewis v. Walter, 4 B. & Ald. 605; Roberts v. Brown. 10 Bing. 519.

(17) Fisher, 2 Camp. 563.

(18) Stiles v. Nokes, 7 East 493.

(19) Andrews v. Chapman, 3 C. & K. 288.

(20) Usil v. Hales, 3 C. P. D. 319; which overrules the contrary held in McGregor v. Thwaites, 3 B. & C. 24.

(21) Usill v. Hales 3 C. P. D. 319; Kimber v. The Press Association, (1893) 1 Q. B. 65.

(22) Smith v. Scott, 2 C. & K. 580.

(23) Ryalls v. Leader, L. R. 1 Ex. 296.

Exception 4.

5717. Report of Preliminary Judicial Inquiry.—And as the explanation makes it clear, the report is equally privileged, whether the proceeding be of a preliminary inquiry or investigation, or of a trial by a Court competent to adjudicate upon the subject-matter of the proceeding. At the same time it does not extend to an inquiry held in camera, as for instance, in a case of rape or the like, in which the Magistrate might deem fit to hold a preliminary inquiry, and even his proceedings with a view to commitment may be so conducted.(24)

Mode of Publication Immaterial.

5718. Subject to the two qualifications, the rule applies equally to all publications, whether in a newspaper, pamphlet or book form. As Hannen, J., put it: "A newspaper has no greater privilege in such a matter than an ordinary person—any person is privileged in publishing such a report if he does so merely to inform the public."(25) The complainant had been the priest of a temple in Pedana. He was convicted of the theft of idols in his charge. Some years afterwards he laid claim to the same office, whereupon the accused who was a trustee of the temple sent the complainant a postcard reminding him of his conviction, whereupon he prosecuted him but the Court held the case met by this exception.(1)

5719. Report of Non-judicial Public Proceeding.—This section enacts no rule for exempting the publication of reports of non-judicial proceeding though the publication of such reports is unusual. In England, at common law, reports of judicial and parliamentary proceeding were also privileged, but the narrowness of common law was relieved by Statute, (2) which exempts a fair and accurate report of the proceedings of a public meeting in a newspaper for the information of the public; a public meeting being defined to be "any meeting bona fide and lawfully held, for a lawful purpose and for the furtherance or discussion of any matter of public concern, whether the admission thereto be general or restricted." It is apprehended that the same rule is likely to be observed in this country, though such publication may not be strictly defensible under any single exception.

5720. In England, an absolute privilege is moreover conceded to members of Parliament, Judges, jury, party, counsel and witnesses who cannot be prosecuted for words spoken or written in that capacity. The freedom of speech and debates or proceedings in Parliament, was declared by the Bill of Rights(3) and a fair and accurate report of any such speech or proceeding, may be published in the same manner and to the same extent as a report of a judicial proceeding.(4) The only

(24) This explanation was evidently intended to mark a departure from the law as laid down in M'Gregor v. Thwaites, (1824) 3 B. & C. 24, since overruled in Usill v. Hales, 3 C. P. D. 319.

(25) Salmon v. Isaac, 20 L. T. 885 (886), to per Bramwell, L. J. in L. J. 5 Ex. D. 56; "I do not think the public press has any peculiar privilege."

(1) Singaraju, 26 M. 464.

(2) First by s. 2, Newspaper Libel and Registration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict., c. 60); now by the Law of Libel Amendment Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict., c. 64), s. 4.

(3) 1 Will. Mary, St. 2, c. 2, which, however, only declared the common law; Fielding v. Thomas, (1896) A. C. 600 (612).

(4) Wason v. Walter, L. R. 4 Q. B. 73.

corresponding institutions in this country are the Imperial and Provincial Legislative Councils, and the question may arise whether the same immunity is possessed by the speeches and proceedings of those bodies. They are the recent creation of Statute which confers no similar immunity upon their proceedings, and this section does not refer to them. It would thus appear that they enjoy no special privilege as regards the speeches delivered therein and those who report their proceedings do so at the risk of having to justify under the general exceptions or any of the ten exceptions to this section.

5721. Comment on Cases.—The right of the public, to comment on cases and on the persons connected therewith, equally follows the course of English decisions,(5) according to which every one has a right to discuss fairly and bona fide the administration of justice as evidenced at this trial. It is open to him to show that error was committed on the part of the Judge or jury; nay, further, for myself I will say that the Judges invite discussion of their acts in the administration of the law, and it is a relief to them to see error pointed out, if it is committed; yet whilst they invite the first discussion, it is not open to a journalist to impute corruption."(6) The right of the public to such discussion, however, only arises when the case is decided and not when it is sub judice; any comment at that stage would be contempt of Court as having a tendency to prejudice the due administration of justice. "The essence of the offence," said Lord Alverstone, C.J.: "is conduct calculated to produce, so to speak, an atmosphere of prejudice in the midst of which the proceedings must go on."(7) "It is the pride of the constitution of this country," said Lord Kenyon, C.J., "that all cases should be decided by jurors, who are chosen in a manner which excludes all possibility of a bias, and who are chosen by ballot, in order to prevent any possibility of their being tampered with. But, if an individual can break down any of those safeguards, which the constitution has so wisely and so cautiously erected, by poisoning the minds of the jury at a time when they are called upon to decide, he will stab the administration of justice in its most vital parts. And, therefore, I cannot forbear saying that, if the publication be brought home to the defendant, he has been guilty of a crime of the greatest enormity."(8) But it is one thing to level wholesale criticism against a Judge or jury, in regard to proceedings pending in his Court, and addressing him a reasonable argument or expostulation, against a judicial act as contrary to law or the public good in which case no Court could or would treat as contempt of Court.(9)

Exception 5.

5722. But the exception here enacted only lets in the right of criticism after the case is decided. It does not however, limit that right to any particular period afterwards. But it is evident that in order

(5) Daw v. Eley, L. R. Eq. 49; Sullivan, 11 Cox 57; White, 1 Camp. 359 note and cases, post.

(6) Per Fitzgerald, J., in Sullivan, 11 Cox 57.

(7) Tibbits and Windust, (1902) 1 K. B. 77 (88).

(8) Jolliffe, 4 T. R. 285 (289); cited with approval by Lord Alverstone, C. J., in Tibbits and Windust, (1902) 1 K. B. 77 (86).

(9) Per Lord Russell, C. J., in Gray, (1900) 2 Q. B. 36 (40).

to be a criticism delivered in good faith, it must be made as soon as the case is decided or within a reasonable time afterwards. And since the right arises as soon as the case is decided, the critic need not await the chances of an appeal, though, he is necessarily silenced as soon as the appeal is filed, for the case is then again, sub-judice. But otherwise, the comment may relate to any case and be made at any time. The words "civil case" would apparently include also a revenue case which is a case of a civil nature. And the word "case" is wide enough to include any judicial proceeding, original or appellate, revisional or in review.

5723. But the comment must be confined to the merits of the case, including the conduct of parties or their agents and witnesses thereto. Now since the expression of such opinion must be made in "good faith," it follows that it must be fair and honest, based upon reason or discussion and not merely declamation and invective, written not with the view to advance public good, but solely to bring into contempt and hatred the administration of justice, or to injure the character of individuals.(10) So it is no fair comment to say that the prisoner was acquitted, though he was really guilty,(11) though, of course, it would be fair to give reasons showing on what points the Judge had erred and why there had been a failure of justice. So again, the critic may lament the state of the law the administration of which leads to such startling results, but he cannot direct his shafts personally against the Judge calling him a knave or a fool, or implying as such, though it is quite different to say that the Judge had misunderstood or misapplied the law or omitted to consider or apply it correctly. Such criticisms are daily made in the public press, and though they have a remote tendency to bring the administration of justice into contempt they are not defamatory, because they are equally protected by this exception and Exception 2. So a newspaper may comment on the conduct of Magistrates for dismissing a case without hearing the whole of the evidence, or in committing the prisoner for trial on insufficient evidence, but it must not impute that in doing so the Magistrates acted deliberately and consciously from political motives.(12) So where a party or person charges the Judge of bribery or other malpractice, he can only justify it by proving the charge. The accused who was a defendant in a civil suit pending before a Munsiff, presented a petition to the Deputy Commissioner, charging the Munsiff with conspiracy with the plaintiff to get up a false case in his Court, which he failed to prove, whereupon he was held to have been rightly convicted of this offence.(13)

5724. The comment may refer to parties, their agents and witnesses. But in each case, it must be made in good faith, that is to say, with due care and circumspection regard being had to the facts of the case. The maid servant of the plaintiff, a clergyman, gave birth to an illegitmate child of whom she asserted the plaintiff to be the father.

(10) White and another, 1 Camp. 359, note.

(11) Riskallah Bey v. Whitehurst and others, 18 L. T. 615; Lewis v. Walter, 4 B. & Ald. 605.

(12) Hibbins v. Lee, 4 F. & F. 243.

(13) Kirpa Ram, (1887) P. R. No. 21; following Ali Khan v. Malik Taran Khan, (1879) P. R. (Civil) 16.

She took out an affiliation summons against him, but it was dismissed for want of corroboration. The defendant inserted letters and articles in his paper upholding the girl's story and alluding to the plaintiff as a "gay deceiver." He was held to be liable to pay the £ 2,000 damages assessed.(14) A complained against B under section 506, of which B was convicted and bound down under section 106 of the Procedure Code. Shortly after the disposal of this case B's pleader asked B the real cause of his dispute with A, and B said that A had taken offence at a caste feast, where some of B's party had declared that A's daughter-in-law had eloped with somebody. A was informed of this statement made by B, and he prosecuted him for defamation, but the Court held that his intention in making the statement was not to harm the reputation of A, and that it was made at a time when the legal relationship between B and his client subsisted, and that B was not therefore guilty of this offence.(15)

The Morning Post, commenting on a trial, said of a firm of attorneys, "Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snages, were fairly equalled, if not undone." The reference was to the notorious firm of pettifogging attorneys of that name in the novel "Ten Thousand a Year." This account of the attorneys was exclusively taken from the speech of the defendant's counsel, and no allusion was made to the evidence subsequently adduced to rebut his statements. It was held that the comment was too one-sided to be fair.(16) So while a newspaper may comment on the evidence given by any particular witness, in any enquiry on a matter of public interest, he may not go the length of declaring such evidence to be "maliciously or recklessly false," or that a witness had perjured himself,(17) and in any case no one is justified in commenting upon a person or document who was not examined, or which was not filed as evidence in the case,(18) for the word "witness" means a person called and examined and not merely a person called as a witness.

Privilege of Party to Judicial Proceeding.

5725. This clause merely protects a bona fide comment made respecting the conduct of a party, witness or agent. It has no reference to the protection in some measure enjoyed by them. That protection arises under exception 9 where the subject will be found discussed.

Exception 6.

5726. Literary Criticism.—The sixth exception also enunciates a rule in conformity with English law. Indeed, the rule may be said to be the logical deduction of that which protects comments made on matters of public interest. But this section is intended to specially refer to literary and dramatic criticism, which sanctions the use of language which could not be ordinarily endured, but which is nevertheless subject to the same rule, namely,

(14) Roberts v. Owen and others, (1888) 5 T. L. R. 11.
(15) Bhagirath, 13 C. W. N. 1087.
(16) Woodgate v. Ridout, 4 F. & F. 202.
(17) Roberts v. Brown, 10 Bing. 519; Stiles v. Nokes, 7 East 493; Littler v. Thomson, 2 Beav. 129; Felkin v. Herbert, 33 L. J. Ch. 294.
(18) Helsham v. Blackwood, 11 C. B. 111: Andrew v. Gray, 26 J. P. 663, Hope v. Sir W. C. Leng & Co., (1907) 123 T. L. R. 243.

that it must be fair and honest. So Cockburn, C. J., said: "It was of the vast importance to literature, and through literature to good taste and good feeling, to morality and to religion, that work published for general perusal should be such as were calculated to improve and not to demoralize the public mind: and therefore it was of vast importance that criticism, so long as it was fair, reasonable, and just should be allowed the utmost latitude, and that the most unsparing censure of works which were fairly subject to it should not be held libellous."(19)

So Lord Ellenborough, C. J., said in another case(20): "Liberty of criticism must be allowed, or we should neither have purity of taste nor of morals. Fair discussion is essentially necessary to the truth of history and the advancement of science. That publication, therefore, I shall never consider as a libel which has for its object not to injure the reputation of any individual, but to correct misrepresentations of fact, to refute sophistical reasoning, to expose a vicious taste in literature, or to censure what is hostile to morality." These views have received legislative sanction in this exception, the effect of which is to protect only fair literary criticism and not vituperation and abuse. This is clear from the fact that (i) the opinion protected must relate to the merits of the performance, as distinct from the capacity of the performer, unless the one is apparent from the other; and (ii) the opinion must be expressed in good faith. And in any case, no one is entitled to criticize a work which is not submitted to the judgment of the public.

Exception 6—Explanation.

5727. In the first place then the work must have been submitted to the judgment of the public. This does not imply that the author should have expressly invited criticism, for as is here explained: "A performance may be submitted to the judgment of the public expressly or by acts on the part of the author which imply such submission to the judgment of the public"—or in other words, such submission may be express or implied. This is evident from illustration (a), which is in accordance with the view of Cockburn, C.J., who said: "A man who publishes a book challenges criticism."(21) Therefore it is not defamation to criticize a published work whether it has been expressly sent for review or not. So a speech delivered in public implies an invitation to the public to criticize it, and a similar invitation is implied in sending in a painting for public view or giving a public theatrical or musical performance.

So a person designing a public building invites criticism thereupon.(22) And so again a person who puts forward a new invention, such as a new and improved design, appeals to the public for approval, and he cannot complain of its disapproval. And as regards literary criticism, it is not necessary that the literary matter published should be a book, pamphlet or matter of a permanent character, for the writer of an article or letter in the public press invites criticism so far as

(19) Strauss v. Francis, 4 F. & F. 1114.

(20) Tabart v. Tipper, 1 Camp. 350.

(21) Strauss v. Francis, 4 F. & F. 1114.

(22) Thompson v. Shackell, Moo. & Mal. 187.

he is the writer of that article or letter, though it would not justify a general attack upon his character. At the same time wherever a man calls public attention to his own grievances, or those of others, whether by public speeches, or writing in the public press, he must expect to have his assertions challenged, the existence of his grievances denied, and himself ridiculed and assailed.(23)

5728. It may be added that in order to let in the right of the public to criticize, the performance need not be public, if it is submitted to the judgment of the public. For instance, an amateur dramatic club may give performances open only to its members and friends, in which case the performances are not open to public criticism though they would be so, if the club should invite subscription from the public for its maintenance and improvement.(24) But in the other case, the members of the club and those who pay for admission to the performances would be still entitled to criticize them, for the performances were then still submitted to their judgment. From this it is clear that "public" is an elastic term and does not necessarily mean the community at large, but also includes any section or class of the community to whose judgment a performance may be submitted, who alone may then be entitled to criticize it.(25)

(ii) Opinion must Relate to the Merits.

5729. But whether the performance be addressed to the public at large or to any section of it, the same salutary rule of criticism applies to each, namely, that it must be primarily confined to the merits of the performance, though the effect of such comments may injure the author's character. But that must not be its primary or even main object. The plaintiff published a novel which the Athenaeum described as "the very worst attempt of a novel that has ever been perpetrated", and commented upon its "insanity, self-complacency and vulgarity, its profanity, its indelicacy (to use no stronger word), its display of bad Latin, bad French, bad German, and bad English," and its abuse of persons living and dead. The case was withdrawn by the plaintiff after Erle, C.J., had summed up the case,(1) whereupon the defendants published another article stating that they had consented to the withdrawal of the case as the plaintiff would have been unable to pay their costs, had the verdict been in their favour. The plaintiff thereupon sued them again, but this time the verdict was given for the defendants.(2)

The late Mr. Ruskin was sued for libelling Whistler, the plaintiff, in an article which he published on the pictures in the Grosvenor Gallery, in which the following was complained of as being defamatory of the plaintiff. "For Mr. Whistler's own sake, no less than for the protection of the purchaser, Sir Coutts Lindsay ought not to have ad-

(23) Odger v. Mortimer, 28 L. T. 472; Koenig v. Ritchie, 3 F. & F. 413; Veley, 4 F. & F. 1117.

(24) McLeod, 3 A. 342.

(25) In Gathercole v. Miall, 15 L. J. Ex. 179; Pollock, C. B., said: "It is doubtful how far a book printed for private circulation only may be criticized" —but it is submitted that the question really depends upon considerations in the text.

(1) Strauss v. Francis, (No. 1), 4 F. & F. 939.

(2) Strauss v. Francis, (No. 2), 7 F. & F. 1107.

mitted works into the gallery in which the ill-educated conceit of the artist so nearly approached the aspect of wilful imposture. I have seen and heard much of Cockney impudence before now, but never expected to hear a coxcomb ask 200 guineas for flinging a pot of paint in public's face." The jury considered the words "wilful imposture" as just overstepping the line of fair criticism and found a formal verdict for the plaintiff who was however, awarded one farthing damages and no costs.(3) The plaintiff was the professor of architecture in the Royal Academy, and was alleged to have invented a new design of architecture called "Boetian," which the defendant ridiculed, illustrating the absurdity of the conception by referring to the buildings designed by the plaintiff whom the defendant called "the Boetian professor." The latter sued for damages, but the verdict was for the defendant.(4) Here the fun was evidently justified because it did not descend to personality; and so in another case, where the plaintiff was caricatured as author bowing beneath the weight of his books, it was held to be no libel, though a personal caricature of him as he appeared in private life would have been so.(5)

5730. Indeed, in literary criticism as in the other cases considered under the foregoing exceptions, the rule is the same, namely, that if what is written or said is merely an expression of opinion and not a statement of fact, it will be protected if it is fair and honest, howmuchsoever strongly expressed it might otherwise be, but if it purports to be a statement of fact, then it could only be justified as a fact and not as a mere expression of opinion. For instance, the critic may pronounce a work to be dull, vulgar and degrading,—whether it is so in fact or not is a matter of opinion, and persons may honestly differ in their opinions—but to say that it is a plagiarism is not an expression of merely an opinion, but it is a statement of fact which must be proved.(6) But where there is no statement of fact but only a statement of opinion, the only thing required is that the criticism should be "fair" and not that it should be convincing or cogent. But it must be relevant(7) and not disclose in itself actual malice.(8)

So Lord Esher, M. R., said that the meaning of "fair comment" was this: "Is the article in the opinion of the jury beyond that which any fair man, however prejudiced or however strong his opinion may be, would say of the work in question? Every latitude must be given to opinion and to prejudice, and then an ordinary set of men with ordinary judgment must say whether any fair man would have made such a comment on the work. It is very easy to say what would be clearly beyond that limit, if, for instance, the writer attacked the private character of the author. But it is much more difficult to say what is within the limit. That must depend upon the circumstances of the particular case."(9) So where the critic misdescribed a play

(3) Whistler v. Ruskin, (1878) Times, Nov. 26th and 27th.
(4) Soane v. Knight, Moo. & Mal. 74.
(5) Carr (Sir Jhon) v. Hood, 1 Camp 355, note.
(6) Joynt v. Cycle Trade Publishing Co., (1904) 2 K. B. 292 (297); explaining McQuire v. Western Morning News Co., (1903) 2 K. B. 100.
(7) Per Collins, M. R. in McQuire v. Western Morning News Co., (1903) 2 K. B. 100 (110, 112).
(8) Ib., p. 112.
(9) Merivale v. Carson, 20 Q. B. D, 275 (280, 281).

as immoral, though there was in fact nothing immoral in it, the Court considered the critic to have overstepped the bounds of fairness.[10] Such was rightly held to be the case where the defendant wrote an article in the newspaper, advising an actor to return to "his old profession, that of a waiter." The actor had never been a waiter.[11] The same fate befell the writer who commenting on a flower show referred to an exhibitor as "a beggarly soul, famous in all sorts of dirty work," and one who used "tricks by which he and a few like him used to secure prizes," but who has now "broken in upon by some Judges more honest than usual."[12]

5731. But the case was held to be otherwise where the Era, the special organ of the theatrical profession, published an indignant article on the conduct of the prosecutor, a person wholly unconnected with the stage, in having got up a ball for his own benefit and calling it a "Dramatic Ball."[13] The Western Morning News in commenting on the plaintiff's play called "The Major" performed at Plymouth wrote as follows: "A three act musical absurdity, entitled 'The Major,' written and composed by Mr. McQuire was presented last evening before a full house by the author's company. It cannot be said that many left the building with the satisfaction of having seen anything like the standard of play which is generally to be witnessed at the Theatre Royal. Although it may be described as a play 'The Major' is composed of nothing but nonsense of a not very humorous character, whilst the music is far from attractive. This comedy would be very much improved had it a substantial plot, and were a good deal of the sorry stuff taken out of it which lowers both the play and the players. No doubt the actor and actresses are well suited to the piece, which gives excellent scope for music hall artists to display their talent. Among Mr. McQuire's company there is not one good actor or actress, and, with the exception of Mr. Ernest Braine, not one of them can be said to have a good voice for singing. The introduction of common, not to say vulgar, songs does not tend to improve the character of the performance, and the dancing, which forms a prominent feature, is carried out with very little gracefulness." The jury found that this was not a fair comment and gave a verdict for the plaintiff with £100 damages, but the Court of Appeal held that there was no evidence on which a rational verdict for the plaintiff could be founded, that if the comment was fair, that is, such as did not disclose actual malice, it was not for the jury to apply the standard of their own taste to the appreciation of the thing criticised, and to measure the right of the critic accordingly.[14] The same view governed the decision in the case of the plaintiff, a retail rag merchant, who issued hand-bills offering exceptionally high prices for rags, left-off clothes, kitchen-stuff dripping, old metals, old bottles and the like. The defendant reproduced this hand-bill in his paper and said that it encouraged servants to rob their masters, which was held to be a fair comment.[15]

(10) Merivale v. Carson, 20 Q. B. D., 275 (280, 281).

(11) Duplany v. Davis, (1886) 3 T. L. R. 184.

(12) Green v. Chapman, 4 Bing. N. C. 92.

(13) Ledger, (1880) Times, Jan. 14th.

(14) McQuire v. Western Morning News Co., [1903] 2 K. B. 100 (112, 113).

(15) Paris v. Levy, 9 C. B. N. S. 342

5132. Censure by one in Authority.—All these are, however, cases of general privilege, that is to say, cases in which the public have an equal right to criticize. But cases may arise in which the right of criticism is limited only to a specified class of persons, which arises either on account of the jural relationship between the two persons, or on account of the necessity of the case. Exceptions 7 and 8 may be said to be instances of the one, while the other two exceptions are instances of the other. Of these, exception 7 continues the same privilege of criticism to a person in authority. This privilege arises from the legal position of one person in relation to the other, whether that position be conferred by law or created by contract, in either of which cases the legality of the right depends upon the same two conditions, namely, (i) that the censure must be on the conduct of the person within the scope of the critic's authority; and (ii) the censure must be passed in good faith.

Exception 7.

5733. In the first place, then the person claiming privilege must possesss authority over another. Such authority is conferred by law upon Judges and Magistrates over persons who are parties or their agents and witnesses in cases submitted to their arbitrament. In this respect the judiciary in this country does not possess the same unlimited power of criticism as the Judges in England, where the Judges of a superior Court possess an absolute immunity for words spoken in their office, though the words be spoken maliciously and were wholly irrelevant to or unwarranted by the issue.(16) This rule of common law is said to exist to secure the absolute independence of the Judges, and to prevent their being harassed by vexatious actions.(17) The rule extends to Judges of the Supreme Court of the Colonies,(18) but is, of course, in either case confined to words spoken or written as Judge in a matter within his jurisdiction.(19)

(1) Accused must be in Authority.

As Lord Esher. M. R., said: "No action lies for acts done or words spoken by a Judge in the exercise of his judicial office, although his motive is malicious and the acts or words are not done or spoken in the honest exercise of his office. If a Judge goes beyond his jurisdiction a different set of considerations arise. The only difference between Judges of the superior Courts and other Judges consists in the extent of their respective jurisdiction."(20) This absolute immunity is held to be enjoyed by the English and Colonial Judges, whether sitting in open Court or at chambers(21) or in bankruptcy.(22) And such privilege is held to be possessed by the master of the Supreme Court,(23) Chairman

(16) 2 Hawk P. C. 1, ss. 1, 3, 9. 17; Floyd v. Barker, 12 Rep. 24; Ashley v. White, 1 Sm. L. C. (9th Ed.) 268 (274); Calder v. Halket, 3 Moo. P. C. 28; Taaffe v. Downes, 3 Moo. P. C. 36-n; Groenvelt v. Burwell, 1 Ld. Raym, 454 (468); Anderson v. Gorrie and others (1895) 1 Q. B. 668.

(17) Per Crompton, J., in Fray v. Blackburn, 3 B. & S. 576 (578); per Lord Esher, M. R., in Anderson v. Gorrie, (1895) 1 Q. B. 668 (670).

(18) Anderson v. Gorrie, (1895) 1 Q. B. 668.

(19) Houlden v. Smith, 14 Q. B. 841; Calder v. Halket, 3 Moo. P. C. 28.

(20) Anderson v. Gorrie, (1895) 1 Q. B. 668 (671).

(21) Taaffe v. Downes, 3 Moo. P. C. 36-n.

(22) Dicas v. Lord Brougham, 6 C. & P. 249; Ryalls v. Leader, L. R. 1 Ex. 296.

(23) Pedley v. Morris, 61 L. J. Q. B. 21.

of Quarter Sessions, [24] County Court Judges,[25] the Recorder of London,[1] the Vice-Chancellor of a University when sitting as a Judge in the University Court,[2] a Coronet,[3] a Courtmartial[4] and a Justice of the Peace.[5] But the same immunity does not extend to persons exercising merely quasi-judicial functions, such as members of the county Council transacting licensing business,[6] or those of a Jockey Club hearing a dispute[7]; and of course, it does not extend to a Magistrate's clerk,[8] who is not a judicial officer.

5734. The immunity enjoyed by the English and Colonial Judges is the outcome of common law which so far as it was applicable to this country has remained unaffected by the Code (§ 116, 117). But the question whether Judges of the High and other Courts possess the same immunity must now be answered with reference to the Judicial Officers' Protection Act,[9] which protects all Judges, Magistrates, Justices of the Peace, Collectors and other persons acting judicially against their being used in any Civil Court for any act done or ordered to be done by them in the discharge of their judicial duties, whether or not within the limits of their jurisdiction, provided that they at the time in good faith, believed themselves to have jurisdiction to do or order the act complained of. This enactment, however, leaves intact the liability of Judicial officers to a criminal prosecution for this offence, and the question may therefore arise whether an additional immunity conferred on the English Judges by the common law equally applies to Indian Judges—or, in short, whether this exception is subject to the rule of common law if it is applicable to India. Now the common law immunity applied to Judges is, for the same reason, equally applicable to counsel and witnesses appearing in a case, and in this connection the rule has been put to the test in several cases, but after considerable divergence the Courts of this country are now agreed that their immunity is no larger than what is permitted by this and the next two exceptions—which make no departure in favour of persons in authority, who must regulate their censure by the rule here enacted.

Authority may be Legal, Contractual or Social.

5735. Persons entitled to this qualified privilege must, however, be shown to possess authority over the person concerning whom the imputation is made. Such authority may be conferred or implied by law, as in the case of an official superior, or one whose duty places him in a position of authority in relation to the other, as for instance, police officer making investigation into a cognizable offence. The question whether the accused was a person in authority over

(24) Skinner, Lofft, 55.
(25) Ryalls v. Leader. L. R. 1 Ex. 296.
(1) Hamond v. Howell, 2 Mod. 218.
(2) Kemp v. Neville, 10 C. B. N. S. 523.
(3) Thomas v. Churton, 2 B. & S. 475.
(4) Hodson v. Pare, (1899) 1 Q. B. 455.
(5) Jekyll v. Sir John Moore, 2 B. & P. N. R. 341; Home v. Bentinck, 2 B. & B. 130; Oliver v. Bentinck, 3 Taunt 456; Dawkins v. Lord Rokeley, L. R. 7 H. L. 744.
(6) Royal Aquarium v. Parkinson, (1892) 1 Q. B. 431; London County Council, (1894) 71 L. T. 638.
(7) Hope v. L'Anson, 18 T. L. R. 201.
(8) Delegal v. Highley, 3 Bing. N. C. 950.
(9) Act XVIII of 1850.

another is one of fact, and he who relies upon this exception must establish it. Such relationship will, however, be presumed from the situation in which one person places himself under another, though the contract under which such relationship was created may not be proved. Such would be the case where the relationship of master and servant, husband and wife, parent and child, schoolmaster and pupil, preceptor and pupil, is once admitted or proved. Such is also the relation ship between members of a caste panchayat and the rest of the community.(10) So where the accused who was the guru of the caste to which the complainant belonged circulated a letter in the latter's village forbidding social intercourse with him as the complainant's wife had been caught with a man of a lower caste, it was held that the imputation was made in good faith for the protection of the social and spiritual interests of the community of which the accused was the guru, and so far as it implied a censure on the conduct of complainant's wife, it was justified by that authority which the accused was vested with as the spiritual head of the community. The case was then held to fall both under this as well as exception 9.(11)

The same view was taken in Bombay in a similar case in which, the accused, who was the headman of the caste of the complainant, issued a notice to the members of that caste, intimating that he had received a complaint that the complainant's daughter had committed adultery with a certain person named, and that he should therefore appear with his daughter to answer to the charge. The notice was issued in good faith on a complaint received, and the Court held the accused protected by this exception.(12) This view is in harmony with English law where the rule as here enacted is comprised in the wider rule thus stated: "The occasion had arisen if the communication was of such a nature that it be fairly said that those who made it had an interest in making such a communication, and those to whom it was made had a corresponding interest in having it made to them. When those two things coexist, the occasion is a privileged one, and the question whether it was or was not misused is an entirely different one."(13) Accordingly, a bishop's charge to his clergy is held privileged. although it contains defamatory matter;(14) so is a communication made by one director to another as to the misconduct of the company's auditor when acting as secretary of another company;(15) so are the reports of the directors and auditors of a company circulated among the shareholders.(16) The defendant was the governor of a public school to which the plaintiff supplied butcher's meat. Defendant told the steward of the school, whose duty it was to examine the meat, that plaintiff had been known to sell bad meat. His communication was held privileged.(17)

(10) Nga Poona 9 Bur. L. T. 136, 34 I. C. 325, 17 Cr. L. J. 213, Bagamahar 76 I. C. (N.) 393.

(11) Basumati v. Budram Kolita, 22 C. 46.

(12) Bhikaji, (1888) B. U. C. 387; Sukratendra Swami, 45 M. L. J. 116, 72 I. C. 165, 24 Cr. L. J. 325.

(13) Hunt v. Great Northern Ry. Co., (1891) 2 Q. B. 189 (191).

(14) Laughton v. Bishop of Sodor, L. R. 4 P. C. 495.

(15) Harris v. Thompson, 13 C. B. 333.

(16) Lawless v. Anglo-Egyptian Cotton Co., L. R. 4 Q. B. 262.

(17) Humphreys v. Stilwell, 2 F. & F. 590.

Authority may be Limited or Unlimited.

5736. The authority of one person over another may be limited or unlimited, and it may be limited as to time and place and to particular acts, in which case the censure must be passed within the scope of that authority. For instance, while an employer may censure his servant for negligence in his work, he could not invade his private life and pass a censure on his domestic relationship unconnected with his employment. So while the banker of the illustration would be within his right in censuring the cashier for matters done by him as cashier, he could not arrogate to himself the general authority to improve his morals by censuring him about his caste and on matters unconnected with his employment as cashier.

5737. Lastly, the censure may be severe, but it must be passed in good faith, that is to say, passed with due care and caution, having regard to the circumstances and necessity of the occasion. For instance, a statement may be privileged but it may forfeit that privilege by the manner of its publication. Such was the case of the accused who as guru or spiritual guide of the complainant, issued a notice, published broadcast, declaring him out of caste for having attended a widow-marriage, and the indiscriminate publication of which the Court held to be wholly unjustifiable.(18) This view is confirmed by the English cases in which publicity given to a person outside the privilege is held to destroy the protection to which the imputation is otherwise entitled. So if a libel is transmitted, written on a post card,(19) or unnecessarily transmitted by the telegraph,(20) the Court presumes that persons other than those to whom it was addressed read it, though this presumption may be rebutted by the plaintiff. So where the accused, a Sub-Inspector of Police, maliciously reported and got recorded the complainant's name in the Register of Badmashis (bad characters) subjecting him to surveillance, the Court held him prima facie guilty of this offence.(21) The defendants who were members of the town council, were convicted of libel for publishing in a newspaper a letter accusing the contractors of the borough gaol with scamping their work, though the same charge, if preferred at a meeting of the town council would have been privileged.(22) So while a petition to Parliament is privileged, that privilege is lost if the defendant hands a copy of the petition for publication in the newspapers.(23)

Exception 8.

5738. Complaint to Authority.—Again, it is clearly in consonance with sound public policy that persons aggrieved should have free recourse to persons in authority, and it has consequently been held that persons complaining in good faith against another to a person in lawful authority over him, cannot be proceeded against for this offence. The English rule in this respect is the same.

(18) Sankaru, 6 M. 381.
(19) Robinson v. Jones, 4 Ir. L. R. 391; Chattel v. Turner, 12 T. L. R. 360; Beamish v. Dairy Supply Co. Ltd., 15 T. L. R. 484; Sadgrove v. Hole, (1901) 2 K. B. 1.
(20) Williamson v. Frier, L. R. 9 C. P. 393.
(21) Abdul Razak v. Gauri Nath (1910) P. W. R. 4, 5 I. C. 714.
(22) Simpson v. Downs, 16 L. T. 391; Harb v. Catherall, 14 L. T. 801.
(23) Pierce v. Ellis, 6 Ir. C. L. R. 55.

So Lord Campbell, C. J., observed: "In this land of law and liberty all who are aggrieved may seek redress, and the alleged misconduct of any who are clothed with public authority, may be brought to the notice of those who have the power and the duty to inquire into it, and to take steps which may prevent the repetition of it."(24) "To protect those who are not able to protect themselves is a duty which everyone owes to society."(25) Of persons in authority to whom an accusation is made, there are those who posses official authority, such as the King(1) and his Ministers,(2) both Houses of Parliament(3) and other officials of the State, civil(4) and military.(5) Besides these there are the Magistrates and Judges to whom all persons are entitled to represent their grievances if their cognizance falls within the scope of their authority.

So it has been observed: "When it comes to the knowledge of anyone that a crime has been committed, a duty is laid on that person, as a citizen of the country, to state to the authorities what he knows respecting the commission of the crime; and if he states only what he knows and honestly believes he cannot he subjected to an action of damages merely because it turns out that the person as to whom he has given the information is, after all, not guilty of the crime."(6) But in this case, if the charge levelled by them is shown to be false, the complainant would be liable to a prosecution either under section 182 or 211. But the exception is not restricted merely to complaints made to a Magistrate, for a person in lawful authority over another may be any other person, such as those referred to under the last exception (§§ 5735-5737). So a person may prefer to the headman of a caste a complaint that another person belonging to that caste had outraged his religion. And so when A wrote to his fellow-castemen, enquiring whether B who had committed adultery with a woman of low caste, should still be considered in the caste, and adding that the enquiry held into his conduct in the village was perfunctory and unsatisfactory, he was held protected both by this exception as well as exception 10.(7) The same view was taken in another case in which the accused who were members of the Reddi caste stated to a panchayat of Reddis that the members of another caste (Balijas) were inferior to them and that all social intercourse with them should be stopped and that the village servants should not serve them.(8)

5739. In such cases, then, four points call for notice: (i) Was the complaint made to a person in authority over another with reference to the subject-matter of accusation; (ii) was the imputation an accusation, or something different; (iii) was it made in good faith; and (iv) is

---

(24) Harrison v. Bush, 5 E. & B. 344 (349).

(25) Jenoure v. Delmege, (1891) A. C. 73 (77).

(1) Hare v. Mellers, 3 Leon. 138 (163).

(2) Chatterton v. Secretary of State for India in Council, (1895) 2 Q. B. 189; Grant v. Secretary of State for India in Council, 2 C. P. D. 445; Das v. Secretary of State for India in Council, L. R. 19 Eq. 509.

(3) Lake v. King, 1 Lev. 240.

(4) 2 Inst., p. 228; 4 Co. Rep. 14. See §§ 5736-5738.

(5) Dawkins v. Lord Rokeley, L. R. 7 H. L. 744; Home Bentinck, 2 B. & B. 130.

(6) Per Inglis Lord President in Lightbod v. Gordon, 9 Scotch Sess. Cas. (4th Series), 937, 938.

(7) Kashinath, 8 B. 168.

(8) Venkata Reddi, (1885) 1 Weir 575.

the complainant absolutely privileged, or is his privilege qualified by the terms of this section?

(i) What Persons are in Authority?

5740. Of persons in authority, some possess plenary powers to hear grievances, though they may not themselves possess authority, to redress the grievances. For instance, the King and Parliament, the Secretary of State and the Government of India are persons in authority over all their subjects, though they possess no direct means for redressing complaints made to them. But an accusation preferred to them does not on that account cease to be privileged. The same view may be taken of provincial governors who as representatives of the sovereign also possess that attribute of sovereignty. But judicial officers such as Judges and Magistrates and the Police are directly responsible for disposing of complaints made to them within their jurisdiction, and complaints so made would be protected, however libellous they might otherwise be. But they are only protected, if they are made to those who possess lawful authority over the person complained against, with respect to the subject-matter of the accusation. For instance, if A is a Magistrate in the district B, and C in the district D, a person suffering an injury from a person living in D, could not complain to A, for A is only in lawful authority in B, whereas the person charged resided at D; but if in such a case the accused absconded from D and took shelter in B, the complainant would be entitled to complain both to A and C.

5741. The question of lawful authority is therefore important, though it may at times raise knotty questions. For instance, suppose A is a third class Magistrate at B and the offence complained of is murder or rape, dacoity or arson, all exclusively triable by the Court of Session, in which A does not even possess the power of commitment, would the complaint to A be privileged? The question arose but does not appear to have been considered in England. In one case the defendant wrote a letter to the Home Secretary, complaining of the conduct of the plaintiff, a solicitor, as clerk to the borough Magistrates. The Home Secretary had no power or jurisdiction whatever over the plaintiff, for which reason the communication was held not to be privileged.(9) But the contrary was laid down in another case in which the defendant, an elector of Frome, petitioned the Home Secretary for the removal of the borough Magistrate for making speeches inciting to a breach of the peace, which was held to be privileged, although the petition should have been more properly addressed to the Lord Chancellor.(10)

So in another case, in which the defendant sent a letter to the Secretary of War, complaining against an officer in the army, of non-payment of a debt due to the defendant and asking him to exert his authority to prevail on the plaintiff to pay up, the Court considered the letter privileged as the Secretary of State had general authority over the plaintiff though no direct power or authority to order the plaintiff to pay his debt.(11) This was the ratio decidendi of the case in which the inhabitants of a district, in which the plaintiff was a teacher, prepared a memorial charging

(9) Blagg v. Stuart, 10 Q. B. 899.
(10) Harrison v. Bush, 25 L. J. Q. B. 25; to the same effect Jenoure v. Delmage, [1891] A. C. 73.
(11) Fairman v. Ives, 5 B. & Ald 642.

him with drunkenness and immorality, which they sent to the Local Superintendent of Schools. It ought strictly to have been sent to the trustees of that particular school in the first instance, and such trustees would then, if they thought fit, in due course forward it to the Local Superintendent who was then empowered to take action. It was held that though the memorial was erroneously sent in the first instance to the Superintendent, still it was privileged as the ultimate decision lay with him.(12)

This was presumably the view of Pollock, B., in a case in which the defendant addressed a libellous petition to the Privy Council against the plaintiff, a Sanitary Inspector appointed by the local authority but removable from his office by the Privy Council and whom Denman, J., awarded £350 which was upheld on appeal but on the ground that there was evidence of express malice; but the Court at the same time observed that the power of removal was not judicial, and apart from judicial proceedings there is a class of cases where complaints have been made to high officers of State, in which it has been held that statements made in such complaints are privileged, in the same manner as statements by masters relating to their servants.(13) This was again the view taken in holding libellous complaints against a local postmaster, addressed to the Postmaster-General, privileged.(14) The principle deducible from these cases, would then appear to be this: that where the authority petitioned has some jurisdiction in the matter, the petition is privileged whether such jurisdiction be immediate or ultimate, but where the authority possesses no jurisdiction at all over the subject-matter of the complaint, it is then no more privileged than if it had been published to any other man.

5742. This is all that the rule here enacts, and it has been so understood in the few cases in which its working has been tested. So where the right to a plot of land was in dispute between the complainant and the accused, and the latter in a petition to the Municipality about the land, stated that the complainant was convicted and sentenced to rigorous imprisonment, it was held that the statement to the Municipality, though true, was not privileged.(15) The same view was taken of a statement made by a party to the Registrar of Assurances.(16) So where a public servant, in the course of a departmental enquiry, stated to the Head of his department, that another subordinate in his department borrowed money from his superior officer, the statement was held to be defamatory if it was untrue,(17) and, it may be added, if it was made in good faith.

5743. But a person may bona fide believe a person to possess jurisdiction which in fact he does not possess. In that case, the accused might be protected under any of the general exceptions,(18) and it may be even a circumstance for mitigation but it would not then be protected by this exception.

(12) McIntyre v. McBean, 13 Upper Canada Q. B. R. 534.
(13) Proctor v. Webster, 16 Q. B. D. 112 (114).
(14) Woodward v. Lander, 6 C. & P. 548; Bannister v. Kelty, 59 J. P. 793.
(15) Ramasami v. Ramachandrudu, (1895) 1 Weir 612.
(16) Krishnamal v. Krishnaiyangar, 3 M. L. J. 50, F. B. 15 I. C. 652.
(17) Krishna Rao v. Appaswami, (1891) 1 Weir 585 (586).
(18) E.g., ss. 76, 79.

(ii) Accusation.

5744. Again, even if the person appealed to possess the requisite authority, it does not thence follow that the complaint is privileged under this clause. For, if it is something more than an accusation and something short of bona fide, it would not be privileged. The term "accusation" means a charge or formal complaint that some person has committed an offence.(19) The offence committed need not be punishable under the Code, and it may be punishable under a special or local law, or it may be merely a religious or moral or social delinquency not punishable by law, but in each case the accusation must suit the authority before whom it is formulated; otherwise the accuser cannot appeal to this exception for protection. An Irish Coroner sent a report of an inquest held by him on the body of an outdoor pauper, to the Chief Secretary of Ireland, at which the plaintiff who was the relieving officer had given evidence. He mentioned in this report that the Parish priest had publicly stated in Court that the plaintiff had perjured himself. It was held that this portion of the report, at all events, was not privileged, as the Chief Secretary could have no interest in hearing the opinion of the Parish priest about the plaintiff's evidence.(20) A police officer is equally guilty of defamation if he maliciously makes to his superior officer, a defamatory report against any person, unless he can show that he is protected by some special statutory privilege which the Legislature has created in his favour.(21)

5745. An imputation may contain an accusation as well as vituperation, in which case the former would be separated from the latter and held privileged, though the latter would be unprivileged,(22) and it will be read along with the former for the purpose of considering whether the whole was made in good faith.(23) But in considering the effect of such words, regard must be had to the mode of expression common amongst persons of the class to which the accused belongs, the warmth of his feeling, and the meaning he really intended to attach to the words used by him.(24)

(iii) Accusation must be Made in Good Faith.

5746. Lastly, the accusation must be made in good faith. Now, there can be no good faith, where there is express malice or evidence of culpable negligence or recklessness in the dissemination of the libel. Otherwise the question must be decided according to the circumstances of each case. As Parke, B., said: "If fairly warranted by a reasonable occasion or exigency, and honestly made, such communications are protected for the common convenience and welfare of society, and the law has not restricted the right to make them within any narrow limits."(25) The defendant petitioned the House of Commons against the plaintiff, charging him with extortion and oppression in his office of Vicar-General to the Bishop of Lincoln. Copies of his petition were only distributed amongst members of Parliament, and to no one else. It was held

(19) S. 4 (h), Cr. P. C.
(20) Lynam v. Gowing, 6 L. R. Ir. 259.
(21) Abdul Razak v. Gauri Nath, (1910) P. W. R. 4, 5 I. C. 714.
(22) Warren v. Warren, 1 C. M. & R. 251; Jacob v. Lawrence, 4 L. R. Ir. 579.
(23) Pearson v. Lemaitre, 12 L. J. Q. B. 253.
(24) Per Lord Esher, M. R. in Nevill v. Fine Arts, etc., Co., (1895) 2 Q. B 156 (168).
(25) Toogood v. Spyring, 1 C. M. & R. 181 (193).

that though the petition contained matter which was false and scandalous, still, since the defendant had only circulated it amongst the members of Parliament to whom he applied, it was privileged, and not the less so because he had got it printed; for, though the printing was a publication to the printers and compositors, still it was the usual course of proceeding in Parliament.(1)

The plaintiff had been a clerk to a board of guardians, and claimed a sum of money as due to him. At a meeting of the board, it was proposed that the plaintiff be paid £89 odd, in full settlement of his claim, to which the defendant, a member of the board, moved an amendment to the effect that he be paid only £39 odd, and in his speech he referred to the "defalcations of an unfaithful servant." When this was said, the press reporters were present as usual at all meetings of the board, and there were also present some other persons besides members of the board. But it was held that the occasion was privileged, in spite of the presence of the outsiders; for it was the duty of the defendant to speak out then and there, or the resolution would have been carried and the money voted.(2) But the case would have been otherwise, if the defendant had himself invited outsiders and the reporters and then made defamatory comments in their hearing.(3) The Justices were about to swear in the plaintiff as a paid constable, when defendant, a parishioner, came forward and stated that the plaintiff was an improper person to be a constable. It was held that the fact that other persons besides the Justices were present as usual, did not destroy the privilege attaching to such a bona fide remark.(4) In such cases, the question of good faith depends not upon the concourse of persons present but upon the question whether there were more persons present than necessary, and whether the charge made by the accused before them was made recklessly and unwarrantably.(5) So a person may be privileged as against A, but if he drags in others to support his case against him, he could not claim privilege against them if reference to them was irrelevant. Suppose, for instance, a person were to charge A for taking a bribe, could he be heard to say that the holders of that office were all bribe-takers—so were B, C and D before him?

5747. Statements Made in Self-defence or Defence of Another.—

Exception 9.

As compared to the last, the ninth exception is of wider application, and indeed, it embraces all cases arising under Exception 1. In order to justify a statement under this exception, it is not necessary to show that it is true: all that it is necessary is that the accused honestly believed it to be true and that it was published in self-defence or in the interest of the public. It is founded on the leading English precedent in which the same rule was thus stated by Parke, B.: "In general, an action lies for the malicious publication of statements which are false in fact, and injurious to the character of another (within the well-known limits as to verbal slander), and the law considers such publication as malicious, unless it is fairly made by a person in the discharge of some public or private duty, whether legal or moral, or in the

(1) Lake v. King, 1 Lev. 240.
(2) Pittrad v. Oliver, (1891) 1 Q. B. 474.
(3) Parsons v. Surgey, 4 F. & F. 247.
(4) Kershow v. Bailey, 17 L. J. Ex. 129.
(5) Padmore v. Lawrence, 11 A. & E. 380: Boxsins v. Goblet Freres, (1894) 1 Q. B. 842.

conduct of his own affairs, in matters where his interest is concerned. In such cases, the occasion prevents the inference of malice, which the law draws from unauthorised communications, and affords a qualified defence depending upon the absence of actual malice. If fairly warranted by any reasonable occasion or exigency, and honestly made, such communications are protected for the common convenience and welfare of society; and the law has not restricted the right to make them within narrow limits."(6)

So Lord Campbell, C.J., said in another case(7): "A communication made bona fide upon any subject-matter in which the party communicating has an interest, or in reference to which he has a duty, is privileged, if made to a person having a corresponding interest or duty, although it contains criminatory matter which, without this privilege, would be slanderous and actionable." "The reason for holding any occasion privileged is common convenience and welfare of society, and it is obvious that no definite line can be so drawn as to mark off with precision those occasions which are privileged, and separate them from those which are not."(8) Of course, the rule applies all the more if both the maker of the imputation and its receiver have a common interest in the subject-matter of the communication.(9) But the mutuality of such interest is by no means necessary, though where it exists, it strengthens the occasion for privilege. At the same time, it is understood that the communication is not absolutely privileged because it was the duty, or in the interest of the maker to publish it—for the publication must be made in good faith—which restricts the operation of the rule both as regards the manner of publication and the person to whom it is published. As to the latter, the English rule requires that the publication must be confined only to the person who has a corresponding interest or duty, and this would necessarily be the case, if the publication is made in good faith, of which the two illustrations appended to the exception furnish apt instances.

5748. Again, the English rule requires that the defendant himself should have some interest or duty in making the imputation, while the rule under consideration allows that such interest need not be confined to the maker of the imputation, for it may be made with impunity even if it is made for the protection of the interest of another person or for the public good. But since in such cases, he must be under some duty to that other person or the public, the result in each case is the same and the rule here enacted must not be understood to be wider than the corresponding rule of English Law.

5749. The two questions then that arise under each rule are (i) was the imputation made in the interest of some one, and (ii) was it made in good faith.

(i) What "Interest" is Necessary?

5750. As regards the first, the word "interest" is obviously used to refer to such interest as a person possesses in his property, character, reputation or the like. But besides such personal interest which a person possesses in his own affairs, there is an interest which a person possesses in the

(6) (1834) Toogood v. Spyring, 1 C. M. & R. 181 (193).

(7) Harrison v. Bush, (1855) 5 E. & B. 344 (348).

(8) Per Lindley, L. J., in Stuart v. Bell, (1891) 2 Q. B. 34 (1346).

(9) Per Lopes, L. J. in Hunt v. Great Northern Ry. Co., (1891) 2 Q. B. 189 (192).

affairs of the other persons and in the public generally which cast on him a duty to publish facts and opinions which law equally recognizes as a ground of protection. The "interest" protected is then an interest the protection of which it is his moral or social duty and it may be either of a public or private nature. But in any case, it is essential that the interest must be in the matter communicated, and not merely in making it. For instance, while counsels are entitled to comment upon the evidence adduced in a case in which they are instructed, such comments by a by-stander would be wholly gratuitous and unprotected, because while the former have an interest in the case, the latter has no such interest.(10) The plaintiffs, who were architects, had been employed by a committee to effect the restoration of a church at Skirlaugh. The defendant, a clergyman of the Church of England, wrote to a member of the Committee: "I have seen in The Hull News that the restoration of Skirlaugh Church has fallen into the hands of an architect who is a Wesleyan, and can show no experience in Church work. Can you not do something to avert the irreparable loss which must be caused if any of the masonry of this ancient gem of art be ignorantly tampered with?" The writer was neither the patron nor the minister of the Church, nor a member of the committee appointed to effect its restoration, nor even a parishioner, nor was there any occasion to render the communication privileged either on the ground of duty or of interest, and it was therefore held to be libellous.(11)

But the question whether the quantum of interest possessed by the accused is sufficient to protect his imputation on the ground of privilege, is not always an easy one. Take, for instance, the following case: The mate of a ship sent a letter to the defendant who was his personal friend, in which he accused the Captain of drunkenness and gross misconduct in the navigation of the ship, but requesting him not to communicate with the owner. The defendant showed this letter to two others, and in accordance with their advice communicated it to the owner of the ship who immediately dismissed the Captain. The latter then sued the defendant for libel, and the defendant inter alia pleaded privilege, but though that question was twice argued, the Court was equally divided, Tindal, C. J., and Earle, J., holding the communication privileged while Coltman and Cresswell, JJ., holding that it was not.(12) Tindal, C. J., held that the defendant's communication was made in full belief of the truth of the information, and that he was performing a duty, however much mistaken he might have been as to the existence of such duty, or in his mode of performing it. He held the rule of law not so narrowed and restricted by any authority that a person having information materially affecting the interests of another, and honestly communicating it, in the full belief and with reasonable grounds for the belief that it is true, will not be excused, though he has no personal interest in the subject-matter.(13) Earle, J., however, supported his view on the ground that the information was given for the purpose of preventing damage from misconduct, and that in furnishing such information it was not essential that the giver of the infor-

(10) Lynam v. Gowing, 6 Ir. L. R (Ex-D) 259.
(11) Botterill v. Whitehead, 41 L. T. 588.
(12) Coxhead v. Richards, 2 C. B. 569.
(13) Coxhead v. Richards, 2 C. B. 569 (594, 596).

mation should stand in any relation to the other parties, the rule being founded on the importance of the information to the interests of the receiver.(14)

But these views were controverted by Coltman, J., who held that there was no legal duty calling on the defendant to communicate with the owners, and as to moral duty, it was plainly the other way, for it was the duty of not slandering your fellowmen on insufficient grounds, and "it is clear, that a violation of that duty ought not to be sanctioned in the case of voluntary communications, except under circumstances of great urgency and gravity." And it was no sufficient justification that the defendant had acted bona fide and without malice.(15) This view was concurred in by Cresswell, J., who added that there was no relation of principal and agent between the ship-owner and the defendant; nor was any trust or confidence reposed by the former in the latter; there was no relationship or intimacy between them; no enquiries had been made; they were, until the time in question, strangers; the duty, if it existed at all between them, must therefore have arisen from the mere circumstances of their being fellow subjects of the realm. The mate of the ship might have been, if he believed that which he wrote to be true, under a moral duty to communicate with the owner, but the defendant could not take that vicarious duty upon himself; he was not requested by the mate to communicate, but was, on the contrary, enjoined not to make the communication.(16) But though in that case the matter rested there, the view of Tindal. C. J., has been followed in subsequent cases as laying down the correct rule as to the necessity of interest in publishing defamatory matter.(17) At any rate, this clause is in accordance with that view, for though the defendant may not have been under any public or moral duty to make the communication, it was certainly believed to have been made in the interests of the mate and of the public. As such, to quote Blackburn, J.: "Where a person is so situated that it becomes right in the interests of society that he should tell to a third person certain facts, then if he bona fide and without malice does tell them, it is a privileged communication."(18)

Test of Public Good.

5751. But who is to judge whether a communication is or is not in the interest of society? It is held to be a question of law and not one of fact.(19) As Lindley, L. J., put it: "The question of moral or social duty being for the Judge, each Judge must decide it as best he can for himself. I take moral or social duty to mean a duty imposed by English people of ordinary intelligence and moral principle, but at the same time not a duty enforceable by legal proceedings, whether civil or criminal."(20) The plaintiff was a valet in the service of a person staying at New-

(14) Coxhead v. Richards, 2 C. B., p. 608.

(15) Ib., pp. 599, 601.

(16) Ib., pp. 603, 604.

(17) Per Lindley, L. J., in Stuart v. Bell, (1891) 2 Q. B. 341 (347) per Willes, J., in Aman v. Damm, 3 C. B. N. S. 597 (602); per Lord Blackburn in Davies v. Snead, L. R. 5 Q. B. 608 (611). The statement, made in Folkard's Libel (5th Ed.)., p. 317, Note (s), that the judgements of Coltman and Cresswell, JJ., have received universal assent, is certainly incorrect.

(18) Davies v. Snead, L. R. 5 Q. B. 611; followed per Jessel, M. R., and Brett, L. J., Waller v. Loch, 7 Q. B. D 621.

(19) Per Lindley, L. J. in Stuart v. Bell, (1891) 2 Q. B. 341 (345); contra in Umed Singh, 21 A. L. J. 765.

(20) Per Lindley, L. J., in Stuart v. Bell, (1891) 2 Q. B. 341 (350).

castle as the defendant's guest. The defendant was the Mayor and a Magistrate of the town. The chief constable showed him a letter received from the Edinburgh police informing the Newcastle police that the plaintiff had been suspected of having left after committing a theft at a hotel and suggesting that a cautious inquiry should be made with the view of discovering whether the plaintiff was in possession of the property. The defendant made no enquiry but informed the plaintiff's master of the communication received, whereupon the plaintiff sued the defendant for slander, but the Court held the occasion privileged, Lindley, L. J., observing: "My own conviction is that all or, at all events, the great mass of rightminded men, in the position of the defendant, would have considered it their duty, under the circumstances, to inform Stanley (plaintiff's master) of the suspicion which had fallen on the plaintiff. My own opinion is clear and strong that it was his moral or social, although not his legal, duty to do so, in other words, the occasion was privileged."[21]

5752. Where a person is under a legal duty to inform, he is of course privileged, for it cannot be illegal to publish an imputation when its publication is enjoined by law.[22] The question of good faith is then immaterial, for the question of good faith only arises when the act itself is illegal, and not where it is legal. Now, since ordinarily, and unless otherwise provided by the procedure Code, every member of the public acquainted with the facts of the case is entitled to set the criminal law in motion,[23] it follows that every such communication is privileged as is made for the public good, it being for the public good that society should be rid of its criminals. Assuming then that such person makes a communication in good faith, he could not be prosecuted under this section, though the Court has other means of dealing with him if his communication is found to be false and malicious.[24]

Privilege of the Press.

5753. This view is confirmed by the Privy Council in a case arising upon the following facts. The accused Channing Arnold, was the proprietor and editor of a newspaper published in Rangoon called "The Burma Critic." He was convicted of this offence in that he had published a defamatory article concerning a Mr. Andrew, District Magistrate of Mergui. It appeared that Mr. Andrew had discharged one Captain McCornic of abduction and rape, whereupon the accused criticised the discharge, alleging that Mr. Andrew was an intimate friend and "boon companion" of the accused and by reason of such friendship "he entered into a deliberate conspiracy with Lieutenant Finnie, the District Superintendent of Police," to shield McCornic from punishment and to "burke the crimnial charges made against him," These charges had been repeated after the Government had, after enquiry, apprised the accused of the true facts. The accused was thereupon prosecuted and convicted of defamation and on appeal to the Privy Council, his counsel took up his stand on this exception urging that, though the charge was false, it was made in good faith. Some special, though not an absolute

---

(21) Per Lindley, L. J., in Stuart v. Bell, (1891) 2 Q. B. 341 (350).
(22) S. 79.
(23) Ganesh Narayan Sathe, 13 B. 600; Keshavlal, 21 B. 536; Ramruttun Neogee 6 W. R. 3; Furzand Ali v. Hanuman Prasad, 18 A. 465.
(24) Ss. 182, 211, and s. 250, Cr. P. C.

privilege was claimed for the accused, because he was a journalist as to which Lord Shaw observed: "Their Lordships regret to find that there appeared on the one side in this case the time-worn fallacy that some kind of privilege attaches to the profession of the Press as distinguished from the members of the public. The freedom of the journalist is an ordinary part of the freedom of the subject, and to whatever length the subject in general may go, so also may the journalist, but apart from statute-law his privilege is no other and no higher. The responsibilities which attach to his power in the dissemination of printed matter may, and in the case of a conscientious journalist do make him more careful; but the range of his assertions, his criticisms or his comments, is as wide as, and no wider than, that of any other subject. No privilege attaches to his position."(25) The question of good faith had been found by the jury against the accused and it was well justified by the evidence. Their Lordships then passed in review their own practice in Criminal Cases and in the end dismissed the appeal adding that the result would have been the same even if they had been a court of regular appeal.

5754. Privilege of Judge, Counsel, Parties and Witnesses.—Though the general rules here enacted make no distinction between the several classes of the public, nor confer upon any class any special privilege, the English Common Law places Judges, Counsel, parties and witnesses in a class apart, clothing them with special immunity in respect of utterances made within the sphere of their special duties. The subject may be treated in the following order:—

(i) Their privilege under English Law (§§ 5755);

(ii) The nature and extent of their immunity from civil liablity (§ 5756);

(iii) The nature and extent of their immunity from criminal liability (§§ 5757-5758);

(iv) Common Law rule applicable to civil liability here (§§ 5759-5762); but

(v) Not to criminal liability, since it is subject to this section (§§ 5763-5767).

Absolute Privilege under English Law.

5755. As regards English Law, as far back as 1772, Lord Mansfield laid it down to be the rule that "neither party, witness, counsel, jury or Judge, can be put to answer civilly or criminally, for words spoken in office. If the words are opprobrious or irrelevant to the case, the Court will take notice of them as contempt, and examine on information. If anything mala mens is found on such enquiry, it will be punished suitably.(1) This statement of the law has since been followed in several cases.(2) In England this immunity is said to be absolute, being based on the principle that "the law will rather suffer a private mischief than any public inconvenience" and it is obvious, on the ground of public policy, that persons engaged in the administration of the law, and those who seek justice in respect of wrongs and injuries suffered, or give evidence as to any such, or make defence thereto may not be deterred from so doing by the fear of being harassed by actions or prosecutions, for defamation in respect thereof. But this is a good ground for conferring a privilege but not an absolute privilege erroneously spoken of in the books(3) as attaching to the office of the Judge; for a Judge is not wholly irresponsible for his acts, but may be impeached if he acts maliciously, oppressively, or with partiality in violation of his oath.(4)

(25) Arnold, 41 C. 1023 (1063) P. C.

(1) King v. Skinner, (1772) Lofft 54, 98 E. R. 529 (530).

(2) Dawkins v. Rokeby, L. R. 8 Q. B. 264; Seaman v. Netherclift, 1 C. P. D. 544, 2 C. P. D. 53; Munster v. Lamb, 11 Q. B. D. 594. The Scotch law is the same; per Cockburn, C. J., in Thomas v. Churlan, 2 B. & S. 475 (479). See the case law reviewed per Brett, M. R., in Munster v. Lamb, 11 Q. B. 588 (599-605), and per Fry, L. J., ib., 605-608.

And so Cockburn, C. J., said: "For my own part, I should prefer to treat the immunity of Judges as a matter positivi juris, as settled by decisions and authority, rather than as resting on sound or satisfactory principle, on which, were the matter res integra, it would be desirable to act. I cannot believe that Judges or juries would fail to discharge their duties satisfactorily and fearlessly according to their oaths and consciences, or witnesses give evidence less truthfully, from any fear of exposing themselves to actions at law. I am presuaded that the number of such actions would be infinitely small, and would be easily disposed of; while, on the other hand, I can easily conceive cases in which judicial opportunity might be so perverted and abused for the purpose of injustice, so that, on sound principles, the authors of such wrong ought to be responsible to the parties wronged."(5)

The Privy Council emphasized the same view in the following words. "Upon the other side it would appear from certain observations of the learned Judge that this false dangerous doctrine may have been hinted at, that some privilege or protection which exempts him, in regard to these, from free and adverse comment. He is not above criticism, his conduct and utterances may demand it. Freedom would be seriously impaired if the judicial tribunals were outside of the range of such comment."(6) But these cases merely establish that a person suffering at the hands of a corrupt or malicious Judge is not wholly without redress. In that sense, his privilege is not absolute, but he is nevertheless absolutely privileged in the sense that he is neither civilly nor criminally liable for words spoken in his office, though they be howmuch soever irrelevant malicious, improper or otherwise indefensible. Lord Mansfield declared any other rule to be "subversive of all ideas of a constitution,"(7) and later Judges support it on the ground of common law, public policy and general convenience.

It will thus be seen that English Law throws round Judges and others a cloak of absolute immunity both from civil and criminal liability.

(3) E. g., Odger Libel (4th Ed.) Ch. X, p. 215; Folkard's Libel (4th Ed.), Ch VIII, p. 192; 1 Halsbury's Laws of England, p. 13, § 14.

(4) Scroggs, 8 How. St. Tr. 163, 198; Arnold, 41 C. 1023, P. C.

(5) Dawkins v. Paulet, 9 B. & S. 755.

(6) Arnold, 41 C. 1023 (1063, 1064), P. C.

(7) King v. Skinner, Lofft 54; 98 E. R. 529 (530).

5756. And counsel or advocate,[8] and witnesses[9] though not parties, and their agents are held to stand on the same footing, that is, like the Judges, they are all absolutely privileged and no action will lie for damages for words spoken by them in the conduct of a case, even if they were irrelevant and uttered maliciously. The defendant was a county court Judge, before whom the plaintiff, an accountant and scrivener, had been sued, and who referring to him said "you are a harpy, preying upon the vitals of the poor." The words were stated to have been spoken falsely and maliciously and without any reasonable and probable cause and not bona fide, in the discharge of his duty as Judge. But the court of Exchequer unanimously threw out the plaint, on the ground that a Judge could not be sued for words spoken in his office, Kelly. C. B., adding: "It is essential in all Courts that the Judges who are appointed to administer the law should be permitted to administer it under the protection of the law and independently and freely without favour and without fear. This provision of the law is not for the protection or benefit of a malicious or corrupt Judge, but for the benefit of the public, whose interest it is that the Judges should be at liberty to exercise their functions with independence and without fear of consequences. How could a Judge so exercise his office, if he were in daily and hourly fear of an action being brought against him, and of having the question submitted to a jury, whether a matter on which he had commented judicially was or was not relevant to the case before him?

(2) Absolute Civil Immunity.

Again, if a question arose as to the bona fides of the Judge, it would have, if the analogy of similar cases is to be followed, to be submitted to the jury. Thus if we were to hold that an action is maintainable against a Judge, for words spoken by him in his judicial capacity, under such circumstances as those appearing on these pleadings, we should expose him to constant danger of having questions such as that of good faith or relevancy raised against him before a jury, and of having the mode in which he might administer justice in his Court submitted to their determination. It is impossible to overestimate the inconvenience of such a result."[10] This case is then an authority for holding that, in England under English Law, a Judge cannot be sued for defamation for words spoken or written in his office, however unjustifiable and malicious they may be, and the same immunity has been extended to the judicial officers of this country by an Act enacted for their protection[11] (§ 5730). But as observed before, this Act does not advisedly go beyond exempting them from their liability to be sued in any Civil Court, for any act done or ordered to be done by them in the discharge of their judicial duty, whether or not within the limits of their jurisdiction: provided that he at the time, in good faith, believed himself to have jurisdiction to do or order the act complained of. This

(8) Munster v. Lamb 11 Q. B. D. 588.
(9) Mackey v. Food, 5 H. & N. 792; Pedley & May v. Morris, 61 L. J. Q. R. 21; Lilley v. Roney, 61 L. J. Q. B. 727.
(10) Scott v. Stansfield, L. R. 3 Ex. 220 (223); to the same effect, Lord Esher in Anderson v. Gorrie, (1895) 1 Q. B. 668.
(11) Act XVIII of 1850.

absolute civil immunity, though statutory in the case of judicial officers, is held to extend to counsel, parties and witnesses by force of the common law,[12] for the play of which there is room, since the Indian law of torts is not yet codified and is consequently the law of justice, equity and good conscience, which drags in the rules of English common law as the quintessence of justice.

Indian Rule the Same.

5757. In any case so far as regards the civil liability of Judges, the question has been set at rest by the Statute, and as regards counsel and witnesses, by a decision of the Privy Council decided upon the following facts: An affray took place between a tenant of the plaintiff and the defendants in which one of their party was killed. One of the defendants thereupon falsely complained to the Magistrate and the other two defendants falsely confirmed his statement that the plaintiff and his son had killed the deceased, whereupon they were both arrested, but the plaintiff was discharged and he sued the defendants for damages, alleged to be for the defamation of his character by the defendants, for swearing themselves to the injury of the plaintiff; and the case having gone up to the Privy Council, their Lordships observed: "This action has been called a suit to recover damages for defamation of character. Their Lordships are of opinion with the High Court, that if it had been, strictly speaking, such an action, it could not have been maintained; for they agree with that Court that witnesses cannot be sued in a civil Court for damages, in respect of evidence given by them upon oath in a judicial proceeding. Their Lordships hold this maxim, which certainly has been recognised by all the Courts of this country, to be one based upon principles of public policy. The ground of it is this, that it concerns the public and the administration of justice that witnesses giving their evidence on oath in a Court of Justice should not have before their eyes the fear of being harassed by suits for damages; but that the only penalty which they should incur if they give evidence falsely should be an indictment for perjury. But it appears to their Lordships that the suit of the paintiff in the Courts below, although called a suit for defamation of character, may be substantially supported (the question is one of substance rather than of form) as an action for a malicious prosecution."[13]

5758. This dictum is, of course, conclusive so far as it goes, and those who hold litigants governed by this section have no difficulty in distinguishing it on the ground that it merely refers to their civil liability, and does not bear upon the question under reference. So in a recent case, it was said that while as regards the civil liability of such person considered as a tortfeasor, there was room for the application of the English rule as quintessence of justice, equity and good

---

(12) Munster v. Lamb, 11 Q. B. D. 588; Gunesh Dutt v. Mugneeram, 11 B. L. R. 321 P. C.; affiring O. A. Mugnee Ram v. Gonesh Dutt, 5 W. R. 134; Bhikumber v. Becharam, 15 C. 264; Golap v. Bholanath, 38 C. 880; Crowdy v. Reilly, 17 C. W. N. 554; Satish Chandra v. Ram Doyal, 48 C. 388 (415, 416) S. B. Bhaishankar v. Wadia, 2 Bom. L. R. 3 F. B.; Chunilal v. Narsing Das, 40 A. 341 F. B.; Govindan v. Atchutha, 39 M. 433; Jagat Mohan v. Kalipada, 1 Pat. 371; Karu Singh, (1926) Pat. 425.

(13) Ganesh Dutt Singh (Baboo) v. Mugneeram, 11 B. L. R. 321 (328, 329), P. C., 17 W. R. 283, O. A. from 5 W. R. 134.

conscience, because the Indian Law of Torts is still uncodified, there was no room for its application to modify the provisions of this section which forms part of a Code the essence of which is to be exhaustive.(14) This view is now concurred in by all Courts.(15) And it was thus justified by Knox, A. C. J., who said: "Expressum facit cessare tacitum, is a maxim that cannot be overlooked in construing Statutes whether English or Indian. The Indian Penal code in making defamation a criminal offence was creating an offence which was till then not an offence in India. It is difficult to conceive that a maxim which, as their Lordships say, certainly has been recognised by all the Courts in England to be one based upon principles of public policy, could have been absent from the minds of the framers of the Code, when they were considering this new offence they were creating.(16) Even if it were, the fact remains that the law contains an omission which the Courts cannot supply by having recourse to the doctrine of common law or of public policy. The present position of law is then this—that while litigants, their counsel and their witnesses are absolutely privileged so far as regards their civil liability, their privilege under criminal law is only qualified and limited by good faith as provided in Exceptions(7)-(9) of this section.

5759. Common Law Privilege.—Under English Law "neither party, witness, counsel, jury, nor Judge can be put to answer civilly or criminally for words spoken in office,(17) unless a Judge goes beyond his jurisdiction when a different set of considerations arise,(18) that is to say, the immunity of the Judge extends only to words spoken with reference to a matter within his jurisdiction, which is properly before him. It does not extend to any words spoken however maliciously and without probable and reasonable cause, in a matter not properly before him.(19) So it was the view of Lord Ellenborough that a Judge was only privileged so long as he did not exceed his jurisdiction,(20) and subject to the rule enacted in section 79 and section 19 of the Judicial Officer's Protection Act,(21) it would appear to be the rule in this country. But a Judge

(3) English Law.

(14) Kari Singh, 40 C. 433; Satis Chandra v. Ram Dayal, 48 C. 388 F. B.; M. Bannerjee v. Anukul, 55 C. 85.

(15) Abdul Hakim v. Richander, 3 A. 815; Isri Prasad v. Umrad Singh, 22 A. 234; Ganga Prasad 29 A. 685; but in Kallu v. Sital, 40 A. 271, witness was held to be exempt from a prosecution for this offence by reason of s. 132 of the Indian Evidence Act. But this affords a very limited protection confined to evidence given in the circumstance therein stated; Tiravengada v. Tripurasundari 49 M. 728 F. B.; Anwaruddin v. Fatheni Bai, 100 I. C. (M.) 537; Bai Shantana v. Umrao, 50 B. 162 F. B McDonnell, 3 R. 524; Nirsu Narayan Singh, 6 Pat. 224; Maya Das, (1893) P. R No 14; Fateh Muhammad, (1889) P. R. No. 84; Phundi Ram, (1911) P. W. R. 7, 10 I. C. 681; Champa Devi, 24 A. L. J. 329, (1926) A. 287; Kari Singh, 40 C. 433; Satis Chandra v. Ram Dayal, 48 C. 388 F. B.; M. Banerjee v. Anukul, 55 C. 85; Suraj Mal v. Ram Nath, (1928) N. 58.

(16) Ganga Prasad, 29 A. 685 (696, 697, 699), per Knox, A. C. J. and Aikman, J., Richards, J. dissentiente.

(17) Per Lord Mansfield in Skinner, Loft. 55 (56).

(18) Per Lord Esher, M. R., in Anderson v. Gorrie, (1895) 1 Q. B. 668 (671).

(19) Kirby v. Simpson, 10 Exch. 358; Gelen v. Hall, 2 H. & N. 379.

(20) Thomas Pieton, 30 St. Tr. 225 (791); cited and explained per Lord Esher, M. R., in Anderson v. Gorrie, (1895) 1 Q. B. 668 (671). The language of Fry, L. J., in Munster v. Lamb, 11 Q. B. D. 588 (607), is wider, but the question of jurisdiction was not considered there. On the other hand, its existence was assumed; see Ib., p. 608.

(21) Act XVIII of 1850.

(which term includes a Magistrate and all judicial officers whatever their designation) does not cease to have jurisdiction over the subject-matter of a suit or proceeding for this purpose as soon as he has disposed of it or permitted its withdrawal by a party.[22] Indeed, the question of jurisdiction should not be too narrowly scanned.

5760. As regards counsel his privilege is even greater, and not less than that of the Judge, for he speaks in the presence of the Judge who can check him if he says what is improper.[23] Subject to this he is absolutely privileged whether the words spoken by him be false, malicious and irrelevant.[24] So Brett, M. R., said: "Of the three classes—Judge, witness, and counsel—it seems to me that a counsel has a special need to have his mind clear from all anxiety. A counsel's position is one of the utmost difficulty. He is not to speak of that which he knows; he is not called upon to consider whether the facts with which he is dealing are true or false, and what he has to do is to argue as best he can, without degrading himself, in order to maintain the proposition which will carry with it either the protection or the remedy which he desires for his client. If amidst the difficulties of his position he were to be called upon during the heat of his argument to consider whether what he says is true or false, whether what he says is relevant or irrelevant, he would have his mind so embarassed that he could not do the duty which he is called upon to perform. For, more than a Judge, infinitely more than a witness, he wants protection on the ground of benefit to the public. The rule of law is that what is said in the course of the administration of the law is privileged; and the reason of that rule covers a counsel even more than a Judge or witness. To my mind it is illogical to argue that the protection of privilege ought not to exist for a counsel who deliberately and maliciously slanders another person. The reason of the rule is that a counsel who is not malicious and who is acting bona fide may not be in danger of having actions brought against him. If the rule of law were otherwise, the most innocent counsel might be unrighteously harassed with suits, and therefore it is better to make the rule of law so large that an innocent counsel shall never be troubled, although by making it so large counsel are included who have been guilty of malice and misconduct."[25] In this view, the privilege enjoyed by counsel is greater and not less than that possessed by a judicial officer, and if in a case a Judge could not be prosecuted for a defamatory utterance, no more can a counsel though his utterance be false, irrelevant and expressly malicious. But, of course, in such a case it will be the duty of the Judge to see that the privilege is not abused and that it is not made a cloak for the gratification of personal animosity.

---

(22) Law v. Llewellyn, (1906) 1 K. B. 487.

(23) Per Brett, M. R. (Lord Esher), in Munster v. Lamb, 11 Q. B. D. 588 (596).

(24) Per Brett, M. R. (Lord Esher), in Munster v. Lamb, 11 Q. B. D. 588 (593, 603).

(25) Per Brett, M. R., Fry, L. J., concurrent; Munster v. Lamb, 11 Q. B. D. 588 (603 604); following Skinner, Loft. 55; Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby, L. R. 8 Q. B. 255 (263, 264, 268): Kennedy v. Hilliard, 10 Gr. C. L. R. N. S. 195 (209), dissenting from Lord Denman, L. J., in Kendillon v. Maltby, 2 M. & R. 438.

5761. Apart, however, from this unqualified privilege the Court will accord to counsel the liberty of speech, which, having regard to the time and circumstance, it will consider as justified in forensic argument though the same statement, if uttered elsewhere, would be clearly defamatory. This is so because the measure of good faith must vary with the necessity of the case. Counsel are presumed to address the Court from instructions, and the Court will presume this fact,[1] sufficient to rebut the imputation of malice, till malice is otherwise proved.[2] Such was held to be the case of the accused, a mukhtyar, to whom a litigant approached to secure the transfer of his case from the file of a Magistrate, whereupon the accused drew up a petition for transfer charging the Magistrate with corruption which he delivered to the client to file personally, himself remaining in the background. The man filed it, and when questioned about the defamatory imputation therein contained, he falsely disclaimed all knowledge of it whereupon, the accused was prosecuted for this offence, and his pleader rested his defence upon this exception, but Turner, J., held that he had not acted in good faith because he had himself suggested the plea as likely to insure the transfer while his refusal to accept the mukhtiarnama and to appear in Court in support of the application deprived him of the privilege of counsel. In other words, the imputation was published by a mukhtyar, but not as such, and he was consequently held to have been rightly convicted of this offence.[3]

(4) Indian Rule.

5762. The immunity possessed by counsel has been held to extend to all advocates whether counsel or not: e.g., an attorney[4] or a solicitor[5] acting in a county or police court; and it would then extend equally to a vakil, pleader or mulkhtyar and other legal practitioners, including even a party's agent to whom is entrusted the conduct of a case. And, of course, the same immunity extends to a party himself, who is, if anything, because of his ignorance of the proper mode of conducting a case, allowed even a still greater latitude,[6] though this does not enable him to seize the occasion to gratify malice by traducing his adversary or other persons unconnected with the case. The accused was under prosecution in a previous case for defamation by the complainant and was represented by counsel. The complainant, a minister of the Gospel, was being examined as a witness against the accused, who interjected the remark to him: "You cheated people at Hyderabad, and had to leave ministry." The imputation was false and the accused claimed the privilege of party, and reliance was placed on the leading precedent[7] which the Court held to protect parties only for words written or spoken in the ordinary course of a judicial proceeding, and Pleaders and Parties.

---

(1) Butt v. Jackson, 10 Ir. L. R. 120; Flint v. Pike, 4 B. & C. 473; Nikunja v. Harendra, 38 C. 375; following Upendra Nath v. Savi, 36 C. 375; M. Banerjee, 104 I. C. (C.) 717; Anwaruddin, 52 M. L. J. 269, 100 I. C. 537, (1927) M. 379; Nagari (In re), 19 B. 340; Nikunja v. Harendra Chandra, 41 C. 514; Nirsu Narain Singh, (1926) Pat. 499; McDonnell, 3 R. 524.

(2) Kripasindhu, 54 C. 137; Bhagwan Das, 98 I. C. 481, (1927) A. 116.

(3) Christian, 2 N. W. P. H. C. R. 473.

(4) Mackay v. Ford, 5 H. & N. 792.

(5) Munster v. Lamb, 11 Q. B. D. 588.

(6) Per Holroyd, J., in Hogson v. Scarlett, 1 B. & Ald. 244.

(7) Munster v. Lamb, 11 Q. B. D. 588.

did not confer an unlimited license on parties to libel persons, and in that view the accused was convicted.(8)

The same view was reiterated in another case in which the accused being asked to explain the circumstances appearing in the evidence against him, stated that his grandfather had, at one time, kept the wife of the complainant as his concubine, which was found to be a statement both false and malicious, upon which both Moore and Subramania Aiyar, JJ., agreed in holding the statement defamatory though they differed as to the extent of privilege enjoyed by parties, Moore, J., holding it to be limited by this exception, while his colleague was for extending the wider latitude admissible under English law.(9) But under either view, the accused possesses special liberty of speech which would not be tolerated in any other person. As a rule his statement would be privileged if it has reference to the inquiry and is not expressly malicious (§5764). Where, for instance, the complainant charged the accused with forgery, and the latter being called upon to explain the evidence adduced against him stated that the complainant was his former mistress now in the keeping of another person, and there was some evidence of the truth of the statement, the Court held it to be privileged under this exception.(10)

5763. Of course, the rule of public policy only confers a wider latitude upon persons engaged in a judicial proceeding, but this section has in one respect a still wider application and would apply to proceedings whether judicial or otherwise. But in the latter case, the privilege would be held strictly limited by this clause.(11) The accused called the complainant a "pariah dog" in the course of a quarrel. The latter filed a complaint for defamation before a Magistrate but which he afterwards compromised; but the complainant's relatives did not approve of the compromise and convened a punchayat to call the accused to account for applying the offensive epithet to the complainant. The punchayat asked the accused if he could justify it and the latter admitted his "folly" in using the offensive epithet but justified it by alleging that one Antony had informed him that the complainant had, three years ago, had connection with a pariah woman, and the statement was held to be privileged as made in vindication of his character which the accused considered having been unjustifiably attacked.(12)

(5) Privilege Limited by Good Faith.

This case was decided upon the authority of an English case in which the defendant having been violently attacked by the plaintiff, a barrister, issued his defence in which he commented severely on the speech and conduct of the plaintiff, which he published in a newspaper which the Privy Council held to be privileged on the principle which their Lordships enunciated almost in the very words of this exception: "Their Lordships are clearly of opinion that his charge was a

(8) Hayes v. Christian, 15 M. 414.
(9) Nadu Gounden v. Nadu Gounden, (1899) 1 Weir 589.
(10) Murugesa Pillai v. Papathi Ammal, (1897) 1 Weir 612.
(11) Kari Gowda, 19 B. 51.
(12) Gobindappa Nayak, 7 M. 36; following Laughton v. Bishop of Sodor and Man, L. R. 4 P. C. 495 (504).

privileged communication, in the ordinary sense of the term, on the well-known principle that a communication made bona fide, upon any subject-matter in which the party communicating has an interest, or in reference to which he has, or honestly believes he has a duty, is privileged, if made to a person having a corresponding interest or duty, although it contains criminatory matter which, without that privilege, would be defamatory and actionable."(13)

Witnesses.

5764. Witnesses, whilst under examination, are accorded a similar privilege, though it is necessarily more limited. Under the English rule a witness is absolutely privileged in answering all the questions asked of him by the counsel on either side; and even if his statement is volunteered provided it is made in continuation of the answer elicited by the question put, or was necessary to complete the reply, though counsel had previously warned the witness to say no more. It was so held in a case in which the plaintiff sued the defendant for damages for slandering him from the witness-box in a case in which he was called upon to depose as a handwriting expert. The defendant had, in another case sworn to a will attested by the plaintiff being a forgery, but the Court found it to be a genuine will; and the Judge castigated the defendant as a recklessly imprudent witness. In the subsequent case, the defendant appeared again as an expert witness and in his cross-examination he was questioned whether he had read the Judge's remark upon his testimony. The defendant said that he had. The cross-examination then stopped, but the defendant said that he should like to make a statement about that case, but the Judge said that he could not hear any statement respecting a case not before him. The defendant then ejaculated, in spite of the protests of the Court, the words: "I believe that Will to be a rank forgery, and I shall believe so to the day of my death." The plaintiff, an attorney, who had attested that Will, thereupon sued him for slandering him, and the jury found that the words spoken by the defendant were malicious and volunteered for his own purposes, and then arose the question of law whether a defamatory statement volunteered by a witness was privileged, and it was held by Lord Coleridge, C. J., that such a statement was privileged only if it is intended to be made in a judicial proceeding as a part of evidence necessary to complete his answer, even though the answer be not relevant to the case.(14)

And this view was affirmed by the Court of Appeal, Cockburn, C.J., observing: "if there is anything as to which the authority is overwhelming it is that a witness is privileged to the extent of what he says in the course of his examination. Neither is that privilege affected by the relevancy or irrelevancy of what he says; for then he would be obliged to judge of what is relevant or irrelevant and questions might be, and are, constantly asked which are not strictly relevant to the issue. But I agree that if in this case, beyond being spoken maliciously, the words had not been spoken in the character of a witness, or are not while he was giving evidence in the case, the result might have been different. For I am very far from desiring to be considered as laying down as law that what a witness states altogether out of the character and sphere of a witness, or what he may say dehors the matter in hand, is necessarily protected. I quite agree that what he says, before he enters or after he has left the witness-box, is not privileged. Or if a man when in the witness-box were to take advantage of his position, to utter something having no reference to the cause or matter of inquiry, in order to assail the character of another, as if he were asked: Were you at York on a certain day? and he were to answer: Yes, and A B picked my pocket there; it certainly might well be said in such a case that the statement was altogether dehors the character of witness, and not within the privilege."(15) Such was the case of the accused from whom, whilst under cross-examination, the complainant, Kasim Sahib, asked the Magistrate to inquire if he had not been previously convicted. The question was objected to, and before the Magistrate could decide upon its admissibility, the accused cried out: "Yes, I was convicted because I had Kasim Sahib's wife in my house," which he repeated in spite of a warning by the Magistrate not to repeat it. His statement was held to be defamatory of Kasim's wife and in no way protected.(16)

(13) Laughton v. Bishop of Sodor and Man, L. R. 4 P. C. 495 (504).

(14) Seaman v. Netherclift. 1 C. P. D. 540 (54[illegible] 17); O. A. 2 C. P. D. 53.

Privileges of Party and Witness Compared.

5765. In this and in all such cases the sole question now to consider is whether the act or words of the accused are defended by good faith. Of course, it is not of the essence of good faith that truth shall be proved. For a person acts in good faith, if having regard to facts and circumstances within his knowledge, he might, as an ordinarily reasonable and prudent man, have drawn the conclusions which he has expressed in defamatory language for the protection of his own interest.(17) In a recent case Pigott, J., defended the statement of a witness with reference to s. 132 of the Indian Evidence Act, but it confers upon witnesses a very limited immunity confined only to answers which he is compelled to give.(18) The defendant had in a previous suit described the plaintiff as sho, which was a very low caste. The plaintiff sued for damaes and got one anna which the High Court awarded him, holding that the defendant's statement though made in the course of pleadings was not absolutely privileged.(19) This view was reiterated in another case where the plaintiff was described in offensive language.(20) But so far as regards Counsel, while their privilege here is limited by good faith still the Courts would presume good faith unless there be evidence of private malice.(21)

Limits of the Privilege: Exceptions 7-9.

5766. The question how much of abuse is privileged under the exceptions, must, of course, depend upon its relevancy and the intention of the abuser, for if his abuse was incidental, his main object being otherwise, the Court should feel justified in treating abuse as given in good faith. The accused, who was the partner of the defendant in a civil suit, saw the complainant during its hearing, to go and sit amongst the plaintiff's witness, whereupon he complained to the Judge that he had gone

(15) Seaman v. Netherclift, 2 C. P. D. 53 (56, 57).

(16) Syed Hussain, (1881) Weir (3rd Ed.) 357; Mhd. Sher Ali v. Ghasi Roud, 59 I. C. (A) 863, 22 Cr. L. J. 159.

(17) Abdul Hakim v. Tej Chandar, 3 A. 815; Sayed Ally, (1925) R. 360.

(18) Kallu v. Sital, 16 A. L. J. 201; Moss, 16 A. 88.

(19) Angoda Ram v. Nemai Chand, 23 C. 867.

(20) Kali Nath v. Gobinda Chandra, 5 C. W. N. 293.

(21) Anwaruddin v. Fatima 52 M. L. J. 269, 100 I. C. 537, (1927) M. 379.

to tamper with his witnesses. It was held that the statement was protected by this exception, as the accused was acting in the interest of his partner, and his complaint to the Judge was made in good faith—which presumably consisted in his inferring the motive of the complainant by his act in having to sit amongst the witnesses of the accused's adversary during the examination of his witnesses.(22) The statement of a witness is then privileged whether it is volunteered or made in reply to a question properly addressed to him, if it is "made with reference to the inquiry" though it may not be relevant to it.(23) But the privilege of a witness does not commence till he is actually sworn to give evidence, and it does not continue after he is discharged. Consequently, an observation made by an expectant witness, while waiting about the Court before or after he has given evidence, is not privileged.(24) On this point the following provisions of the Indian Evidence Act are instructive:

"S. 132. A witness shall not be excused from answering any question as to any matter relevant to the matter in issue in any suit or in any civil or criminal proceeding, upon the ground that the answer to such question will criminate, or may tend directly or indirectly to criminate such witness, or that it will expose, or tend directly or indirectly to expose such witness to a penalty or forfeiture of any kind:

Witness not excused from answering on ground that answer will criminate.

"Provided that no such answer, which a witness shall be compelled to give, shall subject him to any arrest or prosecution, or be proved against him in any criminal proceeding, except a prosecution for giving false evidence by such answer." (25)

Proviso.

5767. This provision has sometimes been referred to as laying down the limit of privilege extended to witnesses against their prosecution for this offence,(1) but this view assumes the truth of the converse proposition, which is, of course, fallacious. It has been accordingly held that a witness cannot be prosecuted for defamation, in respect of statements made by him in the course of his evidence given in a judicial proceeding. So where the accused whilst under examination as a witness, falsely stated that the complainant had been convicted of an offence by a Criminal Court, the Court held it afforded no ground for his prosecution for this offence, though he might be proceeded against for giving false evidence.(2)

According to the view now held neither party to a litigation, whether complainant or the accused, is entitled to anything more than the statutory privilege here accorded.(3) And the fact that the person is the accused does not vest him with special immunity if he uses the dock as a pulpit for traducing people. The complainant does not even enjoy the special privilege accorded to witnesses.(4) He is however protected if he made statements resulting from action taken under ss. 154 and 155 of the Criminal Procedure Code.(5)

(22) Purushotam Kala, 9 B. 269.

(23) This was the language used by Bramwell, J. A., in Seaman v. Netherclift, 2 C. P. D. 53 (59), on the authority of Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby, L. R. 7 H L. 744.

(24) Trotman v. Dunn, 4 Camp. 211; Iunam v. Gouing, 6 L. R. Ir. 259.

(25) Act I of 1872.

(1) Per Knox, A. C. J., in Ganga Prasad, 29 A. 685; Kallu v. Sital, 40 A 271.

(2) Babaji, 17 B. 127; followed in Balkrishna, 17 B. 573.

(3) Satis Chandra v. Ram Dayal, 48 C. 388 F. B.; Subramania v. Thirumudi, 11 Bur. L. J. 104; 42 I. C. 763; 18 Cr. L. J. 1019, and cases cited ante.

(4) Dinshaw Edulji v. Jehangir 47 B. 15.

(5) Parwati, 41 A. 311.

5768. Privilege Arising from Interest or Duty.—Besides Counsel, Judge, parties and their witnesses in a judicial proceeding, there are others to whom this clause affords its qualified protection. Two such cases are given in the illustrations, which are obviously drawn from the two leading precedents in which that view was taken.(6) As to illustration (a) it was held in England that the defendant, who was interested in the proceeds of a sale, was entitled to warn the auctioneer not to part with the property sold to the plaintiff, unless he paid for it, on the ground that he had committed an act of bankruptcy.(7) So a creditor of the plaintiff may comment on the plaintiff's mode of conducting his business to the man who is surety to that creditor for the plaintiff's trade-debts.(8) The defendant had dismissed the plaintiff from his services on suspicion of theft, and upon the plaintiff returning to his shop for his wages, the defendant called in two of his servants and told them in the hearing of the plaintiff: "I have dismissed that man for robbing me; do not speak to him any more, in public or in private, or I shall think you as bad as him." The statement was held to be privileged on the ground that both the interest and the duty of the defendant were to prevent his servants from associating with such a person.(9)

Indeed, the "interest" which constitutes the privilege may be acquired in a variety of ways, and it may vary in its extent, so that it may be so small that the Court would then hold it to be no interest at all for the purpose of this clause. It would have been useful, if it were possible, to define a limit of such justifiable interest, but it is obviously impossible, for in the chequered commerce of life it can never be predicated as to what degree of interest should justify a libel. Consequently, as observed by Kay, L. J., "the true mode of judging upon the question is to put oneself as much as possible in the position of the defendant.(10) It is not enough for the accused honestly to believe that a duty or interest exists. There must be facts upon which the Court could hold that the accused had reason to possess the interest under which he shields his libel.(11) If there were no facts or circumstances to create such an interest, the fact that he honestly believed in its existence may protect him under section 76, and it may otherwise be a mitigating circumstance, but it is not a complete answer to the charge.(12) The duty of the question of interest is then a legal inference from facts upon which it is the duty of the Judge to find whether it constitutes a privileged occasion.(13)

(6) Ill. (a) is Blackham v. Pugh, (1846) 2 C. B. 611; to the same effect now, Baker v. Carrick, (1894) 1 Q. B. 838; ill. (b) follows a bead-roll of cases commencing with Barwis v. Keppel, (1766) 2 Wils. 314; Sutton v. Jhonston, (1785) 1 T. R. 493; Grant v. Gould (1792) 2 Hen. Bl. 69; Mansergh, 1 B. & S. 400; Warden v. Bailey, 4 Taunt 67; Dawkins v. Lord Paulet, L. R. 5 Q. B, 94; Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby, L. R. 8 Q. B. 271; Grant v. Secretary of State for India, 2 C. P. D. 445; Doss v. Secretary of State for India, L. R. 19 Eq. 509; Chatterton v. Secretary of State for India, (1895) 2 Q. B. 189.

(7) Blackham v. Pugh, 2 C. B. 611.

(8) Dunman v. Bigg, 1 Camp. 269-n.

(9) Somerville v. Hawkins, 10 C. B. 583.

(10) Per Key, L. J., in Stuart v. Bell, (1891) 2 Q. B. 341 (359).

(11) Hebditch v. MacIlwaine and others. (1894) 2 Q. B. 54.

(12) Stuart v. Bell, (1891) 2 Q. B. 341 (349).

(13) Per Lord Esher, M. R., in Hebditch v. MacIlwaine and others, (1894) 2 Q. B. 54 (58).

5769. Of course neither the interest nor the duty need necessarily be an interest or duty enforceable by law, for it may be a moral or social duty of imperfect obligation,(14) which must also be decided by the Judge.(15) A familiar instance of such a duty is the character given to a servant in answer to an inquiry addressed by a person to whom the servant had applied for employment, in which case the occasion is privileged for the common convenience of society even though it should appear that the former employer was mistaken in some of his statements.(16)

Advice Gratis When Protected.

5770. In such case, it is not even necessary that the information should be given in answer to an inquiry,(17) though, if it is so given, it will be of itself sufficient evidence of good faith, provided, of course, that the occasion is not availed of for the purpose of defamation. So if an intending customer comes to me and inquires as to the respectability of a tradesman, it is my duty to tell him all I know. But I am not justified in taking my stand at the tradesman's door and voluntarily decry him to his intending customers.(18) So, again, if I see A's servant robbing A, it is my duty to inform A, but I take greater risk if I inform A about a floating rumour as to his servant's dishonesty without taking any trouble to ascertain the truth.(19) So where the plaintiff, by name King, a master, purchased a quantity of barley of Butler, to whom the defendant offered the following advice gratis: "Don't trust that damned rogue, he will never pay you a farthing. Have you sold King some barley? You mind and have the money for it before it goes out of the waggon, or you will never have it." Butler, in consequence, refused to deliver the barley till he was paid for it. Lord Abinger, C. B., told the jury that the defendant's words were unprivileged because they were volunteered.(20) They, moreover, bore the imprint of malice. And the defendant was in no way interested in Butler. But if he had been his friend, partner or creditor or otherwise concerned in his business, his advice, though voluntary, would have been privileged. Such was the case of the defendant who wrote to the lady to whom the plaintiff was about to be married, disclosing to her all his antecedents. The defendant had been a friend of the plaintiff and the letter was written in consultation with the clergyman of his parish which the Court consequently held to be prima facie privileged.(21) Dawes told the defendant that he intended to engage the plaintiff as accoucheur at his wife's approaching confinement; the defendant thereupon advised him not to do so on account of the plaintiff's alleged immorality. The communication was held to be privileged though it had been volunteered.(22)

5771. The landlord may complain to the tenant of the conduct of her lodgers(23) and the occupier of a house may complain to the landlord

(14) Per Lord Campbell, C. J., in Harrison v. Bush, 5 E. & B. 344 (349).

(15) Per Lindley, L. J., in Stuart v. Bell, (1891) 2 Q. B. 341 (350).

(16) Edmondson v. Stephenson, (1766) Buller's N. P. 8; per Brett, L. J., in Waller v. Loch, 7 Q. B. D. 622; Jenoure v. Delmege, (1891) A. C. 73 (78); Robshaw v. Smith, 38 L. T. 424.

(17) Per Jessel, M. R., in Waller v. Loch, 7 Q. B. D. 621.

(18) Southam v. Allen, L. Raym. 231.

(19) Cleaver v. Sarrande, 1 Camp. 268; Kine v. Sewell, 3 M. & W. 297; Amann v. Damm, 8 C. B. N. S. 597; Masters v. Burgess, (1886) 3. T. L. R. 96.

(20) King v. Watts, 8 C. & P. 614 (Damage one farthing).

(21) Re Coleridge, Q. C. 15 C. B. N. S. 410, 411.

(22) Dixon v. Smith, 29 L. J. Ex. 125 (129).

(23) Knight v. Gibbs, 1 A. & E. 43.

of the workmen he has sent to repair the house.[24] So information given to a vicar absent on the continent, as to rumours affecting the moral character of the curate he has left in charge, is privileged; so is similar information given verbally to the absent vicar's solicitor with a view to his informing the vicar, should he think it right to do so; so again, is the information given to a neighbouring vicar who has asked the curate in charge to preach for him.[25] So where the plaintiff, a good churchman, informed the bishop of the diocese, of a report current as to the disgraceful conduct of the incumbent of a parish in which the defendant did not reside and in which he was not personally interested, his communication was held to be privileged, because he was interested in a matter which brought scandal on the church.[1] So a letter written by a clerk to a Board of Guardians complaining that one of the under-clerks in the office neglected his duty and behaved in an offensive and insubordinate manner was held to be privileged.[2]

The plaintiff was the daughter of a deceased officer in the army. Two ladies, A and B, interested themselves in securing subscriptions. A collected some subscriptions for her and B wrote to a society for information concerning the plaintiff which being unfavourable to her, B with the permission of the society communicated it to A whereupon A stopped all payments and the question was whether the communication made by the society was privileged and it was so held on the ground that the society was formed to prevent the abuse of charity and any communication made by it was privileged. Even the fact that B solicited the information was immaterial, for, as Blackburn, J., put it, "where a person is so situated that it becomes right in the interests of society that he should tell to a third person certain facts, then if he, bona fide and without malice, does tell them, it is a privileged communication.[3] A, a creditor of B, a member of the firm of B. C. & Co., found his claim against B resisted till he had to sue him for the money. A knew that C had filed a petition in insolvency and A also knew that C had at the time of his petition claims against the firm of B. C. & Co. A thereupon circulated a letter to persons dealing with the firm warning them against paying anything due to B. C. & Co., adding that a member of the firm had filed his petition in insolvency, "the object being to collect the outstandings and defeat the creditors," that the other members were not entitled to recover the outstandings or to give an effectual discharge for such payments and that A was taking steps to have all the other members declared insolvents. It was a fact that the firm was without capital, and A subsequently did file a petition of insolvency against the other members of the firm, though unsuccessfully, and upon these facts it was held that taking the letter as a whole it was protected under illustration (a) to this exception.[4] This case is further justifiable on the principle that where the statement is not divisible, the whole of it is privileged if only a part of it is privileged. So where A and B were joint trustees and the defendant said she had heard rumours about its maladministration by A and B and her publication

(24) Toogood v. Spyring, 1 C. M. & R. 81.

(25) Clark v. Molyneux, 3 Q. B. D. 237.

(1) James v. Boston, 2 C. & K. 4.

(2) Keight v. Hill, (1873) J. P. 176.

(3) Per Blackburn, J., in Davies v. Snead, L. R. 5 Q. B. 608 (611); cited per Jessel, M. R., in Waller v. Loch, 7 Q. B. D. 619 (621).

(4) Cassem Karrim v. Jamshedjee, 9 C. W. N. 195.

as regards A was justifiable, it was held that the privilege extended to the alleged slander of B as the communication could not be made without mentioning him.(5)

5772. The defendants who were the committee of a Marine Insurance Company, posted the plaintiff's ship as suspended from the highest class which implied that it was not quite safe. The plaintiff wrote to the defendants complaining of the publication and the defendants promised to reinstate the ship to its former class upon executing certain repairs which they specified. The plaintiff pleaded his inability to execute the repairs and requested the defendants to mark the vessel as withdrawn but which the defendants refused to do. The Court held that the action of the defendants was actuated by a desire to perform the duty they had undertaken towards ship-owners and the public in general, and that their refusal to scratch the plaintiff's ship formed no ground for complaint.(6)

It will be thus seen that "interest" is an ever widening circle and its extent depends upon what is regarded as a duty of imperfect obligation.

Caste Disputes.

5773. In this country several cases have arisen on the question of caste dispute, the preservation of caste being regarded as the protection of one's interest in matters social and religious. In case of caste offence and penalties the Court recognizes the autonomy of caste and refuse to sit in judgment over caste decisions, unless they are shewn to have been obtained by express malice. (§§ 5682-5684). The accused, who were the headmen of the caste to which the parties belonged, prohibited other members from holding intercourse with the complainant on pain of incurring caste penalties. The complainant's niece, in ignorance of this prohibition, invited the complainant to a family ceremony, but the accused insisted that she should retire as she had been outcasted. It was held that the imputation, being made for the protection of the accused and of others of their castemen, was protected, though the accused gave undue publicity to the fact, but which was overlooked because the accused were ignorant rustics and so was also their statement that the complainant had been outcasted which was not strictly true.(7)

5774. In matters relating to caste and within the exclusive cognizance c caste assemblies, the Court does not apply the same rigid test which it does i: judging of the legality of its own procedure. As was observed by Brandt, J.: "It is clear that the Court will not interfere on the ground that the procedure of such assemblies is not strictly or even approximately 'judicial' as to the manner of recording either evidence or resolutions, when there is no evidence that according to custom or otherwise it is necessary to keep such a record.....And for the same reason it is not open for the Courts to determine whether or not the evidence on which the caste assembly acted is such as a Court of Justice would act upon."(8) Hence where a caste punchayat declared the complainant to be a Rangari and he was not of the caste of the Punches, the latter could not be convicted of this offence, merely because their decision was erroneous and made without sufficient inquiry if it

(5) Per Lush, J., in Davies v. Snead, L. R. 5 Q. B. 608 (609).

(6) Clover v. Royden, L. R. 17 Eq. 190 (204).

(7) Chalil Kothali, (1882) 1 Weir, 609; Padman Babul, 14 Bom. L. R. 585; 16 I. C. 335, 13 Cr. L. J. 687. Ayyaswami, 47 M. L. J. 8.

(8) Salar Mannaji v. Herojee Row (1887), 1 Weir, 614.

was a decision given in good faith, that is after such inquiry as was reasonably necessary and sufficient, or in other words, if the inquiry was bona fide and not a blind for securing immunity against a prosecution such would be the case if the accused hastily convened a punchayat of picked men to outcaste the complainant behind his back and without notice to him.

5775. In another case the accused, a member of a Khoja Religious Association, was called upon by that body to shew cause why he should not be excommunicated therefrom. The accused replied by publishing a letter in the press denouncing the association as a " dangerous society giving every encouragement to murder and assassination" and characterized the notice as an incitement to murder him. One member of the association prosecuted him for this offence. It appeared that a body of men had seceded from the association, that religious feeling ran high and that the accused connected the commission of some fanatical murders with the secret workings of the association, that he was consequently really alarmed though he had no sufficient ground for doing so. He defended himself with reference to this exception, but the Court held the allegation was unjustified and its publication to persons other than members of the community unnecessary.(9) The complainant was put out of caste at a meeting of his castemen for taking water from an untouchable man. The accused told some of the members of the caste not to take water from the complainant's hand, and if they did they too would be put out of caste. He was held to be protected by exception 10 of this section.(10) But an allegation made at a caste panchayat that a child was born to a woman of adulterous intercourse is not protected unless the accused can shew that it was made in good faith.(11)

Explanation (5).

5776. The defendant invited the plaintiff, a Brahmin, to attend a sradh ceremony at his house, but when he arrived he turned him out saying that as he had taken meals at widow remarriages, other Brahmins objected to his presence. The plaintiff sued the defendant for slander but the Court threw out the case holding that it was no defamation to say that a man had become an outcaste or was outcasted because it did not imply defect of moral character;(12) but the soundness of this view is questionable in view of explanation 4 which directly provides for the case in point.(13) But if in this case the accused had merely asked the complainant to leave without assigning any reason he would have rightly escaped the charge of defamation.(14) The accused, a tailor, was convicted because he had sent a post-card to the complainant demanding a sum of money for work done. The Court held that there was no injury to the complainant's character intended or implied and that therefore no offence was committed.(15) Caste disputes ordinarily arise because a person complains of improper

(9) Jaffar Fadu, 4 S. L. R. 67, 8 I. C. 209.

(10) Umed Singh, 22 A. L. J. 79,77 I. C. 824, 25 Cr. L. J. 472.

(11) Baga Mahar, 76 I. C. (N) 393, 25 Cr. L. J. 68; Nanhey v. Pyari, 96 I. C. (N) 394.

(12) Vengala v. Thallam, 28 M. L. J. 58; 26 I. C. 460.

(13) Bishambhar v. Gobind Das, 12 A. L. J. 552; Khamani, 24 A. L. J. 171, 92 I. C. 584, (1926) A. 306.

(14) Faqir Tulaha, (1926) A. 711.

(15) Abdulla v. Clarke, (1909) P. W R. 3, 1 I. C. 99.

expulsion, or of the withholding of certain rights due to him as a member thereof.

5777. The cases, before considered, are, moreover, sufficient to show that though the body of men possessing the interest may be numerous, the quantum of interest possessed by each may vary and in some cases it may be infinitesimal. In this case, if the imputation be for the public good, the person making it need not possess any interest at all. For the existence of interest is only required where the imputation is made for the protection of the interest of the maker or of another person and not when it is for the public good (§§ 5697-5707).

5778. Matters of Public Interest.—But since an imputation made for the public good is made in the interest of the public, it follows that there is even here the necessity of the presence of some interest though that interest is very different to that required in the two earlier cases. Such interest may be presumed to be possessed by every member of the public in a public department such as the Post Office, so that a defamatory letter written by a private individual to the Postmaster-General, complaining of the misconduct of an official under him, is privileged even though some of the charges therein made may be untrue, and though the defendant stood in no relation, past or present, either to the official maligned or to the postal authorities[16] (§§ 5698, 5699). In this case all that is required is good faith, though the imputation may not be true, and in this respect this clause differs from exception I which similarly protects an imputation made for the public good, if it is true, good faith being then immaterial. The combined effect of these two clauses then is that an imputation is privileged if it is made for the public good, and is either true or made in good faith. In either case, the question whether an imputation is for the public good is a question of fact. Where, however, the matter is of public interest, the Court does not weigh any comment on it in a fine scale. It makes some allowance for even intemperate language, so long as the writer keeps himself within the bounds of substantial truth and does not misrepresent or suppress any facts.[17]

5779. Caution in Good Faith.—Indeed, a person may not only make an imputation, but convey a caution under the same circumstances as are specified in exception 9. In ordinary cases the two go together; as in illustration (a) to the last exception. But a person may of course convey a caution without making any imputation in which case this exception should be directly applicable. So a relation or intimate friend may confidentially advise a lady not to marry a particular suitor, and may or may not assign reasons, in which case the statements will be privileged.[18] In England, words by way of caution were formerly held to be "good counsel" for which no action would lie,[19] though some doubt has been thrown on this rule by later cases in which it was said that no one was justi-

Exception 10.

(16) Blake v. Pilford, 1 Moo. & Rob. 198: Woodward v. Lauder, 6 C. & P. 548.

(17) Edmonds on Birch & Co., (1907) 1 K. B. 371 (380), Fernandas, 13 Bom. L. R. 1187, 12 I. C. 971.

(18) Todd v. Hawkins, 8 C. & P. 88· Adams v. Coleridge, 1 T. L. R. 84.

(19) Vanspike v. Cleyson, Cro. Eliz. 541.

fied in cautioning another uninvited, and that the exemption only extended to a communication invited and not to one merely volunteered;[20] but this view is clearly indefensible and has not been followed in still later case.[21] It would be, indeed, the height of technicality to say that if A should see his friend's servant B systematically pilfering his friend's things, he should only be justified in cautioning him against B if he was asked his opinion about B, but not otherwise. The contrary has been accordingly held in several cases,[22] and is the rule here enacted.

Undue Publicity.

5780. The question here is not whether the caution was conveyed uninvited, but whether it was conveyed in good faith, and if it is conveyed to any one in particular, then the further question arises whether it was to his good. The question of good faith in this exception must, of course, be answered in the light of observations already made (§§ 382-386). Such good faith implies fairness and honesty, belief in the truth though not the truth. It postulates, moreover, the exercise of reasonable circumspection in giving publicity to the imputation, which should be confined only to persons within the privilege. For instance, if a person is subjected to a social penance, there is no reason why that fact should be published broadcast. A Hindu couple went to England, and upon their return were put of caste, but re-admitted after performing expiatory ceremonies. This re-admission was resented by the accused and the other members of his faction, who six months after the admission circulated leaflets indiscriminately in the bazar describing the complainant as a "doshi," or sinner, meaning that he was not fit to be associated with. The accused relied on this exception, but the Court thought "that the manner in which the publication was made was unnecessary and in excess of the purpose for which the privilege was allowed, and, therefore, not protected."[23] This view has been reiterated in several cases decided both in England and in this country, in all of which a caution conveyed with undue publicity was held to destroy the privilege. So in a case similar to the last, the complainant having attended a Hindu widow marriage legalized by law,[24] his guru or spiritual preceptor, disapproving of his action, published a notice declaring him to be an outcaste and interdicting his disciples and the public of the town from all social intercourse with him until he performed the expiatory penance, a copy of this decree was made on a post-card posted to the complainant, whereupon the Court held the mode of publication in excess of the necessity; which rendered this exception inapplicable.[25]

So in Bombay, one Uma left her husband and married B, which marriage was declared void by the headman of the caste. Some years afterwards another headman of the caste declared the marriage valid.

(20) Per Lord Abinger, C. B., in King v. Watts, 8 C. P. (615); Bennett v. Deacon 2 C. B. 628; Coxhead v. Richards, 2 C. B. 569.

(21) Amann v. Damm, 8 C. B. N. S. 602; Stuart v. Bell, (1891) 2 Q. B. 347; Clark v. Molyneux, 3 Q. B. D. 237; Rumsey v. Webb, Car. & M. 105.

(22) Clearer v. Sarrande, 1 Camp. 268; Kine v. Sewell, 3 M. & W. 297; Amann v. Damm, 8 C. B. N. S. 597; Masters v. Burgess, 3 T. L. R. 96

(23) Thiagaraya v. Krishasami, 15 M. 214; following Sankara, 6 M. 381; Williamson v. Freer, L. R. 9 C. P. 393; Somerville v. Hawkins, 10 C. B. 583

(24) Act XV of 1856.

(25) Sankara, 6 M. 381.

This decision was, however, challenged by certain members of the community who addressed their protests to him asking him to rescind his decision, but he took no notice of their protests, whereupon twelve of the dissentients published a notice in a local paper to the effect that B having kept a concubine by name Uma has had offspring by her. They were convicted of this offence, but they pleaded that such notices were customary and that the publicity as to Uma's status was for the public good, and that at any rate two of the accused were directly interested in contesting the legitimacy of B's sons born to him by Uma. But the Court held that the publication was not for the public good, though it was for the good of the caste, but in that case the publication in a public print reached a circle who could in no way be interested in the question, and that therefore the accused had been rightly convicted of this offence.(1) So where the accused openly declared that he had seen the complainant having connection with a pariah woman whereupon he was outcasted, and the facts were such that he bona fide believed that he had seen what he asserted, but the Court held his communication unprivileged because he "violently and publicly" talked about the complainant and in a manner quite unnecessary and improper.(2) But a person may honestly believe though his belief may be wholly erroneus.(3) Such was the case of the accused. who had given undue publicity to the sentence of excommunication passed by a caste panchayat on the complainant. The Court took into consideration the ignorance and illiteracy of the accused and acquitted them for what they had done through a mistaken sense of duty.(4)

Communication in Confidence.

5781. A person cannot claim privilege, if he marks his communication "private and confidential" any more than if he goes about circulating defamation, but warning each hearer that his gossip is given in confidence. But two persons may make a communication confidential in the legal sense of the term, if there is in fact such relationship between them.(5) Such relationship exists between counsel and client, husband and wife, guardian and ward, master and servant, and even between intimate friends. So a father, guardian or an intimate friend may warn a young man against associating with a particular individual, or a lady against marrying an objectionable suitor.(6) And so it is the duty of a steward, bailiff, foreman or house-keeper, to inform his master if anything is going wrong, without waiting to be questioned about it. In all such cases, confidential communication averts undue publicity, and the question of privilege then depends, not so much upon the confidential relationship, though it establishes the interest, as on the measure of publicity. In England, tradesmen issue in confidence a trade-protection circular, which contains names of all bad, dishonest and dilatory customers which serves as a warning to other fellow tradesmen, but such circulars are clearly illegal because it reaches those some of whom will be interested in one item, others in another item, but none in all

(1) Shiv v. Gowda, 3 Bom. L. R. 188.
(2) Palani Asari, (1882) 1 Weir. 613 (614).
(3) Parvataneni v. Kasinaduni, 23 I. C. (M.) 489, 15 Cr. L. J. 281 following Abdul Hakim v. Tej Chander, 3 A. 815.
(4) Virji Bhagwan v. Bai Amba, 11 Bom. L. R. 638, 3 I. C. 744.
(5) Picton v. Jackman, 4 C. & P. 257
(6) Todd v. Hawkins, 8 C. & P. 88.

the items of information contained in it.(7) But the Police Confidential Gazettes issued in this country, stand on a different footing, for they publish the names of habitual criminals, in the extermination of which all are equally interested, and more so the Police amongst whom it is circulated.

Unnecessary Aspersion.

5782. There can be no good faith where there is unnecessary aspersion or abuse of another which takes the case out of the exceptions. The accused complained against the complainant—a Forest Range Officer—alleging that he connived at the Village Munsiff and others illicitly browsing goats in a reserve and illicitly trading in timber and demanding an inquiry. The complainant was removed from service for various causes, the complaint being one of them. The court held the allegations false and recklessly made. He was convicted of this offence.(8) The same fate befell the memorialist to a Lieutenant-Governor, who had accused a Deputy Collector of dishonesty and corruption.(9) So it would be prima facie defamatory to say of a man that he made gifts not out of charity but for some self-advantage.(10)

5783. Statement to Pleader.—The accused had been accused in a former case under s. 506, I. P. C. Immediately after the termination of proceedings in that case, the pleader questioned the accused what was the real cause of the trouble whereupon the accused replied in his ordinary voice that the trouble arose of a particular alleged elopement. The complainant's mukhtiar having overheard it the accused was convicted of this offence but the Court held the statement protected being made in answer to a natural question put to him by his legal adviser at a time when the relations of legal adviser and client could not be said to have ceased.(11) But it would have been clearly publication of defamation if the statement had been made after that relationship had ceased.(12)

5784. The defendant, a clergyman, after having promised to perform the marriage of the plaintiff with a lady attached to his mission, wrote to her that he was not prepared to perform the marriage owing to the plaintiff not being worthy of her. The lady then broke off the engagement. The plaintiff sued for damages, but the Court threw out the suit holding the communication privileged.(13)

5785. Legislators' Absolute Privilege.—Members of the Legislature—Central(14) and Provincial(15)—have been accorded an absolute privilege in respect of their speeches delivered at the meetings of the Legislature. In this respect they have been accorded the same privilege as is enjoyed by members of the British and Colonial Parliaments. The privilege is confined to utterances in the House, but their repeti-

(7) King v. Patterson, (1887) 83 L. T. J. 408.
(8) Madappa Goundan, 43 I. C. (M.) 403, 19 Cr. L. J. 115.
(9) Jai Debi, 13 A. L. J. 681, 29 I. C. 322, 16 Cr. L. J. 482.
(10) Appa v. Maricar, 43 I. C. (R.) 417, 19 Cr. L. J. 129.
(11) Debendra v. Bhagirath, 13 C. W. N. 1087.
(12) Sher Singh, (1910) P. R. No. 10, 5 I. C. 892.
(13) B. v. C., (1908) P. R. No. 83, 4 I. C. 918.
(14) Government of India Act, s. 67 (7).
(15) Ib., s. 72-D (7).

tion outside is not privileged, and would be subject to the provisions of this section. The special immunity accorded to them is founded on public policy, it being the policy of Law to give them the right of free expression in the interest of the public, unfettered by a fear of their exposure to prosecution or a suit for damages.

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st class. Non-cog. Warrant. Bailable. Comp.

500. Whoever defames another shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Punishment for defamation.

[Defames—s 499.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5786).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5787-5795).
(3) Only a "Person aggrieved" may complain (5787-5790).
(4) Sanction When Necessary (5791).
(5) Alteration of Charge and Conviction to s. 182 or 211 (5792-5794).
(6) Venue (5795).
(7) Proof (5796-5797).
(8) Charge (5798-5799).
(9) Proof of Defamation (5800-5810).
(10) Proof of Criminal Intention (5801).
(11) Publication (5806-5807).
(12) Falsity of Imputation Unnecessary (5808-5809).
(13) Cross-examination on Complainant's Character (5810).
(14) Possible Defences (5811-5812).
(15) Defamation and Abuse (5813).

5786. Analogous Law.—This section constitutes defamation as an offence for the first time in this country,[16] prior to which it was treated only as a civil wrong redressable merely in compensation obtained in a civil action. The last section which defines the offence embraces all such cases, so that the offence as now enacted is one in which the party aggrieved is entitled to the double remedy by way of a civil suit for damages and a criminal prosecution under this section. But though there is nothing in the section to indicate when the Criminal Court should feel justified in refusing to proceed by way of prosecution, still it is obvious that no Court will lend itself to the abuse of its process by entertaining trivial and frivolous complaints—complaints upon such facts, for instance, for which the English Courts award the customary one farthing damage. There are besides other cases of defamation which the Court regards as essentially a civil wrong, for which redress by a civil suit is considered as more appropriate. Such is a defamation committed by a newspaper or a juridical person, such as an incorporated company. And there is s. 95 (§§ 891-897). Certain persons enjoy absolute statutory protection against their accountability to the court for their speeches and on account of the publication of those speeches in the official reports:—

(16) Ganga Prasad, 29 A. 685.

The following provisions relate to these exemptions:—

"Subject to the rules and standing orders affecting the chamber there shall be freedom of speech in both chambers of the Indian Legislature. No person shall be liable to any proceedings in any Court by reason of his speech or vote in either chamber, or by reason of anything contained in any official report of the proceedings of either chamber."(17)

Another clause similarly worded exempts members of the Provincial Legislature.(18)

5787. Procedure and Practice.—No Court shall take cognizance of this offence, except upon a complaint made by some person aggrieved by such offence or where he is a minor, lunatic, sick or infirm by some other person with the leave of the Court.(19) The offence is therefore non-cognizable, but warrant should, ordinarily, issue in the first instance. It is both bailable and compoundable and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of first class.

Only a "Person aggrieved" may Complain.

5788. As regards the right to complain, the prohibition applicable to this section also extends to a complaint for an offence falling under Chapter XIX (ss. 490-492) and under sections 493 to 496. The meaning of the term "person aggrieved by such offence" is important, and has been already set out. But evidently that phrase does not bear an uniform sense applicable to every section mentioned in section 198 of the Procedure Code, since persons "aggrieved" by this offence may not be necessarily aggrieved by the other offences such as the criminal breach of contracts of service (ss. 490-492) or bigamy (ss. 493, 494). Indeed, in order to ascertain whether a person is aggrieved, the first thing necessary to inquire is how the defamation complained of affects the complainant. This must, of course, mainly depend upon the social habits of the people, and the effect the defamation has upon the complainant's reputation in their estimation.

For instance, there can be no doubt that the husband is as much aggrieved by the defamation of his wife, as the wife herself, and it is therefore settled that the husband is entitled to complain of a defamation affecting his wife,(20) and this because any imputation regarding her unchastity necessarily affects her husband, who is thereby lowered in the estimation of his fellowmen. Indeed, the same thing may be said of the other near relatives of a female member of a Hindu joint family. As remarked by Ameer Ali and Handley, JJ.: "A Hindu lady residing with her father, her brother or her son is a member of his family; and her reputation is bound up with the reputation of the person in whose house and under whose charge she is living. If any imputation

(17) S. 67 (7), Government of India Act.
(18) Ib., s. 72-D (8).
(19) S. 198, Cr. P. C.
(20) Chotalal Lallubhai v. Nathabhai, 25 B. 151, F. B. overruling contra in Kustandin, (1887) B. U. C. 327; Chellam Naidu v. Ramasami, 14 M. 379; Anantha Gaundan, 15 M. L. J. R. 224.

is made against her character, that would affect as much the relative with whom she is living as herself."[21] In this view, the Court held that where the imputation alleged unchastity to a Hindu widow residing at the time with her brother, the latter was a "person aggrieved" by such imputation, and that, as such he was competent to set the criminal law in motion.[22]

A somewhat discordant note was struck in two unreported cases of the Bombay Court in which the person defamed was said to be the person aggrieved,[23] but these cases were overruled by the Full Bench[24] in which Jenkins, C. J., said: "Now it does not appear to me that a husband complaining of an imputation of unchastity on his wife's part would prima facie come within the mischief, and I think one is entitled to approach the question in the light of this consideration, and to ask whether there is anything in the expression 'some person aggrieved by such offence' that excludes him from being a competent complainant. I am unable to find in the Code any limitation of the sense in which the word 'aggrieved' is used. Nor is there any indication of the kind of grievance which may qualify a man to complain. Still I think it must be conceded that any fanciful or sentimental grievance would not suffice; it must be such a grievance as the law can appreciate; it must be what has been termed a legal grievance and not a sta pro ratione voluntas reason."[25]

5789. This case has been followed in Calcutta where the Court held the father-in-law of a woman living with him, whose husband was a lunatic, sufficiently aggrieved to institute the complaint.[1] But the Punjab Court takes a somewhat narrow view of the section, holding that the father could not complain against a person imputing unchastity to his daughter, because it was not intended to harm the reputation of the complainant as well as his daughter,[2] and on this ground that Court has refused to hear even the husband of the woman accused of immorality.[3] But this view postulates the existence of the rule that the right to complain depends upon the intention of the accused, so that if he intended to injure the wife, the husband could not complain though he may have been outcasted and suffered all the social degradation possible. But it is submitted that this view is unwarranted by the language of s. 198 of the Procedure Code, the language of which is sufficiently wide to permit of the prosecution being instituted not only by the direct victim of the calumny but by all those injured thereby.

5790. But the case is different where the President of a Municipality complained for the defamation of his subordinate officials on the ground that under the Municipal Act he was responsible for the efficient discharge of their duties.[4] In this connection it may be well to add that a person does not become an aggrieved person within the meaning of s. 198 of the Criminal Procedure Code merely because he feels

---

(21) Thakur Das v. Adhar Chandra, 32 C. 425.
(22) Ib.
(23) Kustandin, (1887) B. U. C. 327; Lakshman, (1888) B. U. C. 302.
(24) Chotalal v. Nathabhai, 25 B. 151, F. B.
(25) Ib.

(1) Daem Sardhar v. Batu Dhali, 3 C. L. J. 38; following Chotatal v. Natha Bai, 25 B. 151, F. B.
(2) Imam Baksh, (1887) P. R. No. 39; following Daud, (1884) P. R. No. 22.
(3) Daud, (1884) P. R. No. 22.
(4) Beauchamp v. Moore, 26 M. 43.

aggrieved by the defamation; his grievance must be rational and such as other persons in the same circumstance would consider a real cause for complaint. The fact that one person feels aggrieved out of sympathy to another does not entitle him to complain. If it were otherwise a neighbour or a friend might complain for the offence. The word "aggrieved" in this connection must be understood to refer to a grievance caused by a legal injury suffered, though it is not necessary that the person aggrieved should be entitled to maintain a civil action for damages.

Sanction When Necessary.

5791. Another limitation on the right of complaint is enacted by s. 197 of the Procedure Code which requires that a public servant accused cannot be prosecuted for any offence committed by him as such without the previous sanction of Government. This prohibition is, of course, confined to an offence committed by a public servant as such, that is to say, under the colour of his office.(5) Moreover where the person to be prosecuted is a judicial officer, other considerations arise (§§ 5734, 5752, 5759). And since counsel, parties and witnesses to a judicial proceeding similarly possess exceptional immunity, it follows that before issuing process the Court must be satisfied that their offence is not exceptional. This is necessary, not because the Court looks ahead to the possible defences the accused might set up, but because it cannot issue process till a prima facie case is made out, and that it takes judicial notice of a fact which is obvious. But otherwise the Court has not to speculate what special privilege the accused might set up. Its duty is to issue process if the accused is shown to have made a statement which is prima facie defamatory.(6) It is bound to assume the absence of privilege till privilege is pleaded and proved.(7)

Alteration of Charge and Conviction to Section 182 or 211.

5792. Again, a statement may be not only defamatory but also disclose the commission of an offence under s. 182 or 211, in which case the Court would not be justified in refusing process merely because an inquiry into those offences cannot be made without sanction.(8) For instance, where the accused stated to his officer that another subordinate—the complainant—borrowed money from his official superior, the fact that the statement amounted to an offence under s. 182 does not make it any the less defamatory, and it being so, the complainant is not precluded from prosecuting the accused for this offence, though he could not have proceeded against him under s. 182 without sanction.(9) But such a case is distinguishable from cases in which the statement being made in the course of a judicial proceeding,

---

(5) Nandolal Basak v. Mitter, 26 C. 852; Parashram, 7 B. H. C. R. 6; Lakshman, 2 B. 481; Ghulam Muhammad, 9 M. 439; Amir Singh, (1904) P. R. No. 29; Fink v. Corporation, 30 C. 721 (724); Dunne v. Kumar Chandra, 30 C. 593; Anath Nath v. Mohendra, 15 I. C (C.) 489 (sanction required to prosecution of Receiver); contra in Nagendra Nath v. Jagendra Nath, 15 I. C. (C.) 491, 13 Cr. L. J. 491.

(6) S. 105, Indian Evidence Act; Periyaswami, (1886) 1 Weir 580 (583).

(7) S. 105, Indian Evidence Act (1 of 1872).

(8) Krishna Rao v. Appaswami, (1891) 1 Weir 585.

(9) Ib; Ram Sewak Lal v. Maneshwar, 37 C. 604; distinguishing Sharbe, Khan 10 C. W. N. 518; followed in Satis Chandra v. Ram Deyal, 48 C. 383, F. B.,

the offence committed is perjury, or the preferment of a false charge, in which case the necessity for sanction cannot be circumvented by having resort to this section. Such was the case of the complainant who having applied for sanction to prosecute the accused under s. 211, the Magistrate refused him sanction but granted process for this offence, but the Court held such procedure unjustifiable, inasmuch as if there were no grounds to proceed against the accused under s. 211, it was no ground to proceed against him for a different offence on the same facts.(10)

5793. But apart from such circumstances, there is nothing in law to prevent the Court from convicting the accused of this offence, though the complaint was laid under s. 211(11) and even the Appellate Court may alter a conviction from s. 182 into one under this section,(12) if the proceedings were instituted on a complaint properly laid, but not vice versa. In other words, while a complaint made under ss. 182 and 211 after due sanction might culminate in a conviction for this offence, a complaint made for this offence would not justify a conviction under s. 182 or 211, for proceedings under those sections cannot be instituted without sanction or complaint as required by section 195 of the Procedure Code. And so a conviction had under s. 501 cannot be altered into one under this section, for the two offences are distinct and do not involve proof of the same elements.(13) So again where process was issued against the accused under s. 506 but the Magistrate finally discharged him under s. 500, the Magistrate treating the issue of process under a wrong section as a lapsus calami, the Court ordered a retrial holding that the mistake had prejudiced the trial.(14) An acquittal of an offence punishable under s. 182 is no bar to another trial for this offence.(15)

5794. It may be added that the Courts commend it as most desirable that the examination and cross-examination of the complainant should be held in the presence of the Magistrate who has to finally decide the case.(16)

Venue.

5795. Another point worth noting, which affects the question of jurisdiction is that the imputation charged as defamatory must have been either made or published within the territorial jurisdiction of the Court taking cognizance of the same.(17) The Courts in British India have no jurisdiction to try for the publication of defamation outside British India.(18)

5796. Proof.—It is perhaps needless to add that all the points constituting defamation together with its publication must be affirmatively proved by the prosecution. An admission made by the accused in his examination under s. 342 of the Criminal Procedure Code cannot be used by the prosecution to fill up the gap in their own evidence.(19) Publication

(10) Profulla Kumar v. Harendra Nath, 44 C. 970.

(11) Ujjala Bewa, 1 C. L. R. 523; Alli, 25 A. 209; Naurati, 6 L. 375.

(12) Gur Narain Prasad, 25 A. 534.

(13) Uma Shankar, (1889) P. R. No. 18; Ashutosh v. Purnachandra, 36 C. L. J. 287.

(14) Anath Nath v. Mohendra, 16 C. W. N. 983 15 I. C. 488; Ram Sewak Lal v. Maneshwar, 37 C. 604; followed in Satis Chandra v. Ram Dayal, 48 C. 383 F. B.

(15) Ram Sewak Lal v. Maneshwar, 37 C. 604.

(16) Brindaban v. Ishaquddin, 13 C. W. N. 550.

(17) Barke v. Skipp, 45 M. L. J. 754.

(18) Varna Kote Illath, (1900) 1 Weir 579.

(19) Jeramiah v. Vas, 36 M. 457; Anand Rao, 17 Bom. L. R. 82.

means communication to at least one other person than the defamer and the defamed.(20) Where the accused defamed the complainant—a medical practitioner—for having killed a patient by his treatment and the Magistrate after consulting medical books found that the complainant's treatment was wrong, the court condemned the procedure as erroneous.(21) In such a case the court should have examined expert evidence.

5797. The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused made or published an imputation.

(2) That it concerned the complainant or some other person thereby aggrieving the complainant.

(3) That the said imputation amounts to defamation (s. 499).

5798. Charge.—It is said that a charge under this section should specify the particular occasion on which the offence complained of is proved to have been committed.(22) These observations occur in a case in which the accused had passed a receipt to the complainant on the 12th April describing his caste as "Brithial Bania" whereas the complainant was a "Gondha Bania," and upon which the charge framed was that the offence alleged was committed "on or about the 12th April" which Stevens and Henderson, JJ., held to be insufficient on the ground that it did not "set forth the particular occasions on which the defamation is said to have been committed so as to give the accused person an opportunity of defending himself with reference to each act alleged to have been committed by him."(23) This is, of course, necessary where the statement complained of is repeated on several occasions on the same day or on different days, in which case the accused could not be held accountable for acts not specified in the charge. The charge should, moreover, specify the name of the person defamed, for it is the very gist of the offence.(24) But it is not necessary to negative the exceptions to section 499, merely because they are appended to the definition of the offence.(25) The charge must, of course, set out the words alleged to be defamatory.(1)

5799. The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you made or published the following imputation concerning A B, to wit—(here set out the defamatory matter) intending to harm or knowing or having reason to believe that it would harm the reputation of the said A B, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 500 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

"And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge."

---

(20) Barke v. Skipp, 45 M. L. J. 754.
(21) Purnachandra, 28 C. W. N. 579.
(22) Bishwanath v. Keshab, 30 C. 402.
(23) Ib.
(24) Anon, Weir (3rd Ed.), 357.
(25) It was so contended by Mr. Anstey but the contention was overruled; Kikabhai, 9 B. H. C. R. 451.
(1) Barke v. Skipp, 45 M. L. J. 754.

5800. Proof of Defamation.—The essential ingredients of this offence have been already set out under the last section which defines it (§§ 5630-5784). It is only intended to set out here the points upon which the constitution of the offence depends, and the evidence by which it may be proved.

In the first place there must be proof of an imputation (§ 5645) which may be made in words spoken or written or by signs (§ 5645) or visible representation (§§ 5632-5646). The imputation must be made (§ 5633) or published (§§ 5633-5646) by the accused. Indeed, for the purpose of the Code, no words are defamatory unless they are made or published, for a person may write the most atrocious libel and put it into his box, and he could not be charged, unless he publishes it and his publication is accompanied by the intention which makes his publication criminal, that is to say, unless he publishes it "intending to harm or knowing or having reason to believe that such imputation will harm the reputation of another person." Two things must then be certain—the person defaming and the person defamed, the former must be ascertained, because without ascertaining him no person could be charged for this offence, and there can be no defamation unless some ascertained person is defamed. An imputation which affects the whole human race cannot be punished, because the complainant feels aggrieved by a calumny affecting his race. At the same time it is not necessary that the defamation should hit any one in particular, for the term "person" does not merely mean an individual and is large enough to include an aggregate of individuals, such as a corporation or a company (§§ 5673, 5674). These two persons being ascertained, the next thing to see is whether the imputation amounts to the offence as it is defined in the last section. Its principal ingredient on this head is his "intending to harm, or knowing or having reason to believe that such imputation" will harm the reputation of the person defamed.

Proof of Criminal "Intention."

5801. As already stated an intention to harm is by no means an essential prerequisite of this offence (§§ 5649-5651) for, if the imputation was made "knowing or having reason to believe"[2] that it will harm the reputation of another, it is defamation. As Lord Kenyon said: "In order to constitute a libel the mind must be in fault and shew malicious intention to defame."[3] But there may be neither intention nor knowledge and yet the accused cannot escape if he had reason to believe that it will harm the complainant's reputation and it does have that effect, then the offence is complete and the latter is entitled to complain.[4] This intention, knowledge or belief constitutes the scienter which converts his act into a crime, and the Code has constantly to refer to it in connection with the proof of other offences (§ 5651). But the facts and circumstances necessary to prove criminality in one case are not necessarily relevant to establish it in every case. For as the offences differ, so does the evidence, though the underlying principle is in each case the same.

(2) S. 26.
(3) Rex v. Lord Abingdon, 1 Esp. 226.
(4) Anand Rao, 17 Bom. L. R 82 2 I. C. 657.

Such, for instance, are the principles enacted in sections 6 and 9 of the Indian Evidence Act[5], the former of which enacts that the facts which, though not in issue, are so connected with a fact in issue as to form part of the same transaction, are relevant, whether they occurred at the same time and place or at different times and places.[6] Consequently, if A sues B for a libel contained in a letter forming part of a correspondence, letters between the parties relating to the subject out of which the libel arose, and forming part of the correspondence in which it is contained, are relevant facts, though they do not contain the libel itself.[7] This will be necessary only when the words complained of are not per se defamatory and when there is any doubt as to the intention of the accused, in which case the Indian Evidence Act allows also the proof of further facts necessary to explain or introduce a fact in issue or a relevant fact.[8] So it is provided: "A sues B for a libel imputing disgraceful conduct to A; B affirms that the matter alleged to be libellous is true. The position and relations at the time when the libel was published may be relevant fact as introductory to the facts in issue. But the particulars of a dispute between A and B about a matter unconnected with the alleged libel are irrelevant, though the fact that there was a dispute may be relevant if it affected the relations between A and B. But the fact that A had previously published an imputation respecting B showing ill-will on the part of A towards B is relevant as proving A's intention to harm B's reputation by the particular publication in question.[9]

5802. Where the libel contained in a document consists of several statements one of which alone the complainant complains of as libellous, the accused is entitled to show that the other statements therein contained are true for the purpose of showing that though it may contain an inaccurate statement, it was not as a whole libellous. The complainant, Laidman, a Subordinate Judge at Dehra Dun, charged the accused Captain Hearsay of this offence in that the latter wrote a letter to the Government of India complaining of the complainant's conduct as Judge for having abused three litigants in his presence adding that that was not an isolated case of Mr. Laidman abusing respectable natives in his Court, and that when the time came the accused could produce several others whom he had treated in a similar manner. The accused wanted to establish the former by establishing the latter, and put the following question to the complainant: "Do you swear that you have never in Court used any offensive expression to any native of this country?" The question was objected to on behalf of the complainant, but Petheram, C.J., allowed it, adding: "We are not trying the defendant for telling a falsehood, but for defaming the complainant in his character as a Judge. Upon this issue I am of opinion that the whole of the complainant's character as a Judge is relevant."[10]

5803. For the purpose of proving that a statement is libellous the opinion of other persons is relevant, since reputation implies the

(5) Act I of 1872.
(6) Ib., s. 6.
(7) Act I of 1872, s. 6. ill. (c).
(8) Ib., s. 9.
(9) Act I of 1872, s. 14, ill (e).
(10) Laidman v. Hearsay, 7 A. 906.

good opinion of others, so that an opinion which affects one's reputation is relevant not because it is opinion, but because it is necessary to establish the criminality of the act complained of.[11] So where A sues B for a libel expressed in a painted caricature exposed in a shop window, the remarks of a crowd of spectators may be given in evidence on the question of the similarity of the caricature and its libellous character.[12]

5804. Judgment of a Court of competent jurisdiction are admissible in evidence subject to the provisions of section 43 of the Indian Evidence Act[13] which contains the following as its illustration: "(a) A and B separately sue C for a libel which reflects upon each of them. C, in each case says that the matter alleged to be libellous is true, and the circumstances are such that it is probably true in each case, or in neither. A obtains a decree aganist C for damages on the ground that C failed to make out his justification. The fact is irrelevant as between B and C."[14]

5805. For the rest, the question of the physical and moral, as distinguished from the legal character of the act of a person accused of an offence under this section is, like those which arise under other sections of the Code, one to be determined by considerations and inferences drawn from common experiences rather than from the rules of legal construction. What the imputation was which a man intended to convey who did not directly express it and whether he believed or had reason to believe that the imputation would produce a particular sentiment or opinion on the part of those to whom the communication was made are matters of fact, or inference from fact, belonging, where the judicial functions are divided, to the province of the jury. Whether the imputation thus found to have been made, and whether the harm thus found to have been the probable or expected result were such as to satisfy the definition of the offence of defamation would be questions for the Judge.[15] Where the imputation is conveyed in the mother-tongue of the parties, others speaking or understanding the same language are competent witness to depose to the sense it was intended to convey.

So West, J., said: "The natural sense of language is best determind by the impression it makes on ordinary persons speaking the tongue in which it is uttered. But in the case of a foreign language, still more than in that of a provincial dialect, the aid of persons who, as compared with the Court, are specially conversant with the language is indispensable to the attainment of a right understanding of what any particular expressions in that language and the character peculiar to it were fitted to convey; the popular and colloquial sense of the whole passage as it stands in the vernacular character is what is important for the purpose on hand, and this is best learned from the testimony of a number of persons as to the impression the words were calculated according to their

(11) Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 32 (8).
(12) Ib., ill. (n).
(13) Act I of 1872.
(14) Ib., s. 43. ill. (a).
(15) Per West and Pinhey, JJ., in Pitambar, (1879) B. U. C. 140.

judgment and knowledge of the language to make. It is so far from wrong for a Judge to inform himself as to the sense conveyed, which is of course the impression naturally communicated to readers in the vernacular, that he could hardly in any other way place his view of the meaning and purpose of any particular passage beyond the reach of very plausible objection."[16]

Publication.

5806. Besides intention the prosecution have to give formal evidence of publication. This must depend upon the nature of the libel. If it is oral, then the only evidence possible is the statement of witnesses before whom the defamatory words were uttered, in which case it is the duty of the prosecution to prove as far as possible the ipsissima verba of the accused and not merely their substance, or the witnesses' impressions of them. Sometimes the words used may convey a sense exactly the opposite. In that case the witnesses must be asked to depose as to the tone and temper of the accused, and their own impression of the sense in which they understood him (§§ 5662-5666, 5676, 5677). For this purpose the evidence of intention would lend a very material assistance. For it will show what sense the accused intended to attach to his expressions, and why.

5807. Where, however, the defamation complained of is committed in writing, all that the prosecution has to prove is its authorship, which may be done by calling persons who are acquainted with his handwriting, by filing his admitted handwriting for the purpose of comparison, and by the testimony of a handwriting expert (§§ 5198-5202). Where the incriminating matter is in print, its publication is sufficiently proved by the production of the printed copy[17] (§ 5637). And if the matter was printed from the copy proved to be in the handwriting of the accused, there is evidence from which it may be presumed that the printing and publication were by the direction of the accused.[18] But as against the printer and publisher publication may be proved by production of an attested copy of a declaration made under the Registration of Press Act,[19] the scope of which has been already discussed under s. 124-A. A letter is deemed to be published both where it is posted and where it is received and opened[20] (§ 1267).

Falsity of Imputation Unnecessary.

5808. It will be observed that it is no part of the offence that the imputation concerning one should be false. On the contrary, it may be true, but truth alone is never a justification for this offence (§§ 5686, 5687). Consequently, the prosecution need not take upon themselves the duty of proving falsity of the defamatory imputation, which would encourage the defence to cross-examine witnesses for the purpose of establishing its truth, and the result in such cases then is that both parties enter the lists upon an issue which is by no means material to the case and which often leads to damaging the complainant's character far more than the defamation complained

---

(16) Per West and Pinhey, JJ., in Pitambar, (1879) B. U. C. 140 (141); this view is not inconsistent with s. 98 of the Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872); and the English rules which exclude such evidence, see s. 499 §§ 5662-5665.

(17) Soosai Naidu, (1891) 1 Weir 579.

(18) Lovett, 9 C. & P. 462.

(19) Act XXV of 1867.

(20) Barke v. Skipp 45 M. L. J. 754.

of. In civil cases the procedure is necessarily different, for there truth alone being a good defence the plaintiff suing for damages has necessarily to show that the imputation complained of is not true. Even in such a case it is not necessary to call a crowd of witnesses, for it is ordinarily sufficient if the plaintiff swears on oath that the defamatory imputation is false, which is sufficient to shift the burden of proof even in a criminal case.(21)

5809. Where, however, the prosecution rest content with proving publication and intention, it is not open to the accused to cross-examine the complainant as to the truth of the imputation, unless he intends to plead truth as a justification, in which case it is not only allowable but necessary for him to cross-examine the complainant; and if he fails to do so it is a subject of serious consideration whether he should be subsequently allowed to tender proof, as to the material incidents of which he had not cross-examined the complainant.(22) There is, however, no law which entitles the accused to have the complainant medically examined for the purpose of proving the truth of his imputation that she was pregnant by adultery.(23) And even as regards the cross-examination of the complainant and his witnesses law does not permit the accused to direct an aimless cross-examination with the possible hope of ensconcing himself behind one or other of the ten exceptions. This license is generally permitted to the accused by untrained Judges, but it exposes the complainant who had come for justice to the insensate fury of the accused.

Cross Examination on Complainant's Character.

5810. Of course, such cross-examination is widely different from that which law permits to the accused. For instance, since the gist of the crime is an intention to harm the reputation of the person defamed, the accused is entitled to show that the complainant has no reputation to lose. And so Petheram, C.J., said: "Mr. Gordon now seeks to show that Mr. Laidman (the complainant) as a Judge, has no character to be defamed. This is a fact in issue. A statement which is defamatory of one person is not necessarily defamatory of another. The defendant is not being tried for telling a falsehood, but for filching a man's character. Upon this question it is necessary to consider what the complainant's character is."(24) But this does not let in evidence of the complainant's general character but only of particular instances of the same kind of misconduct as that alleged in the libel. For example, if a libel charged a man with having been drunk on a particular occasion, it could not be justified by evidence showing that on other occasions he had committed theft.(25)

And even when the examination relates to other acts of similar misconduct it must be confined to the elucidation of facts, so that a question whether a certain report were not current about the com-

(21) Shibo Prasad, Pandah, 4 C. 124.
(22) Dum Singh, 6 A. 220.
(23) Agnew v. Jobson, 13 Cox 625; followed in Pudmon, (1889) B. U. C. 474.
(24) Laidman v. Hearsay, 7 A. 906: Devi Dyal 4 L. 55.
(25) Scott v. Sampson, 8 Q. B. D 491; followed in Laidman v. Hearsay, 7 A. 906.

plainant is wholly irrelevant, for if the rule was otherwise the consequence would be that a man might circulate a slander, and then call as witnesses persons who had heard the slander from him, and thus avail himself of his own wrongful acts.(1) So Wood, B., observed: "I have ever understood that general good character is always presumed in law, unless by evidence of particular acts, fairly and specifically put in issue, that presumption is negatived. Some cases have been mentioned wherein it would seem that such evidence has been received at Nisi Prius. I will not attempt to distinguish the present from those; I strongly protest against any such mischievous doctrine altogether, and deny that it has any legal foundation. It cannot be supported by any principle of law. I say distinctly that it is not warranted by the law of the land."(2)

5811. Possible Defences.—If the prosecution establish a prima facie case against the accused, the latter has besides the general exceptions the choice of ten exceptions under which he may defend himself. The applicability of these exceptions depends upon proof of either truth or good faith. It has been stated before that the prosecution are not bound to prove the falsity of the imputation complained of as defamatory, nor are they invariably bound to prove the absence of good faith. But this may be sometimes necessary. So the authors observed: "Whether an imputation be or be not made in good faith is a question for the courts of law. The burden of the proof will lie sometimes on the person who has made the imputation, and sometimes on the person on whom the imputation has been thrown. No general rule can be laid down. Yet scarcely any case could arise respecting which a sensible and impartial Judge would feel any doubt. If, for example, a public functionary were to prosecute for defamation a writer who had described him in general terms as incapable, the Court would probably require the prosecutor to give some proof of bad faith. If the prosecutor had no such proof to offer the defendant would be acquitted. If the prosecutor were to prove that the defendant had applied to him for money, had promised to write in his praise if the money were advanced, and had threatened to abuse him if the money were withheld, the Court would, probably, be of opinion that the defendant had not written in good faith, and would convict him. On the other hand, if the imputation were an imputation of some particular fact, or an imputation which, though general in form, yet implied the truth of some particular fact which, if true, might be proved, the Court would probably hold that the burden of proving good faith lay on the defendant. Thus if a person were to publish that a Collector was in the habit of receiving bribes from the zemindars of his district, and were unable to specify a single case, or to give any authority for his assertion, the Court would probably be of opinion that the imputation had not been made in good faith. And if there is no good faith it is immaterial that the publication was for the public good.(3)

(1) Per Patteson, J., in Thompson v. Nye, 16 Q. B. 175 (179); Bell v. Parke, 11 Ir. C. L. R. 413 (420); Scott v. Sampson, 8 Q. B. D. 491; Wood v. Durham, 21 Q. B. D. 501.

(2) Jones v. Stevens, 11 Price 235.

(3) Purna Chandra, 28 C. W. N. 579.

5812. "Again if a critic described a writer as a plagiarist the Court would not consider this as defamation without very strong proof of bad faith. But if it were proved that the critic had, like Lauder, interpolated passage in old books in order to bear out the charge of plagiarism, the Court would doubtless be of opinion that he had not criticised in good faith, and would convict him of defamation."(4)

5813. Defamation and Abuse.—Some common terms of vulgar abuse, must be distinguished from defamation as such. Of these terms of abuse, this may be said that they do not constitute defamation for the simple reason that no one takes them literally. Such expressions as "baiman," "badmash" are current coin in the bazar, and though they may at times constitute insult they cannot be the subject of punishment under this section.(5) So calling a European or an Anglo-Indian a "native" is not defamation.(6) So where the accused had called the complainant a rogue, the Court took into consideration the circumstances in which the statement was made and acquitted him for this offence.(7)

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st class. Non-cog. (s. 198, Cr. P. C). Warrant. Bailable. Comp.

Printing or engraving matter known to be defamatory.

501. Whoever prints or engraves any matter, knowing or having good reason to believe that such matter is defamatory of any person, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

[Good reason to believe—cf. s. 26. Defamatory—s. 499.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5814).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5815-5817).
(3) Proof (5818).
(4) Form of Charge (5819).
(5) Meaning of Words (5820).
(6) Printing Defamatory Matter (5821).

5814. Analogous Law.—This section furnishes another instance of the Code making abetment a distinct offence. A person who prints or engraves any matter with the knowledge or belief that it is defamatory abets the defamer by giving him facility for the dissemination of his libel. And since his act is calculated to give it wide publicity the section does not discriminate between his offence and that of the defamer.

5815. Procedure and Practice.—No Court shall take cognizance of this offence except upon a complaint made by some person aggrieved by such offence (§ 5814). The offence is consequently non-cognizable, but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both bailable and compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate, or a Magistrate of the first class.

(4) Note R. Reprint, p. 184.
(5) Bakhtawar Lal, (1922) P. L. R. 51, (1922) A. I. R. (L.) 459; Thakaria v. Puran Singh, 67 I. C. (L) 589, 23 Cr. L. J. 429.
(6) Nga On Thi 1 Bur. L. J. 39, 66 I. C. 80, 23 Cr. L. J. 240.
(7) Esufali, 20 Bom. L. R. 601, 46 I. C. 411, 19 Cr. L. J. 731.

5816. As this offence is distinct from that punishable under the last section, and involves proof of other elements, the Court is not competent to alter or amend a complaint under this section into one under the last section, since s. 198 of the Procedure Code precludes the Court from taking cognizance of this offence except upon a complaint by some person aggrieved by such offence.(8) On a conviction under this section the Court may order the destruction of all the copies of the thing in respect of which the conviction was had, which are in the custody of the Court or in possession or power of the person convicted.(9)

5817. For other points of practice reference should be made to commentary under the last section (§§ 5787-5795).

5818. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused printed or engraved any matter.
(2) That the matter was defamatory.
(3) That he did so knowing or having good reason to believe that it was defamatory.

5819. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at—— you printed or engraved some matter, to wit——knowing or having good reason to believe that the same was defamatory, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 501 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session, or High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

5820. Meaning of Words.—"Prints or engraves": The word "prints" does not include composition, but the multiplication of copies by the process known as printing: Engraving being, however, used to denote the process of cutting figures, letters or devices on stone, metal, wood or any other substance. A person who prepares a wood cutting of a defamatory caricature would thus be punishable under this section. "Having good reason to believe": This is a new phrase and a variation of that defined in section 26. The interposition of the word "good" is obviously intended to imply that the "reason to believe" defined in s. 26 must be not only sufficient but strong, and such as would most probably lead any man to believe that the matter was defamatory. "That such matter is defamatory": It is not necessary that the accused should know the person defamed, if the matter he prints or engraves is unmistakably defamatory. So a person may get printed defamatory matter leaving blank space for filling in the name, in which case the accused would be liable to the same extent as if he knew the name subsequently filled in. But in such a case there must be evidence that what was printed was intended to be published, and that it was a libel upon some person.

---

(8) Uma Shankar, (1889) P. R. No. 18.

(9) S. 521 (1), Cr. P. C.

5821. Printing Defamatory Matter.—This offence is wholly distinct from the offence of defamation in that the person who prints or engraves defamatory matter may not intend to publish it with the intention which makes it defamation within the meaning of section 499. Indeed, the gist of the offence consists in printing or engraving such matter with the knowledge of its nature. If the person printing also publishes the matter he prints he may then be guilty of the principal offence punishable under the last section: otherwise he would be punishable under this section if he knew or had good reason to believe that the matter was defamatory. This may be evident from the nature of the matter printed. For if it is plainly defamatory it is a good reason for the printer to know that it is so.(10) But if the defamation is couched in innuendo or otherwise requires explanation then the prosecution must adduce evidence of facts and circumstances from which such knowledge or belief can be inferred.

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st class. Non-cog. (s. 198, Cr. P. C.). Warrant. Bailable. Comp.

Sale of printed or engraved substance containing defamatory matter.

502. Whoever sells or offers for sale any printed or engraved substance containing defamatory matter, knowing that it contains such matter, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

[Defamatory matter—s. 499.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5822).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5823).
(3) Proof (5824).
(4) Form of Charge (5825).
(5) Sale of Defamatory Printed Matters (5826-5827).

5822. Analogous Law.—This section is supplementary to the last and it is another instance of abetment being specially provided for. The essence of criminality is dissemination of defamatory matter with knowledge of its nature.

5823. Procedure and Practice.—No Court shall take cognizance of this offence except upon a complaint made by some person aggrieved by such offence.(11) The offence is consequently non-cognizable, but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both bailable and compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class. For other points of practice, reference should be made to the commentary under s. 500 (§§ 5787-5795). It is evident that since the jurisdiction of Court depends upon a complaint laid for such offence, the Court is not empowered to amend or alter a complaint instituted under s. 500 into one under the last or this section,(12) though if the process is issued under s. 500 there is nothing to prevent the Court from charging the accused under this section, if the complainant so desires,[13] but not otherwise.

(10) Sardar Dayal Singh, (1891) P. R. No. 8.
(11) S. 198, Cr. P. C.
(12) Uma Shankar, (1889) P. R. No. 18.

5824 Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused sold or offered for sale any printed or engraved substance.

(2) That the substance contained defamatory matter.

(3) That he then knew that it contained such defamatory matter.

5825. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you sold or offered for sale any printed (or engraved) substance, to wit——containing defamatory matter knowing that it contained such matter, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 502 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session, or High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

5826. Sale of Defamatory Printed Matters.—This section does not apply to all disseminators of calumny. Those who circulate it by word of mouth are dealt with as actual defamers. Those who disseminate it in print are punishable under this section. But between the two there is a noticeable distinction. For one who verbally publishes defamation is liable even if he does so having reason to believe that it will harm the reputation of some person, whereas the seller of printed calumny is immune unless knowledge of its nature is brought home to him. It may then be said that the circulator of printed libel possesses an advantage denied to the lip-libellor, though the mischief done by the one is incalculaby more than that done by the other. But this section was not intended to emphasize any such contrast. Its sole object is to reach those who in the ordinary course of their trade or business sell books, pamphlets, prints or paper which they know contains defamatory matter. It has been held in the Punjab that such knowledge may be presumed on their part if the matter is per se defamatory,[14] but the section does not appear to warrant the imputation of such constructive knowledge, which may at times be wholly at variance with facts. For instance, a large bookseller may, in the course of his trade, receive a book for sale, which he may sell without being aware of its contents though they may be flagrantly defamatory. Surely he could not then be prosecuted on the strength of that fact and apart from any evidence, or knowledge on his part that the matter sold is defamatory.

(13) S. 230, Cr. P. C.

(14) Per Plowden, J., in Sardar Dayal Singh, (1891) P. R. No. 8.

Liability of Printer and Publisher.

5827. The case of the printer and publisher of a registered press is different. For his liability is created by Statute[15] and even then it only creates a presumption which is rebuttable (s. 124-A.) And on this point the English rule would appear to be wider, making the publisher criminally liable even though he was shown in fact to possess no knowledge of the libel. So where the defendant, the proprietor of The Times, was shown to have left the management of the paper entirely to his son, himself residing in the country, he was still held criminally liable for publishing a libel on a nobleman, though he was in fact wholly ignorant of its publication.[16] But in the case of a bookseller indicted for selling a book written in Latin and containing a libel on the Court of King's Bench, the Court discharged him on his filing an affidavit that he did not know Latin and on his giving up the name of the author and printer from whom he had received the book for sale.[17] Even in the case of the publisher of a newspaper, the rule is now modified by Statute[18] and the tendency of modern decisions is to make criminal responsibility depend upon knowledge. A libel appeared in the Man of the World of May 11th, 1878. On the 25th May the defendant was appointed its publisher, and back numbers sent to his office. The complainant's agent purchased a copy of the number for May 11th on December 13th by applying to the defendant who told his assistant to look it up and deliver it to the purchaser. The defendant swore that he had not examined the back numbers at all and knew nothing of the libel whereupon Cockburn, C.J., intimated that in those circumstances no jury could find the defendant criminally liable for publishing the libel.[19]

(15) Act XXV of 1867, s. 7.

(16) Walter, (1799) 3 Esp. 21; Gutch Fisher and Alexander, Moo. & Mal. 433.

(17) Wiatt, (1722) 8 Mod. 123; Cuthel, 27 How, St. Tr. 642.

(18) Lord Campbell's Act, 1843, s. 7 (6 & 7 Vict., c. 96).

(19) Barnard, 43 J. P. 127. To the same effect, per Lord Coleridge, C. J. in Bradlough and others, 15 Cox C. C. 217; Ramsey and Foote, 15 Cox 231: Allison, 16 Cox 559.

CHAPTER XXII

OF CRIMINAL INTIMIDATION, INSULT AND ANNOYANCE.

Criminal intimidation.

503. Whoever threatens another with any injury to his person, reputation or property, or to the person or reputation of any one in whom that person is interested, with intent to cause alarm to that person or to cause that person to do any act which he is not legally bound to do, or to omit to do any act which that person is legally entitled to do, as the means of avoiding the execution of such threat, commits criminal intimidation.

Explanation.—A threat to injure the reputation of any deceased person in whom the person threatened is interested, is within this section.

Illustration.

A, for the purpose of inducing B to desist from prosecuting a civil suit, threatens to burn B's house. A is guilty of criminal intimidation.

[Person—s. 11. Act—s. 33. Injury—s. 44.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5828).
(2) Principle (5829).
(3) Meaning of Words (5830).
(4) What is Criminal Intimidation (5831-5836).
(5) What is a Threat (5831-5832).
(6) Threat must be of an "Injury" (5833-5834).
(7) Injury to Third Person (5835).
(8) In whom one is "interested" (5836).
(9) Criminal Intent (5837-5838).
(10) "To cause alarm" (5837).
(11) Act must be Illegal (5838).

5828. Analogous Law.—This section has undergone a complete transformation since its first draft which after enumerating certain offences such as murder, hurt, mischief, house-breaking, unnatural offence and rape made the offence, inter alia depend upon the causing of distress or terror to the person intimidated.[20] The word "distress" was naturally objected to though the Law Commissioners defended its retention.[21] The original clause was apparently taken from Russel's work on Crimes [22] and it was both disjointed and incomplete. The present section is practically new, and the substitution of the word "alarm" for distress and terror is intended to confine the offence only to cases when the effect of the threat is to cause more pain than is covered by those words.

(20) Cl. 482.
(21) 2nd Rep., s. 417.
(22) Ib., s. 419.

5829. Principle.—The anxiety and mental anguish caused by an injury threatened, may often be as great or even greater than the actual injury. And since it may lead to reprisals and the consequent breach of the peace, law esteems such threats an offence, even though they fall short of a preparation to commit the offence threatened. But such threats which preface a probable execution, must be distinguished from those which are used as mere terms of vulgar abuse and in which there is neither the intention nor the possibility of execution. Such are the usual expression "I will see you" which is as vague as it is meaningless, but which have furnished ground for many a frivolous action. The gist of the offence is causing of alarm to another person or the doing of a thing which he was not bound to do. If the threat falls flat upon him, the offender could not be punished for his evil intention which he was powerless to achieve. So Lord Ellenborough, C.J., said: "To make it indictable, the threat must be of such a nature as is calculated to overcome a firm and prudent man.....The law distinguishes between threats of actual violence against the person, or such other threats as a man of common firmness cannot stand against and other sorts of threats."[23] So Petheram C. J., said: "The gist of the offence is the effect which the threat is intended to have upon the mind of the person threatened, and it is equally clear that, before it can have any effect upon his mind, it must be either made to him by the person threatening, or communicated to him in some way."[24]

5830. Meaning of Words.—"Threatens another with any injury": "Threat"[25] is the declaration of an intention to inflict punishment, loss or pain on another. "Injury" is defined in s. 44. It involves the doing of an illegal act. "Person, reputation or property" that is to say, by committing offences against the person, such as murder, hurt or wrongful restraint, of the offence of defamation as defined in s. 499, or offences against property dealt with in Chapters XVII and XVIII (ss. 378-489D.) But it is not necessary that only these offences should be committed, for the term "injury" implies the doing of an illegal act and not an act punishable under the Code. "In whom that person is interested": The word "interested" is here used in its largest sense as implying any interest, whether created by relationship, contract or otherwise. "With intent to cause alarm to that person": The term "alarm"[1] is here used in a sense signifying consternation caused by the threat, producing a state of terror in the mind which may provoke retaliation or produce mental anxiety by the prospect of evil. "To do any act which he is not legally bound to do": This means an involuntary act.

"A threat to injure the reputation": See s. 499, Expl. 1 (§§ 5644-5646).

5831. What is Criminal Intimidation?—Criminal intimidaton is in one word a "threat," but every threat is not criminal intimidation, which is a threat of the kind and given with the intent specified in the section. But all the same, it is a threat, that is to say, a declaration of an intention to inflict

(1) What is a Threat ?

(23) Southerton, 6 East R. 126.
(24) Ganga Chunder Sen v. Gour Chunder Banikya, 15 C. 671.
(25) From A.-Sax. Threotan, to tire, harass.
(1) From It, All'arme, to arms; hence, a sudden fear or painful suspense excited by an apprehension of danger.

punishment, loss or pain on another. It must then be necessarily communicated to the other party,[2] though not necessarily by the accused, if he intended that it should reach the person threatened and influence him to the consequence comtemplated in the section.[3]

5832. The threat must, moreover, relate to an injury to the person, reputation or property of another. An injury to one's person may be threatened by means of personal violence, as where one threatens to murder another,[4] or the threat may be directed against one's reputation, as where one threatens to accuse another of an unnatural offence,[5] or it may again be of an injury to property, as a threat to burn one's house. But it is not necessary that the threat should expressly refer to an injury of one kind or another, for the threatener often veils his offence in a language from which it is not possible to describe the nature of the evil threatened. Such would be the case where one is threatened with vengeance, as in the case of the complainant who having been sent for by a Police Inspector, the constable ordered to fetch him was escorting him, when the accused appeared upon the scene and threatened both the constable and the complainant with the Head Constable's vengeance. It was found that the Inspector had no authority to call the complainant in the manner he did, and the Court then held the threat to mean injustice and oppression by the Head Constable under whom the two were living, and convicted the accused under s. 506.[6] So a threat to ruin another may amount to this offence if it acquires a more definite sense, having regard to the position and relationship of the parties, and the authority or power one wields over another. So an official superior may threaten to dismiss his subordinate in which case there is a threat and it may be a threat of an injury according to the circumstances of the case. In other words, no threat is punishable unless it threatens an "injury" as that term is defined in section 44 (§ 362).

(2) Threat must be of an "Injury."

5833. Now the word "injury" implies "any harm illegally caused to any person in body, mind, reputation or property," from which it follows that in order to be criminally punishable a threat must be a declaration of one's intention that one would illegally cause harm to the person, reputation or property of another. The illegality of the act by which the harm is threatened must then be clearly established by the prosecution. In some cases, as where one threatens to murder another or burn his property, the illegality of the act is too evident to require demonstration. But there are threats in which their illegality would have to be proved. Such would be the case, for instance, where one threatens to get another dismissed from the police-service, in which case the threat does not explain itself.[7] The accused told the complainant, a member of their caste, that he should give up his field or else they would put him out of caste and injure him in person and reputation. As the complainant refused to give up his field, the accused put their threat into execution by convening

---

(2) Gunga Chunder Sen v. Gour Chunder Banikya, 15 C. 671.

(3) Syed Mahomed, (1900) 1 Weir 622: Anon, (1865) 1 Weir 622; Palani 622; Goundan, (1892) 1 Weir 623.

(4) Such a threat is specially provided against in England by 24 & 25 Vict., c. 100, s. 16.

(5) Specially provided against in England by the Larceny Act (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96), s. 44.

(6) Purshotam, (1896) B. U. C. 850; Nand Kishore, 102 I. C. 557.

(7) Dada Hanmant Dain, 20 B. 794.

a panchayat of the caste at which the complainant did not attend and who pronounced his excommunication. He thereupon prosecuted the accused for this offence, but the Court held that since the complainant could not have brought a civil action to decide whether he was rightly or wrongly expelled from the caste, his expulsion did not constitute an injury within the meaning of section 44 of the Code: for as the Court remarked: "The Civil Courts have always refused to enquire whether an expulsion from caste was legal or illegal, although they have awarded damages to persons who were entitled to be invited to caste dinners and were omitted."(8)

This question was more fully adverted to in a case in which the complainant having attended a Hindu widow-marriage, the accused, who was his guru, or spiritual preceptor, declared him out of caste and forbade his other disciples and the public generally to associate with him until he performed an expiatory penance. The accused was prosecuted, and on a question as to the applicability of this section arising, Muttusami Ayyar, J., said: "There can be no criminal intimidation where the injury of which complaint is made, is the hardship arising, from a conventional punishment, which a spiritual superior, acting in the exercise of his authority as regulated by the custom of the caste, is competent to inflict. The custom implies a common submission to his authority, and assuming that there was an error of judgement on his part, the error cannot be accepted as sufficient for turning a case of conventional discipline into a criminal offence. It may be a matter for regret that there should be this spiritual tyranny and oppression, but if it is consistent with the usage of the caste of which the complainant claims to be a member, and if it is not expressly forbidden by law, we are not at liberty to treat it as a criminal offence."(9) But a threat to proclaim that a person is put out of caste is threat of the publication of an imputation which amounts to defamation: in other words it is a threat to charge another with a conduct which is injurious to his reputation (§§ 5682-5684) and as such it amounts to this offence. But such a threat is widely different to one in which the offender threatens merely with caste penalties in which case the harm threatened is not illegal because the Civil Courts have no jurisdiction to try the question whether a person had been rightly or wrongly made the subject of caste discipline.(10)

5834. But where a person threatens another with a penalty in consequence of which he causes injury to himself, the former could not be acquitted of this offence merely because he had resorted to a time-honoured usage in which he believed. The accused, who was the mukaddam of a village, had certain of his property stolen, and he, thereupon, had recourse to the ordeal of heated oil in order to discover the thief. As such, he ordered the complainant to submit to the ordeal threatening to beat him and turn him out of the village if he did not, and the complainant thereby burnt his hand. It was held that the accused could not be convicted under s. 330, because the accused could not be held to have voluntarily

(8) Alya Dhurma, (1870) B. U. C. 37.

(9) Sankara, 6 M. 381. It may be added that, under Regulation I, s. 21, "no interference on the part of the Court in caste question is warranted, beyond the admission and trial of any suit instituted for the recovery of damages on account of an alleged injury to the caste or character of the plaintiff." This provision is unaffected by Regulation V, s. 2, cl. 3 which prescribed only a limitation for "suits for recovering the right of participation in caste, communications and privileges."—See Alya Dhurma, (1870) B. U. C. 37 (38).

(10) Cf. Fakirappa, (1882) B. U. C. 1[illegible] caused hurt but that his offence fell under this section, inasmuch as the complainant had dipped his hand in heated oil in consequence of the threat, which he was not bound to do.(11) So there was held to be no injury where the accused went to the complainant, the brother of an adult woman, and told him that he had come from the Sarkar, and would get him six months' imprisonment if the complainant did not let his sister go. The accused was evidently anxious to release the woman from detention in the complainant's house, and Kemball, J., held that his threat did not amount to an injury within the meaning of section 44.(12) There was nothing in this case to show that the accused intended to prosecute the complainant falsely; for if that were his intention he could not have resisted his conviction for this offence.(13) A more familiar example of such innocent threat is the demand made by the creditor coupled with a warning that unless he be paid up, he should take legal steps to recover his money.

So where the accused wanted the complainant to sell him a cow and on his refusing to do so, he threatened to ruin him with cases. The complainant was at one time found to be a person of bad livelihood, and the accused charged him again before a Magistrate with bad livelihood. It was held that a mere threat to injure by "cases" followed up by a prosecution, did not satisfy the definition of injury, for there was nothing to show that the cases threatened were meant to be false cases and that those instituted afterwards were false. In short, a harm so caused would not be illegal though it was caused from an improper motive.(14) But the fact that the cases threatened to be instituted were false may as well be inferred from the tenour of the threat and the surrounding circumstances. The accused Ata Husain, was a leading Shiah and took a prominent part in the Muharram festival. A local disturbance being apprehended between the Hindus and Mahomedans in consequence of the Dasehara and Muharram festivals falling on the same day, the Tehsildar took agreements from leading members of both communities to keep the peace during the festivals. As soon as the Tehsildar left the town, the accused commenced to threaten both the communities that if they did not break their bonds and join him in committing a breach of the peace he would implicate them and get them imprisoned, and which Sir Comer Petheram, C. J., held to be "the very kind of threat against which s. 506 of the Penal Code is directed."(15) The learned Judge did not go into the question of illegality because its illegality was obvious and a threat directed against the public at large must of necessity be of a false prosecution.

(3) Injury to Third Person.

5835. The injury may be threatened to another or to a third person in whom that other is interested. So a threat to A that the accused would waylay and kill his son B if he did not submit to his demand, would be clearly this offence committed against A, though the person threatened to be injured was B in whom A was interested by the ties of parental relationship. And since that threat is punishable because of the alarm it causes in another, it is conceivable that the accused may commit this offence though the person threatened be himself. So a threat to commit suicide if

(11) Hirde Ram, 9 C. P. L. R. 18.
(12) Moroba Bhaskarji, 8 B. H. C. R. 101.
(13) Per Collins, C. J., and Benson, J., in Chitoraputra, (1896) 1 Weir 623; per Stevens and Henderson, JJ., in Jowahir Pattak v. Parbhoo Ahir, 30 C. 418.
(14) Jowahir Pattak v. Parbhoo Ahir, 30 C. 418.
(15) Ata Husain, (1886) A. W. N. 41.

another person refuses to do a particular act may amount to this offence, if the latter is interested in the former.[16] Such, for instance, would be the case if the fond son were to threaten to cut his own throat unless the father gave him a sum of money or yielded to his other wishes. But such a case must be discriminated from that of the beggar who threatens to mutilate his body unless his demand is met. Here the injury threatened has exactly the same purpose in view though since one is not interested in the other, the offence, committed by the threatener would be extortion, but not criminal intimidation. The two offences are thus closely akin though they differ only in this that while the purpose of the extortioner is delivery of property, the object of the offender here may be to coerce another to do or not to do an act unconnected with the delivery of property.

In whom One is "Interested."

5836. Of course, the term "interested" is large and includes interest of any kind, pecuniary or personal, social, moral, or religious, but there must be such an interest as furnishes a spring for human action. And the extent of the interest may then be gauged by the alarm produced in the mind of the complainant in consequence of the threat communicated to him. It may then happen that the accused threatens A with intent to influence B in whom the accused believes A is interested, but if A was not, in fact, interested in B, the accused cannot be punished in spite of the intention of the accused to overawe A. The accused, a clerk in the Forest Department, dismissed by the complainant Mr. McGregor, the Divisional Forest Officer, sent a petition purporting to be written by the inhabitants of certain villages to the Commissioner, threatening that unless Mr. Mc.Gregor were transferred to another district, he would be killed. All the ingredients of this offence were proved against the accused, but the question depended upon whether the threat made to the Commissioner was made to one who was "interested" in McGregor. It was found that the Commissioner exercised a general supervision over the work of the complainant, but it was held to be no interest of the kind here contemplated, for that interest would not alarm the Commissioner because Mr. McGregor's life had been threatened. The interest here contemplated must be of such a personal character as may suffice to explain human conduct. It is not an interest which one human being feels in another.[17] In this view the accused was acquitted, even though the Court found that the accused intended to frighten the Commissioner into ordering the transfer he desired.

(i) To Cause Alarm.

5837. Criminal Intent.—One criterion for gauging the interest one person feels in another, is the alarm produced upon his mind. It is not of the essence of the crime, but it is both a fair measure of the accused's intention as well as of the interest of one person in another where that fact is material. But the test is not an infallible one—nor, indeed, it is invariable. For the susceptibilities of all men are not equal, and a threat which may suffice to frighten one out of his wits will produce scarcely any effect upon another. But the accused is presumably aware of the temperament of his victim and he attunes his threats accordingly. It is therefore always pertinent to inquire what effect the threat has had upon the accused. How did they affect his daily movements; what precautions did he then take to protect himself against their execution? These are, moreover, questions which will explain the accused's words in another sense. For it is a notorious fact that the people of this country use words and utter threats at the slightest provocation, but which are well understood to be mere epithets of vulgar abuse. Such are threats affecting one's female relations, to set fire to one's house, bury one alive, twist one's neck like a chicken, and words too numerous to mention, but all of which are mere terms of opprobrium and convey no well-formed determination to carry the threat into execution. Allied to them are words of braggadocio in which there is much stage-thunder, but in which the very extravagance of the language used is a sure sign of its hollowness. There is a tendency in certain quarters to take such threats for their face value, but nothing could be more fallacious than to pay regard to the sound, disregarding the sense in which they are used. But this requires some knowledge of the genius and temperament of the people and familiarity with their thoughts and mode of expression for which due allowance must be made.

(16) Nubi Bukhsh v. Oomra, (1866) P. R. No. 109; Chikbati Guruadu, (1881) Weir (3rd Ed.) 390.

(17) Mungesh Jivaji, 11 B. 376.

5838. Again, the object of a criminal threat must be to achieve some future purpose by causing the person threatened to do or not to do some act which he is not legally bound to do. A threat to take revenge for an act already done is then scarcely within the rule unless the threatener expects to shape its course in future by coercing the other to do some further act as the means of avoiding the execution of such threat. Two things are then necessary: First, that the threat must be directly connected with a demand to do an illegal act; and secondly, it must clearly indicate that the doing of the act was the only means of avoiding its execution. It is not, of course, necessary that the threat should be adequate to compass the doing of the act, but it must be at any rate sufficient to overcome a man of ordinary nerves and temperament, for otherwise it will be difficult to hold that the threat was intended to cause alarm.

Act must be Illegal.

504. Whoever intentionally insults, and thereby gives provocation, to any person, intending or knowing it to be likely that such provocation will cause him to break the public peace, or to commit any other offence, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Any Mag. Non-cog. Warrant. Bailable. Comp. Summary.

Intentional insult with intent to provoke breach of the peace.

[Person—s. 11 Offence—s. 40.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5839).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5840).
(3) Proof (5841).
(4) Form of Charge (5842).
(5) Principle (5843).
(6) Intentional Insult (5844).
(7) What is an Insult (5845-5848).
(8) Intention All in All (5846).
(9) Insult must give Provocation (5847).
(10) Though Breach of Peace be Unlikely (5848).
(11) Venial Offence (5849-5850).
(12) Privileged Occasion (5851).

5839. Analogous Law.—This offence arises out of the offence of defamation as it is punishable under English Law, that is to say, when the defamatory words published to the person defamed are such as are calculated to provoke a breach of the peace (§§ 5628, 5629). But since the offence of defamation in the Code follows a very different principle, this section is enacted to meet a case which s. 499 had left unprovided for. Insult as such was punishable under Hindu law.(18) It was actionable under civil law.(19) But as slander it is not actionable under English Law without proof of special damage, unless it imputes an indictable offence, a contagious disease, or the words are spoken in the way of his office, profession or trade, or impute unchastity or adultery to any woman. And this view has been affirmed as regards this country by the Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court.(20) In this view this section constitutes an offence for which there is no corresponding remedy in a civil suit for damages. In other words, an act punishable under this section does not necessarily constitute an actionable wrong. This may appear anomalous but as Maclean, C.J., pointed out in the case last cited,(21) the anomaly arises from the two totally different stand points from which the civil and criminal law view the offence. The latter punishes it to prevent a breach of the peace, but the former only regards the offence as actionable when it is attended with some damage.

5840. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable and warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both bailable and compoundable and is triable by any Magistrate, and may be tried summarily. As defamation is a more serious offence, it can be treated and tried summarily as an insult, the gist of which is the use of an expression tending to the breach of peace. Even the English notion of defamation is based upon that principle, but the gist of this offence lies rather in its immediate tendency to occasion a breach of the peace or commit any other "offence," which here means an offence punishable by the Code.(22) This is a petty offence and should be atoned for by an apology or a small fine.(23) The tender of an apology, however, should not be treated as evidence of the accused's guilt.(24)

5841. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused insulted some person.

(2) That he did so intentionally.

(3) That he thereby gave provocation to some person.

(4) That he then intended, or knew it to be likely that the provocation given will cause him to break the public peace or commit any other offence.(25)

---

(18) Narada (Sacred Books of the East), pp. 207-212; Vrihaspati, p. 355; Vishnu, pp. 27, 28, 36; Yajnavalkya (Mandlik's Ed.), p. 232, s. 205.

(19) Saunder's Justinan, 4, 4, 1 p. 418.

(20) Girish Chandra Mitter v. Jatadhari, 26 C. 653, F. B.

(21) Girish Chunder Mitter v. Jatadhari, 26 C. 653 (662), F. B.

(22) S. 40.

(23) Chet Singh (1911) P. W. R. 21, 11 I. C. 619, 12 Cr. L. J. 435.

(24) Abdul Rahiman, 4 M L. W. 556, 36 I. C. 142, 17 Cr. L. J. 462.

(25) Jay Krishna, 21 C. W. N. 95; Gul Mahamed v. Akbar Ali, 99. I. C. 604, (1927) L. 129.

5842. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you intentionally insulted A B by using the following words, to wit——(set them out) and thereby gave him provocation to the said A B (or to C D) intending (or knowing it to be likely) that such provocation will cause him to break the public peace (or to commit any other offence) and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 504 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

"And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge."

5843. Principle.—The object of this section is clearly to prevent the use of language which is resented by the person with reference to whom it is used, and which, if allowed to go unpunished, is provocative of reprisals, thereby disturbing the public tranquillity. Consequently, the ten exceptions to which section 499 is subject are no justification for using an insulting expression which would be punishable because of its offensive tendency and apart from the considerations of justification or truth. The absence of such provision in other countries has, it is stated, led to the practice of duelling.(1)

Insult must be Intended.

5844. Intentional Insult.—The offence of criminal insult punishable by this section, derives its criminality from the fact that it is intentional and gives provocation which is likely to lead to retaliation. It does not punish the use of all insulting expressions, nor indeed, it could, were even such an offence possible, for no criminal law can provide against the sensitiveness of human nature, nor could it justly punish one for the morbid sensibility of another. All it can do and does is to punish the offering of an intentional insult to another. Now, such an insult may be offered by word or deed, and as the section is worded, the offence is sufficiently wide to comprise even cases elsewhere especially provided for, e.g., in ss. 297, 298. But the immediate object of this section is to provide for cases not otherwise provided for, and as such, it would include even cases of personal abuse where it is calculated to provoke a breach of peace. A police constable ordered the complainant to desist from carrying on a loud altercation on the public road, over the price of a chicken. The complainant protested, whereupon the accused feeling his authority set at nought ordered him to accompany him to the police outpost. The complainant declined, whereupon the accused pushed and dragged him to the outpost calling him a pig, soor. The Court held the use of this word to constitute an insult, though there was no finding that the word had given any provocation to the complainant, which is, of course, the gist of the crime.(2) But this may be assumed from the nature of the word used and the circumstances in which it was uttered (§§ 5848-5850).

(1) Bentham's Theory of Legislation, p. 299.

(2) Goolab, 5 Bom L. R. 507.

5845. What is an Insult?—But the words used must be insulting, that is to say, they must be words expressive of contempt, indignity or insolence. They may be used as terms of abuse, as where one calls another sala or haramzada or soor or the like,(3) or they may be words of greater significance in which case they may approximate the offence of defamation, as where a high caste Hindu is accused of drunkenness or partaking of the forbidden food, in which case the words are as defamatory as they are insulting—defamatory, because they lower him in the estimation of his society, and insulting, because they are provocative of the breach of peace. But whether they are more appropriately one or the other must depend upon the intention of the accused and the place and circumstances of their publication. If they were spoken to a man's face, they were clearly insulting, but if they were published behind his back, they would be treated as defamatory. An insult unlike defamation need not be conveyed in words—for it may be equally conveyed by acts, signs and visible representations. So it is insulting to pull a Mahomedan by his beard,(4) to make faces at another, or to make lewd and indecent gestures in the presence of a female(5) or ridicule one in coarse caricature, and in fact in any one of the ways in which human feelings are moved and hurt.(6)

5846. But there can be no insult where no insult was intended.(7)

Intention All in All.

There are many things said and done which are not taken in good part, but which the law does not punish, because the necessary mens rea is wanting. This is furnished in the present case by the intention as distinguished from knowledge and belief. So a person may lecture to another for his good, well knowing that he will feel insulted, but the one does not commit this offence, because the other considers himself insulted. The conduct of missionary or evangelistic preachers is a case in point. These persons use expressions distasteful to those to whom they preach; they even know it, but their discourse, however unpalatable, is not punishable under this section merely because it is insulting, unless it offends against the provisions of s. 298 (§§ 2989-2995). The complainant gave a caste-dinner, to which two accused were bidden. They arrived late and asked some of the other guests to whom food had been already served, to move to another place, which they refused to do, and whereupon the two accused threw down a shoe amongst them and which rendered the food impure and in consequence of which all the guests had to leave without partaking of it. The accused were prosecuted both for mischief as well as this offence, but they were acquitted of both by Blair, J., who with reference to this offence, held the evidence of intention wanting.(8) The same view was taken in the Punjab, where the accused had excluded the complainant from the use of their wells on the ground of their being of a low caste, which was held to be neither punishable as a nuisance under s. 290, nor as an insult under this section.(9)

(3) Girish Chander Mitter v. Jatadhari, 26 C. 653 (654, 661), F. B.

(4) Bhagwan Das, 23 A. L. J. 73, 86 I. C. 79, (1925) A. 318.

(5) S. 509, Holmes Dears, C. C. 207: Syed Mahomed, (1900) 1 Weir 622.

(6) Habib Khan v. Mazharul Haque, 1 Pat L. W. 536; Jay Krishna, 21 C. W. N. 95.

(7) Kuppusami, 28 M. L. J. 505, 20 I. C. 109.

(8) Moti Lal, 24 A. 155.

(9) Ram Dita v. Kirpa Singh, (1883) P. R. No. 3.

Insult must Give Provocation.

5847. The question whether an insult was intentional is, of course, a question of fact, and not of law. But the mere fact that the insult was intentional does not make it criminally punishable, for which the section requires the additional circumstance that it should give provocation to cause a breach of the public peace. This does not mean that the provocation given should actually result in the breach of the public peace. For, all that the section requires is that the person insulting should give provocation, and not that the person insulted should accept it in the manner intended. As was said in Madras that "The law makes punishable the insulting provocation which, under ordinary circumstances, would cause a breach of the peace to be committed, and that the offender is not protected from the consequence of his acts, because the person insulted became too terrified to accept the provocation in the manner intended.(10)

Though Breach of Peace be Unlikely.

5848. These words were used in a case in which the complainant had been reduced to a state of abject terror by the abusive language of the accused, and whose insults were accordingly unlikely to cause him to break the public peace or commit any other offence, but which the Court held to be insufficient to exculpate the accused.(11) This case was followed by Best, J., who held the mere forbearance of the person insulted from being provoked to commit a breach of the peace insufficient to protect the offender.(12) The accused in a quarrel with the complainant's wife, indecently exposed his body to her, who thereupon entered her house. The accused then abused the complainant who kept quiet without attempting to assault the accused. The Magistrate acquitted the accused on the ground that the insult had provoked neither the complainant nor his wife to commit a breach of the peace, but White, C.J., and Moore, J., held that the offence of the accused depended upon the provocation given and not upon the provocation felt, and in that view the acquittal of the accused was set aside.(13) The soundness of this view is manifest, for, the offence is intended to prevent the doing of an act likely to occasion a breach of the peace and not upon one which actually causes it, nor, indeed, is it necessary that the person insulted should be in fact provoked, because if it were so, the measure of criminality would vary with the temperament and power of the complainant, so that the strong could oppress the weak, for the latter would suffer when they were unable to retaliate. The section therefore punishes insults which are provocative of the breach of peace, and in judging of their character, law judges them by the standard of an ordinary resonable man, holding them criminal if they are ordinarily sufficient to arouse passions and provoke retaliation.

5849. Venial Offence.—This is a trivial offence and suitable apology is not infrequently taken as a sufficient atonement. A, who was

(10) Per Collins, C. J., and Parker, J., in Jogayya, 10 M. 353, Jay Krishna, 21 C. W. N. 95; Stiffles v. Dixit, 7 N. L. J. 124.

(11) Jagayya, 10 M. 353; followed in Chunibhai, 4 B. L. R. 78.

(12) Sooraparaza, (1894) 1 Weir 621.

(13) Syed Mahomed, (1900) 1 Weir 622.

not a pleader entered a pleader's room in order to see a pleader. B, a pleader objected to A's presence in the room as against the rules. As A refused to leave the room B ejected him. A having re-entered B abused him apologising afterwards. B was convicted of this offence but the Court held his apology a sufficient amends for the offence.(14) Mere rudeness is not insult. So where the complainant a lady customer entered the shop of a furniture dealer and asked him to deliver the furniture which her husband had on the previous day asked him to supply on hire, the dealer did not get up from his seat and refused to give her the furniture. It was held that the dealer might have been rude but he had not insulted the lady.(15) So where the accused called the complainant a Kirar which has a somewhat contemptuous significance, the Court held the occasion too trivial to call for a conviction.(16)

5850. And it is not even necessary that the insult should be sufficient to provoke the person insulted, for if it gives provocation to any person it is sufficient; such a case may be imagined of the husband provoked by an insult directed against the wife, or by the father insulted through his son. But the analogy should not be carried too far. For if A insults B, it is none of C's business to complain, if C was in no way interested in B. To hold otherwise would expose a slanderer to a greater penalty than a defamer.

5851. Privileged Occasion.—In dealing with the offence of defamation reference has already been made to occasions which the Courts treat as privileged (§§ 5754-5767). It is clear that where such a person cannot be convicted of libel he cannot be convicted of this offence, which is a minor offence of the same genus, though the ingredients of the two offences are not essentially the same, but the immunity which is dictated by public policy or the absence of express malice would appear to be equally applicable to both(17) (§ 5759).

Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st class. Non-cog. Warrant. Not bail. Not comp. Sanction. (s. 169. Cr. P. C.)

505. Whoever makes, publishes or circulates any statement, rumour or report—

Statements conducing to public mischief.

(a) with intent to cause, or which is likely to cause any officer, soldier, sailor or airman in the army, navy or air force of Her Majesty or in the Royal Indian Marine or in the Imperial Service Troops to mutiny, or otherwise disregard or fail in his duty as such, or

(b) with intent to cause, or which is likely to cause, fear or alarm to the public or to any section of the public, whereby any person may be induced to commit an offence against the State or against the public tranquillity; or

(14) Moro Balwant Marathee, 15 Bom. L. R. 1039, 22 I. C. 158.

(15) Rahim Baksh, 18 A. L. J. 515, 56 I. C. 435, 21 Cr. L. J. 451.

(16) Mhd. Baksh, 65 I. C. (L) 635, 23 Cr. L. J. 171.

(17) But see Tikekar v. Piarelal, 45 I. C. (N) 1002, 19 Cr. L. J. 666.

(c) with intent to incite, or which is likely to incite, any class or community of persons to commit any offence against any other class or community; shall be punished with imprisonment which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Exception.—It does not amount to an offence, within the meaning of this section, when the person making, publishing or circulating any such statement, rumour or report has reasonable grounds for believing that such statement, rumour or report is true and makes, publishes or circulates it without any such intent as aforesaid.

[Offence—s. 40. Offences against the State—Ch. VI, ss. 121-130. Offences against the public tranquillity—Ch. VIII, ss. 141-160.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5852-5857).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5858-5859).
(3) Proof (5860).
(4) Principle (5861).
(5) Public Mischief (5862).
(6) Truth No Defence (5863).

5852. Analogous Law.—Both this section as well as s. 153-A, to which it bears a close affinity, were amended by the Indian Penal Code Amendment Act 1898,[18] prior to which the present section ran as follows:—

Circulating false report with intent to cause mutiny, or an offence against the State, etc.

"505. Whoever circulates or publishes any statement, rumour or report, which he knows to be false, with intent to cause any officer, soldier, or sailor in the Army or Navy of the Queen, to mutiny, or with intent to cause fear or alarm to the public, and thereby to induce any person to commit an offence against the State or against the public tranquillity, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both."

5853. Its amendment to the present form was thus justified by the Select Committee[19]:—

"We have inserted the clause proposed by the Government, but we have altered and enlarged the scope of the exception to the clause. No doubt, the statements, rumours and reports referred to are of a highly mischievous character, but having regard to the conditions under which modern journalism and the discussion of public questions are necessarily carried on, we think that, when the statement, rumour or report is published without any criminal intent, it is going too far to require the person who published it to prove its actual truth, to require such proof might be throwing an impossible burden upon him, and it should be sufficient for him to show that he had reasonable grounds for believing it, as, for instance, by showing that he made due inquiry before he published it."

(18) Act IV of 1898, s. 6.

(19) Gazette of India, 1898, Pt. V, p. 14.

5854. And in explaining the scope of this section, the Law Member in charge of the Bill[20] said:—

"In s. 505 the Select Committee have made a considerable modification. As the clause now stands, I think, it need cause no apprehension to any speaker or journalist who speaks in good faith. It must be borne in mind that the clause does not strike at mischievous and mendacious reports generally. It is aimed only at reports calculated to produce mutiny or to induce one section of the population to commit offence against another. If a man takes upon himself to circulate such a report, he surely cannot complain if he is asked to show that his intentions were innocent, and that he had reasonable grounds for believing the report."[21]

5855. The proposal to make no exception in favour of truth was the subject of trenchant criticism in a memorial submitted by the Calcutta Bar. Referring to it Sir Griffith Evans said:—

"It is said, 'the time has not come to prohibit the telling of the truth in India.' There is no denying the humour of this comment. But if the learned authors of it had met a man who had found out that by an accident there was something wrong with the grease of the sepoys' cartridges, and who was going to take that information into the sepoy lines with the probable result of an immediate mutiny, in which my learned friends, their wives and their children would be slaughtered, I much fear they would have laid violent hands on that man in preference to dying in defence of the principle so neatly enunciated. In such cases, Salus republicae, suprema lex."[22]

5856. The section was then enacted as amended by the Select Committee, and its effect is to punish the circulation of any report or rumour, even if true, if it is likely to cause mutiny or disturbance of the public tranquillity, or if it was circulated with that intent; but if it was circulated in the reasonable belief that it was true and without intent to incite mutiny, sedition or the disturbance of public tranquillity, then the accused is exempt irrespective of the consequences. In this state of the law the sepoy in Sir Griffith Evans's illustration might escape scot-free if his statement was true, and circulated with the object of cautioning his co-religionist against incurring religious impurity.

5857. The section provides for a case since made the subject of another section (s. 153-A) (§§ 1486-1494). But this section is somewhat more general and deals with the dissemination of false and mischievous news with intent to create a public disturbance. As such, the offence may be divided into two parts: (i) where the publication is likely to cause mutiny amongst soldiers or sailors; and (ii) where it is likely to cause commotion amongst the public, inducing some one to commit an offence against the State or against the public tranquillity. In both cases the offence may equally be sedition, though sedition differs from this offence, in that it may be committed against the Government without affecting the persons here enumerated. But it is difficult to conceive of a case in which the offence falling in clause (a) would not be also punishable under some one or more of the provisions of Chapter VII (ss. 131-140), which specially deals with offences relating to the Army, Navy and Air Force, and as regards clauses (b) and (c), most of the cases here dealt with would be equally punishable under either section 153-A or 124-A. The offence, in short, is a short statement of the offences elsewhere more specifically provided for. Its position here therefore seems anomalous.

(20) Mr. M. D. Chalmers.
(21) Gazette of India, 1898, Pt. VI, p. 26.
(22) Gazette of India, 1898, Pt. VI, p. 38.

5858. Procedure and practice.—No Court shall take cognizance of this offence unless upon complaint made by order of, or under authority from, the Governor-General in Council, the Local Government, or some officer empowered by the Governor-General in Council in this behalf. This offence is non-cognizable, but warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class.

5859. Where the accused was summoned under this section, but the trial proceeded as if the offence tried was that defined in s. 499, the Court ordered a retrial on the motion of the complainant holding that there had been no judicial disposal of the complainant under either section and that if s. 506 was a lapsus calami for s. 500, which was the real offence intended, then the procedure appropriate to the trial of that offence should have been followed.(22) A person charged under s. 500 or s. 501 cannot be convicted of this offence, and vice versa, since the two offences are distinct and involve proof of different ingredients.(23)

5860. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused made, published or circulated a statement, rumour or report.

(2) That he did so with intent—

(a) to cause or which was likely to cause any officer, soldier or sailor to fail in his duty, or to cause fear or alarm to the public, whereby any person may be induced to commit an offence against the State or against the public tranquillity; or

(b) to incite or which is likely to incite any class or community of persons to commit any offence against any other class or community.

5861. Principle.—This section presumably deals with an offence not hereinbefore provided for. Its primary purpose is to check the circulation of false and mischievous news calculated to excite commotion and create disturbance amongst the public. More serious offences would be probably dealt with under the more specific provisions of the earlier section (§ 5857).

5862. Public Mischief.—The section is not intended to punish the circulator of every idle gossip or mischievous news which one hears every day in the bazar. It is rather intended to punish those who give currency to such news with a definite purpose in view, that purpose being to cause fear or alarm to the public, so that they or some one of them are thereby induced to commit an offence against the State or the public tranquillity. The fact that there is a vague possibility of the commission of this offence is scarcely sufficient. For, what the section punishes is the dissemination of matter which is likely to cause such fear or alarm as is sufficient to induce some one to commit an offence against the State or the public tranquillity, or which is likely to incite one class to commit an offence against another class.

(22) Anath Nath Dey v. Mohendra Nath, 10 C. W. N. 983.

(23) Ashutosh v. Purna chandra, 36 C. L. J. 287.

The accused, a daffadar of a tea estate in Darjeeling, who had recently returned from Nepal, where he had been on leave, circulated a report among the garden coolies that a war was impending between the British Government and Nepal, that Nepalese soldiers were stationed on the frontier and that coolies would be killed by the British. The effect of this report was that about 150 coolies of the tea garden immediately ran away, whereupon the accused was convicted of this offence, but the Court held that though the report had certainly caused fear and alarm amongst the coolies, there was nothing to show that it was likely to induce them to commit an offence against the State or against public tranquillity. The fact that such panic-stricken people might easily commit such offences is hypothetical and far-fetched. No doubt the act of the accused was very mischievous and malicious, but he could not be taken to have intended more than what was the probable result of the report which he circulated, namely, the flight of the coolies. The accused was consequently acquitted.(24)

The section here is intended to protect one class against the attacks of another class and preserve the public peace by preventing the commission of an offence against the State or against the public tranquillity. It is not intended to punish the dissemination of mischievous news merely because it is mischievous and has a remote tendency to induce the commission of such offences. So if a person were to circulate false news to the effect that the Sarkar had poisoned wells to cause the spread of plague, or that it had ordered the slaughter of a hundred men to mark the opening of a bridge, the news is undoubtedly mischievous, but its disseminator could not be punished upon a possibility of certain consequences assumed, but of which there was no probability.

Explanation.

5863. Truth No Defence.—But if the news was followed up by any overt act, evidencing the commission of any of the offences mentioned in the section, then the offender could be dealt with under this section irrespective of the result. And in such a case truth alone is no justification, for truth is no defence to the commission of offences against the State (§ 1261), and against the public tranquillity (§§ 1492-1494), or against any class or community. And if the law were otherwise, the question in each case would be, what is Truth?

Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Non-cog. Warrant. Bailable. Comp.

Punishment for criminal intimidation.

506. Whoever commits the offence of criminal intimidation shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both;

(24) Manbir, 3 C. W. N. 1 (2).

and if the threat be to cause death or grievous hurt or to cause the destruction of any property by fire, or to cause an offence punishable with death or transportation, or with imprisonment for a term which may extend to seven years, or to impute unchastity to a woman shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st class. Non-cog. Warrant. Bailable. Not comp.

[Cause death—s. 299. Grievous hurt—s. 320.
Criminal intimation—s. 503.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous law (5864-5865).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5866-5867).
(3) Proof (5868).
(4) Form of Charge (5869).
(5) Proof of Criminal Intimidation (5870-5874).
(6) Threats (5871-5872).
(7) Cause Alarm (5873).
(8) Involuntary Act (5874).

5864. Analogous Law.—This section prescribes punishment for the offence defined in section 503 and committed under the two circumstances of varying gravity. As such, it follows the lead of English Law under which the offence as presented in clause 2 is the subject of special legislation. Thus the sending of a letter threatening to murder is punishable with penal servitude for ten years,(25) and so is also the sender of a letter threatening to burn or destroy houses, cattle or agricultural property,(1) while the rest of the clause summarizes, s. 46, of the same Statute.(2)

5865. The offence here described may amount to extortion, where the object of the offender is to obtain delivery of property in which case it would be punishable as such.

5866. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable, but warrant should, ordinarily, issue in the first instance. It is bailable, and compoundable if the offence falls under clause 1, otherwise it is non-compoundable, and in either case it is triable by the Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class, and clause 2, also by the Court of Sessions, and in both cases it may be tried summarily. The sentence of fine without imprisonment prescribed as an admissible punishment for this offence shows how widely the offence may differ in the measure of its criminality. It has been accordingly held that though clause 2 of the section is non-compoundable, still there may be a case in which it will be right to allow the withdrawal of the complainant from prosecution.(3) Each threat given under the circumstances mentioned in s. 503 constitutes a distinct offence, so that if a person so threatens at

---

(25) Offences against the Criminal Act (1861) 24 & 25 Vict., c. 100, s. 16, re-enacting 4 Geo. IV, c. 54, s. 3; 10 & 11 Vict., c. 66, s. 1.

(1) Malicious Damage Act (1861), 24 & 25 Vict., c. 97, s. 50, re-enacting 4 Geo IV, c. 54, s. 3; 10 & 11 Vict., c. 66, s. 1.

(2) Ib., s. 46.

(3) Vithoba, (1887) B. U. C. 330, following Devama, 1 B. 64.

the same time three different persons, and each of them institutes a separate prosecution against him, he may be convicted of the offence against each of them.(4) And in such a case he may be tried together for all the three offences.(5)

5867. The accused may be tried either by the Court within whose jurisdiction the threat was given, or where the person threatened resided, or did or abstained from doing the act in consequence of the threat.(6)

5868. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused threatened the complainant or some other person.

(2) That the threat was of some injury to him.

(3) That it was given to cause alarm to him or to cause him not to do or to omit to do any act which he is legally entitled to, or was or was not bound to do.

5869. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you threatened AB (or CD), with injury to his person (or reputation or property), with intent to cause alarm to the said AB (or CD), [(or to cause the said AB or CD to do an act, to wit——(specify it), or not to do an act, to wit——(specify it), which he wat not legally bound to do, or which he was legally entitled to do]. And that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 506 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

"And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge."

5870. Proof of Criminal Intimidation.— The necessary ingredients of this offence have been already set out under the defining section (§§ 5831-5838). As there stated, the gist of the offence consists in causing another to do an act by means of threats. As such, there is very little to choose between such an offender and an extortioner under s. 383, for both achieve their purpose by the force of threat, but an extortioner uses them to obtain money or money's worth, while an offender here may have some other purpose in view. All the same there is a close affinity between the two offences, and it must be kept in mind in dealing with them.

Threats.

5871. In the first place, then, there must be evidence of threats (§§ 5831-5832), and these must be connected with the alarm caused to another person or the doing of an involuntary act as the direct result of the threats. It is not, however, necessary that they should cause either, for the criminality of the act lies in the intention and not in the result attained. For

(4) Goolzar Khan, 9 W. R. 30.
(5) S. 234, ill. (h), Cr. P. C.
(6) S. 179, ill. (c), Cr. P. C.

instance, if a person points a cocked pistol at another and bids him sign a petition withdrawing from a suit, on pain of being, immediately shot dead in case of his refusal to sign it, could the accused be heard to say that the pistol was not loaded and could have done the complainant no harm, or that the complainant preferred death to such an ignominious surrender of his claim? At the same time if the complainant knew that the pistol was empty and he therefore refused to sign there would then be no question of alarm, though there would still remain the question whether the threat was sufficiently serious to be criminally punishable. The threat may assume a variety of forms according to the susceptibilities of the person threatened. For instance, a Pariah may threaten to defile a person's home by making an intrusion therein, unless his demand is satisfied, in which case the threat of trespass is a sufficient injury within the meaning of law justifying the accused's conviction for this offence. A threat to publish a defamatory imputation about one, or about one's deceased relative is equally within the rule, while a threat to burn one's house or to cut off one's water supply are palpable examples of threats to property.

In one case the accused, who had set up an arbitration court, issued notice to the complainant that if he did not appear and answer a claim made against him, the same would be decreed ex parte, the Court held it to amount to this offence even though the accused had no means of enforcing his decree.(7) But in another case the accused, who had extorted Rs. 300 from the complainant showing him a letter from a god Nagore in which it was alleged that his failure to pay would be visited with calamity, was convicted of cheating but acquitted of this offence on the ground that s. 503 assumes that the injury threatened must proceed from the accused, while s. 508 equally required some further act on his part.(8)

5872. A threat may be couched in an ambiguous language; evidence may then be given to shew the meaning it bore to the complainant and the effect it had upon his mind. Evidence may also be given of other threats uttered by the accused either against the same complainant or against others, the latter being admitted as showing intention and the act in question being a part of a scheme and as negativing accident.(9)

Cause Alarm.

5873. The threat must be intended to cause alarm from which it follows that ordinarily it would be sufficient for that purpose. The degree of such alarm may vary in different cases, but the essential matter is that it is of a nature and extent to unsettle the mind of the person on whom it operates and takes away from his acts that element of free voluntary action which alone constitutes consent.(10) The case where the threat produces an alarm is comparatively a simple one, for all that has then to be proved is that the threat was given and that that the alarm was due to the threat, but where the threat has not that effect, it may be a question whether

---

(7) Priya Nath v. Lalji, 27 C. W. N. 479, 72 I. C. 508, 24 Cr. L. J. 306.
(8) Dorai Swami, 48 M. 774.
(9) Tucker, R & M. C. C. R. 134; Kain, 8 C. & P. 187; Ward, 10 Cox, 42.
(10) Parfit, 1 East, P. C., p. 416; Simmon's case, 2 East, P. C., p. 731; Taplin's case, 2 East, P. C., p. 712.

it was sufficient to overcome a man of ordinary nerves, otherwise the Court may hold it to be an empty boast, too insignificant to call for the penal visitation of this section.

Involuntary Act.

5874. The object of the threat may be merely to cause alarm to the person threatened, though ordinarily its object is something more. When it is to obtain delivery of property, the offence is extortion; when it is to coerce the person to do or not to do any other act, the offence would be criminal intimidation. It is not necessary that the act done should be illegal, so long as it is involuntary, for the section punishes the coercion of will irrespective of its legality. As such, it will apply to a large number of cases in which a certain effect is directly traceable to the exercise of this species of undue influence.

Session. Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st class. Non-cog. Warrant. Bailable. Not comp.

Criminal intimidation by an anonymous communication.

507. Whoever commits the offence of criminal intimidation by an anonymous communication, or having taken precaution to conceal the name or abode of the person from whom the threat comes, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, in addition to the punishment provided for the offence by the last preceding section.

[Criminal intimidation—s. 503.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5875).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5876).
(3) Proof (5877).
(4) Principle (5878).
(5) Anonymous Intimidation (5879-5881).

5875. Analogous Law.—This is a proviso to the last section prescribing a higher punishment in consequence of the offence being committed by means of an anonymous communication. The alarm caused by such a communication is necessarily greater, for it does not localize the point of attack and creates in the mind a proportionately greater suspense and apprehension.

5876. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable and warrant should, ordinarily, issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by the Court of Session, Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class. For other points of practice see s. 506 (§ 5855).

5877. Proof.—The points requiring proof are the same as those required to prove a case under s. 506, in addition to which, prove—

(4) That the threat was by a communication in which the true name and residence of the accused was concealed.

5878. Principle.—The aggravating feature of this offence is the anonymity which accompanies the threat which produces in the receiver a greater uneasiness than when the author of the threat is known. Such a threat, moreover, shows greater malignity of mind, while the care taken to escape detection presents difficulties in proof, all of which make such an offender a fit subject of exemplary punishment.

5879. Anonymous Intimidation.—The ordinary offence of criminal intimidation may be committed either by verbal or written communication of threats. In England, a distinction is made between the two modes of communication, but no such distinction, exists in the Code. Even in an offence falling under this section an anonymous communication may be either verbal or written, though ordinarily it will be written. The term "anonymous communication" simply means a communication in which the name of the author is not disclosed. This is also implied by the phrase "or having taken precaution to conceal the name or abode of the person from whom the threat comes." A pseudonymous communication is thus equally within the rule; and so is a communication in which the identity of the author is concealed by giving a wrong and misleading address. There is otherwise no concealment of the abode if mention of it is omitted.

5880. A communication may be made by affixing it to a gate in a public highway, near which the complainant would be likely to pass from his house, in which case it will be a question of fact whether the accused intended to use that means of communicating with the complainant.(11)

5881. The additional term of two years is the maximum which may be added to the sentence passed under the last section. If, therefore, the Court considers the normal sentence prescribed by the last section sufficient, it is not bound to record a conviction under this section.

508. Whoever voluntarily causes or attempts to cause any person to do anything which that person is not legally bound to do, or to omit to do anything which he is legally entitled to do, by inducing or attempting to induce that person to believe that he or any person in whom he is interested will become or will be rendered by some act of the offender an object of Divine displeasure if he does not do the thing which it is the object of the offender to cause him to do, or if he does the thing which it is object of the offender to cause him to omit,

Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st or 2nd class. Non-cog. Warrant. Bailable. Comp.

Act caused by inducing person to believe that he will be rendered an object of the Divine displeasure.

shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine or with both.

Illustrations.

(a) A sits dhurna at Z's door with the intention of causing it to be believed that by so sitting, he renders Z an object of Divine displeasure A has committed the offence defined in this section.

(11) Williams, 1 Cox, 16.

(b) A threatens Z that, unless Z performs a certain act, A will kill one of A's own children, under such circumstances that the killing would be believed to render Z an object of Divine displeasure. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

[Person—s. 11 Voluntarily—s. 39. Legally bound to do—s. 43.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5882).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5883).
(3) Proof (5884).
(4) Form of Charge (5885).
(5) Principle (5886).
(6) Intimidation by Religious Imposture (5887-5889).
(7) Accused must induce (5888).
(8) Accused must Cause Voluntarily (5889).

5882. Analogous Law.—In the ordinary case of criminal intimidation the threat relates to an injury to the person, reputation or property of another; but in this case the same result is achieved by arousing one's fears of Divine vengeance by preying upon his superstition or his religious belief. This section was originally proposed to be placed under a separate chapter devoted to "offences relating to religion and caste," and the authors justified it in the following words: "It is intended to prevent such practices as those known among the natives by the names of Dhurna and Praga: such acts are now punishable by law,[12] and it is unnecessary to adduce any argument for the purpose of showing that they ought to be so."[13] But this view did not pass unchallenged, it being objected to on the ground that its enactment would rather encourage and perpetuate than repress what is pernicious.[14] Even the Law Commissioners felt it advisable to delete the clause as separate offence, but they recommended its inclusion in the general offence of criminal intimidation,[15] but the Legislature acceded to their recommendation so far as to transpose the section to its present place where it remains as a species of criminal intimidation, the offender being punished for the imposture, not because of his pretended power to imprecate the vengeance of the Deity, but because of its being used for an illegal purpose.

5883. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable, but warrant should, ordinarily, issue in the first instance. It is both bailable and compoundable, and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the first or second class. For other points of practice reference should be made to s. 506 (§§ 5866-5867).

5884. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused induced or attempted to induce another person to believe that he or some other person in whom he is interested will become an object of Divine displeasure.

(2) That he will so become by some act of the accused.

(12) They were punishable by Beng. Reg. XXI of 1795, and VII of 1820; Bom. Reg. XIV of 1827.
(13) Note J, Reprint, p. 137.
(14) 2nd Rep., s. 262.
(15) Ib., s. 265.

(3) That the accused thereby caused or attempted to cause any person to do something which he was not legally bound to do, or to omit to do something which he was legally entitled to do.

(4) That the accused caused or attempted to cause as in (3) voluntarily.

5885. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you voluntarily caused (or attempted to cause), A B to do something, to wit—(here describe the act or omission) which he was not legally bound to do (or that you caused, etc., A B to omit to do something, to wit——which he was legally entitled to do—) by inducing (or attempting to induce) the said A B to believe that he (or C D in whom A B was interested) will become (or will be rendered) by some act of yours an object of Divine displeasure, if the said A B did not do the thing which was your object to cause the said A B to do (or not to do), and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 508 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

"And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge."

5886. Principle.—Though the authors intended this section to apply to the practice of Dhurna, it is obvious that it has other uses as well. It will, for instance, equally apply to the threat of practising sorcery on the complainant unless he submitted to the demand of the accused. The act of the imposter may, in short, take any form of threat so long as it is intended to impress on the victim fear of an impending evil due to some supernatural agency which the accused has the power to invoke. The alarm so produced in a superstitious mind causes the same if not greater mental torment as a threat of direct physical injury, and its intensity varies in inverse ratio with the education and enlightenment of the accused, the result being that the ignorant and the weak fall an easy prey to this species of imposture, clothed as it often is in the garb of sanctity, and appealing as it does to the deeprooted instincts of religion.

5887. Meaning of Words.—"By some act of the offender": Consequently, where the displeasure requires no such act, there can be no conviction for this offence.(16)

5888. Intimidation by Religious Imposture.—The mischief which an act causes must not be judged in the light of reason or by the standard of a civilized man. Its effect must in a great measure depend upon the nature and education of the receptive mind. The practice of Dhurna, at one time the familiar mode of realizing a debt or demand, has long since fallen into desuetude, and this section may so far be regarded as a landmark, which marks one epoch in human history. But it cannot be even yet predicated that the superstitious faith of the people has so completely died out as to render the section nugatory. For, there still remain tracts where there lingers a faith that the torture of one recoils upon another, which is the underlying principle of the cases supposed in the two illustrations, and which are otherwise not quite accurately drawn. For instance, they suppose that the means are adopted to coerce another to do an act which he is not legally bound to do, but it is not stated, though without that qualification the illustrations are too wide. For if A was in either case making a just demand adopting that means for enforcing it, could he be punished for using pressure to enforce a legal right? The use of such pressure is not illegal unless the act to be performed is one which the person pressed was not legally bound to do. This is clear from the first two clauses.

(16) Darai Swami, 48 M. 774.

Under clause 2 a mere persuasion that unless a person complied with the wishes of the offender he had power to call down upon him the vengeance of Heaven is not criminal, unless the accused voluntarily causes that person to do anything which he is not legally bound to do. In this view the two illustrations are clearly misleading, since illustration (a) states nothing as to why A sits Dhurna at Z's door, and the "certain act" which A wants Z to perform in illustration (b) may or may not involve the doing of anything which Z is not legally bound to do, though it is only in the former case that A would be guilty under this section. This was evidently the view of Birdwood and Parsons, JJ., in a case decided upon the following facts: The complainant was the Police Patel of A, and as such he was bound to send a certain monthly return to B; which the accused was bound to carry from A to B, and for which he was paid a certain remuneration. The complainant ordered the accused to carry one such return from A to B, but the accused declined, whereupon the complainant insisted upon compliance with his order. Thereupon the accused lifted up a stone and struck one blow on his own hand with it, exclaiming that the wrath of certain deities named shall rest on the complainant. The complainant, a Mahomedan, prosecuted the accused, and his conviction for this offence was upheld, it being held that the intention of the accused was to induce the complainant to believe that he would be rendered by that act of his, an object of Divine displeasure if he insisted upon the accused carrying the return which the complainant was legally entitled to order him to carry.(17)

Accused must Induce.

5889. The use of coercion must be to cause another to do an act which he is not legally bound to do, or omit to do anything which he is legally entitled to do. This may be either done or the accused may attempt to cause it to be done. In either case it must be his objective. And the means employed by him must be the evoking of fears of Divine displeasure as a consequence of his act, which he must induce the other to believe in. If, therefore, A says to B: "Pay me my debt, otherwise you will have to answer for it in the next world." A may appeal to B's fear of the hereafter, but it is a fear neither evoked nor caused by any act of the accused. The case would, however, be different if in the same case A were to say: "Pay me Rs. 100, else I will recite mantras, whereby you will die," in which case the accused attempts to induce B to submit to

(17) Mhadnack, (1888) B. U. C. 376.

his exaction by making him believe in the efficacy of his power. The transition between such a case and the following is imperceptible, though there is probably a limit beyond which it would not be possible to push the provisions of the section. Suppose a blackmailing priest were to give out that the planet Saturn has haunted some one, and unless it is propitiated by suitable offerings it forebodes calamity; the object is the same, though it is a matter of every day occurrence. But in such a case it may be said that the accused does not profess to intimidate by calling up Divine vengeance by some act of his own, but professes rather to propitiate it by his paid intervention. So Turner, C. J., said: "To constitute the offence punishable under this section it must be shown that the respondent threatened to believe that by that act or illegal omission the person threatened, or some one in whom the person threatened is interested, would become an object of Divine displeasure."(18) The section has, consequently, no application to a case of social excommunication due to the act of the accused, as where the headman of a caste puts one out of caste for some social delinquency interdicting all social intercourse till the person outcasted performs some prescribed purificatory penance. Here the headman does no act to expose the person outcasted to Divine displeasure. Such displeasure is, if at all, ex hypothesi incurred by his very act, and all that the headman does is to declare that it is so.(19)

Accused must Cause Voluntarily.

5890. Again, there must not only be some act done or professed to be done, but the complainant must be persuaded that, that act would bring down the vengeance of Heaven upon him. If he goes no further, he may yet escape, since the section requires that such inducement should be followed up by his voluntarily causing or attempting to cause the complainant to do or omit to do as stated in clause 1. This may be illustrated by an example. A induces B to believe that he possesses supernatural powers by which he could invoke divine agency to harm B, if B did not repay A's debt. A commits no offence, though B believes A. And he incurs no penalty even if B voluntarily offers A a present with the loan so long as A does not demand it. But if he does, he cannot then escape the charge that he had voluntarily caused B to make him a present, which B was not legally bound to do (§ 5888).

Word, gesture or act intended to insult the modesty of a woman.

Pres. Mag. or Mag. of 1st class. Non-cog. Warrant. Bailable. Comp. with Court's sanction.

509. Whoever, intending to insult the modesty of any woman, utters any word, makes any sound or gesture, or exhibits any object, intending that such word or sound shall be heard, or that such gesture or object shall be seen, by such woman, or intrudes upon the privacy of such woman, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

[Woman—s. 10.]

(18) Sankara, 6 M. 381 (394). (19) DeCruz, 8 M. 140

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5890).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5891).
(3) Proof (5892).
(4) Form of Charge (5893).
(5) Principle (5894).
(6) Meaning of Words (5895).
(7) Insult to Female modesty (5896).
(8) Intrusion upon Privacy (5897).

5891. Analogous Law.—A person who insults the modesty of a woman in a public place is guilty of a public nuisance,[20] one whose act goes beyond the words and gesture may be guilty of assault or use of criminal force punishable under s. 354. This section applies only to an act which is not punishable either as one or the other, but which is nevertheless an outrage on female modesty. Such would be the singing of an obscene song, the making of an indecent proposal, or the exposure of one's nude person—acts which become punishable by reason of their depraved suggestiveness.

5892. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable, but warrant should, ordinarily, issue in the first instance. It is bailable and compoundable with the permission of the Court, and is triable by the Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class.

5893. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused—

(a) uttered some word; or

(b) made some sound; or

(c) made some gesture; or

(d) exposed some object; or

(e) intruded upon the privacy of a woman.[21]

(2) That in cases (a) to (d) above, he intended that the same shall be heard or seen by a woman.

(3) That he thereby intended to insult the modesty of any woman.

5894. Charge.—The charge should run thus:—

"I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

"That on or about the——day of——at——you (name of the accused) intending to insult the modesty of one A B, uttered the words, to wit—— (or made some sound or gesture. to wit——, or exhibited some object, to wit——), intending that the same shall be heard (or seen) by the said A B, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 509 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

"And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge"

---

(20) S. 294 (§§ 2888-2896).

(21) I.e., of some one specified, and not of a class; Khair Mahemed, 86 I. C. 968, (1925) S. 271.

5895. Principle.—This section enacts an offence because it causes annoyance to the woman, and it therefore finds place in this chapter which deals with the offences of "criminal intimidation, insult and annoyance." Where such an act is committed in a public place it is punishable as a public nuisance.[22] Where it amounts to an assault or the use of criminal force, it is punishable under the special section enacted for the purpose,[23] and, where the instrusion involves entry into the woman's property it is punishable as criminal trespass or the other offences allied thereto.[24] This section is intended to punish an act which, but for it, would go unpunished.

5896. Meaning of Words.—"Exhibits any object": A letter sent by post containing indecent overtures is such an object exhibited to the complainant by whom it was received.[25]

5897. Insult to Female Modesty.—The question what constitutes an insult to female modesty requires no description, for it is well known. Any word spoken or sung, picture or figure exhibited which suggests lewd thoughts is immoral and insulting to female modesty, unless the woman was a consenting party to it. The fact that the indecent act was done unobserved by all except the woman is, of course, no excuse for the offence, because it is intended to punish such very acts (§ 5714). Nor does the fact that there were several women present, some of whom did not mind, matter, for if the accused intended that his obscenity should be witnessed by all, it is sufficient if it caused annoyance to some. The question whether a song or sight was intended to insult female modesty may be answered with reference to the song or sight. A lewd song is prima facie insulting to female modesty, and so is the exhibition of a nude picture or figure. At a certain time of the year, e.g., Holi the singing of such songs and the exhibition of such figures has degenerated into a usage, but there is no religious sanction for such bacchanalian revels, though usage, the parent of all laws, has made them tolerable. At such times, obscenity may be defended with reference to the festival, and it will be then for the prosecution to shew that it was intended to insult the modesty of a woman.

There can be, of course, no offence, unless the accused's intention that his word or sound shall be heard by the woman is accompanied or followed by its being actually so heard, of which there must be evidence.

5898. Intrusion upon Privacy.—Again, where the offence charged consists of the accused's intrusion upon the privacy of a woman, it must be shown that the intrusion was made with intent to insult the modesty of any woman,[1] which, of course, implies that the intrusion was unwelcome to her. Where, therefore, the accused was found at night inside the complainant's house, whither he had gone for the purpose of visiting the former's widowed daughter-in-law, a woman of loose character, with whose knowledge and consent he had in all probability entered the room, it was held that the accused could neither be convicted under s.

(22) S. 294.
(23) S. 354.
(24) Balmakand Ram v. Ghansam Ram, 22 C. 398; Premananda v. Brindabun, 22 C. 994.
(25) Tarak Das Gupta, 50 B. 246.
(1) Phias Mahammad, 5 Bom. L. R. 502; Hopper, (1892) P. R. 6.

451 or this section.[2] So the mere fact that the accused entered the sleeping apartment of a woman in the middle of the night and called her by name and asked her to get up, would not constitute this offence, in view of the fact that the accused and the woman had had previous acquaintance with each other, and that she was in the habit of speaking to strangers at that hour and entertain them to Pan Supari.[3]

In any case the mere fact that the accused was found on the prosecutor's premises with intent to peep or endeavour to peep into the apartment occupied by the ladies of the household would not constitute this offence, unless there were facts and circumstances justifying a finding that the intrusion was insulting to their modesty.[4] But this may be presumed where the parties are shown to be strangers, or the prosecutor is a woman of respectability, though poor.[5] In short, an intention to insult the modesty of a woman may be presumed from the mere fact of entry into the private apartment of a woman, unless the accused accounts for his presence otherwise.[6] So where the accused was found to have effected an entry into a room occupied by four women, which fact the accused simply denied, the Court felt justified in holding that his entry had been made at least with the object of committing this offence, and in this view his conviction under s. 456 was upheld.[7]

Any Mag. Non-cog. Warrant. Bailable. Not comp. Summary.

Misconduct in public by a drunken person.

510. Whoever, in a state of intoxication, appears in any public place, or in any place which it is a trespass in him to enter, and there conducts himself in such a manner as to cause annoyance to any person, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which extend to twenty-four hours or with fine, which may extend to ten rupees, or with both.

[Person—s. 11. Public place—s. 159, § 1522. Trespass—s. 441.]

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5898).
(2) Procedure and Practice (5899).
(3) Proof (5900).
(4) Being Drunk and Disorderly (5901).

5899. Analogous Law.—This is another section in which an act is punishable because of the annoyance it causes to others—in this case, to any person. Such an act is also punishable under the various municipal bye-laws, and under s. 34 of the Police Act,[8] under which such cases are usually dealt with. The offence consists not in being drunk, but in causing annoyance to others through drunkenness. The fact that he was made drunk does not seem to affect the question, for, the offence is in the nature of a nuisance in which the liability of the accused is unaffected by

(2) Lajje Ram, (1898) P. R. No. 12. C. 994.
(3) Phias Mahammad, 5 Bom. L. R. 502.
(4) Hopper, (1892) P. R. No. 6.
(5) Balmakand Ram v. Ghansam Ram, 22 C. 391; Premanundo v. Brindaban, 22 C. 994.
(6) Premanundo v. Brindaban, 22 C.
(7) Ib.
(8) Act V of 1861.

the exceptional provisions of s. 85 (§§ 804-807). It is, indeed, a case in which he who errs when drunk must pay for it when sober.(9)

5900. Procedure and Practice.—This offence is non-cognizable, but warrant should, ordinarily, issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by any Magistrate and may be tried summarily. The general provisions of the section have been to a great extent supplemented by the provisions of s. 34 of the Police Act,(10) which empowers a police-officer to take into custody without a warrant any person, who within his view is found drunk or riotous, or who is incapable of taking care of himself. Moreover, several Municipal Acts contain similar provisions for the apprehension of persons found drunk in any public place, so that in practice the more cumbrous machinery necessary to establish a case under this section is now seldom resorted to. It will, however, be useful to meet a case where a person commits trespass to the annoyance of another, which cannot be otherwise punished.

5901. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the accused was drunk.

(2) That as such he appeared in a public place or committed trespass.

(3) That he then conducted himself in such a manner as to cause annoyance to any person.

5902. Being Drunk and Disorderly.—This section does not punish drunkenness as such, but drunkenness followed by disorderly conduct in a public place or "in a place where it is a trespass in him to enter." The term "public place" has been the subject of adequate notice (§ 1522), and it is in that sense that it has been used here. A person guilty of disorderly behaviour in a public place commits a public nuisance and may be dealt with as such. If he was drunk he may be punished under this section. But a drunken person may cause annoyance in a place not public. In that case it is only punishable here if it was accompanied by trespass, not necessarily criminal trespass as understood in section 441, but trespass within the meaning of civil law (§§ 4937-4939). Annoyance may be caused by the mere fact of the drunken person remaining on the premises after he is told to go, or he may be guilty of brawling and other acts causing annoyance "to any person," and not necessarily to one in possession of the property.

(9) Qui peccat ebrius, lua sobrius, 'Let him who sins when drunk be punished when sober."

(10) S. 34, Sixth, Act V of 1861.

CHAPTER XXIII

OF ATTEMPTS TO COMMIT OFFENCES.

Punishment for attempting to commit offences.

Triable by Court by which the offence attempted is triable. Cognizable if offence attempted is cognizable. Warrant or summons shall issue according as the offence is one in respect of which a warrant or summons shall ordinarily issue. Bailable if offence contemplated is bailable. Comp. if offence attempted is comp.

511. Whoever attempts to commit an offence punishable by this Code with transportation or imprisonment, or to cause such an offence to be committed, and in such attempt does any act towards the commission of the offence shall, where no express provision is made by this Code for the punishment of such attempt, be punished with transportation or imprisonment of any description provided for the offence, for a term of transportation or imprisonment which may extend to one-half of the longest term provided for that offence, or with such fine as is provided for the offence or with both.

Illustrations.

(a) A makes an attempt to steal some jewels by breaking open a box, and finds after so opening the box that there is no jewel in it. He has done an act towards the commission of theft, and therefore is guilty under this section.

(b) A makes an attempt to pick the pocket of Z by thrusting his hand into Z's pocket. A fails in the attempt in consequence of Z's having nothing in his pocket. A is guilty under this section.

Synopsis.

(1) Analogous Law (5903-5905).
(2) English Law (5904-5905).
(3) Procedure and Practice (5906).
(4) Proof (5907).
(5) Form of Charge (5908).
(6) Principle (5909).
(7) Meaning of Words (5910).
(8) What is an Attempt (5911-5912).
(9) Intention (5911).
(10) Preparation (5912).
(11) Preparation Distinguished from Attempt (5913-5918).
(12) Question one of Degree: Illustrations (5914-5915).
(13) Allahabad View Criticised (5916).
(14) Preparation may be a Distinct Offence (5919-5923).
(15) Cases on the Border Line (5920-5921).
(16) Degree of Proximity Necessary (5924-5931).
(17) "Towards" the Commission of the Offence (5925).
(18) Attempt where Offence Impossible (5926).
(19) When Innocent Act Becomes Criminal Attempt: Locus paenitentiae (5929).
(20) Where Accused is Entrapped (5930-5931).
(21) Attempt Implies Doing of an Act (5932).
(22) Case where Express Provision Made Elsewhere (5933-5935).
(23) Other Attempts (5936-5937).
(24) No Attempt (5938-5940).

5903. Analogous Law.—This section prescribes punishment for an attempt not otherwise expressly provided for. Such provision has been made by several sections of the Code, for instance, in the following sections:—

121. Attempts to wage war against the Queen.
124. Attempt wrongfully to restrain or overawe the Governor-General, Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, or Member of Council.
124-A. Sedition, by attempting to bring into hatred or contempt the Government.
125. Attempt to wage war against a friendly Asiatic Power.
130. Attempt to rescue any prisoner.
131. Attempt to seduce soldier or sailor from his allegiance.
152. Attempt to obstruct a public servant in the discharge of his duty.
153-A. Attempt to promote class-hatred.
161-163, 165, 239-241, 251. Attempt to take bribe.
196. Attempt to use false evidence.
198. Attempt to use a false certificate.
200. Attempt to use a false declaration.
213. Attempt to obtain gratification for screening an offender.
239-241, 251. Attempt to deliver false coin.
307. Attempt to murder.
308. Attempt to commit culpable homicide.
309. Attempt to commit suicide.
385. Attempt to intimidate with a view to commit extortion.
387. Ditto when intimidation causes fear of death or of grievous hurt.
388. Ditto with extortion.
389. Ditto when intimidation causes fear of an accusation.
391. Attempt to commit dacoity.
393. Attempt to commit robbery.
394. Ditto with hurt caused.
397. Robbery with attempt to cause death or grievous hurt.
398. Attempt to commit robbery or dacoity when armed with a deadly weapon.
460. Attempt by a lurking house-trespasser to cause death or grievous hurt.

In all these cases the provisions of this section are inapplicable, because the offence is otherwise expressly provided for. In other cases this section should apply if what is done amounts to an attempt.

5904. English Law. Under English Law every attempt to commit a felony, or a misdemeanour is a misdemeanour at common law, whether the crime attempted is by Statute or at common law.[11] To constitute an attempt the act must be immediately connected with the commission of the offence.[12] The view taken one time was that there could be no attempt unless there was the possibility of committing the offence. As Cockburn, C. J., put it: "The word 'attempt' clearly conveys, with it the idea that if the attempt had succeeded the offence charged would have been committed,"[13] or again:[14] "An attempt to commit felony can only in point of law be made out where, if no interruption had taken place, the attempt could have been carried out successfully, so as to constitute the offence which the accused is charged with attempting to commit." This was also the view of Blackburn, J., who said: "If the actual transaction has commenced, which would have ended in the crime if not interrupted, there is clearly an attempt to commit the crime."[15] But this view led to the result that a pick-pocket could not be convicted of an attempt to commit theft, if the pocket happened to be empty, a view which could not long prevail. The earlier cases were consequently overruled[16] it being held that in such a case the accused could be rightly convicted of an attempt. The earlier precedents were followed by the Calcutta High Court[17] whose view has ceased to be in harmony with that now prevailing in English as well as the other Courts (§§ 3301-3311).

5905. The present English view was, indeed, anticipated by the English Law Commissioners (Lords Blackburn and Barry, Lush and Stephen, JJ.), responsible for drafting the English Criminal Code, who proposed to define an attempt as follows:—

"Art. 74. An attempt to commit an offence is an act done or omitted with intent to commit that offence, forming part of a series of acts or omissions which would have constituted the offence if such series of acts or omissions had not been interrupted either by the voluntary determination of the offender not to complete the offence or by some other cause.

"Every one who believing that a certain state of facts exists, does or omits an act, the doing or omitting of which would, if that state of fact existed, be an attempt to commit an offence, attempts to commit that offence, although its commission in the manner proposed was reason of the non-existence of the state of facts at the time of the act or omission impossible.

"The question whether an act done or omitted with intent to commit an offence is or is not only preparation for the commission of that offence and too remote to constitute an attempt to commit it, is a question of law."

5906. Procedure and Practice.—The procedure applicable to this offence is exactly the same as is applicable to the offence of which it is an attempt. That is to say, this offence is cognizable or non-cognizable according as the offence is cognizable or non-cognizable, and so it is one in which warrant or summons may ordinarily issue, or whether bail should be taken or refused, or the offence could be compounded

---

(11) Hensler, 11 Cox. 570; Roderick, 7 C. & P. 795; Martin, 2 Mood, C. C. 123; Butler, 6 C. & P. 368.

(12) Eagleton, 24 L. J. M. C. 158; Roberts. 25 L. J. M. C. 17.

(13) M'Pherson, Dears & B. 197 (202).

(14) Collins, 33 L. J. M. C. 177.

(15) Cheeseman, L. & C. 140 (145).

(16) Brown, 24 Q. B. D. 357; Ring, 61 L. J.M. C. 116; Williams, [1893] 1 Q B. 320; overruling Collins, 33 L. J. M. C 177: M'Pherson, Dears & B. 197.

(17) Riasat Ali, 7 C. 352; followed in Chandi Pershad v. Abdur Rahman, 22 C. 131 (138).

or not, and it is similarly triable by the same Court by which the offence attempted is triable. It would seem that if the Court was precluded from taking cognizance of an offence without sanction, it is not necessarily precluded from taking cognizance of an attempt under this section without such sanction, because ss. 195-199 of the Procedure Code which qualify the general powers of the Court, only refer to an offence and not to its attempt or abetment.[18] And since as compared to the completed offence this is a minor offence of the same kind, a person, though charged for the one may be convicted of the other if the facts warrant it.[19] So a person may be charged for committing rape and convicted of an attempt, but in that case though a sentence of 10 years' transportation or of 5 years' rigorous imprisonment may be passed, it is illegal to pass a sentence of 7 years' rigorous imprisonment commutable under section 59 to 7 years' transportation.[20] A conviction under this section is not subject to s. 75, since that section merely mentions Chapters XII and XVII and not Chapter XXVII of which this section is a part[21]. A sentence of whipping cannot be passed on a conviction for attempting to commit house-breaking by night with intent to commit theft.[22] But such a sentence is legal where the offence committed is attempted robbery as defined in s. 393.[23]

5907. Proof.—The points requiring proof are:—

(1) That the act amounted to an attempt.

(2) That it was an attempt to commit an offence under the Code.

(3) That that offence was punishable with imprisonment.

5908. Charge.—The charge should mention both this section as well as the principal section.[24] A person charged for a principal offence may be convicted of an attempt.[25] It should run thus:—

"I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:—

That on or about the—day of——at——you attempted to commit (specify the offence attempted), and in such attempt did a certain act towards the commission of the said offence, to wit——(mention it), and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s.—(principal offence), and s. 511 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or within the cognizance of the Court of Session or the High Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried (by the said Court) on the said charge.

---

(18) Anant v. Puranik, 25 B. 90.
(19) S. 238, Cr. P. C.: Joseph Marian, 10 W. R. 10.
(20) Joseph Marian, 10 W. R. 10; s. 57.
(21) Ajudhia, 17 A. 120; Bharosa, ib. 123; Motawel, 1 Weir 37; Jhamman Lal (1906) P. R. 14; Ghasita, (1918) P. R. 13; Banne, 24 O. C. 250; 64 I. C. 142; 22 Cr. L. J. 750.
(22) Yella, 3 B. H. C. R. 37; s. 2 (10) Whipping Act (VI of 1864).
(23) S. 4 (9), Whipping Act (VI of 1864).
(24) 1 W. R. Cr. L. 11.
(25) Billinghurst, 27 C. W. N. 821; (1924) A. I. R. Cal. 18; 1.

5909. Principle.—All offences may be viewed from four distinct stages; (i) intention; (ii) preparation; (iii) attempt; and (iv) completed act. Of these the Criminal Codes of all countries exempt the first from punishment. The Code punishes the second stage of certain offences, while the third marks a distinct advance in the development of criminality, so that it is punishable everywhere. Ordinarily then, law allows locus pœnitentiæ only up to the second stage, after which it regards the development of the scheme as too far advanced to remain unpunished. This has led to an important question as to when the preparation ends and an attempt begins. The section does not, however, punish all attempts, for it leaves unpunished attempts of those minor offences which are themselves only punishable with fine. And as it leaves out attempts of other offences otherwise expressly provided for (§ 5902), this section is not exhaustive of the attempts which are punishable here, but only provides for some cases of attempts which would have otherwise gone unpunished. What such attempts are will be seen presently.

5910. Meaning of Words.—"Or causes such an offence to be committed":—This means a person who instigates or engages another to commit an offence. It would thus include one who attempts to abet an offence. "Does any act towards the commission of the offence:" These words are equivalent to the English phrase "does an overt act." They exclude a mere intention not followed up by an overt act; they also exclude acts not proximate and necessarily connected with the commission of the offence. "Where no provision is made for the punishment of such attempt:" In one sense these words are clear enough, but in another sense they are not. For instance, suppose A runs after B with a hatchet intending to murder B. He is rescued before A can give a stroke. Is he guilty under s. 307 or under this section? (§§ 3301-3311).

5911. What is an Attempt?—As has been before remarked (§ 5909), the Code recognizes four stages in the commission of a crime, and of these it makes reference to three stages, namely, preparation, attempt and completed offence. The first stage is intention—and so long as the offence rests only in intention it is not punishable. So Lord Mansfield, C. J., : "So long as an act rests in bare intention, it is not punishable by our laws: but immediately when an act is done, the law judges not only of the act done, but of the intent with which it is done; and if it is coupled with an unlawful and malicious intent, though the act itself would otherwise have been innocent, the intent being criminal, the act becomes criminal and punishable."[1] Intention is the determination of the will to act in a particular manner. As such, it amounts to resolution or a settled determination that a certain thing shall be done. So long as such intention does not pass beyond the stage of mental resolve or determination law cannot punish it, because law will not take notice of an intent without an act.[2] But the moment it emerges from that stage, it ceases to be an intention and develops into a preparation.

(1) Intention.

(1) Scofield, (1784) Cal. 397 (403); Baku, 24 B. 287.

(2) Per Coleridge, J. in Dugdale, 1 E. & B. 435.

Even the expression of an intention may be an act sufficiently criminal as in the case of criminal intimidation, insult or annoyance. And it may even be a completed offence as in the case of sedition. But otherwise even the expression of an intention is not criminal. For instance, if A were to say to B that he intended stealing his purse, A could not be punished for the mere expression of his intention. And if A were to follow B under such circumstances as irresistibly point to his determination to pick B's pocket—even then he could not be punished, for he is at the preparatory stage of an offence which falls short of an attempt, and is as such not punishable. But this is not the invariable rule. For, indeed, there are offences, the heinousness of which has led law to punish even their preparation. Such are offences to overthrow the sovereignty of the King[3] and preparation to commit dacoity,[4] in which case even that stage is punishable.

(2) Preparation.

5912. But in such cases that stage is defined. There are, however, cases in which the transition between what is a preparation and an attempt is so gradual as to be almost imperceptible. And since those are cases in which a preparation is not punishable, it becomes necessary to see if a working rule cannot be devised to test when an act ceases to be a preparation, and becomes an attempt. Now the preparation to commit an offence consists in devising or arranging the means or measures necessary for the commission of the offence.[5] It implies the taking of previous measures necessary for the crime. In one sense everything how remotely so ever connected with the commission of the crime may be regarded as preparation towards it. For instance, a thief may require a stick and a lantern, a pair of shoes and food for his journey. The collection of all these would be preparation, but it is a preparation which is not directly connected with the commission of the crime, and law therefore views it with an indifferent eye. In other words, though a preparation, it is too remote from the crime and as such it is not punishable.

5913. Preparation Distinguished from an Attempt.—But between such preparation and one which is punishable under law, there is only a difference of degree. For instance, where a married woman entered the shop of the accused with a view to have sexual intercourse, and the shop was immediately afterwards besieged, it was held that the act done amounted only to preparation or providing an opportunity, being a stage of the proceeding short of attempt which is not punishable by law.[6] This case followed an earlier precedent in which the accused, who was a member of the Municipal Committee of a town, had had a woman brought into the Committee room for co-habitation, with whom he intended to pass the night, but before he had sexual intercourse with her, her husband surprised them whereupon the Court held that the accused had not proceeded beyond the stage of preparation.[7] The accused who was the milk contractor to the regimental hospital at Ferozepur, was detected in the hospital

(3) Ss. 121-A. 122.
(4) Ss. 399, 400-402.
(5) Peterson, 1 A. 316; Padala Venkatasami, 3 M. 4; Srinivasan, 25 M. 726.
(6) Paira Ram, (1902) P. R. 25.
(7) Ghulam Mahomed, (1879) P. R. 13.

compound with about three gallons of stale milk in his possession going in the direction of the place where the cows were about to be milked, the milk being in a can similar to those in which the cows were milked. His intention was clearly to adulterate old milk with the new, for which he was convicted, but the Court held the act to amount only to a preparation.(8)

The accused asked a native doctor for medicine to poison her son-in-law. It was held that the act was not an attempt to murder but merely a preparation, though it might be viewed as an instigation of the doctor to abet her in the commission of murder, and as such it would be an offence punishable under section 302|116 of the Code.(9) The accused had a quarrel with the complainant who was his brother, in the course of which he ran off and fetched a sword, when he was disarmed by by-standers. It was held that the mere act of bringing a sword was not an act of such an approximate nature as would amount to an attempt to commit murder or grievous hurt, as though there was a preparation towards the commission of some such offence a mere preparation was not sufficient to constitute an attempt though his menacing attitude while armed was sufficient to constitute criminal assault, for which he was convicted under s. 352.(10) Where the accused raised his knife in a threatening manner manifesting an intention to stab the complainant, but did not actually try to stab him, the act was held to fall short of an attempt to stab.(11)

The accused having had a quarrel with her relations threatened to commit suicide for which she ran up to a well. She was caught before she could jump into it whereupon she was prosecuted for attempted suicide, but the Court held her act not to have gone beyond the stage of preparation. "There is no doubt that the accused intended to commit suicide, and that she prepared to carry out that intention, and proceeded to the well. She might have, however, still changed her mind, and she was caught before she did anything which might be regarded as the commencement of the offence of which she is convicted."(12) A young Brahmin widow was confined of a child. The police made a raid on her house and found her lying on the first floor, while her new-born child was found on the second floor wrapped up in a cloth with a cooking pot turned over it. She was prosecuted under section 307 but West, J., held the evidence insufficient to sustain the conviction. But he did not go into the question whether the act if proved would have sufficed to sustain the conviction, though this may be presumed.(13)

5914. The case where the accused purchases a stamp-paper in the name of a person in whose name it was intended to forge, was in one case held to be a mere preparation,(14) not unlike the person who purchased poison to commit murder.(15) But there is a distinction between

Question one of Degree: Illustrations.

(8) Sukha, (1885) P. R. 40.
(9) Bakhtawar (Mt.), (1882) P. R. 24.
(10) Data Ram, (1882) P. R. No. 45.
(11) Tha Do Hla, (1902) 1 L. B. R. 264.
(12) Ramakka, 8 M. 5.
(13) Chima, 8 B. H. C. R. 164.
(14) Ramsarun, 4 N. W. P. H. C. R. 46.
(15) Bakhtawar (Mt.), (1882) P. R. No. 24.

the two. For the purchase of poison by A does not of itself indicate that he is going to murder B, but the purchase of a stamp-paper by A in the name of B is a distinct act in advance of the preparation so that it may be regarded as an act done towards the commission of the offence, and as such constituting an attempt within the meaning of this section. This case has been distinguished[16] and dissented from in subsequent cases of the same Court[17] upon grounds which considerably shake its authority, but which do not overrule it. But the same view was reached independently in Madras in a case in which the accused were detected after they had prepared a draft of the document they intended to forge, procured a stamp-paper on which the draft was to be copied, and applied to a person there sitting to furnish him the corresponding Telugu date for an English date which they intended to insert therein, upon which it was held that the acts of the prisoners did not go beyond the preparation to commit forgery and towards the commission of which they had done no act. But at the same time it was held that the act amounted to the abetment of forgery under s. 116 of the Code for which they were convicted.[18]

5915. In the second case,[19] the facts were the same, though the conclusion arrived at was different. There the accused, who was a money-lender intending to forge a bond in the name of his debtor Chattar who had already paid off his debt, sent a servant to buy a stamp-paper in the name of Chattar giving the latter's parentage and address. The accused was convicted and in revision his pleader relied on the earlier precedent referring to which Turner, J., said: "The endorsement of the stamp-vendor forms no part of the document which it may be assumed it was the intention of the person who procured the endorsement to make on the face of the stamp-paper. The offence of the forgery had, therefore, not proceeded beyond the stage of preparation; but in the case now before the Court there had been an actual fabrication: something had been done. It is true that no judicial proceeding had been instituted, but the petitioner's pleader is unable to suggest any other object for which the false endorsement could have been procured. The petitioner undoubtedly threatened Chattar Singh that he would make him pay Rs. 50. He could not have carried out his threat without the intervention of the Court. The object of the endorsement made by the vendor of a stamp, is to afford proof of the person to whom it is sold; and in suits brought on documents written on stamp-paper, it is the usual course, when the execution of the document is denied, to advert to the endorsement, and to the stamp-vendor's memory assisted by the endorsement as evidence of the person to whom the stamp was sold, and, therefore, as evidence of the probability that the document was made by the person by whom the paper was procured. I do not say that in the case cited the accused should have been discharged. Had the point been taken, the Court might have held the accused guilty of the offence of which the petitioner has been convicted, but I am of opinion that, in the case before the Court, the evidence for the prosecution warranted the inference that the petitioner procured the false

(16) Mula, 2 A. 105.
(17) MacGrea, 15 A. 173; Kalyan Singh, 16 A. 409.
(18) Padala Venkataswami, 3 M. 4.
(19) Mula, 2 A. 105.

endorsement for the purpose of thereafter using it in a judicial proceeding, and consequently that the conviction is not open to the objection taken to it."[20] But this much may be said of any forged bond. The case in which the accused had not only purchased a stamp-paper in the name of another, but caused a petition-writer to engross a portion of the bond thereon mentioning the name of the person against whom it was to be used as the executant, is clearly distinguishable. for it was clearly an attempt, inasmuch as the writing which constituted the offence had been written, though it was incomplete and wanted a signature.[21]

Allahabad View Criticised.

5916. The distinction between a preparation and an attempt was much discussed in a case in which the accused had not gone so far as in the Allahabad cases last cited so as to constitute an attempt. There the accused got printed one hundred receipt forms similar to those formerly used by the Bengal Coal Company of which he corrected the second proof in order to assimilate the form to that then used by the said company when he was arrested by the police. The prosecution alleged that the receipts were so printed for the purpose of cheating. The jury found him guilty of an attempt to commit forgery, and one of the questions considered by Garth, C.J., was whether the act amounted to an attempt within the meaning of this section. For this purpose he relied upon the definition of that term as given in the two English cases[22] since overruled (§ 5904) and added: "All that he (the accused) did consisted in mere preparation for the commission of the crime. He was no more guilty of an attempt to commit forgery in having the forms printed than he would have been of an attempt to commit burglary by having a false key made of the house where he intended to commit the offence."[23] This view cannot be combated, but the correctness of the definition of "attempt" adopted by the Court has been questioned in Allahabad,[24] though it was incidentally followed in a later case of the same Court,[25] but the point was perhaps not argued, and in view of the recent decisions of the English Court it is not now even arguable (§ 5904).

5917. As has been remarked before, there is no sharp line of division between a preparation and an attempt. The question whether it is one or the other must depend upon the circumstances of each case. For instance, take the following case: The accused was the stationmaster of a wayside station, where a guard of a goods train when just about to start was persuaded by him to initial in pencil the station Receipt Book against the word "one only." The description column of the book was then blank. He filled this in later by adding "Four bales silk" and altered "one only" into "four only." The additions and alterations were made to convert the entry to mean that the accused had entrusted the guard four bales of silk for conveyance for which he was responsible. His intention was proved to be to

(20) Mula, 2 A. 105.
(21) Kalyan Singh, 16 A. 409.
(22) Per Lord Blackburn in Cheeseman, L. & C. Rep. 145; M'Pherson, D. & B. 202.
(23) Riasat Ali, 7 C. 352.
(24) MacGrea, 15 A. 173.
(25) Chandi Pershad v. Abdur Rahman, 22 C. 131.

defraud the Railway Company, but the Court held that the forwarding by the accused of the fictitious consignment notes could only be regarded as preparatory to the offence of cheating. But the Court held that the act was nevertheless sufficient to uphold the accused's conviction for abetment of cheating.(1)

The same principle may be illustrated by another case with widely different facts. The accused, Baku, was prosecuted at Sholapur for having taken a girl under sixteen years of age from that place to Tuljapur in the Nizam's territory and there dedicated her to a goddess with intent or knowing it likely that the minor would be employed or used for purposes of prostitution. She was charged under s. 372, but the Sessions Judge acquitted her, holding that the removal of the minor from Sholapur to Tuljapur was, at the most, a preparation for the commission of the offence, and as such did not constitute either the principal offence or the abetment thereof. The Local Government appealed, and in upholding the acquittal Ranade, J., held that the conveyance of the girl from Sholapur to Tuljapur was merely preparatory to the offence which consisted in her dedicating the girl at Tuljapur to life-long prostitution, that since the offence commenced and was committed at Tuljapur which was outside British India, the British Courts had no jurisdiction to try her for an ex-territorial offence without a certificate from the Political Agent.(2) As compared to these cases, there is no difficulty in holding that a person who is intent upon contracting a bigamous marriage cannot be convicted of an attempt if he had done nothing more than caused the publication of names of the contemplated bigamous marriage.(3) So a person could not be convicted of an attempt to cheat on the mere fact found against him that he had fraudulently induced the Octroi office to grant him a certificate entitling him to obtain a refund of octroi duty(4) or that he had despatched an insured parcel to the complainant purporting to enclose currency notes in payment of his debt, whereas it contained in fact only waste paper;(5) much less where the accused had taken the thumb impression of the complainant on a blank piece of paper upon which he feared a receipt might be written up.(6) The accused was prosecuted for conveying a police jacket under his arm with intent to pass himself off as a policeman. It was held that the accused could not be convicted under s. 171 as his act amounted to no more than a preparation to commit that offence.(7)

5918. Similarly, in an attempt to commit theft, the question depends upon the proximity between the act done and the act which constitutes the offence. For instance, if A wishes to pick B's pockets, the fact that he was seen shadowing him is too remote, and so is the fact that he lifted the tail of B's coat to ascertain if there was anything in the pocket,(8) but if with the same object A puts his hand into B's pocket then it is clearly an attempt, even though the pocket

---

(1) Raghunath, (1889) B. U. C. 470. following Padala, 3 M. 4.
(2) Baku, 24 B. 287.
(3) Peterson, 1 A. 316.
(4) Dhundi, 8 A. 304.
(5) Vythinathaswami, 51 M. L. T. 800; Tularam, 83 I. C. 993. (1924) A. 205.
(6) Shco Prasad, 94 I. C. 353. (1926) Pat. 267.
(7) Nga Po Kyaw, (1904) 1 U. B. R. P. C. 3.
(8) Taylor (1871), 25 L. T. 75.

be empty.[9] So it was clearly an attempted house-breaking where the accused was making a hole in the wall with a view to obtain an entry into the house, but before the hole could be completed he had to run away leaving it unfinished, on being surprised.[10] Such was the case of the accused who had offered to sell to the complainant a bagful of coins which were found to be counterfeit. He was arrested before their delivery.[11]

5919. Preparation may be a Distinct Offence.—The question whether an act is merely preparatory or amounts to an attempt depends upon the nature of the offence and whether it is part of the act which is punishable as an offence. Consequently, an act may be merely preparatory to the commission of one offence, though it may amount to another completed offence. So in the case of the prisoner indicted for rape, Patterson, J., said: "In order to find the prisoner guilty of an assault with intent to commit a rape, you must be satisfied that the prisoner, when he laid hold of the prosecutrix, not only desired to gratify his passions upon her person, but that he intended to do so at all events, and notwithstanding any resistance on her part."[12] Here is then an instance, when an assault is complete though the act is not rape but only preparation to commit that offence.

So in a case where the accused was convicted of an attempted rape, Melvill, J., said: "We believe that in this country indecent assaults are often magnified into attempts at rape, and even more often into rape itself; and we think that a conviction of an attempt at rape ought not to be arrived at, unless the Court be satisfied that the conduct of the accused indicated a determination to gratify his passions at all events, and in spite of all resistance. In the present case....(the prisoner)seems to have desisted before he was interrupted; and no evidence has been given to show that the complainant's person showed marks of violence.....nor that the clothes either of the complainant or the prisoner showed any stains which would indicate to what point the prisoner's criminality had proceeded." For these reasons the Court quashed his conviction for this offence read with s. 376 and converted it into one under s. 354.[13] So while the presence of a married woman in the same room with the accused may be insufficient to prove an attempt to commit adultery[14] still it may be sufficient to hold the accused guilty of s. 448[15] or of the offence defined in s. 509.[16] So an act may fail to amount to an attempt though it may be sufficient abetment. So where A wrote a letter to B asking the latter to commit sodomy with him A was indicted for instigating B to commit that offence though the letter was never opened by B.[17]

---

(9) Brown, 24 Q. B. D. 357; Ring, (1892) 61 L. J. M. C. 116; Williams, (1893) 1 Q. B. 320.

(10) Chand Khan, 37 B. 553; Ghasita, (1919) P. R. No. 13, 51 I. C. 476; Jaimal, 89 I. C. (L.) 848.

(11) Rahmat Ali, 103 I. C. 408, (1927) L. 634.

(12) Llyod, 7 Car. & Pay. 318.

(13) Shankar, 5 B. 403.

(14) Ghulam Mahomed, (1879) P. R. 18; Paira Ram, (1902) P. R. 25.

(15) Premanundo v. Brindabun, 22 C. 994; Balmakand v. Ghansam Ram, 22 C. 398.

(16) Ib.

(17) Ransford, 13 Cox. 9; cf. Padala Venkatasami, 3 M. 4.

5920. But the question whether an act amounts to an attempt or is merely a preparation is not always so easy to answer. For instance, suppose the case of a person found with a piece of live charcoal concealed in a ball of rag found near a place in the neighbourhood of which other houses had been previously set fire to by similar means, was his act an attempt or preparation merely? Glover, J., was of opinion that it was the former while his junior colleague Mitter, J., held it to be the latter, and though the opinion of the senior Judge determined the fate of the prisoner, still the reasons given by Mitter, J., are well worthy of serious consideration. It was conceded by Glover, J., that if the ball of rag found on the accused had contained a piece of unlighted charcoal he should have held that there had been no sufficient commencement of any act which tended towards the commission of mischief by fire, and that the prisoner would have been in the same position as a person who intending to murder some other person whether by shooting or poisoning him, bought a gun or poison, and kept the same by him, which being an ambiguous act and not so immediately connected with the offence, the accused could not be punished under this section. "But in this case the instrument for causing mischief by fire was completely ready, and was not used, only because the party carrying it had no opportunity. It must, I think, be assumed that a person going about at night provided with an apparatus specially fitted for committing mischief by fire intends to commit that mischief, and that he has already begun to move towards the execution of his purpose, and that is sufficient to constitute an attempt."(18)

Cases on the Borderline.

5921. But Mitter, J., dissented from this view on the ground that the act afforded no evidence of the use the accused was going to make of the burning charcoal: "In order to support a conviction for attempting to commit an offence of the nature described in s. 511 it is not only necessary that the prisoner should have done an overt act 'towards the commission of the offence,' but that the act itself should have been done 'in the attempt' to commit it. The Sessions Judge says that the very fact that the prisoner went out of his house with the ball, which was found in his possession was an overt act 'towards the commission of the offence, but the question is, was there any attempt to commit a particular offence, and, if so, was the act done in such attempt? I am of opinion that both these cases must be answered in the negative. Suppose a man goes out of his house into the street with a loaded gun in his possession, and suppose even that there is evidence to show that he did so with the intention of shooting (Z). If Z is not found in the street, or when found no attempt is made to shoot him either from fear or repentance, or from any other cause, can it be said that the man is guilty of attempting to murder Z? The going out of one's house with a loaded gun and with the intention of shooting a particular individual might be in one sense considered as an act done towards the shooting of that individual; but so long as nothing further is done, so long as there is no attempt to shoot him and no overt act done in 'in such attempt,' it is impossible to hold that there has been an attempt to murder. (In the present case) it may be said that the prisoner had some mischievous object in view when he secured the possession of a ball like the one which was found with him, but there is nothing to show what was the particular mischief which he contemplated, or that he attempted to commit any mischief.[19] But this was the case in which the criminality of the accused had not to be judged from the mere possession of a lighted charcoal. There had been mysterious fires in the village before, which had been caused by means of a similar ball. The accused was found in possession of one such ball at night and he was found to have concealed it on his person. He was, moreover, detected in the vicinity of the fires, and all of which facts may legitimately be used to presume the existence of other facts not disclosed by the mere possession of the ball: It was in fact a case in which the Court after considering the matters before it, believed the fact that the accused was about to set fire to the house before which he was standing so probable that a prudent man ought under the circumstances of the particular case to act upon the supposition that he was so about to set fire to it.[20]

(18) Doyal Bawri, 3 B. L. R. (A. C.) 55.

5922. At any rate, such cases lie on the frontier between preparation and attempt. Between them and an attempt proper there is no difference of principle but only of degree. But this cannot be more precisely defined, though it may be illustrated. But this much may, however, be premised that this section does not relate only to the penultimate act but to all preceding acts if they were done with the intent to commit or facilitate the commission of the act.[21] The accused asked certain persons to collect men to overthrow the Government and plunder the treasuries and release Tilak who was then in jail being convicted of sedition. He was prosecuted of an attempt to collect men and arms to wage war with the Queen under s. 122 read with this section. But though both Ranade and Fulton, JJ., agreed that the act of the accused was criminal, they were by no means agreed on the nature of the offence committed by him; Ranade, J., was of opinion that the act of the accused was an attempt to commit the offence of collecting men and arms for the purpose of waging war under s. 122 of the Code, but this view was combated by Fulton, J., who said: "I do not think the acts of the accused amounted to an attempt. In many cases it is hard to indicate the precise point at which a preparation to commit a crime becomes an attempt to commit it; and it is still more difficult to define in general terms the difference between a preparation and an attempt. In some cases the distinction is clear. If A merely buys a stick in order to beat B no one would think of saying that he attempted to beat B. If he ran at B with the stick, but was seized by C, probably most people would say that he did attempt to beat him. But there might be many intermediate cases in which there would be a difference of opinion whether the acts amounted to an attempt or merely constituted a preparation."[22] That learned Judge was of opinion that the appropriate section applicable to the case was s. 166 read with s. 122 in other words, the act of the accused was not an attempt but an abetment.[23]

5923. These cases are sufficient to show the difficulty of reducing them to a general principle. So Knox, J., said: "It is no doubt most difficult to frame a satisfactory and exhaustive definition which shall lay down for all cases where preparation to commit an offence ends

---

(19) Doyal Bawri, 3 B. L. R. (A. C.) 55.

(20) "Proved" as defined in s. 3 (2), Indian Evidence Act. (I of 1872).

(21) Per Ranade, J., in Anant Puranik, 25 B. 90. To the same effect, Knox, J. in MacCrea, 15 A. 173.

(22) Per Ranade, J., in Anant Puranik, 25 B. 90. To the same effect, Knox, J., in MacCrea, 15 A. 173.

(23) Ib.

and where attempt to commit that offence begins. The question is not one of mere proximity in time or place. Many offences can easily be conceived where, with all necessary preparations made, a long interval will still elapse between the hour when the attempt to commit the offence commences and the hour when it is completed. The offence of cheating and inducing delivery is an offence in point. The time that may elapse between the moment when the preparations made for committing the fraud are brought to bear upon the mind of the person to be deceived, and the moment when he yields to the deception practised upon him may be a very considerable interval of time. There may be the inter-position of inquiries and other acts upon his part. The acts whereby those preparations may be brought to bear upon the mind may be several in point of number and yet the first act after preparation completed will, if criminal in itself, be beyond all doubt, equally an attempt with the ninety and ninth act in the series.

Again, the attempt once begun, and a criminal act done in pursuance of it towards the commission of the act attempted does not cease to be a criminal attempt in my opinion, because the person committing the offence does or may repent before the attempt is completed. The attempt to defraud a widow of valuable security, commenced by an act of criminal intimidation committed in such attempt and towards the fraud, does not cease to be an attempt, because the perpetrator repents and abstains from completing the attempt. The question whether the act is an act of preparation or an act in attempt, and towards commission, is a fact to be determined upon the evidence. It is in most cases question for the jury to distinguish between an act after attempt begun, and towards commission of the offence attempted and an act independent of the attempt altogether."(24) These views were generally concurred in by Bliar, J., who said: "It seems to me that the section uses the word 'attempt' in a very large sense; it seems to imply that such an attempt may be made up of a series of acts, and that any one of those acts done towards the commission of the offence, that is, conducive to its commission, is itself punishable; and though the act does not use the words, it can mean nothing but punishable as an attempt. It does not say that the last act which would form the final part of an attempt in the larger sense is the only act punishable under the section. It says expressly that, whosoever in such attempt, obviously using the words in the larger sense, does any act, etc., shall be punishable. The term 'any act' excludes the notion that the final act short of actual commission is alone punishable, and the notion that any of the other acts would be without the range of the section is probably derived from the rulings in the English cases.

"The difficulty with section 511 might easily have been removed by saying that where in such an attempt, using the word in the larger sense, any person does any act towards the commission of an offence, he shall be held to have committed an 'attempt' within the meaning of this section. That I take to be the real meaning and drift of the section, differentiating in a marked manner, the definition of 'attempt' in the Indian Penal Code and the accepted English doctrine.[25]

(24) MacCrea, 15 A. 173, O. A. 15 A. 310, P. C.

5924. Degree of Proximity Necessary.—This view has been concurred in in other cases,[1] and they may then be said to have established the proposition that in order to constitute an attempt the act must be one done towards the commission of the offence, but it need not be the penultimate act, but may be "any act" proximate or remote so long as it is done "towards" the commission of the offence. But the negative proposition that the act need not be proximate is instructive but it does not carry the discussion much further, for the question still remains—do acts only remotely connected with the commission of the crime equally amount to attempt? And if so, is their remoteness ever a ground for holding them otherwise? Indeed, it is not so much upon the first question as upon the second that the English and Indian views are divergent. For, while both agree that acts too remote or quite foreign to the end proposed, or too insignificant a contribution to it are not sufficient to constitute an attempt, the difficulty is created not in the abstract enunciation of the rule, but in its practical application to concrete facts. For instance, the question was at one time in controversy whether a thief putting his hand into a pocket intending to pick it could be said to commit an attempt when there was nothing in the pocket to steal, but it is now settled that the impossibility of committing the offence does not preclude the possibility of criminal attempt.

"Towards" the Commission of the Offence.

5925. So an "attempt to discharge any kind of loaded arms at any person" is punishable by Statute[2] and it has been held that a person may be guilty of such attempt if he point a gun towards another intending to shoot him and pull the trigger, but the gun fail to go off, because the cartridge was empty and the gun not loaded.[3] So where the accused was indicted for a similar attempt and the evidence was that the prisoner had presented a loaded revolver, but had been prevented from discharging it by a third person, it was held that the prisoner intended to do that which he was prevented from doing and the evidence was sufficient to support the conviction.[4] So while under English law[5] a boy under fourteen years of age is deemed physically incapable of "having carnal knowledge of a girl under thirteen"—an offence punishable under s. 4 of the Statute,[6] still that fact does not preclude the possibility of his conviction under s. 9 of the same Statute for an indecent assault.[7]

Attempt Where Offence Impossible.

5926. These cases then establish another proposition, viz., that there may be an attempt to commit an offence though the commission of the offence was in the circumstances impossible. But the case in which the commission of the offence is impossible must be distinguished from

(25) MacCrea, 15 A. 173 (181); O. A. 15 A., 310, P. C.

(1) Anant Vinayak, 25 B. 90; Ganesh, 34 B. 378; per Mitter, J., in Doyal Bawri, 3 B. L. R. (A. C.) 55; Harjee Mull v. Imam Ali, 8 C. W. N. 278.

(2) 24 & 25 Vict., c. 100. s. 14 (Offences against the Person Act, 1861).

(3) Jackson, 17 Cox. 104.

(4) Duckworth, 17 Cox. 495.

(5) Criminal Law Amendment Act 1885 (48 & 49 Vict., c. 69), s. 4.

(6) Waite, (1892) 2 Q. B. 600.

(7) Williams, (1893) 1 Q. B. 320.

one in which the act if completed would be no offence at all. For in such a case there is not only the possibility of committing the offence attempted, but what was attempted cannot be punished because the act if completed was innocent and not punishable by the Code. So Birdwood J., said: "It is possible to attempt to commit an impossible theft, and so offend against the Code, because theft is itself an offence against the Code, and may, therefore, be attempted within the meaning of the Code. But no criminal liability can be incurred under the Code by an attempt to do an act, which if done, would not be an offence against the Code."(8)

Such a case arose where the accused sent a pseudonymous petition to a Commissioner threatening to kill the complainant unless he was transferred from a certain forest division of which he was in charge. The commissioner was found not to have been "interested" in the complainant so as to make the act of the accused punishable as criminal intimidation(9) (§ 727), and as he could not be punished for that substantive offence he could not be also punished for its attempt under s. 507.(10) But in this case if we suppose the Commissioner had been "interested" in the complainant, then the accused might have been convicted of an attempt, though it might not have created the slightest effect upon the Commissioner. So if A asks B for a bribe, his attempt to obtain an illegal gratification from B is complete though B might have been wholly unwilling to give it to A.(11) And of course, in such a case the attempt may be as much made by addressing a direct request to another as by indulging in a suggestive circumlocution the meaning of which is unmistakable, as in the case last cited where the accused, a clerk employed in the Pension Department of Government told B, an applicant for a pension, what influence he possessed in the department and how he had secured increased pensions in two instances adding that anything could be done by kar-rawai, and on rejecting the overture the accused declared that B should rue and repent the rejection of it, and which was held to have been a sufficient attempt to obtain a bribe within the meaning of s. 161.(12) So an attempt would be complete if the accused is shown to have dug a hole intending to place salt therein, with intent that the discovery of the salt so placed might be used in evidence against his enemy whom he intended to get convicted of breach of the customs law.(13)

5927. Such a case presents innumerable variations in accordance with the offence the accused intends the complainant should be convicted of. So he might screen a railway key or other stolen property in the complainant's house intending to implicate him for its theft, or he might use other means of fabricating false evidence in which case the accused would clearly be guilty of this offence irrespective of the consequences. So a person may be guilty of attempted arson if intending to set fire to a stack he approaches it and lights a lucifer match for that purpose, but abandons the attempt because he finds that he is being watched.(14) But here the act of lighting a lucifer was a direct

(8) Mangesh Jivaji, 11 B. 376 (381).
(9) Ss. 503, 506.
(10) Mangesh Jivaji, 11 B. 376.
(11) Baldeo Sahai, 2 A. 253.
(12) Ib.
(13) Nunda, 4 N. W. P. H. C. R. 133.
(14) William Taylor, (1859) 1 F. & F. 511.

overt act converting preparation into an attempt. If, therefore, he had desisted before lighting the match, the fact that he was there with a lucifer match ready to set fire to the stack would not have developed his preparation into an attempt. So it has been said that if a person intending to commit a murder walk towards the place of the contemplated scene, he could not be convicted of an attempt.(15)

So where the servant of a contractor who was sent to deliver meat put a false weight into the scale with the intention of appropriating the difference, but was detected in the act, it was held that he was rightly convicted of an attempt to steal. Erle, C. J., said: "It is said, however, that the evidence here does not show any such proximate overt act as is sufficient to support the conviction for an attempt to steal the meat. In my opinion there are several overt acts, which brought the attempt close to completion. These were the preparation of the false weight, the placing it in the scale, and the keeping back the surplus meat. It is almost the same as if the prisoner had been sent with two articles, and had delivered one of them as if it had been two. To complete the crime of larceny there is only needed one thing—the beginning to move away with the property." To this Blackburn, J., added: "I am of the same opinion. There is, no doubt, a difference between the preparation antecedent to an offence and the actual attempt. But if the actual transaction has commenced, which would have ended in the crime if not interrupted,(16) there is clearly an attempt to commit the crime. Then, applying that principle to this case, it is clear that the transaction which would have ended in the crime of larceny had commenced here."(17)

5928. This statement of the law is too narrow and has been since overruled,(18) but it does not affect the decision which is, of course, still an instance of an indictable attempt. So where the accused procured in England dies for counterfeiting half-dollars of Peru, and his intention was to make only a few counterfeit coins in England, to see whether the apparatus he intended to purchase would answer before sending it out to Peru to be there used in counterfeiting coin, it was held that the procuring of the dies was an act in furtherance of the criminal purpose sufficiently proximate to the offence and that alone was sufficient to convict him of an attempt, but his making a few coins in England with the object stated constituted the completed offence of counterfeiting coin.(19) The question whether a person is guilty of attempt may then be a mere matter of chance, so that of two persons both embarking upon the same enterprise with the same determination, one may escape and another may be convicted, because of the intervention of fortuitous circumstances which favour one more than the other.

(15) Per Jervis, C. J. in William Roberts, (1855) Dears 539 (550).

(16) The unsoundness of this dictum has been already animadverted upon (§§ 3301-3311).

(17) Cheeseman, 31 L. J. M. C. 89; Eagleton, 24 L. J. M. C. 158.

(18) Brown, 24 Q. B. D. 357; Ring, 61 L. J. M. C. 116; Williams, (1893) 1 Q. B. 320.

(19) William Roberts, (1855) Dears 539.

When Innocent Act becomes Criminal Attempt: Locus Paenitentiae.

Nor indeed, is it necessary that the act which constitutes the attempt should be itself criminal. So if one put a thing into another's house with intent to accuse him of theft the act is innocent, but the intention renders it criminal. And so if there be both an act and an intention, and it constitutes an attempt, any subsequent change of intention would not alter the character of the act. So if a thief intending to rob a house goes up to the gate with the implements of house-breaking, but on reaching the door, he finds it on fire and hearing cries of distress he rushes in to rescue the sufferers, he could not be convicted of an attempt. But if after having effected his entry he remained there to rescue the sufferers he would be guilty of attempted house-breaking because his entry with that intention completed that offence, and his subsequent change of intention could not convert a criminal act into an innocent one.[20] So it has been held in America that a person may be guilty of an attempt to commit rape, though he may have voluntarily desisted before consummating the act.[21]

It has been already observed that it is now settled that a person even touching another person's pocket with intent to pick it commits this offence. It was so laid down in the case in which the accused hustled a woman whilst entering the compartment of a railway train, and one of them was endeavouring to find the pocket of her dress, which was held to be sufficient to convict them for an attempt to steal.[22]

Where Accused is Entrapped.

5930. A person may be convicted of an attempt though the act relied on is seen through by the other party who, however, allows him to do it with the object of entrapping him. A had obtained administration to the estate of his brother B, and had caused a Government Promissory Note bearing a certain number belonging to C to be entered in the letters of administration as part of the estate of the deceased. The note was in the possession of the Comptroller-General, and the accused MacCrea joined A in an attempt to induce that officer to deliver it to him, or to A who he stated was legally entitled to the note. The Comptroller-General at once suspected the fraud, but he nevertheless sent to MacCrea certain forms to be filled in which he did, but it was held that the affording of facilities to commit an attempt could not neutralize its criminality[23]; for, a person who intentionally does a wrongful act cannot plead the temptation offered in justification of his act (§ 455). This was the ratio decidendi of the case in which the accused wrote a letter to the Currency office at Calcutta enclosing the halves of two Government Currency Notes, stating that the other halves were lost, and enquiring what steps should be taken for recovery of their value. The Currency office having upon enquiry ascertained that the second halves of the Notes had been already paid for and the Notes withdrawn from circulation and cancelled, nevertheless sent the

(20) 1 Bishop's Criminal Law, ss. 366, 664, 692.
(21) Ib., s. 664, note 5.
(22) Ring, 61 L. J. M. C. 116.
(23) MacCrea, 15 A. 173 O. A. 15 A. 310, P. C., in which, however, leave for special appeal was refused on general grounds. The facts of the case are, however, given here.

accused the usual form of claim to be filled up and returned to it which the accused did. The form was sent on purpose to enable the accused to commit himself—in short, to entrap him. But it was held that the accused was none the less guilty of this offence.(24)

5931. The accused intending to cheat a Municipality of its octroi duty informed the Superintendent that there were 16 maunds of an article in a cart, whereas there were in fact only 6, and the Superintendent believing him granted him a certificate for the refund of octroi duty on 16 maunds, but the true fact was discovered before any money could be paid over to the accused. It was held that the act was punishable for an attempt to cheat.(25) This case is clearly opposed to an earlier decision of the same Court(1) in which Brodhurst, J., allowed the accused a locus pœnitentiæ holding that the mere obtaining of a refund certificate did not show that the accused intended to cheat: "Before that time he might have altered his mind even from prudence, if not from penitence, and torn up the certificate and no cheating could then have happened." But this view is clearly untenable, and the obvious reply to it is suggested by the case of the house-breaker who effects an entry to commit burglary, but beats a retreat "from prudence" finding the master upon his heels with a loaded revolver. The case was probably dictated by the narrow doctrine of Cockburn, C.J., (§ 5903), and it is certainly not in keeping with the language of this section.

5932. Attempt Implies Doing of an act.—Of course, an attempt implies the doing of an act which term is defined to include a series of acts.(2) But it does not include an omission, nor anything which would not be an act as understood in the Code (§ 295).

For instance, the mere possession of indecent prints is not criminal, for it is not an act, though to procure them would be such an act.(3) So it was held that the fact that a person was found in possession of a counterfeit coin with intent to utter it as good, was no act which was necessary to constitute the crime.(4) But where the prisoner was found in possession of a large quantity of such coins unaccounted for and under suspicious circumstances, it was held to be evidence from which it might be inferred that the prisoner had procured them with intent to utter, which is clearly a criminal act punishable as a misdemeanour.(5)

5933. Case Where Express Provision Made Elsewhere.—This section 307 only punishes an act "where no express provision is made by this Code for the punishment of such attempt." It has already been seen that the Code makes such provision in most important cases, in all of which the provisions of this section are primafacie inapplicable. But such is evidently not the view taken in the Punjab where the question arose upon the following facts:-The accused filed a complaint against Section 307.

(24) Government of Bengal v. Umesh Chunder Mitter, 16 C. 310; Saleh Mahomed, 10 S. L. R. 159, 38 I. C. 991.
(25) Bhagwan Das, 2 A. L. J. 718.
(1) Dhundi, 8 A. 304; Saleh Mahamed, 10 S. L. R. 159, 38 I. C. 991.
(2) S. 33.
(3) Dugdale, 1 E. & B. 435.
(4) Stewart, R. & R. 288.
(5) Fuller & Robinson, R. & R. 308.

the complainant, who being called upon to explain himself called the accused a wicked man if not actually a lunatic. The accused took offence and afterwards intending to avenge himself seized a hatchet and ran up to the complainant ready to strike with it. But as he advanced he cried: "Here am I, the madman. Take care," hearing which the complainant took refuge in a shop; the accused was then disarmed before he could do any harm to the complainant; and he was charged under s. 307, but the Court held that section inapplicable inasmuch as it applied only to an act which is per se sufficient to cause death, which in the case before the Court it was not. The question then arose whether the fact that the accused could not be convicted under s. 307 yet left him with the possibility of a conviction under this section. But a consideration of this question was held to be unnecessary, because in the view of the Court the accused might well be convicted under this section read with s. 326,(6) though it gave no reason for holding why the accused was held to premeditate only grievous hurt and not death. The learned Judge was no doubt confronted with the conflicting rulings of the two Courts at Bombay(7) and Allahabad,(8) but the case appears to have been one in which the offence was undoubtedly an attempt to commit homicide, and it necessarily raised the question whether the present provisions are supplementary to those enacted in s. 307. This was considered by Couch, C.J., and Westropp, J., in Bombay and Straight, J., in Allahabad, and though they arrived at opposite conclusions, the grounds of their decision are well worth examination.

5934. The facts of the two cases were almost alike. In the Bombay case, the prisoner a soldier fired at his petty officer but the gun failed to go off as it had not been capped. In the Allahabad case the accused, an absconding dacoit, turned round upon his pursuer and fired a blunderbuss, the cap of which exploded without exploding the charge, and the question in either case was what offence the accused had committed. The Court in both the cases were unfortunately at variance as to the meaning of s. 307 (§§ 3301-3311) and as Straight, J., was of opinion that such a case was well within the scope of s. 307, his dissent from the Bombay view as to the applicability of this section where s. 307 is inapplicable was an obiter dictum: still the reasons for his dissentient view are instructive.

5935. But the question as to the applicability of this section was directly at issue before the Bombay Judges, who having held s. 307 inapplicable were necessarily confronted with the question whether the accused could be convicted under this section read with s. 299 or 300. Couch, C. J., and Westropp, J., both held that there was nothing in the Code to prevent a person being convicted under this section, though he could not be under s. 307. The view proceeded upon the two requirements of the section, namely, the intent, and an act towards the commission of the offence. The effect of the clause under reference was not considered. And this view was met by Straight, J., on the

(6) Jewan Das, (1904) P. R. No. 30.
(7) Cassidy, 4 B. H. C. R. 17; followed in Martu Vithoba, 15 Bom. L. R. 991, dissented from in Niddha, 14 A. 38.
(8) Niddha, 14 A. 38.

principle Expressio unius exclusio alterius[9] and on the ground that this section applies only "where no express provision is made by this Code for the punishment of such attempt."[10] But as to this it may be argued that the phrase "such attempt" must mean an attempt such as is defined in this section so that if it is not punishable under s. 307, it may still be punishable under this section. In other words, this clause only excludes such attempts as are both punishable under this general section as well as under some special section elsewhere. Consequently, if it is not punishable under a special section it does not necessarily follow that it is not punishable under this section. In this view the conviction of Jiwan Das in the Punjab case[11] under section 302|511 would have been well justified.

5936. Other Attempts.—A similar question arose in the Chief Court at Rangoon, but the Court declined to go into its legal aspects. In that case the accused had put some powder into the complainant's food which chemical analysis showed to be Datura seeds. There was no evidence as to the quantity found in the food or of the probable effects on any one who might have eaten it, upon which the Court held that it could not be said that the accused could have intended to cause more than hurt. She was consequently convicted of s. 328 read with this section and sentenced to imprisonment for three years.[12]

5937. A person who presents a fraudulent bill for payment is guilty of an attempt to cheat.[13] A person who, from extreme youth, old age or infirmity, has no power of erection and consequently of penetration, is incapable of committing the offence of rape, and cannot be convicted of committing an attempt, though he might be of indecent assault.[14] But since penetration suffices for completion of the offence[15] a youth having the power of erection could well be convicted of an attempt under this section,[16] subject of course, to the general exceptions enacted in ss. 82 and 83. The accused had instituted a suit on the basis of a forged promissory note. The record of the case was taken by the Munsiff trying another case to his house. The accused removed the forged document from the record and tore it up. It was held that they were guilty of s. 380 as well as of an attempt to commit an offence under s. 201.[17] The complainant had his buffaloes stolen. The accused proposed to him that if he paid Rs. 200 to him and said nothing of his theft he would get back his stolen buffaloes. The accused was convicted of an attempt to commit an offence punishable under s. 215.[18]

The accused travelled by train with a forged railway pass made out in the name of a railway official. He had no occasion to use it, whereupon the court held it to be a case of only an attempt to cheat

(9) "The express mention of one excludes the rest."
(10) Niddha, 14 A. 38.
(11) Jiwan Das, (1904) P. R. No. 30.
(12) Mi Pu, (1909) 5 L. B. R. 79, 3 I. C. 721.
(13) Billinghurst, 27 C. W. N. 821; (1924) A. I. R. 18; Shiamji, 65 I. C. (N) 994, 23 Cr. L. J. 210.
(14) Gopalarama, (1896) B. U. C. 865.
(15) S. 375, Expl.
(16) Nga Tun Kaing, 42 I. C. (R) 175, 18 Cr. L. J. 943.
(17) Sheonandan, 31 I. C. (A) 647, 16 Cr. L. J. 791.
(18) Hargayan, 45 A. 159; dissenting from contra in Chittar, 20 A. 389.

under s. 419.[19] The accused manufactured some spurious trinkets and took them to the complainant for sale, falsely alleging that they were of gold but stolen and that therefore he could not sell them in the bazar. The complainant did not purchase them. It was held to amount to an attempt to cheat.[20] The accused had, in collusion with a railway booking clerk, obtained a railway receipt for 300 bales of cotton, whereas he had only 200 bales at the station. On the faith of this receipt he attempted to raise Rs. 40,000 for which the complainant gave him some Hundis but these were never cashed. The accused was convicted of an attempt to cheat.[21] The accused entered the compound of a house with intent to commit theft of cattle. He was held to be guilty of an attempt to commit theft.[22] So it was held that while an entry on a verandah may not amount to house trespass, such entry coupled with an attempt to push open the door would amount to an attempt to commit that offence.[23] Section 471 punishes the fraudulent or dishonest use of a forged document. A person who files such a document in court is then guilty of an attempt to use it .[24]

5938. No Attempt.—Besides cases already considered there remain others in which though the accused might have committed another offence, it nevertheless falls short of an attempt as here defined. Such was the case of the accused who attempted to get himself reinstated in the post of the Karnam by the production of a false certificate of having passed a certain examination. The act was not shown to have caused damage or harm to the officer to whom the representation was made. It was held that the accused could not be convicted of s. 419|511 though a prosecution under s. 182 might lie.[25]

5939. A charge of conspiracy was instituted against three police officers in that they had fabricated false evidence to secure the conviction of certain persons whom they had prosecuted for robbery. In order to facilitate their identification by the prosecution witnesses they were stated to have joined hands in photographing the accused while in their custody. It was held that the mere taking of photographs was not an act towards the subordination of evidence, even though it be conceded that they were taken with a view to the procuring of false identifying witnesses. The view of the court appears to be that, in order to constitute an attempt the act itself must be necessarily connected with the commission of the offence.[1] Such was held to be the case of the accused who had despatched to his creditor an insured postal cover advising him of the remittance of his debt in currency notes which on opening was found to contain only worthless paper. It was held that there was no attempt to

---

(19) Govindaswamy, 21 M. L. J. 748, 11 I. C. 590, 12 Cr. L. J. 406.

(20) Abdullah, (1914) P. R. No. 14, 23 I. C. 473, 15 Cr. L. J. 265.

(21) Shiamji, 65 I. C. (N) 994, 23 Cr. L. J. 210.

(22) Kohmi, (1914) P. R. No. 24, 26 I. C. 305, 16 Cr. L. J. 1; Ghasita, (1919) 51 I. C. (L). 476, 20 Cr. L. J. 492.

(23) Nga Pan Hlaing, 26 I. C. (R.) 306, 16 Cr. L. J. 2.

(24) Krishna Prasad v. Rabindra Nath, 13 I. C. (C.) 99, 13 Cr. L. J. 6.

(25) Manikkam, (1908) 4 M. L. T. 324, 8 Cr. L. J. 421.

(1) Gulab Singh, 14 A. L. J. 688, 35 I. C. 991, 17 Cr. L. J. 431.

cheat though it might amount to an attempt to fabricate false evidence.(2) There can be no attempt without the necessary mense rea. The accused who was a municipal member was deputed to countersign refund chalans for goods taken out of the municipal limits. As such he applied for refund in respect of 460 bags of linseed, but on the day in question only 230 bags passed out of the octroi naka. The accused promised to make good the balance the next day. The refund chalan was not signed by the moharir. The court held it to be a mere irregularity for which the accused could not be convicted of attempted cheating under s. 420|511.(3)

Where a woman driven mad with pains of her prolonged labour threw herself into a well, she was convicted of an attempt to cause miscarriage. The Court held that it was an attempt to commit suicide.(4) The complainant, a girl, complained that the accused took off her clothes, threw her down and then sat down besides her. He said and did nothing more. He was convicted of an attempt to commit rape. But it was held to be no such attempt, and his conviction was altered to one under s. 354.(5) The accused had applied for an appointment in the Public Works. He filed with his application a printed pamphlet of his testimonials of which one was found to be forged. The court held it to be no attempt to cheat on the ground that the forged certificate was only one out of the many, and it could not be held to have been singled out for inducing his employer to appoint him.(6)

5940. Cases of preparation must be distinguished from those of attempts. Where the accused, who was employed to weigh the sugarcane carts purchased by his employer, entered a larger weight in the register but was promptly detected before he could fill up the other connected columns completing the transaction, his act was held to have proceeded no further than the stage of a mere preparation.(7) Such was held to be the case of the accused who was detected on the roof of a bazar with an open clasp knife in his hands and two gunny bags. He had come to steal but was surprised before he had proceeded beyond the stage of preparation.(8) Such was held to be the case of the accused who had entered the complainant's house with intent to commit adultery with his wife. He was held to be guilty of house-trespass but not of an attempt to commit adultery.(9)

---

(2) Thularam, 21 A. I. J. 865; Raman Behari, 50 C. 849; Sadho Lal, 1 Pat. L. J. 391, 34 I. C. 992, 17 Cr. L. J. 272; contra in Arura, (1913) P. R. No. 10, 20 I. C. 596, 14 Cr. L. J. 436.

(3) Birjraj, 17 C. W. N. 294, 18 I. C. 680, 14 Cr. L. J. 120.

(4) Mulia, 17 A. L. J. 32, 49 I. C. 98, 20 Cr. L. J. 114.

(5) Nuna (1912) P. W. R. 10, 15 I. C. 309, 13 Cr. L. J. 469.

(6) Lachman Lal, 4 Pat. L. J. 16, 49 I. C. 174, 20 Cr. L. J. 148.

(7) Lakshumi Prasad, 65 I. C. (Pat.) 492, 23 Cr. L. J. 108.

(8) Batwa Khan, 12 Bur. L. J. 222, 52 I. C. (R). 59, 20 Cr. L. J. 571.

(9) Phentua Lodhi, 47 I. C.(N) 77, 19 Cr. L. J. 881.

INDEX.

INDEX TO VOLS. I & II.

PAGE

A

Abandonment—

And exposure of children (s. 317) 1676
Persons who ordinarily commit the crime .. 1676
Section applicable only when it is not followed by the death of the child .. 1676
English Law as to, and how it differs from Indian Law 1676
Of Infants 1678
Inapplicable to a nurse or an ayah .. 1678
Persons liable .. 1679
Intention must be to abandon it 1680, 1681
No, if left in charge of somebody 1680
Exposure without protection sufficient .. 1681
Exposure, meaning of .. 1681
Actual harm immaterial .. 1682
Death in consequence of, liability for .. 1683, 1684

Abduction—

Definition of (s. 362) .. 1853
In itself not an offence .. 1853
Relation to kidnapping. .. 1853
Neither taking nor custody of a guardian required for 1853
Person abducted need not be a minor 1853
When punishable is a continuing offence .. 1853
Completed offence distinguished from attempt .. 1854
"Deceitful means" meaning of 1854
Consent condones .. 1854
Kidnapping or, in order to murder (s. 364) .. 1857, 1858
Actual murder not a prerequisite 1859
Intention or knowledge of purpose essential .. 1859
Disposal for murder .. 1859

PAGE

Abduction—(Contd.)

Kidnapping or abducting with intent secretly and wrongfully to confine person (s. 365) 1860
Kidnapping or abducting woman to compel her marriage (s. 366) .. 1862
Mere seduction not punishable under the section .. 1862, 1864
Section amended to include abuse of authority .. 1862
Charge to state whether kidnapping or, .. 1864
Cannot convict for, on a charge of kidnapping without amending .. 1864
Analysis of the offence .. 1865
Special ingredients of the offence 1865
Intention to seduce subsequent to elopement, part of the crime .. 1866
Seduction essential, what it is 1866
Seduction, conflicting views as to 1867, 1868
Criminal intimacy prior to elopement if liable under this section .. 1867, 1868
Illicit intercourse or forced marriage another essential 1868
What is illicit intercourse .. 1868
Intention or knowledge of forced marriage or intercourse 1869
Woman consenting to her own, if liable as abettor .. 1869
Of married woman, compared with section 498 .. 1869
Cases of no offence .. 1869, 1870
Kidnapping or, in order to subject person to grievous hurt, slavery or unnatural offence (s. 367) .. 1874
Offence under this section compared with kindred offences 1874
Wrongfully concealing or keeping in confinement kidnapped or abducted person (s. 368) .. 1876

PAGE

Abduction—(concld.)

Provisions applicable to a person other than the kidnapper or abductor .. 1877
Knowledge that the person in confinement was kidnapped or abducted essential .. 1877
Accused must conceal person so abducted 1878
Wrongful concealment, what is 1878, 1879
Kidnapping or abducting child under 10 years with intent to steal from its person (s. 369) .. 1880
Theft by 1881
Actual taking of property from person or child not necessary 1881
Of married woman (s. 498) .. 2638

Abetment—

No, when act done is different 296
Itself an offence .. 312
Definition of (s. 107) .. 657
This chapter made applicable to sections subsequently added to the Code .. 657
English Law as to .. 658
Three kinds of accessories 658
English and Indian Law of, Distinguished .. 658, 659
Applicability of the definition of, to all Acts of Governor-General .. 659
Why an offence .. 659
Bentham, remarks of, on .. 659
Definition of, general .. 660
Such definition necessary where abettor solely liable 660
Section describes the three shades of meaning of the term in the Code .. 660
Essentials to complete, as a crime .. 661
Instigation—When a person said to instigate another .. 661
Instigate, Instigation, what is 661, 663
All assistance is not abetment 661
Aid something more substantial than mere advice 661
Mens rea necessary for abetment 662

PAGE

Abetment—(contd.)

Persons merely present at, or cognizant of a crime or only concealing it, not accomplices 661, 674
Person instigated need not be known to the instigator 662
Instigation complete though of no effect on the person instigated .. 663
Instigation may be either direct or by suggestive innuendos .. 663
Instigation by publication of literature .. 663
Withdrawal after instigation 663
Instigation must be conveyed 664
Limits of liability on instigation 664, 665
Operation of mistake .. 665
Misrepresentation or concealment as .. 666, 667
Legal obligation to disclose necessary for .. 666
Police keeping out of the way on purpose, guilty of 666, 667
Must be prior to act; Subsequent knowledge of crime insufficient to constitute 667, 693
Intention or preparation as 667
Person receiving an unstamped document without objection, not guilty of .. 667
Abetment by conspiracy .. 660, 667
Conspiring in addition to instigating does not aggravate his offence except in four cases 668
Two or more must join .. 668
Other or others need not be adult or adults .. 668
The other may be the wife, English Law different .. 668
Acquittal of one of two accused of conspiracy, Effect of 668
They must be "engaged" in the conspiracy .. 668, 669
What co-operation necessary 669
There must be consequent act 670, 671
Attempt and preparation distinguished 671
Act of one co-conspirator acts of all .. 672

Abetment—(contd.)	Page
"In order to the doing of that thing" explained ..	672
Intentional aid ..	672, 673
What it may consist of ..	673
Direct acts of ..	673
By giving facility ..	673
Giving food to person known to be engaged in crime, not per se an offence ..	674
Criminality depends not so much on the facility given but on its nature, effect and the intention with which given ..	675
Illegal omission is ..	675, 676
Intentional aid by non-interference ..	675
Illegal omission to prevent offence and illegal concealment of an offence, Difference between ..	676
Person convicted for main offence not punishable as abettor of same ..	681
No, where the thing is initially impossible ..	681, 682
Of abetment of an offence, when principal abetment of an offence ..	683
Substantive offence when necessary for liability of ..	683
In British India of offence outside it (s. 108-A) ..	685
Of foreign offence ..	686
Offence abetted must also be an offence in British India ..	686
In foreign territory ..	686
Liability depends on the, being complete in British India ..	686
Punishment for, if act abetted committed in consequence (s. 109) ..	686
No, when principal offence is not substantiated ..	688
Section applicable only when there is no express provision in the Code ..	689
Enumeration of sections containing express provisions for ..	689
Section excludes cases where act abetted is committed but not in consequence of abetment ..	690
After completion, generally not an offence ..	692, 693
In case of a continuing offence, abetment may still be an offence ..	692, 693
Of kidnapping ..	692, 693
No offence, no,	694

Abetment—(contd.)	Page
Of waging war against the Queen (s. 121) ..	733
Of waging war against any allied Asiatic power (s. 125) ..	789
Of mutiny (s. 131) ..	800
Of mutiny if mutiny is committed in consequence thereof (s. 132) ..	802
Of assault by soldier, sailor or airman on his superior officer (s. 133) ..	803
No, of an assault where the assault itself not an offence ..	805
Abetment of such assault (s. 133), if the assault is committed (s. 134) ..	805, 806
Abetment of desertion of soldier, sailor or airman (s. 135) ..	807
Desertion abetted need not take place ..	808
Abetment of act of insubordination by soldier or sailor or airman (s. 138) ..	812
Essentials of the offence ..	813
Knowledge of the act as well as its quality necessary ..	813
By public servant of offences defined in section 162 or 163 (s. 164) ..	908
Of fabrication of false evidence as when a person purchases stamp-paper in the name of another ..	1059, 1060
Giving false evidence, abetment of ..	1056
Of issuing or signing false certificate under section 197	1102
In India of counterfeiting of coins abroad (s. 236) ..	1283
Of suicide of child or insane person (s. 305) ..	1635
Includes persons in charge who give opportunities to persons under them to commit suicide ..	1635
Of kidnapping ..	1852, 1853
Of kidnapping or abducting a woman to compel her marriage ..	1862
Woman consenting to her own abduction if liable as abettor ..	1869
Wrongful confinement of kidnapped or abducted person is another instance of subsequent abetment punishable as a substantive crime ..	1877

PAGE

Abetment—(concld.)

Of rape 1934
Husband liable for rape on his wife, Lord Audley's case 1934
Of criminal breach of trust by clerk or servant. .. 2150
Of cheating .. 2238-2242
Of cheating and attempt at, Distinction between .. 2241
See Abettor, coin.

Abettor—

Definition of (s. 108) .. 676, 677
Indian and English Law compared 678
Who is an .. 679. 680
For an, there must be an act possessing the ingredients of an offence .. 679
Subsequent acts inoperative 680
Person convicted for main offence not punishable as abettor of same .. 681
Where agent innocent, .. 681, 682, 683
Act or effect immaterial .. 681, 682
No abetment where the thing is initially impossible 682
Conviction of, not dependent on conviction of principal 683
Liable where substantive abetment is abetment of an offence 683
Substantive offence when necessary for liability of 683, 684
What knowledge material .. 684
In British India of offence outside it (s. 108-A) .. 684
Section remedied defect in the Code by the Amending Act of 1898 .. 685
Offender only liable to punishment as abettor though he may be principal offender also .. 685
Complaint from officer empowered necessary .. 685
Offence abetted must also be an offence in British India 686
Liability depends on the abetment being complete in British India .. 686
Punishment of, where act abetted committed in consequence (s. 109) .. 686

PAGE

Abettor—(contd.)

Section applicable only when there is no express provision in the Code .. 689
Sections containing express provisions for abetment .. 689
Points to be considered in determining criminality of .. 689
Section excludes cases where act abetted is committed but not in consequence of the abetment .. 690
What was the act abetted, determination of .. 690, 691
If the act committed the same as the act abetted 691
Ex post facto generally no 692, 693
Ex post facto in a continuing offence can be offence .. 692, 693
Of kidnapping .. 692, 693
Not guilty if he has subsequent knowledge of the offence 693
Punishment of, where act done with a different intention (s. 110) .. 694
Liability of, where one act abetted and a different act done (s. 111) .. 695
Section how far based on English Law .. 696
Limits of vicarious liability 697, 698
True test of such liability 698, 699
Strict construction of the section enjoined .. 698
When liable to cumulative punishment for act abetted and act done (s. 112) .. 700
Constructive liability under this section goes beyond English Law .. 701
Section obviously does not override the provisions of section 71 .. 700
The offences must be distinct. 701
Liability of, for effect caused by act abetted different from that intended by abettor (s. 113) .. 701, 702
This section distinguished from section 111 .. 702
Liability of, where effect likely 703
Act abetted or effect caused should not be merely an attempt 703

Abettor—(contd.) PAGE

Presence of, when offence committed, effect of (s. 114) 703
Provision somewhat wider than that of section 34 .. 704
If English Law differs on the point .. 704
Liability of present abettor 705
Necessary essentials to be proved .. 705, 706
Previous abetment necessary where presence insufficient .. 705
Admissible evidence .. 706, 707
When is an abettor "present" 707, 708
Actual presence as to make one an eye or ear-witness is not required .. 707
Sufficient if near enough to render assistance .. 707
Community of purpose essential .. 708
Withdrawal before commission no liability .. 708
Section compared with section 149 .. 708
Section not applicable if accused takes part in the commission .. 709
Liability of, for abetment of offence punishable with death or transportation—if offence not committed (s. 115) .. 710
Liability for abetment of offence punishable with only imprisonment (s. 116) .. 711
Abortive abetment .. 712, 713
Where person abetted is a public servant .. 713
Section applicable to special and local laws .. 714
Of Offence by public or more than 10 persons (s. 117) .. 714
Remarks of the Law Commissioners on the subject 714
Can be punished although persons abetted cannot be pointed out .. 715
Public must commit offence collectively not individually .. 715
By concealing design to commit offence punishable with death or transportation (s. 118) .. 715

Abettor—(concld.) PAGE

Two kinds of concealment recognized by the section 718
Criminal concealment when penal .. 718
Criminally false representation .. 718
What is misrepresentation .. 719
Mere repetition of an idle rumour not enough to create liability .. 719
Concealment by acts .. 719
Public servant concealing design to commit offence (s. 119) .. 720
Liability of Public servants circumscribed by their duty 721
Concealing design to commit offence punishable with imprisonment (s. 120) 722
Of mutiny (s. 131) .. 799
Of mutiny if mutiny is committed (s. 132) .. 802
Of assault by soldier or sailor or airman on his superior officer (s. 133) .. 803
Of such assault if assault be committed (s. 134) .. 806
Public servant as, of offences defined in section 162 or 163 (s. 164) .. 908
Of suicide of child or insane person (s. 305) .. 1635
Includes persons in charge who give opportunities to persons under them to commit suicide .. 1635
Of Kidnapping .. 1852, 1853
Of rape 1934
Present, counted as amongst number required to constitute dacoity .. 2042, 2043

Abortion—

Causing, defined (s. 312) .. 1662
See Miscarriage.

Absconding—

To avoid service of summons or other proceeding (s. 172) .. 945, 946
Section applies not only to parties but to witnesses also 946
Section applies to, with the intention of evading service 947
"Absconds," meaning of .. 947

PAGE

Absconding—(concld.)

Essentials of the offence .. 947, 948
Refusing to accept service, not 948
What knowledge essential .. 948
Rule confined to summons, notice or order .. 948
"Order," what it includes .. 948, 949
Warrants excluded .. 949
Summons, etc., must have been issued by a public servant legally competent to issue it .. 949
Aggravated form of .. 949, 950

Abuse—

Mere, whether provocation to mitigate offence of murder 1542, 1543
Mere words of, not defamation 2673, 2676
May be criminal insult .. 2678, 2679

Accessory—

Before the fact .. 658
After the fact .. 658
Who is an .. 659
When classed as principal in second degree .. 659

Accidents—

In doing a lawful act (s. 80) 495
Sections 80 and 81 compared 495, 496
Not of itself a defence to a civil suit 496
As a ground of exoneration 495
In mala in se and mala prohibitum .. 496
Criminal intent and knowledge 496, 497
Meaning of 498
When a good defence .. 498, 499
And "misfortune" compared 499
Doing a lawful act in unlawful manner .. 499
In unlawful games .. 500
Spectators in unlawful games if liable as accomplices .. 500
Facts negativing defence of .. 500, 501
Criminal negligence and .. 501, 502
Sufficient if precaution that is usual and ordinary in such cases is taken .. 502
In negligent driving .. 502, 503
Amount of care in case of driving 502

PAGE

Accidents—(concld.)

Two drivers racing, liability of both in case of .. 503
Contributory negligence no defence .. 503
Contributory negligence, operation of .. 505
Contributory negligence, has a direct bearing upon the degree of the offence committed 505
Negligence of servant, master's liability for .. 505
In doing an unlawful act .. 506
Where statute renders the doing illegal for one purpose, it cannot be referred to any thing wholly unconnected with that purpose 506
Illustrative cases .. 507
Death of one by provocation and of another by mistake or accident .. 1552
Accidental acts not mischievous .. 2288, 2289

Accomplice—

Briber as .. 900
Testimony of 901
Persons present in bribery not 902

Accounts—

Failure to keep election (s. 171-I) .. 943
Election expenses, what constitutes, not defined in the Code .. 943
Election expense, what constitutes .. 944
Limits of the rule .. 944
False entry in, makes criminal breach of trust complete 2117, 2118
Mere confusion of, not evidence of criminal breach of trust .. 2129
A mere omission to enter in, or to account for receipt of money and a wilful falsification of accounts, difference between .. 2131
Falsification of, definition of (s. 477-A) .. 2506, 2507
See Falsification of Accounts.

	PAGE
Accusation—
False, when punishable under section 182 ..	984
When under section 211 ..	985, 1161-1164
Extortion by threat of, of an offence punishable with death or transportation (s. 388) ..	2029
Extortion by ..	2030
Putting person in fear of, of offence in order to commit extortion (s. 389) ..	2032
False, when defamatory ..	2676, 2677
Meaning of ..	2728
To lawful authority how far an exception to offence of defamation ..	2728
Accused—
Not liable for fabricating false evidence ..	1065
Not liable under section 201 for screening himself ..	1115
Acts—
Or omission for which persons liable (s. 2) ..	164
Illegal omissions, include (s. 32)	287
What are	287, 288
Single series of, Denotes (s. 33)	288
Criminal liability in case of act done by several persons in furtherance of common intention (s. 34) ..	289
Division of all penal into two classes (1) those in which criminal knowledge or intention is presumed (2) those in which it has to be proved	299
Effect caused partly by an, and partly by omission construed an offence (s. 36)	301
Conspiracy by doing one of several (s. 37) ..	303
Causing death, when amounts to culpable homicide ..	1502, 1503
Acts of State—
Prerogative of the king ..	450
"The king can do no wrong" explained	450
The person who actually did the act primarily responsible	450
Origin of the English constitution	451
Powers of the Government of India ..	452
Sources from which such powers were derived ..	452
Government of India can transmit such powers to Local or Subordinate Governments	452
Its amenability to Civil Court	453
What are	453, 454
Acts done under Municipal Law	455, 456
Depend upon the status of the person	456
Summary of discussion as to acts excluded from jurisdiction of Courts ..	456
Illustrative cases ..	456, 457
Seizure of person as an ..	457, 458
When, may become the subject of judicial cognizance	458
Plea must be supported by reason and jurisdiction ..	459
Government of India, what is	460
Priority of Crown debts ..	460
Executive acts of the Government, Which are ..	460, 461
Party aggrieved is not without remedy	460
Unauthorised acts ..	461
Acts subject to Municipal Law	462, 463
Encroachment upon one's rights no	463
Liability of Government for the Acts of its servants ..	464
No liability if act was within the scope of duty ..	464
No liability if act done in excess is ratified by Government	464
Illustrative cases ..	464
Liability presumed ..	465
Jurisdiction of Civil Courts presumed ..	465
Liability for Crown contracts	466, 467
Liability for torts ..	467, 468
Liability on contracts ..	468
Contract not to dismiss a servant of the Crown if can be enforced ..	469
Crown equally liable on breach of contract whether by acts or by omissions ..	469
Crown cannot acquire new rights over its subjects by entering into a treaty with a foreign power ..	469
Viceroy's liability ..	471
Limited authority of the Indian Government ..	472

PAGE

Acts of State—(concld.)

Criminal liability of the Government of India .. 473
Supreme Court v. Government 473, 474
Suspension of Civil Law .. 474
3 points of view of exemption from criminal prosecution 474
Limits of the prerogative of the Crown 475
When Martial Law justifiable .. 476
Power to proclaim Martial Law must be exercised by the civil authorities .. 476
Liability of Governor of Colony how qualified .. 478
3 propositions of law with reference to his liability .. 478
States Offences Act .. 479
Operation of an act of Indemnity 480, 481
Acts done by order of Foreign State 481

See Martial Law.

Admiralty Jurisdiction—

See Exterritoriality, High Court.

Adoption—

Forgery of authority for (s. 467) 2476
Fraudulent cancellation, destruction, etc., of authority to adopt (s. 477.) .. 2504

Adulteration—

Of food or drink (s. 272) .. 1367, 1368
Section not confined to food or drink intended for human consumption .. 1368-1371
With harmless ingredients not liable under the section 1368
Must be done consciously .. 1368
Of drugs (s. 274) .. 1373
Section directed against fraud 1371
Test as to what constitutes.. 1375
If the change beneficial it is an improvement and not 1375
Sale of adulterated drugs (s. 275) 1375
Enforcement of the section requires further provisions as those under English Law 1378
Alteration by extraction of vital constituents from the drug is 1378

PAGE

Adulteration—(concld.)

What is .. 1378
Mere possession of such drug no liability under the section 1379
Of drugs when changing quality (s. 276) .. 1380

See Public Nuisance.

Adultery—

Lurking house-trespass or house-breaking to commit, cases re. .. 2406, 2407, 2411
Definition of (s. 497) .. 2623
Report of the first Law Commissioners recommending this offence being left out of the Code .. 2624, 2625
Pre-existing Law as to .. 2626
Punishable in all European countries except England 2626
Omission of this offence from English Law a defect, some of the most celebrated English Lawyers consider 2626
Compoundable, when and how 2627
A continuing offence .. 2627
Husband alone can complain 2627
In case of idiots, lunatics and such others, any interested person can complain with permission of Court as provided by the New Act XVIII of 1923 .. 2626
Husband living apart from his wife can complain .. 2628
No liability without complaint 2628
Complaint, what is under this section 2628
Complaint to Police or evidence in Court if would satisfy the requirement of this section, different views 2628
Views of Punjab Court in several cases 2628
What is sufficient complaint 2629
Death of complainant after the commencement of prosecution, Effect of 2627
Punished for the collateral purpose of preserving the peace and sanctity of family life 2630

PAGE

Adultery—(contd.)

Charge of, between two dates is legal where it is impossible to assign particular dates 2629
What is 2630
Essentials of 2630-2637
(1) There must be sexual intercourse 2630
There must be consent of wife: otherwise the offence would be rape .. 2630
To sustain conviction, adulterer need not be surprised flagrante delicto .. 2631
What is sufficient intercourse 2631
(2) Woman must be lawfully married to another .. 2632
Woman not the wife of a man within the meaning of this section if marriage were voidable under the right of option of puberty among Sunni Mahomedans 2632
Meaning of marriage .. 2632, 2633
Marriage a question of customs 2632
Immoral and illegal customs not recognized by law .. 2633
(3) Knowledge and reasonable belief of having been married essential .. 2633
Accused need not know who is the husband but sufficient if he knows that she has a husband .. 2633
How such knowledge or reasonable belief may be proved 2633, 2634
(4) Consent or connivance of the husband, absence of .. 2634
Why absence of consent or connivance of husband essential 2634
Consent, meaning of .. 2634
Connivance, meaning and essentials of .. 2635
Connivance is an act of the mind and implies knowledge of and acquiescence in the act 2635
Connivance distinguished from consent 2636
Mere negligence inattention, dulness of apprehension or indifference will not suffice 2635
Husband receiving a sum of money from adulterer after discovering the adultery is connivance .. 2636

PAGE

Adultery—(concld.).

Omission to prosecute for a long time held to be connivance 2636, 2637
Desertion of the husband held to be connivance .. 2636
Connivance sufficient defence, though it may not have been of the wife's misconduct with the accused 2637
Condonation of 2637, 2638
Condonation, how differs from connivance .. 2637
Condonation by agreement to take consideration, such agreement not enforceable at law 2637
Seduction of married woman included in 2639

Advertisements—

Puffing, if cheating .. 2209, 2210
Simplex commendatio non-obligat 2210
Material misdescription may amount to cheating .. 2210, 2211
Overstating weight .. 2212
Showing better sample .. 2212, 2213

Affidavit—

Power to certify .. 227

Affirmation—

Solemn, Oath includes (s. 51) 321
Solemn, is equal to an oath only in the case in which it is "substituted by law for an oath" 323
Distinguished from declaration 323

Affray—

Definition of (s. 159) .. 883
Gist of the offence .. 883
Meaning and derivation of 883
No quarrelsome or threatening language would amount to, unless the language would amount to assault .. 883
Disturbance of the public peace 883-884
What is a public place .. 883-884
Act done in a public place and act done in public, distinction between .. 884
Essentials of 884

PAGE

Affray—(concld.)

Punishment for committing (s. 160) 884
Characteristics of an .. 885
Assault and riot distinguished from 886
Aggravated forms of .. 886
When may become an unlawful assembly .. 886
There must be fighting .. 886
Fighting must cause disturbance of public peace .. 886
Evidence required to establish an 886

Age—

Privilege of infancy, non-liability of child under 7 years (s. 82) 516
Qualified liability of child between 7 and 12 years (s. 83) 519

Agent—

Commission of offence through innocent .. 681, 682
Not liable for abetment, if knowledge dawns subsequently to the act .. 693
Liability of, for not giving information of unlawful assembly held on land of principal (s. 154) .. 873
Acts of; punishable under (s. 154) 875
Liability of, for benefit of whose principal unlawful assembly held or riot committed (ss. 155, 156) 876, 877, 878
Criminal breach of trust by (s. 409) .. 2150, 2158
Who is an 2158
Defamation through .. 2669

Agreement—

See Hire-purchase.

Aliens—

Subject to the Code 170

Allegiance—

Seducing an officer, soldier, sailor or airman from his (s. 131) 799-800

Alteration—

Fraudulent or dishonest, of weight of coin (ss. 246, 247) 1301, 1303

PAGE

Alteration—(concld.)

Mere possession of altered coin not an offence, offence confined to performing of an operation 1303
Of appearance of coin with intent to pass for a different coin (ss. 249, 250) .. 1306, 1307
Delivery of coin with knowledge of the (ss. 250, 251) 1307, 1308
Possession of coin with knowledge of the alteration, at the time when he became possessed thereof (ss. 252, 253) .. 1309, 1310
Delivery of coin as genuine which when he first possessed he did not know of the (s. 254) 1310
Of landmark (s. 434) .. 2323
Of landmark, what is .. 2324
Landmark, what is a .. 2324
Landmark may be temporary or permanent .. 2324
Fraudulent or dishonest, of a document is forgery (s. 464) 2426, 2427
Fraudulent, what is .. 2436
Fraudulent, after completion of the deed is forgery .. 2436
Must be of a material part of the deed .. 2436
What is material and what is immaterial .. 2437
Not fraudulent .. 2437
To be penal must be both unauthorised as well as fraudulent .. 2437, 2438
Fraudulent but not dishonest 2440
Without free consent .. 2441

Ambassadors—

Exempt from the Code .. 168, 169

Americans—

On conviction to be sentenced to penal servitude (s. 56) 351

Analogous Law—

See under each section.

Animal—

Definition of (s. 47) .. 319
Criticism of the definition .. 319
Fauna of Biology, equivalent to 319

PAGE

Animal—(Concld.)

Tree, cannot be an animal but a thing .. 319
Negligent conduct with respect to (s. 289) .. 1422
Such conduct applies to all animals wild and domestic 1422
Negligent management of .. 1423
Degree of negligence with respect to, that is criminal .. 1425
Negligent conduct with respect to, only person in possession liable .. 1425, 1426
Domestic and savage, distinction between .. 1422, 1423
Hurt caused by agency of (s. 324) .. 1712, 1718
Grievous hurt caused by agency of (s. 326) .. 1723
When subject of theft 1953, 1954, 1957
Mischief by killing or maiming, of the value of Rs. 10 (s. 428) .. 2306
Mischief by killing or maiming cattle etc., of any value or of any other, of the value of Rs. 50 (s. 429) .. 2310
Young ones also included in the term .. 2311,2312
Animals nullias proprietas 2312
Bull set at large in accordance with religious usage if nullias proprietas .. 2312

Anonymous Communication—

Criminal Intimidation (s. 507) .. 2790
Meaning of the term .. 2791
How made 2791

Application—

False statement in an, punishable when it amounts to a false declaration .. 1050, 1051

Apprehension—

Wilfully omitting to assist in, of an offender (s. 187) .. 1015, 1016
Unintentional omission excepted .. 1018
Harbouring offender whose, has been ordered (s. 216) 1194, 1195
Intentional omission to apprehend on the part of public servant (s. 221) .. 1217

PAGE

Apprehension—(concld.)

Intentional omission to apprehend person under sentence or lawfully committed (s. 222) .. 1220
Resistance to (s. 224) .. 1226
Resistance to, of another (s. 225) .. 1234
Omission to apprehend in case not otherwise provided for (s. 225-A) .. 1238
Resistance or obstruction to lawful, in case not otherwise provided for (s. 225-B) 1240

Arbitrator—

Is a public servant (s. 21, cl. 6) 229
False evidence before an, punishable under section 192 1064
Is really a Judge appointed by the consent of the parties 1064

Army Act—

Not affected by the Code (s. 5) 208, 209

Army, Navy and Air Force—

Offences re: Topical Introduction 799
Necessity for provisions for offences re, in the Code .. 799
Reasons for the nature and quantum of punishment .. 799
Abetting mutiny, or attempting to seduce soldier, sailor or airman from his duty (s. 131) .. 799, 800
English Law, provisions under "Mutiny," meaning of 800
Non-combatants serving as camp-followers classed as soldiers for the section .. 801
Section relates to abetment not followed up by mutiny 802
Section not applicable to a friendly advice given for advancement in life to give up soldiering or to get a discharge 802
Asking soldiers not to fire on the mob when they have been commanded to do so, offence under this section 802

PAGE

Army, Navy and Air Force—(contd.)

Soldiers and sailors going on strike, their abettors guilty under the section .. 802
Abetment of mutiny if mutiny is committed in consequence thereof (s. 132) 802
Abetment of assault by soldier, sailor or airman on his superior officer (s. 133) 803
Section not applicable when officer is not in execution of his office .. 803
"Superior Officer," meaning of .. 804
"Assault" is the same as is implied in the phrase "strikes or offers any violence" under English Law 805
"Assault," what the term includes 805
No abetment of an assault where the assault itself not an offence .. 805
Knowledge that the person was a superior officer, necessary 805
Such knowledge presumed when such officer wears his uniform 806
"In the execution of his office," meaning of .. 806
Abetment of such assault if the assault is committed (s. 134) 806
Abetment of desertion of soldier, sailor or airman (s. 135) 807
Provisions under the Army Act 807
Not necessary that desertion should take place .. 808
Desertion, what is .. 808
Intention distinguished from attempt 809
Intention of not returning for service, necessary for desertion 809
Intention to desert cannot be presumed from prolonged absence 809
Harbouring deserter (s. 136) 809
Offender, accessory after the fact under English Law .. 810
Essential ingredient of the offence 810
Harbouring deserter, what is 810

PAGE

Army, Navy and Air Force -(concld.)

Wife of the deserter excluded 810
Knowledge or belief that he was a deserter necessary 810
Deserter concealed on board merchant vessel through negligence of master (s. 137) 811
Facility which such vessels afford to deserters calls for this section .. 811
Liability of ship's master .. 812
Men of war not dealt with under the section .. 812
Provision against deserters being stowaways only .. 812
Abetment of act of insubordination by soldier, sailor or airman (s. 138) .. 812
"Insubordination," what is 812
Knowledge of the act as well as its quality necessary .. 813
Application of sections 131-138 to the Indian Marine Service (s. 138-A) .. 813
Persons subject to Articles of war (s. 139) .. 814
Wearing garb or carrying token used by soldiers (s. 140) 814
Section applies to a "soldier" only and not a "sailor" 814
Wearing a soldier's garb .. 815
"Garb," "token," meaning of 815
Intention to deceive necessary 815

Arrest—

Right of 484, 485
Cognizable and non-cognizable cases, difference between 484
Without warrant by Police-officer, in what offences, under the Code .. 484, 485
Without warrant by Police-officer in what offences, under special and local laws 485
By Forest officers, in what cases 487
Limits on the power of .. 487, 488
When justifiable .. 485, 486
"Reasonable complaint or suspicion" .. 487
No power of, on the chance of something being found against thereafter .. 487

	PAGE
Arrest—(concld.)
No power of detention by police after, for more than 24 hours ..	487
"Credible information" what is ..	488
Grounds required for ..	488
Procedure for effecting ..	489
Entry to the place where the person to be arrested is believed to be ..	489
Execution of warrants how protected ..	489-490
Forcing doors in ..	490
What is justifiable force ..	491
Excessive use of force without malice is not however criminal though not civilly excusable ..	491
English Law more stringent	491
By private persons, right of	492, 494
Village watchmen or choukidars have no greater power than private persons	492
Under English Law a private person has the same right of, of a felon as the police but with more serious responsibility ..	492
What police must show to justify an ..	493
Duty of a private person ..	492, 493
Private person arresting can make over the person to a servant for delivery to the police	494
Original custody continues until delivery to the police	494
Arson—
See Mischief.
Assault—
Abetment of, by soldier on superior officer (s. 133) ..	803
No abetment of, where assault itself not an offence	805
Meaning of the term "assault" and what it includes	805
Abetment of, if assault committed (s. 134) ..	806
Hurt and, difference between	1690
Battery and, difference in English Law ..	1691
Privileged and negligible, ..	1709

	PAGE
Assault—(contd.).
Criminal, or hurt to public servants	1746
Definition of, in English Law	1805
Definition of (s. 351) ..	1809
English Law how differs ..	1810
Must fall short of criminal force	1810
Intention only to frighten by menacing words and attitude	1810
Conditional threat excluded	1810
What constitutes ..	1811
Regard to be had not only to words but to surrounding circumstances ..	1811
Explanation to section, scope of	1812
Or criminal force, otherwise than on grave provocation, punishment for (s. 352) ..	1812, 1813
Sudden and grave provocation when a mitigation ..	1813
Term distinguished from its popular sense and the sense in which it is used in English Law ..	1815
Beating and, distinguished	1815
And criminal force ..	1815
Necessary caution in assuming the offence ..	1815
Assault on provocation ..	1815, 1816
Or criminal force to deter a public servant from discharge of his duty (s. 353)	1816
On public servant ..	1817
Act must be shown to be legal or done in good faith under colour of his office ..	1817
Distinction to be drawn between resistance and attack	1818
No offence, cases of ..	1818, 1819
On duty ..	1819, 1820
Or criminal force to woman with intent to outrage her modesty (s. 354) ..	1820
Section compared with section 376, rape ..	1820
Statement of female assaulted, admissible in evidence ..	1821
Indecent, on woman ..	1821
Woman, whom it refers to..	1822
Variety of forms of ..	1822
Mere words do not amount to	1823

PAGE

Assault—(contd.)

Indecent proposal unaccompanied by gesture or preparation if an offence .. 1823
Must be without consent .. 1823
On prostitutes, if within the section .. 1823
What criminal intent material 1823, 1824
Quantum of necessary evidence 1824
Caution against common exaggeration .. 1824
Sexual connection under pretence of being her husband, held to be indecent assault 1824
Distinguished from attempted rape .. 1824, 1825
Or criminal force with intent to dishonour person otherwise than on grave provocation (s. 355) .. 1825
Sense of honour when provocative of mortal fray .. 1826
Section intended for cases where mode of assault selected on purpose to dishonour another .. 1826
Assault and dishonour .. 1826
If dishonour under this section includes religious susceptibilities .. 1826
Or criminal force in attempt to commit theft of property carried by a person (s. 356) 1826
Section directed against pick-pockets .. 1827
Section refers only where attempt falls short of theft 1827
To commit theft explained .. 1827
Cases of theft when distinguishable from offence under this section .. 1827, 1828
Pick-pocket, putting his hand in an empty pocket, if liable under this section .. 1828
Or criminal force in attempting wrongfully to confine a person (s. 357) .. 1829
In attempted confinement, what is .. 1829
To confine to be distinguished from an attempt to escape .. 1829
Or criminal force upon a person wrongfully confined, not provided for .. 1830
Or criminal force on grave provocation (s. 358) .. 1830

PAGE

Assault—(concld.)

Section 358 attenuated form of section 352 .. 1830
House-trespass after preparation for, hurt or wrongful restraint (s. 452) .. 2394
Lurking house-trespass or house-breaking after preparation for, hurt or wrongful restraint (s. 455) 2403
Lurking house-trespass or house-breaking by night after preparation for, hurt or wrongful restraint (s. 458) 2413

Assemblage—

Assembling for purpose of committing dacoity (s. 402) 2083
For dacoity what is .. 2084
Essence of the crime .. 2084
Nature of the evidence required 2084
Presupposes a determination to commit dacoity .. 2084

Assembly—

See Religion.

Assessor—

Personation of an, or juror (s. 229) 1260
See False Personation.

Attachment—

Removal of crops pending .. 1970

Attempt—

Itself an offence .. 312
Distinguished from preparation and abetment .. 671, 672
To wage war against the King (s. 121) .. 733
What is an, in sedition .. 780
To wage war against any allied Asiatic Power (s. 125) 789
To seduce sailor or soldier or airman from duty (s. 131) .. 799
Mere intention does not amount to an, to desert .. 809
To obtain a bribe .. 898
To murder (s. 307) .. 1641
To murder by life convicts (s. 307) 1641
Section graduates the offence of, to murder .. 1644

Attempt—(contd.)	PAGE
Remarks and the illustrations given by the Law Commissioners	1644
What is an	1645
What is an, to murder	1645
To murder by discharge of fire-arms	1645
Extension of the offence to homicide	1644
What act amounts to	1645
Sec. 307, re, and s. 511, Applicability of, discussion as to	1646
Conflict of views, Bombay and Allahabad High Courts	1647
English Law on discharging fire-arms	1647
Illustrative cases	1647, 1648
Discharging empty fire-arms if, and when	1648
Intention or knowledge followed by an act are essentials of the offence	1649
What intention or knowledge must accompany such act	1649
Danger to which technicality may lead to, illustrative case of	1650
Case of mistaken belief	1650
Where death intended and caused but act insufficient	1650
Intention, presumption of	1650-1651
No attempt, where means inadequate	1651-1652
Act without intention	1652
Inchoate acts not	1652
To commit culpable homicide (s. 308)	1653
Section same as section 307 in all points except that it refers to culpable homicide	1653
To commit culpable homicide, what is	1653
To commit suicide (s. 309)	1654
Attempted rape distinguished from indecent assault	1824, 1825
Assault or criminal force in, to commit theft of property carried by a person (s. 356)	1826
Section enacted against pick-pockets	1826
Pick-pocket putting his hand into an empty pocket cannot be convicted of, to commit theft	1827, 2805
Section punishes, which falls short of theft	1826

Attempt—(contd.)	PAGE
Assault or criminal force in, to wrongfully confine a person (s. 357)	1829
An impotent person not liable for, to commit rape	1926
To commit rape	1934
To commit extortion	2025, 2026
At extortion by putting person in fear of death or grievous hurt (s. 387)	2827
At extortion by putting person in fear of accusation of offence (s. 389)	2032
To commit robbery (s. 393)	2049
Dacoity, Definition of, includes also an attempt, which is therefore punishable as such	2056
To commit robbery or dacoity when armed with deadly weapon (s. 398)	2068
Robbery or dacoity with, to cause death or grievous hurt (s. 397)	2063
To commit dacoity distinguished from preparation	2070
To cheat 2122-2126, 2216,	2238-2242
To cheat, no inducement necessary	2240
To cheat distinguished from preparation	2238
Claiming damages against Insurance Company far in excess of goods destroyed by fire is an, to cheat	2239
And abetment to cheat, how distinguished	2241
To commit mischief to decked vessel or one of twenty tons burden by fire or explosive substance (s. 438)	2336
Punishment for attempting to commit offences, not otherwise provided for (s. 511)	2800
Attempts made specifically punishable	2801
English Law as to	2801, 2802
Procedure applicable under the section is the same as is applicable to the offence of which it is an	2802
Four stages in the commission of a crime	2804
What is an	2804, 2805
(1) Intention	2804
Mere intention not punishable	2804

PAGE

Attempt—(concld.)

Intention a completed offence in sedition .. 2805
(2) Preparation .. 2805
Preparation distinguished from an attempt .. 2805, 2809
Difference is only one of degree—illustration .. 2806, 2807
Conflict of views as to .. 2807, 2808
Allahabad view criticised .. 2808
Illustrative cases of mere, not being offence .. 2809
Preparation may be a distinct offence .. 2810
Preparation when indistinguishable from an, cases on the borderline .. 2811-2813
Degree of proximity necessary 2814
Act "towards" the commission of the offence necessary 2814
Attempt where offence impossible .. 2814, 2815
Innumerable variations of such attempts .. 2815, 2816
When innocent act becomes a criminal attempt .. 2817
Where accused is entrapped 2817
Attempt implies the doing of an act 2818
Cases where express provision made elsewhere .. 2818, 2819
Other attempts .. 2820
Illustrative cases of attempts 2820
No attempt 2821
Act falling short of the attempt accused of but guilty of another offence .. 2821
Illustrative cases .. 2821, 2822

Attorney—

Power of, is a document (s. 29 III.) .. 282
Criminal breach of trust by (s. 409) 2150

Auction—

Mock bidding at a public (s. 185) .. 1003-1005

Authority—

Offences in contempt of lawful, (chapter X s. 172-190) 945-1035

Autopsy—

Or post-mortem examination in murder .. 1582

PAGE

B

Bailiff—

Right of; to enter houses .. 1085

Balance Sheet—

Preparation of a false, by directors of a bank suppressing mention of bad debts is criminal breach of trust .. 2156
False issue of, when amounts to cheating 2258

Banker—

Criminal breach of trust by, (s. 409) .. 2150, 2151, 2155, 2156
Who are classed as .. 2155, 2156

Bank Notes—

Offences relating to (ss. 489-A-489-D) .. 2559-2567
Meaning of (s. 489-A Expl.) 2560

Baptism—

Forgery of register of (s. 466) 2472

Basavi—

Woman dedicated to a temple 1899, 1904

Benami Transaction—

See Fraudulent deeds.

Bestiality—

See Unnatural offence.

Bigamy—

Topical introduction .. 2574, 2575
Not universally applicable .. 2574, 2575
Definition of (s. 494) .. 2577, 2578
English Law of, not applicable to offence under this section 2579
The word "Bigamy" not used in the section .. 2579
"Criminal polygamy" would be true designation .. 2579
Question of criminality depend on personal law, usage and custom of the parties 2579
Section inapplicable to Hindu and Muhammadan males 2579

Bigamy—(contd.).	Page
Section inapplicable to women in Malabar where polyandry is customary ..	2579
Personal marriage laws ..	2579, 2580
Offence made compoundable with the permission of Court by the new Act XVIII of 1923 ..	2580
Person aggrieved, who is ..	2581
In case of minors, lunatics and such others, provision in new Act XVIII of 1923 allowing interested persons to make complaint with permission of Court ..	2581
Complaint need not be specifically of this offence or under this section ..	2581
Venue	2581
Object of making, punishable	2582
Criticism on the English Law of "Bigamy" ..	2582
Criminal Polygamy ..	2583
Three exceptions to the rule	2583
Section makes no reference to intention, knowledge, fraud or deceit ..	2583
Voidability of second marriage on what depends ..	2583
Second marriage when void	2583, 2584
Where both parties are Christians ..	2583
Law as to form and essentials of marriage ..	2584
Form and essentials distinguished ..	2585
Conflict between English and American Law ..	2585
Impossible impediment (Impedimentum dirimens) and those removeable by papal or episcopal dispensation (impedimentum impediteviem) ..	2587
Christian marriages contracted abroad ..	2587
Case where one party may be a non-Christian or one a British subject and the other a foreigner ..	2587
Safest course to be married according to the law of the country	2588
Marriage of a Christian to a non-Christian ..	2588, 2589
Mixed marriages of Christians with natives in heathen countries where polygamy is allowed by law, validity of ..	2589
Validity depends on the fact that the non-Christian shall belong to a sect of which monogamy is an established doctrine ..	2591
Christian and non-Christian marriage in Christian country ..	2591
A religious disability only an impedimentum impedients not an impedimentum dirimens	2592
Removal of disability on change of domicile ..	2593
Indian converts, case of ..	2594
Position of Hindu converts	2594
Presumption of polygamy ..	2595
Ceremonial an index of the obligation implied ..	2596, 2597
Marriage of Hindu and Mahomedan apostates ..	2598
Status of Indian converts ..	2599
Dissolution of Native converts marriage ..	2600, 2601
Mahomedan Law ..	2601
Proof of marriage ..	2602
Christian marriage ..	2602
Christian marriages in India	2603
Onus of proof of previous lawful marriage is on the prosecution ..	2605
Jewish marriage ..	2606
Foreign marriage ..	2606
Parsi marriage ..	2606
Buddhist marriage ..	2606
Mahomedan marriage ..	2606, 2607
Muta marriage ..	2608
Apostacy dissolves the marriage	2608
Hindu marriage ..	2609
Intercaste marriages ..	2609
Marriage under Hindu Law a sacrament ..	2610
Hindu divorce ..	2610
Invalidity of marriage due to first marriage ..	2611
Exceptions to criminality ..	2612
Absence of 7 years, presumption of death arising from	2613
How such presumption could be displaced ..	2614
Bona fide belief in death how far a defence ..	2616
Mistaken belief ..	2616
With concealment of former marriage from person with whom subsequent marriage is contracted (s. 495) ..	2617

PAGE

Bigamy—(concld.)

Offence an aggravated form of .. 2617
Section 495 distinguished from section 496 re, mock marriage 2618
Not necessary that concealment should have effected the consent given to the second marriage .. 2618
By deceit 2618
Concealment of former marriage material when it offers an impediment to the validity of the subsequent marriage .. 2618
Proof of such concealment necessary 2619
What is such concealment .. 2619
Person belonging to polygamous race not under an obligation to disclose the fact of his first marriage .. 2618
Criminality of the act necessarily admits of degree .. 2619

Bills of Exchange—

Endorsement on, is a document (s. 29 Expl. 2 Ill.) .. 282
When becomes a valuable security (s. 30 Ill.) .. 284

Birth—

Prevention of, of child or causing it to die after birth (s. 315) .. 1673
Concealment of, of a child when punishable (s. 318) 1684
Forgery of register of (s. 466) 2472

Books—

Sale of obscene (s. 292) .. 1431, 1432
Having in possession obscene, etc., for sale or exhibition (s. 293) .. 1439
Court on conviction empowered destruction of copies of .. 1433
Book advocating checks to conception not an obscene or immoral thing .. 1437
How far goods for purposes of trade mark .. 2519, 2553
Literary piracy not within the provisions of the Code 2519
Bookseller also liable for selling goods with counterfeit trade or property mark 2553

PAGE

Boundaries—

Mischief by altering (s. 434) 2323

Boxing—

Is a lawful game .. 573

Breach of Peace—

Insult intended to provoke (s. 504) 2777
What is an insult .. 2780
Circulation of false report causing, (s. 505) .. 2782

See Insult.

Breach of Trust—

Criminal, Definition of (s. 405) 2112
Civil 2131

See Criminal Breach of Trust.

Bribery—

Taken by a public servant (s. 161) 889
English Law as to .. 890
What evidence considered sufficient .. 891, 892
As a crime, the outcome of refined jurisprudence .. 893
Thanks offering not a bribe though punishable under section 165 .. 893
Requisites of the offence of 894, 895
The accused may be a, or expecting to be a .. 894
"Expecting" meaning of 893
Such expectation may be real or pretended .. 894
What gratification is .. 895
Motive or reward .. 895, 896
Demand of a 'dasturi" or Customary due, if .. 896
Not necessary that the motive should be corrupt or oppressive .. 896
Receipt of gratification by person in authority how far by itself conclusive of 897
Legal remuneration excepted 898
Attempt to obtain bribe .. 898
"Dasturi," "Inam," "Bakshees," all are bribes .. 898
Service in consideration of 899

Bribery—(contd.)	Page
Briber's liability	900
Briber not wholly exempt from liability	900
Briber not always liable for punishment	900
Testimony of accomplices	901
Payer to be taken as an accomplice only, for this offence	901
Question whether the payer was or was not a free agent, important	901
Persons present who do not prevent or disclose, if accomplices	901, 902
Persons paying under threats, offence to be treated under extortion	902
No offer, a curious case of	902
Taking bribes to influence public servant (s. 162)	903
Gratification to influence another	904, 905
If accused is a public servant, he should be charged under section 161 only	905
3 essentials to constitute the offence	905
"Any gratification," the phrase intended to guard against idea of legal, remuneration	905
Section inapplicable to persons who merely serve as conduit pipe retaining nothing for themselves	905
When is a person said to corrupt another	906
Taking gratification for exercise of personal influence with public servant (s. 163)	906
Exercise of personal influence without gratification, however deprecable, no offence	907
Advocates, profession of, considered	906
Exercise of personal influence	907
What is personal influence	907
Abetment by public servant of offence under s. 162 or s. 163 (s. 164)	908
Receipt of valuable presents by public servants (s. 165)	909
Ordinary civilities of pan, fruits or flowers, receipt of, no offence	912

Bribery—(concld.)	Page
Acceptance of bribe and receipt of valuable presents, difference between	912
Acceptance of presents by public servants	912
With reference to elections (s. 171-B)	929
English Law on the point	929
Gratification explained and Illustrated	930
And corruption in elections	930
Payment of rates and taxes on behalf of a voter to get his name on the role, if	930
Payment of money to voter before and after election, difference between	930
Payment of travelling allowance to voter, not a	930
Payment for loss of time, if a	931
Contribution to charities	931
"Treating" what is	931, 932
All treating is not bribery	931, 932
Treating need not be by the candidate himself or his agents	932
Cases which would avoid elections not necessarily an offence	932
At elections, what is not	932
Punishment for, at elections (s. 171E)	936
Treating punishable more leniently than other forms of	937

British India—
Meaning of	157
Definition of, in General Clauses Act	158
Defined (s. 15)	221
Definition of, in other Acts	221, 222
What is, for purposes of kidnapping	1833

British Subject—
Meaning of	185
Elasticity of the term	186
Distinguished from European	185, 186

Buggery—
See Unnatural Offence.

PAGE

Building—

Theft in a (s. 380) .. 1992
What is a .. 1994
Railway carriage not a .. 1995, 1996
Open compound round the house not a .. 1996
Arson of a .. 2330, 2333
What is a, for the offence of mischief by fire .. 2333
House compared with .. 2381

Burial Ground—

See Religion.

C

Capital Sentence—

Delay in execution of, justify commutation .. 1600

Carrier—

Criminal breach of Trust by a (s. 407) .. 2141
Who is a 2142
Indian Railways are .. 2142

Causes—

Meaning of, in Criminal Law 1494, 1618

Causing Abortion—

Definition (s. 312) .. 1662

See Miscarriage.

Causing Death—

Meaning of 1494, 1618
By negligence (s. 304A) .. 1612

Causing Miscarriage—

Definition of (s. 312) .. 1662

See Miscarriage.

Certificate—

Issuing or signing a false (s. 197) 1099
What is a 1100
Using as true a false (s. 198) 1103
Using a forged, when punishable 2493

Character—

Of criminal how influences award of punishment .. 341, 342

PAGE

Charge—

Form of, where Court would not have jurisdiction but for exterritoriality .. 182
Appropriation of property in enforcement of, not dishonest .. 2099

See under each section.

Cheating—

Responsibility of person charged with, Test to determine .. 263
Extortion contrasted with, and theft—Tabular form 2009, 2011
Criminal misappropriation and, distinguished .. 2091
Definition of (s. 415) .. 2200
Punishable under Common Law 2202
Cases treated as, in England 2202
History of English Law as to 2203
Many cases of, in common parlance excluded .. 2203
Definition coincides with English Law .. 2204
Report of the framers on the subject .. 2204, 2205
Provision for, in Criminal Law dependent on Civil Law 2205
Definition of, criticism of .. 2206
Extortion and, Distinction between 2206
What is 2207
Deceiving, what it means .. 2207
No intention no deception .. 2207
Nothing wrong in assuming a name, as travelling in cognito 2208
Fortune-telling if .. 2208
English illustrative cases .. 2209
Puffing advertisements .. 2209
Property sold being not according to sample .. 2210
Misrepresentation .. 2210, 2211
Rule is the same as in Civil Law 2210
Vaunting or exaggerating value 2211
Material misdescription may amount to 2211
Pawning inferior articles as gold and such other cases 2211
Overstating weight .. 2212
By showing better sample 2212

Cheating—(contd.)	PAGE
By person in fiduciary relationship	2213
By mute deception	2213
Deceiving must induce	2214
Minor raising loan describing himself as a major, without any intention to pay	2214
True test of deception	2215
Illustrative cases	2215, 2216
False claim, Making of, if amounts to	2216
Case where there may be no, but an attempt to cheat	2216. 2217
Claim to the value of currency notes on ground of loss of one half	2216, 2217
Inducement must be fraudulent or dishonest	2217
Fraudulently, meaning of	2217
Fraudulently and dishonestly associated with delivery or retention of property	2217
Innocent deception, cases of	2218, 2219
Omission to disclose an incumbrance on property sold by owner to another	2220
Selling property to which vendor had no title	2220
Giving false name and address to shield oneself from prosecution not fraudulent	2222
Not fraudulent to tell a lie	2222
Travelling in a higher class railway carriage than what one has paid for is not	2223
Being found within an exhibition without a ticket	2223
Giving a false description and thereby obtaining admission into the police is not	2223
Fraudulently and dishonestly, Distinction between	2223
Inducements by acts and conduct	2224, 2225
What inducement dishonest	2224
Issuing cheque when there is no money to credit, if and when amounts to	2224
Issuing post dated cheque when	2224
Inducement by dishonest acts	2225
Obtaining credit by wearing University gown	2225

Cheating—(contd.)	PAGE
Obtaining credit by false pretence	2225
Intention to deceive and defraud at the time of taking money essential	2227
Subsequent conduct	2227
Mere breach of contract and, Distinction between	2227
Adulterating milk with water and selling it as pure milk is	2228
Fixed price of sale of opium and rice, Disobeying of departmental rules regulating, if	2229
Denial of receipt, after receiving money, if amounts to	2229
Non-fulfilment of promise which was one factor in inducing delivery of property otherwise legally made does not make it	2229
Mis-statement of fact as distinct from mere expression of opinion essential	2230
Giving girl in marriage by false by stating caste, if and when amounts to	2229
False weights and measures, use of, when	2230
Advertisement of fictitious things swindle by	2230, 2231
Fraudulent or dishonest inducement relates to delivery or retention of property	2231
Property may be present or prospective, existent or non-existent	2231
Inducement must be a continuing one and delivery must be under its influence	2231
Taking meals in a hotel knowing he could not pay for the meal	2231
Property, meaning of	2232
Delivery or retention must be illegal	2232
Delivery or retention even temporary sufficient	2233
English Law on the subject	2233
Inducement too remote to constitute	2233
Remoteness, question of, a question of fact	2233
Indirect inducement when criminal	2234
Intentional inducement	2234

Cheating—(contd.)	PAGE
Illustration where the section was pushed to its extreme length ..	2235
Harm when too remote to constitute ..	2236
No, where consequence unnatural ..	2237
Dishonest concealment necessary	2238
Concealment fraudulent though not dishonest, if amounts to ..	2238
Affixing signature of a fictitious shareholder to a document alleged to embody a resolution of shareholders if amounts to ..	2238
Attempt or abetment of ..	2238
Attempt at, to be distinguished from mere preparation	2238
Attempt at, Inducement not necessary for, only definite overt act ..	2240
Preparation becomes attempt as soon as the accused has done all in his power to let the act be out of his control	2238
Claim for damages against Insurance Company far in excess of the goods destroyed by fire is ..	2239
Fraud by post ..	2240
Travelling with an expired Railway pass with the date and other details altered	2240
Attempt and abetment, distinction between ..	2241
Illustrative cases ..	2241, 2242
Criminal prosecution not allowed for an act for which there is no civil redress as in cases of immoral contracts ..	2242
By personation, definition of (s. 416)	2242
By personation what is ..	2242, 2243
False personation may be by word, act or conduct ..	2243
One person answering examination for another pretending to be that other person ..	2243
False personation, what it may consist in ..	2244
By false personation, what is not	2245
Personation, cases of, intended to be punished ..	2244, 2245
Preparation to cheat distinguished from an attempt	2246
By false personation, person personated need not be real person ..	2246
Punishment for (s. 417) ..	2246
Scope of section compared with (s. 420) ..	2247
Venue	2247
Property obtained by, not stolen property ..	2247
Civil liability and crime, to be discriminated in case of	2248
High Court can quash conviction for ..	2248
Manner of cheating and the person cheated to be mentioned in the charge ..	2249
Evidence requisite in case of simple cheating ..	2249
Necessity for some workable rule as to the applicability of this section and (s. 420) ..	2249
No cheating, cases of ..	2251
Marriage lies, cases of ..	2252
Evidence of other acts ..	2253
Evidence of conduct ..	2253, 2254
Applicability of section 11 of the Evidence Act criticised	2255
Tendered only to negative the inference of accident or mistake ..	2255
Secondary evidence admissible of letters containing inducement ..	2256
With knowledge that wrongful loss may ensue to person whose interest offender is bound to protect (s. 418) ..	2256
Section aimed at abuse of trust coupled with cheating	2257
Cheating one whom accused was bound to protect ..	2257
Existence of legal obligation necessary ..	2258
Cheat need not bear any defined relationship to person deceived ..	2258
He must be in a position where it becomes his duty to protect the interest of the other ..	2258
False balance sheets, issue of, when amounts to ..	2258
By personation, punishment for (s. 419) ..	2258
Scope of section compared with that of section 420	2259

PAGE

Cheating—(concld.)

Evidence requisite in case of .. 2260
If it did not deceive, the act is only an attempt .. 2260
Cheating and dishonestly inducing delivery of property (s. 420) .. 2261
Scope of this section compared with section 417 .. 2261
Valuable security, provision as to, compared with provisions in the English Larceny Act .. 2263
Evidence of .. 2263
Essential ingredients of the offence .. 2264, 2265
Dishonest inducement, what it implies .. 2264, 2265
Returning it afterwards is not an exoneration or exculpation .. 2265
Offence complete the moment there is delivery of property .. 2265
Delivery of property by false personation and by false tokens .. 2265
Offence, how may be committed .. 2266
Property need not necessarily be delivered to the cheat 2267
Valuable security, what is, for purposes of cheating .. 2267
Dishonest inducement as regards valuable security must fructify in action .. 2267, 2268
To make, alter, or destroy valuable security, what is 2267, 2268
Forgery distinguished from 2268
Forgery for purposes of cheating (s. 468) .. 2480

Children—

Under 7 years, incapable of committing crime (s. 82) 516
Blackstone's commentary .. 517
3 stages of Infancy .. 517
Rule based on absence of understanding .. 517
Presumption under English Law that infant under 14 cannot commit rape .. 517
Indian Law different .. 517
Exemption does not extend to offences under special or Local Laws .. 517
Privilege of Infancy .. 518
Its limits .. 518

PAGE

Children—(contd.)

May be employed as agent to commit crime .. 519
Act of, above seven and under twelve of immature understanding (s. 83) .. 519
Period under English Law is between seven and fourteen .. 519
Other differences between Indian and English Law .. 519, 520
Qualified privilege of, between seven and twelve .. 520-523
Full criminal responsibility commences at 12 years though civil liability commences only after 18 years .. 520
Strict proof necessary in the case of .. 521
Capacity for doing wrong to be measured not so much by years as by the accused's understanding and judgment as disclosed in the case .. 521
Illustrative cases .. 521, 522
Nature of the act complained of offers fair indication of capacity and intelligence .. 522
Capacity to understand, test to find .. 523
Consent of, age of consent .. 586
Child when becomes a human being for the offence of culpable homicide 1492, 1493
Abetment of suicide (s. 305) .. 1635
Act done with intent to prevent, being born alive or to cause it to die after birth (s. 315) .. 1673
Causing death of quick unborn, by act amounting to culpable homicide (s. 316) 1674
Exposure and abandonment of, under 12 years (s. 317) 1676
Concealment of birth of, by secret disposal of dead body (s. 318) .. 1684
English Law, provision under 1684
Section applies only to a child as distinct from a fœtus 1685
Secret disposal of, what amounts to .. 1686

PAGE

Children—(concld.)

Section directed against the secret disposal of the offsprings of illegitimacy .. 1686
Giving into adoption or to a foundling hospital not a guilty disposal .. 1686
Essentials for the offence .. 1686
"Child," what is a .. 1686
Child must be dead .. 1687
Secret burial or disposal of dead child .. 1687, 1688
Secrecy, Evidence of .. 1688, 1689
Intentional concealment of, or endeavour to conceal, birth by such secret disposal of dead child essential 1689, 1690
Kidnapping from lawful guardianship (s. 359) .. 1831
Kidnapping or abducting child under 10 years with intent to steal from its person (s. 369) .. 1880
Selling, for purposes of prostitution (s. 372) .. 1890
Buying minor, for purposes of prostitution (s. 373) .. 1905

See Abandonment, Minor.

Circumstantial Evidence—

Nature essential in a case of murder .. 1594

Claim—

Making a false, to property to prevent its seizure or forfeiture (s. 207) .. 1137
Fraudulently admitting (s. 208) 1140
Dishonestly making a false, in Court (s. 209) .. 1143
Forgery with intent to support a 2459
What is a 2459

Classes—

Promoting enmity between (s. 153A) .. 869
Section supplement to law of sedition .. 870
Promotion of class hatred .. 870, 871
Scope of section 153A .. 871, 872
Defamation of, or by .. 2559, 2560

Clerk or Servant—

Possession of, is possession of master (s. 27) .. 277
Theft by, of property in possession of master (s. 381) 1998
Theft by, distinguished from criminal breach of trust by 1999

PAGE

Clerk or Servant—(concld.)

Reasons for making the offence heinous .. 2000
Theft by, what is .. 2000
Relationship of, depends more upon the right to control than on right to obedience 2001
Who are 2000, 2001
Question of service depends also on terms of employment and degree of control 2002
Term not synonymous with employee but narrower than it 2002
Who are not .. 2002, 2003
Contractors if 2003
Commercial travellers if .. 2003, 2004
Persons illegally employed 2004
While non-payment of salary does not exclude service, its payment is a certain criterion of it .. 2001
Persons employed as .. 2005
Ex-servants excluded .. 2005
Criminal breach of trust by (s. 408) .. 2144
As distinguished from agent 2146
Property entrusted in the capacity of .. 2146
Falsification of accounts by (s. 477-A) .. 2506, 2507

Coercion—

Effect of 310
Murder, Does not justify .. 311
When act done under, amounts to a voluntary act 310, 311
Operation of, on crime (s. 94) .. 596, 597
English Law as to .. 597
Crime under .. 598, 599
When not a defence .. 598
Is not consent .. 599-601
When a defence .. 599
When, becomes extortion .. 599
Subject considered .. 599, 600
Anarchist cannot plead .. 601

Coin—

Offences relating to, Topical introduction .. 1263
General scope of, set out .. 1263
Definition of (s. 230) .. 1264
Queen's coin, what is a .. 1265
Currency, the test of a coin .. 1264

Coin—(contd.)	PAGE
History of the definition of	1265
"Calling in of coin" what is	1265
Definition of, in the Metal Tokens Act	1266
What coin now includes	1266
A coin obsolete or no longer in use is not coin	1267
Queen's "coin," what is included in	1267
Counterfeiting (s. 231)	1268
Counterfeiting used in the sense of the definition in section 28	1268
What is counterfeiting	1268
For counterfeiting, not necessary that the coin should be a legal tender, but should be used for the time being as money	1268
Intention to deceive essential	1270
Intention to be presumed from the closeness of the imitation	1270
Removing solder from coins	1271
Quantum of imitation necessary	1272
Counterfeiting by "sweating"	1273
Performing any part of the process of counterfeiting	1273
Counterfeiting Queen's coin, (s. 232)	1273
Counterfeiting King's coin, What is	1274
Making or selling instruments for counterfeiting (s. 233)	1275
Making or selling instruments for counterfeiting Queen's coin (s. 234)	1275
Making or mending instruments for counterfeiting the King's coin	1276, 1277
Intention material	1277
Possession of instrument or material for counterfeiting (s. 235)	1278
Provisions of the English Law which is followed by the Code	1278
English Law more specific and comprehensive	1279
Both under the Code and under English Law, the offence depends not upon intention but upon knowledge	1279

Coin—(contd.).	PAGE
Possession of coining tools	1280
What is possession	1280
Proof of conscious retention necessary	1280
Evidence of possession	1281, 1282
Hindu family and possession	1282
What are coining instruments	1282
Knowledge essential	1283
Evidence may be direct or presumptive	1283
Abetting in India of counterfeiting abroad (s. 236)	1283
Abetment must be complete	1283
Import or export of counterfeit (s. 237)	1285
Provisions of the English Law.	1285
Traffic in counterfeit	1286
Guilty knowledge or belief necessary	1286
Import or export of counterfeit Queen's coins (s. 238)	1286
Delivery of, possessed with knowledge that it is counterfeit (s. 239)	1287
Possession of any number of coins constitutes only one offence	1287
Section intended for professional dealers in false	1289
Knowledge of counterfeit, material	1290
A casual utterer and his offence	1289
Knowledge of falsity at the time of possession material	1290, 1291
Knowledge of falsity how inferred	1291
Direct proof of fabrication not required	1292
Mere possession of a quantity of coin without being able to explain possession	1289
Delivery must be fraudulent	1292
Not necessary that the coin should have been accepted	1292
What is Delivery	1292, 1293
False coiner excluded	1293
Delivery of Queen's coin with knowledge that it is counterfeit (s. 240)	1293
Uttering King's coin	1294
Delivery of counterfeit, with knowledge subsequent (s. 241)	1294
Casual delivery of false	1295
Knowledge that it is counterfeit essential, mere suspicion or belief not enough	1296

PAGE

Coin—(contd.).

Possession of counterfeit coin with knowledge of its being so (s. 242) .. 1296
Possession of counterfeit coin when criminal 1297, 1298
Mere possession not punishable .. 1298
Possession of counterfeit Queen's coin with knowledge of its being so (s. 243) .. 1298
Fraudulent possession of King's coin .. 1298
Misconduct by Mint employees (s. 244) .. 1298
Section applicable to Mint employees only .. 1299
Debasement of coin by mint employees .. 1300
Mistake due to carelessness or negligence no offence 1300
Unlawfully taking coining instruments from a Mint (s. 245) .. 1300
Unlawful removal of coining tools .. 1301
Fraudulent or dishonest alteration or diminution in weight or composition of (s. 246) .. 1301
Provisions under English Law .. 1301
Impairing coins .. 1303
Diminution of a maximum of 2 per cent. allowed for wear and tear .. 1303
Presumption of fraud where new coin shows more than 2 per cent. diminution .. 1303
Diminution in weight if fraudulent or dishonest is a question of fact .. 1303
Mere possession not an offence, offence confined to performing an operation 1303
This section not applicable to gilding, silvering etc., of coins so as to give a higher denomination .. 1303
Fraudulent or dishonest alteration or diminution in weight or composition of a Queen's coin (s. 247) .. 1303
Altering appearance of coin with intent to pass as different coin (s. 248) .. 1304
Provisions in the English statute .. 1304, 1305
Altering appearance of a coin .. 1305

PAGE

Coin—(concld.).

Mere alteration punishable not possession of such coin .. 1306
Uttering of such coin not necessary .. 1305
Altering appearance of Queen's coin with intent to pass as different coin (s. 249) .. 1306
Delivery of coin with knowledge that it is altered (s. 250) .. 1306, 1307
Fraudulently dealing in altered coins .. 1308
2 sub-divisions of counterfeit coins .. 1308
Essentials of the offence .. 1308
Delivery of Queen's coin with knowledge that it is altered (s. 251) .. 1308
Possession of altered coin with previous knowledge (s. 252) .. 1309
Possession of altered Queen's coin with previous knowledge (s. 253) .. 1310
Delivery of coin which when first possessed not known to be altered (s. 254) .. 1310
Innocent possession but guilty delivery .. 1311

Commencement—

Code, Of the 157, 158

Common Law—

Rights under, saved by the Code .. 211, 212
What Laws are so exempt 211, 212
Contempt of Court under case of .. 212

Commutation—

Of sentence of death (s. 54) 348
English Law followed .. 348
This power is independent of the power of the sovereign to pardon, etc., .. 349
Power of the High Court in case of pregnant women .. 349
Power of, what justifies .. 349
Capital sentence, of Re .. 349, 350
Transportation, of (s. 55) .. 350
Europeans and Americans, In case of (s. 56) .. 351
Of sentence of offenders under transportation .. 351, 352

PAGE

Compounding—

Illegal of an offence (ss. 213, 214) 1180, 1181, 1183, 1184
No liability if, is legal under some other provision of law .. 1181
What the section punishes .. 1181
English Law, provisions under and where Indian Law differs from it .. 1181
Person compounding immaterial .. 1183
Offence necessary for .. 1183
Existence of consideration chief ingredient of the offence of .. 1183
Criticism of the original section before the amendment .. 1185
Compoundable offences direct by the party aggrieved and those compoundable with the permission of the Court in which the case is pending .. 1186
Sub-divisions of offences under various principles 1187
Accused's liability for illegal compromise .. 1187, 1188
Any giver liable .. 1188
Gratification, meaning of .. 1188
Motive material .. 1189
Offence complete with offer of gratification .. 1188, 1189
Execution of consideration immaterial for the offence 1189
Court permitting illegal withdrawal not guilty of the abetment of the offence .. 1189
Such withdrawal void .. 1189
Offences lawfully compoundable .. 1189

Compromise—

See Compounding.

Compulsion—

See Coercion.

Compulsory Labour—

Unlawful, defined (s. 374) .. 1911

See Forced Labour.

Concealment—

Of birth by secret disposal of dead body (s. 318) .. 1684
Offence applies only to dead body of a child but not to a fœtus .. 1685
Assisting in, of stolen property (s. 414) .. 2197
See Children.

PAGE

Condonation—

Of adultery .. 2637
Connivance how differs from 2637

Confession—

Of abettor admissible against principal offender .. 709
Voluntarily causing hurt to extort (s. 330) .. 1736, 1737
Obtaining of, aimed at by section 330 .. 1740, 1741
Voluntarily causing grievous hurt to extort (s. 331) 1742, 1743
Wrongful confinement to extort (s. 348) .. 1802

Connivance—

What is .. 2635
Distinguished from consent 2634, 2635
Essentials of .. 2636
How differs from condonation. .. 2637

Consent—

Act not intended and not known to be likely to cause death or grievous hurt by (s. 87) .. 561
To what extent a defence .. 562
Historical view of .. 562
Operation of, on criminality 562, 563, 573
Suicide a crime .. 563
Homicide by consent .. 563
Grievous hurt by consent .. 563
Such offences non-compoundable .. 563
Doctrine of, considered .. 563, 564
People judge better of their own interests than any law-giver or tribunal .. 564
A defence except in serious crime .. 564, 565
What offences excepted .. 564, 565
When death by, justifiable .. 565
These rules common to all countries .. 566
Harm short of grievous hurt justified by .. 566
Benefit of person harmed immaterial .. 566
The principle as to, with reference to prize-fights .. 566
To illegal acts .. 566
Meaning of .. 567
As a defence to criminality 567
What acts by, justifiable .. 567
Definition of .. 568

Consent—(contd.)	PAGE
English definition of ..	568
Division of ..	569
Implied ..	569
Where silence implies ..	569
Where, can be assumed from past conduct ..	569
Where law presumes ..	570
Is a question of fact ..	569
In cases re sexual intercourse	570
In such cases a modest negative can be assumed as ..	570
Of guardian in abduction and kidnapping ..	570
Doctrine of obvious risks ..	570, 571
Cannot be inferred from mere passivity ..	571
Not free where it is a trap to detect crime ..	572
Cannot atone for a public wrong ..	572
Division of offences with reference to ..	572
Offences modified by, analysis of ..	573
Offences where, does not vary their nature or affect their penalty ..	573
Offences where, mitigates or excuses ..	573
Value of, varies in inverse ratio with the gravity of the crime ..	573
Operation of, controlled by public policy ..	573
Harm caused in games, whether or not justifiable, lawfulness of game sole test, not ..	573
Unlawful games ..	574
Lawfulness of games does not defend upon popularity or antiquity but on risk to life and limb ..	574
One test of legality of the Game is where bodily harm is not the motive on either side ..	575
Extent of justifiable harm by ..	575
Points calling for notice in connection with justifiable harm by ..	575
By person under 18 years of age, legality and effect of ..	575
Who must ..	576
Act not intended to cause death done by, in good faith for person's benefit (s. 88) ..	576

Consent—(contd.)	PAGE
Section not intended to exonerate quacks ..	577
English Law followed ..	577
Law allows a chance where without that chance death is certain ..	577
Benefit, not mere pecuniary benefit ..	578
Harm intended to benefit ..	578
3 restrictions forming the exceptions to the rule ..	578
Act must be beneficial ..	578, 579
Mutilation or disfigurement of the body if benefit ..	579
Act must be done in good faith ..	579
What is good faith ..	579
Does not necessarily include special skill and knowledge ..	579
True test of good faith ..	580, 581
Surgical operations by quacks ..	580
Degree of care in such cases	582
What circumstances are material ..	582
Evidence of qualified medical men ..	582
Care and attention varies with education ..	583
The principle is applicable equally in the case of an attorney, or persons requisitioned for assistance ..	583
Act done in good faith by, of guardian (s. 89) ..	583
In what cases such, necessary ..	584
By guardian ..	586
Of husband as guardian of his minor wife ..	586
In case of a lunatic ..	586
Of a child ..	586
Of an insane person ..	586
Age of consent ..	586
Test, benefit and care ..	586
Given under fear or misconception (s. 90) ..	587
What is, ..	587
As defined in the Contract Act ..	587
Under misconception ..	587, 588
Cases of, given by women on misconception or assumption of facts ..	588
Misconception need not have been brought about by the accused ..	589
Accused must know that, is given under such misconception ..	589

Consent—(contd.).	PAGE
Consciousness necessary for	589
Mere submission is not ..	589
Merely taking risk is not ..	589, 590
Case of workman working with defective machinery after complaining and protesting ..	590
In some cases only express consent is ..	591
Unintelligent, is not ..	591
Evidence of ..	591
"Physical consent" ..	591
Exceptions to the operation of, in condonation of crime (s. 91) ..	592
Limits beyond which the condonation will not extend ..	592
Where immaterial ..	592
Same policy as underlies classification of offences as compoundable and non-compoundable ..	592
Act done in good faith for the benefit of person without (s. 92) ..	593
This section deals with cases of emergency not covered by section 89 ..	594
Conditions required ..	594
Beneficial act without ..	595
Section intended for cases where the exigency of the case requires prompt assistance ..	595
Acts authorised are those that call for immediate relief ..	595
3 cardinal rules of interference ..	595
Not free, where acts consented to by threats (s. 94) ..	596
English Law as to ..	597
Crime under compulsion ..	598, 599
When compulsion is no defence ..	598, 599
Coercion is not ..	599
When compulsion is a defence ..	599
Where the offence becomes extortion ..	599
Fear of instant death vitiates ..	600
Essentials to justify act done under compulsion ..	600
Case of femme covert to be judged by the general rule as no reference under this section ..	601
Mitigates offence of causing miscarriage ..	1672

Consent—(concld.)	PAGE
Question of, how far material in kidnapping ..	1852
Does not condone kidnapping ..	1854
Value of, in the offence of rape ..	1918-1925
Kinds of ..	1930
Nature of fraud necessary to vitiate ..	1932
How proved in rape ..	1932, 1933
Taking must be without, for theft ..	1971, 1972
By agent, in the case of theft ..	1973
Execution or alteration obtained without, is forgery ..	2413
Conspiracy—
Co-conspirators, Liability of, re-acts done in furtherance of common intention (s. 34) ..	288
Common elements of (s. 35) ..	299
Actual intention and knowledge when necessary ..	300
Actual intention and knowledge when not ..	300
Common intention how inferred ..	301
By doing one of several acts (s. 37) ..	301
Upon the doing of what act joint liability depends ..	303
Severance of liability (s. 38) ..	303
Combination without ..	304
What elements material ..	304
Assumes absence of common intention ..	304
Unity of intention ..	386, 387
Proximity of time and similarity of act and result ..	387
Illustrative cases ..	388, 389
Meaning of ..	660
Abetment by ..	667, 668
What is ..	667, 668
Two or more must join ..	668
They must engage ..	668, 669
What co-operation necessary ..	669
There must be consequent act ..	670
Act must be in pursuance of object of ..	672
What privity material ..	684
Confession of a co-accused in ..	709
Construction of Statutes—
Rules for the, of the Code ..	158-163
Marginal notes no aid to (f.n.) ..	160

PAGE

Construction of Statutes—(concld.)

Illustrations, value of in .. 160
Never intended by the draftsmen to supply any omission in written law .. 160
Illustrations expository and not exhaustive .. 160
Sub-headings .. 160
Specific offences, value of .. 160
Strict construction necessity for .. 161
Strict construction, what is .. 161, 162
Duty of Courts re .. 161-163
Intention of the legislature how gathered in .. 163
English cases, value of in .. 163, 164
Definitions in the Code to be understood subject to exceptions (s. 6) .. 214
Object of Chapter II (general explanations) .. 214
Sense of expression once explained (s. 7) .. 215

Constructive Criminality—

See Criminality.

Constructive Intention—

See Intention.

Constructive Knowledge—

See Knowledge

Contempt of Court—

High Court, Powers of, under English Common Law, in case of .. 211-213
Provisions of the Contempt of Court act .. 213
Position of Counsel in India .. 213
Intentional insult or interruption to public servant sitting in Judicial proceeding (s. 228) .. 1250
Offence otherwise provided for in the Criminal Pro. Code s. 480 .. 1251, 1252
Other allied offences under ss. 175, 178 .. 1251
Courts to be slow to take offence where insult not intentional .. 1251
Courts to record that the, was intentional .. 1251, 1252
Things essential for the crime .. 1251, 1253
What is .. 1253

PAGE

Contempt of Court—(concld.)

Insult or interruption must be intentional .. 1253, 1254
What amounts to insult or interruption .. 1257, 1258
Other contempts not in facie curiae .. 1258, 1259
Such contempts punishable under common law .. 1258
Jurisdiction of the High Courts in .. 1259
Other Contempts .. 1259, 1260
High Court's power to punish for, subordinate to them .. 1260
Arrest in, not wrongful .. 1694

See Public servants, contempts of.

Contempts of Lawful Authority—

Offences of Ch. X .. 945-1035

See Public servants, contempts of

Contributory Cause

Doctrine of, its place in criminal law .. 1498

Contributory Negligence—

Doctrine of .. 1394, 1395, 1398
Though no defence, yet an element in determining whether the act was rash or negligent .. 1395, 1632
Its place in criminal law .. 1394, 1398
Relevant in criminal law as showing cause too remote .. 1632
How far irrelevant .. 1633, 1634
Though a good defence to a suit based on civil negligence, it is no defence to liability for criminal negligence .. 1619, 1766

Conversion—

Wrongful, implies a breach of bailment .. 2091
Wrongful, of property .. 2095
Wrongful, compared with criminal misappropriation .. 2095, 2096
Illustrative cases .. 2095, 2096
Conversion must be dishonest for wrongful .. 2097
If illegal conversion under a claim of right amounts to criminal misappropriation .. 2098

	PAGE
Copyright—
Is a kind of property ..	2516
Property in, resembles a trade mark ..	2516
Right to trade-mark compared with ..	2516-2517
Is not a trade-mark ..	2519
Trade-mark is not sufficiently elastic to protect the rights of authors ..	2519
Corpus Delicti—
Meaning of, as used by the jurists of the Middle Ages ..	1580
Rule for the necessity of, before conviction how far valid ..	1580-1581
Meaning of, as used by the authors ..	1580
Secret disposal of, in infanticide ..	1685
Device used in forgery (ss. 475 and 476) ..	2500, 2503
A trade-mark or property mark used by another (s. 483) ..	2543
A mark used by a public servant (s. 484) ..	2544
Possession of a die, plate or other instruments for counterfeiting a trade-mark or property mark (s. 485) ..	2546
Selling goods marked with a counterfeit trade-mark or property mark (s. 486) ..	2549
Of Currency notes and Bank notes (s. 489A-489D) ..	2559-2564
Correction—
Right of ..	481, 482
Who possesses such right ..	482
Parents and persons in loco parentis ..	482
Husband in India ..	482
How to be exercised ..	482
Cases of excessive and immoderate use of ..	482
In the case of an apprentice ..	482
Extent of school master's authority ..	483
Limit of his authority ..	483
Authority of a captain at sea ..	483, 484
Counsel—
Privilege of speech of ..	2734
Absolute privilege under English Law ..	2734
Absolute civil immunity ..	2736
Special privilege	2739
Duty of Judge to see that the privilege is not abused ..	2739
Need for such privilege ..	2739
Privilege only while acting as ..	2739
Counterfeiting—
Definition of (s. 28) ..	280
Dishonesty and fraud not essentials of ..	280
Intention alone sufficient ..	280
Intention when presumed .	280
Section provides as definition for the word used in Chapter XII in relation to stamps and coins ..	280
Alteration of 'used' to resemble 'unused' stamp is ..	281
Value of the counterfeiting is immaterial ..	281
Resemblance need not be exact ..	281
Counterfeit coin ..	281
Intention to imitate necessary and how that intention gathered ..	281
Person striking stamps and coins in imitation of current things for his album will be guilty ..	281
But if it has on its face something to show that it is an imitation, there is no liability ..	281
See Coin, Currency Notes, Bank Notes.
Court of Justice
Definition of (s. 20) ..	227
Court, meaning of ..	227
Only the Judge or body of Judges is acting judicially ..	227
Different kinds of ..	227
Officers of, when are public servants ..	240
Persons specially authorised by, when are public servants ..	241, 242
Power of, to prohibit report of proceedings before them ..	2709, 2710

PAGE

Creditors—

See Fraudulent Deeds.

Crimes—

Classification of, in the Code .. 339, 340

Criminal—

Classification of, into 3 classes .. 340
Character of, how influences award of punishment .. 341, 342

Criminal Breach of Contract of Service—

Offences re (s. 491) .. 2570
Criminal desertion from personal service fall under the above section .. 2568
Topical introduction .. 2568, 2569
Object of treating, as crimes .. 2568
Other species of contract to be guarded by penal sanction .. 2569
Repeal of sections 490 and 492 . 2569
To attend on and supply wants of a helpless person (s. 491) .. 2570
Provisions supplementary to section 1 of Workman's Breach of Contract Act .. 2571
Deserting a helpless person .. 2571
This section has no reference to a traveller .. 2571
If infant's wet and dry nurse, specially retained to supply their wants would come under this section .. 2572
Desertion must be voluntary .. 2572
Servant must not be a general servant unless specially engaged for the purpose .. 2571
Curators and Hospital servants excluded .. 2572, 2573

Criminal Breach of Trust—

By clerk or servant distinguished from theft by clerk or servant .. 1999
Criminal misappropriation involved in .. 2090
Criminal misappropriation distinguished from .. 2093
Definition of (s. 405) .. 2112
English Law of embezzlements, provisions of .. 2113

PAGE

Criminal Breach of Trust—(contd.)

English and Indian Law compared .. 2111
Is criminal misappropriation by one in the position of a trustee .. 2114
Not radically different from theft in principle .. 2114
What is .. 2114, 2115
Essential ingredients of .. 2115
There must be a trust .. 2115
Trust, definition of .. 2115
Position of partners .. 2115
Position of stake-holder .. 2116
Trust may be unlawful .. 2117
Illegality of trust no defence to charge of .. 2117
Offence of, complete when accused made false entries in accounts dishonestly .. 2117
Money advanced to contractor for building purposes . 2118
Debt but not trust, Illustrative cases . 2118-2120
Banker and Customer, relation between, if one of trust and if so when .. 2119
Money delivered to try honesty of servant, Liability in case of, for .. 2119
No, when there is no trust actual or constructive .. 2120
No, when there is only a contract and no trust .. 2121
Illustrative cases .. 2120, 2121
Wife in charge of her husband's property, position of .. 2121
English Law on the subject .. 2121
Person entrusted with property, Rights of .. 2121
Dominion over property, meaning and nature of .. 2121
Property must be moveable property .. 2122
No, in cases of immoveable property .. 2122, 2123
Dominion over property not necessary to be a matter of contractual relationship but how may be acquired .. 2123
Dominion over property acquired by law or contract .. 2124
Violation of a legal duty or contract first essential of .. 2124
Dishonesty essential element .. 2124

PAGE

Criminal Breach of Trust—(contd.)

Case of goldsmith mixing alloy with gold given for making ornaments .. 2124, 2125
Salesman in liquor shop adulterating liquor given to him for sale .. 2125
Dishonesty must relate to use or disposal of trust property .. 2126, 2127
Where there is no evidence of dishonesty, accused is not guilty of .. 2127
Dishonest use or disposal, Illustrative cases .. 2127, 2128
Civil Breach of contract and Criminal Breach of contract, Distinction between . 2128
Withholding of payment, not evidence of dishonesty .. 2128
Dishonesty, presumption of, not raised by mere retention of money .. 2129
Confusion of funds .. 2129
Embezzlement and, compared .. 2130
Dishonesty, how proved .. 2131
Negligence may be good ground for civil liability only .. 2130
Civil Breach of Trust .. 2131, 2132
No offence when there is want of trust or want of dishonesty .. 2132
Punishment for (s. 406) .. 2133
Regarding venue different rules followed in different High Courts .. 2134
Place for account is the place for trial .. 2134
Although non-compoundable, practice of Courts to allow composition indirectly .. 2133, 2134
Charge, joinder of, in respect of, of money .. 2134
Distinguished from kindred offences of theft or misappropriation or cheating .. 2138
Evidence of .. 2133
This section deals with cases not otherwise provided for .. 2138
Burden of proof .. 2139
Breach of hire-purchase agreement .. 2140
Taking jewellery on approval and keeping them without payment .. 2140
Breach of duty where amounts to .. 2140

PAGE

Criminal Breach of Trust—(concld.)

By carrier, wharfinger or warehouse-keeper (s. 407) 2141
By carrier and common custodian .. 2142
Who is a carrier .. 2142
Indian Railways are carriers .. 2142
Things to be delivered in specie, if necessary for the offence .. 2142
Wharfinger, who is a .. 2143
Warehouse-keeper, who is a 2143
By clerk or servant (s. 408) .. 2144
Offence analogous—with theft by clerk or servant .. 2144
Joinder of charges .. 2145
Accused cannot be charged for, and falsification of accounts for the same transaction .. 2145
Clerk or servant, Who is a 2145, 2146
Entrusted in such capacity .. 2146
Servant distinguished from agent .. 2146
Illustrative cases .. 2146-2148
Servant's commission .. 2149
English Law different .. 2149
Civil breach of trust and, distinction between .. 2150
Abetment of, by clerk or servant .. 2150
By public servant, or by banker, merchant or agent (s. 409) .. 2150, 2151
Scope and policy of section .. 2152
Reasons for the severe punishment under this section .. 2152
By Public Servants .. 2152-2155
Banker, who is a .. 2155, 2156
Merchant, who is a .. 2156, 2157
Factor, who is a .. 2157
Broker, who is a .. 2157
Attorney, who is an 2157, 2158
Agent, who is an .. 2158, 2159

Criminal Causation—

Doctrine of .. 1491
English doctrine of .. 1496
Causes proximate and too remote .. 1497, 1498
Doctrine of, limits of .. 1498
Bodily pain caused by reflex action of mind too remote to constitute .. 1692

PAGE

Criminal Conspiracy—

Definition of (s. 120-A) .. 723
Sections 120-A and 120-B enacted by Act VIII of 1913 .. 723
Scope of .. 723, 724
History of the definition of 724
English Law as to .. 725, 726
English and Indian Law, Distinction between .. 724
Other conspiracies punishable as distinct offences under the Code .. 726
Constituent elements of the offence .. 727
Essentials of .. 727
(1) Agreement .. 727
(2) Act illegal .. 727, 728
(3) Means illegal .. 728
(4) Overt act .. 728
Overt act must be something distinct from that proving the agreement .. 728
Punishment for (s. 120-B) 728, 729
Evidence of .. 731
Confessions of one conspirator relevant against the other .. 732
If two persons are tried together both must be convicted or acquitted .. 732
Seditious conspiracy to overthrow Government (s. 121-A) .. 763-789

Criminal Force—

Definition of (s. 350) .. 1805
Force when becomes criminal .. 1806
Force applied to property, section has no reference 1807
Analysis of .. 1807
Two distinct classes of cases of .. 1807
Intention and effect necessary .. 1807
Quantum of force .. 1807
Hurt, Distinguished from .. 1807, 1808
Illustrations of .. 1808
Hurt and, intended to be mutually exclusive .. 1808
Motion need not be directly caused .. 1808
Change of motion necessary .. 1808
Use of, generally preceded by assault .. 1809
Assault or, otherwise than on grave provocation, Punishment for (s. 352) .. 1812, 1813
See Assault.

PAGE

Criminal Intimidation—

Definition of (s. 503) .. 2772
Vulgar abuse to be distinguished from .. 2772
Gist of the offence is causing alarm to another person .. 2772
Offender could not be punished if the threat falls flat 2772
What is .. 2772, 2773
And threat distinguished .. 2772
What is a threat .. 2772, 2773
Threat must be of an injury. 2773, 2774
Cases of other threats .. 2774, 2775
Injury to another or third person .. 2775, 2776
In whom one is interested .. 2776
Interested, meaning of .. 2776
Criminal Intent .. 2776, 2777
One criterion of interest is alarm produced on the mind .. 2776
Act induced must be illegal 2777
Punishment for (s. 506) .. 2786, 2787
Clause (2) of s. 506 subject of special legislation under English Law .. 2787
Gist of offence is causing another to do an act by means of threats .. 2788
Distinguished from extortion .. 2788
Threat, Evidence of, necessary .. 2788
Threat must be intended to cause alarm .. 2789
Threat may be couched in an ambiguous language .. 2789
Involuntary acts .. 2790
By an anonymous communication (s. 507) .. 2790
Anonymous communication, meaning of .. 2791
By anonymous communication how made .. 2791
By inducing person to believe that he will be rendered an object of Divine displeasure (s. 508) .. 2791
Section intended to apply to practice of Dhurna and Praga .. 2792
Section applicable to threat of practising sorcery .. 2793
Intimidation by religious imposture .. 2793
Accused must induce .. 2794
Accused must cause voluntarily .. 2795

Criminality—

Mental elements of .. 267

Criminality—(contd.) PAGE

Act done by several persons in furtherance of common intention, Liability of each (s. 34) .. 288
Co-conspirators, Liability of .. 290
Law on the subject of liability for acts done in the furtherance of common intention, summed up .. 290
Rule of presumption in matters relating to .. 292
Elements of joint criminal responsibility .. 292
Common intention sole test of joint responsibility .. 292, 297
Common intention how proved .. 292
Common intention must be commission of criminal act which is done .. 292, 297
Joint liability in and reasons for .. 292, 297
How judged from effect .. 293
Common intention may be inferred from participation in crime .. 294
Community of interest in .. 294, 295
Examples of such community of interest or intention .. 294, 296
Question whether persons were acting in concert is a question of fact .. 296
No joint responsibility, case of .. 297
Constructive liability, to fasten on presumed intention, Inadvisability of .. 297
Joint responsibility, classes of cases of fatal assault where the question of, of several assailants arises .. 297, 298
Criminal knowledge or intention and (s. 35) .. 299
Division of penal acts into two classes .. 299
Community of knowledge and interest determines, in case of conspiracy .. 299
Proof of particular intention when required for .. 300
Judged from two standpoints, actual intention and presumed intention, Subject discussed .. 300, 301
Presumed from unlawfulness of act .. 300
Joint liability of several persons, Doctrine of, from the guilt of some applies only to assemblies formed for unlawful purpose .. 301

Criminality—(contd.) PAGE

The principle of exemption from criminal responsibility .. 307
Operation of criminal volition .. 308
Presumed intention and .. 308, 309
Intention, knowledge and negligence considered, in relation to .. 309, 310
Test of, in complex acts .. 385-392
Offences in the same transaction .. 385, 386
Unity of intention .. 386, 387
Proximity of time and similarity of action and result .. 387
Illustrative cases .. 388, 389
Theft and receiving stolen property .. 390
Double liability of rioters .. 391
Limits of constructive liability .. 391, 392
Same facts constituting different offences .. 393, 394
Compound offences .. 394, 395
Ignorance of Law no excuse in Criminal Law .. 416
No intention, no crime .. 417
Absence of specific intention .. 419
Necessity as a defence to 508, 509, 511-514
Criminal responsibility, exemption of lunatics from .. 524
Drunkenness, how far a defence to criminality 515, 553, 555, 557 560,
Insanity as a defence to .. 535, 536
Consent, Operation of, on 562, 563, 573
Consent as a defence .. 567
Compulsion how far exemption from (s 94) .. 596, 597
Acts causing slight harm exempted from .. 601
Infants below 7 years and (s. 82) .. 506
Reasons for such exemption 518
English Law—Infants below 14 cannot commit crime of rape .. 517
Act of child above 7 years and below 12 years, qualified privilege (s. 83) .. 519
Rests not so much on facility given but on its nature and effect and intention .. 675
Of abettor, points to be considered in determining .. 689
Constructive liability, element of .. 847
Constructive liability, conditions of .. 849

PAGE

Criminality—(concld.)

Constructive liability, determined by knowledge .. 852, 853
Constructive liability, limits of .. 853, 854
With reference to omissions 1505
Under both systems of law, depends on doing some positive injury or illegal omission by which such injury is caused .. 1506
Both, and the measure of, of an act the Code has regard solely to the actual as distinct from a presumed constructive intention, Regarding .. 1519
In causing hurt by rashness or negligence .. 1765
Illegal act done in the belief that it is legal, how far a defence .. 2294-2295
Intention is the sole test of, in criminal trespass, and such intention must be actual and primary .. 2345
Constructive liability in the case of lurkers and housebreakers for grievous hurt or homicide caused by a confederate (s. 460) .. 2418-2420

Criminal Law—

Nature of, before the passing of the Code .. 153
What it takes cognizance of 256
Regards only man's intentions not motives .. 268
Protects only actual or physical possession .. 279
Case where, takes cognizance of constructive possession .. 279
Object of .. 279
Punishments, Place of, in .. 329

Criminal Misappropriation—

Dishonest misappropriation of Property (s. 403) .. 2085, 2086
English Law as to .. 2087
Does not cease to be an offence because complainant gave accused time to pay .. 2088
Principle .. 2090
Misappropriates, meaning of 2090
What is .. 2090, 2091
Necessarily involved in criminal breach of trust .. 2090
Theft and, Difference between .. 2091

PAGE

Criminal Misappropriation—(contd.)

Cheating and, distinguished 2091
Essential elements of .. 2092
Misappropriation is a mental act, how proved .. 2092, 2093
Distinguished from criminal breach of trust .. 2093
Misappropriation when becomes criminal .. 2093
Wrongful conversion and, compared .. 2095
Mere possession if sufficient for .. 2095
Mere non-fulfilment of a legal obligation, How it differs from .. 2096
Temporary .. 2096
Lapse of time if evidence of dishonesty .. 2096
Appropriation or conversion must be dishonest .. 2097
Illegal conversion under a claim of right if amounts to .. 2098
Retention of property in assertion of the right of lien is not .. 2099
Enumeration of the various kinds of legal lien .. 2099
Similarly in case of right to appropriation .. 2099
Lien negatives dishonesty .. 2099
Proof of Dishonesty .. 2100
Illustrative cases .. 2100
Act at one time honest may at any time become dishonest 2101
English Law different 2101
Property must have an owner .. 2101
No owner, no 2102
Property, what is .. 2102
No property, no misappropriation .. 2103
Illustrative cases .. 2103
If can be between partners .. 2104
Abandoned property .. 2104
Differs from theft, as it may be committed in respect of property not in possession .. 2104
Derelict property .. 2105
When owner is traceable and when he is not .. 2106
Where property mislaid but not lost .. 2107
Finder's duty to trace owner, English and Indian Law as to .. 2108
Thing abandoned and a thing lost, distinction between .. 2109

Criminal Misappropriation—(concld.) PAGE

Of property possessed by a deceased person at the time of his death (s. 404) 2109
Policy of law to protect assets of deceased .. 2110
Section intended to punish only strangers and servants, not relatives who take possession under a claim of right .. 2111
Despoliation of the dead .. 2111
Property here refers only to moveable property .. 2112
When amounts to criminal breach of trust .. 2112

Criminal Negligence—

By public servant in suffering escape (s. 223) .. 1250
Doctrine of .. 1389, 1390
Offences due to, Common feature of .. 1389
Thirteen sections in the Code, dealing with criminal rashness or .. 1389
What is .. 1389, 1615
Criminal rashness distinguished from .. 1389, 1390
Such distinction, how important .. 1390
Contributory negligence no good defence to liability for .. 1619
Grievous hurt by .. 1766
In cases of, act regarded irrespective of contributory negligence .. 1766, 1767
May be in the performance of a duty .. 1768

See Culpable Negligence.

Criminal Trespass—

Intent to commit offence, cardinal ingredient in .. 263
Topical introduction .. 2339, 2340
Definition of (s. 441) .. 2340, 2341
Offence akin to "forcible entry" in English Law .. 2341
Forcible entry and, distinguished .. 2341
Definition of trespass in the Draft Bill .. 2341
Trespass, what is .. 2342
Trespass and, distinction between .. 2342
What is .. 2342, 2343
Essential ingredients of .. 2343
Civil trespass, what is .. 2344

Criminal Trespass—(contd.) PAGE

Trespass, Different standpoints of civil and criminal law as to .. 2344
Sole test of criminality in, is intention as distinct from knowledge and effect .. 2345
The intention must be actual and primary not merely constructive or secondary .. 2345
Bona fide claim of right, Entry in assertion of, if .. 2345
Claim must be bona fide and not a mere pretence or excuse for causing annoyance or trouble .. 2346
Knowledge of consequence or presumed intention immaterial .. 2347
Presumed and actual intention, Difference between .. 2347
Cases where there may have been fullest knowledge but not the least intention of causing annoyance .. 2348, 2349
Intention, question of, is a question of evidence .. 2349
Specific intention unnecessary .. 2349
View that specific intention necessary .. 2350
Criminality depends not on use of criminal force or unlawfulness of entry but on intention to commit an offence: hence conflict of views .. 2351
Law defective, the only law available being this section whose language is inapt or defective .. 2351
Intention must in any case be criminal .. 2351
Intention to commit offence how proved .. 2351, 2352
No, where person takes possession of property in absence of another .. 2352
Entry or remaining must be unlawful .. 2352, 2353
Trespass on disputed land, assertion of a claim of right .. 2354-2356
Mere assertion of a claim of right is not a sufficient defence, it must be claim made in good faith .. 2354
Entry though unlawful, cases where held not to be criminal .. 2354

PAGE

Criminal Trespass—(contd.)

Section not intended to protect title but only possession as distinct from ownership .. 2356 Person having a right to possession may be guilty of ..
Person in physical possession of property is entitled to complain .. 2357
Property in the possession of another, meaning of .. 2356
Possession, what is .. 2357
Limit to which the Code allows constructive possession .. 2356, 2357
Landlord or tenant whether, can complain .. 2357
Court not bound to entertain complaint by an officious intermeddler .. 2357
Possession must be actual and exclusive .. 2358
Such possession must be juridical and of right .. 2358
Illegal possession—License and possession without title excluded .. 2358
Possession must be peaceful .. 2359
Possession without title entitled to legal protection only when sufficiently long as to raise an inference of acquiesence by owner .. 2359
Length of possession necessary to invest person with right to hold even by main force against owner .. 2359
Cases in which accused himself in possession excluded .. 2359, 2360
Unlawfully remaining after lawful entry, when .. 2360
What is entered upon must be property .. 2360, 2361
Entry upon a bona fide claim of right not .. 2361
Question of bona fide arises as soon as entry is shown to be unlawful .. 2361
Superior title Evidentiary value of, in determining question of bona fide claim .. 2362
Plea of bona fide claim only arises in cases where trespass is not of an aggravated kind .. 2362
Limits of the rule as to bona fide claim .. 2362, 2363

PAGE

Criminal Trespass—(concld.)

Enforcing a right in a wrong way may amount to .. 2363
Manifestation of Criminal intention .. 2363-2366
Intention to commit an offence .. 2363
The offence must be one punishable under the Code and not under any special or local law .. 2363
"Intention" has been held to include "knowledge or likelihood" of causing annoyance .. 2364
Offence contemplated must be something differing from trespass itself .. 2364
Trespasser need not have actually committed an offence but should have entered with intent to commit one .. 2365
Exhibition of notice by public bodies and private persons threatening to prosecute trespassers, value of .. 2366
Clear finding as to intent of accused essential .. 2366
Punishment for (s. 447) .. 2382
Person persisting, after conviction in remaining on the land cannot be convicted again and again for the same act .. 2383
If accused liable for, and offence committed 2383
Evidence requisite for .. 2384, 2385
Defences open to accused to rebut charge of .. 2386
Cases where it was held that there was no criminal trespass .. 2387
See House-breaking, House-trespass, Lurking House-trespass.

Criticism, Right of

See Defamation.

Culpable Homicide—

Definition of (s. 299) .. 1490
Distinguished from English Law .. 1491
English limitation as to causation not adopted in Code .. 1492
What is .. 1492
Excusable .. 1493
Justifiable .. 1493

Culpable Homicide—(contd.) PAGE

Elements necessary to constitute .. 1493
Implies, (1) death of a human being .. 1493
Meaning of human being, Fœtus when so considered .. 1494
Child, what is, difference between English and Indian Law .. 1494
"Child" when a human being .. 1494
(2) such death must be caused .. 1494
Meaning of death .. 1493
Causes, meaning of . 1493
Doctrine of criminal causation .. 1493-1496
Words producing .. 1495
Causes too remote .. 1495, 1496, 1498
Nervous shock .. 1495
English doctrine of causation similar .. 1496
Theoretically possible but scarcely likely cases .. 1496
Proximate cause .. 1497
True measure of causation considered .. 1497
Contributory causes when immaterial .. 1498, 1499
True cause out of many how determined .. 1498
Degree of crime depends upon intention and knowledge .. 1499
Finding that death was caused is not conclusive as pointing to any crime .. 1499 Death, how may be accelerated .. 1499
Injury accelerating death .. 1499
Neglect accelerating death is immaterial .. 1500
Death resulting from a slight wound if .. 1500
Consideration in a backward place where bad medical treatment is common .. 1500
English Law compared on this point .. 1501
Ill-treatment no consideration in determining the crime .. 1501
Reason why it is so .. 1501
Ill-treatment material in determining true cause .. 1501
Death to be connected with the act by direct influence .. 1501

Culpable Homicide—(contd.) PAGE

Infliction of injury however insignificant if regarded as causing death .. 1501
Where intervening cause unexpected, initial injury cannot be held to have caused death .. 1502
Causing death by poisonous drugs .. 1502
By "doing an act," meaning of .. 1503
Act includes also an illegal omission .. 1503
What omissions punishable .. 1503, 1504
Illustrative cases of omission .. 1504, 1505
Duties which tend to the preservation of life .. 1506
Omission must amount to gross and sometimes culpable negligence .. 1506
(3) Knowledge of likelihood of death essential .. 1506
Intention or knowledge necessary .. 1506
Knowledge, principle different from English Law .. 1507
What amounts to such knowledge .. 1507
Such knowledge assumes consciousness of effect .. 1507
Knowledge, a mental act and incapable of direct proof .. 1508
Knowledge, what is implied by .. 1508
Knowledge, degree of .. 1508
How such consciousness may be proved .. 1508
Knowledge of likelihood of death, question of fact .. 1508
Knowledge how to judge .. 1508
Inference both of knowledge as well as likelihood, Data on which to be made .. 1509
How knowledge of a future effect necessary in, proved .. 1509
Criminal knowledge determined a posteriori in some cases .. 1510
Knowledge, imputation of .. 1510
Knowledge, standard of, fixed by Court .. 1510
Intention per se not necessary .. 1510
Knowledge, Gross negligence when amounts to .. 1511
Effect of knowledge under a mistake of fact .. 1511

Culpable Homicide—(contd.)	PAGE
Knowledge, Imputation of, by legal fiction ..	1511
Striking a person believing him to be a ghost ..	1511
Belief in spirits, an extenuation and not a justification ..	1511, 1512
By performing an unskilful operation ..	1512
Cases of snake charmers inducing people to be bitten to show cures ..	1512
Motive in such cases immaterial ..	1513
Motive when taken into account ..	1513
Where injury moderate, act is treated as a consentient act ..	1513
Knowledge, presumption of, from cruel acts ..	1513
Knowledge of likelihood is apart from motive ..	1513
Doctrine of constructive knowledge ..	1513
Its necessary limits ..	1513
Causing death without knowledge ..	1513
Knowledge of likelihood of death by the act ..	1514
Illustrative cases ..	1514
No liability where subsequent act was a natural one as burial because of the mistake of fact ..	1514
Knowledge of death from degree of violence used ..	1515
Knowledge, presumption of, from natural consequences of act ..	1515
Presumption of knowledge from natural consequence of acts, exceptions ..	1515
Cases of enlarged spleen and liver ..	1515
Ignorance of disease ..	1516
Natural presumption in favour of health ..	1516
Intention, Proof of, when unnecessary ..	1517
Intention, Proof of, an aggravation of offence ..	1517
Motive when relevant ..	1517
Knowledge in, distinguished from intention and motive ..	1517
Homicidal intention described ..	1518
Kinds of homicidal intention ..	1518
Intentional injury likely to cause death ..	1518

Culpable Homicide—(contd.)	PAGE
Homicidal intention, proof of ..	1519
Actual as distinct from presumed or constructive intention, considered in determining criminality or measure of criminality ..	1519
Such intention almost always a matter of inference and rarely of proof ..	1519
Assailant's intention, how to be investigated ..	1519
Mode of proof under English Criminal law, different ..	1519
Rule as to presumed intention ..	1519
Intention presumed from what acts ..	1519
Intention, evidence of ..	1519, 1520
Where proof of intention and knowledge materially differ ..	1519
When "the facts speak for themselves" ..	1520
Distinguished from murder (s. 300) ..	1520-1523
When amounts to murder ..	1520, 1521
When does not ..	1521-1523
Murder and, suggested definition of ..	1525, 1526
Murder, distinguished from ..	1526, 1627
Knowledge in, and in murder ..	1528, 1529
Murder mitigated is ..	1541
Such mitigation may arise from (1) Provocation, (2) Excess of private defence, (3) Over-exercise of legal powers, (4) absence of premeditation, and (5) consent ..	1541
Provocation a mitigation only when it is grave and sudden and when it deprives the power of self-control ..	1541, 1542
Provocation a mitigation because of human infirmity ..	1542
Provocation by words when a mitigation ..	1542, 1543
Mere abuse if sufficient provocation ..	1543
Provocation by acts ..	1543, 1544
Acts against caste or religion ..	1543
Provocation must be both grave and sudden ..	1544
Act must be such as would cause loss of self-control ..	1544

Culpable Homicide—(contd.) PAGE

When is provocation said to be sudden as well as grave .. 1544, 1545
Liability for natural consequences, arising from the doing of an unlawful act .. 1545
Accumulated provocation, cases of .. 1545, 1546
All provocative acts need not arise from same person .. 1545, 1546
Provocation must also be grave .. 1546
Provocation must be natural though it may be unreasonable .. 1547
Provocation grave, is not necessarily sudden .. 1547
Provocation must be sudden .. 1547
If act done after reflection and deliberation, no mitigation of offence .. 1547
Time between provocation and offence, requisite for mitigation .. 1548
Cases of adultery .. 1547, 1548
Offence during loss of self-control .. 1549
Provocation must deprive a person of self-control .. 1549
Loss of self-control not to be invariably measured by gravity of provocation .. 1549
Self-control, deprivation of, conditions under which caused 1549
Provocation and assault, Lapse of time between, effect of 1549
Provocation, grave, continues to influence feelings for considerable time 1549
Provocation when a cause and when an excuse 1550, 1551, 1552
Provocation must be the cause but not the excuse for .. 1550
Premeditation and preparation, acts inconsistent with assumption of loss of self-control .. 1551
Vindictive acts exclude provocation .. 1550, 1551
Hasty preparation inevitable in all cases .. 1551
English rule on the point identical .. 1551
Question in all these cases whether suspension of reason continued from provocation to act .. 1551
Provocation, different kinds of .. 1552

Culpable Homicide—(contd.) PAGE

Death of one by provocation and another by mistake or accident .. 1552
Provocation, when no mitigation .. 1552
3 exceptions to the above rule .. 1552
Provocation, courting of .. 1552
Provocation under cover of authority .. 1553
Provocation received in performance of legal duty .. 1553
Provocation given by public servants .. 1553
Provocation in acting in obedience to law .. 1553
Legal act in exercise of private defence .. 1553
Provocation, a question of fact .. 1554
Death caused by exceeding the right of private defence 1554, 1555
If excess intentional the offence is murder, if unintentional it is culpable homicide .. 1554
Rule applies where act illegal .. 1556
Good faith necessary for mitigation .. 1556
Harm caused must be unintentional .. 1556
Question whether right exceeded is a question of fact .. 1557
Burden of proof of facts in mitigation is on the accused .. 1557
Illustrative cases .. 1557, 1558
By public servant .. 1558
Public servant must have believed in the legality of his powers .. 1558, 1559
Provocation no excuse unless it was such as to bring the case under Exception I 1559
Executioner beheads prisoner instead of hanging him, it is murder .. 1559
Police and other officers, rule as to use of force in apprehending offenders .. 1559, 1560
By public servant, quantum of force justifiable .. 1560
Sudden fight .. 1561-1566
Sudden fight, what it implies .. 1561
Sudden fight: Points of discrimination arising in .. 1561
(1) No premeditation, duelling excepted .. 1561, 1562

PAGE

Culpable Homicide—(contd.)

Duel in a sudden fight also excepted .. 1561
Faction fight .. 1562
(2) Fight must be sudden .. 1563
Two elements of sudden fight .. 1563
Fight sudden, question of fact .. 1563
Law requires two things, there must be provocation and the blow traced to passion .. 1563
(3) Undue advantage and cruelty excepted .. 1564
Malice presumed if instrument or manner of retaliation be greatly inadequate .. 1564
Question of undue advantage is a question of degree .. 1566
Death by consent is .. 1565
Death by consent, English law as to .. 1566
Motive in such cases respectable .. 1566
General insecurity not produced in such cases .. 1567
Reasons for punishing, and murder 1566, 1567
Death by consent, Duelling not within .. 1567
Such consent has no reference to pre-arranged free fights between two factions .. 1568
Death by consent, consent should be free .. 1568
By causing death of wrong person (s. 301) .. 1569
English Law as to, commented on .. 1569
His liability the same and why .. 1569
Real difference between Indian and English Law only a matter of procedure .. 1571
Liability for homicide by mistake .. 1572
Illustrative cases of such mistakes .. 1572, 1573
Punishment for (s. 304) .. 1602
Committing, for discretionary with the magistrate being based on principle .. 1603
Charge to the jury in cases of .. 1603
Wide range of punishments according to degree of criminality .. 1603

PAGE

Culpable Homicide—(concld.)

English Law of malice a subordinate place in the Code .. 1604
Offence to be judged in the light of knowledge and intention apart from motive or malice .. 1605
Principle of, distinguishing it from cognate offences .. 1604, 1605
Analysis of the offence of .. 1605
Section divides the offence into two distinct classes (1) death is caused intentionally (2) death is caused unintentionally .. 1606
Adultery, difference of view of, England and India .. 1606
Punishment for, Circumstances to be taken into account in awarding .. 1606, 1607
Act done with knowledge of likelihood of death .. 1608, 1609
Presence of knowledge but no intention .. 1608, 1609
Death caused by a single blow, cases of .. 1609-1610
Death by consent .. 1610
Causing death by rash and negligent act, distinguished from .. 1615
Acts causing death without intention and without knowledge .. 1611
Case for minor offence .. 1611
Offence only voluntarily causing grievous hurt though ending in death .. 1611
Attempt to commit (s. 308) .. 1653
What is such an attempt .. 1654
Causing death of quick unborn child by act amounting to (s. 316) .. 1674
Scope of the offence .. 1675
Offence can only be committed after the woman becomes quick with child 1675
Culpable fœticide .. 1675

Culpable Negligence—

What is .. 1615
And culpable rashness, distinction between .. 1615
Gross negligence is .. 1619
Degree of culpability in .. 1765
See Criminal Negligence.

Culpable Rashness—

What is .. 1615
And culpable negligence, distinction between .. 1615
See Culpable Negligence.

PAGE

Currency Notes

Offences relating to (ss. 489A to 489D) .. 2559-2567

Currency Notes or Bank Notes—

Topical Introduction, Offences re .. 2558
Added to the Code by Act XII of 1899 .. 2558
Offences against, formerly dealth with under sections 467, 471 and 472 .. 2558
Provision under English Law .. 2558, 2559
Counterfeiting (s. 489A) .. 2559
Scope of the section .. 2560
Explanation extends protection to all, Indian or foreign .. 2560
Counterfeiting, what is . 2560
In England no currency notes but all Bank notes .. 2560
In India no Bank notes but all currency notes .. 2560
Government Promissory notes also protected by the section .. 2560
Hundi or cheque payable to bearer on demand is bank-note .. 2560
Using as genuine forged or counterfeit (s. 489-B) .. 2561
Trafficing in forged notes, what is .. 2562
Onus on prosecution to prove knowledge on the part of the accused .. 2562
Transactions reprobated are "Sells, receives, traffics in" .. 2562
"Sells, receives, traffics in," meaning of .. 2562
Collector of curios, position of .. 2563
Possession of forged or counterfeit (s. 489-C) .. 2563
Criminal possession of forged notes .. 2564
Making or possessing instruments or materials for forging or counterfeiting (s. 489-D) .. 2564
Compared with the corresponding sections relating to stamps, coins, etc. .. 2565
Knowledge or belief that it is intended to be so used must be proved by the prosecution .. 2566
Making and sale of forging instruments, what is .. 2566
See Possession.

PAGE

D

Dacoity

Defintion of (s. 391) .. 2041
Robbery and, distinction between .. 2041
How the word, was derived 2041
What is .. 2042
Essential ingredients of .. 2043
Abettors present counted as amongst the number required to constitute .. 2043
No robbery no dacoity .. 2044
Actual violence necessary, constructive violence excluded .. 2044-2046
English law different .. 2044
Illustrative cases .. 2045, 2046
Punishment for (s. 395) .. 2054
Various stages of the offence of, how punishable .. 2054
Charge to the jury in cases of .. 2054
Definition of, includes also an attempt, which is punishable as such .. 2056
Inchoate act .. 2056
Imprisonment compulsory .. 2056
Evidence of .. 2057-2059
Strict proof of offence and identification of each accused necessary .. 2059
Points on which scrutiny desirabie .. 2059
Identification of the accused must be proved beyond doub .. 2059
Mock dacoity .. 2059
With murder (s. 396) .. 2059
How proved and nature of proof requisite .. 2061
Evidence of .. 2062
In "committing dacoity," meaning of .. 2061
Joint liability of the dacoits for a murder committed by one of them .. 2062, 2063
Only limitation to .. 2063
Robbery or, with attempt to cause death or grievous hurt (s. 397) .. 2063
Aggravated .. 2064
Section prescribes a minimum of punishment .. 2064
4 aggravating circumstances 2065
How proved .. 2066
Section compared with section 398 .. 2066, 2067

PAGE

Dacoity—(contd.)

Three different phrases used to denote the three stages of the crime in this group of sections .. 2067
If liability for the act personal to the offender who uses the weapon, difference of opinion .. 2065
Use of deadly weapon essential, its effect immaterial .. 2067
Attempt to commit, or robery when armed with deadly weapon (s. 398) .. 2068
Use of deadly weapon not necessary .. 2069
Making preparation to commit (s. 399) . 2069
Mere preparation punishable .. 2069
Person making preparation need not be a dacoit .. 2070
Nature of preparation necessary .. 2070, 2071
Preparation for, what is .. 2070
Instances of such preparation .. 2070, 2071
Preparation for, how proved .. 2070
Preparation for, distinguished from attempt .. 2071
Punishment for belonging to a gang of dacoits (s. 400) 2071
Gang of dacoits, belonging to a, what is meant by .. 2072
Nature of the evidence necessary to prove offence under this section .. 2072
Ingredients of offence .. 2073
Punishable independently of any specific crime .. 2074
Belonging to a gang of persons, meaning of .. 2074
Punishment for joining a dacoit gang .. 2074
Gang of dacoits, what is a .. 2074
Gang must habitually commit .. 2075, 2076
Women living as wives or mistresses of dacoits do not, by merely living so, belong to the gang .. 2074, 2075
Habitual association, what is .. 2075, 2076
No presumption because accused belongs to a criminal tribe or tribe of professional dacoits .. 2076
Association implies community of intention and purpose .. 2076

PAGE

Dacoity—(concld.)

Apportioning sentence, points to be considered in 2078
Assembling for the purpose of committing (s. 402) .. 2083
Essence of crime, what is .. 2084
Assemblage for .. 2084
Assemblage presupposes a determination to commit .. 2085
Dishonestly receiving property stolen in the commission of (s. 412) .. 2191

Damage—

What is, for purposes of mischief .. 2292
Liability of Government of India for .. 468

Deafness—

Causing deafness .. 1694, 1696
How caused .. 1697

Death—

Definition of (s. 46) .. 319
As a sentence .. 332
Commutation of sentence of (s. 54) .. 348
When, by consent justifiable 565
Fear of instant, vitiates consent .. 600
Right of Private defence when extends to the causing of (s. 100) .. 636, 637
Right of Private defence of property when extends to the causing of (s. 103) .. 647, 648
Causing, when culpable homicide (s. 299) .. 1490
Meaning of, for culpable homicide .. 1492
Causing, when murder (s. 300) .. 1520
Is the punishment for murder by life convict (s. 303) .. 1601
Causing, by negligence (s. 304-A) .. 1612
Theft after preparation made for causing, hurt or restraint (s. 382) .. 2006, 2007
Extortion by putting a person in fear of, or grievous hurt (s. 386) .. 2026
Putting a person in fear of, or grievous hurt in order to commit extortion (s. 387) .. 2027
Extortion by threat of accusation of an offence

PAGE

Death—(concld.)

punishable with, or transportation (s. 388) .. 2029
Robbery or dacoity with attempt to cause, or grievous hurt (s. 397) .. 2063
Mischief committed after preparation made for causing, or hurt or wrongful restraint (s. 440) .. 2339
House-trespass to commit offences punishable with (s. 449) .. 2390
Constructive criminal liability of lurkers and housebreakers for grievous hurt or, caused by a confederate (s. 460) .. 2417

Declaration—

Oath, when tantamounts to 323
What is a .. 323
No set form of .. 323

Defamation—

Forgery for purposes of harming reputation (s. 469) 2482
Topical introduction .. 2647-2652
Right of every person to character and reputation as important as his life and property .. 2647
Circumstances on which title to a remedy depends .. 2647
Early history of, in the Bible, Greece and Rome .. 2647
English and Indian standpoints .. 2648
English law regards its essence to lie in its tendency to provoke breach of peace 2648
Indian law regards its essence to lie in its tendency to cause pain .. 2648
English Law of Libel and slander .. 2648, 2649
Distinction between spoken and written defamation in English Law .. 2649
Distinction between spoken and written defamation how far observed in the Code .. 2649, 2650
Distinction between spoken and written defamation taken into consideration inapportioning punishment .. 2651
Ten exceptions to, classification of .. 2651, 2652
Exceptions generally follow the lines of English Law .. 2652

PAGE

Defamation—(contd.)

Departure from the English Law in respect of privileges of Judges, Jurors etc. .. 2652
Definition of (s. 499) .. 2652-2656
English law of libel and, Distinction between .. 2657
Truth alone sufficient justification, recommended by the Macaulay Committee but not adopted by the Code .. 2658
Provisions subject to the Govt. of India Act .. 2658
Special privileges of Judges, Jurors and Counsels how far controlled .. 2658
Object of punishing .. 2658
What is .. 2659, 2660
Gist of offence lies in dissemination of harmful reputation .. 2660
Implies making or publishing harmful reputation .. 2660
Makes or publishes, meaning of .. 2660
Publication, what is .. 2660
Communication even to complainant's wife is publication .. 2660
Communication to person defamed if .. 2661
Difference between criminal and civil proceedings in English law on the above point .. 2661
Publication used in the Code is used in the special sense as understood in the English civil law .. 2661
Negligent communication excepted .. 2662
Negligence when inexcusable 2663
Communication in confidence 2664
Publication by printer .. 2665
Printers and publishers, Liability of, for .. 2665
Exception in the case of joint-stock printing company .. 2665-2666
Publication by repetition .. 2666
Publication wide enough to include repetition or republication .. 2667
Illustrative cases .. 2666, 2667
Mitigating circumstances .. 2668
Publication may be by words or signs .. 2668, 2669
Words spoken need not be spoken by defamer .. 2669
Publication by visible representation .. 2669

PAGE

Defamation—(contd.)

Fact that representation is true no justification for publication .. 2670
Imputation must be harmful .. 2670
What is an imputation .. 2670
What is harm .. 2671
No actual harm necessary .. 2671
Malice no part of the definition of the Code, though essential for libel under English Law .. 2672
Question of intentionality material .. 2672
Ingredients of a guilty mind 2672, 2673
Harm intended but not effected, no defence .. 2673
Malice, Evidence of, when admissible .. 2673
Mere abuse not .. 2673, 2678
A random caricature not directed against any particular man or class, outside the scope of the section .. 2673
Person defamed must be certain .. 2674
Person may be a company or association .. 2674
Abuse of a class of persons as lawyers, goldsmiths, etc., no individual member of the class can complain .. 2674
Distinction between libel on an individual and libel upon a class .. 2674
Reputation must be attached 2674, 2675
What is reputation .. 2674
A person's estimate of one's self, not reputation .. 2675
Communication of libel only to the person libelled, no defamation .. 2675
Words of common abuse as stupid, idiot, etc. do not constitute defamation .. 2675
Words defamatory though reputation not harmed .. 2676
(1) Words obviously defamatory .. 2676
Words imputing commission of a crime are clearly defamatory .. 2677, 2678
Mere abuse not, but may constitute insult .. 2678
Words showing that a person is suffering from contagious diseases as leprosy, small pox, syphylis are defamatory .. 2678
Words imputing unchastity to women are highly defamatory .. 2678

PAGE

Defamation—(contd.)

So also imputations touching the efficiency, honesty or integrity of professional men .. 2678
Instances of expressions specially regarding professional men held to be defamatory .. 2679
Re medical men .. 2679
Re Honesty and integrity of public servants .. 2679, 2680
Re Banker or trader .. 2680
(2) Ambiguous words may be defamatory .. 2680
Evidence admissible to explain ambiguity .. 2680
Words appearing laudatory but really defamatory .. 2682
No, where only a jest is meant .. 2682
Neutral words .. 2682
Of the dead .. 2683
Code follows the English Law on the above point .. 2683
Imputation must be harmful to the reputation of deceased .. 2683
Imputation must hurt the feelings of the family i.e. near relations .. 2684
Who are members of the family or who are near relations .. 2685
Of the dead, no civil remedy 2685
Of a class .. 2686
Class must not be too large 2686
Section intended to guard mischief levelled at individual reputation .. 2687
Court should have more regard to the effect produced than to the object aimed at .. 2687
By a class .. 2687
The term "whoever" comprehensive and sufficient to include a body of men .. 2687
Corporation can be punished by being made to pay a fine or damages .. 2687
By innuendo .. 2688
Language of irony and sarcasm more forcible and impressive than a bald statement .. 2688
Illustrative cases and examples .. 2688, 2689
Judge to decide if the words are reasonably capable of two meanings .. 2689

Defamation—(contd.)	Page
Jury to decide which of the two meanings was intended. ..	2689
Imputation guilty although safeguarded by phrases as, "I hear so", "I understand" and such others ..	2690
Harming reputation, what is	2690
Harm to reputation essential	2690, 2691
General tenour of the harm indicated ..	2690, 2691
Harm to caste ..	2691
Illustrative cases ..	2691, 2692
Question of caste intimately connected with the question of privilege ..	2692
Harm to credit or calling ..	2692
Exception (1) Truth, Publication of, for public good	2693
Corresponding provision of English Law ..	2693
Publication of truth for public good, Defence of, must be expressly pleaded	2693
Truth no defence in case of, of the state called sedition, or of one's religion ..	2694
Truth, what is ..	2694
Truth to be a defence must extend to the entire libel ..	2694
Truth to be a defence need not be literally proved but it will suffice if proved in substance ..	2694
Illustrative cases of truth as defence ..	2694, 2695
Only truth of libel must be proved ..	2695
Existence of rumour no defence ..	2696
Each repetition is a fresh ..	2696-2697
If the statement is proved to be true, then the source of information immaterial ..	2697
Publication must be for public good ..	2697
Undue publicity takes the case out of the exception	2698
What is public good ..	2698
Privilege is bound up with the interest of the community ..	2699
Publication by one may be privileged while publication of the same by another may not be privileged ..	2699
Public interest distinguished	2699
Exception (2) Criticism of public servants ..	2700
Good faith, Presence of, essential ..	2701

Defamation—(contd.)	Page
Exception implies expression of opinion, not a statement of fact ..	2701
What opinion is protected ..	2701
Opinion, and statement of fact, Distinction between	2702
Illustrative cases ..	2702-2703
Opinion must be fair and honest ..	2703-2704
Fair comment, meaning of ..	2704
Mere exaggeration would not make comment unfair ..	2704
Opinion not honest and fair when it attacks individuals personally ..	2704
Illustrative cases ..	2705
Criticism of public conduct and imputation of motive, Distinction between ..	2705
Personal attack not privileged ..	2706
When may a question become a matter of public interest. ..	2707
By reason of its character and importance to the community ..	2708
By reason of its being submitted for public judgment	2708
Exception (3) Criticism on public question ..	2708
Rules applicable public servants applicable to persons concerned with public question although not public servants .	2708
Public question, what is a ..	2708
The two fundamental rules that govern such criticism	2709
Private question when becomes a public question ..	2709
Comment on the conduct of a public man must be plausible not malicious ..	2709
Allowance to be made for exaggerated or even grossly exaggerated language due to righteous indignation ..	2709
Exception (4), Publication of judicial proceedings ..	2709
Report of judicial proceedings protected on ground of public policy ..	2709
Judicial proceedings not privileged when (1) their publication is prohibited by court and (2) is obscene or blasphemous ..	2710
Scientific aspect of a question howmuchsoever indecent might be discussed in a medical magazine ..	2711

Defamation—(contd.)	PAGE
Malice immaterial if publication lawful ..	2711
Report must be substantially true ..	2711
Substantially true report, What is a ..	2711
Publishing proceedings favourable to one party and omitting all mention of it as affecting the other, not substantially true ..	2712
Comments on Judicial Proceedings ..	2711, 2712
Report of Judicial proceedings and comments thereon, Difference between ..	2712
Illustrative cases ..	2712
Jurisdiction immaterial ..	2712, 2713
Report of preliminary judicial enquiry ..	2713
Mode of publication immaterial ..	2713
Report of non-judicial public proceeding not exempted ..	2713
Public meeting, What is a ..	2713
Persons with absolute privilege under English Law ..	2713
Speeches and proceedings of Imperial and Provincial Legislative Councils and Reports thereof, how far privileged ..	2714
Exception (5) Comment on cases ..	2714
Comment when a case is sub-judice would be contempt of court ..	2714
Right of criticism comes in only when a case is decided ..	2714
Criticism to be in good faith must be made soon after decision or within reasonable time after decision ..	2715
No right to criticism as soon as the appeal is filed ..	2715
What the term "case" includes ..	2715
Comment must be confined to merits of case, including conduct of parties, their agents and witnesses thereto ..	2715
Comment must be in good faith and also fair and honest based on reason or discussion ..	2715
Civil case includes also a revenue case ..	2715
Cases illustrative of comments not bona fide ..	2716

Defamation—(contd.)	PAGE
Privilege of party to Judicial proceeding ..	2716
Exception (6)Literary criticism ..	2716, 2717
English Law followed on this point ..	2716
The opinion protected must relate to merits of performance ..	2717
Opinion must be expressed in good faith ..	217
Reasons why "literary criticism" should be allowed ..	217
Essentials for privilege of Literary criticism:—(i) Work must have been submitted to judgment of public ..	2717
Submission may be express or implied ..	2717
Illustrative examples of submission to the Public ..	2717
The performance need not be public ..	2718
What the word "Public" means ..	2718
(ii) Opinion must relate to merits of performance ..	2718
(iii) Expression of opinion and a statement of fact, Test applicable to ..	2719
Opinion must be fair and relevant and should not disclose malice ..	2719
Privilege limited to specified class of persons ..	2721
Exception (7) Censure by one in authority ..	2721
This privilege arises from the legal position of one person in relation to the other ..	2721
Such position may be conferred by law or created by contract ..	2721
Censure must be (1) on the conduct of person within scope of critic's authority and (2) in good faith ..	2721
Accused must be in authority ..	2721
What persons are in authority over public generally ..	2721, 2722
Absolute immunity of Judges in England ..	2722
Judiciary in this country do not possess the same absolute immunity as in England ..	2722

Defamation—(contd.)	PAGE
Judicial Officer's Protection Act, how far affects the position	2722
Immunity applied to Judges equally applicable to counsel and witnesses under English Law	2722
If such immunity applicable in India	2722
Authority may be legal, contractual or social	2722, 2723
Illustrative examples of such authority	2723
Authority may be limited or unlimited	2724
Limitation may be as to time and place and to particular acts	2724
Censure may be severe but must be in good faith	2724
Exception (8) Complaint to authority	2724
Four points calling for notice in the above exception	2725, 2726
(i) What persons are in authority	2726
Question of lawful authority most important	2726
Authority petitioned must have jurisdiction whether immediate or ultimate, for claiming privilege	2727
Bona fide belief in such authority, how far would enable one to claim the privilege	2727
(ii) Accusation	2728
Something more than accusation and something short of bona fide, not privileged	2728
Accusation, meaning of	2728
(iii) Accusation must be made in good faith	2728-2729
Presence of other people, how far affects the question of good faith	2729
Exception (9) Statements made in self-defence or defence of another	2729-2730
Statement need not be shown to be true but should have been honestly believed to be true	2729
Statement by one having an interest, or in reference to which he has a duty, privileged	2729-2730
Object of holding such occasion privileged	2730
What interest is necessary	2730-2731

Defamation—(contd.)	PAGE
Duty to protect interest may be moral or social and of a public or private nature	2731
Question if quantum of interest sufficient to protect imputation on the ground of privilege, difficult	2731
Illustrative cases	2731-2732
Test of "public good" where statement made for public good	2732-2733
Not illegal to publish an imputation when its publication is enjoined by law	2733
Privilege of the Press	2733-2734
Judges, Counsel, Parties and Witnesses, privilege of	2734
Absolute privilege under English Law	2734-2735
Absolute civil immunity	2736
Civil immunity extends to Counsels, parties and witnesses though not statutory in their case	2737
Qualified privilege of Counsels, litigants and witnesses under criminal law	2738
Common law privilege	2738
Counsel's special privilege	2739
Need for such privilege	2739
Duty of Judge to see that the privilege is not abused	2739
Privileged only while acting as counsel and not at other times	2739
Privilege how far extends to pleaders and parties	2740-2741
Privilege of witnesses	2742
Privilege of witness and party compared	2743
Limits of the privilege	2743-2744
Provisions of section 132, Indian Evidence Act	2744
Difference of view of the Calcutta and Bombay High Courts	2744
Privilege arising from interest or duty	2745
Honest belief in such interest by the accused not sufficient	2745
Question of interest is a legal inference from facts to be decided by the Judge	2745
Bona fide belief in interest may be considered in mitigation of damages	2745

PAGE

Defamation—(contd.)

Such interest or duty need not necessarily be enforceable at law: may be a social or moral duty of imperfect obligation .. 2746
Advice gratis when protected .. 2746
Interest may be welfare of society .. 2747
Caste disputes .. 2748
Matters of public interest how far privileged .. 2750
Exception (10), Caution in good faith .. 2750, 2751
Good faith essential .. 2751
Good faith, What implied in .. 2751
Caution conveyed with undue publicity not privileged .. 2751
Communication stated to be "private and confidential" how far privileged .. 2752
Trade-protection circulars and Police confidential Gazettes how far privileged .. 2752, 2753
Confidential communications between persons such as master and servant, husband and wife protected .. 2752
Statement to pleader, how far privileged .. 2753
Communication between a clergyman and a person attached to the mission .. 2753
Legislators' Absolute Privilege .. 2753
Punishment for (s. 500) .. 2754
Prior to Code, only a Civil wrong .. 2754
Trivial and frivolous complaints .. 2754
Absolute privilege of speeches in and reports of either chamber .. 2755
Only a person aggrieved may complain .. 2755
Who is a person aggrieved .. 2755, 2756
Imputation against a woman's chastity, either husband or wife can complain .. 2756
If brother or father can complain, difference of view of the High Courts .. 2756
No right to complain because a person feels aggrieved out of sympathy as a friend or other interested person .. 2757
Public servants accused as such of the offence .. 2757
Sanction when necessary .. 2757
Alteration of charge and conviction to s. 182 or s. 211 .. 2758
Venue .. 2758
Essential ingredients of offence .. 2760
Proof of criminal intention .. 2760-2761
Opinion of other persons relevant .. 2761
Judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction admissible in evidence subject to section 43 of the Indian Evidence Act .. 2762
Publication, Evidence of .. 2763
Letter deemed to be published both where it is posted and where it is received and opened .. 2763
Falsity of imputation unnecessary .. 2763-2764
Cross-examination on complaint's character .. 2764-2765
Possible defences .. 2765
Burden of proof of good faith .. 2765
Defamation and Abuse .. 2766
Some common terms of abuse not to be taken literally .. 2766
Printing and engraving matter known to be defamatory (s. 501) .. 2766
Abetment of, a distinct offence .. 2766
On conviction court may order the destruction of all the printed matter .. 2767
Prints or engraves, meaning of .. 2767
Printing defamatory matter .. 2768
Sale of printed or engraved substance containing defamatory matter (s. 502) .. 2768
Sale of defamatory printed matter .. 2769
Difference between disseminators verbally and those by printed matter .. 2769
Knowledge if can be presumed .. 2769
Liability of printer and publisher .. 2770

PAGE

Definition—

Code, In the, to be subject to general exceptions (s. 6) .. 214

Depredation—

Committing, on territories at peace (s. 126) .. 792
What is .. 792

Deserter—

Abetment of desertion of soldier or sailor (s. 135) .. 807
Desertion, what is .. 808
Intention distinguished from attempt .. 809
Intention of not returning for service necessary for desertion .. 809
Desertion abetted need not take place .. 809
Abetment of desertion .. 809
Harbouring (s. 136) .. 809
Essential ingredient of the offence .. 810
Wife of the deserter excluded .. 810
Knowledge or belief that he was a deserter necessary .. 810
Concealed on board merchant vessel through negligence of master (s. 137) .. 811
Section directed against stowaways only .. 812

Devadasis—

Traffic in minors as, punishable under (s. 372) .. 1890
Position of .. 1898
Locus penetentiæ .. 1900
What dedication as, punishable .. 1899

Dharna—

Provision against (s. 508) .. 2792, 2793, 2794

Dipsomania—

See Insanity.

Disaffection—

See Sedition.

Disease—

Drunkenness a defence when it is a .. 556, 557
Causing of, when amounts to hurt .. 1693
Meaning of .. 1692

PAGE

Disfiguration—

Of head or face amounts to grievous hurt .. 1698

Dishonestly—

Definition of (s. 24) .. 261
And fraudulently not used in the same sense nor have they the same legal incidents .. 261
Technical meaning of .. 261
Technical meaning how differs from popular sense .. 262
Essential ingredients of legal dishonesty .. 271, 272
Constitution of legal dishonesty .. 262
Must have reference to property .. 261
English notion of, different .. 266
Where right asserted .. 266
Legal, Distinguished from popular .. 268, 269
Fraudulently, Distinguished from, and examples illustrating distinction .. 271, 272
Dishonesty and fraud not essential in counterfeiting .. 280
No intention, no crime, rule examined .. 417, 418
Absence of specific intention .. 419
No, in case of child under 7 years (s. 82) .. 516
Privilege of infancy and grounds for .. 518
No, in case of child under 12 years (s. 83) .. 519
Privilege qualified between 7 and 12 years .. 520, 521
Dishonest intention to take essential in theft .. 1983
What is .. 1983
Meaning of .. 2217, 2218
Fraudulently and, terms used in cheating, if connote different meanings .. 2223
Meaning of, in the offence of forgery .. 2443

Dishonesty—

First essential to theft 1947
Distinguished from animus furandi .. 1948
What dishonesty material for extortion .. 2018

PAGE

Dishonesty—(concld.)

Proof of, in extortion .. 2018-9
When appropriation becomes .. 2094
Appropriation or conversion must be, for criminal misappropriation .. 2097
Lien negatives dishonesty .. 2099-2100
Proof of .. 2100
Essential element in criminal breach of trust .. 2126
Must relate to, use or disposal of trust property .. 2126
Withholding of payment not evidence of .. 2127
Mere retention of money does not necessarily raise presumption of, misappropriation on .. 2127
What is, receipt in the offence of stolen property .. 2180
No part of the offence of assisting in the concealment of stolen property under s. 414 .. 2197
Fraudulent alteration, distinguished from dishonesty in forgery .. 2440

Dislocation—

Or fracture of a bone or tooth is grievous hurt .. 1694, 1698

Disobedience—

Without obstruction, injury or harm, no offence .. 1030, 1031

Disorderly Assembly—

Unlawful assembly, Distinguished from .. 861, 862
What is a .. 861, 862

Document—

Definition of (s. 29) .. 281
Definition of, in other acts .. 282
Writing and, Distinction between .. 283
What is a .. 283, 284
Illegal mission to produce, before public servant (s. 175 .. 960
Destruction of, to prevent its production in evidence (s. 204) .. 1125

PAGE

Document—(concld.)

Destruction of documentary evidence .. 1126, 1127
Intention material .. 1127
Making a false (s. 464) .. 2426
False document, what is a .. 2430
"Making" a document, what is .. 2431
Antedating a, Forgery by .. 2434
Fraudulent alteration of a .. 2436
Fraudulent cancellation, destruction etc. of a (s. 477) .. 2504

Domicile—

Meaning of .. 187
Essentials of .. 187

Drowning—

Medical witness, Questions to a, in case of .. 1587

Drug—

Adulteration of (s. 274) .. 1373
Test as to what constitutes adulteration .. 1375, 1378
Sale of adulterated drugs (s. 275) .. 1375
Or medical preparation what is .. 1378
Mere possession of adulterated, no liability .. 1379
Meaning of sells, offers or exposes .. 1379
Causing hurt by administering stupefying (s. 328) .. 1729

Drunkenness—

Voluntary, how far a defence 534
English Law as to voluntary .. 534
Involuntary, an excuse (s. 85) .. 553
English law re .. 554
Voluntary, if habitual and produces frenzy a defence 554
Relevant in considering intention .. 554, 555
What real use and abuse of strong liquors depend upon 554
Reason for the rule .. 555
Same as temporary insanity 555
Operation of .. 555, 556
A defence, when it is a disease .. 556
Producing delirium tremens 557
When a defence, case re .. 557
Excuses intention but not knowledge .. 557, 558
Rules deduced as to drunkenness as affecting mental responsibility as regards crime .. 558, 559

PAGE

Drunkenness—(contd.)

How far excuses intention .. 558, 559
Involuntary .. 559
When may, be said to be involuntary .. 559
Whether, was voluntary or not question of fact .. 559
Criminal responsibility in involuntary .. 559
In offences requiring particular knowledge or intention (s. 86) .. 559
Omission to make any express provision as to intention in this section, not accidental .. 560
Presumption of knowledge not resulted by drunkenness .. 560, 561
Its effect on certain crimes 560
Misconduct in public by a drunken person (s. 510) .. 2798
Followed by disorderly conduct punishable .. 2799

Duelling—

Death in a duel is murder .. 1561
Because there is premeditation .. 1561
In a sudden fight, is culpable homicide .. 1561-1562
Not within exception of death by consent .. 1567

Dwelling house—

Theft in a (s. 380) .. 1992
What is a .. 1994
Dwelling, meaning of .. 1998
Mischief by fire or explosive substance with intent to destroy etc. (s. 436) .. 2329

E

Ear—

Permanent privation of hearing of either, is grievous hurt (s. 320) .. 1694, 1696
Causing deafness .. 1696

Elections—

Topical Introduction——of offences relating to .. 926, 927
General view of the subject 927
Introduced newly by Act XXXIX of 1920 .. 926
Necessity for such an act .. 926
Applicable to elections to all public bodies .. 926
Act not exhaustive .. 926
English Law followed generally .. 927

PAGE

Elections—(contd.)

"Candidate" and "electoral right" defined (s. 171-A) .. 927-928
"Candidate" definition of, in English Law .. 928
Person becomes a full-fledged candidate only after nomination .. 928
But liability relates back to the date of his declaration .. 928
What is declaration .. 928
No one is a candidate before the dissolution or vacancy .. 928
English law different .. 928
"Electoral Right," what it includes .. 928
Bribery with reference to (s. 171-B) .. 929
English Law on the point .. 929-931
Gratification, explained and illustrated .. 930
Bribery and corruption .. 930, 931
Payment of rates and taxes on behalf of a voter to get his name registered on the electoral roll, viewed with suspicion .. 930
Payment of money to voter before and after election, Difference between .. 930
Payment of travelling allowance to voter not a bribe 930, 931
Payment for loss of time, if a bribe .. 931
Contribution to charities .. 931
"Treating" what is .. 931, 932
All "treating," is not bribery .. 932
It is not necessary that treating should be by the candidate himself or his agent 932
Cases which would avoid an election not necessarily an offence under this section .. 932
"Bribery" at elections, What is not .. 932
Undue Influence at (s. 171-C) .. 933
Provisions regarding undue influence under English Law .. 933, 934
Essence of the offence of undue influence .. 934
Three means of exerting undue influence .. 934
Not necessary that such undue influence should be effective .. 934
Undue influence at .. 934

PAGE

Elections—(concld.)

No undue influence at, tests of .. 934, 935
Personation at (s. 171-D) .. 935
Provisions under the English Law .. 936
Uudue influence and personation compared .. 936
English Law copied with its obvious defects .. 936
Personation committed ignorantly not an offence 936
Punishment for Bribery (s. 171-E) .. 936
Treating punished more leniently than other forms of bribery .. 937
Distinction between bribery and treating .. 937
Distinction between bribery sufficient to avoid an election and one which is an offence, observed both here and in English Law .. 938
Punishment for undue influence or personation at (s. 171-F) .. 938
Section prescribes the sentence for the two offences 939
English law treats personation as a more serious offence .. 939
False statement in connection with (s. 171-G) .. 940
Wrong personation in connection with .. 940
Election lies, what are .. 941, 942
Two things essential for the offence .. 941, 942
Limits of the rule .. 942
Illegal payments in connection with (s. 171-H) .. 942
Payments illegal under English Law .. 943
Objects of the Legislature twofold .. 943
Failure to keep election accounts (s. 171-I) .. 943
Election expense, What constitutes, not defined in the Code .. 943, 944
Election expense, what constitutes .. 944
Limits of the rule .. 944

Emasculation—

Amounts to grievous hurt (s. 320) .. 1694
What is .. 1696
How caused .. 1696
One who emasculates himself, no liability to .. 1696

PAGE

English Constitution—

Origin of .. 451

English Law—

Stand-point of, as regards crime (General introduction)
Departed from, in drawing up Code .. 163
Persons and places still subject to .. 173, 174
Inapplicable to Europeans since the Code .. 186
Common law rights still saved .. 211, 212
On possession as distinguished from custody .. 278
As to forfeiture stricter than the Code .. 342, 343
Immunity in the case of children .. 517
Incapacity of children under 14 to commit rape under .. 517
On insanity as a defence to criminality .. 524, 553
On private defence, generally agrees with the view of the Code .. 607
On accessary before, at and after the fact .. 658
Distinguished from the Code view of abetment .. 658
Compared with various provisias relating to abetment .. 696
Malice prepense grand criterion in distinguishing murder from other killing 1524
How differs from Indian law in the case of murder .. 1524, 1525
Forgery, common law as to .. 2424
Adultery not an offence under .. 2624
Of libel and the Indian law of defamation, Distinction between .. 2648
See Analogous law under each section.

Escape—

Public servant allowing prisoner of state or war to (s. 128) .. 795
Public servant negligently suffering prisoner of war or state to (s. 129) .. 796
Aiding, of prisoner (s. 130) 797
Harbouring escaped offender (s. 216) .. 1194, 1195
Omitting to apprehend prisoner (s. 222) .. 1220

PAGE

Escape—(concld.)

Negligent, from custody (s. 223) .. 1222
Resistance or obstruction to lawful apprehension after, from custody (s. 224) .. 1226, 1227

Escheat—

Not a sentence under the code .. 357
English view of, compared to forfeiture as punishment .. 357

Europeans—

Offences by, jurisdiction over 202
Sentence on, and Americans to penal servitude (s. 56) 351

European British subject—

Meaning of .. 186
Native of India, and, conflict between the two terms when possible .. 190
Foreign states and .. 203
Why not amenable to Oriental Courts .. 202, 203

Excusable Homicide—

Distinguished from Justifiable .. 1493
Cases of, set out .. 1494

Expert—
See Handwriting Expert.

Explosive substances—

Rash and negligent handling of (s. 286) .. 1414
Gun or revolver not .. 1415
Causing hurt by means of (s. 324) .. 1712
Causing grievous hurt by means of (s. 326) .. 1723
Mischief by fire or, in intent to cause damage to amount to Rs. 100 or in case of agricultural produce Rs. 10 (s. 435) .. 2325
Mischief to decked vessel or one of twenty tons burden committed by fire or (s. 438) .. 2336

See Public Nuisance.

Extent—

Of the operation of the Code (s. 1) .. 153
Of the Code 154-156, 157

PAGE

Extent—(concld.).

—British territory, In .. 154
—Railways, on .. 155
—Indian States, In .. 155, 156
Ex-territorial extension of the Code .. 156
And commencement .. 157, 158
Law applicable to all persons, whether European or Indian (s. 2) 164, 165, 166
Supersession of other laws 165, 167
Foreigners how far subject to it .. 166, 170
Reasons for not exempting any person .. 166, 167
Persons necessarily excluded and reasons for their immunity .. 168, 169
Governors and Judges, Non-liability of .. 170
Indian Princes, Non-liability of .. 171, 172
Meaning of "person" as regards liability .. 172
Judicial persons .. 172
Offences on the High seas Re .. 173, 174
Question of jurisdiction depends on place of commission of offence .. 175
On men of war Re .. 174
Exterritorial offences, To (s. 4) .. 181
Procedure in case of ex-territorial offences .. 182
Provision against 3 distinct classes of persons .. 183
Over Native Indian and British subjects .. 184-188
Indian Troops, Liability of 190
Liability of foreigners for exterritorial offences .. 190-193
Liability of Pirates .. 194-196
Saving of other laws (s. 5) .. 208
Preservation of Common Law Rights .. 211, 212

Exterritoriality—

Code, Of the .. 176
Historical retrospect .. 177
Limits of .. 178
Extension of the Code (s. 4) .. 181
Section as it stood before 1898 182
Jurisdiction of the Code depends on nationality or status of the delinquent, not on character of the crime .. 183

PAGE

Exterritoriality—(concld.)

Section 4 superfluous as its provisions are already found in sections 2 and 3 .. 183
Foreigners how far liable under the Code for exterritorial offences .. 184, 192
Indian troops, liability of .. 190
Foreigners re .. 190-193
Pirates, Liability of Re .. 194-196
Piracy, murder, &c., not affected by 195, 196, 197
Criminal responsibility re, varies according to nationality and status of offender 198
Procedure in case of exterritorial offences .. 200, 201
Extradition .. 200, 201
Exterritorial jurisdiction defined .. 201
High Courts, Jurisdiction of re .. 202, 203

Extortion—

Voluntarily causing hurt to extort property or to constrain to an illegal act (s. 327) .. 1726
Section applicable to robbers dacoits and Thugs .. 1727
Voluntarily causing grievous hurt to extort property or to constrain to an illegal act (s. 329) .. 1736
Voluntarily causing hurt to extort confession (s. 330) 1736
Section manifestly directed against police and other officers .. 1739
Voluntarily causing grievous hurt to extort confession (s. 331) .. 1742, 1743
Wrongful confinement to extort property (s. 347) .. 1798, 1799
Wrongful confinement for extortion, What is .. 1800
Wrongful confinement to extort confession (s. 348) .. 1802
General view of .. 2009, 2010
Analysis of .. 2009
Section on, reproduction of English cases in an improved and systematized form .. 2010
The six sections on, presented in two stages of attempt and completed acts .. 2009
Contrasted with cheating and theft .. 2009
Definition of (s. 383) .. 2009, 2010
English law on the point .. 2010, 2011

PAGE

Extortion—(contd.)

In the sense in which it is here used unknown to English Law .. 2011
English law compared .. 2010
When an act is, when theft and when cheating .. 2011
An intermediate offence between theft and robbery .. 2011
What is .. 2012
Essential ingredients of .. 2012
Intentional intimidation necessary .. 2012-2013
Intimidation what is .. 2013
Intimidation, Nature of, requisite to constitute .. 2013-2014
Working on fears, not on hopes essential .. 2013
Threats nature of, necessary for .. 2014
Legal demand when extortionate .. 2016
Improper threats of prosecution may constitute legal injury .. 2018
What dishonesty material .. 2018
Dishonesty how proved .. 2018-2019
Demand lawful, though excessive not extortionate, Cases of .. 2018, 2019
Inducement necessary .. 2019
Inducement may be express or implied .. 2020
Dasturi, Inam Hap, etc. received by petty officials .. 2019
Words used or written if were intended to convey inducement to deliver property .. 2019
Bona fide belief when and how far a protection .. 2021
Punishment for (s. 384) .. 2021
3 degrees of gravity of the offence according to the nature of the threats .. 2022
Person advancing money to pay to the extortioner not an accomplice .. 2023
What is .. 2023
Principal ingredients of .. 2023
Bribery and, Distinction between .. 2024
Robbery and, Distinction between .. 2024
Putting person in fear of injury in order to commit extortion (s. 385) .. 2024
Attempted .. 2025
By putting person in fear of death or grievous hurt (s. 386) .. 2026
Threat need not be plain and unambiguous .. 2027

PAGE

Extortion—(concld.)

Putting person in fear of death or grievous hurt in order to commit (s. 387) .. 2027
Attempted, by threat of grievous injury .. 2028
Attempted, and robbery difference between .. 2028
By threat of an accusation of an offence punishable with death or transportation etc., (s. 388) .. 2029
By accusation .. 2030
Threat of accusation of unnatural crime, favourite form of blackmail in England .. 2030
Proof of the offence .. 2031
Charge of accusation has nothing to do with its truth or falsity .. 2031
Proof of other acts .. 2032
Putting person in fear of accusation of offence in order to commit (s. 389) .. 2032
When, is robbery (s. 390) .. 2033, 2034, 2040
Cheating and, Distinction between .. 2206, 2207

Extradition—

Procedure re, in respect of offences committed outside British India .. 201

Evidence—

Nature of, required in each case .. 277
Meaning of the term, in s. 29 .. 284
See Evidence under each section.

Eye-sight—

Injury to, is grievous hurt (s. 320) .. 1694, 1696
Injury must cause permanent privation to sight of either eye .. 1696

F

Face—

Permanent disfiguration of the head or face is grievous hurt (s. 320) .. 1694

Fair Comment—

See Defamation.

False Balance—

Use of (s. 264) .. 1329
See Weights and measures.

PAGE

False Certificate—

Issuing or signing a (s. 197) .. 1099
Certificate, what is a .. 1100
Criminal liability for .. 1100, 1101
Nature of certificates included in .. 1101, 1102
Signing of, offence of, abetment of .. 1103
False certificate must be false on a material point .. 1103
Using as true a certificate known to be false (s. 198) .. 1103

False Charge—

Distinguished from giving false information .. 986
Of offence made with intent to injure (s. 211) .. 1150
Offence of making a, and false information (s. 182) contrasted .. 1151, 1153
Complaint in case of .. 1153
Complaint without notice to accused in case of .. 1154, 1155
Complaint when unnecessary .. 1155, 1156
Procedure of magistrate on Police report .. 1156, 1157
Prosecution of allowing complaint must wait until the false charge is disposed of by the magistrate .. 1157, 1158
Effect of defective complaint .. 1158
No case for complaint .. 1158
Proof of a .. 1159
Essential ingredients of offence of .. 1160
Institution means simply filing .. 1160
Who "institutes" or "charges" .. 1161-1163
What is a charge .. 1163
Officer must possess some Jurisdiction .. 1163, 1164
No charge, no false charge 1164
Illustrative cases .. 1165, 1166
True test of a charge .. 1166
Effect of composition .. 1167
Knowledge of falsehood material .. 1167
'No just or lawful ground," meaning of .. 1168
Absence of just and lawful ground, to be proved by the prosecution .. 1168
Persons liable .. 1169
Charge must be of an offence .. 1169, 1170

PAGE

False Charge—(concld.)

Charge partially false .. 1170,1171
"Causing to be instituted," meaning of .. 1171, 1172
Civil remedy, previous criminal prosecution not necessary for maintenance of .. 1172
Enhanced sentence for criminal proceeding .. 1172, 1173
Intent to cause injury at what time material .. 1174
Measure of punishment .. 1175

False Claim—

See Fraudulent Claim.

False Declaration—

False statement made in declaration which is by law receivable as evidence (s. 199) .. 1104
Declaration may be compulsory or voluntary but must be admissible as evidence .. 1106
Declaration, meaning of .. 1106
Essentials of .. 1106
(1) Must be a declaration .. 1106, 1107
Declaration may be oral or written .. 1107
(2) Must be admissible as evidence .. 1107
(3) Must be false on a material point .. 1109
(4) Knowledge of its falsity essential .. 1109
Using as true a (s. 200) .. 1109
See False Evidence.

False Document—

Making a (s. 464) .. 2426-2427
Meaning of, in criminal law narrower than in popular parlance .. 2429
What is a .. 2430
Making, what is .. 2431
What constitutes .. 2432
Pre-requisites of falsity .. 2433
Ante-dating a document .. 2434
False recitals in a deed do not make a document false .. 2434, 2435
Must be made dishonestly or fraudulently .. 2443
When a forgery .. 2454

False Evidence—

Topical introduction .. 1036-1038
General view of the offence of .. 1036

PAGE

False Evidence—(contd.)

False pleading in civil cases .. 1036
English Law of, in civil cases .. 1036
False statement and, distinction between .. 1037
Perjury, English Law of, contrasted with .. 1037, 1039, 1040, .. 1069-1071
Giving, defined (s. 191) .. 1038
"Perjury," the term eschewed by the Code .. 1039
Indian Law proceeds on lines of Code Penal of France .. 1040
Salient features of the offence .. 1040
Three essentials of .. 1040, 1041
Omission to affirm .. 1040, 1041
Affirmation and minors .. 1041
Effect of the Oaths Act .. 1042, 1043
When omission to swear fatal to a charge of .. 1044
Want of jurisdiction in swearing must be given in a judicial proceeding .. 1045, 1046
Before Coram non-judice .. 1045
Persons liable for .. 1045, 1046
Who are bound by an oath 1046, 1047
Bound by any express provision of Law .. 1046-1048
Verification of pleadings .. 1046, 1047
False verification not punishable when document not to be verified .. 1047
Provisions of law relating to, to be strictly construed .. 1048
Venial falsehoods .. 1048, 1049
There must be legal obligation to state the truth .. 1048-1051
False declaration by persons bound to declare .. 1051, 1052
What false declaration is .. 1051, 1052
The statement must be false .. 1052, 1053
On contradictory statements .. 1053, 1054
Falsehood must be intentional .. 1054
Three Degrees of Knowledge
(a) Statement known to be false .. 1054
(b) Statement believed to be false .. 1055
(c) Statement not believed to be true .. 1054, 1056
Cases on these points considered .. 1054, 1055
Abetment of .. 1056
Fabricating (s. 192) .. 1056
Principle of the section .. 1057
Fabricating, what is .. 1058-1060
(1) Materiality essential .. 1058, 1059

False Evidence—(contd.) PAGE

Fabricating as distinguished from giving .. 1058, 1059
(2) Intention .. 1059, 1060
Cases on the subject .. 1060
Intended use in Judicial proceeding .. 1061, 1062
Must be material evidence .. 1061
Evidence in judicial proceeding .. 1062, 1063
Evidence before a Registrar .. 1062
In legal proceedings before a public servant .. 1064
Arbitrator's proceeding .. 1064
Fabrication may be against a future judicial proceeding .. 1065
Fabrication on a material point .. 1065
Immateriality in, never a ground for exoneration .. 1065
Materiality relevant in England in fabricated as well as false evidence .. 1066, 1067
Material facts .. 1066
Material, meaning of .. 1066
Immaterial facts .. 1067
Equivocal statements .. 1067
Not required that the court should be deceived .. 1068
Punishment for giving or fabricating (s. 193) .. 1068, 1069
Proof .. 1071, 1072
Grounds for and against Complaint .. 1072-1074
Application to prosecute by persons who are not parties .. 1073
Prosecution for perjury in a pending proceeding .. 1074
Venial perjury .. 1074
Circumstances which make perjury excusable .. 1074, 1075
What the order must specify .. 1075
Irregularity of sanction how far a bar .. 1075, 1076
Charge for, what should specify .. 1076, 1077
Difference of views considered .. 1162, 1163
Intentionally giving .. 1078-1080
What is "Intentionally" .. 1078
Motive immaterial .. 1079
Contradictory statements, Rule as to .. 1080-1083
Contradictory statements, English Law as to .. 1082
Contradictory statements, English rule how far applicable to India .. 1082
Judicial proceeding .. 1083

False Evidence (contd.) PAGE

Judicial proceeding, what it means .. 1083
Non-Judicial proceeding .. 1084
Proof of Perjury .. 1084, 1085
Proof of Falsity .. 1085, 1086
Proof of Fabricating .. 1086, 1087
Perjury, Measure of punishment for .. 1087, 1088
Giving or Fabricating, with intent to procure conviction of capital offence, Punishment for s. 194 .. 1088
If innocent person be thereby executed (s 194) .. 1088
Scope of s. 194 re punishment in case of, to procure conviction of capital offence .. 1089, 1090
Cases included in s. 194 .. 1090, 1091
This section (s. 194) when inapplicable .. 1091
Giving or fabricating with intent to procure conviction of offence punishable with transportation or imprisonment (s. 195) .. 1091
Scope and place of s. 195 .. 1092
Using evidence known to be false s. 196 .. 1094
Sec. 196 compared with s. 471 .. 1094, 1095
Persons liable under this section (s. 196) .. 1095
Corrupt use of .. 1096, 1097
Innocent use of, no crime .. 1098
Knowledge of falsity essential .. 1098
Corruptly, meaning of .. 1096
Corruptly implies dishonest or improper motive .. 1098
Fabricating, must have been in British India—Effect if place unknown .. 1099
Issuing or signing false certificate (s. 197) .. 1099
Issues or signs, meaning of .. 1100
Certificate, What is a .. 1100
Criminal liability for false certificate .. 1100, 1101
False certificates, what included in .. 1101-1103
False certificate, signing of, Offence of, Abetment of .. 1103
False certificate, must be false on a material point 1103
Using as true a certificate known to be false (s. 198) .. 1103

PAGE

False Evidence—(concld.)

False statement made in declaration which is by law receivable as evidence (s. 199) .. 1104
Difference between this and section 191 .. 1104, 1105
Declaration may be compulsory or voluntary but must be admissible as evidence .. 1106
False declaration—Essentials of .. 1106
False declaration must be a declaration .. 1106
Declaration may be oral or written .. 1107
Declaration must be admissible as evidence .. 1107, 1108
Declaration must be false on a material point .. 1109
Knowledge of falsity essential .. 1109
Using false declaration as true (s. 200) .. 1109
Causing disappearance of evidence of offence of giving false information to screen offender (s. 201) .. 1110
Scope of section 201 .. 1111, 1112
English Law on the subject .. 1112
Policy of Indian Law .. 1113
Screening of an offender .. 1114, 1115
Actual offender excluded .. 1115
Concealing corpus delicti .. 1116, 1117
Knowledge necessary 1117
What disappeared must be evidence .. 1117, 1118
What constitutes evidence .. 1118
Evidence does not include witness .. 1118
Intention to screen offender essential .. 1118, 1119
Concealment or false information .. 1119
Intentional omission to give information of offence by person bound to inform .. 1120
Who are bound to inform .. 1120
The person must know or have reason to believe that an offence had been committed .. 1121
Person must be legally bound .. 1121, 1122
Criminal omission to inform .. 1121, 1122
The phrase "any information," significance of .. 1122

PAGE

False Imprisonment—

Wrongful restraint and wrongful Confinement instances of, in English Law .. 1770
Malicious prosecution and, distinction between .. 1783

False Information—

Furnishing, to public servant (s. 177) .. 968
Furnishing, what is .. 970, 971
Mere omission to furnish true information may amount to furnishing a false return .. 972
Obligation to give information not universal .. 971
Persons legally bound .. 971
Persons not legally bound .. 972
Giving, to public servant to injure another (s. 182) .. 983
Distinguished from false charge under (s. 211) .. 985
Giving, when an offence .. 989
What is .. 989, 990
"Information," meaning of .. 989
False statements in pleadings or appeals do not come under this section .. 990
Knows or believes to be false .. 991
Ulterior intention .. 991
Consequential action unnecessary .. 992, 993
"Ought not to do" importance of the phrase .. 993
Abuse of lawful power .. 994, 995
Use of illegal power .. 995
Giving, respecting an offence (s. 203) .. 1122, 1123
Information must be voluntary and not in answer to questions by the Police or Magistrate .. 1123
Offence under s. 203 can be regarded as accession after the fact .. 1123
Persons giving may or may not be under a legal obligation .. 1124, 1125
Intention to screen offender not necessary .. 1124
Liability for .. 1124
See False Charge.

False Mark—

Making a, upon any receptacle containing goods (s. 487) .. 2553

False Mark—(concld.)

	Page
Making use of a, Punishment for (s. 488)	2556
What is	2555
Absence of intention to defraud a good defence	2556
Falsely marking goods	2556
Wider than a false trade mark or property mark	2555
Making use of a, What is	2556, 2557

False Personation—

Of a soldier (s. 140)	814
Section applies to a soldier only and not to a sailor	814
Wearing a soldier's garb what is	815
Intention to deceive necessary	815
Of a public servant (s. 170)	922
Offence consists in fraudulent personation and not mere personation	923
Of a public servant, what is	923, 924
For purpose of act or proceeding in suit or prosecution (s. 205)	1128
Sections in the Code dealing with false personation	1128
Offence consists independently of intention, fraud or wrongful gain	1129
May be with the consent of the person personated	1129
In suit or prosecution	1129
Should another be a real person	1129
The mere use of an assumed name without more is not criminal	1129
Innocent representation, Doctrine of	1130
What constitutes	1131
Must be in suit or criminal prosecution	1131
Criminal prosecution, also prosecution under special or local law	1131
Of a juror or assessor (s. 229)	1260
Persons who are merely exempt from liability to serve as jurors or assessors are not within the rule	1261
"Returned," "impanelled," meaning of	1261
What is, of juror or assessor	1262
Gist of the offence	1262

False Personation—(concld.)

Applicable to person not entitled to serve as juror or assessor	1262
Cheating by, Definition of (416)	2242
May be by word, act or conduct	2243
Cheating by, what is	2243-2245
—What false personation may consist in	2444
—What is not	2244, 2245
—Cases of personation intended to be punished	2244, 2246
—Person personated need not be real person	2246
—Punishment for	2258

False Records—

Preparation of, by public servant	918
Framing or translating, what is	918
Falsification must be wilful and excludes mistakes due to ignorance	919
Intentional making of, by public servant	1206

See Public Servant.

False Statement—

On oath or affirmation to public servant (s. 181)	980
Distinguished from false evidence	982
Made in declaration receivable by law as evidence (s. 199)	1104
Expression of incorrect opinion and, Distinction between	1213
With reference to elections (s. 171G)	940
Election lies, what are	941, 942
Two things essential for the offence	941
Limits of the rule	942

Falsification of accounts—

Definition of (477-A)	2506, 2507
Section added under amending Act III of 1895	2507
English law, Provision of, on the point	2507, 2508
If and when may amount to forgery	2508
What amounts to	2510
Falsification punishable how may be effected	2510

PAGE

Falsification of accounts—(concld.)

Not due to carelessness or negligence but made both wilfully and fraudulently .. 2510
Includes persons whatever illegality may taint their appointments, whether they were under any obligation to perform their duties, whether they were paid or not paid and whatever their designation .. 2510
Accounts must belong to and be in the possession of his employer .. 2510
Section if applicable if accused secrets without destroying it .. 2510
Cash in hand not tallying with balance in the accounts is no proof of falsification .. 2510
Removing unused court fee stamps from applications, vakalats, etc., and affixing old used stamp in their place, no offence under this section .. 2510, 2511
Falsification by act or omission .. 2511
Entry may be manipulated by the accused himself or their making may be abetted by him .. 2511
Illustrative English cases .. 2511
"Intent to defraud" used with a special significance in this section .. 2511
Section includes past as well as acts accompanying the falsification of accounts .. 2511
"Wilfully," meaning of .. 2511
Question of intent to defraud a question of fact .. 2512

False Weights and measures—

See Weights and Measures.

Fine—

Forfeiture a species of .. 344, 345
Compared with other punishments .. 345, 346
Measure of .. 345, 346
Points to be considered in determining quantum of .. 345, 346
Peculiarly appropriate for offences prompted by cupidity .. 346
Offences re infliction of, division of, in 4 parts .. 346

PAGE

Fine—(concld.)

When sole punishment .. 346, 347
As sole punishment when amount unlimited .. 346
Imposition of, when compulsory .. 346, 347
See Punishment.

Fire—

Negligent conduct with respect to (s. 285) .. 1411
Causing hurt by means of (s. 324) .. 1712, 1713
Hurt by or heated substance 1716
Causing grievous hurt by means of (s. 326) .. 1723

Fœticide—

Definition of (s. 312) .. 1662
While in womb (s. 315) .. 1673
Culpable (s. 316) .. 1674
See Miscarriage.

Food or drink—

Adulteration of, intended for sale (s. 272) .. 1367, 1368
Selling noxious (s. 273) .. 1369
See Public Nuisance.

Force—

Definition of (s. 349) .. 1804
Definition of, necessary for "Assault" .. 1804, 1805
Term occurs in English phrase vi et armis .. 1805
What is and how exercised 1805
Causing of motion, change of motion or cessation of motion is necessary to constitute .. 1805
Criminal, Definition of (s. 350) .. 1805
Excessive force in case of private defence .. 633, 634
Unjustifiable force in case of private defence .. 634

Forced Labour—

Definition of (s. 374) .. 1911
Ancient practice of, how abrogated .. 1911
Section not applicable to coolies in tea gardens and colonial sugar plantations 1911
Law against, based on recognition of individual freedom .. 1911
May be lawful in jails, conscription etc. .. 1911, 1912

PAGE

Forced Labour—(concld.)

Essential ingredients of the offence .. 1912
Law against, limits of .. 1912
Labour, meaning of .. 1912
Unlawful .. 1912
Compulsion necessary .. 1912
Bhet bigar and other customary service by tenants to landlord still common .. 1913
No labour however much forced and exacted against will is penal unless exacted unlawfully .. 1913
Laws relating to the emigration of labour distinguished from slavery .. 1883

Forcible entry—

English law as to, compared with criminal trespass .. 2341, 2345
See Criminal trespass.

Foreign Ambassadors—

How far subject to provisions of the Code .. 168, 169

Foreigners—

Exterritorial offences, Liability for 183, 190-193
Who are .. 198
Native states, Subjects of, are .. 198
Native Indian subject, How could acquire the status of 199
View of International Law .. 198, 199
Effect of change of domicile 198, 199
Offences committed by, subject to what procedure .. 199, 200

Foreign Sovereigns—

Exempt from the Code .. 169

Foreign State—

Subjects in, Jurisdiction over .. 204

Forfeiture—

As a punishment .. 342, 345
See Punishments.

Forged document—

Definition of (s. 470) .. 2484
Using as genuine a (s. 471) 2484
Criminal possession of .. 2499

PAGE

Forgery—

Topical Introduction .. 2424-2425
Common Law in England as to .. 2424
Definition of (s. 463) .. 2425
Making false document (s. 464) .. 2426
Meaning of false document in criminal law narrower than in popular parlance .. 2429
Cheating distinguished from 2429
False document, what is a .. 2430
Picture bearing the forged signature of a well known artist is .. 2430
English Law different .. 2431
What is making .. 2431
Creditor wiping out endorsement of payment by debtor would be guilty of "making" a false document .. 2432
"Makes," meaning of, in English Law .. 2432
"Signs, seals or executes," meaning of .. 2433
Falsity, Pre-requisites of .. 2433, 2434
What it consists of .. 2433
Cl. (1) of section, Discussion as to .. 2434
Of another's signature .. 2434
By antedating a document 2434
False recitals in a deed such as overstatement of consideration do not amount to .. 2434
Execution without authority 2435
Execution with belief in authority but no legal authority is no forgery .. 2435, 2436
Fraudulent alteration .. 2436
Clause (2) of section, Discussion as to .. 2436
Fraudulent alteration is, if made after completion of the deed .. 2436
Alteration must be of a material part of the deed 2436
What are immaterial alterations .. 2437
What is a material alteration 2437
Alterations not fraudulent .. 2437, 2438
Alteration to be penal must be both unauthorised as well as fraudulent .. 2437
With intent to defraud, meaning of .. 2438
Conflicting opinions of different courts .. 2438, 2439
Fradulently, View taken in Punjab .. 2439
Fraudulent but not dishonest 2440
Fraudulent distinguished from dishonest alteration 2440

Forgery—(contd.)	PAGE
Execution or alteration without free consent ..	2441
Obtaining signature of one who cannot from mental incapacity understand the meaning of his act, case of ..	2441
Clause (3) of the section discussed ..	2441
English Law as amended by the Larceny Act of 1861 ..	2442
False document must be made dishonestly or fraudulently ..	2443
Securing employment or admission to an examination by means of forged credentials, if ..	2443, 2444
Acts intended to screen past dishonesty or fraud if amounts to dishonestly or fraudulently ..	2444
Conflicting views as to ..	2444, 2445
Acts fraudulent but not dishonest ..	2447
Innocent fraud, cases of ..	2448, 2449
Of one's own name ..	2450
Of one's own name, Illustrative cases ..	2450, 2451
Using fictitious name ..	2451
Using fictitious name, law as to, Summary of ..	2452
Fictitious name must have been assumed for that particular purpose ..	2452
Intention to commit fraud necessary ..	2452
Using a fictitious name, when innocent ..	2454
False document, when a ..	2454, 2455
Offence complete immediately false document is made with requisite intention ..	2454
Not necessary that the document should have been used or published or the injury intended should have been caused ..	2454
But document should be on its face good and valid for the purpose created ..	2454
Document should resemble a true instrument, but the resemblance need not be exact ..	2454, 2455
Signing, sealing or execution are not essential prerequisites for a false document ..	2455
False document, Inefficacy and inadmissibility of, immaterial ..	2455

Forgery—(contd.)	PAGE
False entry in an account-book made to be evidence of a certain payment, when a ..	2456
Intent necessary to constitute ..	2456
Intent to cause damage to the public ..	2456, 2457
No presumption of fraudulent intent from mere fabrication of a false document ..	2457
Intention inferred from knowledge ..	2457, 2458
Injury to person and injury to public, Distinction between ..	2458
Intent to cause injury to person ..	2458
Intent to support any claim or title ..	2459
Such claim may be a righteous one ..	2459
Claim may be a claim to any thing ..	2459
Claim or title, meaning of..	2459
Document may be insufficient to support claim made or title set up ..	2460
Intent to part with property ..	2460
Intent when affecting property is ordinarily dishonest ..	2460
Clause too wide for it may include cases in which transfer of property is not obtained wrongfully ..	2460
Property, meaning of ..	2460
Implies not only things existing but future property also ..	2460
Intent to enter into contract ..	2461
Contract either express or implied ..	2461
Contract may be personal or relate to property ..	2461
Intent to commit fraud ..	2461
"Fraudulently" and, "intent to defraud" Distinction between ..	2461
Elements necessary to constitute crime where fraud etc. occurs in definition ..	2461
Fraud if implies loss or detriment to another ..	2461
With intent that fraud may be committed ..	2462

Forgery—(contd.) PAGE

Intent to commit fraud and intent that fraud may be committed, Difference between .. 2462
Punishment for (s. 465) .. 2462
Coins and stamps, Offences relating to compared with 2463
Complaint, should be made only when document alleged to be forged is "produced or given in evidence" 2463
Complaint, necessity of when arises .. 2463
Complaint, principles that guide the court in determining whether to make, or not .. 2464
Complaining court, to see that there is a prima facie case for the prosecution .. 2464
Document found genuine by one court is not sufficient ground for not making a complaint .. 2464
In a criminal case, the Judgment of a civil Court is wholly inadmissible either for or against the accused .. 2464
Acquittal of accused for one charge would not preclude his trial for the same offence based on a different document .. 2464
Prosecution to prove forgery and not the defence to prove genuineness of document .. 2464
Accused not to be convicted solely on evidence of similarity of thumb impressions or handwriting .. 2465
Merely filing of document no presumption of knowledge of its forgery .. 2465
Charge which does not state the intention is bad .. 2465
Evidence of forgery, What is .. 2466, 2467
Section not intended to punish for imitating or fabricating document but for doing so with intent to commit fraud .. 2466
Illustrative cases .. 2466, 2467
Proof of genuineness of handwriting what it depends upon .. 2467
Handwriting experts, who are .. 2467
Evidence of handwriting expert .. 2467
Value of such evidence .. 2467

Forgery—(contd.) PAGE

Caution to be exercised in accepting such evidence .. 2467
Not to convict persons on the mere uncorroborated testimony of handwriting expert is a recognised rule 2467
Reasons for the similitude in the handwriting of different persons .. 2468
Different causes why the handwriting of the same person varies .. 2468
Individuality of the handwriting of every person, the basis of the science of handwriting .. 2468
Leading rules for the detection of forgery .. 2468, 2469
Finger Prints .. 2471
Value of evidence of finger prints .. 2471
Principal characteristics of different kinds in finger markings .. 2471
Foot prints and shoetracks, identification by .. 2472
Of record of court or of public register etc. (s. 466) .. 2472
If section applicable to public officer whose duty it is to make entries in a public book and knowingly makes a false entry .. 2473
Section ambiguously worded 2473
Of public record if means either fabrication of a document so as to pass it off as record or proceeding of a court of justice or tampering with such record by a public servant .. 2473, 2474
Scope of s. 416 compared with scope of s. 167 .. 2474
Different views of the Calcutta and Punjab courts .. 2474
No offence unless alteration or addition made dishonestly or fraudulently .. 2475
Documents included under the section .. 2475
Includes private register of marriages of Mahomedans kept by a khazi .. 2475
Of valuable security, will or authority to adopt etc. (s. 467) .. 2476
Prosecution for, on the evidence of expert unsafe .. 2476
Documents enumerated in section affect property and are in many cases negotiable .. 2477, 2478

Forgery—(contd.)	PAGE
Documents enumerated are such of which registration is not compulsory ..	2478
Not necessary that document should be prima facie good ..	2478
Forgery of promissory note on unstamped paper ..	2478
Forgery of a deed of gift or sale before its registration ..	2478
Incomplete document not a, and not even an attempt ..	2478
Imperfect and invalid documents ..	2478
"Which purports to be" meaning of ..	2479
For the purpose of cheating (s. 468) ..	2480
Forger himself need not necessarily be the cheat ..	2480
Forgery to cheat what is ..	2480
Illustrative cases ..	2481
For the purpose of harming reputation (s. 469) ..	2482
Person forging document to defame another guilty of, and defamation as well ..	2483
Person forging deed need not necessarily be a defamer ..	2483
Person defaming on the strength of forged document may be privileged and so escape scot-free ..	2483
Question of justification immaterial ..	2483
The offence is complete as soon as forgery is complete ..	2484
Publication unnecessary nor injury to any particular person necessary ..	2484
Forged document, what is a (s. 470) ..	2484
Using as genuine a forged document (s. 471) ..	2484
Sanction when necessary ..	2485
Aggravating circumstances	2485
Charge under this section should specify the nature of document forged ..	2485
Illustrative cases ..	2485, 2486
Offence of having forged document in possession with intent to use it implied in offence under this section ..	2486
Trial for several forgeries ..	2486
Filing a list mentioning the document alleged to be forged is mere preparation and not even an attempt and therefore not punishable at all ..	2486
Fact of withdrawal of suit on denunciation of a document as forgery is no evidence of forgery ..	2486, 2487
Person convicted for attempt to commit this offence may on appeal be convicted of this offence if accused is not prejudiced by the finding ..	2487
Fraudulent and wilful use of a forged document ..	2487
Scope of section, Discussion as to ..	2487
Elements necessary to constitute this offence ..	2488
Knowledge or reasonable belief in ..	2488
Belief, meaning of ..	2488
Responsibility of pleaders in filing documents for their clients discussed ..	2488
Evidence of such knowledge or belief ..	2488
Evidence of other acts ..	2489
Evidence of other acts admissible both under Indian as well as English Law ..	2489
Evidence of other acts with very long interval is of little or no value ..	2490
What is "using" as genuine	2490
Mere filing of document if it could not be acted upon without formal proof is insufficient to constitute user ..	2490
Involuntary production of document in obedience to a summons is not using ..	2491
Words used in English Law corresponding to "using"	2491
Using like uttering may be complete without manual transferring ..	2492
Person may use a forged document by employing another to circulate it ..	2492
Using a false copy ..	2492
Use must be fraudulent or dishonest ..	2493
Forgery to conceal previous fraud ..	2494
Making or possessing counterfeit seal, plate or other instrument with intent to commit, under section 467 (s. 472) ..	2495

Forgery—(contd.) PAGE

Mere making or being in possession without requisite intention or knowledge not an offence .. 2496
Making or being in possession as distinct from use .. 2496
Making or possessing counterfeit seal etc., with intent to commit, otherwise punishable (s. 473) .. 2497
Possession of Seal, Plate or other Forging instruments .. 2497
Having possession of forged document knowing it to be forged and intending to use it as genuine (s. 474) .. 2498
Gist of offence is possession .. 2498
Mere preparation as distinct from attempt punishable .. 2499
Criminal possession of a forged document .. 2499, 2500
Proof of knowledge of the forgery necesary .. 2499
Guilty knowledge presumed from possession and the person being unable to give a satisfactory account .. 2499, 2500
Counterfeiting device or mark used for authenticating documents described in sec. 467 or possessing counterfeit marked material (s. 475) .. 2500
Scope of section 475 .. 2501
Counterfeiting or possession of authenticating device .. 2502
Criminal possession of such device .. 2502, 2503
What acts, punishable .. 2503
Counterfeiting device or mark used for authenticating documents other than those described in s. 467 or possessing counterfeit marked material (s. 476) .. 2503
Section 476 attenuated form of section 475 .. 2504
Fraudulent cancellation, destruction, etc., of will, authority to adopt or valuable security or committing mischief in respect of such instruments (s. 477) .. 2504
Fraudulent tampering with a valuable security .. 2505
The validity or invalidity of a deed is immaterial .. 2505
Acts punishable under section 477 .. 2506

Forgery—(concld.) PAGE

Acts punishable under this section not punishable under the more general provision of s. 425 .. 2506
Different modes of the commission of the offence .. 2506
Essential constitutents of the offence must be strictly proved as this is a highly penal section .. 2506
Secreting a document or declining to produce it is no proof of guilt as one may do so under a claim of right .. 2506
Falsification of accounts, offence of, if and when may amount to .. 2507, 2508
Of a Currency or Bank note (s. 489-A) .. 2559

Fouling—

Spring or reservoir (s. 277) 1381
Atmosphere (s. 278) 1385

Fracture—

Of bone etc., is grievous hurt .. 1694

Fraud—

No definition of, in the Code or in English Law .. 270
Definition of, in the Contract Act, wider than in section 25 .. 270
Meaning of, as used in the Code and in Civil law .. 270
Deception is of the essence of fraud, but the two terms are not interchangeable .. 270
2 conceptions involved in .. 270
Has nothing to do with the wrongful gain or loss of property .. 270
Constructive, eliminated by the Code .. 270
Defraud, 3 meanings of .. 271
Proof of, in fraudulent concealment of property .. 1135, 1136
Question of, all in all in case of documents executed without authority .. 2435
Forgery with intent to commit, or that fraud may be committed .. 2461, 2462
See Forgery, Fraudulent Claim, Fraudulent Concealment, Fraudulent Decree.

PAGE

Fraudulent Claim—

To property to prevent its seizure (s. 207) .. 1137, 1138
Section supplementary to section 206 but not its counterpart .. 1139
What is a .. 1139
Transferee must be privy to fraud .. 1139
Transfer good and valid when for consideration and without notice though transferor prosecuted and punished .. 1139
Section compared with section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act .. 1139, 1140
Fraudulently suffering decree (s. 208) .. 1140
Dishonestly making a, in Court (s. 209) .. 1143
Section applies to a dishonest as well as a collusive plaintiff .. 1143
The claim may be to money or money's worth, title, status, etc. .. 1144
Object of making, may be, to benefit himself or harass the defendant or to defraud a third party .. 1143
Dishonestly making false claim .. 1144, 1145
Claim must be false .. 1144, 1145
Dismissal of claim does not make it false .. 1144
When is a claim said to be false .. 1145
Knowledge of falsity material .. 1145
Falsely verifying plaint .. 1145
Where a claim depends upon a question of law, Court should exercise discretion in sanctioning prosecution .. 1145
When offence is completed .. 1145, 1146
Court of Justice means Civil Court only and not a Criminal Court .. 1146
What intention necessary .. 1146
A knowingly false claim need not necessarily be dishonest or fraudulent .. 1146

See Fraudulent Decree.

Fraudulent Concealment—

Or removal of property to prevent siezure as forfeited or in execution (s. 206) .. 1131, 1132
Similar provisions in section 421-424 .. 1132

PAGE

Fraudulent Concealment—(concld.)

Sections 206-210 remain a dead letter owing to difficulties of application .. 1133
Meaning of "Removes, conceals, transfers or delivers" .. 1133
Fraudulent withdrawal of property .. 1134
Essentials of .. 1134
Transfer with and without consideration, Presumption in case of .. 1134
Transfer in anticipation of attachment not necessarily fraudulent and void under civil law not criminal under this section .. 1134
Fraudulent preference in insolvency .. 1134
S. 53 of the Transfer of Property Act how applicable under this section .. 1134
Benami transfer .. 1135
Benami inveterate in India and recognised by Courts .. 1135
Test whether a transaction is benami or otherwise .. 1135
Proof of Fraud .. 1135, 1136
Questions requiring consideration about a fraudulent transaction .. 1135-1136
Fraudulent disposition, question of, when arises .. 1136
Was transferor actuated by fear of sentence or execution or was transfer made to defeat them .. 1136
Object to prevent being taken in execution essential .. 1136
No fraud in a person removing his own property to avoid being mistaken for another's property liable for seizure .. 1137
Dishonest or fraudulent removal or concealment of property to prevent distribution among creditors (s. 421) .. 2269

See Fraudulent Decree, Fraudulent Deeds.

Fraudulent Decree—

Suffering a (s. 208) .. 1140
Object of a person who suffers a decree must be to defraud some one .. 1142
Object of fraud not necessary to be immediately accomplished .. 1142

PAGE

Fraudulent Decree—(concld.)

Meaning of "Causes or suffers" .. 1142
Fraudulent practice in vogue in Tanjore .. 1142
Presence of fraud essential .. 1142
Test whether decree was suffered fraudulently, not whether sum decreed was due .. 1142
Obtaining, for sum not due (s. 210) .. 1146
This section is the counterpart of section 208 .. 1147
Fraud in obtaining execution of decree .. 1148, 1149
Decree may be for a sum not due or for a sum larger than what was due .. 1148
Offence committed when a decree or order is passed or is executed .. 1148
Decree or order refers to that of a Civil Court only 1148
Fact of decree being set aside no evidence of fraud .. 1148-1149
Fact of decree was not set aside relevant to prove that there was no fraud though no bar to a prosecution .. 1149
Offence when complete .. 1149
Rule in respect of uncertified payments .. 1150

Fraudulent Deeds—

Offences re (ss. 421-424) .. 2268-2284
Topical Introduction .. 2268
Transfer of Property Act s. 53 and the Presidency and the Insolvency Acts declare nullity of deeds intended to defraud creditors .. 2268
Fraudulent transfer of property intended to defeat or delay creditors—Mode in which fraud may be perpetrated .. 2268, 2269
Other frauds perpetrated with the intervention of court .. 2269
Dishonest or fraudulent removal or concealment of property to prevent distribution among creditors (s. 421) .. 2269
Section relates to voluntary transfer inter vivos of property .. 2269

PAGE

Fraudulent Deeds—(contd.)

Property may be moveable or immoveable .. 2270
Transfer in fraud of creditors, what is .. 2270, 2271
Primary object of section .. 2270
Who are creditors .. 2271
Debt, what is .. 2271
Mental elements of criminality .. 2271, 2272
Section compared with provisions of civil law on the subject .. 2271
Fraud, Question of, Duties of civil and criminal courts in considering .. 2272
Removal, concealment or delivery, what is .. 2272
Transfer whether criminal or merely voidable, Question depends on quantum of consideration .. 2273
Benami transactions, if and when within the scope of criminal law .. 2273
Benami transaction by itself does not imply fraud .. 2273
Benami transactions common in India and is alike applicable to Hindus and Mahomedans .. 2273
Adequacy of consideration essential in determining the criminality of benami transactions .. 2273
Intention, Question of, to prevent satisfaction of claims of creditors, main question .. 2274
Dishonestly or fraudulently preventing debt being available for creditors (s. 422) .. 2274
Dishonest or fraudulent removal or concealment how distinguished .. 2275
Gist of the offence .. 2275
Dishonest prevention of payment of debt or demand .. 2275
Prevention in breach of contract or in assertion of a bona fide right not criminal .. 2275
"Prevention," is used in its widest sense .. 2276
No offence, illustrative case of .. 2277
Dishonest or fraudulent execution of deed of transfer containing false statement of consideration (s. 423) .. 2277

PAGE

Fraudulent Deeds—(concld.)

False recital of consideration or false statement of beneficiary, an offence if made fraudulently or dishonestly .. 2277
Benami when becomes fraudulent .. 2278
Fraudulently false recital of consideration .. 2278, 2279
Overstatement of consideration to defraud a preemptor fraudulent .. 2279
Offence depends on right of pre-emption existing in a third party .. 2279
Dishonest or fraudulent removal or concealment of property (s. 424) .. 2280
Section compared with sections 421 and 422 .. 2280
Penal provisions of the Madras Estate Land Act supplementary .. 2280
Fraudulent concealment or removal aimed at, not wanton destruction which is punishable as mischief .. 2281
Fraudulent concealment of property, what is .. 2281, 2282
Property removed may be of any kind .. 2282
Concealment in anticipation of attachment excepted .. 2282
Partner removing account books with intent to defraud his co-partners is guilty of this offence .. 2282

Fraudulently—

Definition of (s. 25) .. 269
Two essential elements to commission of crime in the definition of which the term occurs .. 269-270
"Intent to defraud," meaning of .. 270
Section does not define, but limits its sense for the purpose of the Code .. 270
What is "intent to defraud" .. 271
Dishonestly distinguished from, and examples illustrating distinction .. 271-272
Intent, Primary and Secondary .. 272, 273
Immaterial elements .. 273
Purpose intended need not have been achieved .. 273
General intention to defraud enough .. 273

Fraudulently—(concld.)

Inducement must be fraudulent or dishonest in cheating .. 2217, 2224
Meaning of .. 2217, 2218
Acts held to be not fraudulent .. 2222
Dishonestly and, terms used in cheating, if connote different meanings .. 2223
Fraudulent alteration in forgery .. 2436
Alterations not fraudulent .. 2437, 2438
With intent to defraud, meaning of, in the offence of forgery .. 2438, 2439
Meaning of, view taken in the Punjab .. 2439
Fraudulent but not dishonest .. 2440, 2447
False document must be made dishonestly or .. 2443
Act intended to screen past dishonesty or fraud if .. 2444, 2445

Fraudulent Transfer

See Fraudulent Deeds.

Free Consent—

Consent given under fear or misconception not (s. 90) .. 587
No, by insane or intoxicated person .. 587
No, by child .. 587
What is consent .. 587
Consent under misconception .. 587-588
Cases of no, given by women under misconception or assumption of facts .. 588
What misconception vitiates .. 587, 588
Misconception need not have been brought about by the accused .. 588
Accused must know that consent is given under a misconception .. 588-589
Consciousness necessary for .. 589
Mere submission is not .. 589
Merely taking risk is not .. 589
In unlawful pursuits .. 590
Unintelligent consent is not .. 591
In some cases only express consent is .. 591
Evidence of .. 591
See Consent.

PAGE

G

Games—

Unlawful .. 574
Harm caused in, whether or not justifiable, lawfulness sole test, not consent .. 573
Lawfulness of, does not depend on popularity or antiquity but on risk of life and limb .. 574

Gambling—

In a public place is a nuisance (s. 294-A) .. 1443
Distinguished from lottery .. 1445
Gambling by itself is no offence under the Code .. 1451

Gang—

Punishment for belonging to a, of dacoits (s. 400) .. 2070, 2071
Of dacoits, belonging to a, What is meant by .. 2072
Meaning of .. 2074
Joining a, of dacoits, Punishment for .. 2074
Punishable independently of any offence .. 2074
Of dacoits, What is a .. 2074
Must habitually commit dacoity .. 2075, 2076
Women living as wives and mistresses of dacoits do not, by merely living so, belong to the .. 2074, 2075
Habitual association, What is .. 2075, 2076
Association implies community of intention and purpose .. 2076
Sentence, apportioning of, points to be considered in .. 2078
Belonging to a, of thieves, Punishment for (s. 401) .. 2078
Joining a, of thieves of robbers, what is .. 2080
Habitual commission of theft or robbery necessary .. 2079-2083
Habitual commission of theft or robbery, cases illustrative of .. 2079-2083

General Exceptions —

Chapter on, controls the entire Code .. 214
To liability, Ch. IV (ss. 76-106) .. 415-656

PAGE

General Exceptions—(concld.)

Topical introduction .. 414
Object of the chapter explained .. 414
Analysis of chapter re .. 414
Absence of criminal intent, chief ingredient in, except where harm is very slight .. 414

See Arrest, Judge, Mistake, Private Defence.

General Warrant—

What is a .. 625
Illegal .. 625, 626
For search also illegal .. 626, 627

Gift—

Taking illegal gift to screen an offender (s. 213) .. 1189
Offering, in consideration of screening offender (s. 214) .. 1183, 1184
Taking, to help to recover stolen property (s. 215) 1190
Taking money to restore stolen property .. 1192-1193

See Bribery.

Good Faith—

Definition of (s. 52) .. 324
Term in other enactments 324, 325
What is .. 324, 325
Defined by exclusion .. 325
Question of, is always a question of fact .. 325
Requires "care and attention" as all in all .. 325
Different standpoints in the definitions of, in the Code and in the General Clauses Act .. 325
Care must be with "due care" .. 325
Honest blunderer how far acts in good faith .. 325
Honest conclusions, how effect the question of good faith .. 325
Due care and attention, what is the standard of .. 325
"Due care," meaning of, and what is .. 326
Care must be proportionate to the risk .. 326
How may be proved .. 326
Want of, how may be proved .. 326
Belief necessary to constitute must be reasonable .. 327

Good Faith—(concld.)	Page
Acting with thoughtless precipitancy is not ..	327
Mistake without, insufficient for exemption from liability ..	424, 425
Reasonable belief in jurisdiction essential to protect Judge's judicial acts ..	439
Presence of, is the touchstone of judicial liability with reference to jurisdiction ..	440
In ministerial acts ..	444-448
—Good faith and belief in the legality of the order essential for exemption from liability ..	444
—Good faith essential to protect acts without jurisdiction ..	447
—Existence of, determined by the nature of the act as well as by the position and education of the person acting ..	447-448
In acts believed justifiable by law (s. 79) ..	448
Act not intended to cause death done by consent in, for person's benefit (s. 88) ..	576
Essential in acts done by ..	579
What is ..	580
Does not necessarily include special skill and knowledge ..	580
True test of ..	580, 581
Surgical operations etc., by quacks ..	581
Degree of care in such cases ..	582
Evidence of qualified men ..	582, 583
Degree of care and attention varies with education ..	582
Principle applicable equally to attorney and persons requisitioned for assistance ..	583
Act in, by consent of guardian (s. 89) ..	583
Act done in, for the benefit of person without consent (s. 92) ..	593
Communication made in (s. 93) ..	596
Essentials of ..	596
Meaning of benefit ..	596
Absence of, Presumption as to, where public servant does illegal act ..	1751
How far a defence in kidnapping ..	1848, 1849

Government—	Page
Legislative powers of the Indian ..	179, 180
Legislative powers of Indian, re extraterritorial offences ..	184, 185
Legislative power of Indian, Limits of ..	196, 198
Definition of (s. 17) ..	223
Local, meaning of ..	223
Meaning of, in ss. 255-263, re-Government stamps ..	223
Government of India—
Definition of (s. 16) ..	222
Powers of ..	452, 460
What is ..	452
Sources from which such powers were derived ..	452
Can transmit such powers to Local Govts. ..	452
Its amenability to Civil Court ..	453
When not amenable ..	453
Who are ..	460
Priority of Crown debts ..	460
Prerogative of pardon ..	460
Executive acts of, which are acts of State ..	460
Party aggrieved not without remedy ..	460
Illegal or unauthorised acts ..	461, 462
Acts of, when subject to Municipal Law ..	462, 463
Illustrative cases ..	462, 463
Liability for encroachment upon one's right ..	463
Liability of, for acts of its servants ..	464
No liability if act was within the scope of duty ..	464
No liability if act done in excess is ratified by ..	464
Liability when presumed ..	465
Jurisdiction of civil Court ..	465, 466
Liability for Crown contracts ..	466
Liability for torts ..	467
Liability on contracts ..	468
Contract not to dismiss a servant of the Crown if can be enforced ..	469
Crown equally liable for breach of contract whether by act or omission ..	469
Crown cannot acquire new rights over its subject by entering into a treaty with foreign power ..	469
Liability for damages ..	469
Viceroy's liability ..	471, 472
Limited authority of ..	472, 473

PAGE

Government of India—(concld.)

Criminal liability of 473
Its conflict with Supreme Court .. 473, 474
Suspension of civil Law .. 474, 475
3 points of view of exemption from criminal prosecution .. 474
Limits of the prerogative of the Crown .. 475, 476
When Martial Law justifiable .. 476

Governors—

Exemption of, from the Code 171

Grievous Hurt–

Medical witness, Questions to a, in case of .. 1589, 1593
Definition of (s. 320) .. 1694
Definition of, suggested by art. 309 of the French Penal Code .. 1695
Not a distinct offence in English Law .. 1695
And hurt distinguished .. 1695
Clauses of the section not mutually exclusive or exhaustive .. 1695
Emasculation is .. 1696
Emasculation, what is and how caused .. 1696
One who emasculates himself not liable for causing, to himself .. 1696
Injury to eyesight is .. 1696
Injury must cause permanent privation of sight of either eye .. 1696
Causing deafness is .. 1696
Deafness how caused .. 1697
Loss of limb is .. 1697
Injury by loss of limb or imparing of limb same as offence of Mayhem in English Law .. 1697
"Member," "Joint," meaning of the terms .. 1697
Imparing of limb is .. 1697
Permanent disfiguration of the head or face .. 1698
"Disfigure" distinguished from "Disable" .. 1698
Fracture or dislocation of a bone or tooth is .. 1698
Such fracture or dislocation need not disable permanently for bones may join or be set .. 1698
Other dangerous injuries classed as .. 1698

PAGE

Grievous Hurt—(contd.)

Other injuries classed as, Test of, disability for twenty days .. 1698
Unsatisfactory nature of the proposed criterion .. 1699
Test of grievousness .. 1699
Voluntarily causing (s. 322) .. 1701
Both result and intention necessary .. 1702
Intention or knowledge to cause, how proved .. 1702
Voluntarily causing, punishment for (s. 325) .. 1718
Section deals with unaggravated and unmitigated .. 1718
Procedure of Magistrate where death follows as the result of .. 1719
Classifying injury as grievous or simple not the duty of the medical man .. 1719
Bare certificate of the medical man no evidence .. 1719
Midway between hurt and culpable homicide .. 1720
Not necessary that, should have been caused to endanger life .. 1720
Measure of crime .. 1721
Intention and knowledge first essentials of .. 1722
Test of not whether hurt was grievous but whether specific hurt voluntarily inflicted fell within any of the kinds .. 1722
Murder, Homicide and, how they are interconnected .. 1722
Rioting and .. 1722
Measure of punishment for .. 1722, 1723
Voluntarily causing, by dangerous weapons or means (s. 326) .. 1723
Procedure of Magistrates in such cases .. 1723
Use of lethal weapons .. 1724, 1725
Gravity of, almost the same as culpable homicide .. 1724
Elements essential to offence .. 1724, 1725
Cases of nose-cutting of women for unchastity .. 1725
Use of poisons .. 1726
Voluntarily causing, to extort property or to constrain to an illegal act (s. 329) .. 1736
Elements of the offence the same as in the corresponding case of hurt under section 327 .. 1736

PAGE

Grievous Hurt—(contd.)

Voluntarily causing, to extort confession or to compel restoration of property (s. 331) .. 1742-1743
Elements of the offence the same as in the corresponding case of hurt under section 330 .. 1743
Causing of, to extort promise to restore women does not come under the section as it has no reference to property .. 1743
Voluntarily causing, to deter public servant from his duty (s. 333) .. 1755
Elements of the offence the same as in the corresponding case of hurt under section 332 .. 1755
Voluntarily causing, on provocation (s. 335) .. 1757-1758
Nature of weapon used immaterial under the section .. 1758
Elements of offence same as in the corresponding case of hurt under section 334 .. 1759
Causing, by act endangering life or personal safety of others (s. 338) .. 1766
Causing, by criminal negligence .. 1766
Contributory negligence how far allowed to rebut criminal liability .. 1766, 1767
Culpable rashness or negligence not confined to acts specified in Chapter XIV .. 1767
Criminal negligence in surgical operations .. 1768
Kidnapping or abducting in order to subject person to, slavery or unnatural offence (s. 367) .. 1874
Extortion by putting person in fear of death or of (s. 386) .. 2026
Putting person in fear of death or, in order to commit extortion (s. 387) .. 2027
Robbery or dacoity with attempt to cause death or (s. 397) .. 2063
Caused while committing lurking house trespass or house breaking (s. 459) .. 2414

PAGE

Grievous Hurt—(concld.)

Constructive criminal liability of lurkers and housebreakers for, or homicide committed by confederate (s. 460) .. 2417

Guardian—

Kidnapping from lawful (s. 361) 1834
Distinction between legal guardian and a lawful guardian 1835
Lawful guardian, what the term includes .. 1835
Kidnapping must be from lawful .. 1841
Section 316 has no application to the taking of children without any .. 1841-1847
Who are, of minor and lunatic .. 1841-1844
(1) Under Hindu Law .. 1841
(2) Under Mahomedan Law .. 1842-1843
Different set of, for different purposes .. 1842-1843
(3) Under other laws .. 1843-1844
May be de facto, though not de jure .. 1844
May be appointed by will or by the civil Court .. 1844
Guardianship a trust divisible by delegation .. 1845
"Out of the keeping of the lawful guardian," meaning of .. 1845

H

Habeas Corpus—

Writ of, when issued in case of wrongful Confinement 1791, 1792
Confinement after issue of 1795
Wrongful Confinement in contempt of the writ of .. 1796
Knowledge of the issue of the writ essential .. 1796
Writ must have been duly issued .. 1797

Handwriting Expert—

Who are .. 2467
Evidence of, to detect forgery .. 2467
Value of such evidence .. 2468
Caution to be exercised in accepting such evidence .. 2468
Uncorroborated testimony of a, Conviction of a person on the .. 2468
Leading rules for the detection of forgery .. 2468-2471

PAGE

Handwriting Expert—(concld.)

Individuality of handwriting of every person, the basis of the science and the vindication of .. 2468

Harbouring—

Prisoner of war or State prisoner (s. 130) .. 797
Deserter (s. 136) .. 809
Gist of the offence of, deserter .. 810
Wife of deserter excluded .. 810
Knowledge or belief that he was a deserter necessary for .. 810
Persons hired for an unlawful assembly (s. 157) .. 879
Harbours, meaning of .. 880
What harbouring prohibited .. 880, 881
Harbouring offender (s. 212) 1175
Essentials for the commission of, offenders .. 1177
—(1) Commission of an offence .. 1178
—(2) Accused must harbour 1178, 1179
—(3) Accused must have knowledge of the offender 1179
—(4) Intention to screen .. 1179, 1180
Husband or wife excepted .. 1180
Principle of criminal responsibility for the offence of, what is .. 1177
Taking gift to screen an offender from punishment (s. 213) .. 1180
Compounding an offence .. 1183
Offering gift etc. to screen an offender (s. 214) .. 1183, 1184
What mental elements necessary to constitute the offence .. 1185
Accused's liability for illegal compromise .. 1187, 1188
Any giver liable .. 1188
Motive material .. 1189
Offender escaped from custody (s. 216) .. 1194, 1195
Harbours, meaning of .. 1197
Harbouring an escaped offender, what is .. 1197, 1198
Escape during 3 stages of his prosecution .. 1198
In the case when the arrest is illegal .. 1199
Robbers and dacoits (s. 216-A) .. 1199
Essentials of the offence .. 1201
Robbers, what is .. 1200, 1201
Definition of "Harbour" in sections 212, 216 and 216-A (216-B) .. 1202

PAGE

Harbouring—(concld.)

Definition of "Harbour" in English Law .. 1202
"In any way," meaning of .. 1202

Harm—

Extent of justifiable, to .. 575, 576
Act causing slight (s. 95) .. 601
What is slight harm .. 602
Meaning of .. 602
Negligible wrongs .. 603
A relative term .. 603
Instances of slight .. 603, 604
Where special protection required .. 604, 605
Caused by defamatory or insulting words .. 605, 606
Applicable to all slight injuries .. 606
Cheating when too remote to constitute .. 2236

High Courts—

European British subjects Over, Jurisdiction of .. 202
Ordinary Jurisdiction of .. 202
Exterritorial Jurisdiction of 203, 204
Admiralty Jurisdiction of .. 205
Powers of, by virtue of the Common Law of England specially in case of contempt of Court .. 211, 212

High Seas—

Offences on the .. 173, 174
Exterritorial Jurisdiction .. 201, 202
Offences committed on, jurisdiction re .. 205
Country and, Line of demarcation between .. 206
Definition of, for purposes of jurisdiction .. 206

Highway—

Endangering a .. 403
What is a .. 1403
Examples of public nuisance on the .. 403, 405

Hire-purchase—

Breach of .. 2140

Homicide—

Culpable, Definition of (s. 299) .. 1490
Distinguished from English law .. 1491
English limitation as to causation not adopted in Code .. 1492

	PAGE
Homicide—(contd.)
Excusable ..	1493
What is culpable ..	1492
Justifiable ..	1493
Culpable, Elements necessary	1493
By mistake, Liability for ..	1572
Causing death by negligence (s. 304-A) ..	1612
Treated as man slaughter in English Law ..	1612
Three classes of homicide punished under the Code	1614
History of section 304-A ..	1613
Section distinguished from culpable homicide and murder ..	1614
Causing death by rash or negligent act, What is ..	1615
Rash or negligent act, What is a ..	1615
Culpable rashness and culpable negligence, distinction between ..	1615
Resulting in death ..	1615
Direct violence to the deceased excepted ..	1616, 1617
Violence with accidental death ..	1616
Absence of intention and knowledge of consequence essential ..	1617, 1618
Rash or negligent act must cause death ..	1618
Meaning of causes ..	1618
Cause must be causa causans, not merely causa sine qua non ..	1618
Only gross negligence culpable ..	1619
What is gross negligence ..	1619
Cases illustrated ..	1619
Contributory negligence, no excuse ..	1619
Death by coercion or fraud	1620, 1621
Rashness and negligence become culpable by association ..	1622
Negligence in lawful and unlawful acts, difference between ..	1622
Care in shooting and driving	1622
Negligent use of public way	1623
Case for special care ..	1623
Intention and knowledge no part of the crime of offence under s. 304-A ..	1624
Lawful acts improperly done	1624, 1625
Killing by improper medicine or surgery ..	1625
Death by love potion or charm ..	1626
Negligence only criminal if diligence would have saved	1626, 1627

	PAGE
Homicide—(concld.)
Negligence by illegal omission. ..	1627
Liability not conclusive in all cases of illegal omissions resulting in death ..	1628
Killing by accident ..	1628
Where consequence too remote. ..	1628, 1629
Negligence must have materially contributed to the death ..	1629
What law regards as such ..	1629, 1630
Where cause is too remote, cases of ..	1630, 1631
Where consequence too remote negligence negligible	1630, 1631
Contributory negligence why relevant ..	1632
Contributory negligence how far irrelevant ..	1633, 1634
Act done with intent to prevent child being born alive, or to cause it to die after birth (s. 315) ..	1673
By abandonment (s. 317) ..	1676
Persons who ordinarily commit the crime ..	1676
What amounts to abandonment ..	1678
Persons liable ..	1679
Inapplicable to a nurse or ayah ..	1678
Intention must be to abandon ..	1680, 1681
Exposure without protection sufficient ..	1682
Exposure, meaning of ..	1681
Actual harm immaterial ..	1682
Death in consequence of, Liability for ..	1683, 1684
See Abandonment, Culpable homicide.
House-breaking—
Definition of (s. 445) ..	2375
A term of English law having the same sense as in the section ..	2377
What is ..	2377
Implies a forcible entry into a house ..	2377
Meaning of the legal phrase "to break a house" ..	2377
Two main sub-heads in the method of ..	2377
House-trespasser and house-breaker, Difference between ..	2377, 2378
Lurker and house-breaker, Difference between ..	2378
Different modes of, considered ..	2378

House-breaking—(contd.) PAGE

Clause (1) relates to actual breaking .. 2378
Actual breaking, what is .. 2378
Clause (2) refers to entry effected through passages not intended for human ingress and egress .. 2379
Clauses (4) and (6) refer to entry or exit by opening any lock or by unfastening any fastened passages .. 2379
Removal of a tatti placed against the door of a hut included under clause (6) 2379
Clause (5) deals with the case of constructive breaking .. 2380
English law on the subject of clause (5) .. 2380
Clause (6) deals with causing door to be opened by an accomplice from within .. 2380
Opening by servant if .. 2380
Servant opening the door intending to entrap the offender, no .. 2380
Accused entering by pushing door which happened to be unfastened would not amount to .. 2380
What entry is essential .. 2380
House, what is included in .. 2381
House compared with building .. 2381
English Law on the subject 2381
Out-houses included in "House" .. 2381
By night, Definition of (s. 446) .. 2382
English Law of burglary, Definition of .. 2382
Sunset and sunrise how proved .. 2382
Punishment for (s. 453) .. 2398
Proof of .. 2399, 2400
Accused guilty of this offence whether either his entry or exit was so made .. 2400
To commit offence punishable with imprisonment (s. 454) .. 2400
Such offence need not be by the trespasser himself .. 2401
Actual commission of offence not necessary .. 2402
Evidence of specific intent .. 2402
Poverty or previous conviction of the accused relevant .. 2402
House breaking or lurking, Evidence of .. 2403
After preparation for hurt, assault or wrongful restraint (s. 455) .. 2403
By night (s. 456) .. 2404
By night in order to commit offence punishable with imprisonment (s. 457) .. 2408
Intention can be proved by proof of circumstances justifying such inference 2409
Under English law specification of intent is part of the indictment and any variance between the intention alleged and proved is fatal to the trial .. 2409
Indian Law, Charge need not be so precise as in English Law .. 2410
Circumstances proving intention .. 2410
To commit adultery .. 2411
To establish title .. 2412
Not guilty, cases of .. 2412
By night after preparation for hurt, assault or wrongful restraint (s. 458) .. 2413
Proof of the offence .. 2414
Among the accused those only who were armed are punishable .. 2414
Grievous hurt caused while committing (s. 459) .. 2414
Strict construction of section, Necessity of .. 2415
Proof of the offence .. 2416
Offence could only be committed at that stage after his entry and before his departure .. 2416
No right of private defence to person causing grievous hurt while committing .. 2417
Constructive criminal liability of all house-breakers by night for the collateral offence of grievous hurt or homicide committed by confederate (s. 460) .. 2417
Conditions of such liability .. 2418
Criminal liability, improper extension of, safeguarded by the section .. 2418
(1) Actual offender must be guilty .. 2419
(2) Injury must be caused at the time .. 2419
(3) All persons jointly concerned are liable .. 2419
"Jointly concerned," meaning of .. 2419, 2420
(4) Liability of actual offender .. 2420

House-breaking—(concld.) PAGE

PAGE

House-trespass—

Definition of (s. 442) .. 2367
Element of aggravation is the sanctity of one's house .. 2367
What is .. 2367, 2368
Essential element, there must be entry in a building, tent or vessel used as human dwelling or building used as place of worship or place for the custody of property .. 2368
What is a building .. 2368
What is a tent .. 2369
What is a sufficient entry .. 2369-2370
Introduction of any part of the trespasser's body held to be sufficient .. 2369
Entry if sufficient must be illegal .. 2370
Remaining unlawful although entry may be legal .. 2370
Criminal intent necessary .. 2370-2371
Such intent must have preceded the entry or unlawful stay .. 2370
Such intent need not be with reference to the person in possession of house or owner thereof .. 2371
Entry into property in the possession of another during his absence when .. 2371
Punishment for (s. 448) .. 2388
English Law as to .. 2388
Evidence, Nature of, requisite for .. 2389
Entry in spite of protest, if criminal intent can be inferred from .. 2389
Tents and vessels not used as human dwellings excluded from this offence .. 2390
Building no longer used for residence would not come under this section .. 2390
Refreshment tent put up for a temporary purpose not a human dwelling .. 2390
To commit offence punishable with death (s. 449) .. 2390
To commit capital offence .. 2391
To commit offence punishable with transportation for life (s. 450) .. 2392
To commit offence punishable with imprisonment (s. 451) .. 2392
If criminal intent could be presumed from the unusual hour and disguise of the accused .. 2393

PAGE

House-trespass—(concld.)

After preparation for hurt, assault or wrongful restraint (s. 452) .. 2394
To commit offence punishable with imprisonment, and section 452, Difference between .. 2396
Entry made after preparation to cause hurt etc., and unlawfully remaining in house after such preparation, Distinction between .. 2396
Person who was always welcome may enter the house but no right to enter for committing an offence .. 2397
Evidence of preparation .. 2397
Preparation not to be assumed from empty threats of bravado commonly used .. 2397
No presumption from mere assault .. 2397
Where preparation is not for causing hurt .. 2398

Human Body—

Offences affecting, Chapter XVI (ss. 299-377) .. 1490-1938

Human Life—

Offences affecting (ss. 299-318) .. 1490-1690
Topical Introduction .. 1489, 1490
See Culpable Homicide, Homicide, Murder.

Hurt—

Definition of (s. 319) .. 1690
Assault and, Difference between .. 1690
Assault and battery English Law—Difference between .. 1691
Infirmity, meaning of .. 1691
Disease, meaning of .. 1691
Composition of .. 1691
(1) Causing bodily pain .. 1692
(2) Causing of disease .. 1692, 1693
English Law as to causing disease .. 1692
Causing disease by sexual intercourse if comes under the section .. 1693
(3) Causing of infirmity .. 1693
When, is grievous (s. 320) .. 1694-1700
Voluntarily causing (s. 321) 1700
Section 321 compared with section 299 .. 1700, 1701
"Any person," significance of the phrase, in the section .. 1701

Hurt—(contd.)	PAGE
Voluntarily causing, Punishment for (s. 323) ..	1702
This section provides punishment for ordinary cases only and not where there is special aggravation or deviation of offence ..	1703
Action personal on, abating on the death of the offender ..	1704
Necessary elements how proved ..	1707, 1708
What is voluntary hurt ..	1706
Intention or knowledge material ..	1708
Intention or knowledge, Presence of circumstances on which depends ..	1709, 1710
Rioting and ..	1710, 1711
Measure of punishment ..	1712
Considerations affecting the measure of punishment ..	1712
Voluntarily causing, by dangerous weapon or means (s. 324) ..	1712
Reasons for the enhanced penalty ..	1713
Section 323 compared with section 324 ..	1714
Facts necessary to prove offence under section 324 ..	1715
The instrument used may be one generally used for peaceful occupations, as a crowbar or hammer ..	1715
If an ordinary stick or walking stick comes under the section ..	1715
By fire or heated substance ..	1716
Branding of one to exorcise evil spirit, not excusable ..	1716
By noxious thing ..	1716, 1717
By corrosives ..	1717
By agency of an animal ..	1718
Voluntarily causing, to extort property or to constrain to an illegal act (s. 327)	1726
To extort or constrain to an illegal act, What is ..	1727, 1728
Acts punishable under section 327 ..	1727, 1728
Section applicable to robbers, dacoits and Thugs ..	1727
Exception where, is caused in assertion of a claim to property ..	1728
Person "interested," significance of the phrase ..	1728

Hurt—(contd.)	PAGE
Caused to constrain another to do anything illegal or which may facilitate the commission of an offence ..	1728, 1729
Section contemplates offence intended but not already committed ..	1729
Causing, by means of poison etc., with intent to commit an offence (s. 328) ..	1729
This section compared with section 324 ..	1729
English Law on the point ..	1730
Meaning of "administers" or "causes to be taken" ..	1731
Elements necessary to constitute the offence ..	1731
What is "Caused to be taken" ..	1732
Swallowing necessary .	1732, 1733
Cases of causing miscarriage ..	1733
Liability for indirect act ..	1733
Question by whom the poison was given not material when accused was instrumental in getting it ..	1733
Intention or knowledge necessary ..	1733, 1734
Case of administering medicine to find out the thief ..	1734
Aggravated acts ..	1734, 1735
Degree of Criminality, Measure of, in case of ..	1735
Evidence of quantity and effect of poison administered necessary ..	1735
Voluntarily causing, to extort confession or to compel restoration of property (s. 330) ..	1736, 1737
This section compared with section 327 ..	1737
Torture, English law as to, and History of ..	1737
Section manifestly directed against police and other officers ..	1739
Hurt (1) for discovery of facts or property or (2) to satisfy any claim or demand ..	1740
(1) Discovery of facts or property ..	1740
Intention negativing homicide ..	1740
(2) Satisfaction of any claim or demand ..	1742
'Claim' 'demand' meaning of ..	1742

PAGE

Hurt—(contd.)

Claim or demand need not be an illegal one .. 1742
Voluntarily causing, to deter public servant from his duty (s. 332) .. 1743, 1744
Section 332 compared with section 353 .. 1744
Other provisions dealing with offences against public servants .. 1745
Criminal assault or, to public servants .. 1746
Protection of public servant confined to lawful duty .. 1746, 1747
"In the discharge of his duty," meaning of .. 1746
Case of execution of a warrant .. 1747
Qualified protection when act illegal .. 1748
Conflict of views of various High Courts .. 1749, 1750
Good faith, Absence of, when presumed .. 1751
Acts flagrantly illegal .. 1752, 1753
Propositions of law affording a good working rule .. 1753, 1754
Intent to prevent or deter necessary .. 1754
Assault in consequence of Legal Act .. 1754, 1755
Assault directed towards one public servant intended to deter another public servant .. 1755
Voluntarily causing, on provocation (s. 334) .. 1756
Section compared with sections 323 and 324 .. 1756
Section subject to all the provisos of exception I to section 300 .. 1756
Provocation must be grave and sudden .. 1757
Causing by act endangering life or personal safety of others (s. 337) .. 1763
Act without intention or knowledge of likelihood punished .. 1764
Criminal rashness or negligence, view of the Code about .. 1764, 1765
Design to cause or expectation of, not necessary .. 1764
Theft after preparation made for causing death, or restraint (s. 382) .. 2006-2007
Caused in robbery, Nature of .. 2036-2038

PAGE

Hurt—(concld.)

Feor of instant, or restraint .. 2039
Voluntarily causing, in committing robbery (s. 394) .. 2051
Mischief committed after preparation made for causing death or hurt or wrongful restraint (s. 440) 2339
House-trespass after preparation for assault or wrongful restraint (s. 452) .. 2394
Lurking house-trespass or house-breaking after preparation for assault or wrongful restraint (s. 455) .. 2403
Lurking house-trespass or house-breaking by night after preparation for, assault or wrongful restraint (s. 458) .. 2413

See Grievous Hurt.

I

Ignorance of law—

No excuse (s. 79) .. 448

Illegal—

Definition of (s. 43) .. 315
Unlawful and, distinction between .. 315, 1903
Denotes a thing prohibited by law 315, 316 1904
Void and illegal, Distinguished .. 316
Unlawful acts not necessarily illegal .. 316, 317

Illegal Contract—

Definition of, in Contract Act .. 316
Void Contract, Distinguished from .. 316

Illegal gift—

Taking, to screen an offender (s. 213) .. 1180
Offering in consideration of screening an offender (s. 214) .. 1183, 1184
Taking, to help to recover stolen property (s. 215) .. 1190
Taking money to restore stolen property .. 1192, 1193
Legal reward, acceptance of, not penalized .. 1194

PAGE

Illegal Gratification—

See Bribery.

Illegal Omissions—

Same effect as acts done (s. 32) .. 286
What are .. 287
Neglect when so .. 288
Omission, The word, denotes single as well as a series of omissions (s. 33) .. 288
Effect caused partly by, and partly by an act construed an offence (s. 36) .. 301
When constitutes abetment .. 675, 676
Intentional aid by non-interference .. 675
To prevent offence and illegal concealment of offence, Definition of (s. 171-H) .. 942, 943
To produce document before public servant (s. 175) .. 960
To give notice or information to public servant (s. 176) .. 963
Cases which do not amount to .. 966
To assist public servant when bound by law (s. 187) .. 1015, 1016
To assist, when criminal .. 1018
Provisions of other law conferring legal obligation .. 1018, 1019
Intentional omission essential 1019
Section applies only to direct refusal and not to mere negligence to perform a lawful duty .. 1019
Person bound to assist may or may not be a public servant .. 1019
To obey order of a public servant (s. 188) .. 1020
What orders included .. 1021, 1022
Order does not include decree or order of a civil Court .. 1024
Order must be legal .. 1024, 1025
To give information of offence by person bound to inform (s. 202) .. 1120
Persons bound to inform .. 1120
Person must be legally bound .. 1121
Person bound must have knowledge or belief in the commission of an offence .. 1122
Criminal omission to inform .. 1121, 1122
The giving of even a little information is enough to exonerate .. 1122
To apprehend by public servant (s. 221) .. 1217

PAGE

Illegal Omissions—(concld.)

3 degrees of criminality contemplated aiding, suffering or omitting to apprehend or escape .. 1219
Legal obligation to apprehend or confine necessary .. 1219
To apprehend by public servant bound to apprehend (s. 222) .. 1220
To apprehend or sufference of escape by public servant in cases not otherwise provided for (s. 225-A) .. 1238
Causing death by .. 1503
Negligence by .. 1627
When amounts to mischief .. 2288

Illegal Payments—

With reference to elections, Deznition of (s. 171-H) .. 942, 943
Under English Law .. 943
Object of the Legislature twofold .. 943

Illegal Purchase—

Or bid of property offered for sale by public servant (s. 185) .. 1003
Benami-bidders of public servants come within the rule .. 1004
Those who bid with no intention to purchase and those who bid in spite of law—aimed at .. 1005
Persons liable for .. 1005
Effect of .. 1005

Illustration—

Value of, in the construction of statutes .. 159

Imprisonment—

See Punishment.

Indian Converts—

See Bigamy.

Indian Princes—

Exemption of, from the operations of the Code .. 171, 172

Indian Troops—

How far subject to provisions of the Code .. 190

PAGE

Infanticide—

Medical witness, Questions to a, in case of .. 1586

Infectious Disease—

See Public Nuisance.

Infirmity—

Meaning of 1691, 1693
Causing, when amounts hurt 1693, 1694

Injury—

Definition of (s. 44) .. 317
Illegality of the harm is the gist .. 317
Actionable wrong necessary for .. 317
Does not possess all the attributes of actionable wrong .. 317
What, implies in civil law .. 317, 318
If, includes risk of harm .. 317, 318
If, is large enough to cover a case of loss suffered by a wife by the death of her husband .. 318
Instances of popular but not legal .. 318
Actual, immaterial in sedition .. 757
Meaning of .. 1413
Personal, and offences re. personal liberty, Distinction between .. 1489
Personal injuries, classification of .. 1489
Accelerating death is culpable homicide .. 1499
Is grievous hurt, if disability continues for twenty days .. 1695, 1698
One of the essentials to constitute mischief .. 2297

See Criminal Intimidation, Grievous Hurt, Hurt.

Insane Person—

Suicide by an, Abetment of (s. 305) .. 1635

See Insanity, Kidnapping.

Insanity—

Act of a person of unsound mind (s. 84) .. 523
Section too narrow and out of date .. 524

PAGE

Insanity—(contd.)

Reason for exemption of, from criminal responsibility .. 524, 525
Provision made for detention only of insane person, such detention is not his sentence .. 524
Proof of, is on the defence .. 524, 553
May be temporary or permanant or due to any cause .. 525
Court may consider the plea if the materials sufficient on the record .. 525
Mental state of the accused at the time of the offence only relevant .. 525
"Unsoundness of mind", What is .. 526
Stage at which law interferes with an insane person .. 525
Varies in its degree as well as in its character .. 526
4 kinds of insane persons .. 527
Difficult to define the invisible line that divides perfect and partial .. 527
Different degrees of .. 527
In Science and in Law .. 527, 528
Two tests prescribed by the Code to render a man irresponsible for his acts .. 528
English Law followed .. 528
Mental delusions .. 529
Fits of .. 527
Run amuck .. 530
And Homicidal mania .. 530
Sympathetic affection .. 530
Three classes of homicidal mania described .. 531
Murder with no known motive, insufficient to justify exclupation .. 531
Partial delusions .. 532
Impulsive insanity, what is .. 533
Puerperal mania, a recognized malady .. 533
Different forms of impulsive, described .. 533
Dipsomania or Drunkenness .. 534
Drunkenness when a sufficient defence .. 534
Somnambulism .. 535
As a defence to criminality .. 535, 536
A medico-legal question .. 536
As a defence does not present such difficulties in England as in India on account of the jury system .. 536

Insanity—(concld.) PAGE

Physical changes in deranged mind .. 536, 537
Not possible of observation through the senses .. 537
Evidence of .. 537, 538
Family antecedents, evidence of .. 537, 538
Affecting the cognitive faculties .. 538
Affecting the emotions and the will whether exempted from liability ..
Medical and legal standpoints, Difference between .. 540
Judges on insanity .. 542, 543
Proper questions to medical men .. 544
View of Maule, J., on .. 544, 545
Irresponsibility must be at the time of doing the act 547
Method adopted in such inquiry .. 547
Pleading and proof of .. 547
Rule that plea of insanity must be taken and proved by the defence not generally enforced by the courts .. 547
Testimony of specialists only in mental diseases to be taken .. 548
Examination of medical witness .. 548, 549
Questions to medical witness .. 549, 550
Test to feigned .. 550, 551
Other evidence of .. 551, 552
Drunkenness same as temporary ..
Obtaining signature of a person while in a state of, when Forgery .. 2441, 2442

See Drunkenness.

Instigation—

See Abetment.

Insult—

Intentional, with intent to provoke a breach of the peace (s. 504) .. 2777
This offence arises out of the offence of defamation .. 2778
Earlier Law .. 2778
Act punishable under this section does not necessarily constitute an actionable wrong .. 2778
An offence against the public tranquillity .. 2779

Insult—(concld.) PAGE

Gist of the offence is the use of an expression tending to the breach of peace .. 2778
The ten exceptions to section 499 no justification for using insulting expression .. 2779
Insult must be intended .. 2779
What is an .. 2780
Insult may be by acts, signs or visible representations 2780
Making faces or making indecent gestures before females is .. 2780
Intention all in all—How proved .. 2780
Conduct of missionary preachers is a case in point .. 2780
Insult must give provocation .. 2781
The attitude of the person insulted is immaterial .. 2781
Though breach of peace be unlikely .. 2781
Forbearance of the person insulted is insufficient to protect accused .. 2781
Venial offence .. 2781, 2782
Mere rudeness no insult .. 2782
One person may be insulted through another .. 2782
Privileged occasion .. 2782
Word, gesture or act intended to, the modesty of a woman (s. 509) .. 2795
Section intended to punish offences not coming under 294 or s. 354 .. 2796
Singing obscene songs or exposing oneself come under this section .. 2796
To female modesty, what constitutes .. 2797
Such, was unobserved by others or other females did not mind it, no defence .. 2797
Defence of custom at certain festivals .. 2797
Intrusion upon privacy .. 2797, 2798
An intention to, when may be presumed .. 2798

Intention—

Intent, Etymological meaning of .. 262
Test to discover .. 262
Proof of .. 264
Res ipsa loquiter principle of .. 264
Presence or absence of, is the crux in all offences where dishonesty is an element .. 265

Intention—(contd.)	PAGE
Illustrative cases ..	265
Question of dishonest, prominent in cases of theft where accused asserts claim of right ..	266
Analysis of mental activity of which, is one stage ..	267
Motive distinguished from ..	268
Criminal law regards only a man's, and not his motives ..	268
Intention to deceive is fraud ..	271
"Intend to defraud," meaning of ..	271
Intent; Primary and Secondary ..	272, 273
To constitute fraud, purpose intended need not have been acheived, mere intent to defraud enough ..	273
Mere intention to practice deception sufficient for guilt in the offence of counterfeiting ..	281
Act done in furtherance of common, Liability in case of (s. 34) ..	288
Sections 149 distinguished from section 134 ..	289, 290
Common, sole test of joint criminal responsibility ..	292-297
Common, must be commission of criminal act which is done ..	291-297
Common, proof of ..	292
Mere presentiment of a possible danger does not constitute an, to court it ..	294
Common, when inferred ..	291
Constructive, Judged from effect ..	294, 295
Illustrative cases ..	295, 296
No joint responsibility ..	297
Three classes of cases of fatal assault where question of joint responsibility arises ..	298
Proof of particular, when required in criminal acts ..	300
All penal acts are of two classes (1) Where criminal knowledge or, is presumed (2) where criminal knowledge or, has to be proved	300
Judged from unlawfulness ..	301
Distinguished from knowledge or knowledge of likelihood ..	306, 307
"Voluntarily" defined in the light of ..	307
Test of presumed criminal ..	307

Intention—(contd.)	PAGE
Presumed ..	305
Indian Law and how it differs from English Law in taking note of actual and not presumed, in crime ..	308, 309
Knowledge, negligence and, distinguished from each other ..	308
Test of criminality in complex acts ..	385
Unity of, in unity of offences	386, 387
Absence of criminal, chief ingredient for exemption from liability except where harm caused is very slight	414
No intention, no crime ..	417
Absence of specific ..	419
Mens rea, meaning of ..	419
Cases of Crimes without ..	419
Criminal, presumed where act itself criminal ..	421, 422
Mens rea not required where act though not criminal yet prohibited by statute ..	431
Nothing is an offence which is done by accident without criminal intent or knowledge (s. 80) ..	495
Absence of criminal, does not necessarily imply absence of criminality or freedom from criminal liability ..	496
Criminal, and knowledge ..	496, 497
Accident when a good defence ..	498, 499
Act causing harm but done without criminal (s. 81) ..	507
Self-preservation ..	508, 509
Meaning of ..	511
Necessity as a defence to criminality ..	511, 512
No, in case of insanity ..	523
In drunkenness ..	553, 559
Drukenness excuses, but not knowledge ..	557, 558
Private defence against a lunatic (s. 98) ..	617
Knowledge requisite in case of right of private defence against acts under direction of public servant ..	627, 628
Intentional aid, a mode of abetment ..	672, 673
Punishment of abettor where act done with different (s. 110) ..	691
Specific, is the essence of the offence of sedition ..	749
Necessary for guilt in the offence of fabricating false evidence in section 192 ..	1059

PAGE

Intention—(contd.)

Intentionally giving false evidence—meaning of "intentionally" .. 1078
To screen offenders essential in offence under section 201 1118, 1119
What kind of, necessary for the offence of making false claim in Court .. 1146
Intent to cause injury at what time material under section 211 .. 1174
To screen offender necessary for guilt in case of harbouring offenders .. 1179, 1180
Motive when material in determining crime in section 214 .. 1189
Intentional disobedience by public servant in section 217, what is .. 1205
Of accused at the time of such disobedience material 1189
To save from legal punishment necessary for offence under section 218 .. 1212, 1213
Intentionally aiding, suffering or omitting to apprehened or escape in section 221 .. 1219
Rescue under section 225 must be intentional .. 1237
To practise deception, the first ingredient of the crime of counterfeiting .. 1270
Distinguished from motive in public nuisance .. 1435
To insult or knowledge that it will be taken as insult necessary for the offence in section 295 and how such intention or knowledge is judged .. 1460
Cases of no .. 1460, 1461
Required for insulting the religious feelings of a class in section 297 .. 1475
Uttering words with intent to wound the religious feelings (s. 298) .. 1478
Deliberate intention, what is 1482, 1483
Intention or knowledge requisite for culpable homicide .. 1506-1511
Whenever there is knowledge proof of, unnecessary .. 1517
Knowledge, motive and, distinguished from each other in culpable homicide .. 1517
Homicidal, what is .. 1518
Homicidal, how proved .. 1519
Evidence of .. 1519, 1520
Kinds of .. 1518
Of assailant, how to be investigated .. 1518
Rule as to presumed .. 1520
A mater of inference and seldom subject of direct proof 1519
Nature of, required to determine criminality and measure of criminality .. 1519
How material in murder .. 1531-1532
In murder not intention to cause death, but to cause bodily injury likely to cause death .. 1533
And Injury sufficient to cause death .. 1535
Whether act of person is dominated by a certain, or knowledge—Test .. 1538
Absence of, essential in causing death by rash or negligent act .. 1617
Nature of, necessary in attempt to murder . 1649, 1650
Act without, resulting in death .. 1652
Intentional self-destruction, what is .. 1658
Abandonment of Infants, intention must be to abandon 1680
Secret disposal of body in offence under section 318 must be with the sole, of concealing its birth .. 1689
To cause grievous hurt, proof of 1702, 1707, 1708
Negativing homicide in offence of causing hurt to extort confession under section 330 .. 1741
Intent to deter public servant from discharging his duty in offence under section 332 1754
Nature of, requisite in indecent assault on woman in section 354 .. 1823, 1824
Immaterial in the offence of kidnapping from lawful guardianship in section 361 1851, 1852
Or knowledge in kidnapping or abducting a woman to compel her marriage .. 1869
Intent and knowledge in the offence of disposal of minors for purposes of prostitution .. 1900, 1901
What, or knowledge material for liability in the offence of purchase of minor for prostitution .. 1909, 1910
Primary and secondary, in theft .. 1949, 1950
To take dishonestly is the first essential of the offence

PAGE

Intention—(concld.)

of theft .. 1983
Intentional intimidation in the offence of extortion, what is .. 2012, 2013
No, no deception .. 2207-2208
To deceive and defraud at the time of taking money essential to cheating .. 2227
Intentional inducement, what is, in the offence of cheating .. 2234-2235
Question of, in offence re fraudulent concealment or removal of property, in fraud of creditors .. 2273
In assertion of a legal right, the question of intention may convert an innocent act into a criminal act .. 2291
Intentionally running a ship aground with intent to plunder it (s. 439) .. 2338
Criminal trespass, Sole test of criminality in, as distinct from knowledge and effect 2345
—In criminal trespass, must be actual and primary and not merely constructive or secondary .. 2345
—Presumed and actual, Difference between .. 2347
—Presumed, or knowledge of consequence immaterial .. 2348
—View that specific, is necessary in different courts .. 2350
—Manifestation of criminal intent .. 2363
—Intent only necessary .. 2365, 2366
—Criminal intent necessary must have preceded the entry or the unlawful stay 2370, 2371
Nature and necessity of, in lurking house-trespass and house breaking how proved 2402, 2403
Circumstances proving, in offence under section 457 .. 2410
Intent necessary to constitute forgery .. 2456-2462
How far inferred from knowledge in forgery .. 2457, 2458
To foist on others, essential for criminal possession of forged notes .. 2564
To harm is not a prerequisite of the offence of defamation .. 2760, 2761
Intentional insult, what is, under (s. 504) .. 2779
Intention all in all for the offence .. 2780
First stage in the commission of a crime .. 2804

PAGE

Intimidation—

Criminal, Definition of (s. 503) .. 2771

See Criminal Intimidation.

Intoxication—

See Drunkenness.

J

Judge

Exemption of, from the Code 171
Definition and meaning of (s. 19) .. 225-226
Who are .. 226
Public servant, Is a .. 240
Joint liability when act done is different from what intended .. 298
Act of, when acting judicially (s. 77) .. 432
Provision under the Judicial Officer's Protection Act (XVIII of 1850) .. 432, 433
Persons who come under the term .. 433
Exempted from liability when acting bona fide where they have mistakenly acted without jurisdiction .. 433
Protection not unbounded or unqualified .. 434
What judicial acts are protected .. 434-435
4 questions arising on the point .. 434
Custom of appointing "commissioners" .. 435
What is a Judicial act .. 435-436
Judicial act not limited to Courts of justice only .. 435, 436
Illegal acts excluded .. 437
2 requisites for exoneration of .. 437
Bona fides is out of the question if the act complained of is wholly illegal .. 437
Illustrative cases .. 437, 438
Plea of bona fide only arises where there is jurisdiction 439
Reasonable belief in jurisdiction essential .. 439-440
Presence of "good faith" touchstone of Judicial liability .. 440
Civil and criminal liability .. 441
Previous sanction to prosecution of, Necessity of .. 442
Privilege of speech (s. 499) 2734-2739

PAGE

Judgment—

What is a .. 227
Act done in pursuance of (s. 78) .. 442
Special provision in the Police Act for the protection of Police .. 443
Obedience to, and military commands, Distinction between .. 443-444
Good faith and belief in the legality of the order necessary for exemption .. 444
Ministerial acts, Protection of 444-445
Acts done in pursuance of, and acts merely warranted by, Distinguished .. 445, 446
Different grades of criminal liability .. 447-448
Section contemplates cases where accused lacks bona-fide belief in the jurisdiction of the Court .. 447
Position and education of the accused to be considered .. 447-448

See Defamation.

Judicial Proceedings—

Meaning of .. 226
Report of, one exception to the offence of defamation 2709
Not privileged when (1) their publication prohibited by Court (2) is obscene or blasphemous .. 2710
Scientific aspect of a question howmuchsoever indecent might be discussed in a medical magazine .. 2711
Malice immaterial if publication lawful .. 2711
Report must be substantially true .. 2711
Substantially true report, what is a .. 2711
Publishing proceedings favourable to one party and omitting all mention of it as affecting the other, not substantially true .. 2711
Comments on Judicial Proceedings .. 2711
Reports of Judicial Proceedings and comments thereon, difference between .. 2711
Illustrative cases .. 2712
Jurisdiction immaterial .. 2712
Report of Preliminary Judicial enquiry .. 2713
on cases .. 2714

PAGE

Judicial Proceedings—(concld.)

Comment when a case is subjudice contempt of Court .. 2714
Right of criticism comes only when a case is decided .. 2714

Jurisdiction—

Extent of the Code,—person and place 153, 183, 199
Exterritorial extension .. 156
Extra-territorial offences—Extension of Code to .. 181
Of High Courts (1) on land .. 203
(2) Over subjects in foreign state .. 204
(3) Admirality,—on high seas .. 205, 209
Of mofussil Courts .. 207

Juror—

Personation of a, or assessor (s. 229) .. 1260

See False personation.

Justifiable Homicide—

What is .. 1493
Distinguished from excusable homicide .. 1493

K

Kidnapping—

Abetment of .. 692
Is a continuing offence .. 692, 693
Taking or enticing complete as soon as girl removed .. 693
Two kinds of, described (s. 359) .. 1831
Literally child stealing .. 1831
Subsequent meaning of .. 1831
English Law, terms used in .. 1831
An aggravated form of wrongful confinement .. 1832
From British India, Definition of (s. 360) .. 1832
What is .. 1832
Not necessary that British India should be his home nor he a British subject .. 1832
"Conveying" necessary, meaning of "conveys" .. 1832
When offence complete .. 1833
British India, what is .. 1833
Need not necessarily be foreign jurisdiction .. 1833
Conveying must be without consent .. 1833

Kidnapping—(contd.)	PAGE
Consent may be validly given by lawful guardian	1833
Ratification of an act is consent	1833
From lawful guardianship (s. 361)	1834
Offence only in respect of minor or insane	1834
Provisions of the English Law on the point	1835
English Law much wider and more general	1835
Distinction between a legal guardian and a lawful guardian	1835
Essential ingredients of offence	1836
Divergence between civil law and the section about capacity to consent	1836
Age limit—14 if male and 16 if female, Discussion as to	1836
Girl falsely overstating her age no defence	1837
What is "Taking" any minor	1837
"Taking" and "not taking," cases of	1838
When is the "taking" complete	1839
Length of detention immaterial	1840
"Taking out of possession" under English Law, What constitutes	1840
Getting married at Church and immediately returning, held to be taking out of possession	1841
Enticing, one mode of taking	1841
Children without guardian and lunatic without curator excepted	1841
Taking must be from lawful guardian	1841
Guardians of minor and lunatic	1841-1844
(1) Under Hindu Law	1841, 1842
Mother marrying daughter without the father's consent guilty under this section	1743, 1842
(2) Under Mahomedan Law	1842
(3) Under other laws	1843-1844
In the case of illegitimate children	1844
Natural guardians	1844
Lawful custodian	1844

Kidnapping—(contd.)	PAGE
"Out of the keeping of the lawful Custodian"	1845
No guardian, no offence	1847
General summary of the law	1847
No protection to self-constituted guardians	1848
Good faith, how far a defence	1848
English Law as to	1849
Mistaken belief as to age, when a defence, Indian rule as to	1850
Intention immaterial in judging of offence, but material for punishment	1851
Consent, Question of, how far material in	1852
Abetment of	1852-1853
Relation to abduction	1853
Consent does not condone	1854
Punishment for (s. 363)	1854
Offence of, international and extraditable	1855
Liability when offence falls short of	1854
Main points to be proved and how they are dealt with in practice	1856
Cases of cooly recruiting	1856
Or abducting in order to murder (s. 364)	1857, 1858
Liability when the object is ransom or to make him join a theatrical company	1857
Section presupposes no consequential murder	1858
Intention or knowledge of purpose essential	1859
Disposal for murder	1859
Or abducting with intent secretly and wrongfully to confine person (s. 365)	1860
Not necessarily distinct from wrongful confinement	1861
Case where there is no, but abduction	1861
Or abducting woman to compel her marriage (s. 366)	1862
Mere seduction not punishable under the section	1864
Charge to state whether it is abduction or,	1864
No conviction for abduction on a charge of, without amending	1864
Analysis of the offence	1865
Special ingredients of the offence	1865

Kidnapping—(contd.) PAGE

Compulsion the essence of the crime .. 1865
Intention to seduce subsequent to elopement, part of the crime .. 1866
(1) Seduction essential—What it is .. 1866
Seduction, confliction views as to .. 1866, 1867
Criminal intimacy prior to elopement, if liable under this section .. 1867, 1868
(2) Illicit intercourse or forced marriage essential .. 1868
What is illicit intercourse .. 1868
(3) Intention or knowledge of forced marriage or intercourse .. 1869
Case of a married woman consenting to her own abduction, if woman guilty of abetment .. 1869
Abduction of married woman, .. 1869
Cases of no offence .. 1869, 1870
Or abducting in order to subject person to grievous hurt, slavery or unnatural offence (s. 367) .. 1874
Of boys for emasculation for being used in zenana, liable under this section .. 1874
How offence under this section differs from other kindred offences .. 1875, 1876
Wrongfully concealing or keeping in confinement kidnapped or abduced persons (s. 368) .. 1876
Offence known as "accession after the fact" under English Law .. 1876
Provisions applicable to a person other than the kidnapper .. 1876
Knowledge that the person in confinement was kidnapped or abducted essential .. 1877
Accused must confine or conceal person so kidnapped .. 1878
Wrongful concealment, what is .. 1878
Merely giving false information is not wrongful concealment .. 1878
No concealment without intention to conceal .. 1879
Or abducting child under 10 years with intent to steal from its person (s. 369) .. 1880

Kidnapping—(concld.) PAGE

Theft by abduction .. 1880, 1881
Actual taking of property from person of child not necessary .. 1881
See Abduction.
Explanation of . 450

King's Prerogative—
"King can do no wrong" maxim examined .. 450
Limits of .. 475
See Government of India.

Knowledge—
Reason to believe, distinguished from .. 274, 275
Intention and, differentiated .. 306
Actual and presumed .. 308, 309
Presence of criminal, a question of fact .. 309, 310
Intention, negligence and, distinguished from each other .. 309, 310
Nothing is an offence which is done by accident without criminal, or intention (s. 80) .. 495
Criminal intention and .. 496, 498
Drunkenness excuses intention but not .. 557, 558
Knowledge requisite in case of right of private defence against acts under direction of public servant .. 627, 628
Intention to insult or, that the act will be taken an insult necessary for offence under section 295 and how such intention or, judged .. 1460
Criminal, essential to culpable homicide .. 1506
Principle different from English Law .. 1507
What amounts to such .. 1507
A mental act and incapable of direct proof .. 1508
What is implied by .. 1507
Degree of .. 1508
Implies consciousness of effect .. 1507
Nature of such consciousness in culpable homicide and how it may be proved .. 1507, 1508
Of likelihood of death, question of fact .. 1508
Inference of, data on which to be made .. 1509
How, of a future effect necessary in culpable homicide proved .. 1508
Criminal, determined a posteriori in some cases .. 1510
Imputation of .. 1510

PAGE

Knowledge—(contd.)

Standard of, fixed by Court .. 1509
Gross negligence when amounts to .. 1511
Which may even amount to culpable homicide .. 1511
Operation of, in mistake of fact .. 1511, 1512
Imputation of legal fiction .. 1511
Striking a person believing him to be a ghost .. 1511
Performance of unskilful operation .. 1512
Cases of snake-charmers inducing people to be bitten to show cures .. 1512
Presumption of, from cruel acts .. 1512
Of likelihood is apart from motive .. 1515
Doctrine of constructive .. 1513
Its necessary limits .. 1513
Causing death without .. 1513, 1514
Of likelihood of death by the act .. 1514
Illustrative cases .. 1514
Of death from degree of violence used .. 1515
Presumption of, from natural consequences of the act .. 1515, 1516
Exceptions to such presumption .. 1516
Presumed from intention and motive .. 1517
In culpable homicide distinguished from intention and motive .. 1517
When necessary .. 1528
Homicidal and murderous, distinguished .. 1528
Is something less than intention and more than belief .. 1529
And intention, in murder and culpable homicide .. 1528
Belief is not knowledge, but must be of a fact in existence .. 1529
Implies probability .. 1529
Of imminent danger, necessity of, in murder .. 1536, 1540
Act of person whether dominated by a certain intention or .. 1538
Act done with, of likelihood of death in culpable homicide .. 1608
Absence of, as to consequence essential in causing death by rash and negligent act .. 1617
Nature of, required in attempt to murder .. 1649

PAGE

Knowledge—(concld.)

Intention or, in kidnapping or abducting a woman to compel her marriage .. 1869
Intent and, in the offence of disposal of minors for purposes of prostitution .. 1900, 1901
What intention or, material for liability in the offence of purchase of minor for prostitution .. 1909, 1910
Nature of, or belief necessary in the offence of receiving stolen property .. 2180, 2181
As to property being stolen how inferred .. 2181, 2182
Retaining stolen property with guilty, What is and how far necessary for offence .. 2184
Intention as distinct from, and effect is the sole test of criminality in criminal trespass .. 2345, 2346
Of consequence immaterial .. 2347
Intention how far inferred from, in forgery .. 2457, 2458
Or reasonable belief in the offence of using forged document as genuine, how proved .. 2457, 2458
Requisite in case of adultery .. 2633, 2634

L

Labour—

Forced, Definition of (s. 374) .. 1911
See Forced Labour, Slavery.

Land—

In civil law comprises not only surface but everything on or over or under it .. 253, 254
Immovable property .. 254
Mines, Includes .. 254
Meaning of the term in the act .. 254

Landholder—

Liability of owner or occupier of land on which an unlawful assembly is held (s. 154) .. 872, 873
Liability of agent of owner or occupier of land for whose benefit riot in committed (s. 156) .. 878 See Rioting.

PAGE

Land-mark—

Mischief by destroying or moving a, etc., fixed by public authority (s. 434) . 2323
May be a temporary or a permanent one 2324
What is a 2324, 2325
A commemorative tablet is not a 2324

Larceny—

See Theft.

Lawful Authority—

Contempts of (ss. 172-190) .. 945, 1034
Abuse of, wrongful confinement consequent on .. 1791

Laws—

Saved by the Code (s. 5) .. 208
Special, Definition of (s. 41) .. 314
Local, Definition of (s. 42) .. 315
Mistake of, distinguished from mistake of act .. 415, 416
Ignorance of law no excuse .. 416
The true reason for such a rule .. 416
Applicable to Foreigners also .. 416
Austin's remarks on the point .. 416
Meaning of, in this connection. .. 416
Municipal, in the case of .. 417
Ignorance of, when an excuse. .. 417
Mistake of mixed law and fact, Effect of .. 422, 424,

Legal proceedings—

Definition of .. 226
See Defamation.

Legislature—

See Government.

Libel—

See Defamation.

Lien—

Appropriation of property in enforcement of, not dishonest .. 2090
See Criminal misappropriation.

PAGE

Life

Definition of (s. 45) .. 319
Taking of, by mistake when execusable .. 426, 427
Limits of soldier's justification .. 429
Preservation of .. 508, 509, 512
Necessity of preserving, no defence 470, 510, 512
Taking of, when excusable .. 514
Limits of the rule .. 515
Self-defence .. 516
Offences affecting, (ss. 299-377) .. 1490, 1938
Topical Introduction .. 1489, 1490
Scheme of Chapter re .. 1489, 1490
Subdivision of, into those relating to personal injuries and personal liberty .. 1489
Offences re personal injuries and personal liberty, distinction between .. 1489
Acts endangering, or personal safety of others (s. 336) .. 1759
Act endangering, and personal safety, what is .. 1761
Causing hurt by act endangering (s. 337) .. 1763
Causing grievous by act endangering (s. 338) .. 1765

Light-house—

Mischief by destroying, moving or rendering less useful a, or sea-mark (s. 433) .. 2322

Local Law—

Saved by the Code (s. 5) .. 208
Definition of (s. 42) .. 315
Rules made under, are not parts of such law .. 315

Lottery—

See Public Nuisance.

Lunatic—

Exempt from liability (s. 84) .. 523
Who is a .. 526, 527
See Children, Insanity.

Lurking house-trespass—	PAGE
Definition of (s. 443) ..	2372
An aggravated form of house-trespass ..	2372
What is ..	2372
Essential ingredients of ..	2372
Section does not specify definitely persons to conceal from whose knowledge precautions are taken ..	2372
If persons in joint possession, agents and servants included among such persons ..	2373
The phrase "exclude and eject" what it signifies ..	2373
Precautions to conceal ..	2374
Entry made to intimidate insult or annoy necessarily excluded from this and the following sections ..	2374
By night (s. 444) ..	2374
Aggravation consists in time of entry ..	2374
By night, Definition of, in Larceny Act ..	2375
Lurking House-trespass by night, what is ..	2375
Punishment for (s. 453), ..	2398
Proof of ..	2399
No, where person has a right to enter house ..	2399
But guilty if he had parted with possession to another	2399
Husband secretly entering his own house to detect suspected offence, not guilty of ..	2399
To commit offence punishable with imprisonment (s. 454) ..	2400
Actual commission of offence not necessary ..	2401
Offence need not be committed by trespasser himself ..	2401, 2402
Evidence of specific intent ..	2402
Poverty or previous conviction of the accused relevant ..	2402
House-breaking or Lurking, Evidence of ..	2403
After preparation for hurt, assault, or wrongful restrant (s. 455) ..	2403
By night (s. 456) ..	2404
By night in order to commit an offence punishable with imprisonment (s. 457) ..	2408
Intention can be proved by proof of circumstances justfying such inference	2409
Under English Law specification of intent is part of the indictment and any variance between the intention alleged and proved is fatal to the trial ..	2409
Indian law; charge need not be so precise as in English law ..	2410
To commit adultery ..	2411
To establish title ..	2412
Not guilty, cases of ..	2412, 2413
By night after preparation for hurt, assault, or wrongful restraint (s. 458) ..	2413
Proof of the offence ..	2414
Among the accused, those only who were armed are punishable under this section, the rest being punishable under sec. 456 ..	2414
Grievous hurt caused while committing (s. 459) ..	2414
Strict construction of section, Necessity of ..	2415
Proof of the offence ..	2416
Offence could only be committed at that stage after his entry and before his departure ..	2416
No right of private defence to person causing grievous hurt whilst committing ..	2417
Constructive criminal liability of all night lurkers for collateral offence of grievous hurt or homicide committed by a confederate (s. 460) ..	2417
Condition of such liability ..	2418
Criminal liability, improper extension of, safeguarded by the section ..	2418
(1) Actual offender must be guilty ..	2419
(2) Injury must be caused "at the time" ..	2419
(3) All persons jointly concerned are liable ..	2419
"Jointly concerned," meaning of ..	2419
(4) Liability of actual offender ..	2419
See House-trespass

M

Machinery—
Use of false weighing, punishable under s. 264 ..	1329
Negligent conduct with respect to (s. 287) ..	1117

PAGE

Malice—

Express and implied, What are. .. 1524
Malice prepense or malitia poecogitata, what is .. 1524
Criterion in English law distinguishing murder from other killing .. 1524
As a legal concept .. 1524
Immaterial for murder .. 1524
Prepense in murder .. 1569
English law requires, a forethought essential to constitute murder .. 1569
Not necessary for defamation though essential for libel under English law .. 2672
Evidence of, in defamation .. 2673

Malicious prosecution—

False imprisonment and, Distinction between .. 1783, 1784

Malignantly—

Meaning of .. 310

Manslaughter—

When it amounts to causing death by negligence (s. 304-A) .. 1612
Distinguished from murder .. 1612, 1613
By negligence, English law as to, same as causing death by rash or negligent act .. 1613
See Culpable Homicide, Murder.

Marginal Notes—

Construction o statutes, No aid to 151 (F. N.)

Marine Service—

Law applicable to (s. 138-A) 813

Marriage—

Kidnapping or abducing woman to compel her marriage (s. 366) .. 1862
Offences re Topical Introduction .. 2574, 2575
Policy of the Code and its intentional departure from the English Law .. 2575

PAGE

Marriage—(contd.)

Cohabitation caused by a man deceitfully inducing a belief of lawful (s. 493) .. 2575
Offence punishable also as rape .. 2575
When an offence comes under this section and when under rape .. 2575
Offence only possible where females is aged at least 14 years .. 2576
Section not intended to punish one for contracting, which turns out to be illegal .. 2576
Obtaining body of woman under a deceitful assurance of marriage punishable .. 2576
Three essentials of the offence .. 2576
Cohabiting under a promise to marry afterwards does not come under the section .. 2576
Cohabitation by deceitful assurance of, what is .. 2576, 2577
Deceit of the accused essential for the offence .. 2577
Bona fide belief that the marriage is valid by the accused, no liability .. 2577
"Cohabit or sexual intercourse," meaning of .. 2577
Marrying again during lifetime of husband or wife (s. 494) .. 2577, 2578
Validity of, depends on (1) religion of parties, (2) their domicile, and (3) the performance of ceremonies .. 2583
Section inapplicable to Hindu and Mohammadan males 2579
Section inapplicable to women in Malabar where polyandry is customary .. 2579
Personal marriage laws .. 2579, 2580
Offence made compoundable with the permission of court by the New Act XVIII of 1923 .. 2580, 2581
In case of minors, lunatics and such others, provision in New Act XVIII of 1923 allowing interested persons to make complaint with permission of Court .. 2581
Object of making polygamy punishable .. 2582
Second marriage when void .. 2583
Where both parties are Christians .. 2583

PAGE

Marriage—(contd.)

Law as to form and essentials of .. 2584
Form and essentials distinguished .. 2585
Christian marriages contracted abroad .. 2587
Of Christian with non-Christian .. 2588, 2589
Mixed marriages of Christians with natives in heathen countries where polygamy is allowed by law, validity of .. 2589
Validity depends on the fact that the non-Christian shall belong to a sect of which monogamy is an established doctrine .. 2591
Of Christian with non-Christian in Christian country .. 2591
A religious disability only an impedementum impendients not an impedimentum dirimens .. 2592
Removal of disability on change of domicile .. 2593
Indian converts, case of .. 2594
Of Hindu and Mahomedan apostates .. 2598
Status of Indian converts .. 2599
Dissolution of native convert's marriage .. 2600, 2601
Mahomedan Law .. 2601
Proof of .. 2602
Christian .. 2602
Christian marriages in India 2603, 2604
Under Christian Law a contract .. 2602
Of necessity, validity of .. 2603
Minister of Church, Presence of, necessity of .. 2602
Jewish .. 2606
Foreign .. 2606
Buddhist .. 2606
Parsi .. 2606
Mahomedan .. 2606
Performance of the akd a sine qua non .. 2606
Muta or temporary marriage 2608
Apostacy dissolves the marriage .. 2608
Hindu .. 2609
Intercaste .. 2609
Under Hindu Law a sacrament .. 2610
Hindu divorce .. 2610
Invalidity of, due to first marriage .. 2611
Exceptions to criminality .. 2612
Presumption of death arising from absence of seven years 2613

PAGE

Marriage—(concld.)

How such presumption could be displaced .. 2614, 2615
Points to be proved .. 2615
Bona fide belief in death, whether a defence .. 2616
Mistaken belief .. 2616
Ceremony fraudulently gone through without lawful marriage (s. 496) .. 2620
Essence of the offence is deception whether of the other party or a third person .. 2620
Section distinguished from section 493 .. 2620
Offence complete without cohabitation or holding of sexual intercourse .. 2621
Offence is an abuse of the holy state of matrimony for purpose of fraud and dishonesty .. 2621, 2622
Ceremony gone through for appearances no offence although it is a fraud on society .. 2622
Fraudulent mock marriage .. 2622
Fraud may be collateral to the, and both parties privy to it, e.g., to recover a legacy .. 2622
Not lawfully married, meaning of .. 2622
Women exempt from punishment under this section .. 2623
Meaning of, in adultery .. 2622

Martial La

Proclamation of .. 476
When justifiable .. 476
Liability on proclamation .. 478
General result stated .. 478
State Offences Act and .. 479
Indemnity for .. 480
Right of captain at sea .. 483, 484

Master and Servant—

See Public Nuisance.

Maxims—

Actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea 276, 417, 496, 497
A cura quia in curiis publicis curas gerebant .. 227
A deo rex a reje lex .. 451
A man is presumed to know the natural consequences of his act .. 1520

Maxims—(contd.) PAGE

Consensus facit matrimonium 2603
Cujas est solum ejus est usque ad cœlum et ad inferos .. 254
Damnum sine injuria .. 2290
Delegatus non potest delegare 242
De minimus non curab lex .. 602, 2232
Doris amara suam mon inter miscuit undam .. 203
Error communis facit jus .. 2611
Every man's house is his castle .. 998
Every man is presumed to know law .. 415
Expressio unius est exclusio alterius .. 1646, 2820
Extra territorium jus dicenti impune non paretur .. 197
Expressum facit cessare tacitum .. 2738
Ex turpi causa non oritur actio .. 2541
Festina lente .. 1815
Furiosus furore solum punitur .. 524
Generalia specialibus non derogant 209
Ignorantia facti excusat, ignoratia juris non excusat .. 415
Inclusio uninsest exclusio alterius .. 215
Lex neminem ad vana seu inutilia peragenda .. 960
Nam omne crimen ebrietas et incendit, et detegit .. 554
Nemo debet bis punire pro uno delicto .. 383
Non quad dictum sed quad factum est inspicitur .. 569
Noscitur a sociis .. 1682
Nulla discordia major quam guoe a religiore fit .. 1481
Per vinum delapsis capitalis pœna remittitur .. 554
Post hoc ergo propter hoc .. 310
Presumptio juris et juri .. 522
Qui quid acquiritur servo acquiritur domino .. 1884
Qui facit per alium facit per se 681, 1373, 2492, 2669
Res ipsa in se dolum hebit .. 1520
Sabus populi supreme lex .. 479
Scripta litera remanet .. 2279, 2429
Sic utare tuo ut alienum non lœdas 1622, 1761, 2286
Sic utare tuo ut rem publicaim non lœdas .. 1344
Simplex commendatio non obligat .. 2210
Specialia generalibus derogant 211, 1825, 2066, 2151

Maxims—(concld.) PAGE

Stabitur præsumptioni donee probetur in contrarium .. 2185
The king can do no wrong .. 450
Verba aliquid operati debent 162
Voluntarius dæmon .. 554
Volunti non fit injuria .. 566, 2634

Meaning of Words—

Words convey same meaning throughout .. 215
See under each section.

Measures—

See Weights and Measures.

Medical Witness—

In case of post-mortem examination, nature of questions to be put to a .. 1582
Certificate of a medical man not per se admissible being hearsay evidence .. 1582
Cross-examination of, how to be directed .. 1582
Question to a, in case of Poisoning .. 1583, 1584
Personal violence .. 1585
Infanticide .. 1586
Strangulation .. 1586, 1587
Drowning .. 1587
Rape .. 1587, 1588
Insanity .. 1588, 1589
Miscarriage .. 1589
Grievous Hurt 1589, 1590
Evidence of, Value of, as to age of minor disposed of for purposes of prostitution 1900

Men of War—

Offences committed on .. 174

Mens rea—

What it implies .. 275
Essential to prove all guilt .. 276
When presumed and when must be proved .. 276
Presence or absence of words implying, Effect of .. 276

Ministerial Officers—

Protection of (s. 78) .. 442
Acts under civil process .. 474
Conditions for exoneration .. 495

Minor—

Procuration of a, girl (s. 366-A) .. 1870
Section newly added by Act XX of 1923 .. 1871

Minor—(contd.) PAGE

Provisions of the International Convention for the suppression of the White Slave Traffic .. 1871
Origin of the section .. 1871
Age raised from 16 to 18 .. 1871
Intention or knowledge of likelihood necessary for the offence .. 1871
Procuration of, .. 1872
Previous seduction of, immaterial .. 1872
Selling, for purposes of prostitution (s. 372) .. 1890
Section amended and scope enlarged by the amending Act XVIII of 1924 .. 1892
Immoral intention the gist of the offence .. 1872, 1891
Section assumes reasonable age of the girl as a good defence .. 1891
Object of the legislature .. 1892
Sections 372 and 373 counterparts of each other .. 1893
Disposal of minor for marriage or adoption, no offence 1893
Change of possession not necessary for the offence .. 1893
"Immoral," what is—not defined in the Code advisedly for it depends on customs and social habits of the people .. 1893, 1904
"Unlawful and immoral purpose" significance of the phrase .. 1894, 1903
The old law and the new, difference between .. 1894, 1895
Prostitution, what is .. 1895-1900
Sale, what is .. 1895
Let on hire, what is .. 1896
Question of possession, discussion as to .. 1896-1897
A single act of sexual intercourse included .. 1897
Dedication of, under sanction of religious usage no exception .. 1998
Position of devadasis .. 1898, 1899
When, said to be disposed of .. 1899, 1900
Must be under 18 years .. 1900
Age how proved .. 1900
Actual intention, not the sole test .. 1900, 1901
Knowledge of likelihood is also material .. 1901
Prostitution presumed in case of disposal of, to prostitutes and such others until the contrary is proved .. 1902
Dedication to a temple with knowledge of immoral life punishable .. 1901
Intention and knowledge of the transferor how far material .. 1902
Prostitution and illicit intercourse, meaning of .. 1902, 1903
Unlawful and immoral purpose, meaning of .. 1903
Prostitution excludes unnatural offence .. 1903
Immoral and unlawful purpose explained .. 1903, 1904
Immorality does not imply unlawfulness .. 1904
Immorality, What is test of .. 1904
Penal law overrides precepts of private laws such as Hindu Law .. 1904
Buying, for purposes of prostitution (s. 373) .. 1905
Section amended by Act XVIII of 1924 .. 1905
Giver may be innocent while receiver is guilty .. 1905, 1906
Person taking possession of minor without any giver guilty .. 1906
Object of section 372 and 373 to protect, not suppress traffic in immorality .. 1906
16 years altered to 18 years as a person attains majority at 18 .. 1907
Purchasing, prostitutes, meaning of .. 1907
Section refers to persons irrespective of sex .. 1907
Essential ingredients of the offence .. 1907
Buys or hires, meaning of .. 1907, 1908
Intention or knowledge only at time of purchase material .. 1909
Such intention presumed in cases of prostitutes by the explanation I under the section .. 1910
How such intention is proved in cases where the buyer is not a prostitute .. 1910
Purchase or possession of, below 18 years with intention to employ or use as a prostitute while under that age necessary .. 1910

See Kidnapping.

Misappropriation— PAGE

Dishonest, of property (s. 403) .. 2085
Essence of, what is .. 2092
What amounts to .. 2092, 2093
When becomes criminal .. 2093, 2094

See Criminal Misappropriation.

Miscarriage—

Medical witness, Questions to a, in case of .. 1589
Causing, defined (s 312) .. 1662
Offence made purposely non-cognizable and the reasons therefor .. 1663
Mother also punished with the accomplice .. 1663
English Law, and how it differs from Indian Law .. 1663
Why punished .. 1664
Quick with child, meaning of .. 1665
What is causing .. 1665
Abortion by mechanical means .. 1665
Its detection .. 1666
Abortion by medicine .. 1666
Principal ingredients .. 1666
Causing or attempting to cause .. 1667
Exception in the case of saving the life of the woman .. 1664
Verbal advice as to potency of certain drugs, no liability .. 166
Pregnancy indispensable .. 1667, 1668
Two grades of the crime under the section .. 1667
Preventing conception no offence .. 1668
Measure of punishment .. 1669
After being quick with child .. 1668
Causing, without woman's consent (s. 313) .. 1669
This section aggravated form of section 312 .. 1669
Offence lighter than under English Law where it is murder .. 1670
Criminal, without consent .. 1670
Death caused by act done with intent to cause (s. 314) .. 1670
Discrimination of the offence into consentient and non-consentient acts .. 1671
Pregnancy not material .. 1671
Knowledge or intention of accused immaterial .. 1671
Ingredients of the offence .. 1672

Miscarriage—(concld.) PAGE

Consent mitigates the offence .. 1672
Intention to cause, how gathered .. 1672
Death caused while abortion intended .. 1672
Intentional act to prevent child being born alive (s. 315) .. 1673
Long range of sentence dictated by varying criminality of the act .. 1673
Fœticide and Infanticide .. 1674
Fœticide, what is .. 1674
Causing death of quick unborn child by act amounting to culpable homicide (s. 316) .. 1674
How this offence differs from that under section 315 .. 1675
Offence can be committed only after the woman becomes "quick" with child 1675
Offence a form of homicide as applied to an unborn child .. 1675

Mischief—

Theft and, no separate conviction for .. 1992
Topical introduction .. 2283, 2284
Corresponds to malicious injuries to property .. 2283
Provisions re, correspond with those of Malicious Damage Act . 2284
Definition of (s. 425) .. 2284
Intention, Presence of, Necessity of .. 2285
Express Malice, proof of, not necessary .. 2285
English Law as to .. 2285
No definition in English Law .. 2285
Principle of punishing .. 2286
Property here refers both to moveable and immoveable property but not incorporeal or intangible, such as easement .. 2286
What is .. 2286
Intention or knowledge, Value of, in the offence of .. 2286, 2287
Accidental acts not .. 2287
Illustrative cases .. 2287, 2288
Negligent acts not necessarily mischievous, when may become so .. 2288
An illegal omission when amounts to .. 2288

Mischief—(contd.)	PAGE
Assertion of right of ownership negatives ..	2289
Removal of building illegally constructed is not ..	2289
Wanton destruction of property in assertion of the right of ownership is ..	2289
Loss or damage not wrongful if there is no invasion of a legal right ..	2290
Legal act with criminal intention when amounts to ..	2291
Bona fide claim excepted ..	2291
Damage, what is ..	2292
Erroneous belief in right excepted ..	2293
Exercise of not only private but public right also allowed ..	2294
Trespass, distinguished from ..	2295
Bona fide mistake excepted ..	2296
Cutting of trees by tenants has given rise to a number of cases under ..	2294
Must affect property ..	2296, 2297
Destruction, change in situation or injury essential, to constitute ..	2297
Erecting a dam across river, if amounts to ..	2298
Case of ..	2298, 2299
Gaolis letting loose cattle for grazing on other people's lands and gardens is ..	2299
Punishment for (s. 426) ..	2299
Bona fide claim of right deprives magistrate of jurisdiction to deal with a criminal charge in a summary way ..	2300
This section frequently resorted to as a trenchant mode of deciding disputed civil questions of right ..	2300
Accused cannot be tried on the same facts both for mischief and theft ..	2300
This offence introduces a novelty in punishment not to be found elsewhere in the Code ..	2301
Simple, Evidence of ..	2301, 2302
Gravamen of, not so much in causing loss as in causing it by injuring property ..	2302
Injuring property when ..	2302
Injury contemplated in, classified ..	2303
Property does not include a human being ..	2303

Mischief—(contd.)	PAGE
By destroying or injuring his own property ..	2303
No, illustrative cases of ..	2303, 2304
Causing damage to the amount of Rs. 50/- and upwards (s. 427) ..	2301
Damage of Rs. 50 caused by, Evidence of ..	2305
A person is not vicariously liable for ..	2305
Loss caused by, Value of, how reckoned, specially in case of fish or crop etc. ..	2305
By killing or maiming animal of the value of Rs. 10/- (s. 428) ..	2306
Section compared with ss. 40 and 41 of the Malicious Damage Act, 1861 ..	2306
By mutilation of animals, why regarded as of greater gravity ..	2307
By injuring animal, what is ..	2307
The animal must be the subject of ownership ..	2309
Destruction of animal originally ferœ naturæ but reduced into possession is ..	2308
Value of Rs. 10 must be at the moment of offence ..	2308
Maiming etc., of animal, What is ..	2308, 2309
Maiming compare with "Mayhem" in English Law ..	2308
"Rendering useless," What is ..	2309
"Rendering useless" does not include case of overwork or ill-use ..	2310
Injury to animals by setting dogs if comes within term "rendering useless" ..	2310
Uselessness must be permanent ..	2310
By killing or maiming cattle etc., of any value or any other animal of the value of Rs. 50 (s. 429) ..	2310
By killing domestic animals ..	2311
Young ones of animals specified also included in the term ..	2311
Animals nullius proprietas ..	2312
Bull set at large in accordance with religious usage if nullius proprietas ..	2312
Trespassing cattle, maiming of, if and when amount to ..	2313

PAGE

Mischief—(contd.)

By injury to work of irrigation or by wrongfully diverting water (s. 430) .. 2313
Offence consists in causing diminution of water-supply .. 2314
Section liable to abuse by criminal Courts being requisitioned to decide questions of a purely civil right .. 2314
By diminution of water-supply, what is .. 2315
The diminution must be appreciable .. 2315
The water-supply must be property i.e. subject of ownership .. 2315
Act done in assertion of a bona fide claim of right does not amount to .. 2316
Why such acts are protected .. 2317
Actual loss or diminution of water-supply not necessary, its likelihood sufficient .. 2317
No diminution, Cases of .. 2318
Of causing diminution of water-supply by illegal omission .. 2318
By injury to public road, bridge, river or channel (s. 431) .. 2318
Bridge must be a public bridge .. 2319
Injury to public ways, what is .. 2319, 2320
Distinguished from offences re public ways under public nuisance .. 2320
Proof of intention or knowledge necessary .. 2320
By causing inundation or obstruction to public drainage attended with damage (s. 432) .. 2320
To public drainage, what is .. 2320, 2321
Public drainage, meaning of .. 2320
By destroying, moving or rendering less useful a lighthouse or seamark (s. 433) .. 2322
Corresponding English Law .. 2323
Object of the section .. 2323
By destroying or moving etc., a landmark fixed by public authority (s. 434) .. 2323
Object of punishing removal of landmarks .. 2324

PAGE

Mischief—(contd.)

By altering landmark, what is .. 2324, 2325
Landmark, what is a .. 2324
Commemorative tablet is not a landmark .. 2324
Removal of landmark which may be temporary or permanent .. 2324
Landmark may consist of anything .. 2325
By fire or explosive substance with intent to cause damage to the amount of Rs. 100 or in case of agricultural produce Rs. 10 (s. 435) .. 2325
English Law as to .. 2326
Scope of the section .. 2327
By fire .. 2327
Mischievous acts and negligent acts compared .. 2328
Fire, meaning of .. 2328
Agricultural produce and other property, Distinction between .. 2328
By fire or explosive substance with intent to destroy house etc., (s. 436) .. 2329
Measure of punishment .. 2329
Legislature in prescribing maximum sentence, has left a good deal to the discretion of the judge .. 2329
Arson of a building .. 2330, 2331
The three kinds of buildings enumerated in the section .. 2330
Essential features of offence .. 2331, 2332
Intention or knowledge necessary .. 2331
Such intention or knowledge must be as regards destruction of a building—not any particular building .. 2331
Proof of such intention or knowledge .. 2331
Evidence requisite to prove .. 2332
Building need not wholly be destroyed by fire .. 2332
Building, what is a .. 2333
Building would include the costliest palace to the lowliest mud hovel .. 2333
With intent to destroy or make unsafe a decked vessel or one of twenty tons burden (s. 437) .. 2334
Small native crafts of all kinds such as a ferry boat, etc., excluded .. 2335
Decked vessel, what is a .. 2336

PAGE

Mischief—(concld.)

Endangering ship, what is and why punishable .. 2335, 2336
Ship incomplete or in an unfinished state, immaterial 2336
Ship simply run aground only and afterward refloated would not be mischief .. 2336
To a decked vessel or one of twenty tons burden, committed by fire or explosive substance (s. 438) .. 2336
Compared with s. 42, Malicious Damage Act, the corresponding English Law .. 2337
Attempt also punishable under this section .. 2337
Arson endangering ship .. 2337
By intentionally running vessel aground or ashore with intent to commit theft (s. 439) .. 2338
Offence allied to piracy .. 2338
Offence consists in stranding a ship for plunder .. 2339
Ship need not be injured .. 2339
Person running aground need not himself plunder it .. 2339
Proof of intention to the committing of plunder necessary, not merely a knowledge or likelihood .. 2339
Committed after preparation made for causing death or hurt or wrongful restraint (s. 440) .. 2339
In respect of a will, authority to adopt or valuable security (s. 477) .. 2504
Statements conducive of, to public (s. 510) .. 2798

Misconduct—

Public, by a drunken person (s. 510) .. 2798

Misrepresentation—

When amounts to a statement of fact or merely an expression of opinion determines liability 2210, 2211

Mistake—

Of fact (s. 76) .. 415
This section and section 79 compared .. 415
Of law, no excuse .. 415
Object of the rule .. 416
Rule applicable to foreigners also .. 416

PAGE

Mistake—(concld.)

Of fact, distinguished from mistake of law .. 415
Meaning of "law" in this connection .. 416
Essentials of the offence under this section .. 419
Mistake of fact, what is .. 420
Mistake has a recognised place in Civil Law .. 420
Proof of, no defence where act criminal .. 420, 421
Effect of, of mixed law and fact .. 422
Such mistake treated as mistake of fact .. 422
Mistake must be believed in .. 422, 423
Reasonable grounds for such belief, necessary .. 423
Suspicion and belief, difference between .. 423
Mistake without good faith, insufficient .. 424, 425
On the question of good faith, some allowance to be made for some negligence .. 425
Section refers to illegal acts .. 425, 426
Obedience to superior's commands .. 426, 427
No special exemption in the case of soldiers .. 426
Soldier must have reasonable belief that the order was one which he was bound to obey .. 426
Soldier's duty and responsibility .. 427, 428
Limits of soldier's justification .. 429
Obedience to order when justifiable by public .. 430
Mistake, when no defence .. 431
In the case of statutory offences .. 431
Reasons for such a rule .. 431
Of fact and legal justification (s. 79) .. 448
Of fact, Effect of knowledge under a .. 1511
Death of one by provocation and of another by, or accident .. 1552
Homicide by, liability of .. 1572
Of fact, a good defence to wrongful confinement .. 1781
As to age how far a defence in kidnapping .. 1850, 1851
Of fact a good defence to a charge of theft .. 1964
See Acts of State.

PAGE

Mock Marriage—

When punishable (s. 496) .. 2620
Essence of offence—deception .. 2620
Must be fraudulent .. 2622

Mofussil Courts—

Admiralty jurisdiction of .. 207
Procedure in, in case of Admiralty jurisdiction .. 207

Month—

Definition of (s. 49) .. 319
Calculation of, in sentences .. 320

Motive—

Meaning of .. 266
Intention distinguished from .. 268
How far a defence in criminal law .. 267, 268
Investigation of, impracticable .. 268
Immaterial where death caused by performing unskilful operation .. 1512
As distinguished from intention not part of definition of culpable homicide .. 1517
Place of, in murder .. 1531

Moveable Property—

Definition of (s. 22) .. 250
Definition of, in other acts .. 251
What it comprises .. 252, 253
Standing crops when .. 253
Land not .. 253, 254
Things attached not .. 253
Things permanently fastened to things attached not .. 253, 254
What is, for purposes of theft .. 1950-1960

Murder—

Definition of .. 1520-1523
When culpable homicide is .. 1520-1521
When culpable homicide is not .. 1521
Definition of, under English Law .. 1524
Malice prepense, what is .. 1524
Malice prepense or "Malitia Præcogitata" the criterion in English Law .. 1524
Malice express or implied, what is .. 1524
Difference between English and Indian Law .. 1524-1525
Malice immaterial for murder .. 1524

PAGE

Murder—(contd.)

Murder defined through culpable homicide .. 1525
Suggested definition of, and culpable homicide .. 1525-1526
Analysis of the offence .. 1526, 1527
Dintinguished from culpable homicide .. 1526
Neither mutually exhaustive nor exclusive .. 1526
Question depends upon degree of criminality .. 1526
All murder necessarily culpable homicide .. 1526
Questions for consideration in deciding whether an offence is, or culpable homicide .. 1527
Knowledge of, when necessary .. 1528
Knowledge, when homicidal and when murderous .. 1528
Knowledge is something less than intention .. 1529
Knowledge is more than belief .. 1529
Operation of exceptions to section .. 1530
Whether act of homicide under clause (4) is committed without excuse is a question of fact .. 1530
Essentials of .. 1531
Intention is first requisite .. 1531
Motive, Place of, in proving .. 1531
Avarice, love, hatred, jealousy and revenge, fruitful source of murder in all countries .. 1531
Intention, how proved .. 1531, 1532
Intention rarely proved by direct evidence .. 1531
Case of express malice .. 1532
Murderous intention how judged .. 1532
Five points on which proof of intention in, is required, and these points considered 1532, 1538, 1539
Intention v. motive .. 1532, 1533
Intentional injury with knowledge of death of person injured .. 1533
Cases where deadly weapon is handled where there is knowledge of likelihood of death .. 1533
Not intention to cause death but intention to cause bodily injury likely to cause death .. 1533

Murder—(contd.)	PAGE
Both intention and knowledge, intention to injure and knowledge as to consequence of injury ..	1533
Illustrative cases ..	1534
Intention and injury sufficient to cause death ..	1535, 1536
Knowledge that the injury is likely to cause death, dispensed with ..	1535
Injury must be sufficient to cause death in the ordinary course of nature ..	1535
Knowledge of imminent danger ..	1536
Applicable to case of dangerous action without an intention to cause specific bodily injury to any person ..	1536
Accused must have committed the act without any excuse for incurring the risk of causing death of such injury ..	1536
Distinction between cl. (4) of s. 300 and cl. (c) of s. 299, explained ..	1536, 1537
Act of person whether dominated by a certain intention or knowledge ..	1538
Cases where act of accused is so reckless and negligent as to place the lives of many in jeopardy with knowledge of the same ..	1538
Case of firing in a crowd ..	1538
Negligent acts when may amount to ..	1538, 1539
Recklessness and inexcusability of act, how judged ..	1540
Degree of negligence necessary ..	1540
An act whether imminently dangerous, Question re ..	1540
Knowledge of danger necessary ..	1540
Mitigated, becomes culpable homicide ..	1541
Such mitigation may arise from (1) Provocation, (2) Excess of private defence, (3) Overexercise of legal powers, (4) Absence of premeditation, (5) Consent ..	1541
Punishment for (s. 302) ..	1573
Alternative sentence, at the discretion of the Court ..	1574
Court not hampered by conditions respecting discretion being given in the section ..	1574
Such refrainment advised ..	1574
Practice of court to see that the accused is defended in cases of ..	1574
Court has no other alternative punishment but death or transportation ..	1574
Court may recommend reduction of punishment to Local Goverment ..	1574
Fine cannot be added to sentence of death ..	1574
Summary of facts constituting ..	1575
Charge in, how framed, and form of ..	1576, 1577
Proof of ..	1577
Proof, in civil and criminal cases, compared ..	1577
Proof amounting to moral certainty beyond all reasonable doubt necessary ..	1577
Benefit of least doubt always to be given to accused ..	1577, 1578
Onus of proof is on the prosecution ..	1578
Duty of prosecution not to gain conviction of accused but to see justice done ..	1578
No such liability on accused but only to defend himself ..	1578
Difference between the procedure of the prosecution and the defence ..	1578, 1579
Admissible and inadmissible evidence in ..	1579, 1580
Intention and knowledge on the part of the accused, to be proved ..	1579
Statements before and after the act, of the accused, relevant ..	1579
Confession of accused, importance of ..	1579
Approvers, evidence of not conclusive ..	1580
Admissibility of evidence, to be determined immediately by the Judge and not to be postponed ..	1580
Corpus delicti, necessity of, Rule as to ..	1580
Rule a rule of caution and not of law ..	1580
Corpus delicti, history and meaning of ..	1580
Having regard to the definition of "Proved" in the Evidence Act, there is no

PAGE

Murder—(contd.)

room for the body doctrine 1580, 1581
Working of the doctrine .. 1581
When there should be an acquittal and mitigation of the sentence .. 1581
Post-mortem examination .. 1582
Nature of questions to be put to medical witness .. 1582
Certificate of medical man not per se admissible being hearsay evidence .. 1582
Evidence of identification of body should be taken .. 1582
Questions, different kinds of, in different cases of death .. 1583-1590
Plea of guilty in a charge of .. 1590
How to be recorded .. 1590
Charge must be read out and explained to accused 1590
"Explained to accused" meaning of .. 1590, 1591
English practice of advising accused to plead not guilty and to stand his trial .. 1591
No strict rule of pleading in criminal cases but Court must use discretion in case of statements in mitigation .. 1592
Charge to jury in .. 1592
Charge most important function of Court .. 1592
Case of perfunctory and legally defective charge .. 1592
Charge, in the trial of more than one accused .. 1592
Charge, in case of provocation .. 1593
Court not to be too particular of formalities of pleas, where accused undefended .. 1593
Case of misdirection, where Judge wrongly told jury that the confession was inadmissible .. 1593
Circumstantial evidence, Value of, in .. 1593
Witnesses may lie but circumstances cannot .. 1593
Case for conviction .. 1594
Motive though not necessary to prove offence yet a weighty circumstantial evidence .. 1595
Witness who materially improves, Previous statements of, not reliable .. 1595

PAGE

Murder—(concld.)

Punishment for, Measure of, upon what principle regulated .. 1596
Death, the only appropriate sentence where crime of the kind is rife .. 1596
Confession no ground for leniency .. 1596, 1597
Persons held constructively guilty .. 1597
Case of pregnant women .. 1597
Circumstances in mitigation of .. 1597
Circumstances of aggravation .. 1597, 1598
Cases for transportation .. 1598, 1599
Other cases of mitigation, cases of killing of malefactors receiving provocation, marital tyranny, drunkenness, etc. .. 1600
Where several are accused of, and no reliable evidence, case for transportation .. 1600
Killing for witch-craft, case for leniency .. 1601
Punishment for, by life-convict (s. 303) .. 1601
Section inapplicable to Europeans and Americans .. 1601
Manslaughter, Distinguished from .. 1612, 1613
Self-murder or suicide, abetment of (s. 306) .. 1637
Attempt to (1) by life convict or (2) by any other person (s. 307) .. 1641
Kidnapping or abduction in order to (s. 364) .. 1857, 1858
Actual, not a pre-requisite .. 1859
Intention or knowledge essential .. 1859
Dacoity with (s. 396) .. 2059
Robbery or dacoity with attempt to cause death or grievous hurt (s. 397) .. 2063
See Culpable homicide.

Mutiny—

Abetting, or attempting to seduce soldier, sailor or air-man from duty (s. 131) 799
Meaning of .. 800
Section compared with the provisions of the English Army Act .. 800
Non-combatants serving as camp-followers classed as soldiers for the offence .. 801

PAGE

Mutiny—(concld.)

Section relates to abetment not followed up by mutiny .. 802
Section not applicable to friendly advice .. 802
Asking soldiers not to fire on the mob when they have been commanded to do so, guilty of .. 802
Soldiers and sailors going on strike, their abettors guilty of .. 802
Abetment of mutiny if mutiny is committed in consequence thereof (s. 132) .. 802

N

Native Indian Subject—

Meaning of .. 184
Term nowhere defined .. 188
Native of India—Statutory meaning .. 188
Historical retrospect of the term .. 188
What the term excludes .. 189
European British Subject and, conflict between the two terms when possible 190
Native Indian Subject of His Majesty and, Distinction between .. 190
Foreigner, How a, could acquire the status of .. 199

Native State Subject—

Where punishable .. 173

Navigation—

See Public Nuisance.

Necessity—

Right of captain of ship at sea rests on law of .. 483
Act likely to cause harm but done to prevent harm (s. 81) .. 507
As a defence to criminality .. 508-512
Desire of self-preservation as a defence to criminality .. 508, 509
Position of danger being brought about without the fault of the accused .. 509,510

PAGE

Necessity—(concld.)

Distress and hunger as defence .. 510
Doctrine of .. 510-511
No justification for crimes .. 511, 512
Act done should be without criminal intention .. 511
"Intention," the word, here used in a narrow sense only .. 511
3 essential points to be established under the section .. 511
No limit placed by law, to the extent of the injury .. 512
Question if such injury could extend to the slaughter of a fellow-being .. 512
3 principles deducible from English cases on the point .. 514
'No necessity justifies homicide" explained .. 514
Justifying homicide .. 514
Limits of the rule .. 514,515
Dangerous method of detecting crime .. 515
Legitimate precautions for detecting crimes .. 515, 516
Cases under this section to be distinguished from cases of acts in self defence .. 516
To prevent forcible and atrocious crime justifies homicide .. 638

Negligence—

If gross, not punishable, unless illegal .. 288
What is culpable .. 309
Knowledge and .. 309
Culpable negligence distinguished from culpable rashness .. 309
Neglect to maintain wife and children no offence .. 312
Accident and criminal .. 501, 502
In driving .. 502, 503
Contributory, no defence .. 503, 1620, 1766
Contributory, Operation of .. 505
Of servant, master's liability for .. 505
In doing unlawful acts .. 506
Public servant suffering prisoner of war to escape (s. 129) .. 796
Deserter concealed on board merchant vessel through, of master (s. 137) .. 811

Negligence—(contd.) PAGE

Escape from confinement or custody negligently suffered by public servant (s. 223) .. 1222
Negligent escape from custody .. 1224
Confinement, meaning of .. 1224
What constitutes negligently suffering an escape .. 1225
Measure of negligence .. 1225-1226
Operation of, in Culpable homicide .. 1500, 1501
Gross, may amount to knowledge .. 1500
Act of, when may amount to murder .. 1537-1540
Causing death by (s. 304A) .. 1612
What is .. 1614
Manslaughter by, in English Law same as causing death by rash and negligent act .. 1615
Rash or negligent act, what is a .. 1615
Culpable, and culpable rashness distinction between .. 1615
Rash or negligent act must cause death in culpable homicide .. 1618
Only gross negligence culpable .. 1619
Becomes culpable by association .. 1622
In lawful and unlawful acts, difference between .. 1622
Use of a public way .. 1623
Only Criminal if diligence would have saved .. 1626-1627
By illegal omission .. 1627-1628
Must have materially contributed to the death in causing death by negligent act 1628-1629
Where consequence too remote, negligible .. 1630-1631
Contributory, why relevant 1632-1633
Contributory, how far irrelevant .. 1633-1634
Rash or negligent act endangering life (s. 336) .. 1760
Such act, a public nuisance .. 1760
Section applies only when act is done neither knowingly nor intentionally but only rashly or negligently .. 1760
All rashness and, is not necessarily criminal .. 1761

Negligence—(concld.) PAGE

To be criminal must be so gross as almost amount to reckless disregard of consequence .. 1761
4 degrees of criminality in criminal rashness or negligence .. 1761
Such acts of, not be directed to the injury of any one .. 1761
What are such acts, illustrations thereof .. 1761-1762
Without danger .. 1763
Causing hurt by act endangering life or personal safety of others (s. 337) .. 1763
2 stand-points of criminal rashness and .. 1764-1765
Causing grievous hurt by rash or negligent act endangering life (s. 338) .. 1766
Grievous hurt by criminal negligence .. 1766-1767
Degree of culpability judged by applying objective test of effect produced by .. 1766
Act involving violation of a rule or law .. 1767
Negligent acts not necessarily mischievous .. 2288
Negligent communication if amounts to defamation .. 2662

See Contributory Negligence, Public Nuisance, Criminal Negligence.

O

Oath—

Definition of (s. 51) .. 321
Definition in other enactments .. 322
What is an .. 322
Meaning of .. 322, 323
Declaration when tantamounts to .. 323
Solemn affirmation when is equivalent to .. 323
Form and administration of 323
Refusal to take (s. 178) .. 973
Refusing to swear .. 974

Obscene Publications—

See Public Nuisance.

Obstruction—

Of sale of property by public servant (s. 184) .. 1002
Must be intentional .. 1003
What is .. 1003

PAGE

Obstruction—(contd.)

Notices of bona fide claim, no 1003
To Public servant in discharge of public function (s. 186) .. 1006
Where the public servant is a Judicial officer .. 1007
Only in the execution of his duties and not at all times 1007
Illegal obstructions .. 1007-1008
3 Ingredients of the offence 1007
What is a public function .. 1007, 1008
Cases illustrative of "Public function" .. 1008-1010
"Public function" Question of, not one of intention or good faith .. 1009
"Public function" not strictly legal .. 1010
Illegal authority .. 1012
Voluntary .. 1012, 1013
What is an .. 1012, 1013
What is not an .. 1013, 1014
To acts in excess of jurisdiction .. 1013-1014
Acts which do not amount to 1015
Resistance or, by person to his lawful apprehension (s. 224) .. 1226-1227
Intention and legality of his arrest or detention the gist of the crime .. 1227
To offences dealt with in the section and both may be committed by the same person .. 1228
Escape or resistance to apprehension .. 1229
By person "charged" .. 1229
"Charged" meaning of .. 1229
Apprehension, lawful and unlawful .. 1230
Escape from lawful custody 1231
Resistance or, to lawful apprehension of another person (s. 225) .. 1234
Rescuing an offender .. 1236-1237
Meaning of "rescue" .. 1236
Rescue must be intentional .. 1237
Arrest or custody must be lawful .. 1237
Arrest under an unsigned warrant illegal .. 1238
Resistance or, to lawful apprehension, escape or rescue in cases not otherwise provided for (s. 225-B) .. 1240
Resistance not otherwise provided for .. 1241, 1242
Arrest must be legal .. 1242
Arrester must possess authority .. 1244
What is, to constitute wrongful restraint .. 1244

PAGE

Obstruction—(concld.)

Resistance to unlawful arrest 1245
Mischief by, to public drainage attended with damage (s. 432) .. 2329
See Wrongful Restraint.

Offences—

Under the Code supersede others .. 165, 167
On the High seas .. 173-174
On men of war .. 174
On air-ships and aeroplanes .. 175
Piracy .. 194, 196
Procedure in respect of, committed outside British India 200-201
Extradition re, committed outside British India .. 201
Europeans, By .. 202
Definition of, subject to general exceptions (s. 6) ..
Effect caused partly by illegal omission and partly by an act construed also an (s. 36) .. 301
By doing one of several acts (s. 37) .. 301
Definition of (s. 40) .. 311
Discussion of the term .. 311
English Law on .. 312
No, cases of .. 312
Order for maintenance, not a conviction for an .. 312
English Law, Division of offence Grand treason, Petit treason—what are .. 312
Felony, What is .. 312
Misprisions and misdemeanours .. 313
Division why conventional .. 313
Definition of, in Procedure Code .. 313
In the Code, distinguished .. 313
Defects of the definition, pointed out .. 314
Complex (s. 71) .. 379
Complex, how treated .. 379, 390
Compound .. 394, 395
Distinct .. 395
Alternative (s. 72) .. 398
Conviction of doubtful .. 400
Justifiable acts no, except in cases of infringement of special law .. 495
Communication made in good faith not an (s. 93) .. 596
Act causing slight harm no (s. 95) .. 601
Attempt to commit (s. 511) .. 2800
See Attempts, Extent, Punishment.

Officer—

Definition of, in the Army Act .. 240

PAGE

Officer—(concld).

Meaning of the term .. 240
Office and employment, Distinction between .. 240
Instances of .. 240
Ministerial, may appoint a deputy but a judicial officer cannot .. 242

Omission—

See Illegal Omission.

P

Penal Servitude—

As a sentence .. 336

See Punishment.

Penetration—

Not only necessary but sufficient to constitute intercourse necessary for rape 1925
Degree of, that is requisite to constitute rape .. 1925
Rupture of hymen not necessary to prove .. 1925
Proof of .. 1925
Impotent person cannot be convicted of an attempt to commit rape .. 1926
Sufficient for unnatural offences (s. 377, Expl.) .. 1931
Per anum necessary in case of unnatural offence on a human being .. 1936

Perjury—

See False Evidence.

Person—

Meaning of, as regards liability .. 172
Definition of (s. 11) .. 217
Meaning of .. 218, 219

Personal Injury—

See Injury.

Personation at Elections—

Definition of (s. 171D) .. 935
Provisions under the English Law .. 935, 936
Undue influence and, compared .. 936
English Law copied with its obvious defects .. 936
Personation committed ignorantly not an offence .. 936
Punishment for (s. 171F) .. 938
English Law treats personation as more serious offence 939

PAGE

Pick-pockets—

Provision against (s. 356) .. 1826

Piracy—

Meaning of .. 194
Elements of .. 194, 195
Liability for .. 194, 196
Slave dealer by sea treated as a pirate .. 1889
Stranding a ship for plunder (s. 439) .. 2339
Ship need not be injured .. 2339
Literary piracy not within provisions of the Code .. 2519

Plea of Guilty—

Judge not bound to accept a 1591
Construction of pleas .. 1591, 1592

Poison—

Hurt by .. 1716
Meaning of .. 1716
Grievous hurt by means of (s. 326) .. 1723
What is, for purposes of section 326 .. 1726
Administering, with intent to commit offence (s. 328) .. 1729
English Law on the point .. 1730
Meaning of "administers" or "causes to be taken" .. 1731
Elements necessary to constitute the offence .. 1731
What is "caused to be taken" .. 1732
Swallowing necessary .. 1732-1733
Cases of causing miscarriage 1733
Question by whom poison was given not material when accused was instrumental in getting it .. 1733
Intention or knowledge necessary .. 1733-1734
Degree of criminality .. 1735
Evidence of quantity and effect of poison administered necessary .. 1735

Poisoning—

Death by, Questions to a medical witness in case of 1583, 1584
Death by, Questions to a non-professional witness .. 1584

Possession—

Property in, of wife, clerk or servant of a person (s. 27) 277
The section as originally framed .. 277
Criticism on the original section .. 278
English view of .. 278
Custody distinguished from 278

PAGE

Possession—(contd.)

Difference between the Indian and the English view of .. 278
Of wife, means only during the conjugal relationship .. 279
The term wife used in the widest sense .. 279
The Hindu wife in, of her stridhan is not in, on account of her husband .. 279
Constructive, in criminal law 279
The person in, need not be the owner .. 279
Doctrine of, not to be extended to illegal possession of things .. 279
Actual or physical, protected by criminal law .. 279
Only that of a thief not protected by criminal law .. 279
How determined .. 279
Of Instruments for using the same in counterfeiting coin (s. 235) .. 1278
What is possession 1280, 1281, 1942, 2162, 2356
Proof of conscious retention necessary for the offence .. 1281
Evidence of possession .. 1281
Hindu family and .. 1282
Of altered coin with previous knowledge (s. 252) .. 1309
Of altered Queen's coin with previous knowledge (s. 253) .. 1310
Delivery of altered coin which when first possessed not known to be altered (s. 254) 1310
Innocent, but guilty delivery 1311
Of instrument or material for counterfeiting Government stamp (s. 256) .. 1313
Mere, itself not material .. 1314
Of counterfeit Government stamp (s. 259) .. 1318
Which is a prelude to an intended imposition is an offence .. 1319
Being in, of false weights and measures (s. 266) .. 1335
Of false weight, fraud expectant .. 1336
Nature of such .. 1336
Mere, not an offence unless accompanied by criminal intention .. 1336
Person having, putting aside wrong weight or measure as not being in use but still in possession, no liability .. 1336
When may a person be said to be in, of property .. 1408

PAGE

Possession—(contd.)

Implies control and temporary dominion over property .. 1408
One in charge has not the same right as one in .. 1408
Charge and, distinction between .. 1408
Of an animal, Negligent conduct of a person in, liability of .. 1425
Possession not defined in the Code .. 1942
English conception of, arbitrary .. 1942
In theft, possession not ownership the subject of protection 1941, 1965, 1968
——What is .. 1942
——Property must be in .. 1961
——Property must be in, of any person i.e., a human being .. 1961, 1970
——Need not be actual but may be symbolical .. 1961, 1962
——Taker in joint, no offence 1965
——Conversion of joint, into an exclusive one is theft .. 1965
——Protection of, against title, cases illustrative of .. 1965, 1966
——No theft when, of person from whom owner took property is not legal 1969
——Legal presumption from recent possession .. 1985
——Such, must be recent .. 1987
——Recent, what is .. 1987
——Possession should be exclusively traced to accused .. 1990, 1991
Distinguishes theft by clerk or servant from criminal breach of trust by same .. 1999
Nature of employer's, in case of theft by clerk or servant 2006
Mere, of weapons per se is evidence of preparation in offence under section 382 .. 2003
Mere, if sufficient for criminal misappropriation .. 2095
Distinguishes theft from criminal misappropriation as the latter may be committed in respect of property not in possession .. 2104
Criminal misappropriation of property possessed by a deceased person at the time of his death (s. 404) 2109
Nature of, requisite to make property stolen property .. 2162

PAGE

Possession—(contd.)

Transfer of, when necessary to constitute property stolen property .. 2163
Mere, of stolen property not an offence .. 2167
Exclusive, necessary to offence of receiving stolen property .. 2175
Means conscious possession 2176
Such possession how proved 2176
Illustrative cases .. 2177
In the case of a joint family 2177, 2178
Of husband and wife .. 2178
English Law as to such .. 2179
Dishonest retention of stolen property, change in the mental element of possession necessary to constitute 2184
Presumption arising from recent, of stolen property .. 2185
Nature of such presumption and how determined .. 2189
Criminal trespass re, Nature of possession necessary to complain of .. 2356, 2357
——Meaning of "in the possession of another" in section 441 .. 2356
——Person having a right to possession may also be guilty .. 2357
——Not title but possession intended to be protected in section 441 .. 2356
——Limit to which Code allows constructive possession 2356, 2357
——Must be actual and exclusive .. 2358
——Illegal, excluded .. 2358
——Must be peaceful .. 2358
——Possession without title entitled to legal protection only when sufficiently long as to raise an inference of acquiescence by owner .. 2359
——Unlawfully remaining in, after lawful possession when guilty of .. 2360
Having, of counterfeit seal, plate, etc., with intent to commit forgery under section 467 (s. 472) .. 2495
Having, of counterfeit seal, plate, etc., with intent to commit forgery punishable otherwise (s. 473) .. 2497
Mere possession of such seal, plate, etc., without any such intent, no liability .. 2496
Of forged document, knowing it to be forged and intending to use it as genuine (s. 474) .. 2498
Is gist of offence of possessing forged document in section 474 .. 2498
Criminal, of forged document, what is .. 2499
Implies control and to be criminal it must be exclusive .. 2499
Having, of any die, plate, etc., for counterfeiting a trade-mark or property-mark (s. 485) .. 2546
Of counterfeiting instrument 2548
Of counterfeit trade labels .. 2548
Of goods bearing counterfeit trade-mark .. 2551
Implies consciousness of the spurious character of the trade-mark .. 2551, 2552
For purposes of trade of such goods .. 2552
Criminal, of forged notes .. 2564
Having, of instrument for counterfeiting currency notes or bank notes (s. 489D) .. 2564, 2565

Postal Articles—

Detection and destruction of .. 494

Post-mortem Examination—

Advantage of, in determining sufficiency of injury and mode of death besides evidence of death .. 1582
May put new complexion on the whole case .. 1582
Nature of questions to be put to the medical man .. 1582
Evidence of identity to be taken in case of .. 1582
Poisoning, in cases of, evidence of identification of articles .. 1582
Questions to a medical man—
in case of poisoning .. 1583, 1584 in case of personal violence .. 1584
in case of infanticide .. 1585
in case of strangulation .. 1586, 1587
in case of drowning .. 1587
in case of rape .. 1587
Questions to a non-professional witness in case of poisoning .. 1584

Preamble—

To the Act (s. 1) .. 153

PAGE

Pre-emption–

Overstatement of consideration in case of transfer of property subject to, when fraudulent .. 2279

Preparation—

Premeditation and, inconsistent with assumption of loss of self-control .. 1551
Attempt distinguished from 1644, 1654, 2805
Making, to commit dacoity (s. 399) .. 2069
Mere, punishable .. 2069
What is .. 2070, 2071
Nature of, necessary .. 2070
How proved .. 2071
Instances of .. 2071
For dacoity distinguished from an attempt .. 2071
Mere, as distinct from attempt punishable in the offence of having possession of forged documents 2408
Second stage in the commission of the crime .. 2805
When a distinct offence .. 2810

Presidency—

Definition and meaning of (s. 18) .. 224

Presidency Town—

Meaning of .. 224

Presumption—

Arising from recent possession of stolen property 1985, 2185, 2186
Of fact and of law .. 2185
Of law, what is .. 2185
Of fact, three kinds of, What are .. 2185, 2186
Nature of, how determined .. 2189
As to property being proceeds of dacoity .. 2193, 2194

Principle—

See under each section.

Printer—

See Defamation.

Private Defence—

Life and .. 515
Act done in, no offence (s. 96) .. 606
Policy of .. 608
Allows greater latitude than the English Law though substantially agreeing with it .. 607
What is .. 607

PAGE

Private Defence—(contd.)

Founded on the doctrine of "Self-help" 607, 608, 630
Bentham's opinion on the point .. 608
Not defined in the Code .. 608
Plea of .. 608, 609
Plea of, cannot stand against the right of .. 610
No right of, against an act which is not an offence .. 608
Must be pleaded and proved by the defence .. 608
Proper time to plead .. 608, 609
If incompatible with other plea .. 609
Right of, of the body and of property (s. 97) .. 610
Section 99 complementary to this section .. 611
Extent of .. 611
Against unlawful aggression .. 611
Burden of proof in .. 611
Plea of, when to be raised .. 611
Neglect of this point in cases of affray .. 612
Defence of person .. 612
Right of, what it consists .. 612
Right of, absolute and unqualified, not any the less because of malice .. 612
Right postulates attempt to commit or commission of offence .. 613
Right of, is a right of defence and not of punishment for past and prospective inequities .. 613
Defence of property .. 613, 614
Right to possession immaterial .. 613
Preparation necessary for, if allowed for resisting unlawful aggression .. 613, 614
Dictum of Allahabad High Court not allowing such preparation .. 613, 614
Against what acts justifiable .. 614
Section inexhaustive and why .. 615
Amount of justifiable force .. 615
Amount depends upon danger actually present and upon danger apprehended .. 615
Against mischief .. 615
Against criminal trespass .. 616, 617
Against disturbance of possession .. 616
Peaceful possession necessary to entitle .. 616

Private Defence—(contd.)	PAGE
Such possession not to be that of a thief ..	616
Against forcible work or service ..	617
No right of, in a case of premeditated riot ..	617
Right of, against act of a person of unsound mind (s. 98) ..	617
Right exists irrespective of physical or mental incapacity of assailant ..	618
Right prevails against overt attacks irrespective of intention and meaning ..	618
Acts against which there is no right of (s. 99) ..	618, 619
Limitation to the exercise of the right of ..	620
Acting in good faith under colour of office ..	620
Against acts which do not reasonably cause apprehension of death ..	620
When a person has no ..	620
More logical arrangement of the sections referring to the right of ..	620
Right against public servants ..	620, 621
Presumption of law that their acts are legal ..	620
Two things essential for the protection of the public servant ..	621
Public servant must have jurisdiction ..	621
Not strictly justifiable by law ..	622
Clause not intended to cure want of jurisdiction but only the erroneous exercise of it ..	622
Cases of such acts ..	622, 623
Acts under directions of public servants ..	624
Illustrative cases ..	575
General warrants ..	624, 625
Right of, when not affected ..	627, 628
Meaning of, "recourse to authorities" ..	628
The words "in which there is time" is rather ambiguous and misleading ..	628
Right of ejecting a trespasser ..	629
Right of retaining possession ..	629

Private Defence—(contd.)	PAGE
Law does not permit free fights to settle disputes which can be settled through Court ..	629
Against encroachments valid	630
Question if there was time to have recourse to authorities, a question of fact ..	630
To decide if there was time to have recourse to authorities, Points to be considered ..	630
Commencement of the right ..	631
Quantum of harm justifiable ..	631
Allowance to be made for the exaggeration of danger by the person threatened ..	631
Illustrative cases ..	632, 633
Excessive force ..	633, 634
Unjustifiable force ..	634, 635
Circumstances —which justify and which do not ..	634
Illustrative cases ..	635, 636
Limits of the rule ..	636
No right of, where no violation of legal right ..	636
Right of, when extends to causing death (s. 100) ..	636, 637
Homicide justifiable only on plea of necessity in prevention of forcible and atrocious crimes ..	638
The limitations prescribed in section 99 apply to this section also ..	638
Cases of justifiable homicide ..	638
What is reasonable danger ..	640, 641
When homicide justifiable ..	640
Facts to be proved when pleading self-defence ..	641, 642
Belief in such danger must be bona fide though wholly mistaken ..	642
Right of, when extends to causing any harm other than death (s. 101) ..	64[illegible]
Restrictions prescribed in s. 99 applicable to the whole law of, ..	642
Offences against which this right available ..	642
Excessive harm in the exercise of, ..	643
Commencement and continuance of right of, of body (s. 102) ..	643

Private Defence—(contd.) PAGE

Section postulates reasonable apprehension of danger to body .. 644
Commencement of the right of .. 645
Would not extend to superstitious fears .. 645
Threats used as vulgar abuse not allowed to have right of .. 645
Threat not of present but future time not allowed right of .. 645
Dividing line between criminality and non-criminality, not always easy to see .. 647
Continuance of the right of .. 647
Right not available to justify a crime .. 647
Right to protect the innocent .. 647
Force cannot be used in the prosecution of an illegal object .. 647
Right of, of property when extends to causing of death (s. 103) .. 647, 648
English Law how differs .. 648
Enumeration of offences against which right of, avails .. 649
Death in protection of property .. 649
Of right of property when extends to causing any harm other than death (s. 104) .. 650
Harm in this section means use of force and not mere abuse punishable under section 504 .. 650
When homicide is unjustifiable .. 650, 651
Who may be harmed .. 651
Right of, of property, commencement and continuance of (s. 105) .. 651, 652
Section criticised as too much restricted .. 652
Against what offences does the right of, avail .. 651, 652
When it commences .. 653
Right of, if available when property unrecovered, though all contingencies satisfied .. 653
Defect in section 105 .. 653
When the right ends .. 654, 655
How the section differs from section 99 .. 654
Against Robbery .. 655

Private Defence—(concld.) PAGE

Against Criminal trespass and mischief .. 655
Against House-breaking .. 655, 656
Against misappropriation and receiving of stolen property .. 656
Right of, against deadly assault when there is risk of harm to innocent person (s. 106) .. 656
Only in case of extreme necessity this right available .. 656
Follows English Law .. 656
Should not be excessive .. 656
Right of, against public nuisance .. 1342
When exceeded becomes culpable homicide only if unintentional but murder if intentional .. 1554
Right of, against public servant not same as that available against the public .. 1748
Right not available to a lurking house-trespasser or house-breaker for causing grievous hurt .. 2417

Privilege of Speech—

Of Judges, counsel, parties and witnesses .. 2734
Of Members of the Legislature in the House .. 2753

Procedure and Practice—

In case of offences under the Code .. 157
Offences committed outside British India, Re .. 200
Punishments, Chapter on, relates to procedure .. 329
See under each section.

Procession—

Right of 862, 863, 1029

Promissory Notes—

Are Bank Notes 2560
Therefore offences against, punishable as against Bank Notes .. 2560
See Currency Notes or Bank Notes

Proof—

See under each Section.

Property—	PAGE
Definition of in Larceny Act	252
Meaning of	252
Classification of, under English Law	252
Offences against, Topical Introduction	1939-1943
Necessity for the branches of remedies criminal and civil	1939
Protection of, concern of the State in all systems of law	1939
General view of offences against	1939, 1940
Ten forms of the violations of the rights of	1939
Object of the Code punitive but not preventive	1940
Possession not ownership the subject of protection	1941
General limitations subject to which chapter on, must be read	1941, 1942
Offences against, Distinction based on the mode of dispossession	1943
Possession not defined in the Code	1942
What is possession	1942
English conception of possession, arbitrary	1942
Kinds of property capable of being subject of theft	1950-1957
What is, for purposes of criminal misappropriation	2102
No, no misappropriation	2103, 2104
Abandoned	2104
Possession not necessary for misappropriation	2104
Derelict	2105
Right of finder of, when owner is traceable and when he is not	2106
When, is mislaid but not lost	2107
Finder's duty to trace owner, English and Indian Law as to	2108
Abandoned and property lost, Distinction between	2109
Theft of, possessed by a person at the time of his death (s. 404)	2109
Policy of law to protect the assets of the deceased	2111
Assets referred to is only moveable	2111
Must be moveable property for the offence of Criminal Breach of Trust	2122, 2123
Trade-mark and copy right how far	2516, 2517

Property-mark—	PAGE
Definition of (s. 479)	2519
What is a Property-mark	2520
Distinguished from Trade mark	2520
Distinction peculiar to Penal Code	2520
English Law, no such distinction	2520
Must relate to moveable property only	2521
"Belonging to a particular person" meaning of	2521
Does not necessarily imply ownership	2521
Using a false (s. 481)	2532
Punishment for using a false trade mark or (s. 482)	2532
Limitation for a prosecution under this section	2534
Offences relating to infringement of, purpose in view	2536
Mens rea Burden of proof of, in offence re	2536
Law presumes fraudulent intent from an imitation which is reasonably calculated to deceive	2536
Use of such mark was without knowledge and without intention to defraud, good defence	2541
Counterfeiting a, used by another (s. 483)	2543
Limitation for prosecution under this section	2543
Counterfeiting a, used by a public servant (s. 484)	2544
Making or having in possession any die, plate or other instrument of counterfeiting a trade-mark or (s. 485)	2546
Counterfeiting instruments possession of	2548
Possession must be for purpose of counterfeiting	2548
Purpose how proved	2548
Possession of counterfeit labels	2548, 2549
Possession of a, when criminal	2549
Selling goods with a counterfeit trade-mark or property-mark (s. 486)	2549
Section extends penalty to those who promote circulation or consumption of such goods	2549, 2550
Criminality consists in merely selling, exposing or having in possession for sale goods

PAGE

Property-mark—(concld.)

apart from intention or knowledge .. 2550
Defences open to the accused 2551
Sale or possession, what is .. 2553
Books held to fall in the category of goods and hence bookseller also punishable under this section .. 2553
Tampering with, with intent to cause injury (s. 489) .. 2557
Section applicable to property-mark only .. 2557
Section intended to prevent misappropriation of things by removal or tampering with .. 2557
Tampering with .. 2558
Section requires proof of criminal intention or knowledge .. 2558

See Trade-mark.

Prostitution—

Procuration of a minor girl (s. 366-A) .. 1870
Section newly added by Act XX of 1923 .. 1871
Provisions of International Convention for the suppression of White Slave Traffic .. 1871
Origin of the section .. 1871
Age raised from 16 to 18 .. 1871
Intention or knowledge of likelihood necessary for the offence .. 1871
Section does not penalize prostitution .. 1871
Not necessary that the means employed should be illegal 1872
Importation of girl from foreign country (s. 366-B) 1873
Girl should be below 21 years 1873
Importation of woman, What is .. 1874
Points to be proved for the offence . 1874
Selling minors for purposes of (s. 372) .. 1890
Section amended and scope enlarged by Act XVIII of 1924 .. 1891
Offence, a special case of kidnapping .. 1891
Immoral intention gist of the crime .. 1891
Section assumes reasonable age of the girl a good defence .. 1891
Object of the legislature .. 1891, 1892

PAGE

Prostitution—(contd.)

Sections 372 and 373 counterparts of each other .. 1893
Disposal of minor for marriage or adoption, no offence 1893
Person who gives and person who takes possession commit distinct offences and cannot both be tried together .. 1893
Change of possession not necessary for the offence .. 1894
"Immoral," what is—not defined in the Code advisedly for it depends on customs and social habits of the people .. 1893, 1904
"Unlawful and immoral purpose", significance of the phrase 1894, 1903, 1904
Old law and the new, differences between .. 1894, 1895
Disposal of minors for immoral purposes, What is .. 1895-1898
Sale, what is .. 1895, 1896
Let on hire, what is .. 1896
Position of Devadasis, Basavis, Murlis and such others 1898-1899
"Dispose of", meaning of the phrase .. 1899, 1900
Minor must be under 18 years 1900
Intention and knowledge with reference to the offence .. 1900, 1901
Prostitution presumed in case of disposal of, to prostitutes and such others until contrary is proved .. 1901, 1902
Prostitution and Illicit Intercourse, meaning of .. 1902, 1903
Meaning of "Immoral" purpose .. 1904
Penal law overrides precepts of private laws such as Hindu Law .. 1904
Buying minor for purposes of (s. 373) .. 1905
This section also amended with its counterpart section 372 by the same Act (XVIII of 1924) .. 1905
Receiver guilty while giver may be innocent .. 1905
Person taking possession of a minor without any giver guilty under this section .. 1906
Sections 372 and 373 not intended to suppress traffic in immorality but only to save persons below 18 years .. 1906
16 years altered to 18 years as a person attains majority then .. 1907

Prostitution—(concld.) PAGE

Possession need not be taken from third party .. 1907
Purchasing minor prostitutes, What is .. 1907
Section refers to minors irrespective of sex .. 1907
Essential ingredients of the offence .. 1907
Casual connection expressly made liable under the section .. 1909
Immoral act with a member of his own household, no offence under the section .. 1909
What intention or knowledge material .. 1909
Case of adoption by prostitute, presumption rebuttable .. 1909
Prostitution intended must be when under 18 years .. 1910

Provocation—

See Culpable homicide, Grievous Hurt, Hurt, Murder.

Public Place—

What is a .. 883
Act done in a public place and act done in public, Distinction between .. 884

Public Mischief—

Statements conducing to (s. 505) .. 2782, 2783
Provisions of the section before the amendment of 1898 2783
Justification for the amendment .. 2783
Compared with section 153-A .. 2784
Offence when can be sedition .. 2784
What is .. 2785
Scope of the section .. 2785
Dissemination of what matter prohibited .. 2785, 2786
No exception in favour of truth .. 2785 2786

Public Nuisance—

Offences relating to, Topical Introduction .. 1339, 1342
Title of the chapter is itself a definition of .. 1339
Nuisances of two kinds, public and private .. 1339

Public Nuisance—(contd.) PAGE

Private nuisances are not indictable but subject to civil action .. 1339
Nuisances under the old laws 1339-1340
No definition of, in English Law .. 1340
Is both indictable and actionable .. 1341
Common feature of all .. 1341
11 principal cases of, specifically dealt with in the Code .. 1341, 1342
Other cases of minor nuisances dealt with under various special and local laws .. 1342
Private defence against .. 1342
Right to remove .. 1342
Definition of (s. 268) 1342, 1343
Section intended to protect 3 classes of persons .. 1343
Criminality in respect of, depends not on knowledge or intention but injurious effect .. 1343
Analysis of .. 1344
Act or illegal omission essential .. 1344
That it was done in assertion of one's right in property or in one's own property or from time immemorial are no defences to .. 1344
Defence of that the man went to the nuisance considered .. 1344
Prescription no justification for continuance of .. 1344
Bona fide dispute .. 1345
Presence of other nuisances will not justify any one of them .. 1345
Every omission resulting in a nuisance is not indictable .. 1345, 1346
Illegal omission only indictable .. 1361
Common injury to the public essential .. 1347
Who are the "Public" .. 1347
The class must obviously be non-sectarian and numerically sufficient to be called the public .. 1347
Section not intended to apply to acts and omissions calculated to offend the sentiments of a class .. 1347
No common injury to public where no public or persons sufficiently at hand to feel annoyance .. 1348

Public Nuisance—(contd.)	PAGE
Common danger essential ..	1349
Material injury essential ..	1349, 1350
Annoyance essential ..	1350
Not necessary that a number of men should complain ..	1350
Person collecting a crowd guilty of, though it is not his object ..	1351
Annoyance must be to public	1351
Disorderly houses when and how far a ..	1351
Common gaming house a, under English Law and if it is so under the Code ..	1352
Legalised nuisances or nuisances of necessity ..	1352, 1354
Legalised nuisances, Distinction between acts which are imperative and acts which are merely authorised ..	1352, 1353
Acts necessarily legalising ..	1353
Railway or Tramway Company, when indictable for	1353, 1354
Liability of the Company depends upon the two questions (1) could the nuisance have been avoided? (2) Did the Company take reasonable care to avoid it ..	1353
Temporary ..	1354
Question of nuisance is a question of circumstances —What would be, in Belgravia will not be, in Bermondsey ..	1354, 1355
Annoyance complained of must not only be real but reasonable ..	1355
Injury to exercise of Public right ..	1355
Essentials in such a case of ..	1355
Conflict of views ..	1356
Enumeration of acts held to be ..	1356, 1357
Acts subversive of morality whatever their object, are ..	1356
Disposal of the dead, Law as to ..	1357
Cremation ground, if and when ..	1357
Actual injury or obstruction not necessary, when it is an encroachment on a public right ..	1358
Master liable for act of servant ..	1358
Offence of, an exception to the general rule which makes criminal liability dependent upon criminal intention or knowledge ..	1358
Master liable even if workmen do it without his knowledge or against his orders ..	1358
Convenience or advantage no defence ..	1359
Accused liable even if he did in a reasonable manner and took all precautions if it was really a nuisance ..	1359
Negligent act likely to spread infection of disease dangerous to life (s. 269) ..	1359
Criminal dissemination of infection ..	1360, 1361
Responsibility of the accused varies with his knowledge of the infectious character of the disease ..	1360
Elements of criminality under the section ..	1361
Disease must be infectious ..	1361
Infectious and contagious diseases, Distinction between ..	1361
Diseases held to be infectious under English Law ..	1361
Accused's knowledge or belief ..	1362
Act must be done unlawfully or negligently ..	1362, 1363
Mere omission to fulfil the dictates of one's moral duty is not unlawful ..	1363
Communication of syphilis, etc. through sexual intercourse by a woman, if guilty ..	1363
Malignant act likely to spread infection of disease dangerous to life (s. 270) ..	1364
Offence same as in section 269, difference being one of degree ..	1364, 1365
Malignant act and a negligent act, Distinction between ..	1364
Means adopted must not only be believed to be infectious but must be really so ..	1365
Disobedience of quarantine rule (s. 271) ..	1366
Disobedience of preventive rules ..	1366, 1367
Rule must be legal ..	1366
When rule clear and disobedience wilful, question of motive or intention immaterial ..	1367
Adulteration of food or drink (s. 272) ..	1367, 1368

Public Nuisance—(contd.) PAGE

Section not confined to food and drink intended for human consumption .. 1368, 1372
Section confined to adulteration which make the food or drink noxious .. 1368
Adulteration with harmless ingredients not liable under the section .. 1368
"Noxious" meaning of .. 1368
Sale of noxious food or drink (s. 273) .. 1369
Not only adulterated but also those which become noxious by lapse of time included .. 1369
Food or drink includes drug 1370
Sale of unfit food or drink 1370
What are deemed articles of food .. 1370, 1371
True test whether an article is an article of food .. 1371
There must be exposure, offer or sale .. 1371
Neither serving at dinner, nor pledge of an article of food an offence .. 1371
Article must be noxious or unfit for consumption .. 1372
Knowledge necessary .. 1372
Knowledge of the purchaser immaterial .. 1372
Act reprobated not on account of cheating but because it is injurious to public health .. 1372
Knowledge or belief if and when may be inferred .. 1373
Master liable for act of servant .. 1373
Adulteration of drugs (s. 274) .. 1373
Court empowered on conviction to order destruction of the drug .. 1374
Section directed against adulteration but not against purveying of drugs of an inferior quality .. 1375
Sections directed against fraud .. 1375
Test as to what constitutes adulteration .. 1375
If the change is beneficial it is an improvement and not an adulteration .. 1375
Sale of adulterated drugs (s. 275) .. 1375
English Law, provisions of, the point .. 1376, 1377

Public Nuisance—(contd.) PAGE

Sale of drugs by unqualified persons prohibited under English Law but not so in India .. 1378
Enforcement of the section requires further provisions like those under English Law .. 1378
Drug or medicinal preparation, what is .. 1378
Test is what is its ordinary and normal use .. 1378
Adulteration, what is .. 1378, 1379
Alteration by extraction of vital constituents from the drug is adulteration .. 1378
Meaning of sells, offers or exposes .. 1379
Mere possession of such drug, no liability .. 1379
Exposure does not mean that the article itself should be exposed to view .. 1379
Mere canvasser getting commission on sales is excluded as not being a seller .. 1379
Sale of drug as a different drug or preparation (s. 276) .. 1380
Examples of such substitutes which are common .. 1380
No offence if the seller apprises the purchaser of the difference .. 1381
Fouling water of public spring or reservoir (s. 277) 1381
Water of a public spring or reservior is res communioe 1382
Fouling water of public spring .. 1382
Essentials of the offence .. 1382
Act must be voluntary .. 1382, 1383
Nuisance must relate to public spring or reservoir .. 1383
What is a spring or reservoir 1383
Canal or river if spring or reservoir .. 1383
Question of spring or reservoir has only a limited bearing for accused could be made liable under section 290 .. 1383
What is a public spring or reservoir .. 1383
Fouling necessary .. 1384
Fouling means rendering filthy, putrid, corrupt, muddy, etc. .. 1384
Fouling does not refer to rendering unholy by touch of a person of low caste .. 1384

Public Nuisance—(contd.)	PAGE
How water may be corrupted or fouled	1384
Degree of fouling immaterial	1384
Making atmosphere noxious to health (s. 278)	1385
Vitiating atmosphere	1385, 1386
Right to nuisance cannot be acquired by prescription	1386
But if the nuisance existed for a long time it is not liable unless the nuisance has materially increased	1386
Conflicting rights of plaintiff and defendant in such a case	1387
No liability if sanctioned by the Legislature	1387
Harm must be general	1387
Rash driving or riding in a public way (s. 279)	1388
Provisions under the English Law on the point	1388
Doctrine of criminal negligence	1389
13 sections in the Code dealing with criminal rashness or negligence	1389
Common feature of all that the act is not premeditated or done on purpose	1389
Accused punished not for the act but for the manner of doing it	1389
Culpable negligence and culpable rashness—What are and how distinguished	1389
Imputability arises from the neglect of the civil duty of circumspection	1389
Section is more preventive than punitive	1390
Rash and negligent driving	1390
Rash and negligent driving, essentials of	1390
Liability depends upon the time, place and the nature of the act	1391
Municipal bye-laws regulating traffic to be observed	1391
No liability by mere non-observance of the rule	1391
Rash driving must be on "public way"	1392
What is a "public way"	1392
Public way and Highway, distinction between	1392
3 kinds of public way	1392
Private way could become public when dedicated so	1392
Highway includes way on water	1392, 1396
The act must be dangerous	1393

Public Nuisance—(contd.)	PAGE
Hurt or injury need not have been caused	1393
Respondeat superior	1394
Contributory negligence	1394, 1395
Contributory negligence though no defence is yet an element in considering liability under the section	1395
Rash navigation of a vessel (s. 280)	1395
Section applicable to inland navigation only and not on the high seas	1396
Rashness and negligence must be the immediate cause of the accident	1396, 1397
Contributory negligence considered in determining causation as well as fixing a measure of liability of the accused	1396, 1398
Rash navigation, essentials of	1396
Measure of criminal negligence, what is	1398
Exhibition of false light, mark or buoy (s. 281)	1398, 1399
Section applicable only to intentional negligence	1399
Showing false signals	1399
"False light," meaning of	1399
Section applies to acts, not to illegal omissions	1[illegible]
Conveying person by water for hire in unsafe or overloaded vessel (s. 282)	1400
Section confined to common carriers by water	1400
Liability of Railways, provision in the Indian Railways Act	1400
Conveying in unsafe or overloaded boat	1401
Person exempt from payment of ferry due deemed to be person carried for hire	1401
Danger or obstruction in public way or line of navigation (s. 283)	1401
Section General and overlaps other sections in the chapter	1402
Omission, limited to such as relates to some property	1402
Endangering a highway	1403
Limits of sufferable nuisance	1404, 1405
Omission to take order	1406
Juridical persons liable	1407
Danger or obstruction to some person necessary	1407, 1408
A mere apprehension of injury not sufficient to support conviction	1407

Public Nuisance—(contd.) PAGE

Liability of person in charge or in possession of property .. 1408
Negligent conduct with respect to poisonous substance (s. 284) .. 1408-1409
Nuisance with respect to poisons .. 1410
In case of poisons a person negligently injuring himself is also liable .. 1411
Negligent conduct with respect to fire or combustible matter (s. 285) .. 1411
Nuisance by fire .. 1412
Combustible thing distinguished from an explosive thing .. 1412
Meaning of injury .. 1413
Owner of house in which a fire originates cannot be convicted without proof or rashness or negligence .. 1414
Negligent conduct with respect to explosive substance (s. 286) .. 1414
Explosive substance, definition of, under the Explosives Act .. 1415
Nuisance by an explosive .. 1415
Petroleum not an explosive but still rules are provided for its carriage and storage 1415
Section not intended to punish every careless act but only where the accused sees or could foresee the danger .. 1416
Negligent conduct with respect to machinery (s. 287) 1417
Nuisance by machinery .. 1419
What is machinery .. 1419
Degree of care necessary .. 1419
Negligent conduct with respect to pulling down or repairing buildings (s. 288) 1420
Nuisance from falling buildings .. 1421
Refers to building situate in populous neighbourhood or abutting on a highway .. 1421
Liability is with reference to danger to human life from the fall of the building and not to annoyance or inconvenience .. 1421
Negligent conduct with respect to animals (s. 289) .. 1422
Not confined to animals feræ naturæ as tiger or bear .. 1422
Applies to all animals wild or domestic .. 1422

Public Nuisance—(contd.) PAGE

Reason because of its danger as well as of the terror to the public .. 1422
Negligent management of animals .. 1423
Section deals only with criminal omissions and not with criminal acts .. 1423
In animals feræ naturæ onus of having taken precaution is on the accused whereas it is the other way in the case of domestic animals .. 1423
What omissions are criminal 1423, 1424
Negligence of accused how proved .. 1423
In the case of domestic animals, it must be shown that accused was aware of its savage disposition .. 1424
Degree of negligence that is criminal .. 1425
Only person in possession liable .. 1425
Bull set at large in accordance with religious practice, owner not liable .. 1426
Measure of probable danger 1426
Cases not otherwise provided for (s. 290) .. 1426
Where the orders of the Civil Court and Criminal Court are conflicting Civil Court to be obeyed .. 1427
Miscellaneous nuisances .. 1427
Nuisances under special or local laws .. 1428
Corporation can be guilty of 1429
Cases of no nuisance .. 1429
Section limits liability to the actual nuisance-feasor .. 1429
Continuance of, after injunction to discontinue (s. 291) 1429
Provision for enhanced penalty .. 1430, 1431
Provisions of section 75 not applicable .. 1430
Person repeating a nuisance after conviction under a specific section of this chapter not liable under this section .. 1430
Section applicable only where, is repeated or continued after injunction .. 1430
Prosecution for repetition or continuance of, may be in addition to penalty for contempt .. 1431
Injunction must be to accused individually and not by general proclamation .. 1431

Public Nuisance—(contd.)	PAGE
Injunction must be legal ..	1431
Repetition or continuance must be after being enjoined by public servant against it ..	1431
Prima facie order presumed to be legal unless illegality apparent or shown ..	1431
Sale, etc., of obscene books, etc., (s. 292) ..	1431, 1432
Test of and what is obscenity ..	1432, 1434
Sections 292 and 293 to be amended and the proposed sections ..	1432, 1433
Court on conviction empowered to order destruction of the obscene copies ..	1433
Criminal intention not required to complete the offence ..	1434
Mere possession of obscene prints not an offence ..	1432
Sale of obscene books, etc.— Sale of obscene things ..	1434
All obscenity and immorality not punishable but only obscenity destructive of morals ..	1434
What are obscene things, illustrative examples ..	1434-1435
Intention and motive of publication immaterial ..	1435
Question whether a picture or print is obscene or not, a question of fact ..	1437
Book advocating checks to conception not an obscene or immoral thing ..	1437
Exception in the case of religious prints, sculptures, etc., works of art, etc. ..	1438
Publication necessary ..	1438, 1439
Acts of publication, what are ..	1338, 1339
Having in possession obscene book, etc., for sale or exhibition (s. 293) ..	1439
Section supplementary to and punishes a preparation for the offence in section 292 ..	1440
Criminal possession of obscene things ..	1440
Possession for sale or exhibition only punishable and not mere possession ..	1440
A bookseller and showman presumed to keep for sale
Obscene acts and songs (s. 294) ..	1440, 1441

Public Nuisance—(contd.)	PAGE
Obscene acts and songs, essentials of the offence ..	1442
Obscene act and song must be in a public place ..	1342
The act or song must be obscene ..	1342
Such act or song must annoy others' ..	1343
There must be actual annoyance, not merely probability of it ..	1343
Keeping lottery office (s. 294-A) ..	1443
History of legislation against lottery ..	1443, 1445
Complaint from Government necessary for cognizance of the offence ..	1445
Lottery and gambling, Distinction between ..	1445
Reasons why lottery is prohibited ..	1445
Authorization from Government does not legalize it and it is still subject to the provisions of section 30 of the Contract Act though not punishable under this section ..	1446
Lottery authorised by foreign Government only, illegal under this section ..	1447
What is a lottery ..	1446, 1447
Unauthorised lotteries ..	1447, 1448
Presence or absence of skill, test of legality ..	1448
Mere exercise of skill does not convert lottery into a fair game if it did not influence the result ..	1448
Cases held to be lotteries ..	1449
Lottery distinguished from wager ..	1451
Wager and gambling not offences under the Code ..	1451
Cases of no lottery ..	1452, 1453
Where benefit mutual, no lottery ..	1452
Life, fire and other Insurance Companies are conducted under this principle of mutual benefit ..	1452
Where result judged by skill, no lottery ..	1453
Missing word competition held to be lottery ..	1450, 1453
Publication of lottery ..	1454
Publisher liable by the mere fact of publication, intention or knowledge being unnecessary ..	1454

Public Nuisance—(concld.)	PAGE
Printer and publisher also liable under the Press Act ..	1454
Printing and publication necessary ..	1454
Persons liable, keeper of lottery office and its publisher ..	1455
Public Servant—
Definition of (s. 21) ..	228-230
Under special or Local Laws ..	230-232
Bears some analogy to the term "servant of the Queen" in section 14 ..	230
What the term includes ..	233
Require special protection and privileges and severe penalties for abuse of power ..	232
Who are public servants ..	233, 234
No real definition of, but description by enumeration only ..	233
Receiving or not receiving salary, no test of ..	233
What is "public" duty ..	233,234
One common feature of "public" duty ..	234
Examples of Statutory ..	234
True test of ..	235
Suspended policeman is not a ..	235
Who are not ..	235, 236
Covenanted servant of the Queen ..	237, 238
Officers of the army, the navy and air force ..	238, 239
Judge ..	240
Officers of Court of Justice ..	240
"Office," meaning of ..	240
Persons specially authorised by a Court of Justice ..	241, 242
Juror, Assessor, Panch ..	243
Arbitrators and Commissioners ..	243, 244
Policemen, Jailors ..	244, 245
Peace Officers ..	245
Miscellaneous Officers of Government ..	246
Surveyors, State Railway officials, officers of Irrigation and Agriculture, etc. ..	246, 247
Officers of Public Works Department ..	247
Officers of Revenue, Excise, Opium, Ganja, Salt, etc. ..	247
Bailiffs ..	247
Tax Collectors, Tashil officials ..	247

Public Servant—(contd.)	PAGE
Record keepers ..	247
Custom Officials ..	247
Quarter-master's clerk not ..	248
Finger Print Expert Sub-Inspector is ..	248
Officers of Local Bodies ..	248
Appointment by Government not essential as an elected Municipal Commissioner ..	248
Defective appointment how far a disqualification in case of a ..	249
Servant employed by a, cannot acquire such status ..	250
To be charged as, proof of acting as such sufficient ..	249
Examples of persons who are not ..	250
Persons assisting such, are not ..	250
Acts of , Right of private defence against (s. 99) ..	618, 619
Acting in good faith under colour of his office ..	618, 619
Right of private defence against ..	620, 621
Presumption of law that their acts are legal ..	620
Two things essential for the protection of the ..	621
Must have jurisdiction ..	621
Not strictly justifiable by law ..	622
Clause not intended to cure want of jurisdiction but only the erroneous exercise of it ..	622
Cases of such acts ..	622, 623
Right of private defence against acts under the directions of ..	624, 625
Illustrative cases ..	624, 625
Right of private defence against acts, or acts under direction of when not affected ..	627, 628
Where abettor or person abetted be a, Liability of, where offence abetted punishable with imprisonment (s. 116) ..	711
Section discriminates between the peace officers and the public ..	712
Object of such discrimination ..	712
Section applicable to special and local laws ..	714
Concealing design to commit offence (s. 119) ..	720
Liability of, circumscribed by their duty ..	721
Voluntarily allowing prisoner

Public Servant—(contd.)	PAGE
of war to escape (s. 128)	795
Negligently suffering prisoner of War or State Prisoner to escape (s. 129) ..	796
Assaulting a, when suppressing a rioting (s. 152) ..	863
Active resistance to suppression of riots by ..	865
Offences by or relating to, Topical Introduction ..	887-889
Offences which can be committed by Public servants only treated in this chapter (IX) ..	887
The punishment by the Code given to, are apart from what the Government may inflict on such ..	887
Giver of bribe to, not punished by the Code ..	888
Object of the legislature in doing so ..	888
Taking a bribe (s. 161) ..	889
The accused may be or expecting to be a ..	894, 895
Not necessary that the motive should be corrupt or oppressive ..	896
Receipt of gratification by person in authority, how far by itself conclusive of bribery ..	897
Demand of dasturi, inam or baksheesh by ..	898
Taking gratification to influence (s. 163) ..	906
If accused is a, he should be charged under section 161 only ..	904, 905
Taking gratification for exercise of personal influence with (s. 163) ..	906
Exercise of personal influence without gratification with, however deprecable, no offence ..	907
Advocates, profession of, considered ..	906
Abetment by, of offences under s. 162 and s. 163 (s 164) ..	908
Receipt of valuable presents by (s. 165) ..	909
Acceptance of bribe and receipt of valuable presents, difference between ..	912, 913
Acceptance of presents by ..	912
Disobeying law with intent to cause injury to any person (s. 166) ..	914

Public Servant—(contd.)	PAGE
Section directed against official perversity ..	914
Offence consists in wilful disobedience of an express direction of law ..	915
A mere dereliction of duty unconnected with injury not punishable under this section ..	916
A disobedience of law resulting in injury to the public does not come under this section ..	916
Framing incorrect document with intent to cause injury (s. 167) ..	916
Compared with the provisions of section 218 ..	917
Preparation of false records by ..	918
Framing or translating, What is ..	918
Falsification must be wilful and excludes mistakes due to ignorance ..	919
Unlawfully engaging in trade (s. 168) ..	919
Two reasons why trading is prohibited ..	920, 921
Only debarred from trading not from laying out savings to advantage ..	920
Instances of not "unlawfully engaged in trade" ..	920, 921
Unlawfully buying or bidding for property (s. 169) ..	921
Property must be property with which he is connected in his official capacity ..	922
False personation of a (s. 170) ..	922, 923
Offence consists in fraudulent personation, not mere personation ..	923
Fraudulent personation of a ..	923, 924
Wearing garb or carying token used by, with fraudulent intent (s. 171) ..	924
This section compared with section 140 ..	925
Fraudulent disguise ..	925
Intention to practise deception necessary ..	925
No act need be done or attempted in that guise ..	925
If garb, it must be worn, not merely carried under arm ..	925
If token, it must be carried, not merely possessed ..	925
If fraud is committed, the

Public Servant—(contd.)	PAGE
accused must be charged under section 170 only ..	925
Refusing oath or affirmation (s. 178) ..	973
Resistance or obstruction by a person to his lawful apprehension (s. 224) ..	1226, 1227
Persons charged ..	1229
Resistance or obstruction to lawful apprehension of another person (s. 225) ..	1234, 1235
Omission to apprehend or sufference of escape by, in cases not otherwise provided for (s. 225-A) ..	1238
Resistance or obstruction to lawful apprehension in cases not otherwise provided for (s. 225-B) ..	1240
Intentional insult or interruption to, setting in Judicial proceeding (s. 228) ..	1250
Summary procedure in Contempt of Court cases ..	1251
Provocation by, how far mitigates murder ..	1553
Homicide by ..	1558-1560
Guilty of only culpable homicide when he exceeds legal power ..	1559, 1560
Quantum of force justifying homicide by ..	1560
Assault or criminal force to deter a, from discharge of his duty (s. 353) ..	1816
Assault on, what is ..	1817
Assault must be while, is in the execution of his duty	1819, 1820
Mischief by destroying or moving, etc., a land mark fixed by the authority of a (s. 434) ..	2323
Counterfeiting a mark used by a (s. 484) ..	2544
Criticism of ..	2700, 2701
What opinion is protected ..	2701, 2702
Opinion must be fair and honest ..	2703-2704
Personal attack not privileged ..	2706
See Bribery, Contempt of Court, Obstruction, Rescuing.
Contempts of—
Topical Introduction ..	945
Three main classes of public servants referred to in this chapter ..	945
Two main elements common

Public Servant—(contd.)	PAGE
to all offences in this chapter ..	945
Penalties provided in the chapter do not exclude other coercive measures ..	945
Absconding to avoid service (s. 172) ..	945, 946
Corresponding provisions in old regulation ..	946
Section applicable to both parties as well as witnesses ..	946
Section implies absconding with the intention of evading service ..	947
"Absconds," meaning of ..	947
"Summons, notice or order," meaning of	947, 948, 949
Absconding to avoid service, essentials of the offence of	947, 948
Refusing to accept service is not absconding ..	948
Knowledge essential ..	948
Rule confined to summons, notice or order ..	948
"Order," what it includes ..	948, 949
Warrant excluded, being not order served on accused ..	949
Summons, etc., must be legal	949
Preventing service of summons (s.173) ..	950
Section refers to active resistance ..	950
Prevention of process ..	951, 952
Prevention essential ..	951
What is prevention ..	951, 952
Refusal to ackowledge service of summons not an offence under the section	952
Refusal to receive, no offence under the section ..	952
Non-attendance in obedience to order (s. 174) ..	952, 953
Section does not supersede the special provisions of the acts concerned ..	953
When non-attendance an offence ..	954, 955
Summons, notice or order to attend, what should contain ..	954
Certain time and place ..	955
No disobedience without personal service ..	955, 956
Process must be legal ..	956
Disobedience must be intentional ..	958-960
What disobediences condoned ..	959, 960
Substantial compliance only essential ..	959
Cumulative penalties ..	960
No offence, cases of ..	960

Public Servant—(contd.)	PAGE
Omission to produce document by person legally bound to produce (s. 175)	960
Obligation to produce must be legal ..	962
Omission must be intentional	962
Omission to give notice or information (s. 176) ..	963
Witness refusing to answer irrelevant questions ..	964, 967
When omission to inform, an offence ..	965
Notice or information must be definite having a credible origin ..	965
Persons legally bound ..	966, 967
Excuse of expectation of others who are also bound to inform, giving the information ..	968
Omission must be intentional	968
Person not legally bound, example of ..	968
Furnishing false information (s. 177) ..	968, 969
Furnishing false information, what is ..	970, 971
Mere omission to furnish true information may amount to furnishing a false return ..	972
Obligation to give information not universal ..	971
Persons legally bound ..	971
Not legally bound ..	972
False representation in a memorandum of appeal ..	973
Liability in plaints and statements ..	973
Refusing oath or affirmation (s. 178) ..	973
Other summary punishment provided by the Cr. Pro. Code ..	973, 974
Refusing to swear, when criminal ..	974
Competency of person to administer necessary ..	974
Payment of expenses to witnesses, in Civil and Criminal Courts compared ..	974
Refusing to answer questions (s. 179) ..	975
Certain exemptions to witnesses under the Indian Evidence Act ..	975, 977
When is refusal to answer an offence ..	976
Legal liability to answer questions created by other Acts ..	976

Public Servant—(contd.)	PAGE
Liability to answer does not if necessarily implies liability to state the truth ..	976
Power of Courts to put questions, limited ..	977
Refusal to sign statement (s. 180) ..	978
Statements that should be signed by the person making it ..	978
Refusal to sign when criminal ..	978
Accused's statement or confession before a Magistrate, whether refusal to sign, criminal ..	979
False statement on oath or affirmation (s. 181) ..	980
Provisions of this section more general than those of section 193 ..	980
Difference between this section and sec. 193 in substantial and of practical importance ..	980
False statement, Distinguished from false evidence ..	981, 982
Operation of this section if confined to non-judicial proceedings only ..	982
False information with intent to cause public servant to injure another (s. 182) ..	983
This section distinguished from false charge under section 211 ..	985
Views of different High Courts ..	984, 985
Giving of false information when an offence ..	989
False information, what is ..	989, 990
False statements in pleadings or appeal do not come under this section ..	990
"Knows or believes to be false" meaning of ..	991
Ulterior intention ..	991
Consequential action unnecessary ..	993
"Ought not to do" importance of ..	993
Abuse of lawful power ..	994, 995
Use of illegal power ..	995
Resistance to taking of property by lawful authority of public servant (s. 183)	995
Unlawful resistance to seizure of property ..	996, 997
There must be resistance to taking ..	996
Taking must be by lawful authority ..	997

Public Servant—(contd.) PAGE

Right of bailiff to enter houses .. 998
Theory of Every Man's house is his Castle .. 998
English and Indian rule compared .. 999
Resistance to seizure not strictly justifiable .. 999, 1000
Seizure under defective warrant .. 1001
Authority must be known to the accused .. 1001
View of law in such cases .. 1000
Obstructing sale of property by (s. 184) .. 1002
Obstruction must be intentional .. 1003
"Obstruction" what it implies .. 1003
Notices of bona fide claim no obstruction .. 1003
Illegal purchase or bid of property offered for sale by (s. 185) .. 1003
2 Kinds of delinquencies punished by the section .. 1004
Benami-bidders of public servants come within this rule 1004
Mock-bidders and illegal purchasers .. 1005, 1006
Persons liable for .. 1005
Obstructing, in discharge of public function (s. 186) .. 1006
Where the, is a Judicial officer .. 1007
Only in the execution of his duties and not at all times 1007
Illegal obstructions .. 1007-1009
3 ingredients of the offence 1007
What is a "public function" 1007
Cases illustrative of "Public function" .. 1007, 1008
"Public function," Question of, not one of intention or good faith .. 1009, 1010
Public function not strictly legal .. 1010
Illegal authority .. 1012
Voluntary obstruction .. 1012, 1013
What is an obstruction .. 1012, 1013
What is not an obstruction 1013
Obstruction to acts in excess of jurisdiction .. 1014
Omission to assist, When bound by law (s. 187) .. 1015, 1016
English Law followed .. 1016
Omission to assist, when criminal .. 1018, 1019
Provisions of other law conferring legal obligation .. 1018, 1019
Intentional omission .. 1019
Section applies only to a direct refusal and not to mere negligence to perform a lawful duty .. 1019
Section applicable equally to public servants as well as others .. 1019
Disobedience to order (s. 188) .. 1020
What orders included .. 1021, 1022
Sanction required for prosecution .. 1022
"Order" in this section does not include decrees and orders of Civil Courts .. 1024
Disobedience of order, essentials of .. 1024
Order must be legal .. 1024
Irregular orders when legal 1025-1026
Illegal orders under s. 144, Cr. P. Code .. 1026
Orders otherwise illegal .. 1027
Justifiable interference with private rights .. 1028
Orders outside the scope of s. 144, Cr. P. C. .. 1029
Rights of procession .. 1029
Persons not in possession .. 1029-1030
Disobedience without obstruction, Annoyance or injury .. 1030
Illustrative cases .. 1030, 1031
Threat of injury to (s. 189) .. 1031
This section compared with section 503 .. 1032
Meaning of "Threat" .. 1032
Criminal threat to .. 1032, 1033
Threat must be to, or one in whom he is "interested" 1033
No Threat, case of .. 1033
"Interest," What is .. 1033
Intention of uttering threat must be to induce, to do or forbear .. 1032
Threat of injury to induce person to refrain from applying for protection (s. 190) .. 1034
Essentials of the offence .. 1035
Fabricating evidence in legal proceedings before a .. 1036
By destroying document to prevent its production as evidence (s. 204) .. 1125
Disobeying direction of law with intent to save person from punishment or property from seizure (s. 217) 1203
Section deals with official partiality .. 1203
Intentional disobedience by 1205
Excludes all cases of ignorance or mistake .. 1205

Public Servant—(contd.)	PAGE
The disobedience must be with reference to any express direction of law ..	1205
Intention of accused at the time of the disobedience material ..	1206
Retaining valuable thing found in the course of a search, comes under this section ..	1207
Framing incorrect record with the same intention as in section 217 (s. 218) ..	1207
Section deals with the intentional falsification of record ..	1208
Falsification of record, what is ..	1209
Persons in custody of records and not charged with their preparation do not come under this section ..	1209
Using of such document not necessary, offence complete with preparation ..	1210
Remote injury ..	1210
Injury to the public what is	1211
False statement and expression of incorrect opinion, Distinction between ..	1211
Case of making false record	1211, 1212
Injury immaterial ..	1212
Intention to save from legal punishment ..	1212
Legal punishment, meaning of ..	1212
Making reports contrary to law (s. 219) ..	1213
Must have been made corruptly or maliciously and must also be illegal ..	1214
Meaning of "corruptly" and maliciously ..	1214
Commitment for trial or confinement by, contrary to law (s. 220) ..	1215
This section compared with section 219 ..	1215, 1216
Section confined to illegal commitment and confinement ..	1216
Criminal confinement ..	1216
Knowledge of illegality necessary ..	1216
Section applicable to persons "in office" only ..	1217
Intentional omission to apprehend by (s. 221) ..	1217
3 Degrees of criminality contemplated ..	1219
Intentional aiding, suffering or omitting, to apprehend or escape ..	1219

Public Servant—(contd.)	PAGE
Legal obligation to apprehend necessary ..	1219
Intentional omission, what amounts to ..	1219
Intentional omission to apprehend by lawfully committed or under sentence (s. 222) ..	1220
The sentence may or may not be legal but his liability to confine him remains the same ..	1222
Escape from confinement or custody negligently suffered by (s. 223) ..	1222
Section applicable to persons arrested under a criminal process only ..	1223
Negligent escape from custody ..	1224
What constitutes negligently suffering an escape ..	1225, 1226
The "escape" must be complete for the offence ..	1224
"Confinement," meaning of the term ..	1224
The authorization for the confinement must be legal	1225
Measure of negligence ..	1225, 1226
Section not intended to punish all escapes following upon negligence ..	1226
Voluntarily causing hurt to deter, from his duty (s. 332) ..	1743, 1744
Criminal assault or hurt to ..	1746
Compared with section 353.	1746
What amounts to ..	1746
Private person helping, does not come under this section ..	1746
Protection confined to lawful duty ..	1746, 1747
Qualified protection when act illegal ..	1748, 1749
Right of private defence against a, not the same as that available against public ..	1748
Conflict of views between the High Courts ..	1749, 1750
Good faith, Absence of, Presumption as to ..	1751
Acts flagrantly illegal ..	1752, 1753
Acts done in violation of law and acts not strictly justifiable, Distinction between	1753
Intent to Prevent or Deter essential ..	1754
Assault in consequence of legal act ..	1754, 1755
Assault against one intended to prevent another ..	1755

PAGE

Public Servant—(concld.)

Voluntarily causing grievous hurt to deter, from his duty (s. 333) .. 1755
Aggravated form of offence coming under the previous section .. 1755, 1756
Wrongful confinement by .. 1781
What is and what is not .. 1781, 1782
Assault or criminal force to deter a, from discharge of his duty (s. 353) .. 1816
Criminal breach of trust by (s. 409) 2150-2151, 2152-2155

Public Tranquillity—

Offences against, Chapter VIII (ss. 141-160) .. 816-886
Topical Introduction .. 816-817
See Rioting, Unlawful Assembly

Public Way—

What is a .. 1392
By land or sea is a highway 1403
Duties of a person using .. 1623

Punishments—

Different kinds of, coming under the Penal Code (s. 53) .. 329
Place of, in criminal jurisprudence .. 330
True measure of .. 330
Severity of .. 330
Method and system of discipline that would conduce to reduction of terms of imprisonment .. 330
What is .. 330
Necessity of, for administration of law .. 331
Sole aim of, according to Bentham .. 331
Retribution, considered as a motive for .. 331
True doctrine of, in modern civilized States .. 330, 331
Disproportion of, effect of .. 331
Discarded forms of .. 331
Flogging as a form of .. 332
Flogging, why condemned .. 332
The Whipping Act, its history .. 332
Appropriateness of, what it depends upon .. 332
Various forms of, considered 332-348
Circumstances which mitigate award of, according to Bentham 340 (f. n.)
Illustrations of no, under the Code .. 348

PAGE

Punishments—(contd.)

Measure of—
In murder, mitigation of sentence and the reasons therefor .. 1596-1600
In culpable homicide .. 1605-1608
Legal often varies according to the notions of social morality .. 1606
For attempt to commit suicide .. 1658
For causing miscarriage .. 1669
In case of belonging to a gang of dacoits .. 2071
For attempting to commit offences .. 2800
Cumulative,—
Abettor when liable to for act abetted and for act done (s. 112) .. 700
Death,—
Place of, in the category of punishments .. 332
Justifiability of, as punishment .. 332
When inflicted under English Law .. 333
Abolished in several European States .. 332
When inflicted under the Penal Code .. 333
Treason and murder, awarded only in case of .. 333
Where the Code differs from English Law and why it differs .. 333
To be sparingly inflicted .. 334
Period in which to appeal, to be informed by the Judge 334
Commutation of sentence of (s. 54) .. 348
Power solely with the Executive Government .. 348
English Law followed .. 348
Like powers of commutation provided under the Cr. P. Code .. 349
Such powers under the Cr. P. Code being limited .. 349
Powers of Government here provided for is independent of the like powers of the sovereign .. 349
Like powers of the High Court in the case of a pregnant woman sentenced to death .. 349
Object of the legislature in investing such powers with Government .. 349
Enhanced,—
Cases in which enhanced punishment admissible (s. 75) .. 404

PAGE

Punishments—(contd.)

Provisions of the Cr. P. Code that complete the law set out under this section 405, 406
Previous conviction when taken into account .. 405
Question is not where the offender had been previously convicted but by whom .. 405
Addition to the charge necessary to enable Court to add sentence of whipping .. 407
Limits of the rule .. 407, 408
Section not to be applied mechanically in all cases .. 408
Points for the consideration of the Judge before the section is applied .. 408
Illustrative cases .. 408, 409
Provisions not retrospective 409
Operation of the section discussed .. 408
Previous conviction must be prior to the commission of subsequent offence .. 410
Cases for .. 409
Locus penitentiæ, Doctrine of .. 410
When and how to prove previous conviction .. 410, 411
Jurisdiction of Courts .. 412
Judgment awarding, what must contain .. 412
Nature of enhanced sentence 412
Section inapplicable to offences other than in Chapters XII and XVII .. 413
Violation of condition of remission of punishment (s. 227) .. • 1248
Breach of conditional remission .. 1250
Forfeiture,—
Rare occurrence of the sentence of .. 342
Reasons for the punishment of .. 342
History of 342, 343, 357
Of ancient origin .. 342
History of, under English Law .. 343
Blackstone's opinion .. 343
When imposed under English 343
English Law and the Code, Difference between .. 343, 359
Four classes of, under the Code, and offences for which imposed .. 345
When compulsory and when optional .. 344
Under s. 517, Cr. P. Code .. 344

PAGE

Punishments—(contd.)

Allied to fine .. 345
Sentence of forfeiture compulsory, Disability, in case where (s. 61) .. 356
One of the 3 methods of acquisition of another's property by the Sovereign and how foreiture differs from the others .. 356, 357
Meaning of .. 357
Doctrine of forfeiture and fiction of corruption of blood under English Law 357
Rule of, how effects bona fide incumbrances created before forfeiture .. 357
Difference expected under the Code .. 357, 358
Where offender is the holder of an impartible estate .. 358
Rule as to, in respect of offences punishable with death, transportation or imprisonment (s. 62) .. 358
Sentence of, must be passed at time of judgment, must form part of sentence and pronounced as such .. 359
When must be resorted to .. 359
The only 2 cases in which it may be added as a sentence .. 359
Rule of, provides for forfeiture of corpus and usufruct .. 359
Rule of, in s. 62, Discussion re .. 359, 360
Sentence of, effect of, on ancestral or self-acquired or moveable or immoveable property .. 360
Reversionary not affected by 360
Fine,—
As a species of .. 345
Allied to forfeiture .. 345
Compared with other punishment in its capacity to affect people .. 345
Superiority of fine considered by Bentham 345 (f. n.)
Measure of .. 345
Points to be considered in determining quantum of .. 345, 346
Peculiarly appropriate for offences prompted by cupidity .. 346
Limit of, fixed in some cases only .. 346
Offences in the Code, re imposition of, Division of, in 4 parts .. 346
When sole punishment .. 346

Punishments—(contd.)	PAGE
As sole punishment, when amount unlimited ..	347
Imposition of, when compulsory ..	347
Amount of, unlimited but not excessive (s. 63) ..	361
Justification for not limiting the amount of ..	361
What is an appropriate amount of ..	361
Discussion about Mr. Livingstone's rule ..	362
When the maximum may be fixed ..	362
Why unlimited ..	363
What is a fair measure of fine ..	363, 364
Prohibition of the section against excessive fines applies equally to all cases.	364
Bentham's 3 rules applicable to the imposition of ..	364
Insufficiency of punishment cannot be set right by fine but must be committed to the Higher Magistrate ..	365
Poor offenders not be fined heavily, because of being backed up by rich persons who may pay them ..	365
Fit cases for imposing ..	365, 366
Fine judicially inflicted cannot be remitted on account of departmental ..	365
Recovery of, Procedure for 366, 377, 378
Court authorised to suspend execution to enable accused to raise the amount of ..	366
Payment of compensation out of ..	366
Imprisonment in lieu of (s. 64) ..	366
Rule of, Extent of ..	367
Rule as to, now applies also to special and local laws ..	367
Court not bound to award an alternative sentence ..	368
Limit of imprisonment for non-payment of (s. 65) ..	369
Limit of, qualified by s. 33. Cr. P. Code ..	369, 372
If releases pecuniary obligation and if so, when ..	370-371
Fair term of imprisonment ..	372, 373
Imprisonment but not transportation ..	372
When may be rigorous or simple (s. 66) ..	373
In case of offences punishable with fine only (s. 67)	373
Imprisonment terminates with payment of (s. 68) ..	375

Punishments—(contd.)	PAGE
Terminates with payment of even proportionate part of (s. 69) ..	376
Courts have no power to refund, if no necessary remission is made ..	376
Duty of Court to order release as soon as terms complied with ..	376
Imprisonment awarded and suffered does not absolve from payment of fine ..	377
Justification for the above rule ..	377
Levy of, Process of law for ss. 386, 387, Cr. P. Code ..	375
Limitation for (s. 70) ..	376
Limitation for, Reason for the rule ..	378
Limitation for, period of, cannot be enlarged by acknowledgment or part-payment ..	379
Property of the offender so liable, questions about ..	378
Imprisonment,—
What is ..	337
Explanation of ..	337
Need not necessarily be in a place prescribed for the purpose ..	337
Till the rising of the Court	337, 349
Simple and rigorous, nature of explained ..	337, 338
Why minimum sentences not fixed ..	338
Two cases in which minimum prescribed ..	338
Maximum for a single offence 14 years ..	338
Lowest term actually named for a single offence 24 hours ..	338
Three cases in which the, should be rigorous ..	338
Offences the sentence prescribed for which is only simple ..	338, 339
Apportionment of punishment advisedly left to the discretion of the Judge ..	339
Measure of ..	339, 340
Circumstances influencing infliction of ..	339, 342
Offences against person more serious than offences against property and reasons for the same ..	339
Considerations of age, provocation, etc. ..	340
Aggravating circumstances	340
The three classes of Criminals (1) Casual Criminal

Punishments—(contd.)	PAGE
(2) Habitual Criminal and (3) Professional Criminal	340
In case of first offender ..	341
Habitual Criminal ..	341
Influence of character ..	341, 342
Offences against the public peace, more serious than other offences ..	342
May be simple or rigorous, or partly simple and partly rigorous (s. 60) ..	356
Sentence of forfeiture compulsory, Disability in cases where (s. 61) ..	356
In lieu of fine (s. 64) ..	360
Limit of, for non-payment of fine ..	369
Limit of, qualified by s. 33 of Cr. P. Code ..	369, 372
Terminates with payment of (s 68) ..	375
In Compound Cases,—
Maximum in composite offences (s. 71) ..	379
Rule of the Code compared with the Cr. P. Code ..	380, 381
English practice compared ..	382
Object of the section, to confine punishments within reasonable limits ..	383
What section 71 comprises ..	383
Rule re, Principle of s. 71 ..	383, 384
S. 71 compared with sections 35 and 235 of the Cr. P. Code ..	383, 384
Sections 71 and 235 auxiliary to each other only ..	384
Test of criminality in complex acts ..	385
Offences in the same transaction ..	385, 386
Unity of intention ..	386, 387
Proximity of time and similarity of action and result	387
Illustrative cases ..	388, 389
S. 71: when separate sentences justifiable ..	390
Theft and receiving stolen property ..	390
Double liability of rioters ..	391
Limits of constructive liability ..	391, 392
High Courts not agreed on the point ..	391, 392
Two points on which the question of constructive liability depends ..	392
When the same facts constitute different offences	393
Intention of the Legislature on the point ..	393

Punishments—(contd.)	PAGE
Compound offences ..	394, 395
Quantum of Punishment in ..	395, 396
Section 71 prima facie regulates punishment and not procedure ..	396
Passing of separate sentences under s. 35 Cr. P. Code permissive and not mandatory ..	397
In the alternative (s. 72) ..	398
Section 236 of Cr. P. Code supplementary to this section ..	398
What must be doubtful ..	398, 399
Conviction of doubtful offences ..	400
Section applicable only to cases of certain criminality but uncertain offence ..	400
Solitary Confinement.
Proportion of, as a punishment (s. 73) ..	400
English Law, provisions regarding, repealed ..	401
What is ..	401
Object of imposing ..	401
In what cases imposed ..	401
Section regulates duration of ..	401
As a mode of undergoing rigorous imprisonment ..	402
Not a substantive sentence by itself ..	402
Cannot be awarded on conviction of offences under special or local laws ..	402
Cannot be awarded where sentence of imprisonment is in default of payment of fine ..	402
Order of, is not a judgment against which there can be appeal ..	402
Limits of (s. 74) ..	403
Section enacted on medical grounds ..	403
Section regulates execution of ..	403
Transportation.
When inflicted ..	334
Compared to banishment of old ..	334
Maximum period of ..	334
Europeans and Americans, Inapplicable in cases of ..	334
Sentence of, not to specify place to be transported ..	334
Used now also as the favourite method of "lopping off tall poppies" ..	334

Punishments—(contd.)	PAGE
Offences in which it is a maximum sentence ..	334-336
Justification of ..	335
Objectionable features in the sentence of ..	336
Commutation of the sentence of death (s. 54) ..	348
English Law followed ..	348
Punishments to which sentence of death can be commuted ..	349
This power independent of the power of the Sovereign to pardon, etc. ..	349
Power of the High Court in the case of pregnant woman ..	349
Reasons for such power being given to Government .	349
Power of commutation should be unconditional ..	349, 350
Commutation of the sentence of (s. 55) ..	350
Power solely with the Executive Government ..	350
In cases of sentences of Europeans and Americans, to be penal servitude (s. 56) ..	350
For life, Fractions of terms how calculated (s. 57) ..	351
Itself has now come to mean for 20 years ..	351
Transportation prisoners how dealt with until transported (s. 58) ..	352
The two punishments not identical except for the above purpose of calculation ..	352
Sentence of, in lieu of imprisonment (s. 59) ..	352
Transportation how an effective punishment ..	353
Sentence of, in lieu of imprisonment, Provision as to, inapplicable in case of conviction under special or local law ..	353
Legislature against short terms of transportation, with the remarks of Bentham ..	353, 354
Section inapplicable in cases of combined sentences of 7 years or more ..	354
To be abolished ..	354
Commuted transportation, limitations provided by the section (s. 59) ..	354, 355
Minimum period of, now admissible ..	355

Punishments—(concld.)	PAGE
Unlawful return from (s. 226) ..	1245
Return from unlawful ..	1248
Penal Servitude.
Reserved for Europeans and Americans ..	337, 352
Europeans other than British subjects, Admissible also in case of ..	337
Inadmissible in case of Indians ..	337
Commutation of ..	336
Scale of commutation of ..	337
Exhaustively dealth with under the act of the same name ..	337
More severe than transportation ..	337
Commutation into, in case of Europeans and Americans (s. 56) ..	351
Whipping.
Flogging as a form of punishment ..	332, 347
Flogging why condemned ..	332
History of ..	332, 347
Abandoned in Europe ..	348
Drawbacks in the imposition of ..	347, 348
Modified by recent Act ..	332, 347

Q

Queen—
Definition of (s. 13) .	220
Includes her successors ..	220
Sense in which the term is used in Chapter VI, "offence against the State"	220
Used as prosecutor in cognizable cases ..	220
'The king never dies," meaning of the phrase ..	220
Servant of the, Definition of s. 14) ..	220
Servants of the, who are ..	221
Queen's Coin—
What is a ..	1264
What is included in ..	1267
Counterfeiting (s. 232) ..	1273
Making or selling instruments for counterfeiting (s. 234) ..	1275, 1276
Import or export or counterfeit (s. 238) ..	1286
Delivery of, with knowledge that it is counterfeit (s. 240) ..	1293

PAGE

Queen's Coin—(concld.)

Possession of counterfeit, with knowledge of its being so (s. 243) .. 1298
Fraudulent or dishonest alteration or diminution in weight or composition of (s. 247) .. 1303
Altering appearance of, with intent to pass as a different coin (s. 249) .. 1306
Delivery of, with knowledge that it is altered (s. 251) .. 1308
Possession of altered, with previous knowledge (s. 253) .. 1310

See Coin.

Questions—

Nature of, to be put to medical men .. 1583
To medical witness in case of—
(1) Poisoning .. 1583, 1584
(2) Personal violence .. 1585
(3) Infanticide .. 1586
(4) Strangulation .. 1586, 1587
(5) Drowning .. 1587
(6) Rape .. 1587, 1588
(7) Insanity .. 1588, 1589
(8) Miscarriage .. 1589
(9) Grievous Hurt .. 1589, 1590
To a non-professional witness in case of poisoning .. 1584

R

Rape—

Medical witness, Questions to a, in case of .. 1587, 1588
Attempted, distinguished from indecent assault .. 1824, 1825
Definition of (s. 375) .. 1913, 1914
In English Law .. 1915
Section re, amendment of, as to age of consent .. 1914
Case of Hurry Mohon Mythee which necessitated the amendment .. 1914
Historical retrospect .. 1915
Jewish, Hindu and Anglo-Saxon Laws against .. 1915
Irrebuttable presumption under English Common Law that an infant below 14 years cannot commit rape .. 1916
No such presumption under the Code except the general presumption against criminality in the case of children below 7 years .. 1916
What is .. 1916, 1917
"Against her will," Will and consent distinguished .. 1917
Against her will when
Ravishing while woman is asleep .. 1917
Woman insensible from liquor .. 1917
Woman of weak intellect unless she is a healthy woman who consents having strong animal instincts .. 1917, 1919
Woman is under mesmeric influence .. 1917
Consent may be inferred from non-resistance .. 1918
No consent when there is—
(1) Want of capacity .. 1919
Want of capacity may be natural or induced by administering stupefying drugs .. 1919
(2) Mere submission .. 1919
Consent and submission, Distinction between .. 1919
(3) Consent before or after the fact .. 1919
(4) Consent when fraud is immaterial .. 1920
(5) Consent obtained by fraud .. 1921
Rape by medical man pretending treatment .. 1921
(6) Consent by fear of death or hurt .. 1922, 1923
Resistance how far evidence of consent .. 1923
Negligible resistance, case of .. 1923
Force essential to .. 1923
From whom should the fear emanate .. 1924
(7) Consent under misconception of facts .. 1924
Fraud as to nature of the act and as to identify of person, distinction between .. 1920, 1924
Sexual intercourse consequent on invalid marriage, if amounts to .. 1924, 1925
Husband suffering from disease communicates it to the wife, if commits rape .. 1920
When consent is inoperative .. 1925
Husband guilty of, if wife under 12 years .. 1925

PAGE

Rape—(contd.)

Penetration not only sufficient but also necessary to constitute .. 1925
Rupture of hymen not necessary for proof of penetration .. 1925
Degree and proof of penetration necessary .. 1925
Potency, If proof of, necessary .. 1925, 1926
Rape and Homicide .. 1926
Punishment for (s. 376) .. 1926
Punishment under English Law .. 1927
And allied offences .. 1927
Special procedure in case accused is the husband .. 1927
Exclusively triable by a Court of Sessions .. 1927
Judge advised to have the trial in camera if case delicate and have minute enquiry .. 1928
No other charge so easy to concoct and so difficult to refute .. 1928
Some marks of struggle to be invariably looked for in any case .. 1928
Complaint of husband necessary for prosecution for adultery on failure of the charge of rape .. 1929
Character and position of prosecutrix determining factor in apportioning punishment .. 1929
Taking the legal aspect of "consent" the first 4 clauses unnecessary .. 1930
Evidence of .. 1930, 1931
Social ethics condemns incestuous intercourse but the Code does not .. 1931
Reason why exception made in favour of husband .. 1931
Summary of the whole law of rape .. 1930-1934
Kinds of consent .. 1931, 1932
Subsequent consent, value of .. 1932
Consent how proved .. 1932
Fraud, nature of, necessary to vitiate consent .. 1932
Resistance, Value of, as evidence of non-consent .. 1933
Marks of resistance, Value of, as evidence regarding consent .. 1933
Abetment of .. 1934
Husband liable for abetment, on his wife; Lord Audley's case .. 1934

PAGE

Rape—(concld.)

Attempted rape and indecent assault, distinction between .. 1934

Rashness—

Culpable, distinguished from culpable negligence 309, 310, 1615

See Public Nuisance, Negligence.

Rash or Negligent Act—

Causing death by (s. 304A) 1612
What is a .. 1615-1616
Absence of intention and knowledge of consequence essential .. 1617-1618
Must cause death .. 1618
Meaning of causes .. 1618
Only gross negligence culpable .. 1619
What is gross negligence .. 1620
Persons practising medicine or surgery may be guilty of .. 1625
Endangering life or personal safety (s. 336) .. 1759
Causing hurt by act endangering life or personal safety or others (s. 337) 1763
Causing grievous hurt by (s. 338) 1766

Reason to Believe—

Definition of (s. 26) ..
Phrase used in relation to receipt of stolen property 274
Does not imply sensual perception .. 275
Knowledge, Distinguished from .. 274, 275
Its place in criminal law .. 276
Presumption of criminality, How it affects .. 275, 276

Receiving Stolen Property—

Stolen property, Definition of (s. 410) .. 2159
Amendment of sec. 410 .. 2160
English Law as to .. 2160, 2161
Section presupposes the commission of offence of theft, etc., but not the existence of an offender .. 2161
Stolen property, what is .. 2162
Possession, nature and meaning of .. 2162
Property in the hands of a thief is also stolen property .. 2163

PAGE

Receiving Stolen Property—(contd.)

Possession, Transfer of, when necessary to constitute .. 2163
Property when becomes stolen .. 2163
Change, conversion or alteration of property, Effect of .. 2163, 2164
When original identity destroyed, property ceases to be stolen property .. 2164
Substance remaining same but form undergoing, change, property remains stolen .. 2164
Cheques, notes and jewels, Change of, Effect of .. 2164
Property on reversion to lawful owners ceases to be stolen property .. 2165, 2166
Person may be in possession of stolen property which is his own as he may commit theft of his own property .. 2165
Owner's subsequent consent or ratification cannot alter character of stolen property .. 2165
Unless owner after actually taking hold of the thing sells it or gifts it to thief .. 2165, 2166
Illustrative cases .. 2165, 2166
Property acquired by fraudulent transfer is not stolen property .. 2166
Fraudulent transfer of property by debtors .. 2166
Dishonestly (s. 411) .. 2166, 2167
Mere possession of stolen property not an offence .. 2167
Venue, principles of .. 2167, 2168
Person in possession of stolen property of different owners, cannot be convicted of separate offences unless recieved in different times .. 2167
Person in possession of different articles of stolen property, joinder of charges in case of .. 2168
Who may be jointly tried 2169
Joint trial of person accused of this offence and another accused of kindred offence now allowed by amended Procedure Code .. 2169
Trial of thief with receiver 2168
Restitution of stolen property, Power of Court re .. 2169, 2170

PAGE

Receiving Stolen Property—(contd.)

When property is negotiable and when it is not, Restitution, In case of .. 2169, 2170
English Law, provisions of on the point .. 2170
Right of prosecutor to maintain separate suit against accused .. 2170
When thief himself concerned and when rights of third parties intervene .. 2170
"Property produced before Court or in its custody regarding which an offence has been committed or which has been used in the commission of any offence," meaning of .. 2171
Accused can be tried for both theft and receiving stolen property but there can be only for one offence 2172
Object of punishing receiver 2174
Essentials of, offence of .. 2174
Dishonestly What is .. 2174
Dishonest receipt and retention implies possession .. 2175
Exclusive possession necessary .. 2175
Such possession how proved .. 2176
Such possession means conscious possession .. 2177
Illustrative cases .. 2177, 2178
Possession in case of members of a Hindu joint family .. 2177, 2178
Possession of husband and wife .. 2178, 2179
Husband and wife, Liability of .. 2178
English Law as to .. 2179
Dishonest receipt, What is .. 2179, 2180
Dishonesty of receipt must be connected with knowledge or belief in the stolen property .. 2180
Mere pointing out place of concealment of stolen property does not necessarily conclude receipt of property or participation in the crime .. 2181
Actual knowledge or belief not necessary .. 2181
Such knowledge or belief, if exists—tests to be applied, (1) Nature of property .. 2182
(2) Circumstances of sale and .. 2183
(3) Price paid .. 2183

Receiving Stolen Property—(concld.) PAGE

Criminality as to, Inference of, case where irresistible from a combination of circumstances .. 2183
Retaining with guilty knowledge .. 2184
Dishonest retention and dishonest receipt, Distinction between .. 2184
Dishonest retention, change in the mental element of possession necessary to constitute .. 2184
Knowledge as to dishonest retention inferrable from mode of concealment .. 2184
Mere absence of or false explanation no proof of guilt of accused .. 2185
Presumption arising from recent possession .. 2185
Recent possession, What is 2186
Cases illustrative of presumption arising from recent possession .. 2186, 2187
Presumption, Nature of, how determined .. 2189
No offence if property abandoned or ownerless .. 2191
Dishonestly, being proceeds of dacoity (s. 412) .. 2191
Mere proof of dacoity or of property being stolen property insufficient .. 2193
Section inapplicable to a dacoit .. 2193
Receiving from dacoit or receiving dacoity goods .. 2193, 2194
Property being proceeds of dacoity, presumption as to .. 2193, 2194
Habitually dealing in stolen property (s. 413) .. 2195
Habitual dealer distinct from receiver .. 2195
Provision applicable to habitual offenders .. 2196
"Habitually deals" meaning of .. 2197
Habitually dealing in stolen property what is .. 2197
"Receiving" and "Dealing" what is .. 2197
Assisting in concealment of stolen property (s. 414) .. 2197
Scope of the section .. 2198
Dishonesty not a part of the offence .. 2199
Assisting concealment, What is .. 2199
Concealment, what is .. 2200

Receptacle PAGE

Dishonestly breaking open a, containing property (s. 461) .. 2420
What is dishonestly breaking open a .. 2420
The gist of the offence lies in the criminal intention .. 2421
The receptacle must contain or be believed to contain property .. 2421
Breaking open a coffin to steal corpse no offence as corpse is not property .. 2421
Receptacle, what is and what it includes .. 2421, 2422
Such receptacle must be closed but need not be locked .. 2421
Person entrusted with custody of such, committing the offence (s. 462) .. 2422

Religion—

Offences relating to (sections 295 296) .. 1457-1485
Topical Introduction .. 1457
Principle of religious toleration (1) Every man free to profess his own religion and (2) No man allowed to insult the religion of another .. 1457
Such principle most necessary in India the land of religions .. 1457
Analysis of the chapter .. 1457, 1458
Injuring or defiling place of worship with intent to insult the, of any class (s. 295) .. 1458
Principle of protection .. 1458
Desecrating .. 1460
Insulting, intention essential 1460
Intention how judged .. 1460
Cases of no intention .. 1460, 1461
Intent or knowledge part of the offence and to be proved by the prosecution .. 1461
Place or object desecrated must be sacred .. 1461
Whether a thing is a place of worship is a question of fact .. 1462
Sacred object, what is a .. 1462
Sacred object and an object which is venerated, Distinction between .. 1462
Sacred object, if object should be inanimate .. 1462, 1463
Why animate objects should not be sacred .. 1462, 1463
Place or object must be sac-

PAGE

Religion—(contd.)

red to a class .. 1463
Insulting must be by destroying damaging or defiling .. 1464
Offence applicable to persons of the same class .. 1464
Deliberate and malicious act intended to outrage religious feeling of any class (s. 295-A) .. 1464
History of the section .. 1465
Essentials to be proved .. 1465
Section to safe-guard against outrage on religious feeling
Insult to, .. 1466
Disturbing religious assembly (s. 296) .. 1466
English Law followed on the point .. 1467
Disturbance of religious assembly, what is .. 1468
Essentials of the section .. 1468
Disturbance must be voluntary .. 1469
Disturbance, what is .. 1468
Not necessary that the worship or ceremony should be stopped or prevented from going on .. 1468
Disturbance must be voluntary .. 1468
Illustrative cases .. 1468, 1469
Active intention to disturb if necessary .. 1470
No right in public places .. 1470
Right if permission taken from authorities in charge 1470
Right during engagement of assembly in worship .. 1470
Right limited to period of worship .. 1471
Assembly must be legally engaged .. 1471
No right where worship is a mere pretext to advance legal claim where it is opposed by others to assert their own rights bona fide 1472
Disturbance not by direct action but by false rumours, no disturbance .. 1472
Trespassing on burial places, etc., (s. 297) .. 1472, 1473
"Sepulchre," what is a .. 1473, 1476
Trespass may be a civil trespass .. 1474
Sacreligious acts .. 1474
Intention or knowledge essential .. 1474
Bona fide dispute, case of 1475
Other illustrative cases .. 1475, 1476
Owner of land may trespass on his own property .. 1476

PAGE

Religion—(concld.)

Entry of a low caste mahar into a temple, held liable 1476
Question if act insults religion or wounds feelings is a question of fact .. 1476
Insult or hurt not necessarily to a class of persons —enough even to a single individual .. 1476
Acts condemned .. 1476
Section punishes acts of 3 kinds .. 1477
Acts which are indignities to a corpse .. 1477
Uttering words intended to wound religious feelings .. 1478
History of the Law in England .. 1478, 1479
Attempt to convert any person from the religion of the country even by gentle persuation, an offence under English Law .. 1479
Absolute religious freedom under the Code .. 1479
Objects of the legislature .. 1480
Difference between the Code and the English Law .. 1481
Essentials of the offence .. 1481
Insulting religion, what is .. 1481
Insulting religion—Intention must be deliberate .. 1482
Deliberate intention, what is .. 1482
Illustrative cases .. 1482, 1483
Only acts wounding religious feelings not acts involving social penalties .. 1484
Insult must be personal .. 1484
Words must wound feelings 1484, 1485

Remission—

Violation of conditional remission of punishment (s 227) .. 1248
Breach of conditional remission .. 1250

Rescuing—

Prisoner of war or state prisoner (s. 130) .. 797
An offender (s. 225) .. 1234
An offender, what is .. 1236, 1237
"Rescue" meaning of .. 1236
Rescue must be intentional 1237
Arrest or custody must be lawful .. 1237
Arrester must possess authority .. 1237

PAGE

Resistance—

To legal process, one of the common objects of an unlawful assembly .. 821, 823
To taking of property by lawful authority of public servant (s. 183) .. 995
Unlawful resistance to seizure of property .. 996, 997
There must be resistance .. 996
Taking must be by lawful authority .. 997
Right of bailiff to enter houses .. 998, 999
Theory of "every man's house is his castle" .. 998
English and Indian rules compared .. 999
To seizure not strictly justifiable .. 999, 1000
View of law in such cases .. 1000
Seizure under defective warrant .. 1001
Authority must be known to the accused .. 1001

See Obstruction.

Rioting—

Double liability of rioters for punishment for hurt and .. 391
Definition of (s. 146) .. 836
Affray and, distinguished .. 836
Is simply an unlawful assembly in a particular state of activity .. 837
What constitutes .. 837
There must be actual force not merely show of force 837
What is force .. 837
Passive resistance is not use of force or violence .. 838
Personal violence not necessary .. 837
Unlawful assembly and, Difference between .. 837, 838
Sudden quarrel .. 838
Use of force must be to achieve a common purpose 838
Illustrative cases .. 835, 839
Having badges, banners, etc. relevant to show common object .. 839
Common object must be illegal .. 839
Person may participate in the common object only up to a certain time and extent .. 839
Punishment for rioting (s. 147) .. 839
Charge must specify the common object .. 840
Charge may be of two or more common objects in the alternative .. 840

PAGE

Rioting—(contd.)

Accused cannot be convicted of one common object when they are charged with another .. 841
Cumulative sentences in .. 842, 843
No rioting, cases of .. 844, 846
Punishment for, armed with deadly weapon (s. 148) .. 846
Liability of individual members (s. 149) .. 846
This section compared with section 34 .. 846, 847
Conditions of constructive liability .. 849
3 restricting conditions necessary for liability .. 849
Object of the section .. 849
Prosecution of the common object .. 850
Illustrative cases .. 850, 852
Liability determined by knowledge .. 852, 853
Two essential conditions .. 853
Limits of constructive liability 853, 854
Necessity of being member of an unlawful assembly at the time of the commission of the offence .. 854
Joining unlawful assembly after offence committed .. 855
Offence must have been committed and that by a member of the unlawful assembly .. 855
Assaulting a public servant when suppressing a riot (s. 152) .. 863
Active resistance to suppression of riots .. 865
Not necessary that public servant should then be employed in lawful discharge of his duties .. 865
Gist of offence consists in use of force on a public servant 865
Wantonly giving provocation with intent to cause riot (s. 153) .. 865
Malignantly or wantonly, meaning of .. 866, 867
Conviction of this offence is not conviction involving breach of peace within the meaning of 106, Cr. P. Code justifying taking security .. 866
Criminal provocation of .. 867
Requisites to sustain a conviction under the section .. 868
Question of malignity or wantonness a question of fact .. 868

PAGE

Rioting—(concld.)

Provocation given must be such as would be likely to cause a riot .. 868
Promoting enmity between classes (s. 153-A) .. 869
Provisions of the Press Act section 4 (1) compared .. 869
Section enacted to supplement the law of sedition .. 870
Offence deals with defamation of a class .. 870
Offence held to involve moral turpitude entitling High Court to take disciplinary measures against a pleader convicted of it .. 870
Promotion of class hatred .. 870, 871
Not necessary, that the class as a class should be held up to hatred and contempt—Enough if there is such intention and it is likely to produce it .. 870
Illustrative cases .. 870, 872
Sections 124-A and 500 compared .. 871, 872
If defamation of a person may amount to sedition .. 872
Liability of owner or occupier of land on which, takes place (s. 154) .. 872, 873
Criminal non-feasance of land-holders .. 874
Section obviously presupposes a premediated riot .. 873, 375
Essentials of the offence .. 873-875
Three breaches of duty punishable .. 875
Liability of person for whose benefit riot is committed (s. 155) .. 876
Limits of liability .. 877, 878
Liability of agent of owner or occupier for whose benefit riot is committed (s. 156) .. 878
Limits of vicarious liability .. 878, 879
Essentials necessary to constitute offence .. 879
Being hired to take part in an unlawful assembly or riot (s. 158) .. 881
Being hired for unlawful purpose .. 882
And hurt, how distinguished .. 1710
And grievous hurt, how distinguished .. 1722
See Unlawful Assembly.

Road—

Duties of person using public .. 1623, 1624

PAGE

Robbery—

Theft after preparation made for causing death, etc. distinguished from .. 2007
Extortion an intermediate between theft and .. 2011
Extortion and, difference between .. 2023
Attempted extortion and, difference between .. 2028
Topical Introduction .. 2033
Definition of (s. 390) .. 2033, 2034
When theft is (s. 390) .. 2034
When extortion is (s. 390) .. 2034
English Law as to .. 2035
Reasons why theft and extortion are put together in .. 2035
What is .. 2036
Theft (1) Voluntary hurt or restraint .. 2036
(2) Hurt, etc., must be subservient to robbery .. 2037
(3) Hurt or restraint must be voluntarily caused .. 2038
Accidental or incidental hurt not material .. 2038
(4) Wrongful restraint necessary in .. 2038, 2039
Instant hurt or restraint, Fear of, very essential .. 2039
Such fear may be caused to any person not necessarily the owner .. 2039
Theft in house vacated for fear of robbery in the neighbourhood does not make robbery .. 2039
That offender should be sufficently near to execute his threat instanter is essential in, by extortion .. 2040
Injury must have been threatened instanter, threat of accusation hence excluded .. 2040
Hurt to prevent pursuit does not convert theft into robbery .. 2041
When, is dacoity (s. 391) 2041
Dacoity and, difference between consists in the greater number of persons .. 2041
Actual violence necessary, constructive violence excluded .. 2044-2046
English Law of, different .. 2044, 2045
Illustrative cases .. 2044-2046
No robbery, no dacoity .. 2044
Punishment for (s. 392) .. 2046

Robbery—(contd.) PAGE

Facts declared relevant by the Evidence Act for proof of .. 2047
Evidence of .. 2049
Attempt to commit (s. 393) .. 2049
Attempt to rob, what is .. 2050
English Law as to, different .. 2050
Essential element of all attempts, some overt act and that act wrongful .. 2050
Voluntarily causing hurt in committing (s. 394) .. 2051
Accused cannot be convicted both under this and under section 392 by reason of section 235 of Cr. P. Code .. 2052
Section inapplicable where force consists merely of threat or attempt to cause hurt or of wrongful restraint or confinement .. 2052
With hurt, what is .. 2053
Distinction between those who jointly cause hurt and those who do not but are "jointly concerned" .. 2053, 2054
Dacoity or, with attempt to cause death or grievous hurt (s. 397) .. 2063
Aggravated .. 2064
Section prescribes a minimum of punishment .. 2065
Four aggravating circumstances .. 2065
Section compared with section 398 .. 2066, 2067
Three different phrases used to denote the three stages of the crime in the group of sections .. 2067
If liability for the act personal to the offender who actually uses the weapon, difference of view 2066
Use of deadly weapon essential, its effect immaterial .. 2068
Attempt to commit, or dacoity when armed with deadly weapon (s. 398) .. 2068
Use of deadly weapon not necessary .. 2069
Gang of Robbers, belonging to a, Punishment for (s. 401) .. 2078
Habitual association, if proved by previous convictions .. 2079

Robbery—(concld.) PAGE

Joining a gang of thieves or robbers, what is .. 2080
Illustratives cases .. 2080-2082
Habitual commission of, Necessity of 2080-2083
Section penalises criminal association for purpose of habitually committing theft .. 2082
See Dacoity.

Rules—
For the interpretation of the Code .. 158
See Construction of Statutes.

Sale
Of property by public servant, Obstruction of (s. 184) .. 1002
Intentional obstruction of 1003
Obstruction, what is .. 1003
Illegal purchase or bid of property offered for, by public servant (s. 185) .. 1003
Mock bidding at .. 1005
Persons liable .. 1005
Of minors for purposes of prostitution (s. 372) .. 1890
Section amended and scope enlarged by Act XVIII of 1924 .. 1891
Immoral intention, gist of offence .. 1891
Per se not punishable, only sale for an immoral purpose .. 1893
Disposal of minor for marriage or adoption, no offence .. 1893
Section assumes reasonable age of the girl a good defence .. 1891
Change of possession not necessary .. 1894
"Unlawful and immoral purpose" significance of the phrase 1894, 1903, 1904
Old law and the new, differences between .. 1894, 1895
Disposal of minors for immoral purposes, What is .. 1895-1898
What is .. 1895, 1896
Let on hire, what is .. 1896
"Dispose of" meaning of the phrase .. 1899, 1900
Prostitution presumed in case of, to prostitutes until the contrary is proved .. 1901, 1902
See Minor Prostitution.

PAGE Scheme—

Of the Code .. 160

Screening—

An offender (s. 201) .. 1110, 1111
Accessories after the fact in English Law .. 1112
Scope of section 201 .. 1114
An offender, what is .. 1114, 1115
Concealing corpus delicti .. 1116
Knowledge necessary .. 1117
What disappeared must be evidence .. 1117, 1118
What constitutes evidence .. 1118
Intention to screen offender essential .. 1118, 1119
Concealment or false information .. 1119
Case of no offence .. 1119, 1120
An offender by intentional omission to give information of offence (s. 202) .. 1120
Who are bound to inform .. 1120
Criminal omission to inform .. 1121, 1122
Person must be legally bound .. 1120, 1121
Giving very little information is enough to exonerate the person .. 1122
Taking illegal gift to, an offender (s. 213) .. 1180, 1181
Offering gift in consideration of, an offender (s. 214) .. 1183, 1184

Seal—

Making or possessing counterfeit, with intent to commit forgery (s. 472) .. 2195

Sea-mark—

Mischief by destroying, moving or rendering less useful a light-house or a (s. 433) .. 2322

Section—

Definition of (s. 50) .. 321

Sedition—

Topical Introduction—Analysis of the chapter .. 733
Waging war against the King (s. 121) .. 733
Historical retrospect .. 735
English Statutory Law on High Treason .. 736
Its unsatisfactory character .. 736

PAGE

Sedition—(contd.)

"Waging war" levying war," if mean the same thing .. 737, 738
Levying war, meaning of .. 738
"Divine right of Kings" what is and its necessity in former times .. 740
Treason, origin of the word 740
What High Treason comprises of .. 740, 741
How these were incorporated into the Code .. 741
Persons bound .. 741
Operation on foreign subjects .. 743, 744
Foreign residents are subject to the laws of the state because they claim protection under it .. 741, 742
Position of subject of one state entering another to attack it when the states are at peace .. 742
Position of an alien enemy .. 743
Effects of foreign naturalisation .. 744
"Waging war" what is .. 745, 746
Abetment of .. 745
Criminal Conspiracy to wage war .. 747, 748
What such conspiracy may consist of .. 747
English and Indian Law difference between .. 748
Preparation, attempt and levying of war .. 748, 749
Any conspiracy with an overt act will amount to an abetment .. 748
Specific intention is the essence of the offence .. 749
Constructive treason .. 750
Three elements in levying War .. 751
No waging of war when the object is only to redress a private wrong .. 751
American war of independence .. 751
Gordon riots and the Chartist rising in Wales .. 751, 752
Sedition and Abetting War .. 753
Seditious conspiracy to overthrow Government (s. 121-A) .. 753
Seditious conspiracy punishable as a substantive offence, apart from any illegal act or omission .. 755
Treasonable conspiracy .. 756
Wahabee cases of Ameer Khan .. 756, 757

Sedition—(contd.) PAGE

Writ of mainprize, held that High Court had no power to issue .. 757
Application of the rules of evidence in .. 757
Actual injury immaterial .. 757
Collecting arms, etc., with the intention of waging war (s. 122) .. 755
Mere preparation is punishable, This is the only case where .. 758
English Law followed .. 758
Intention necessary to constitute offence .. 759
Offence does not depend upon quality or efficiency of arms and ammunition .. 759
Bombs not ammunition but a person collecting bombs can be charged under section 121 if the other essentials are present .. 759
Concealing with intent to facilitate design to wage war (s. 123) .. 760
Assaulting Governor-General etc., (s. 124) .. 761
Assault on High Officers .. 762
Assault to induce him to refrain from exercising unlawful power, no liability under the section .. 762
Definition of sedition (s. 124-A) .. 763
Section criticized .. 764, 765
Law Commissioners' view .. 765
English Law of sedition .. 766-768
English and Indian rules distinguished .. 768
Supplementary provision .. 768, 769
What is sedition .. 771
Sedition of the King .. 771, 772
Defamation of the King amounts to .. 772
Scandalum Magnatum under English Law .. 771, 772
Cases of, and no sedition of the King .. 772
Sedition of State .. 772
Analysis of .. 773
Criminal intent necessary, which is a question of fact .. 773, 774
Intention when presumed .. 774
Boycott of foreign goods, no sedition .. 775
That Government has ordered prosecution is no conclusive proof of .. 774, 775
Time and place of publication .. 775

Sedition—(concld.) PAGE

Form immaterial .. 776
Intention, In judging of, the article should be looked into as a whole .. 776
Treatises and reports excepted .. 776, 777
Cause judged from effect .. 777
When is disaffection likely .. 778
Position and standing of the accused to be considered .. 778
Truth how far a defence .. 778, 779
"Brings or attempts to bring or excite," meaning of .. 779, 780
What is an attempt .. 780
"Hatred, contempt, disaffection" .. 782, 783
Hatred of State not of its servant .. 783, 784
"Disaffection" .. 784
Disaffection implies political discontent .. 784
Publication not authorship material .. 785
That it was copied or published on the responsibility of the author no defence .. 785
Inadvertence, want of knowledge or intention are the only defences possible .. 785
Intention presumed by law in the case of printers and publishers by the Press Act, which may be rebutted .. 785
Cases of no sedition .. 787
Liberty of the Press .. 787
Journalist, Accuracy of a lawyer or scientist not expected from .. 788
Punishment for .. 789
Waging war against any allied Asiatic power (s. 125) .. 789
What is waging war .. 791
Commercial contracts exempted .. 791
Foreign state may be a state de facto, though not de jure exercising functions 791
Promoting enmity between classes, section re, supplement to (s. 153-A) .. 869

Seduction—
Of married woman after kidnapping or abduction punishable under section 366 .. 1862
What is .. 1866-1868
Complete as soon as the woman consents to surrender her person .. 1866
Conflicting views as to .. 1867, 1868

Seduction of Married Woman—	PAGE
Enticing or taking away or detaining with criminal intent a married woman (s. 498) ..	2638
Provisions of this section limited by sections 361 and 366 ..	2638
Is wife exempt from liability as abettor ..	2639
Death of husband complainant does not abate the prosecution ..	2639
Procedure where the accused challenges the prosecutor's marriage with the woman ..	2639
Complaint after the husband divorces his wife after abduction, of no value ..	2639
Included in major offence of adultery ..	2639
Points which the finding should specify ..	2640
Circumstances mitigating the offence to be considered in the punishment ..	2640
Is a continuing offence ..	2640
Offence a departure from English Law ..	2641
What is ..	2641
Depriving the husband of his control over the woman, principal ingredient of the offence ..	2641
Wife's complicity not material ..	2642
Taking and enticing must be proved ..	2642
Taking complete the moment she is removed from the control of the husband ..	2642
Not necessary that the accused intended to have illicit intercourse with her himself ..	2642
Woman enticed must be a married woman ..	2643
Accused must know that the woman was married ..	2643
Marriage must be one in which the woman is enjoined strict monogamy ..	2643
Taking must be from the husband ..	2643
Woman staying with her parents or in a boarding house the charges being paid by the husband is still under his protection ..	2644
Woman must have been living in coverture at the time of the elopement ..	2644

Seduction of Married Woman—(concld.)	PAGE
Husband's remedy lost by delay and desertion no less than by connivance or consent ..	2644
Divorced and deserted woman excluded ..	2645
Intention must be that she should have illicit intercourse with some person ..	2645
Not necessary that the woman should actually have such intercourse ..	2645
Concealment or detention of such woman for such purpose also punishable ..	2645
"Conceals or detains," meaning of ..	2645
Any such woman, i.e., woman married and so known to accused, not one taken away or enticed ..	2646

Self-defence
See Private Defence.

Sentence—
Separate, awardable for abducting with intent to rape and actual rape ..	1863

Servants of the Queen—
Meaning of ..	199
Definition of (s. 14) ..	220
Enumeration of officers who are ..	221
List not exhaustive ..	221
Public servants, If are ..	221

Slavery—
Kidnapping or abducting in order to subject person to grievous hurt, slavery, etc. (s. 367) ..	1874
Buying or disposing of any person as a slave (s. 370)	1881
Origin of the custom with conquest ..	1881
Modern notions of war among civilized nations ..	1881, 1882
Historical retrospect ..	1882
Recognized by Hindus and Mahomedans ..	1882
Opposed to common law of England ..	1882
Liability for not only to carry or convey them but also to keep or retain ..	1882
Anti-slavery legislation ..	1882, 1883

Slavery—(concld.) PAGE

Indian regulations against .. 1883
Laws relating to forced labour distinguished from .. 1883
Essential constituents of .. 1884, 1885
What is a slave .. 1885
Section does not directly prohibit slavery .. 1885
Assertion of absolute power over liberty of another is the crux of .. 1886
Acquiring rights over the liberty of another legally no slavery .. 1886
Outcome of section 370 .. 1887
Question whether a person is slave depends on how he is treated and also right claimed over him .. 1887
Purchase and sale of girls for marriage outside scope of the section .. 1887
What acts are prohibited .. 1887, 1888
English statute against piracy applicable to India .. 1888
Habitual dealing in slaves (s. 371) .. 1888
Section refers to professional slave dealer .. 1889
English statute on the point 1889
A slave dealer by sea treated as pirate .. 1889
Habitual slave dealer, who is a .. 1889
Section includes middleman who negotiates for commission .. 1889, 1890

See Forced Labour.

Sodomy—

See Unnatural Offence.

Duties of 427, 428, 429
Limits of justification of .. 429
Abetting mutiny or attempting to seduce, sailor or airman from duty (s. 131) .. 799, 800
Abetment of mutiny, if mutiny is committed (s. 132) 802
Abetment of assault by, on his superior officer, (s. 133) 803
Superior officer meaning of 804
Section not applicable when officer is not in execution of his office .. 803
Abetment of assault by .. 804, 805
"Assault" what the term includes .. 805
No abetment of assault where assault itself not an offence 805

Soldier—(concld.). PAGE

Abetment of assault if assault committed (s. 134) .. 806
Abetment of desertion of (s. 135) .. 807
Desertion abetted need not take place .. 808
Desertion what is .. 808
Intention of not returning for service necessary for desertion .. 808
Harbouring deserter (s. 136) 809
Abetment of insubordination by (s. 138) .. 812
Essentials of offence .. 813
Knowledge of the act as well as its quality necessary .. 813
Wearing garb of, or carrying token used by (s. 140) .. 814
Wearing a soldier's garb .. 815
Intention to deceive necessary .. 815

See Army and Navy.

Solitary Confinement—

Proportion of, as a punishment (s. 73) .. 400, 402
What is .. 401
Object of imposing .. 401
In what cases imposed .. 401
Section regulates duration of .. 401
As a mode of sentence .. 402
Not a substantive sentence by itself .. 402
Cannot be awarded on conviction of offences under special or local laws .. 402
Limits of (s. 74) .. 403
No, when conviction is under any other law .. 403

Special Law—

Saving of (s. 5) .. 208
Definition of (s. 41) .. 314
Whipping Act not a .. 314
Provisions of ss. 65 and 67 applicable to punishments under, .. 369

Stamps—

Offences relating to .. 1312-1327
Topical introduction .. 1263
General scope of, set out .. 1263
Counterfeiting Government (s. 255) .. 1312
Counterfeiting of Government stamps .. 1313
What is stamp .. 1313

PAGE

Stamp—(contd.)

Stamp includes court-fee stamp also and may be adhesive or non-adhesive 1313
What is counterfeiting .. 1313
Counterfeiting a stamp is forgery .. 1313
Possession of instrument or material for counterfeiting (s. 256) .. 1313
Mere possession itself not material .. 1314
English Law, mere possession punishable .. 1314
Making or selling instrument for counterfeiting (s. 257) 1315
Compared with section 234 .. 1316
Making or selling instruments for forging stamp .. 1316, 1317
Liability only when the instrument is one specially designed for the purpose such as a plate or die .. 1316, 1317
Criminal knowledge or intention necessary .. 1317
Sale of counterfeit Government stamp (s. 258) .. 1317
Person mortgaging such stamps if liable under the section .. 1317
Having possession of counterfeit Government (s. 259) .. 1318
Possession, which is a prelude to an intended imposition, is an offence .. 1319
Section applies only to a person other than the forger who is liable under section 255 .. 1319
Using as genuine of a counterfeit Government stamps (s. 260) .. 1319
Criminal knowledge at the time of using the stamp necessary .. 1320
Cancelled stamp is not a counterfeit stamp .. 1320
Effacing writing from a stamp or removal of a stamp from a document with intent to cause loss to Government (s. 261) .. 1320
Section 261 deals with 2 distinct acts .. 1321
Removal of writing may be without interfering with the stamp .. 1321, 1322
Removal of stamp per se not an offence but only removal with intent to use it over again .. 1322
Using Government stamp known to have been before used (s. 262) .. 1322
Intent to defraud or cause loss to Government essential .. 1323
Erasure of mark denoting that stamp has been used (s. 263) .. 1323
Section deals with offences of 3 kinds .. 1324
"Mark" what is .. 1324, 1325
Intention or knowledge to defraud or cause loss to Government essential .. 1324
Possession or disposal must be with the knowledge of fraudulent erasure .. 1325
Prohibition of fictitious stamps (s. 263-A) .. 1325
English Law followed on this point .. 1326
Working of the section depends upon the proper understanding of the terms "knowingly" and "without lawful excuse" .. 1326
Motive innocent immaterial .. 1327

State—

Offences against the, Ch. VI (ss. 121-130) .. 733-797
Topical Introduction .. 733

Stolen Property—

Taking gift to help to recover (s. 215) .. 1190
Provisions of English Law .. 1190, 1191
Section protects a bona fide detective .. 1192
Taking money to restore .. 1192, 1193
Legal reward .. 1194
Restoration of, Courts power to order, in case of theft .. 1980
Definition of (s. 410) .. 2159
Definition of, how amended .. 2160
English Law as to .. 2160, 2161
What is .. 2162
Possession, Transfer of when necessary to constitute .. 2163
When becomes so .. 2163
Property in the hands of a thief is .. 2163
Change, conversion or alteration of property, Effect of .. 2163, 2164
Property ceases to be, when original identity destroyed 2164
Substance remaining same but form undergoing

PAGE

Stolen Property—(concld.)

change, property remains stolen property .. 2164
Cheques, notes and jewels, Change of, Effect of .. 2164
Property on reversion to lawful owner ceases to be .. 2165, 2166
Person may be in possession of, which is his own, as he may commit theft of his own property .. 2165
Owner's subsequent consent or ratification cannot alter character of .. 2165
But not when owner after actually taking hold of the thing sells or gifts it to the thief .. 2165, 2166
Property acquired by fraudulent transfer is not .. 2166
Dishonestly receiving (s. 411) .. 2166, 2167
Mere possession of, not an offence .. 2167
Who may be jointly tried .. 2169
Joint trial of person accused of theft and another accused of kindred offence now allowed by the amended Procedure Code .. 2169
Restitution of, Power of Court re .. 2169, 2170
Dishonestly receiving property stolen in the commission of dacoity (s. 412) 2191
Habitually dealing in (s. 413) .. 2195
Assisting in concealment of (s. 414) .. 2197
Property obtained by cheating not .. 2247

See Receiving Stolen Property.

Strangulation—

Medical witness, Question to, in case of .. 1586, 1587

Sub-headings—

To the Code, Object and value of .. 160

Sudden Fight—

Culpable homicide in a .. 1561
Duelling excepted .. 1561
What is a .. 1563
Two elements of a, considered in mitigation of murder 1563

Suicide—

Abetment of, of child or insane person (s. 305) .. 1635

PAGE

Suicide—(contd.)

Persons actively aiding, liable 1635
Includes persons in charge who give opportunities to persons under them to commit .. 1635, 1636
What is .. 1635
Offence only when suicide committed .. 1636
Concurrence or Consent immaterial .. 1636
Not necessary that the, should have killed himself in consequence of the abetment .. 1636
Section provided for persons who do not come under section 306 .. 1636
Abetment of (s. 306) .. 1637
Abetment distinguished from homicide by consent .. 1637
History of the English Law on the point .. 1637
Section not applicable in case of attempted .. 1637
What is abetment of .. 1638
Abettor should be something more than a mute spectator, Spectator haud particeps .. 1638
In England suicide an act of insanity .. 1638
Cases where two people mutually consent to die together .. 1639, 1640
Suttee, abetment of .. 1640
Attempt to commit (s. 309) .. 1654
Attempt, definition of .. 1655
Christian ideas of .. 1655
Punishment for, in England 1656
Posthumous punishment for, In England abandoned .. 1656
Ancient law in Athens as to 1656
Hindu religion encouraged .. 1655
The only offence where attempt alone punishable while completed crime is not .. 1656
Why attempted, punishable .. 1656, 1657
Not necessarily the outcome of deranged intellect .. 1657
What is an attempt to commit .. 1657
When preparation ends and attempt begins, illustrative examples .. 1657
Attempt must be intentional 1658
Mutilation of one's person is not .. 1658
Stages of the attempt .. 1657
Punishment for attempted, measure of .. 1658
Persons attempting, fitter objects for sympathy .. 1658
Motives for committing .. 1658, 1659

PAGE

Suicide—(concld.)

Points to be considered in awarding punishments .. 1659

Summons—

See Contempt of Courts, Public servants, contempts of.

Suttee—

Abetment of, punishable under section 306 .. 1640
What amounts to such abetment .. 1640

T

Tent—

Theft in a (s. 380) .. 1992
What is a .. 1997
Theft from a .. 1997

Theft—

Topical Introduction .. 1939-1943
Necessity for the branches of remedies Criminal and Civil 1939
Protection of property, concern of the State in all systems of law .. 1939
Departure from English Law with reference to the offence of .. 1939
General view of offences against property ... 1939, 1940
Classification of such offences 1939, 1940
Object of the Code punitive but not preventive .. 1940
Possession, not ownership, subject of protection .. 1941
Theft distinguished from other cognate offences .. 1941
Possession not defined in the Code .. 1942
What is possession .. 1941, 1942
English conception of possession arbitrary .. 1942
Offences against property, distinction between, based on the mode of dispossession 1943
Assault or criminal force in attempt to commit, of property carried by a person (s. 356) .. 1826
Section directed against pick-pockets .. 1827
Cases of, distinguished from assault to commit theft .. 1828
Kidnapping or abducting child under 10 years with intent to commit, from its person (s. 369) ..
By abduction .. 1880

PAGE

Theft—(contd.)

Actual taking of property from person of child not necessary .. 1881
Definition of (s. 378) .. 1944
Offence of larceny in English Law—What is larceny .. 1946
Larceny and, distinguished on 6 grounds .. 1946, 1947
Difference between the two offences is really one of degree .. 1947
What is theft .. 1947
Dishonest intention the sole criterion for criminal responsibility .. 1947
Dishonesty compared with animus furandi .. 1947
Five essential ingredients of the offence .. 1948
Animus furandi, Lucri causa 1948
Primary and secondary intention .. 1949
Temporary deprivation if sufficient .. 1950
Actual taking not necessary 1950
Secrecy by no means the necessary ingredient .. 1950
Taking must be of moveable property .. 1951
Moveable property, What is 1950, 1951
Moveable property may be
(1) Of earth severed from earth .. 1951
(2) Water whether stagnant or running .. 1952
(3) Gas and electricity .. 1952, 1953
(4) Animals feræ naturæ 1953
Animals feræ naturæ are property if dead, tame or confined .. 1953
Wild animals and birds so long as they are wild and free cannot be the subject of theft .. 1953
Animal feræ naturæ, young one of .. 1954
(5) Fish .. 1954, 1955
Fish when becomes private property and consequently subject to theft .. 1955
(6) Oysters, peculiar nature of and property in .. 1956
(7) Chanks, subject to the same rules as oysters being of the same nature .. 1956, 1957
(8) Domestic animals .. 1957
(9) Human body .. 1958
(10) Carcass .. 1958
No property where a thing is abandoned .. 1959

Theft—(contd.) PAGE

Bull set at large on ceremonial occasions is abandoned property .. 1959
Jettisoning goods to lighten ships in an emergency, ownership not abandoned.. 1959
Whether property is abandoned property depends upon intention .. 1959
Property may be valueless .. 1960
Such property exempted from theft by the operation of section 95 of the Code .. 1949, 1960
Property must be in possession .. 1961
It must be in the possession of any person i.e., a human being .. 1961
Possession need not be actual but may be symbolical .. 1961, 1962
One thief cannot rob another, reason why .. 1962
Case of disputed titles .. 1962
Bona fide claim excepted .. 1962, 1963
Claim, if bona fide a question of fact .. 1962
A bona fide claim may be altogether indefensible in law 1963
To cut down and appropriate crops raised by oneself no, though title passed to another .. 1964
Bona fide belief as to right essential .. 1964
Mistake of fact as distinct from a mistake of law a good defence .. 1964
Taker in joint possession, no offence .. 1965
Conversion of joint possession into an exclusive one is .. 1965
Offence takes no note of owner of a thing but protects its present possession 1965
Being jointly entitled to property no defence .. 1965
Protection of possession against title, cases illustrative of .. 1965, 1966
By husband and wife, under English Law .. 1966, 1967
Under Hindu Law .. 1967
By husband and wife under Mahomedan Law .. 1968
By owner of his own property .. 1968
An offence against possession, so ownership no defence .. 1968
Illustrative cases re .. 1968, 1969
By owner of his own property, Test as to possession 1969

Theft—(contd.) PAGE

Dishonesty, what constitutes in case of .. 1969
No theft when possession of person from whom owner took property not legal .. 1969
Attachment of a Civil Court, effect of .. 1970
Removal of crops pending attachment, if amounts to 1970
Possession of another necessary .. 1970, 1971
Possession protected against, What is .. 1970
Taking must be without consent .. 1971, 1972
Consent a sufficient defence though it does negative criminality .. 1972
Consent is the chief difference between cheating and theft 1972
Consent under a misconception of fact, what is .. 1973
Consent by agent .. 1973
Consent by agent when invalid .. 1973
Moving of property necessary 1974
Moving, what is .. 1974
Moving, nature of evidence required to prove .. 1975
Mere fact of moving completes, even with intention of replacement .. 1976
Moving must be with intent to take it dishonestly .. 1976
Moving, different kinds of, contained in the Explanation to the section .. 1976
Punishment for (s. 379) .. 1976
Summary trial for, when to be adopted .. 1977
Joint trial of two or more persons for, when vitiates the whole trial .. 1977
Trial of one person for two or more offences, legality of 1978
Several thefts in one transaction .. 1979
The goods may belong to several persons but still it may be one offence .. 1979
Punishment of whipping .. 1979
Measure of punishment, principles governing .. 1979
Not an offence involving breach of the peace .. 1980
Restoration of stolen property, Court's power to order in .. 1980
Principles regarding restoration .. 1980, 1981
Fine optional .. 1981

PAGE

Theft—(contd.)

Pointing out place where stolen articles were hid, insufficient to support conviction .. 1981
Person charged with theft cannot be convicted of extortion or dishonest misappropriation .. 1982
Evidence of .. 1983
Intentionality of dishonest acquisition .. 1983
Dishonesty, what is .. 1983
Accusation of, Where there is bona fide claim of right or where subject-matter savours of civil dispute .. 1983, 1984
Conflict of rights between landlord and tenant .. 1984
Legal presumption from recent possession .. 1985
Essentials of such presumption—
(1) Previous theft, proof of .. 1986
(2) Identification of property in possession as property stolen .. 1986
(3) Such possession must be recent .. 1987
Recent possession what is .. 1987
Recent possession, presumption from, that accused committed theft or stolen property .. 1988
Adverse presumption from unsatisfactory explanation 1989
(4) Possession to be exclusively traced to accused .. 1990, 1991
Other circumstantial evidence .. 1991
Motive for, immaterial .. 1992
To earn reward for discovery .. 1992
Mischief and, no separate conviction for .. 1992
In dwelling house, tent or vessel, etc. (s. 380) .. 1992
No corresponding provision in English Law .. 1993
Facts aggravating, into theft in a building .. 1994
Building, tent or vessel, What is .. 1994
Building, what constitute 1994
Building under English Law must be enclosed and covered .. 1994
Railway carriage not a building .. 1995
Different kinds of buildings .. 1995, 1996

PAGE

Theft—(contd.)

Theft must be in a building, meaning of .. 1996
If a person could be convicted for, when building is his own .. 1997
From a tent .. 1997
From a vessel .. 1998
Whether building, tent or vessel, it must be used for human dwelling or custody of property .. 1998
"Dwelling," meaning of .. 1998
"Custody," meaning of .. 1998
By clerk or servant of property in possession of master (s. 381) .. 1998
Distinguished from criminal breach of trust by same 1999
English law on the point compared .. 1995
Reasons for making the offence heinous .. 2000
Not necessary that he should be a paid or regular servant .. 2000
What is, by clerk or servant .. 2000
Who is a clerk or servant 2000, 2001
Relationship depends more on right to control than on right to obedience .. 2001
Question of service depends on terms of employment and degree of control .. 2002
Term not synonymous with "employee" but narrower than it .. 2002
Who are not .. 2002, 2003
Contractors if .. 2003
Commercial travellers if .. 2003, 2004
Servants illegally employed 2004
Persons who are ordinarily classed as .. 2004
While non-payment of salary does not exclude service, its payment is a certain criterion of it .. 2004
Persons employed as .. 2005
Ex-servants excluded .. 2005
Liability limited to property in employer's possession—Nature of such possession 2006
After preparation made for causing death, hurt, or restraint; in order to the committing of it (s. 382) 2006, 2007
Under section 382 distinguished from robbery .. 2007
Point of aggravation is intimidation of personal injury 2008
Criminality depends merely on preparation and not on

PAGE

Theft—(contd.)

its knowledge by the person in possession .. 2008
Preparation, what amounts to .. 2008
Mere possession of weapons per se evidence of preparation .. 2008
Theft distinguished from extortion and cheating .. 2009
When, is robbery (s. 390) 2034,2036,2037
Gang of thieves, Belonging to a, Punishment for (s 401) .. 2078
Joining a gang of thieves or robbers, what is .. 2080-2083
Habitual commission of, necessary .. 2079
Criminal misappropriation and, Difference between 2090,2091
Criminal misappropriation differs from, as it may be committed even in respect of property not in possession .. 2104
Joint Trial of thief with receiver of stolen property now allowed by the amended Procedure Code .. 2169
Dishonestly breaking open closed receptacle containing property (s. 461) .. 2420
Person entrusted with custody of such receptacle committing the offence (s. 462) 2422

Threat—

See Consent, Criminal Intimidation, Extortion, Free consent.

Thug—

Definition of (s. 310) .. 1659
Historical retrospect .. 1659
Distinguished from robber and dacoit .. 1660
What is a .. 1660
Requirements of the section 1660,1661
Murder must be the necessary accompaniment .. 1661
Punishment for being a (s. 311) .. 1661
Being a member of such organisation a crime, actual commission of offence not necessary .. 1662
Proof of the offence .. 1662

Torture—

Resulting in hurt (s. 330) .. 1736,1737
Sections 327 and 330 compared .. 1737
English Law as to, and History of .. 1737,1738

PAGE

Trade Description—

Section manifestly directed against police and other officers .. 1739
Punishment for .. 1740
Resulting in grievous hurt (s. 331) .. 1742,1743
Distinguished from trade-mark .. 2517
What is .. 2517
Use of false, punishable under the Code as well as Merchandise Marks Act .. 2518
General get-up, Distinguished from .. 2518
Illustrative cases of .. 2518, 2519

Trade-mark—

Topical Introduction 2424, 2425 2512,2513
Offences relating to, and cheating .. 2512
Infringement of, how far a civil or a criminal wrong 2512,2513
Criminal Law provides a speedy remedy .. 2513
Definition of (s. 478) .. 2513,2514
Definition in the English Merchandise Marks Act. 2513,2514
Second clause of the section includes international arrangements for the protection of inventions, designs, etc. .. 2515
No system of registration of trade-marks in India and rival claims determined with principles of common law of England .. 2515
What is a .. 2515
Compared to copyright .. 2516
May or may not be registered .. 2516
If registered it is, though not used as such .. 2516
If not registered it ceases to be, if not used as such 2516
Right to a, how far property 2516
Object of protecting .. 2516
Instances of .. 2517
Trade description, Distinguished from .. 2517
What is Trade description 2517
Use of false, punishable under Code .. 2518
General get-up, Distinguished from .. 2518
Illustrative cases of .. 2518
Copyright is not a .. 2519
Books how far goods for purposes of .. 2519
Definition of, not so elastic as to protect rights of authors .. 2519

Trade-mark—(contd.)	PAGE
Property mark, Definition of (s. 479)	2519
What is a property mark	2520
Distinguished from property mark	2520
Such distinction peculiar to Penal Code	2520
English Law; no such distinction	2520
Property mark must relate to moveable property	2521
Using a false, (s. 480)	2521
Corresponding English Law	2522
Using a false, what is	2522,2523
There must be an infringement of a	2523
Illustrative cases	2523,2524
Right depends on user	2524
Right restricted to the kind of goods using the trade-mark	2525
Right lost by abandonment	2525
Mere non-user for a sufficient time good evidence of abandonment	2525
Use in a manner "reasonably calculated to deceive"	2526
Knowledge of previous use of similar trade-mark by another essential	2526
Two persons using the same trade-mark each without the knowledge of the other	2525
There may be such knowledge yet act not criminal though it may afford ground for an injunction	2526
True test—Similarity need not deceive the conoisseur but sufficient if it could deceive a casual customer	2527
Illustrative cases of degress of similarity	2527,2529
Truth is no justification	2528,2529
One person namesake of another well-known person may not sell goods in his own name if it is calculated to deceive	2529,2530
When such person may legally do so	2530
Coincident similarity excepted	2531
Quality of the goods being the same is no defence	2531
Using a false property mark (s. 481)	2532
Punishment for using a false, or property mark (s. 482)	2532
Using a false trade description as distinct from false trade-mark not punishable under the Code but under Merchandise Marks Act	2532
Corresponding provisions of Merchandise Marks Act	2533
Ordinary procedure modified by special provisions of Merchandise Marks Acts	2534
When criminal proceedings are improper	2534
Except the limitation prescribed for criminal proceedings, no indication by legislature when party entitled to resort to one proceeding rather than another	2534
If undue delay, complainant will be referred to a Civil Court	2534
Bona fide dispute how far an answer to a criminal prosecution	2535
Proof that contravention of law was unintentional entitles acquittal under Merchandise Marks Act	2535
Offences relating to infringement of, Purpose in view of the Code in	2536
Mens rea, Burden of proof of, in offence re	2536
Fraudulent use of false	2536, 2537
Gravamen of the offence is fraud	2537
Not necessary that some one should in fact have been actually deceived	2537
Quality of counterfeit goods immaterial	2538
Using a, What is	2539
Whether imitation so exact as "reasonably calculated to deceive"	2539
Proximity of business	2540
Possible defences to offences against	2540, 2541
Defence that the trade-mark had in course of time become publici juris	2541
No exclusive right in trade-mark containing a false representation calculated to deceive the public	2542
Laches in prosecution, effect of	2542
Counterfeiting a, or property mark used by another (s. 483)	2543
Counterfeiting a, what amounts to	2544
Counterfeiting a mark used by a public servant (s. 484)	2544

PAGE

Trade-mark—(contd.)

Making or having in possession any die plate or other instrument for purpose of counterfeiting a, or property mark (s. 485) .. 2546
Provision of English Act furnishing a good defence to a charge under this section .. 2546, 2547
Counterfeiting instrument possession of .. 2548
Possession must be for purpose of counterfeiting .. 2548
Purpose how proved .. 2548
Possession of counterfeit trade labels .. 2548, 2549
Possession of a, when criminal .. 2548
Selling goods marked with a counterfeit trade-mark or property mark (s. 486) .. 2549
Section extends penalty to those who promote circulation or consumption of such goods .. 2549, 2550
Criminality consists in merely selling, exposing or having in possession for sale goods apart from intention or knowledge .. 2550
Defences open to the accused .. 2550
Possession of goods bearing counterfeit .. 2551
Cases which may be made subject of redress in a civil proceeding excluded under the section .. 2552
Possession for trade .. 2552
Such possession implies consciousness of spurious character of the trade-mark .. 2552
Prohibition restricted to persons who are dealers or sellers of such goods .. 2553
Sale or possession, What is 2553
Books held to fall in the category of "goods" and hence bookseller also punishable under this section .. 2553
Making a false mark upon any receptacle containing goods (s. 487) .. 2553
Section compared with sections 482 and 486 .. 2555
Falsely marking goods .. 2555
False mark what is .. 2555
Absence of intention to defraud a good defence .. 2556
Punishment for making use of a false mark (s. 488) .. 2556

PAGE

Trade-mark—(concld.)

Making use of a false mark 2556, 2557
Tampering with property mark with intent to cause injury (s. 489) .. 2557
Section requires proof of criminal intention or knowledge .. 2558

Trafficking—

In forged Notes .. 2562, 2563

Transportation—

As a sentence .. 334-336

Trap—

To detect crime .. 572

Treason—

See Sedition.

Trespass—

See Criminal trespass, House-trespass, Lurking house-trespass, Housebreaking, Religion.

Trust—

Criminal Breach of, Definition of (s. 405) .. 2112
Criminal Breach of, What is .. 2114-2118
What is a .. 2115
There is no criminal breach of, when there is no trust actual or constructive 2115, 2120, 2121
Trustee dishonestly breaking open a closed receptacle (s. 462) .. 2422

U

Undue Influence

At elections, Definition of (s. 171-C) .. 933
Provisions under English Law .. 933, 934
Essence of the offence of .. 934
Three means of exerting .. 934
Not necessary that, should be effective .. 934
At elections, what is .. 934
No, at elections, tests of .. 934, 935
Punishment for, at elections (s. 171-F) .. 938

Unlawful—

Illegal, Distinguished from 315

Unlawful Assembly—	PAGE
What is an (s. 141) ..	817, 818
English Law different as to number of persons ..	818, 819
Menace to peace and therefore unlawful ..	819
Essentials of "Unlawful Assembly" ..	819, 820, 842
Common object essential ..	819
Meaning of object ..	819
Mere combination of five men not unlawful unless with common unlawful object ..	820
It is not necessary that they should be all jointly brought to trial ..	819
Assembly perfectly lawful in its inception may become suddenly unlawful ..	820
Common object must be one of those specified in the section ..	820
Overawing Government ..	821
When is a person said to overawe another ..	821
Overawing merely by superior influence not criminal nor overawing by fear illegal ..	821
Other provisions in the Code against overawing Government ..	821
Resistance to legal process ..	821, 822
Process must necessarily be legal ..	822, 823
Commission of any offence ..	823, 824
This clause not free from ambiguity ..	823
Forcible possession and dispossession ..	824
Conflict of views of different High Courts ..	825, 826
Assembly lawful does not become unlawful merely because it provokes others to do unlawful acts ..	827, 829
Right of procession ..	824, 825
Bona fide claim protected ..	827
Illegal command to disperse	827
Symbolical possession ..	827, 828
Proof of possession ..	828
Supposed right ..	828, 829
Illegal compulsion ..	829
Being member of an (s. 142)	829
Joining or continuance in an, must be intentional ..	829, 830
Punishment for being member of an, ..	830
Merely being a member is punishable ..	830

Unlawful Assembly—(contd.)	PAGE
Joining, armed with deadly weapon (s. 144) ..	832
Deadly weapon, meaning of	833, 834
Armed with deadly weapon	833, 834
If only the person armed is punishable with enhanced punishment ..	833, 834
Conflict of views ..	834
Joining or continuing in, after command to disperse (s. 145) ..	834
Person joining or continuing in, after command to disperse is guilty of contempt	835, 836
Liability of every member of, in prosecution of the common object (s. 149) ..	846
This section compared with section 34 ..	846
Hiring or conniving at hiring of persons to join an (s. 150) ..	855, 856
Section not applicable to abettor but one who though not abettor still promotes or connives ..	856
Section compared with section 157 ..	856, 858
Promotes or connives at, meaning of ..	857
Person liable for ..	857, 858
If unlawful assembly should be in existence with or without the recruit hired by the accused for liability under the section ..	858
Object must have been to constitute or strengthen an	859
No connivance without legal obligation ..	859
Non-interference through sheer helplessness, not criminal connivance ..	859
Knowingly joining or continuing in an, after commanded to disperse (s. 151) ..	859
Section compared with section 145 ..	860
Knowingly, meaning of ..	861
Lawfulness of command most essential ..	861
Bombay, In the city of, special provision made and the command of the magistrate insufficient ..	861
Disorderly assemblies ..	861
Disorderly assemblies distinguished from ..	861, 863
Person commanding must have jurisdiction as well as reason to order dispersal ..	861

Unlawful Assembly—(concld.) PAGE

Requisites of the offence .. 861
Legality of the order solely depending on imminence of danger to public peace .. 862
Lawful gathering cannot be prohibited merely because it may endanger public tranquillity .. 863
Owner or occupier of land on which, is held, Liability of (s. 154) .. 872, 873
Criminal non-feasance of landholders .. 874
Reasons for creating this duty 873
Section obviously presupposes a premeditated riot .. 873, 875
Persons jointly interested in land will both be liable .. 874
Essentials of the offence .. 874, 875
Knowledge necessary for liability .. 875
Non-residential landholders and agents, Duty of maintaining public peace imposed on .. 875
Three breaches of duty punishable .. 875, 876
Liability of person for whose benefit riot is committed (s. 155) .. 876
Limits of liability .. 877, 878
Liability of agent of owner or occupier for whose benefit riot is committed (s. 156).. 878
Limits of vicarious liability 878, 879
Harbouring persons hired for an (s. 157) .. 879
Harbours, meaning of. .. 880
What harbouring is prohibited .. 880
Receiving or assembling, meaning of .. 880
Being hired to take part in an, or riot (s. 158) .. 881
Being hired for unlawful purpose .. 882
Person proposing to become member of, would be liable although refused .. 882
When affray may become an 885

Unlawful Compulsory Labour—

Definition of (s. 374) .. 1911

See Forced Labour.

Unnatural Offence—

Kidnapping or abducting in order to subject person to grievous hurt, slavery or (s. 367) .. 1874

Unnatural Offence—(concld.) PAGE

Definition of (s. 377) .. 1934
Kinds of offences dealt in .. 1934
English Law as to .. 1935
Other person held guilty as accomplice .. 1935
Testimony of such accomplice only, insufficient for guilt .. 1935
Infant under 14 years incapable of this crime under English Law .. 1935
Elements necessary to constitute .. 1936
In case of human being, penetration per anum necessary .. 1936
"Hijras" Eunuchs called, ordinarily guilty of the crime .. 1937
On animals .. 1937
Habitual sodomite .. 1937
Evidence in case of .. 1937
Medical examination of person disclosing probability of an, itself insufficient . 1937
Carnal knowledge by man or woman with inanimate objects not an .. 1938
Carnal intercourse by woman with animals is also within the definition of .. 1938
In such case penetration need not be per anum .. 1938
Solitary offences not punished under the Code .. 1938
Other offences against the person .. 1938

Unsoundness of mind—

See Insanity.

Valuable Security—

Definition of (s. 30) and in English Law .. 284, 2263
Characteristics of .. 285
What is and what is not .. 286
Legal right, what is a .. 286
Cheating and dishonestly inducing the making, or altering or destroying whole or any part of a (s. 420) .. 2261
Provision as to, compared with English Law .. 2263
What is, for purposes of cheating .. 2267
To make alter or destroy valuable security, what is 2267, 2268
Forgery of (s. 467) .. 2467
Fraudulent cancellation; destruction, etc., of (s. 477) .. 2504

PAGE

Valuable Security—(concld.)

Fraudulent tampering with valuable security, what is 2505
Different modes of the commission of the offence .. 2506
Essential constituents must be strictly proved as the section is a highly penal one .. 2506

Vessel—

Definition of (s. 48) .. 319
Deserter concealed on board a, through negligence of master (s. 137) .. 811
Liability of ship's master .. 812
Essentials of the offence .. 811
Theft in a vessel (s. 380) .. 1992
What is a, for the purpose of theft in a .. 1994, 1998
Mischief, with intent to destroy or make unsafe a decked vessel or one of twenty tons burden (s. 437) .. 2334
Small native crafts of all kinds such as a ferry boat etc., excluded .. 2335
Decked vessel, what is a .. 2336
Mischief endangering ship, What is and why punishable .. 2336, 2337
Mischief to a decked or one of twenty tons burden, committed by fire or explosive substance (s. 438) .. 2336
Arson endangering ship .. 2337
Intentionally running, aground or ashore with intent to commit theft, etc., (s. 439) .. 2338

Viceroy—

Powers of .. 471, 472
Liability of, for contracts and grants .. 471, 472
Proclamation of Martial Law .. 476, 477

Voluntarily—

Definition of (s. 39) .. 305
Wilfully and, Distinction between .. 305, 306
Various meanings of .. 305, 306
Constituents of .. 305
Intention and knowledge, How far different from .. 305, 306
Intentionally, Distinguished from .. 307
When act done under coercion amounts to .. 310

PAGE

W

Waging War—

Against the King (s. 121) .. 733
What is .. 745, 746
Conspiracy to wage war (s. 121-A) .. 753
Collecting arms etc., with intention of waging war against the Queen (s. 122) 758
Mere preparation punishable 758
Bombs not ammunition .. 759
Offence independent of quality or efficiency of arms and ammunition .. 759
Concealing with intent to facilitate design to (s. 123) 760
Against any allied Asiatic Power (s. 125) .. 789
War against an Asiatic Power .. 791
Commercial contracts exempted .. 791, 792
Committing depredations on territories at peace with the Queen (s. 126) .. 792
What is depredation .. 792
Receiving property taken by war or depredation (s. 127) 793
No sanction required for prosecution .. 793
Receipt of booty .. 794
"Receives any property," meaning of .. 794

See Sedition.

War—

Prisoner of, Public servant voluntarily allowing, to escape (s. 128) .. 795
Prisoner of, who is .. 796
State prisoner, meaning of 796
Public servant, negligently suffering prisoner of, to escape (s. 129) .. 796
Aiding escape of, rescuing or harbouring prisoner of war (s. 130) .. 797
Harbours or conceals, meaning of .. 798

Warehouse-keeper—

Criminal breach of trust by (s. 407) .. 2141
Who is a .. 2143

Water—

See Public Nuisance.

PAGE

Weights and Measures—

Offences relating to (sections 264-267) .. 1328-1337
Topical Introduction .. 1328
No standard of weights and measures in India as in England .. 1328
Provisions under the English statute .. 1329
Fraudulent use of a false instrument for weighing (s. 264) .. 1329
Police empowered within jurisdiction to enter any place for inspection of .. 1330
Fraudulent use of false scale 1330
Intention to defraud essential .. 1330
When are scales false .. 1331
What is a false balance .. 1331
Temporary contrivance to adjust the balance correct, if liable under the section .. 1332
Fraudulent use of false (s. 265) .. 1332
What is a weight and a measure .. 1333
No weight need necessarily bear a fixed ratio to a measure .. 1334
Small deficiency naturally excluded—quantum of deficiency different according to the nature of the article as coal or gold .. 1333, 1334
What is fraudulent use .. 1333, 1334
Necessity of measure or weight used being a prescribed one .. 1334
Primary duty of person selling to keep correct .. 1334
Being in possession of false (266) .. 1335
Fraud expectant .. 1336
Nature of possession .. 1336
Mere possession not an offence unless accompanied by criminal intention .. 1336
Four things required to complete the crime .. 1336
Evidence of customers dealing with the accused relevant .. 1336
Exception Crown property 1337
Person putting aside wrong weight or measure, as not being in use, no liability .. 1337
No offence where short weight is customary .. 1337
Making or selling short (s. 267) .. 1337
Traffic in false weights .. 1338

PAGE

Weights and Measures—(concld.)

Mere manufacture prohibited not export or import .. 1338
Disposal may or may not be for valuable consideration 1338
Not necessary to make a new weight but a true weight may be made by falsely tampering with it 1338
False use of, when amounts to cheating .. 2230

Wharfinger—

Criminal breach of trust by (s. 407) .. 2141
Who is a .. 2143

Whipping—

As a form of punishment .. 1332
Why condemned and its history .. 1332
Addition to be charged necessary to enable Court to add .. 407
In case of theft .. 1979

Will—

Definition of (s. 31) .. 286
In other acts .. 286
What is a .. 285
Forgery of (s. 467) .. 2476
Fraudulent cancellation, destruction, etc., of a (s. 477) .. 2504

Words and Phrases—

Absconds .. 947
Accident .. 498
Accusation .. 2728
Act .. 288
Act or omission .. 164
Administers or causes to be taken .. 1731
Adulteration .. 1378
Affray .. 883
Agent .. 2158
Alarm .. 2772
Allegiance .. 799
Animals (s. 47) .. 319
Any native Indian subject .. 184
A rash act .. 1614
Assembly .. 1470
Assistance .. 1017, 1018
Attorney .. 282, 2157
Autopsy .. 1582
A will (s. 31) .. 286
Banker .. 2155
Belief .. 2488
Belong to a gang of persons 2072
Benefit .. 596

Words and Phrases—(contd.)	PAGE
Bombs	759
Boxing	513
Brings or attempts to bring or excites	779
British India (s. 15)	221, 222
British India	157
British subject	185
Broker	2157
Building	1994, 2333, 2368
"Buys" or "hires"	1907
Candidate	928
Carcass	1958
Causes	1494, 1665
Chanks	1956
Charge	1163, 1229
Child	518, 1494, 1686
Claim	2459
Class	872
Clerk officer or servant	2000, 2145, 2146
Closed receptable	2421, 2422
Cohabit or have sexual intercourse	2577
Coin	1264, 1266
Combustible and explosive	1411
Conceals or detains	2645, 2646
Concealment	1684
Confinement	1224
Confiscation	357
Connivance	2035
Consent	587
Contractors	2003
Copyright	2516
Corporeal property	252
Corruptly	1095, 1214
Corrupt or foul	1384
Counterfeit (s. 28)	280
Counterfeiting	1268
Court	227, 228
Court of Justice (s. 20)	227
Covenanted servant	237
Covering	2522
Creditors	2271
Culpable negligence	309, 1615
Culpable rashness	309, 1615
Damage	2292
Deadly weapon	833
Death	1493
Death (s. 46)	319
Debt	2271
Deceitful means	1834
Deceiving	2207
Deception	280
Decked vessel	2336
Declaration	323, 928
Defiles	1460
Defraud	271
Delirium tremens	556
Delivery	1292
Depradation	792
Derelict property	2105
Destroys, damages or defiles	1464
Devadasi	1898

Words and Phrases—(contd.)	PAGE
Disaffection	784
Disease	1692
Dishonest	1947
Dishonestly (s. 24)	261, 1983
Dispose of	1899
Disturbance	1468
Documents (s. 29)	281
Domicile	187
Drowning	1587
Drug or medical preparation	1378
Embezzlement	2130
Every person	167
Evidence	283
Excuse	1521
Expecting	893, 894
Fabricating	1058
Factor	2157
False balance	1331
False document	2429, 2430
False light	1399
False mark	2555
Felodese	1639
Felony	312
Fire	2328
Fœticide and Infanticide	1674
Framing or translating	918
Fraud	270
Fraudulently	2217, 2219
Fraudulently (s. 25)	269
Gain	257, 258
Gambling	1443, 1445
Gang	2073
Good faith (s. 52)	324, 579
Goods	2532
Government (s. 17)	223
Government of India (s. 16)	222
Gratification	930
Grave provocation	1546
Habitual association	2075
Habitually deals	2195, 2197
Harbouring	1197
Harbours	880
Harbours or Conceals	798
Harm	601
Hatred, Contempt, disaffection	782, 783
"He" (s. 8)	215
High treason	312
Highway	1403
House	2381
Human being	1493, 1494
Illegal (s. 43)	315
Illicit Intercourse	1868, 1903
Imminent	1531
Immoral	1893, 1904
Imputation	2670
Incorporate	219
Infectious	1361
Infirmity	1691, 1693
Information	487, 983
Injury	1413, 2303, 2308
Injury (s. 44)	317
Instigates	661

Words and Phrases—(contd.)	Page
Institutes	1161
Insubordination	812
Intent	272
Intention	511
Intentional	2012
Intentionally	1078
Intent to defraud	271
Interested	1033, 1728, 2726
Issues	1100
Judge (s. 19)	225
Judicial	436
Keeping	1845
Kidnapping	1831
Know	275
Knowingly	275
Knowledge	1529
Land	253, 254
Law	416
Lawful excuse	1326
Leave	1678
Legal punishment	1212
Legal reward	1194
Let on hire	1896
Life (s. 45)	319
Local law (s. 43)	315
Lottery	1446, 1451
Machinery	1419
Maiming	2308
Making	2431
Malice	1524
Maliciously	255
Malignantly or wantonly	867
Man, woman (s. 10)	216
Mark	1324
Mayhem	2308
Measure	1333
Mens rea	275
Merchant	2156
Misappropriate	2090
Mischief	2286
Mis-demeanour	313
Mistake of fact	420
Month (s. 49)	319
Motive as distinguished from intention	267, 268
Moveable property (s. 22)	250
Moving	1974
Mute deception	2213
Mutiny	800
Native Indian subject	184
Negligence	1389
Nozcitura sociis	1998
Noxious	1368, 1372
Nuisance	1339
Number (s. 9)	215
Oath (s. 51)	321
Object	819
Obscene	1434
Obstruct	1770
Obstruction	1003
Offence (s. 40)	311
Officer	240, 804
Overawe	821

Words and Phrases—(contd.)	Page
Permanently fastened to things attached	255
Person	167, 172
Person (s. 11)	217
Personation	935
Person's wife	279
Petit treason	312
Piracy	194
Place of worship	1461
Poison	1726
Possession	277, 1942
Preparation	2070
Present	707
Presidency (s. 18)	224
Prints or engraves	2767
Prisoner of war	796
Property	2460
Prostitution	1895, 1902
Public	1347, 2718
Public (s 12)	219
Publication	2660
Public function	1007
Public good	2732
Public Nuisance	1339, 1342
Public Place	883
Public question	2708
Public servant (s. 21)	228
Public way	1392
Punishment	329
Queen	228
Queen's coin	1264
Quickening	1665
Rape	1916
Rashness	1389
Rash or negligent act	1389
Reason to believe (s. 26)	274
Receive	1292
Receives	2197
Recourse to authorities	628
Reputation	2674
Rescue	1236
Returned or Impanelled	1261
Run amuck	530
Sacred object	1462
Sale	1895
Section (s. 50)	321
Seduction	1866-1868
Sells, offers, exposes	1379
Sepulchre	1473
Servant of the Queen (s. 14)	220
Shall	143
Signs, seals, executes	2433
Slave	1885
Special law (s. 41)	314
Stamp	1313
State prisoner	796
Subject	276
Suttee	1640
Takes or entices away	2641
Things attached to the earth	254

PAGE

Words and Phrases—(concld.)

Threat .. 1032, 2772
To break a house .. 2377
Treating .. 936
True .. 1109
Truth .. 2694
Undue Influence .. 933
Unlawful .. 287
Unlawfully .. 1362
Uses .. 1332
Uttering .. 1294
Valuable security (s. 30) .. 284
Vessel (s. 48) .. 319
Voluntarily (s. 39) .. 305
Voluntarily .. 1468
Wager .. 1451
Wages war .. 745
Weights .. 1333
Wilfully .. 305, 2511
Will .. 1917
Wrongful .. 255
Wrongful gain (s. 23) .. 255
Wrongful loss .. 255, 260
Year (s. 49) .. 319

Wrongful Confinement—

And wrongful restraint, instances of false imprisonment in English Law .. 1769, 1770
Definition of (s. 340) .. 1776
And wrongful restraint, distinction between .. 1776
A form of wrongful restraint 1777
Aggravated forms of, Enumeration of .. 1777
What is .. 1777
Detention must be involuntary .. 1778
Circumscribing limits necessary .. 1778, 1779
Physical force or corcion not necessary for the offence .. 1778
Imprisonment within an imprisonment .. 1779
What is wrongful .. 1779
Detention must be illegal .. 1779
Good faith and mistake of fact only defence possible 1780
Motive material for proving good faith .. 1780
Mistake when excepted .. 1780, 1781
Defence in case of public servants .. 1781
By public servant when legal act performed with undue harshness .. 1781
Knowledge if material .. 1781
By public servant, high handedness, tyranny or oppression essential .. 1781
True test of wrongfulness 1781, 1782

PAGE

Wrongful Confinement—(contd.)

Cases of police oppression 1781, 1782
Lawful arrest may become unlawful .. 1782
Malice immaterial .. 1782
Mistaken view of law no defence .. 1782
Maxim "Respondeat superior" explained .. 1782, 1783
Principal liable for act done through agency of another 1783
Magistrates maliciously or perversely refusing bail liable under this section .. 1782
False imprisonment and malicious prosecution, Distinction between .. 1783, 1784
Limits of .. 1784
Responsibility of master for acts of servant .. 1784
Power of High Courts to issue writ of habeas corpus 1785
Punishment for (s. 342) .. 1787
Aggravating circumstances 1788
Where, is not continuous, each act a distinct offence 1788
Offence when complete .. 1790
Why, punishable .. 1790
Cases of abuse of lawful authority .. 1791
Ignorance, perversity or malice immaterial .. 1791
Legal confinement .. 1791
Arrest without warrant, cases where authorised .. 1791
Habeas corpus, writ of when issued .. 1792
Contempt of Court, power to order arrest for .. 1792
Aggravated forms of—
(1) For 3 or more days (s. 343) .. 1792
Three days, meaning of .. 1793
Starting point for calculation .. 1793
(2) For 10 or more days (s. 344) .. 1793
Punishment of imprisonment compulsory under the section .. 1794
Confinement initially legal subsequently .. becoming illegal, computation in case of .. 1794
Other additional aggravations .. 1795
(3) Of person for whose liberation writ has been issued (s. 345) .. 1795
In contempt of writ of liberation .. 1796
Knowledge of the issue of the writ essential .. 1796

Wrongful Confinement—(contd.) PAGE

Writ must have been duly issued .. 1797
English Law, writ of "Mainsprize" .. 1796
Such power not possessed by High Courts in India .. 1797
(4) In secret (s. 346) .. 1797
Secret confinement, what is 1798
Offence common on the Bulgarian frontier .. 1798
Offence lies in the intention, not in the success of secrecy .. 1798
(5) To extort property or to constrain to illegal act (s. 347) .. 1798, 1799
Confinement for extorfion 1800
Provisions of section 329 similar .. 1799, 1800
Robbers and dacoits who extort, guilty under this section .. 1800
(6) To extort confession or to compel restoration of property (s. 348) .. 1802
Provisions of section 330 similar .. 1802
Confinement to extort confession .. 1803
Section directed mainly against the police and other officials .. 1803
Liability of persons under a duty to protect persons .. 1804
Assault in attempt to (s. 357) 1829
To confine to be distinguished from an attempt to escape .. 1829
Kidnapping, an aggravated form of .. 1832
Kidnapping or abducting with intent and wrongfully confine a person (s. 365) 1860
Not necessarily distinct from kidnapping .. 1861
Wrongfully concealing or keeping in confinement kidnapped or abducted person (s. 368) .. 1876
Offence known as "accession after the fact" under English Law .. 1876
Provisions applicable to a person other than the kidnapper .. 1876
Knowledge of kidnapping or abduction essential .. 1877
Accused must confine or conceal person so kidnapped .. 1878
Wrongful concealment means no more than, in secret defined in section 346 .. 1878
Intention to keep kidnapped person out of view must be apparent .. 1879
Confinement must be wrongful .. 1878
Merely giving false information is not wrongful concealment .. 1878

Wrongful Gain—

Definition of (s. 23) .. 255
Not found in English Law 256
Test of wrongfulness .. 256
Meaning of the concept .. 256
Essentials of (1) use of unlawful means and (2) unlawful acquisitions .. 256
What is "unlawful" .. 256
What "gain" implies .. 257, 258
Not necessarily dishonest gain .. 258
Motive as distinguished from intention immaterial .. 258
Wrongfully gaining property in the case of joint property .. 259
Gain means material gain, not sentimental gain .. 259
And Wrongful loss correlated .. 260

Wrongful Loss—

Definition of (s. 23) .. 255
What is .. 260
Person in possession of property to which he is not legally entitled as stolen property cannot suffer .. 260
Illustrative cases .. 260
Act causing, must be the proximate cause of that act but not too remote .. 261
Wrongful retention distinguished from .. 261

Wrongful Restraint—

Definition of (s. 339) .. 1768
Both, and wrongful confinement have many common elements .. 1769
And wrongful confinement, instances of false imprisonment in English Law .. 1770
Everyman's right of personal liberty .. 1770
Right of, may accure under process of Court .. 1770

	PAGE
Wrongful Restraint—(contd.)
Essentials of the offence ..	1770
What is ..	1770, 1771
Physical compulsion not necessary for ..	1771
Obstruction, what is ..	1772
No obstruction, Case of ..	1772
Offence determined by effect caused, not by nature of act ..	1772
Obstruction not necessirily a physical element ..	1772
Voluntary obstruction, what is ..	1772, 1773
Act necessarily illegal	1770, 1773, 1774
Act must be to obstruct person ..	1773
To amount to obstruction, unconditional prevention of movements necessary	1773
Voluntary obstruction a question of fact	1773
Persuasion not obstruction ..	1774
Restraint implies desire ..	1774
Resistance under claim of right ..	1775
Exception ..	1775
Good faith, a question of fact ..	1776
Punishment for (s. 341) ..	1785
Section refers to simplest form of the offence, aggravated forms provided elsewhere ..	1785
If Magistrate can remove obstruction on conviction	1785
Necessary elements in ..	1786
Not necessary that, should be of short duration ..	1786
Theft after preparation made for causing death hurt or, in order to the committing of it (s. 382) ..	2006, 2007
Necessary in Robbery ..	2038, 2639
Mischief committed after preparation made for causing death or hurt or, (s. 440) ..	2339
House trespass after preparation for hurt, assault or, (s. 452) ..	2394
Lurking house-trespass or house-breaking after preparation for hurt, assault or, (s. 455) ..	2403
Lurking house-trespass or house-breaking by night after preparation for hurt, assault or (s. 458) ..	2413
Year—
Definition of (s. 49) ..	319
Same as Gregorian Calendar ..	320
Provision in other acts ..	320
True measure of ..	320
In computing period of sentence ..	320
The day on which sentence is passed counted as a whole day ..	320

Printed by Mr. W. R. Khan at Karim Bux Bros., Printers, 9, Anthony Bagan, Calcutta.

लाल बहादुर शास्त्री राष्ट्रीय प्रशासन अकादमी, पुस्तकालय
Lal Bahadur Shastri National Academy of Administration Library मसूरी
MUSSOORIE

यह पुस्तक निम्नांकित तारीख तक वापिस करनी है।
This book is to be returned on the date last stamped.

दिनांक Date	उधारकर्त्ता की संख्या Borrower's No.	दिनांक Date	उधारकर्त्ता की संख्या Borrower's No.

107468
345
Geu
4th ed.
V.2
अवाप्ति संख्या
Acc No. 2628
वर्ग संख्या
Class No.
पुस्तक सख्या
Book No.
लेखक
Author Geur.
शीर्षक
Title The Penal Law of 345
Geu
4th ed.
2628
LIBRARY
LAL BAHADUR SHASTRI
National Academy of Administration
MUSSOORIE
Accession No. 107468
Books are issued for 15 days only but may have to be recalled earlier if urgently required.
An overdue charge of 25 Paise per day will be charged.